- Lumsden, J. A common error with chi-square. Australian Journal of Psychology, 1961, 13, 55, June.
- McElwain, D. W., and Keats, J. A. Multidimensional unfolding: some geometrical solutions. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 325, September.
- Mandel, J. Non-additivity in two-way analysis of variance. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 878, December.
- Marks, M. R., Christal, R. E., and Bottenberg, R. A. Simple formula aids for understanding the joint action of two predictors. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 285, October.
- Morrill, C. S. Teaching machines: a review. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 363, September.
- Neyman, J., and Scott, E. L. Further comments on the "Final report of the advisory committee on weather control." Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 580, September.
- Peach, P. Bias in pseudo-random numbers. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 610, September.
- Pearlin, L. I. The appeals of anonymity in questionnaire response. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 640, Winter.
- Rapoport A., and Horvath, W. J. A study of a large sociogram. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 279, October.
- Saunders, D. R. The rationale for an "oblimax" method of transformation in factor analysis. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 317, September.
- Shephard, R. W. An appraisal of some of the problems of measurement in operational research. Operational Research Quarterly, 1961, 12, 161, September.
- Stekler, H. O. Forecasting industrial production. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 869, December.
- Theil, H., and Nagar, A. L. Testing the independence of regression disturbances. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 793, December.
- Thompson, J. W. Meteorological models in social dynamics. I: concepts in meteorology. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 43, February.
- Thompson, J. W. Meteorological models in social dynamics. II: the extension of meteorological concepts to sociology. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 51, February.
- Weinberger, M. Does the " sleeper effect " apply to advertising? Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 65, October.
- Weinwurm, E. H. Limits of the scientific method. The Engineering Economist, 1961, 7, 27, Fall.

Motivation and Personality

- Barber, T. X. Physiological effects of "hypnosis." Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 390, September.
- Binder, A., and Salop, P. Reinforcement and personality factors in verbal conditioning. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 379, October.
- Block, J. Ego identity, role variability, and adjustment. Journal of Consulting Psychology, 1961, 25, 392, October.
- Carlson, E. R. Motivation and set in acquiring information about persons. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 285, September.

- Champion, R. A. Motivational effects in approach-avoidance conflict. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 354, September.
- Croner, M. D., and Willis, R. H. Perceived differences in task competence and asymmetry of dyadic influence. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 705, May.
- Deutsch, M. Courage as a concept in social psychology. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 49, October.
- Garmezy, N., Clarke, A. R., and Stockner, C. Child rearing attitudes of mothers and fathers as reported by schizophrenic and normal patients. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 176, July.
- Gerard, H. B., and Rabbie, J. M. Fear and social comparison. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 586, May.
- Gumpert, P., Thibaut, J. W., and Shuford, E. H. Effect of personality and status experience upon the valuation of unobtained statuses. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 47, July.
- Harned, L. Authoritarian attitudes and party activity. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 393, Fall.
- Heilbrun, A. B., Jr. Maternal authoritarianism, social class, and filial schizophrenia. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 235, October.
- Hokanson, J. E. The effects of frustration and anxiety on overt aggression. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 346, March.
- Irwin, F. W. On desire, aversion, and the affective zero. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 293, September.
- King, F. J., Bowman, B. H., and Moreland, H. J. Some intellectual correlates of biochemical variability. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 297, October.
- Kleiner, R. J., and Tuckman, J. Multiple group membership and schizophrenia. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 292, October.
- Kregarman, J. J., and Worchel, P. Arbitrariness of frustration and aggression. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 183, July.
- Lowe, A. Individual differences in reaction to failure: mode of coping with anxiety and interference proneness. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 303, March.
- Maslow, A. R. Some relationships between social conformity and self perception. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Milgram, N. A. Microgenetic analysis of word associations in schizophrenic and brain damaged patients. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 364, March.
- Painting, D. H. The performance of psychopathic individuals under conditions of positive and negative partial reinforcement. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 352, March.
- Pikas, A. Children's attitudes toward rational versus inhibiting parental authority. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 315, March.
- Pine, F. Incidental versus focal presentation of drive related stimuli. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 482, May.
- Podell, J. E. A comparison of generalization and adaptation-level as theories of connotation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 593, May.
- Reimanis, G., and Davol, S. H. Correlates and prediction of anomie in a VA domiciliary. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 237, December.
- Sanua, V. D. Sociocultural factors in families of schizophrenics. Psychiatry, 1961, 24, 246, August.
- Sarnoff, I., and Zimbardo, P. G. Anxiety, fear, and social affiliation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 356, March.
- Schachter, S., Willerman, B., Festinger, L., and Hyman, R. Emotional disruption and industrial productivity. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 201, August.
- Tucker, W. T., and Painter, J. J. Personality and product use. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 325, October.
- Van Buskirk, C. Performance on complex reasoning tasks as a function of anxiety. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 201, March.
- Weiner, H., and McGinnies, E. Authoritarianism, conformity, and confidence in a perceptual judgment situation. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 77, October.
- Witkin, H. A. Cognitive development and the growth of personality. Acta Psychologica, 1961, 18, 245.
- Zagona, S. V., and MacKinnon W. J. Open-mindedness and hypotheses of interdependence between libertarian and equalitarian processes. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 347, October.

Opinions and Attitudes

- Bauer, R. A. Risk handling in drug adoption: the role of company preference. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 546, Winter.
- Beloff, J., and Beloff, H. The influence of valence on distance judgments of human faces. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 720, May.
- Belson, W. A. The effects of television on the reading and the buying of newspapers and magazines. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 366, Fall.
- Blake, R. R., and Mouton, J. S. Perceived characteristics of elected representatives. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 693, May.

Breed, W., and Ktsanes, T. Pluralistic ignorance in the process of opinion formation. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 382, Fall.

Burke, R. L., and Bennis, W. G. Changes in perception of self and others during human relations training. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 165, February.

Byrne, D. Interpersonal attraction and attitude similarity. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 713, May.

Cohn, T. S., Fisher, A., and Brown, V. Leadership and predicting attitudes of others. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 199, December.

Cohn, T. S., Yee, W., and Brown, V. Attitude change and interpersonal attraction. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 207, December.

Cole, D. L. The perception of Lincoln: a psychological approach to the public's conception of historical figures. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 23, October.

Gerard, H. B., and Rotter, G. S. Time perspective, consistency of attitude, and social influence. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 565, May.

Gleitman, H., and Greenbaum, J. J. Attitudes and personality patterns of Hungarian refugees. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 351, Fall.

Greenstein, F. I. More on children's images of the President. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 648, Winter.

Jung, A. F. Attitudes toward customers at financial institutions. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 414, Fall.

Lavidge, R. J., and Steiner, G. A. A model for predictive measurements of advertising effectiveness. Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 59, October.

Maccoby, N., and Maccoby, E. E. Homeostatic theory in attitude change. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 538, Winter.

Maccoby, E. E., Maccoby, N., Romney, A. K., and Adams, J. S. Social reinforcement in attitude change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 109, July.

Manis, M. The interpretation of opinion statements as a function of message ambiguity and recipient attitude. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 76, July.

Manis, M. The interpretation of opinion statements as a function of recipient attitude and source prestige. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 82, July.

Quay, L. C., Bartlett, C. J., Wrightsman, L. S., Jr., and Catron, D. Attitude change in attendant employees. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 27, October.

Radloff, R. Opinion evaluation and affiliation.

Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 578, May.

Seeman, M., and Evans, J. W., Apprenticeship and attitude change. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 365, January.

Smock, C. D., and Kanfer, F. H. Response bias and perception. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 158, August.

Stempel, G. H. III Selectivity in readership of political news. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 400, Fall.

Swank, T. E. An analysis of the social diffusion of an audio-visual message through a church congregation. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.

Taylor, J. B. What do attitude scales measure: the problem of social desirability. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 386, March.

Weiss, W. An examination of attitude toward negroes. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 3, October.

Wurster, C. R., Bass, B. M., and Alcock, W. A test of the proposition: we want to be esteemed most by those we esteem most highly. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 650, November.

Zeisel, H. The opinion game and the danger of stereotypes. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 655, Winter.

Cognitive Processes and Individual Decision Making

Anderson, N. H. Two learning models for responses measured on a continuous scale. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 391, December.

Atkinson, R. C. A generalization of stimulus sampling theory. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 281, September.

Ausubel, D. P., and Fitzgerald, D. The role of discriminability in meaningful verbal learning and retention. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 266, October.

Beach, L., and Wertheimer, M. A free response approach to the study of person cognition. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 367, March.

Behrend, E. R., and Bitterman, M. E. Probability-matching in the fish. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 542, December.

Bower, G. H. Application of a model to paired-associate learning. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 255, September.

Bruner, J. S., and Tajfel, H. Cognitive risk and environmental change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 231, March.

Cunningham, R. M. Customer loyalty to store and brand. Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 127 November-December.

- Edwards, W. Probability learning in 1000 trials. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 385, October.
- Elkind, D. The development of the additive composition of classes in the child: Piaget Replication Study III. Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1961, 99, 51, September.
- Ellsberg, D. Risk, ambiguity, and the Savage axioms. Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1961, 75, 643, November.
- Epstein, W., and Ebenholtz, S. M. Evidence for incremental processes in associative learning. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 319, October.
- Erlick, D. E. Judgments of the relative frequency of a sequential series of two events. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 105, August.
- Ervin, S. M. Changes with age in the verbal determinants of word-association. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 361, September.
- Feldman, J., and Newell, A. A note on a class of probability matching models. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 333, September.
- Fellner, W. Distortion of subjective probabilities as a reaction to uncertainty. Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1961, 75, 670, November.
- Fisher, S. Achievement themes and directionality of autokinetic movement. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 64, July.
- Gagné, R. M., and Brown, L. T. Some factors in the programming of conceptual learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 313, October.
- Gonzalez, R. C., Eskin, R. M., and Bitterman, M. E. Alternating and random partial reinforcement in the fish, with some observations on asymptotic resistance to extinction. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 561, December.
- Gutman, H. The biological roots of creativity. Genetic Psychology Monographs, 1961, 64, 417, November.
- Haines, G. H., Jr. The rote marketer. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 357, October.
- Herman, S. N. Explorations in the social psychology of language choice. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 149, February.
- Hickson, R. H. Response probability in a two-choice learning situation with varying probability of reinforcement. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 138, August.
- Hoffman, L. R. Conditions for creative problem solving. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 429, October.
- Hollander, E. P. Some effects of perceived status on responses to innovative behavior. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 247, September.
- Jensen, A. R. An empirical theory of the serial-position effect. Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, 127, January.
- Jones, J. E. Deviations from matching behavior in probability learning. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 335, October.
- Klein, M. W. Ambiguity and response conflict: a conceptual and experimental analysis. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Koehler, J., Jr. Role of instructions in two-choice verbal conditioning with contingent partial reinforcement. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 122, August.
- Kraeling, D. Analysis of amount of reward as a variable in learning. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 560, October.
- Lanzetta, J. T., and Kanareff, V. T. The effects of congruent and conflicting social and task feedback on the acquisition of an imitative response. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 322, October.
- Leslie, G. R., and Richardson, A. H. Life-cycle, career pattern, and the decision to move. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 894, December.
- Lockhead, G. R. A re-evaluation of evidence of one-trial associative learning. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 590, December.
- Losen, S. M. The differential effects of censure on the problem-solving behavior of schizophrenic and normal subjects. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 258, September.
- Luchins, A. S., and Luchins, E. H. Einstellung effect in social learning. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 59, October.
- MacKay, D. M. Operational aspects of some fundamental concepts of human communication. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 183, December.
- McDaniel, E. D., Halter, A. N., and Hartford, D. L. Grade utility: a new noncognitive factor in academic prediction. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1961, 21, 621, Autumn.
- McGuire, W. J. A multiprocess model for paired-associate learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 335, October.
- McReynolds, P., and Collins, B. Concept-forming behavior in schizophrenic and non-schizophrenic subjects. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 369, October.
- Michels, K. M., Pustek, J. J., Jr., and Johnson, J. I., Jr. Solution of patterned-strings problems by raccoons. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 439, August.
- Morris, C. Values, problematic and unproblematic, and science. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 205, December.
- Murphy, G. Toward a field theory of communication. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 196, December.
- Muth, J. F. Rational expectations and the - theory of price movements. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 315, July.

- Myers, J. L., Reilly, R. E., and Taub, H. A., Differential cost, gain, and relative frequency of reward in a sequential choice situation. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 357, October.
- Nelson, R. R. Uncertainty, learning, and the economics of parallel research and development efforts. Review of Economics and Statistics, 1961, 43, 351, November.
- Northrop, F. S. C. The human communicants in communication engineering. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 202, December.
- Overall, J. E., and Brown, W. L. A factor analysis of several measures of choice behavior from a probability learning situation. Journal of General Psychology, 1962, 66, 115, January.
- Penney, R. K., and Lupton, A. A. Children's discrimination learning as a function of reward and punishment. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 449, August.
- Piaget, J. The genetic approach to the psychology of thought. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 275, December.
- Pruitt, D. G. Informational requirements in making decisions. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 433, September.
- Pulos, L., and Spilka, B. Perceptual selectivity, memory, and antisemitism. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 690, May.
- Restle, F. Statistical methods for a theory of cue learning. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 291, September.
- Rivoire, J. L. The development of reference systems in children. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, September.
- Rosen, S. Postdecision affinity for incompatible information. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 188, July.
- Rosenzweig, M. R. Comparisons among word-association responses in English, French, German, and Italian. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 347, September.
- Rubinstein, I. Supplementary report: the influence of one stimulus on the prediction of the alternative stimulus in two-choice problems. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 311, September.
- Schusterman, R. J. The use of strategies in the decision-behavior of children, chimpanzees and monkeys. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Sebeok, T. A., and Zeps, V. J. Computer research in psycholinguistics: toward an analysis of poetic language. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 365, October.
- Singer, R. D. Verbal conditioning and generalization of prodemocratic responses. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 43, July.
- Sinnott, E. W. The biological basis of communication. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 190, December.
- Smelser, W. T. Dominance as a factor in achievement and perception in cooperative problem solving interactions. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 535, May.
- Suppes, P. Behavioristic foundations of utility. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 186, April.
- Suppes, P., and Zinnes, J. L. Stochastic learning theories for a response continuum with non-determinate reinforcement. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 373, December.
- Swets, J. A., Tanner, W. P., Jr., and Birdsall, T. G. Decision processes in perception. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 301, September.
- Toch, H., Allen, T., and Lazer, W. The public image of cancer etiology. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 411, Fall.
- Wesley, F. The number concept: a phylogenetic review. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 420, September.
- Wrightman, L. S., Jr., and Baumeister, A. A. A comparison of actual and paper-and-pencil versions of the water jar test of rigidity. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 191, July.
- Yamaguchi, S., and Warren, J. M. Single versus double alternation learning by cats. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 533, October.
- Zajonc, R. B., and Burnstein, E. The resolution of cognitive conflict under uncertainty. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 113, February.
- Zimmerman, D. W. The effect of deprivation and satiation on secondary reinforcement developed by two methods. Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1961, 99, 139, September.
- Pfeiffer, J., Problems, too, have problems. Fortune, 1961, 144, October.

Interpersonal Influence

- Birney, R. C., and Houston, J. P. The effects of creativity, norm distance, and instructions on social influence. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 294, September.
- Byrne, D., Terrill, J., and McReynolds, P. Incongruity as a predictor of response to humor. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 435, March.
- Cervin, V. B., Joyner, R. C., Spence, J. M., and Heinzl, R. Relationship of persuasive interaction to change of opinion in dyadic groups when the original opinions of participants are expressed privately and publicly. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 431, March.
- Davis, J. A. Compositional effects, role systems, and the survival of small discussion groups. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 574, Winter.

Gerard, H. B. Disagreement with others, their credibility, and experienced stress. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 559, May.

Janowitz, M. Mass persuasion and international relations. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 560, Winter.

Julian, J. W., and Steiner, I. D. Perceived acceptance as a determinant of conformity behavior. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 191, December.

Lana, R. E. Familiarity and the order of presentation of persuasive communications. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 573, May.

Levin, M. L. Social climates and political socialization. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 596, Winter.

Lewan, P. C., and Stotland, E. The effects of prior information on susceptibility to an emotional appeal. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 450, March.

McGuire, W. J. Resistance to persuasion conferred by active and passive prior refutation of the same and alternative counterarguments. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 326, September.

Michael, J. A. High school climates and plans for entering college. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 585, Winter.

Papageorgis, D., and McGuire, W. J. The generality of immunity to persuasion produced by pre-exposure to weakened counter-arguments. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 475, May.

Shaw, M. E. Some correlates of social acquiescence. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 133, October.

Smith, E. E. The power of dissonance techniques to change attitudes. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 626, Winter.

Vidulich, R. N., and Kaiman, I. P. The effects of information source status and dogmatism upon conformity behavior. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 639, November.

Zajonc, R. B., and Wahi, N. K. Conformity and need-achievement under cross-cultural norm conflict. Human relations, 1961, 14, 241, August.

Group Behavior

Anderson, N. H. Group performance in an anagram task. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 67, October.

Berkowitz, L., and Macaulay, J. R. Some effects of differences in status level and status stability. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 135, February.

Bjerstedt, A. Preparation, process, and product in small group interaction. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 183, February.

Borgatta, M. L. Power structure and coalitions in three person groups. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 287, December.

Byrne, D. Interpersonal attraction as a function of affiliation need and attitude similarity. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 283, August.

Cassel, R. N. A construct validity study on a leadership and a social insight tests for 200 college freshman students. Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1961, 99, 165, September.

Cohen, A. M. Changing small group communication networks. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 116, September.

Cohen, A. M., and Bennis, W. G. Continuity of leadership in communication networks. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 351, November.

Cohen, A. M., Bennis, W. G., and Wolkon, G. H. The effects of continued practice on the behaviors of problem-solving groups. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 416, December.

Crook, R. B. Communication and group structure. Journal of Communication, 1961, 11, 136, September.

Deutsch, M. The interpretation of praise and criticism as a function of their social context. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 391, March.

Haines, G., Heider, F., and Remington, D. The computer as a small-group member. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 360, December.

Hoffman, L. R., and Maier, N. R. F. Quality and acceptance of problem solutions by members of homogeneous and heterogeneous groups. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 401, March.

Kelley, H. H., and Ring, K. Some effects of "suspicious" versus "trusting" training schedules. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 294, September.

Krislov, S. Groping in group theory. Public Administration Review, 1961, 21, 157, Summer.

Lindzey, G., Lykken, D. T., and Winston, H. D. Confusion, conviction, and control groups. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 221, July.

Lott, A. J., and Lott, B. E. Group cohesiveness, communication level and conformity. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, March.

Lott, B. E. Group cohesiveness: a learning phenomenon. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 275, December.

Lyle, Jack. Communication, group atmosphere, productivity, and morale in small task groups. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 369, November.

- Mann, R. D. Dimensions of individual performance in small groups under task and social-emotional conditions. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 674, May.
- Nokes, P. Feedback as an explanatory device in the study of certain interpersonal and institutional processes. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 281, November.
- Rosen, J. Dominance behavior of the adult rat as a function of early social experience. Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1961, 99, 145, September.
- Rosenblum, L. A. The development of social behavior in the rhesus monkey. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, September.
- Schultz, W. C. On group composition. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 275, March.
- Singer, J. D. Primary groups and the political system: simulation and reality. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 336, October.
- Stotland, E., and Cottrell, N. B. Self-esteem, group interaction, and group influence on performance. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 273, September.
- Stradtbeck, F. L., and Hook, L. H. The social dimensions of a twelve-man jury table. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 397, December.
- Thomas, E. J., and Fink, C. F. Models of group problem solving. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 53, July.
- Tiedemann, J. G. An investigation of the influence of group standards and deviate member behavior on the exhibited racial prejudice of an individual. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Wallace, S. E. Patterns of interaction: the significance of numbers on togetherness. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Whitmyre, J. W., Diggory, J. C., and Cohen, D. The effects of personal liking, perceived ability, and value of prize on choice of partners for a competition. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 63, 198, July.
- Winick, C. The diffusion of an innovation among physicians in a large city. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 384, December.
- Wolfe, D. M. Social influence toward unanimous group decision in various group authority structures. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Ziller, R. C., and Behringer, R. D. A longitudinal study of the assimilation of the new child in the group. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 121, February.
- Burlingame, J. F. Information technology and decentralization. Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 121, November-December.
- Burns, T. Micropolitics: mechanisms of institutional change. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 257, December.
- Campbell, D. T., and Damarin, F. L. Measuring leadership attitudes through an information test. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 159, December.
- Cooper, W. W. Some implications of the newer analytic approaches to management. California Management Review, 1961, 4, 51, Fall.
- Daniel, D. R. Management information crisis. Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 111, September-October.
- Derber, M., Chalmers, W. E., and Edelman, M. T. Union participation in plant decision-making. Industrial and Labor Relations Review, 1961, 15, 83, October.
- Donaldson, C. Soviet management. Manager, 1961, 29, 771, October.
- Evan, W. M., and Zelditch, M., Jr. A laboratory experiment on bureaucratic authority. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 883, December.
- Fisch, G. G. Line-staff is obsolete. Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 67, September-October.
- Forehand, G. A., and Guetzkow, H. The administrative judgment test as related to descriptions of executive judgment behaviors. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 257, August.
- Goodman, E. H. Effects of computers on personnel. Data Processing, 1961, 3, 9, November.
- Grusky, O. Corporate size, bureaucratization, and managerial succession. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 261, November.
- Hearle, E. F. R. How useful are "scientific" tools of management? Public Administration Review, 1961, 21, 206, Autumn.
- Hund, J. M. Decentralization in a wider context. California Management Review, 1961, 4, 65, Fall.
- Kilbridge, M. D. Turnover, absence, and transfer rates as indicators of employee dissatisfaction with repetitive work. Industrial and Labor Relations Review, 1961, 15, 21, October.
- Landsberger, H. A. The horizontal dimension in bureaucracy. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 299, December.
- McGuire, J. W. The concept of the firm. California Management Review, 1961, 3, 64, Summer.
- Maier, N. R. F., and Hoffman, L. R. Organization and creative problem solving. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 277, August.
- Nadler, E. B. Psychological analysis of organizational ideology. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 223, December.

Organizational Behavior

Argyris, C. Explorations in consulting-client relationships. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 121, Fall.

- O'Donnell, C. Ground rules for using committees. Management Review, 1961, 50, 63, October.
- Perrow, C. The analysis of goals in complex organizations. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 854, December.
- Perrucci, R. The significance of intra-occupational mobility: some methodological and theoretical notes, together with a case study of engineers. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 874, December.
- Prentice, W. C. H. Understanding leadership. Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 143, September-October.
- Rogers, D., and Berg, I. E., Jr. Occupation and ideology: the case of the small businessman. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 103, Fall.
- Udy, S. H., Jr. Technical and institutional factors in production organization: a preliminary model. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 247, November.
- Wilson, C. Z. Organization theory: a survey of three views. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business, 1961, 1, 53, August.
- family in sociological theory. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 312, November.
- Gross, E. Social integration and the control of competition. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 270, November.
- Jahoda, M. A social-psychological approach to the study of culture. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 23, February.
- Katz, E., and Zloczower, A. Ethnic continuity in an Israeli town: I. relations with parents. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 293, November.
- Katz, E., and Zloczower, A. Ethnic continuity in an Israeli town: II. relations with peers. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 309, November.
- Klietsch, R. G. Decision-making in dairy farming: a sociological analysis. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.
- Lazerwitz, B. A comparison of major United States religious groups. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 568, September.
- Maccoby, E. E. The choice of variables in the study of socialization. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 357, December.
- Macpherson, C. B. Market concepts in political theory. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, 1961, 27, 490, November.
- Nahirny, V. C. Some observations on ideological groups. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 397, January.
- Preston, L. E., and Bell, E. J. The statistical analysis of industry structure: an application to food industries. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 925, December.
- Putney, S., and Middleton, R. Ethical relativism and anomia. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 430, January.
- Schelling, T. C. The future of arms control. Operations Research, 1961, 9, 722, September-October.
- Schnore, L. F. Municipal annexations and the growth of metropolitan suburbs, 1950-60. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 406, January.
- Sewell, W. H., Social class and childhood personality. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 340, December.
- Singer, J. D. The relevance of the behavioral sciences to the study of international relations. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 324, October.
- Taeuber, K. E., Haenszel, W., and Sirken, M. G. Residence histories and exposure residences for the United States population. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 824, December.
- Thomlinson, R. A model for migration analysis. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 675, September.
- Tilly, C. Occupational rank and grade of residence in a metropolis. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 323, November.
- Vogel, E. The go-between in a developing soci-

Voting Behavior

- Campbell, A., and Valen, H. Party identification in Norway and the United States. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 505, Winter.
- Greer, S. Catholic voters and the democratic party. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 611, Winter.

Culture and Institutions

- Constas, H. The U.S.S.R.—from charismatic sect to bureaucratic society. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 282, December.
- Deutsch, M. The face of bargaining. Operations Research, 1961, 9, 886, November-December.
- Duncan, B., Sabagh, G., and Van Arsdol, M. D., Jr. Patterns of city growth. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 418, January.
- Duncan, O. D. Occupational components of educational differences in income. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 783, December.
- Easterlin, R. A. The American baby boom in historical perspective. American Economic Review, 1961, 51, 869, December.
- Ehrlich, H. J. The reputational approach to the study of community power. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 926, December.
- Fallding, H. The family and the idea of a cardinal role: a sociological study. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 329, November.
- Gamson, W. A. The fluoridation dialogue: is it an ideological conflict? Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 526, Winter.
- Greenfield, S. M. Industrialization and the ety: the case of the Japanese marriage arranger. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 112, Fall.

Ward, W. Continuities and discontinuities in denominational loyalty: a Lehigh Valley study of residential movement and church membership. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.

Warriner, C. K. Public opinion and collective action: formation of a watershed district. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 333, December.

Wood, A. L. A socio-structural analysis of murder, suicide, and economic crime in Ceylon. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 744, October.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The Presidential Election and Transition 1960-1961. EDITED BY PAUL T. DAVID. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1961. Pp. ix, 353. $3.75.)

This book is a useful addition to the series of studies of the electoral process that the Brookings Institution has published in recent years. The Institution is making a valuable contribution in devoting continuing attention to this particular field. Periodic studies afford a depth and a comparative dimension that in itself is the surest antidote to and safeguard against impressionistic interpretation in an area where that has been all too common.

In this volume particular attention is given to changes and trends in the apparatus, procedures and emphases of campaigning, the function of the convention, the process of platform construction. Although the format is not the same, the central concern of the first half of this book is not unlike the pioneer studies, The 1928 Campaign and The 1932 Campaign produced by Roy V. Peel and Thomas C. Donnelly thirty years ago. In the intervening years the literature on voting causation, techniques of polling and election analysis has undergone marked change. Political vocabularies have been colored by the statistical and behavioral disciplines. The basic problems have not changed, however, and it is useful as well as interesting to note how little new there was in the 1960 campaign.

Since the present work also covers much the same ground as Theodore White's book, comparisons are inevitable. Both books have their particular assets: White's extensive reportorial man-on-the-spot access plus his "insider's" view versus Brookings' "team" resources. Both have the advantage of advance planning—the recording of politics in action, rather than the post hoc methods of recapturing already completed action. The White book comes off better as a literary product. It is better journalism and more dynamic political science, but the David volume is a worthy contribution.

Actually, the symposium (twelve chapters contributed by ten writers) comprises two monographs, one treating the 1960 campaign, the other the transition and transfer of the presidency in 1960-1961. The conception of the book emphasizes the interrelated character of our political processes—the continuity of all phases of the presidency. Yet, for all its recognition of the inseparability of election and administration, the present work has not gone all the way. It presents within a single volume the campaign and the transition—in tandem; it does not incorporate them into a single panoramic treatment of the period under scrutiny. Nor, indeed, does it treat them as interstitial parts of a single structure. The first six chapters, comprising approximately half the book, deal with various aspects of the 1960 campaign. The final six chapters are concerned primarily with the transition from one administration to its successor. There is little cross reference from one subject to the other. The inherent unity of the subject matter is not organically recognized in the execution of the work.

Nevertheless, the book will find a ready market because it fulfills a real need. What it may lack because of attempting to cover too much ground within a single volume is at least partially offset by its utility in making readily available in highly readable form a number of factual, authoritative and in some instances penetrating essays upon pertinent aspects of significant recent events.

It is impossible to treat individually all of the essays. Each has its own particular merits. Among the chapters relating to the election, it seems likely that the one on finance by Herbert E. Alexander and V. O. Key's interpretation of the election results will be most useful. The former is systematic, comprehensive, well documented yet highly compressed; it will be a standard source for some time to come. Key's sophisticated interpretation of the statistical data yielded by improved techniques of recording election results should give pause to analysts tempted to indulge in sweeping generalizations concerning voting causation.

The chapters on transition and transfer are chiefly narrative; they provide a compact yet adequately detailed review of the many-sided problem of changing the guard. Party and congressional interpretations are contributed by Senators Eugene McCarthy and Thruston Morton. John M. Hightower's essay on the impact of the campaign on foreign relations commands particular attention. For one thing, it is unique because it brings into a book about our election processes the external ramifications of what we have traditionally regarded as the most domestic—almost private—aspect of our political life.

Among the essays some repetition occurs but not enough to be objectionable; more serious is the range in thoroughness of treatment—from meticulous analysis to off-the-cuff commentary. Perhaps this is unavoidable in a symposium of this type.

One wishes for more detail at a number of places. In the campaign chapters: special uses of the vice-presidential candidates, changing organizational situations at the state and local levels, relationships with other party leaders. In the transition section, Eisenhower-Kennedy contrasts as they affected the transition adjustments are touched upon but only enough to tantalize, not to illuminate. Obviously, space limitations are to blame for these minor shortcomings.—LAWRENCE H. CHAMBERLAIN, Columbia University.

Freedom and Protection: The Bill of Rights. By ANDREW D. WEINBERGER. (San Francisco: The Chandler Publishing Co., 1961. Pp. xix, 180. Paper $1.75, cloth $3.50.)

Courts and Rights: The American Judiciary in Action. By JOHN P. ROCHE. (New York: Random House, 1961. Pp. xiii, 117. $1.35.)

Freedom and Protection is essentially a book for nonspecialists on the Bill of Rights broadly defined. The bulk of the book is consumed by 14 chapters, each of which begins with a short introductory note citing the significant historical and political developments for the particular freedom or right being discussed. This is followed in each case by short excerpts from one to three relevant Supreme Court opinions. The opinions seem to have been chosen primarily to give the flavor or tone of Supreme Court attitudes rather than to state the holding or rule of the particular case.

Although 13 justices of the court are represented, approximately one-half of the contributions are from Frankfurter (5), Black (4), and Warren (3). On balance Weinberger's notes are dispassionate and seemingly unexceptionable, though an occasional imprecision in expression occurs. For example, the case of Shelley v. Kraemer, as Weinberger asserts, stands for the proposition that racial land covenants cannot be enforced. But to describe such covenants today as "entirely meaningless" is, at the least, a misleading emphasis.

John P. Roche has also written a short paper-back in the Random House series—"Studies in Political Science." The book deals, as the author says, with the struggle for justice in the United States and the role of the judiciary in that struggle. Specifically, the volume treats such topics as the rule of law, the judicial process, and the rights of citizens. In a final chapter on the judiciary and the democratic process, the author adopts the view of Learned Hand that "the current policy power of the federal judiciary is an anomaly in our democratic system." This conclusion, however, comes as somewhat of a surprise since there is little in the preceding pages to suggest that the author is concerned about such matters.

Courts and Rights is written in a felicitous and readable style which some may find entertaining. Yet certain deficiencies may be mentioned. Viewed as a book for the specialist, there is nothing new here—fact or interpretation. Indeed, the initiated will probably be irritated by the oversimplifications, the clichés, and the "cute" asides which mar this work. Jefferson Davis and Robert E. Lee, even in 1866, are not best described as "rebels and traitors" who "were fortunate to escape with their heads intact." The President and the Congress did not unite "to lock 75,000 American citizens of Japanese ancestry in concentration camps for possessing enemy chromosomes." Professor Roche's penchant for clever and immoderate comment only serves to dilute the informative and thought-provoking functions that a work such as this might have.

Viewed as supplementary or textual material for undergraduate students, the book may be compared to previous studies in this series dealing with the same or similar subject matter. Courts and Rights is a cut below Victor Rosenblum's Law as a Political Instrument and Jack Peltason's Federal Courts in the Political Process in carefulness of statement, systematic coverage of relevant subject matter, and organization. Professor Roche's loose use of language has been noted. Since he does not identify his frame of reference or tell us why he has written his book, it is not clear why some materials are included and others left out; nor why some topics are discussed in depth and others ignored or given cursory consideration.

The author's treatment of the topics he chooses to discuss is not always adequate. In discussing "clear and present danger" Professor Roche is seemingly oblivious to the extent to which that concept has been undermined in recent years. His tendency to downgrade the libertarian heritage of the common law runs counter to the posture taken by J. A. C. Grant in Our Common Law Constitution—a book Professor Roche does not cite. The intentions behind the federal Bill of Rights, often a subject of controversy, present no problem for the author of Courts and Rights. Since civil liberties in the colonies meant noninterference in the American status quo, the Bill of Rights merely reflected concern "for the federal principle and not any abstract American dedication to freedom of the press, a fair trial, or humane and usual punishment." The major contributors to the development of constitutional liberty in the United States, according to the author were not the founders of the republic but the abolitionists. The extent to which state constitutions paralleled the wording of the federal Bill of Rights, however, would seem to testify to a different concern. And the alien and sedition acts were, after all, of little consequence after 1801.

In sum, Courts and Rights is a nonsystematic and narrow treatment of an important subject matter area.—S. SYDNEY ULMER, Michigan State University.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. By DAVID N. FARNSWORTH. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1961. Pp. vi, 189. $4.00, cloth. $3.00, paper.)

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is a useful study of an interesting and important element in foreign policy decision-making. Based on what appears to be a rather thorough review of the Committee's published hearings from the 80th through the 84th Congresses, 1947-1956, and using for background the standard works on Congress and foreign policy, Farnsworth's book has the merits of being adequately researched, carefully organized, and clearly written. The author himself is well aware of the limitations of published hearings as a source of research material. Such readers as have had direct contacts with members of the Committee and its staff may note omissions and small factual errors, but the book was well worth writing and publishing. It will contribute to further public understanding of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. If it will not be considered the definitive book on the Committee, it still deserves serious attention. So far as I know, there is no other current book on this topic, and an up-to-date analysis of the Committee was long over-due.

After a brief introduction, justifying the importance to decision-making of Congressional committees in general and the Foreign Relations Committee in particular, the author sets the limits of his study. A chapter on Committee membership, procedure, and staff serves primarily as background for a chapter-by-chapter analysis of the major types of hearings conducted: nominations; treaties; foreign aid; and investigations, debates, and the St. Lawrence Seaway. Some attention is given to the anti-internationalist—internationalist voting records of Committee members in the Senate, to whether the Committee is "representative" of the Senate on foreign policy questions, and to the impact of fluctuating degrees of bipartisanship upon the Committee's influence in the Senate. A final chapter, which draws general conclusions, is brief, somewhat provocative, but may offer useful insights.

Farnsworth notes a "unity of purpose among administrative witnesses" before the Committee and believes that during hearings "witnesses from the administration have a shared interest with the Committee." He is not alone in drawing the conclusion from a reading of the public hearings that such hearings are often held to justify the Committee's own position and that of the executive branch, that the procedures of the hearings minimize the effectiveness of any opposition. As he says, "... if an interest is to be effective, i.e., affect the basic objectives of the legislation, access to the Committee must be established before public hearings are held, not during the hearings."

Farnsworth implies that such hearings are rarely a critical decision-making procedure, but are more often declaratory of decisions already taken. Thus, their importance and purpose is largely to attract and justify support from the Senate as a whole and from the House (and in lesser degree from the attentive and mass publics), to identify the degree of opposition so that steps may be taken to overcome it, and to serve as an escape valve to release opposition tensions.

If this thesis is correct, and some knowledgeable sources will deny that it is, the elite publics have already been consulted or ignored by the executive branch and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee long before the Committee holds public hearings. It has been charged in years past that Secretary of State John Foster Dulles sometimes paid little attention to his own planners and policy-makers in the Department of State. It has been observed by others that President Dwight D. Eisenhower gave low priority to consultation with members of the academic community. True, at the present time, the Policy Planning Council of the Department of State is in a stage of energetic revival, and policy-oriented research in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research poses alternatives to present policies and even to policies recommended by task forces; but, this has not always been so. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee recognized this fact when it took steps in 1958 which led to the series of 13 contract studies on United States Foreign Policy by private research groups during 1959. At best, this was a stop-gap measure, with research sometimes hastily done.

In the State Department's Office of Personnel, a small, reflective Personnel Policy Council, set somewhat apart from daily operations, gives promise of providing sustained long range consideration to emerging personnel problems confronting State and other foreign affairs agencies. It gathers ideas from a wide variety of sources. In a rapidly changing world environment, is it not imperative that other such devices for ensuring regular executive and/or legislative consultation with Gabriel Almond's so-called elite publics be built-in to the overall government machinery of policy-making?

President John F. Kennedy has stimulated government consultation with the elite publics. He has energized the machinery of policy-making, eliminating the National Security Council Planning Board and the Operations Coordinating Board, in a sense elevating the role of the Department of State, while mobilizing on an ad hoc basis a veritable mushroom patch of groups, working groups, inter-agency committees, and task forces, utilizing both governmental and non-governmental personnel. But, is it not now time to regularize the emerging behavioral patterns of the Kennedy Administration? In the complex and competitive arena of policy-making for national security, where domestic and foreign policy issues are hopelessly intertwined, a creative restoration of order will assure proper coordination of efforts by the President and his chief advisers—not the least of which is the Secretary of State.—ROBERT E. ELDER, Colgate University.

Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime.

By NATHAN D. GRUNDSTEIN. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1961. Pp. 106. $1.60 paper.)

Professor Nathan D. Grundstein, of the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs of the University of Pittsburgh, has rendered a service to the profession by reprinting his monograph, Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime. These three essays first appeared in the George Washington Law Review in 1947 and 1948. The first covers the experience during World War I, and the other two are devoted to World War II.

Professor Grundstein utilizes a common pattern to discuss the comparative experiences of both wars, under the headings "The President's Power to Subdelegate," "Form and Precision of the Sub-delegation," "Presidential Control of the Hierarchy," "Sub-Subdelegation of Administrative Authority" (both the horizontal and vertical distribution of power), and "Top Administrative Co-ordination." The end of the essay dealing with World War II also includes a discussion of "The Power of an Officer to Redelagate His Authority to the Officers of Another Agency."

The major lesson to be drawn from this descriptive analysis is that the President, during wartime, will delegate authority to agencies and subordinates whenever it is convenient for him to do so in order successfully to prosecute the war. Congress, if it takes action at all on this question, will authorize such a delegation, oftentimes retroactively. When an administrative order or regulation is challenged in the courts, alleging an improper delegation of presidential authority, the plaintiff will lose his case.

In both wars, "wartime administration revolved about the President and it exhibited the triple characteristics of a maximum of executive discretion with respect to administration, legislative concentration of administrative authority in the Chief Executive, and Presidential subdelegation of administrative authority to a multitude of subordinate officials and agencies. . . . Essentially the differences in administration in the two wars spring from the practically unfettered choice of means possessed by the President in wartime," although some differences can be attributed to other factors, such as "the partnership between the executive and legislature" in World War II, the "amazing growth of the profession of public administration and the pervasive influence of the trained administrator," and the precedents left by President Wilson. Two fundamental problems during World War II, both unresolved at the end of the war, were (a) "the need for clarifying principles regarding the locus of determinative administrative power and discretion, both as between agencies and within an agency," and (b) "systematizing the exercise of administrative power, especially by subordinate officials."

While it is useful to have these essays available in this convenient form, and while the reprinting of them is a tribute to Professor Grundstein, it is unfortunate that no attempt was made to bring the discussion up to date. Two areas where this might have been done are the experiences during the Korean War and, with respect to national defense, the precedents for and the practices of the current neither-war-nor-peace situation. This reviewer would have liked to have seen Professor Grundstein extend his study to an examination of the delegation of Presidential authority during peace that grew out of the precedents established during war—but this may well be another book in itself. It would have been most helpful to have added both a general conclusion and an index, in the light of the scores of statutes, executive orders, court decisions, and personalities covered in the text.—FELIX RACKOW, Western Reserve University.

Outlawing The Spoils: A History of the Civil Service Reform Movement 1865-1883. By ARN HOOGENBOOM. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. xi, 306. $6.50.)

In the post-Civil War decades civil service reform was a decisive factor in American politics. It shaped party strategy, won and lost elections, made and broke presidents. It claimed the social and intellectual leaders of the time, men like Henry Adams, Carl Schurz, George William Curtis, E. L. Godkin, and Henry Villard. And the final success of the movement created major problems of political organization and administrative responsibility which remain unsolved.

Professor Hoogenboom has made a detailed, carefully documented, study of the civil service reform movement from 1865 to 1883. Beginning with the first proposals of Sumner and Jenckes, he traces the reform movement through the Grant and Hayes administrations, the formation of the National Civil Service Reform League, the assassination of Garfield, and the passage of the Pendleton Act. In so doing he casts new light on such complex and difficult questions as the relations of civil service reform to Radical Reconstruction, the failure of reform during the Grant administration, the virtual collapse of the reform movement after the election of 1872, the Hayes-Conkling fight for control of the New York Customhouse, and the circumstances surrounding the passage of the Pendleton Act.

Professor Hoogenboom also seeks to develop a "theory of reform." He sees the civil service reform movement primarily as a struggle of the "outs" against the "ins." Most of the reformers were professional men, editors and businessmen with commercial and financial interests. The typical reformer came from a well established New England family. He inherited wealth and deplored the materialism of the new industrial rich whose prominence, based on still greater wealth, surpassed his own. He was typically an Episcopalian or a Unitarian and a Harvard graduate.

These reformers were the "best people" of America and many of them had joined the Republican party during the antislavery crusade and held positions of power and authority in the Lincoln administration. During the post-Civil War years they were forced out of public life; they saw their political aspirations frustrated first by Johnson and then by Grant. "Blaming the professional politician for their political impotence, reformers struck at his source of strength, the spoils system. As a weapon they used civil service reform, which would convert the public service from partisanship to political neutrality."

Hoogenboom's "outs" versus "ins" theory is a provocative one, but it raises certain questions. For one thing it does not very well explain why the civil service reform movement began when it did and ended when it did. The "best people" had after all been "outs" since the time of Jackson and were still "outs" when the reform movement declined. Then too, it may be that Hoogenboom in his emphasis on "outs" and "ins" minimizes the importance of ethical considerations. It is doubtless true that the reformers were motivated at least in part by political self interest. But it is also true, as others have argued, that the reformers were outraged by the gross corruption of the spoils system and sought on moral grounds to purify the body politic. One final comment of a different order. Hoogenboom assumes the validity and desirability of civil service reform; yet, while many criticisms of reform were obviously based on partisan considerations, some of them were nonetheless valid. Civil service reform and the merit system have created serious problems of political organization and administrative responsibility and these problems were clearly anticipated in the early debates. But these brief comments aside, we are indebted to Professor Hoogenboom for extending our understanding of the civil service reform movement and its relation to the political, social, and intellectual events of the time.—ROBERT J. MCNEILL, Purdue University.

United States Fiscal Policy 1945-1959. By A. E. HOLMANS. (New York. Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. xiv, 342. $6.40.)

At the close of World War II, there was general concern over the ability of the United States to avoid serious economic depression. The Employment Act of 1946 was enacted to provide a policy to avert such a catastrophe. Dr. A. E. Holmans of the University of Glasgow in United States Fiscal Policy, 1945-1959 assesses the effectiveness of U. S. fiscal policy as a stabilizing device. His conclusions are mixed, that the United States has "lucked out" of each post-war recession, but with the help of capable management, that countercyclical fiscal policy has in fact become a part of the American consensus by 1960.

His analysis makes clear that fiscal policy is formulated in the context of broader political ideologies. For example, in the first post-war congresses, tax policy was heavily influenced by the fact that a primary objective of conservatives was to return to a status quo ante Roosevelt, rather than to pursue goals of economic stability. Republicans and conservatives generally shy away from the use of compensatory fiscal policy because of their preferences for private rather than public solutions. Even today the conventional wisdom of the balanced budget is important in fiscal policy formulation.

Dr. Holmans raises well stated reasons for mild pessimism about the willingness and ability to use compensatory public finance effectively. However, by focusing on fiscal policy he tends to understate the importance of the weapons in the credit and monetary fields. The study and experience has been with minor recessions and moderate war-caused inflation, while the more serious concern is over a major depression. It is not clear that the institutional and ideological barriers to the subtle uses of fiscal policy in minor disturbances would also hold in the case of a depression. The additional strictures placed upon economic policy makers by the United States' international trade balances and the gold flow became prominent after this study was made and have received little discussion in it.

Throughout United States history economic policy has been a vehicle for fundamental political controversies. This book is a study of economic policy in terms of its political context. Moreover, the author raises, but does not explore, political and institutional problems arising in the use of compensatory fiscal policy. He points to difficulties of the separation of powers and the organization of Congress which make prompt action in compensatory fiscal policy difficult. He describes, for example, the failure of the device of an omnibus appropriation bill. On another subject, it is noted that state and local governments, which account for over one third of government spending, are largely beyond the reach of a federal fiscal policy.

The accounts of debate on tax bills and budgets make clear that there is much claptrap about economics in Congress. Some of the quotations must seem embarrassing in retrospect to Republicans and Democrats alike. There is a great deal of detail in the author's discussion of revenue and appropriations bills which seem to move by in unending succession. Perhaps the emphasis on detail is in part due to the origin of this study in a dissertation. As a European, Dr. Holmans provides considerable insight into United States economic policy and politics with a minimum of the difficulty that an outsider might expect to have over nuances of meaning.—ORVILLE F. POLAND, University of California (Berkeley).

Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. By JAMES C. N. PAUL AND MURRAY L. SCHWARTZ. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, Inc., 1961. Pp. 368. $7.50.)

In the Areopagitica Milton warns of censorship which will bring about the suppression of "a flowery crop of knowledge" and consequent famine of the mind. The noxiousness of the crop and the permissible content of the literary diet of Americans has received the attention of many zealous citizens and not a few governmental officials. Until the publication of this study by Professors Paul and Schwartz, however, a systematic study of the powers of the Federal government in this area of civil liberties was lacking. The authors trace the growth of one aspect of civil guardianship over popular taste and morality, the suppression of "obscene" publications by postal and customs interdiction. The authors conclude that the amount of pornographic material distributed in this country is rapidly increasing; furthermore, because of this pressure and changing standards, the law of obscenity, both as administered by the Federal government and promulgated by the courts, is in a state of flux. For these reasons alone, the publication of this excellent survey is timely.

The major emphasis of the study concerns current practices of the Post Office and Customs Bureau and recent decisions of the Supreme Court (including Roth, Buller, Alberts) and significant lower court decisions. There is a detailed analysis of Federal legislation, the rise and fall of "the most obscene man" test of Queen v. Hicklin together with a deservedly acid indictment of the legislative and administrative history of the Comstock Act and adequate illustrations of the misuse of discretion by the Federal executive. While the authors give ample evidence of the literary ignorance of the censors they do not fail to recognize the need for some official net to catch the commercial purveyors of pornography. Their willingness to face up to this difficult task constructively is as convincing as their indictment of the superficiality of the "community conscience" test of Roth v. United States.

The preferences for changes in the law, and the administration of the law evolve from the wealth of data the authors have gathered. Their arguments are adequately supported by the facts. Having assumed that blatant pornography does not deserve the protection of society, they appear to favor evolution toward the test foreshadowed in Chief Justice Warren's opinion in the Roth case, that is, that "the conduct of the defendant is the central issue, not the obscenity of a book or picture." Irresponsible commercial exploitation of certain materials is taken to be a form of anti-social conduct and must be proscribed. In other words, where obscenity, not a book, is sold, the government should be authorized to step in. Ultimately, the authors favor an end to censorship by the Federal administrative branch. Short of this utopian reform, however, they propose the modification of the government's power to revoke the second class mailing privilege, and an end to the arbitrary use of the mail-block sanction. Above all, they emphasize that criminal and civil procedures in a court of law should supersede the unchecked imposition of bureaucratic literary taste. The standards of administrative censorship, in sum, should conform to judicial standards. The Post Office may be permitted the power to investigate and screen materials but it should be enabled to apply further sanctions only when it has proved its case in court.

This volume more than adequately fills a need for a comprehensive study of a complex problem. It is readable, well documented, and the result of careful evaluation of written sources and interview material. There is an exhaustive and definitive bibliography. It is to be hoped that postal and customs officials will be able to include it in their scheduled list of readings.—RICHARD P. LONGAKER, University of California (Los Angeles).

The Structure of American Federalism. By M. J. C. VILE. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. 206. $4.00.)

This book examines the working of American federalism. "Structure" in the title is used to mean the interrelation of parts as dominated by the character of the whole. A re-appraisal is justified on the grounds that no current study is available which sets out to present the American federal structure as a single system of government, combining both constitutional and political elements. Vile's aim is to produce an integrated picture; he is dissatisfied with the textbook practice of treating separately the federal and state systems. Finding other definitions of federalism too restrictive, the author comes up with his own. A new definition is required in order to cover both the early period of dual federalism and the modern era of co-operative federalism. Although he writes almost entirely on the American experience, Vile proclaims a universal definition of federalism. It is a 150-word definition, so loose that even the author admits it cannot serve as an infallible test to differentiate federal and unitary states!

At best we may say that Vile has traversed well-trod territory and synthesized a great amount of material. The book is obviously designed for British or other non-American readers who are not too familiar with U. S. government and politics. Political scientists in the United States will not find much that is new.

Vile's presentation portrays the combination of independence and interdependence as the hallmark of the federal state; mutual respect, compromise, and co-operation characterize American federalism. Early in the book he claims to have a thesis: namely, conflicts between and among the Supreme Court, Congress, and the States rarely become serious because political integration and the mechanisms within the system quickly operate to resolve such conflicts, and, further, that on the very rare occasions when such conflicts do become serious the system operates to provide delay and discussion at the end of which a compromise solution emerges. This is a good workaday generalization. However, it overlooks the Civil War and will not be acceptable to those Americans who have deep feelings of urgency, seriousness, or principle on persistent public problems.—DAVID G. FARRELLY, University of California (Los Angeles).

The Government of Kansas. By JAMES W. DRURY AND ASSOCIATES. (Lawrence, Kan.: University of Kansas Press, 1961. Pp. 393. $7.50.)

The title of this book is to be taken literally: this is almost exclusively a study of the government of Kansas and not of its politics. For this reason it should prove most useful to those in the state who are interested mainly in the formal and institutional aspects of Kansas government. There is a short introductory chapter on the state and its people and another on the state constitution. Only two of the twenty-six chapters are devoted specifically to local government, but another deals with intergovernmental relations and many of the rest treat various other problems confronted by the cities, townships, and counties. At the state level two chapters are devoted to the legislature, another to the governor, and a fourth to the court system. Most of the rest are concerned with various aspects of public administration—administrative organization, financial administration, the revenue system, personnel administration, law enforcement and correction, highways and the regulation of motor vehicles, and the regulation and protection of labor, business, and the licensed professions. Public education, health, and welfare are taken up in separate chapters, and so are agriculture, conservation of natural resources, and state planning. In the thoroughness with which it deals with each of these subjects, the book could hardly be improved upon. It is also notable for the candor with which it discusses the defects as well as the virtues of Kansas government. There is practically none of the puff and boosterism which sometimes characterize studies of this kind particularly when they are undertaken, as in this case, by an agency of the state.

For all of its merits as a textbook and reference tool, the book is not as useful to those interested in the study of comparative state government as its authors had intended. Institutionally, the whole of Kansas government is laid out, carefully and judiciously, for the reader to examine, but unless he is already familiar with state and local government generally, he is not likely to appreciate how typical or atypical the government of Kansas may be. Of the three coordinate branches, only the court system is related to that in other states: it is characterized as following a "pattern familiar to many American states"—"a hierarchy of tribunals, a proliferation of local courts established to make justice widely available, and the popular election of judges." No attempt was made to compare Kansas with other states as to the size and composition of the legislature, the extent to which the governor must share control over the administrative branch with other independently elected officials, and the vigor (or rather the lack thereof) of the two-party competition. For the most part it is only when some feature is unique to Kansas government—or nearly so—that reference is made to the practice in other states. It is pointed out, for example, that the state printer is popularly elected in only one other state (Nevada), that the governor must seek the advice of a “legislatively oriented” Finance Council in the preparation of the “executive” budget, and that the State Board of Agriculture which administers the laws regulating and assisting the farmer is “elected by and responsible to various private farm organizations in the state rather than to the governor or the general electorate.” But this, perhaps, is to criticize the authors for a book they did not write. For the first-rate study which they did write, James W. Drury and his colleagues have placed the people of Kansas greatly in their debt.—ROBERT B. DISHMAN, University of New Hampshire.

Texas: Its Government and Politics. BY WILBOURN E. BENTON. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1961. Pp. ix, 662. $5.95.)

Texans apparently not only like to think “big” but also tend to think “double.” Texas has a dual system of nominations for public office since it uses not only a system of nominating conventions but also a primary system. In addition, it has a dual budget system using both an executive budget and a legislative budget. This duality extends also to the highest court of Texas where we find a Supreme Court which handles only civil cases and the Court of Criminal Appeals which is the highest appellate court for criminal cases. These points, and others of equal interest, are presented in Texas: Its Government and Politics by Wilbourn E. Benton who is an Associate Professor of Government at Texas A. and M. College.

Professor Benton’s book is somewhat hard to assess as a scholarly contribution since neither the preface nor the jacket material gives the reader any clue as to the purpose of the book. Consequently, the reviewer must set his own frame of reference. Apparently, the book is designed as a college level text. This conclusion is supported by the fact that the legislature has provided that a study of the state’s government is compulsory in Texas colleges and it may be assumed that the book is designed primarily for this market.

Judged as a text the book has considerable merit although it does not quite live up to its subtitle. While there is a thorough description and considerable analysis of Texas “government,” there are some significant gaps in the analysis of what many students would consider Texas “politics.” For example, there is no discussion of Texas presidential politics, no analysis of gubernatorial politics nor any comment on the significant developments in the last several years in congressional politics in the Lone Star State.

On the other hand, there is a very good section on “The Politics of Legislation.” In addition, this aspect of Texas politics is implicit in the discussion of the many substantive problems of government such as management-labor relations or the control of oil production. The study does not fall heir to the criticism most often made of textbooks that the work is “entirely descriptive.” On the whole, the writer must be commended for a thorough presentation that shows evidence of a broad understanding of the Texas governmental machinery and major state programs.—COLEMAN B. RANSOME, JR., University of Alabama.

Decisions in Syracuse. BY ROSCOE C. MARTIN, FRANK J. MUNGER AND OTHERS. (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1961. Pp. xvi, 368. $6.95.)

Not too many years ago one critic deplored “the lost world of local government.” That world has been “rediscovered” with a vengeance since then as political scientists, sociologists and economists have increasingly directed research on the community. Analyses of community power structures, community decision-making patterns, and the social, economic and governmental problems of metropolitan growth have tended to replace the purely institutional and legal studies that once claimed scholarly attention. The growing literature flowing from local and community research has taken several forms. There have been fairly discrete case studies of local decisions. Community power structures and community leadership have increasingly drawn research interest. Intergovernmental cooperation and conflict have provided the raw materials for numerous studies, particularly within the conceptual scheme of metropolitan as distinguished from purely municipal action. Local and regional economic development has found growing favor as the object of inquiry. Seldom, however, have these closely related themes been woven into a single study. This is what Professors Martin and Munger and their collaborators have successfully attempted in Decisions in Syracuse.

Much of the research directed at defining, understanding and explaining the processes of community power and decision-making has left the impression of decisive, purposeful, if not monolithic action. The twenty-two case studies contained in this volume, however, constitute a persuasive rebuttal, at least so far as the Syracuse-Onondaga County area of New York State is concerned. The issues examined in these cases affected, at one time or another, most of the people often suspected of possessing and exercising final authority in community decisions. Seldom, however, did such people appear to wield that power.

What does emerge from these studies is a complex mosaic of decision-making. The industrial, economic and professional leadership of the area rarely initiated action calling for decision and when it did, the one cohesive agent that could, on occasion, carry through was the dominant Republican political organization and not the "hidden men of power" behind the scenes. Throughout these cases, only two men were able to make or force major governmental decisions for the area; each was chairman of the county Republican organization. In many instances the prime instigators of events leading to decisions were either agents external to the area—state government and irresistible social and economic trends—or professional government officials responding to such external pressures. In other cases, decisions were the product not of purposeful human inspiration but rather of "inadvertence" or the natural sequence of earlier decisions.

In general, it is more accurate to refer to clusters of power wielders who were activated to influence decisions that affected them but who remained largely inert when their interests were not directly at issue. The cases support the conclusion that there perhaps are "as many decision centers as there are important decision areas." Further, the authors conclude that community power is not a personal possession but a process. It is more appropriate to consider power as a process having "value and substance only as it is used for something. . . . Community power is a network of action, not a locus of residence."

Equally arresting about these studies is the light shed upon metropolitan action and intergovernmental relations. Despite the growing urbanization of the study area, conflict between the central city of Syracuse and its periphery tended to become more intense. In part this followed the relative disintegration of cohesion within the Republican county organization, although even today major area-wide decisions are reached, postponed or neglected through the agency of the party structure. Ironically, while it has become increasingly difficult to obtain agreement between Syracuse and the rest of the county on regional programs and services, the county has emerged as the most likely center of metropolitan action. The County Board of Supervisors, responsive to the towns rather than to the city, highly sensitive to non-urban values in a highly urban setting, views with growing suspicion efforts aimed at formal intergovernmental cooperation and governmental reform at the county level.

It is impossible to distill the rich detail, the lucid analysis and insight that flow through this tightly organized, well-written volume. It is much more than a "casebook" in community power or metropolitan decision-making. Its cases, ranging from attempts to provide area-wide sewage and water services to the development of the Syracuse Industrial Park, and the excellent analytical chapters, are directed at the central theme of understanding "the structure and exercise of community power in a metropolitan context." This is the first in a series of Metropolitan Action Studies; we can look forward hopefully to its companion works and suggest that other research efforts consider seriously the direction taken by this series.—WILLIAM R. MONAT, The Pennsylvania State University.

The Man in the Middle—The Inside Story of the Hot and Cold Wars Between Labor and Management. BY NATHAN W. SHEFFERMAN, WITH DALE KRAMER. (New York: Doubleday and Company, Inc., 1961. Pp. xi, 292. $4.50.)

In this volume, the author purports to bring "the whole conflict between labor and management into focus." While inevitably a portion of the American labor relations scene is brought into some sort of focus here, the resulting picture is neither complete nor clear. But failing this overly ambitious, self-assigned goal, the book does serve other purposes.

Nathan W. Shefferman is an experienced and knowledgeable, but less than objective, observer. For, though he was in the midst of labor-management strife for several decades, seldom was he, as the book title would suggest, in the middle between management and labor. Always (save for a stint with the National Labor Board in 1934-35) he was working with or for management: as efficiency expert, personnel consultant, employee relations specialist, and, finally, as director of one of the largest labor relations firms in the Nation. At the time the McClellan ("Senate Labor-Management Rackets") Committee was established, Shefferman's organization, Labor Relations Associates, was doing a million-dollar-a-year business with hundreds of employers, large and small.

After seven months of investigations and hearings by the McClellan Committee in 1957, Shefferman was a TV "bad guy," his business was ruined, and his reputation and health seriously damaged. "Shefferman tactics" became a new term in the American lexicon, referring to such operations by management labor relations consultants as union countering activities, covert side deals with labor leaders, "soft" working agreements selling out the rank and file workers, and questionable gratuitous services. In The Enemy Within, Robert Kennedy credits Shefferman's testimony with unlocking for the Committee Dave Beck's "empire of crookedness," and in Kennedy's book references to Shefferman's activities rival those of Beck or Hoffa.

Considering these disastrous personal developments for Shefferman, a surprisingly small amount of space in the present volume (pp. 205-221) is spent by him in discussing his relations with the Committee. But this brief statement raises serious questions concerning procedures of that Committee. If remedial legislation were to result from the series of Committee hearings on management consultants, then it can be argued that less than a broad sample was taken when the investigation was restricted to Shefferman and his firm, while thousands of labor-management consultants and other thousands of specialized labor-relations lawyers serving employers in similar fashion existed unexplored. The leaking and printing in full of a list of Shefferman's clients, past and present, resulted in extensive "guilt-by-association" repercussions. Robert Kennedy's assertion that any Committee witness was permitted to make a detailed statement answering charges made against him is countered by Shefferman's assertion that rarely was such a statement read in open hearing, but instead usually went to the inert files. Moreover, civil libertarians should be (and, historically, were) offended by the telecasting and broadcasting, coast to coast, of the grand-jury-like testimony of unproved charges without opportunity for reply or cross-examination.

Although Shefferman was usually in the pay of employers, by far the greater proportion of his book deals with labor leaders, unions, and union activities. In a personal, breezy style that reads easily, he traces the history of the Teamsters Union from Daniel Tobin through Dave Beck to James Hoffa. Shefferman tells how unions are organized and (with more enthusiasm and first-hand knowledge) how unions are disorganized. He gives a running glossary of union slang and reviews a rogues gallery of minor labor hoodlums bearing hilarious nicknames. He presents a brief history of organized labor in America from 1827 to date, complete with a thumbnail biography of Gompers, Lewis, Green, Tobin, Woll, Hutcheson, Murray, Hillman, Dubinsky, Meany, and Reuther. The concluding chapters include decided, but less than novel or profound, observations concerning the Landrum-Griffin Act, automation, and the unionizing of white-collar and Negro workers.—C. EDWIN GILMOUR, Grinnell College.

Religion, Government, and Education. EDITED BY WILLIAM W. BRICKMAN AND STANLEY LEHRER. (New York: Society for the Advancement of Education, 1961. Pp. 292. $5.25.)

Whenever a political issue pokes its way into public attention, there follows inevitably the symposium designed to enlighten the general debate. Such is the intent of Religion, Government, and Education, edited by William W. Brickman and Stanley Lehrer, both editors of the magazine, School and Society. The book contains ten original essays by nine different authors, all of them primarily educators, except for one political scientist. The diversity in the format is somewhat misleading since more than sixty percent of the book is written by Mr. Brickman.

Despite the comprehensive title, the focal point of the book is the current debate over public support of religious schools. The essays, which represent, in a vague way, "mainline" Protestant, Lutheran, Catholic, Jewish and humanistic thought on the issue, are very uneven in their contributions. One of the essays "Public Function of the Lutheran School" by William Kramer, Secretary of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, unwittingly gives a false impression of that denomination's position. Lutherans have flatly rejected the public service argument or any other argument for public support of their schools. The only case study in the book is a description by William W. Boyer of inter-faith tension over a baccalaureate ceremony in a rural Wisconsin high school. The study is a striking vignette of a religious minority (Catholic) perceiving and using the symbols of a separation of church and state in order to preserve its independence. In similar circumstances in New England, these same rhetorical defenses are being used against a Catholic majority. Although the essays add some new facts and interpretative materials, the major positions on the issue are best stated in reprints of official statements of Protestant, Catholic, Jewish and Civil Liberties organizations in the appendix. A chronological outline of American church and state relations in education also in the appendix is helpful.

The major defect in the book is that some of the educators, particularly Mr. Brickman, attempt to deal with the complex legal and political questions of the school issue in a superficial way. This factor together with the tendency toward polemicism of many who write on this religious issue make for some bizarre interpretations of law and history. For example, Brickman, an ardent supporter of public aid for parochial schools, finds that parochial schools are an establishment of religion (apparently in the way that a business is called an establishment) and that the First Amendment prohibition against laws "respecting an establishment of religion" should be read as barring the states from requiring parochial schools to obey fire regulations and curriculum requirements. Brickman thinks that if the state has the right to make these minimum regulations it is then legally obligated to support parochial schools. Arguments like this do little to clarify the complex legal problems surrounding the issue.

In the second half of the book, Brickman takes the reader on a world tour of church-state educational relations. Potentially a valuable undertaking, this section suffers from the same defects mentioned above. The author is so determined to prove "that governmental bodies should give support to religious schools" that his use of resources is selectively one-sided. Although the new educational law of May 1959 aiding religious education in Belgium caused weeks of rioting and still is a divisive issue, Brickman finds that the Belgian situation "is illustrative of how a consensus may alleviate a serious question in a country devoted to the doctrines of democracy." Passing over the generations of strife in French politics over the church-state educational question, Brickman concludes, "It is possible to observe that the French people as a whole do not take a doctrinaire, rigid and one-sided view of private (parochial) education. . . ." Since the Netherlands decided to support sectarian schools in 1921, public schools have decreased from 56% of the total to 32%. The only Dutch opinion Brickman quotes is that of an educator who regards this system as "a consequence of democracy." In a country considered to be one of the most religiously divided in Europe, with one Catholic and two Protestant parties, there are surely some who would disagree with that evaluation. There is much to be gained by looking at the compromises on church schools worked out by other countries, and Brickman's study contains many useful references and facts. However, without examining the political costs involved, uncritical acceptance of endorsements of church-state relations by members of the standing order is a dangerous method of policy formation. The American tradition on church and state and our diverse religious population are almost unique in the world.

Most political scientists, unless they have special interest in church-state educational problems, will find little to interest them in Religion, Government and Education. The significant work in case studies or in comparative law and administration on church and state questions has only just begun.—GEORGE R. LANOUE, Yale University.

Conscience in Politics: Adlai E. Stevenson in the 1950's. By STUART GERRY BROWN. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1961. Pp. xi, 313. $4.50.)

This book is considerably more than a partisan tract friendly to Adlai Stevenson, although it is much less than the full treatment of the Eisenhower administration and its critics which our times call for.

Mr. Brown has chosen to deal less with the events of the period from 1952 to 1960 than with the statements which Stevenson and President Eisenhower made about them at the time. The form is that of a debate, an exciting dialogue which deals in turn with issues ranging from McCarthyism to desegregation to a whole range of foreign affairs problems from Korea to Quemoy and the U-2 incident.

The method itself is somewhat unfair to Eisenhower; an old and cruel Democratic jest was that he would never have won a television debate with Stevenson because of "the language barrier." The effect of parallel quotations from the two men, which is heightened by Brown's low-key presentation, is rather devastating to the General. A comparison of this book with, for example, Sherman Adams' recent memoirs indicates that if Eisenhower is to be judged favorably by history it will have to be on the basis of his actions, not his public statements.

Certainly the record of President Eisenhower's statements about Senator McCarthy, especially in regard to the latter's attacks on General Marshall, is hardly flattering; Adams would suggest that the President should be judged rather on the soundness of his efforts to blur over a major ideological conflict in American life rather than to sharpen it. Similarly, one's opinion of the Eisenhower civil rights record will have to be based on whether one feels that his degree of caution in both word and deed was wiser during those years than the position of strong moral and political intervention which Stevenson urged.

Brown's book, granted its limitations as a "debate" between a man who loved the written and spoken word and another who preferred to move in quite different ways to achieve his ends, is nevertheless a fascinating history of the period. It may be of special value in meeting that perennial need of the political science teacher—background information for undergraduates who were only seven or eight years old in 1952.

The book has certain other limitations. Brown appears to assume too easily, it seems to this writer, the degree of Stevenson's actual influence in affecting a good many policy changes in the nineteen-fifties. It is doubtful, for example—in the light of available electoral data and polling returns, which Brown does not make use of—whether Stevenson "led his party back to power" in Congress in 1954 as a result of his stands on McCarthyism or other issues. It might also be questioned how much his personal influence affected the 1957 civil rights bill or some of the debates over foreign policy of the period. In the realm of ideas, however, Brown makes a strong case that Stevenson's views, even in the short run of those eight years, were closer by far than Eisenhower's to the direction that the United States would take.

Brown does not deal very extensively with the long-debated question of whether Adlai E. Stevenson was a "viable" politician in rough-and-tumble democratic politics. But he makes a most persuasive argument that Stevenson did indeed represent conscience in politics, an authentic personal vision in the complacency of the fifties, and that he left a permanent mark on the Democratic Party and the American people.—JOHN P. MALLAN, Smith College.

The Robe and the Sword: The Methodist Church and the Rise of American Imperialism. By KENNETH M. MACKENZIE. (Washington: Public Affairs Press, 1961. Pp. v, 128. $3.25.)

A piece of ancient wisdom teaches that a book never should be judged by its cover. A gloss might be added to the effect that neither should it be judged by its foreword. The reader is promised, in the foreword, a study that is characterized by "a facile style of writing" and "a penetrating, critical power of analysis." The anticipations thereby raised, however, are not satisfied in the text. The handling of the subject is mechanical rather than "penetrating" and there are more accurate words than "facile" for writing that needs a stern editorial hand to enforce greater respect for the ordinary rules of grammar, sentence structure and syntax.

The essence of The Cross and the Sword can be distilled into a few sentences. Between 1865 and 1900 the interest of Methodists in foreign missions grew. This interest flowed into a larger concern about American imperialistic ventures in Asia, Oceania, and the Caribbean which the Methodist leadership generally supported and helped to make palatable to its constituency. These conclusions are not likely to provoke a quarrel since they are almost as commonplace as the way in which they are reached. Literal summaries of the opinions of Methodist spokesmen are strung together to produce conclusions about a particular denomination that correspond to those already held to be valid for the larger company of Protestants.

There are questions about imperialism, missions and American churches, however, which the book does not answer. In fact, it does not even ask them. Nowhere are Methodist thought and action examined in the context of the tensions and stresses in American society. To have fitted the jingoism of the church into its nineteenth century social setting would have suggested some tantalizing lines of investigation. Did the enthusiasm for missions and imperialism bear any relation to the erosion of Protestant orthodoxy, the growth of Catholicism, the advance of urbanization and the rise of new forms of association which competed with the church for the loyalties of Americans? Was foreign missionary activity a kind of compensation for the church's losses of influence and prestige at home? Did the championship of imperialism enable the church to find support which it could no longer attract through its conventional message? Were the returns from mission work an antidote to a gnawing suspicion that what the church had to say was not relevant to the interests and needs of late 19th century America? Admittedly, these are not problems that are easily solved but they are very important ones. One puts down this book with the feeling that it ends where it should have begun. The subject of organized religion and foreign policy is a worthy one. It deserves, in any of its phases, more thorough study than it has received here.—RALPH E. MORROW, Washington University (St. Louis).

Biographical Directory of the American Congress, 1774-1961. (Washington, D. C.: U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1961. Pp. 1853. $11.75.)

There are now some fifteen editions of the comprehensive biographical directory of the United States Congress, beginning with that of Charles Lanman in 1859. The present one prepared by Clifford P. Reynolds of the staff of the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing follows closely the pattern set in the one of 1927 by Ansel Wold, long-time clerk of the Joint Committee, and continued in the one of 1949 prepared by James L. Harrison of the staff of the Joint Committee. The 10,400 odd biographies vary in length from the exceptional one of two lines to about two-thirds of a column of the large two-column pages. Emphasis is almost exclusively placed on the details of Congressional service, political and public career, and even includes wherever possible for those not still living, such a detail as the place of interment. The idiosyncrasy of the late Arkansas senator T. H. Caraway in limiting biographical details in the current Official Congressional directory to the laconic statement "Democrat, Jonesboro" has given way to a paragraph of 18 lines. For the details, according to the pattern which is nowhere explained, ceaseless effort seems to have been made to secure a reasonable minimum, even pursuing an early member to the Wabash country without being able to determine when and where he had died.

Family relationships are given only when linked to others in the work. No effort has been made to cover literary and other activity or to indicate special legislative or other Congressional service for which the member may have become known such as the Volstead Act and Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives. The Biographical Directory does include many who are not treated elsewhere in standard biographical sources, or whose Congressional service and political activity are not too clearly pinpointed in such sources.

In no other country of the world has there apparently been such continuing effort to establish a minimum biographical record of the members of the national legislative body from the beginning. For those members of the American Congress for whom the minimum information desired has not been procurable, the venerable Senator Carl Hayden, chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, states that "The Committee will be especially indebted to those sufficiently interested in furnishing additional information which would add to the value of future editions."—JAMES B. CHILDS, Library of Congress.

Select list of publications issued by Senate and House committees. Committee prints, staff studies, reports, and documents, 80th-86th Congresses (1947-60, inclusive). PREPARED BY THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS. (Washington, D. C.: U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1961. Pp. 427.)

Under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, the authorization for professional staff assistants to Congressional committees has inevitably been accompanied by the appearance of many reports, committee prints, staff studies, etc., of value to the various committees, but usually much too little known and often much too little circulated outside the committees. An effort has been made in the Select list (issued as a committee print) to indicate under the committees so far as possible, both Senate and House, the principal topics on which hearings have been held and on which staff studies, committee prints and other reports have been made during the intervening 14 year period. Bibliographical record of such in the Monthly catalog of United States government publications tends to become obscured in the multitude of month by month listings. Some studies of interest issued in rather small printings seem to escape recording in the Monthly catalog. Not only does the Select list pinpoint areas of investigation, but helps in the location of special studies and in avoiding duplication of staff work. Although reference to the number of pages, parts, or volumes in each item is not indicated, the overall picture seems to be helpful for students of legislative work. Even the Bureau of the Budget has furnished a very useful nine-page list of selected reports and studies from the Executive Branch during the same period. There is a detailed index to the whole Select list.

The appearance of the volume reminds us of the inadequacy of such materials prior to the 80th Congress and of the need to rectify the situation. The nine-part Checklist of hearings before congressional committees through the Sixty-seventh Congress, by Harold O. Thomen, completed in 1958 and issued by the Library of Congress, made a very substantial contribution that should be followed up and amplified as a service to effective national legislation as well as to effective scholarship. The Select list points to the fact that both the legislator and the scholar need to keep in mind the requirement for an absolute minimum of bibliographical control over materials very difficult to keep under such control.—JAMES B. CHILDS, Library of Congress.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Clark, Joseph S. The Hesitant Senate. Atlantic. March, 1962.

Fiellen, Alan. The Functions of Informal Groups in Legislative Institutions. Journal of Politics. February, 1962.

Robertson, P. L. Cleveland's Constructive Use of the Pension Vetoes. Mid-America. January, 1962.

Steinbach, H. Burr. Scientists and Public Policy. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. March, 1962.

Williamson, Willard F., S. J. House Rules Committee: An Appraisal. Social Order. February, 1962.

State Government

Carley, David. Legal and Extra-Legal Powers of Wisconsin Governors in Legislative Relations—Part I. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1962.

Constitutional Earmarking of State Tax Revenues. Citizens Research Council of Michigan. 1962.

David, Paul T., and Ralph Eisenberg. Devaluation of the Urban and Suburban Vote: A Statistical Investigation of Long-Term Trends in State Legislative Representation. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Virginia. 1961.

Davis, Claude J. West Virginia's State-Wide [Property] Reappraisal Program. Bureau for Government Research, West Virginia University, and West Virginia Association of County Officials. December, 1961.

Derge, David R. The Lawyer in the Indiana General Assembly. Midwest Journal of Political Science. February, 1962.

Faust, Martin L. Constitutional Convention in Missouri? Business and Government Review, University of Missouri. March-April, 1962.

Fisher, Glenn W. Determinants of State and Local Government Expenditures: A Preliminary Analysis. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

Gardner, Wayland D. The Usefulness of Comparative Studies of State Tax Systems. Ibid.

Mann, Dean E. The Legislative Committee System in Arizona. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.

McAllister, Harry E. The Border Tax Problem in Washington. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

Retail Sales and Individual Income Taxes in State Tax Structures. Tax Foundation. 1962.

Ross, William R. House of Delegates Apportionment in West Virginia. Bureau for Government Research, West Virginia University. December, 1961.

Stevenson, William E. The Place of Purchasing in State Government. State Government. Winter, 1962.

Local Government

The American County Platform. County Officer. January, 1962.

Arbena, Joseph F. The 1962 Census of Governments. Public Management. March, 1962.

Burkhead, Jesse. Uniformity in Governmental Expenditures and Resources in a Metropolitan Area: Cuyahoga County. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

California Land Use Controls. [Symposium.] Hastings Law Journal. February, 1962.

Carson, Robert J. Reclassification, Variances, and Special Exceptions in Maryland. Maryland Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Corson, John J. Better Personnel in Local Government. Public Management. February, 1962.

Crouch, Winston W. The California Way [in Metropolitan Government]. National Civic Review. March, 1962.

Current Problems in Municipal Law. [Symposium.] University of Illinois Law Forum. Fall, 1961.

Duggar, George S., ed. The New Renewal. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1961.

Esser, George H., Jr. Next Steps in Improving Local Government. Public Management. January, 1962.

Frye, Robert J., and John A. Dyer. The City Manager System in Alabama. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1961.

Heikoff, Joseph M. The XYZ's of Community Planning. Public Management. March, 1962.

Kammerer, Gladys M. Is the Manager a Political Leader?—Yes. Ibid. February, 1962.

McDonald, James T. Municipal Finance in Kansas, 1948-1959. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1961.

Municipal Revenue Planning. [Symposium.] Municipal Finance. February, 1962.

Nolting, Orin F. A Code of Ethics for Municipal Government. Public Management. March, 1962.

Pope, H. G. Is the Manager a Political Leader?—No. Ibid. February, 1962.

Reed, Thomas H. A Call for Plain Talk [about Metropolitan Government]. National Civic Review. March, 1962.

Schmandt, Henry J. The Municipal Incorporation Trend, 1950-1960. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. November, 1961.

Shapiro, Harvey. Measuring Local Government Output: A Comment. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

Texas Council-Manager Charters. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1961.

Urban Renewal Symposium. Federal Bar Journal. Summer, 1961.

Waldron, Ellis. Municipal Facilities and Services in Montana. Bureau of Government Research, University of Montana. 1961.

What Certified Public Accountants Can Contribute to County Government. County Officer. March, 1962.

Williams, Percy R. Pittsburgh's Pioneering in Scientific Taxation. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. January, 1962.

Wood, Robert C. There Are Many Roads [to Metropolitan Reform]. National Civic Review. March, 1962.

Intergovernmental Relations

Bane, Frank. Recommendations for Improving Intergovernmental Relations. Public Management. January, 1962.

Cook, James M. National-State Cooperation in Securities Regulation. State Government. Winter, 1962.

Developments in the Law—Federal Limitations on State Taxation of Interstate Business. Harvard Law Review. March, 1962.

Federal-Aid Guide for Local Governments. County Officer. February, 1962.

Fier, Louis. A Note on Federal-State Fiscal Coordination. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

Kneier, Charles M. City-State Conflict in the Use of Municipal Police Power. Kentucky Law Journal. Winter, 1961-62.

Krasnowiecki, Jan Z., and James C. N. Paul. The Preservation of Open Space in Metropolitan Areas. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. December, 1961.

Manvel, Allen D. The States' Concern [with Metropolitan Area Problems]. National Civic Review. February, 1962.

Maxwell, James A. A New Proposal for Coordination of Death Taxation. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

McNayr, Irving G. All Pulling Together [in Dade County, Florida]. National Civic Review. March, 1962.

Starner, Frances L. General Obligation Bond Financing by Local Governments: A Survey of State Controls. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1961.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Beth, Loren P. The Supreme Court and State Civil Liberties. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.

Bonfield, Arthur E. The Guarantee Clause of Article IV, Section 4: A Study in Constitutional Desuetude. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1962.

The Distinction between Legislative and Constitutional Courts and Its Effect on Judicial Assignment. Columbia Law Review. January, 1962.

Fitzgerald, David F., Patrick W. Lee, and Jay E. Ricks. The Sovereign's Immunity and Private Property: A Due Process Problem. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1961.

French, John D. Unconstitutional Conditions: An Analysis. Ibid.

Goostree, Robert E. The Power of the President to Impound Appropriated Funds: With Special Reference to Grants-in-Aid to Segregated Activities. American University Law Review. January, 1962.

Gould, William B. The Right to Travel and National Security. Washington University Law Quarterly. December, 1961.

Gummere, Richard M. The Classical Ancestry of the United States Constitution. American Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Kent, Robert B. Compulsory Disclosure and the First Amendment—The Scope of Judicial Review. Boston University Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Kranz, Harry. A 20th Century Emancipation Proclamation: Presidential Power Permits Withholding of Federal Funds from Segregated Institutions. American University Law Review. January, 1962.

Mendelson, Wallace. Jefferson on Judicial Review: Consistency through Change. University of Chicago Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Mr. Justice Brennan. [Symposium.] Catholic University of America Law Review. January, 1962.

Murphy, William P. State Sovereignty and the Ratification of the Constitution—I. Mississippi Law Journal. December, 1961.

Newman, Frank C. Due Process, Investigations, and Civil Rights. University of California, Los Angeles, Law Review. July, 1961.

Nutting, Charles B. Is the First Amendment Obsolete? George Washington Law Review. December, 1961.

Private Economic Coercion and the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Yale Law Journal. January, 1962.

Radabaugh, John. Spencer Roane and the Genesis of Virginia Judicial Review. American Journal of Legal History. January, 1962.

Retroactivity and First Amendment Rights. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1962.

Roberts, Richard J., S.J. Fair Housing Laws: A Tool for Racial Equality. Social Order. January, 1962.

Saye, Albert B. Civil Rights. Georgia Review. Spring, 1962.

Shapiro, Martin. Judicial Modesty, Political Reality, and Preferred Position. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1962.

Smith, John Malcolm. Mr. Justice Horace Gray of the United States Supreme Court. South Dakota Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Somerville, John. Law, Logic and Revolution: The Smith Act Decisions. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.

Spaeth, Harold J. Judicial Power as a Variable Motivating Supreme Court Behavior. Midwest Journal of Political Science. February, 1962.

Threat of Enforcement—Prerequisite of a Justiciable Controversy. Columbia Law Review. January, 1962.

Wickersham, Cornelius W. Presidential Inability: Procrastination, Apathy and the Constitution. Villanova Law Review. Winter, 1961-62.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Barzun, Jacques. In Favor of Capital Punishment. American Scholar. Spring, 1962.

Bruno, John P. The Exclusionary Rule of Illegally Obtained Evidence: Its Development and Application. Southern California Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Carnes, Robert M., and John W. Ryan. Police Training for Delinquency Prevention and Control—An Appraisal. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1961.

Clark, Charles E. Federal Procedural Reform and States' Rights; to a More Perfect Union. Texas Law Review. December, 1961.

- DeMott, Benjamin. The Great Narcotics Muddle. Harper's Magazine. March, 1962.
- Friedrich, C. J. Law and History. Vanderbilt Law Review. October, 1961.
- Goldstein, Sidney. Economic Evidence in Right-of-Way Litigation. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1961.
- Holtzoff, Alexander. Federal Pretrial Procedure. American University Law Review. January, 1962.
- Kadish, Sanford H. Legal Norm and Discretion in the Police and Sentencing Processes. Harvard Law Review. March, 1962.
- LaFave, Wayne R. The Police and Nonenforcement of the Law—Part I. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1962.
- Lasky, Moses. Observing Appellate Opinions from Below the Bench. California Law Review. December, 1961.
- Luhman, Stanley. The Unrecognized Government in American Courts: Upright v. Mercury Business Machines. Columbia Law Review. February, 1962.
- Macy, John W., Jr. "New Era" in Employee-Management Relations. Civil Service Journal. January-March, 1962.
- Marcus, Philip. The Big Antitrust Case in the Trial Courts. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1961.
- Nagel, Stuart S. Ethnic Affiliations and Judicial Propensities. Journal of Politics. February, 1962.
- Newland, Chester A. Personal Assistants to Supreme Court Justices: The Law Clerks. Oregon Law Review. June, 1961.
- Newman, Donald J. The Effect of Accommodations in Justice Administration on Criminal Statistics. Sociology and Social Research. January, 1962.
- Orfield, Lester B. Indictment and Information in Federal Criminal Prosecution—Part II. Syracuse Law Review. Winter, 1961.
- . Trial by Jury in Federal Criminal Procedure. Duke Law Journal. Winter, 1962.
- Pittman, David J., and William F. Handy. Uniform Crime Reporting: Suggested Improvements. Sociology and Social Research. January, 1962.
- Schwartz, Louis B., ed. Crime and the American Penal System. Annals. January, 1962.
- Speed, Oscar, Jr. A Report of an Administrative Analysis of a Police Car Reporting System. School of Public Administration, University of Southern California. 1961.
- Symposium on Intoxication. Cleveland-Marshall Law Review. January, 1962.
- Tramontine, John O. Recess Appointments to the Supreme Court. Intramural Law Review, New York University. March, 1962.
- Ulmer, S. Sidney. Public Office in the Social Background of Supreme Court Justices. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. January, 1962.
- Use of Mandamus to Nullify an Arbitrary Acquittal in a Criminal Prosecution. Columbia Law Review. February, 1962.
- Wilson, Paul E. Basic Rules of Arrest, Search and Seizure. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1961.
- Public Administration and Administrative Law
- Baird, Duncan H. Judicial Review of Administrative Procedures in Minnesota. Minnesota Law Review. January, 1962.
- Bragdon, Kerlin J. Administrative Resolution of Delay Claims in Government Contracts. Administrative Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Cavers, David F. Administrative Decision-making in Nuclear Facilities Licensing. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1962.
- Cooper, Frank E. Federal Agency Investigations: Requirements for the Production of Documents. Michigan Law Review. December, 1961.
- Corson, John J. Comparable Pay for Comparable Work? Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1961.
- Davis, Kenneth Culp. Nuclear Facilities Licensing: Another View. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1962.
- Friendly, Henry J. The Federal Administrative Agencies: The Need for Better Definition of Standards. Harvard Law Review. March, 1962.
- Gellhorn, Walter. Administrative Procedure Reform: Hardy Perennial. American Bar Association Journal. March, 1962.
- Guetzkow, H., G. A. Forehand, and B. J. James. An Evaluation of Educational Influence on Administrative Judgment. Administrative Science Quarterly. March, 1962.
- Hearle, Edward F. R. How Useful Are "Scientific" Tools of Management? Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1961.
- Jennes, Ernest. Judicial Review and the FCC: A Legislative History. Administrative Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Litwak, Eugene, and Lydia F. Hylton. Inter-organizational Analysis: A Hypothesis on Coordinating Agencies. Administrative Science Quarterly. March, 1962.
- McCulloch, Frank W. The NLRB and Techniques for Expediting the Administrative Process. Administrative Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Monat, William R., ed. Public Administration in an Era of Change. Pennsylvania Economy League, Philadelphia. December, 1961.
- Newman, Frank C. Federal Agency Investigations: Procedural Rights of the Subpoenaed Witness. Michigan Law Review. December, 1961.
- Nigro, Felix A. Public Personnel: Agenda for the Sixties. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1961.

Peabody, Robert L. Perceptions of Organizational Authority: A Comparative Analysis. Administrative Science Quarterly. March, 1962.

Personnel Panorama—1961. [Symposium.] Public Personnel Review. January, 1962.

Redford, Emmette S. Perspectives for the Study of Government Regulation. Midwest Journal of Political Science. February, 1962.

Rights of Federal Government Personnel under the Copyright Act. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1961.

Stone, Donald C., and Robert L. Brown. Careers in the Rebuilding and Management of Cities. Graduate School of Public and International Affairs, University of Pittsburgh. 1962.

University Bureau Research in Government: An Inventory of Current Projects. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1961.

Wildavsky, Aaron. Political Implications of Budgetary Reform. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1961.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Bartholomew, Paul C. A Voting Machine That Leads Two Lives. County Officer. February, 1962.

Bender, Charles W. A Report on Politics in Seattle. Joint Center for Urban Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University. 1961.

Billington, Monroe. Senator Thomas P. Gore: Southern Isolationist. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1962.

Bogardus, Emory S. Sociology of Presidential TV Press Conferences. Sociology and Social Research. January, 1962.

Campbell, Angus, and Henry Valen. Party Identification in Norway and the United States. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1961.

Collinge, F. B. A Projective Technique for Political Behavior. American Behavioral Scientist. March, 1962.

Cornelius, William G. The County Unit System of Georgia: Facts and Prospects. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.

Drinker, Sophie H. Votes for Women in 18th-Century New Jersey. Proceedings of the New Jersey Historical Society. January, 1962.

Erlandson, Erling H. Press Cards U.S.A. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1962.

Galbraith, John Kenneth. Dissent in a Free Society. Atlantic. February, 1962.

Gamson, William A. The Fluoridation Dialogue: Is It an Ideological Conflict? Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1961.

Gold, David. Lawyers in Politics: An Empirical Exploration of Biographical Data on State Legislators. Pacific Sociological Review. Fall, 1961.

Gusfield, Joseph R. Mass Society and Extremist

Politics. American Sociological Review. February, 1962.

Hershkovitz, Leo. The Native American Democratic Association in New York City, 1835-1836. New York Historical Society Quarterly. January, 1962.

Huefner, Dixie S. A Report on Politics in Salt Lake City. Joint Center for Urban Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University. 1961.

Lustig, Norman I. The Relationships between Demographic Characteristics and Pro-Integration Vote of White Precincts in a Metropolitan Southern County. Social Forces. March, 1962.

Maccoby, Nathan, and Eleanor E. Maccoby. Homeostatic Theory in Attitude Change. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1961.

Margulies, Herbert F. Anti-Catholicism in Wisconsin Politics, 1914-1920. Mid-America. January, 1962.

Markham, James W. Press Treatment of the 1958 State Elections in Pennsylvania. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.

Middleton, Russell. The Civil Rights Issue and Presidential Voting among Southern Negroes and Whites. Social Forces. March, 1962.

Oklahoma Voter's Guide. Bureau of Government Research, University of Oklahoma. November, 1961.

Olmsted, Donald W. Social Groups, Roles, and Leadership: An Introduction to the Concepts. Institute for Community Development and Services, Michigan State University. 1961.

Robinson, Jack W. Revision of Federal Law on Campaign Finances. George Washington Law Review. December, 1961.

Rose, Henry. A Critical Look at the Hatch Act. Harvard Law Review. January, 1962.

Shannon, David A. Was McCarthy a Political Heir of La Follette? Wisconsin Magazine of History. Autumn, 1961.

Warriner, Charles K. Public Opinion and Collective Action: Formation of a Watershed District. Administrative Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Weeks, O. Douglas. Texas in the 1960 Presidential Election. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1961.

Williams, Donald E. Dawes and the 1924 Republican Vice Presidential Nomination. Mid-America. January, 1962.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Burnham, John Chynoweth. The Gasoline Tax and the Automobile Revolution. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1961.

Fiscal and Monetary Policy for High Employment. Committee for Economic Development. [1962.]

Lukaczer, Moses. Reflections on the Problem of Depressed Areas—1962. Labor Law Journal. January, 1962.

Perlman, Jacob. Intersectorial Flow of Funds for Research and Development in the United States and Some Implications for Public Policy. Social Science. January, 1962.

Ritter, Lawrence S. Official Central Banking Theory in the United States, 1939–61. Journal of Political Economy. February, 1962.

Seligman, Ben B. Tariffs, the Kennedy Administration, and American Politics. Commentary. March, 1962.

Smithies, Arthur. The Commission on Money and Credit. Quarterly Journal of Economics. November, 1961.

Natural Resources

Brewer, Michael F. Public Pricing of Natural Resources. Journal of Farm Economics. February, 1962.

Gatewood, Willard P. Conservation and Politics in the South, 1899–1906. Georgia Review. Spring, 1962.

Hess, W. N. New Horizons in Resource Development: The Role of Nuclear Explosions. Geographical Review. January, 1962.

Agriculture

Harris, Curtis C., Jr. Parity Income Prices. Journal of Farm Economics. February, 1962.

The "New" Agricultural Program—For Better or for Worse? [Symposium.] Ibid. December, 1961.

Ryan, John W. Public Administration in Agricultural Development, 1961. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1962.

Woodman, Harold D. Chicago Businessmen and the "Granger" Laws. Agricultural History. January, 1962.

Business and Labor

Antitrust and Small Business Symposium. University of Detroit Law Journal. December, 1961.

Bank Charter, Branching, Holding Company and Merger Laws: Competition Frustrated. Yale Law Journal. January, 1962.

Barber, Richard J. Private Enforcement of the Antitrust Laws: The Robinson-Patman Experience. George Washington Law Review. December, 1961.

Browne, Harry L. The Missile Sites Labor Commission and the Derogation of the Taft-Hartley Act. American Bar Association Journal. February, 1962.

Cohen, George H. Self-Determination Elections among Previously Unrepresented Employees in Fringe Groups: A Reexamination. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1961.

Daykin, Walter L. Legal Meaning of "Supervisor" under Taft-Hartley. Labor Law Journal. February, 1962.

Drucker, Peter F. Big Business and the National Purpose. Harvard Business Review. March–April, 1962.

The Duty of a Public Utility to Render Adequate Service: Its Scope and Enforcement. Columbia Law Review. February, 1962.

Eisenberg, Meyer, and Richard M. Phillips. Mutual Fund Litigation—New Frontiers for the Investment Company Act. Ibid. January, 1962.

Federal Regulation of Bank Mergers: The Opposing Views of the Federal Banking Agencies and the Department of Justice. Harvard Law Review. February, 1962.

Forkosch, Morris D. The Doctrine of Criminal Conspiracy and Its Modern Application to Labor. Texas Law Review. February, 1962.

FPC Regulation of Independent Producers of Natural Gas. Harvard Law Review. January, 1962.

Gellhorn, Walter, and Louis Lauer. Administration of the New York Workmen's Compensation Law (Part 1). New York University Law Review. January, 1962.

Givens, Richard A. The Validity of Delayed Awards under Section 301, Taft-Hartley Act. Arbitration Journal. Vol. 16, No. 4. 1961.

Hally, John R. The Meeting Competition Defense in Robinson-Patman: FTC v. the Courts. Boston College Industrial and Commercial Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Higgins, John P. The Legality of FPC Regulation of Independent Gas Producers by Area Price Fixing. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1961.

Kearns, Lawrence M. Injunctions against Mass Picketing—A Gap in the Pre-emption Doctrine. Boston College Industrial and Commercial Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Kroner, Jack L. Minor Disputes under the Railway Labor Act: A Critical Appraisal. New York University Law Review. January, 1962.

Lazar, Joseph. Concurrent Jurisdiction of Federal and State Mediation Agencies. Labor Law Journal. March, 1962.

Leiter, Robert D. Coverage Confusion under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Ibid. February, 1962.

Lewis, Willard A. The Law of Unemployment Compensation in Labor Disputes. Ibid.

Malisoff, Harry. The Insurance Character of Unemployment Insurance. W. E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, Kalamazoo, Mich. December, 1961.

Mayer, Henry. Labor Relations, 1961: The Steelworkers Cases Re-examined. Labor Law Journal. March, 1962.

McDonald, Stephen L. Percentage Depletion and the Allocation of Resources: The Case of Oil and Gas. National Tax Journal. December, 1961.

Norton, Hugh S. The President and Transportation Policy 1930-1960. I. C. C. Practitioners' Journal. March, 1962.

Patent Use Restrictions. Harvard Law Review. January, 1962.

The Publisher's Monetary Liability for Copyright Infringement. University of Chicago Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Rohman, Murray M. National Emergency Disputes and Seizure. Labor Law Journal. January, 1962.

Shils, Edward B. The "Flag of Necessity" Fleet and the American Economy. Ibid. February, 1962.

Soter, William J. Taxation of Oil and Gas Financing Arrangements. University of Cincinnati Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Spradlin, T. Richard. The Mexican Farm Labor Importation Program—Review and Reform (Part II). George Washington Law Review. December, 1961.

Steele, Charles J. A Decade of the Celler-Kefauver Anti-Merger Act. Vanderbilt Law Review. October, 1961.

Timberlake, E. Compton. The Legal Injury Requirements and Proof of Damages in Treble Damage Actions under the Antitrust Laws. George Washington Law Review. December, 1961.

Travers, Arthur H., Jr., and Thomas D. Wright. Restricted Channels of Distribution under the Sherman Act. Harvard Law Review. February, 1962.

Turner, Donald F. The Definition of Agreement under the Sherman Act: Conscious Parallelism and Refusals to Deal. Ibid.

Van Cise, Jerrold G. The Federal Antitrust Laws. American Enterprise Association. 1962.

Weber, Arnold R. Railroad Industry: Public Policy and the Scope of Collective Bargaining. Labor Law Journal. January, 1962.

Weiss, Leo. Labor Arbitration in the Federal Courts. George Washington Law Review. December, 1961.

Wetter, J. Gillis. Diplomatic Assistance to Private Investment. University of Chicago Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Whiting, Richard A. Antitrust and the Corporate Executive II. Virginia Law Review. January, 1962.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Chasanow, Howard S. Civil and Criminal Commitment of the Mentally Ill in Maryland. Maryland Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Costanzo, Joseph F. Ribicoff on Federal Aid to Education. Thought. Winter, 1961.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Memorandum on the Impact of the First Amendment to the Constitution upon Federal Aid to Education. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1961.

Dybwad, Gunnar. Administrative and Legislative Problems in the Care of the Adult and Aged Mental Retardate. American Journal of Mental Deficiency. March, 1962.

Franklin, Marc A. Medical Mass Screening Programs: A Legal Appraisal. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1962.

Humphrey, Hubert H. A Magna Carta for the Social and Behavioral Sciences. American Behavioral Scientist. February, 1962.

The Investigation into Administered Prices in Nation's Drug Industry. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. February, 1962.

Legal Department, National Catholic Welfare Conference. The Constitutionality of the Inclusion of Church-Related Schools in Federal Aid to Education. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1961.

LoGatto, Anthony F. Privileged Communication and the Social Worker. Catholic Lawyer. Winter, 1962.

Mencher, Samuel. Newburgh: The Recurrent Crisis of Public Assistance. Social Work. January, 1962.

Meyer, Louis S. Federal Aid to Education: Its Impact on Arizona. Bureau of Government Research, Arizona State University. 1962.

Mulvihill, Roger. Problems in the Management of Public Housing. Temple Law Quarterly. Winter, 1962.

Northrop, Robert M. Organizing for Public Health: Recommendations for New Jersey. Bureau of Government Research, Rutgers—the State University. 1962.

Philp, John R. Government Programs on Alcoholism. State Government. Winter, 1962.

Rosenberg, Herbert H. Research and the Financing of Higher Education. Higher Education. October–November, 1961.

Zapp, John A., Jr. The Federal Hazardous Substances Labeling Act. Food-Drug-Cosmetic Law Journal. February, 1962.

Military Affairs and National Security

Alley, Wayne E. The Litigious Aftermath of Martial Law. Oklahoma Law Review. February, 1962.

Dickinson, William B., Jr. Military Manpower Policies. Editorial Research Reports. February 14, 1962.

Huntington, Samuel P. Equilibrium and Disequilibrium in American Military Policy. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Larrabee, Eric. The Politics of Strategy. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. March, 1962.

Waskow, Arthur I. The Limits of Defense. Atlantic. February, 1962.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Food and Agriculture Act of 1962. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Mexican Farm Labor Program. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Rice Acreage Allotments. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Use and Administration of National Forests. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Economic Conditions in the Performing Arts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Equal Employment Opportunity. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. Also House Report No. 1370. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Equal Opportunity in Apprenticeship Programs. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Impact of Imports and Exports on Employment. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961, 1962.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Center for Cultural and Technical Interchange between East and West. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong. 1962.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Investigation and Study of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1962: To Create a Department of Urban Affairs and Housing. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on House Administration. History of the United States House of Representatives. By George B. Galloway. House Doc. No. 246. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Antarctica Legislation—1961. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Communications Act Amendments. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Communications Satellites. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. To Establish a National Accident Prevention Center. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Gambling Devices. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Natural Gas for Resale for Industrial Use. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Training of Physicians, Dentists, and Professional Public Health Personnel. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Consular Affairs and Security Administration in the Department of State. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Establishing Rules of Interpretation Governing Questions of the Effect of Acts of Congress on State Laws. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Functional Discounts. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. State Income Taxation of Mercantile and Manufacturing Corporations. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Miscellaneous Fish and Wildlife Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Miscellaneous Merchant Marine Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Mid-Decade Census. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Public Welfare Amendments of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. Also House Report No. 1414. 1962.

———. Revenue Act of 1962. House Report No. 1447. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Select Committee on Export Control. Investigation and Study of the Administration, Operation, and Enforcement of the Export Control Act of 1949, and Related Acts. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Small Business Problems Created by Petroleum Imports. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. AEC Raw Materials Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Nuclear Energy for Space Propulsion and Auxiliary Power. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Joint Economic Committee. Employment and Unemployment. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.

———. Employment and Unemployment. Report of Subcommittee. Joint Committee Print. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

- . The Federal Budget as an Economic Document. Joint Committee Print. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Foreign Economic Policy. Hearings before Subcommittee. Dec. 4-14, 1961. 1962.
- . January 1962 Economic Report of the President. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Variability of Private Investment in Plant and Equipment. Joint Committee Print. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- Senate. Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. Orbital Flight of John H. Glenn, Jr. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Food and Agriculture Act of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . 1962 Dairy Price Supports. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Commerce. Deactivation of Military Installations. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Decline of Regulated Common Carriage. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Freedom of Communications. Kennedy, Nixon Speeches; Newscasts; Hearings. Senate Report No. 994, 6 parts. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961, 1962.
- . Freight Car Shortage. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Regulation of Supplemental Air Carriers. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Reorganization of Civil Aeronautics Board, Federal Trade Commission, and Federal Maritime Board. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.
- . Committee on Government Operations. Establish a Department of Urban Affairs and Housing. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on the Judiciary. Administrative Procedure Act Amendments. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Export of Strategic Materials to the U.S.S.R. and Other Soviet Bloc Countries. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.
- . Legislation to Strengthen Penalties under the Antitrust Laws. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Relationship between Teamsters Union and Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Rules and Administration. Senate Election, Expulsion and Censure Cases from 1789 to 1960. Compiled by Richard D. Hupman. Senate Doc. No. 71. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Select Committee on Small Business. Lease Guarantees—1961. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- . Special Committee on Aging. Housing Problems of the Elderly. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.
- . Problems of the Aging. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.
- Other Federal*
- Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, Governments Division. City Employment in 1961. 1962.
- Federal Reserve System, Board of Governors. Historical Chart Book, 1961. [1962.]
- Judicial Conference of the United States. Rules of Evidence. [Preliminary Report on Uniform Rules for U. S. District Courts.] 1962.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

Parliamentary Reform 1933-1960. By THE HANSARD SOCIETY. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. ix, 193. $4.00.)

In contrast to the nineteenth century, the reforms discussed here will not move men to demonstrate in the streets of Manchester or Bristol. Darby jail will not be sacked nor will Nottingham castle burn. Rather these reforms represent the tinkering with a well-established and complex machinery. Where the reforms of the nineteenth century were shot through with passion, those of the middle-twentieth are technical, professional, and, by and large, non-ideological. And yet, the years under review were marked by the most profound economic, social, and political changes. It is in the context of these changes that the question as to the adequacy of the current arrangements and methods by which the British Parliament conducts its business is raised. Though in fact the book never clearly answers the questions of adequacy, since it is more of a compilation of proposals for reform, it does present to the student of British and comparative politics a small silvermine of information and potential insights. Parliamentary reform is something of a misnomer here. The book deals essentially with suggested reforms in the House of Commons. Those in the House of Lords are briefly treated in an appendix.

Proposals for reform are concerned with those areas of the body politic in which irritation and conflict are most acutely felt. This survey of parliamentary reform proposals then becomes an important guide to potential trouble-spots. Thus, although questions of electoral reform have been with us for a long time, the increasing role and power of constituency associations on the one hand and of the party in Parliament, on the other, place an altogether new emphasis on these reforms. Similarly, there is the widespread demand that the House of Commons ought to set up specialized Committees of Members who would link the House with individual Departments of State. A great number of proposals toward the formation of Departmental Committees have been put forward in the last few years, though here too some areas are felt to be more sensitive than others. Thus in 1957 a motion was put down on the House of Commons Order Paper saying that Parliament lacked control over external affairs (shades of Suez); demands have also been made for Committees on Colonial Affairs, on Defense, on nationalized industries, and on finance.

An increasing area for conflict, if recent reform proposals are any indication, is in the relationship between the M.P. and his party. In answer to the question of how "honest political dissent" can be encouraged, it has been suggested that M.Ps. should be guaranteed a reasonable income for life. J. Grimond has advocated greater latitude in free voting, and a whole host of proposals have been advanced to give back-benchers some raison d'être. Other important areas of suggested reform pertain to the relationship of Parliament and the Executive, with particular reference to the Cabinet's collective responsibility and efficiency, delegated legislation, and parliamentary control over nationalized industries. Here the scope of Parliamentary Questions and the proposal of a Parliamentary arbiter, along the lines of the Danish Ombudsman, are particularly relevant.

Finally, both public opinion and the amenities of Parliamentary life play an important role in shaping the day-to-day business of Westminster. As for the latter, W. J. Brown, a former Independent Member, remarked that "when it is said of the House of Commons that 'it is the best club in the world,' this must be taken as referring to the company, and not the comfort, of the club." The inadequacies of research facilities and of secretarial help are felt acutely. As for public opinion, the compilers of this survey feel that "the prestige of Parliament has probably never been higher." This rosy outlook is not borne out by the observations of Bernard Crick or Christopher Hollis, nor is it consistent with recent public reactions to cases involving parliamentary privilege. The survey, then, tells us a good deal about where the shoe pinches, and, additionally, whose shoe is being pinched, for it depends whether one has Conservative, Labour, or Liberal feet.

Other possible insights which may be gained relate to political trends. Thus, the creation of a Select Committee on nationalized industries may presage the development of some form of departmental committee. At the same time there is a visible trend towards smaller Committees. There seems to be an increasing demand for constituency television coverage especially if a network of local television stations can be developed. At the same time, whatever changes occur will take place only exceedingly slowly and gradually. As Sir Kenneth Pickthorn has said, "Procedure is all the constitution the poor Briton has."

Broadly speaking, parliamentary reforms have been proposed by two groups: the theoreticians and the practitioners, although in as literate a country as Britain, the two tend to overlap. The theoreticians are represented by such men as Jennings, Laski, and Ross; the practitioners by Churchill, Grimond, and Morrison, in addition to several former Clerks of the House and a host of M.Ps. Conspicuous by their absence are, however, such writers as S. E. Finer, J. D. Stewart, Harry Eckstein and Allen Potter. While their work is empirically oriented, and thus has relatively little reformative content, it does seem significant that so few reforms regarding pressure groups seem to have been proposed in Parliament. —LUCIAN C. MARQUIS, University of Oregon.

The Failure of Union: Central America, 1824-1960. BY THOMAS L. KARNES. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1961. Pp. xii, 277. $6.00.)

In recent years Central American and foreign observers have turned attention again to the subject of federation or some type of union of the five states of the region. The subject has been of recurrent interest and discussion during the near century and a quarter since collapse of the Confederación Centroamericana. Professor Karnes has produced a timely and valuable work which sheds much light on the record of past attempts at union and on the prospects for future accomplishment of what many consider an ideal solution to political, economic, and social problems of the area. The book serves a real need in view of the paucity of works on Central America in the English language and the frequent lack of objectivity in the voluminous writing in Spanish. Political scientists and historians will find it useful both for general history and for understanding of the political question.

The author's approach is historical-analytical and, while it may not be "refreshingly new" as the dust jacket proclaims, the author has done a thorough, conscientious treatment. He has successfully avoided the errors of emotional involvement and too-easy assumptions which often vitiate writing on the subject. In this respect, the work is refreshing, as well as for the fact that the title very aptly labels the contents.

Professor Karnes has made a contribution that is threefold. In the first place, he analyzes two premises that often lead to the assumption that union of the Central American republics should be accomplished with ease: the supposed similarities among them and the supposed cohesiveness of the area as a political unit of the Spanish Empire. It is shown that neither of these premises is absolutely true. Despite obvious similarities, which may be superficial, there are important differences and a lack of uniformity with respect to size (both in area and population), ethnic composition, language, social structure, and religion. Furthermore, there was not a single, unified drive in the Spanish conquest of the area and a number of factors contributed to political and religious decentralization which allowed the provinces under the Audiencia of Guatemala considerable autonomy.

Secondly, the largest part of the book is devoted to surveying the numerous efforts and attempts to bring about federation and to analyzing the reasons for failure of all attempts after the brief period of union following separation from Mexico. This is a concise but thorough treatment which shows evidence of painstaking care in research, analysis, and writing. Comprehensive coverage and objective appraisal in tracing the story of repeated failure make this section a major contribution to the literature.

The third aspect of the contribution is found in the brief concluding chapter. Herein the author reveals his pessimism about prospects for future union, founding this view not merely on the record of numerous failures in the past. The reasons why individual attempts did not succeed might have been superficial, but there are several fundamental obstacles which have, and do, stand in the way. Foremost among them are: (1) political adolescence of the republics—the failure of all but Costa Rica to achieve representative government; (2) exaggerated nationalism and jealousies among them; and (3) Costa Rican isolationism.

The more optimistic proponents of federation may be disappointed with the brevity of Professor Karnes' treatment of ODECA. He relates the story of the founding of the organization in 1951 and refers to some of the subsequent political and economic activities, judging that accomplishments in the latter field have been more significant. It is not clear whether the author is fully aware of all of the activities currently being carried on under the auspices of the organization, including much cultural interchange and groundwork supposedly for future integration of educational systems, but at any rate he is wise in stating that ODECA is too young to be judged fairly.—CARL C. MOSES, Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

Prophets of the Revolution: Profiles of Latin American Leaders. BY ROBERT J. ALEXANDER. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1962. Pp. viii, 322. $4.95.)

Until recently, United States and European interest in the revolution which has overturned institutions in much of the world was focused on its more spectacular forms in Asia and Africa. However, events of the last few years—Vice President Nixon's confrontation with violence in South America, the implantation of a Communist system in Cuba, and the enunciation of the Alliance for Progress—dramatically pushed Latin America into the foreground of United States interest and concern. Interestingly enough, the revolutionary process in this hemisphere, which we were so slow to acknowledge, is one with antecedents and a sustained development considerably predating most of the Asian and African experiments. Perhaps it is the case of being too close to our noses to see it. At any rate, the publication of this excellent study of the "prophets" of the Latin American revolution is most timely.

Quite rightly, the author's concept of revolution, like that of the Latin American, is far broader and more basic than the chronic revolts and uprisings which much of the press would fit under this label. Furthermore, it is a concept which is thoroughly respectable to a preponderance of Latin Americans inasmuch as it connotes "fundamental alteration of the political, social, and economic life" of one's country and is manifested in the ascendancy of urban working class and middle sectors and, in an incipient way, the peasantry to the councils of political decision-making.

As a consequence, the dozen leaders considered in this book are deemed heroes by these emerging classes. Much of their appeal derives from policies and enactments which substantially ripped their societies out of nineteenth century feudalism and launched them on the road of twentieth century values and aspirations. Not surprisingly, they are men of considerable diversity and complexity. Sequentially, they begin with the revered Uruguayan democrat, José Batlle y Ordóñez, and move along to Cuba's Fidel Castro, modern exponent of totalitarian revolution. In between lie a variety of types—Lázaro Cárdenas (Mexico), Arturo Alessandri (Chile), Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre (Peru), Rómulo Betancourt (Venezuela), José Figueres (Costa Rica), Luis Muñoz Marín (Puerto Rico), Víctor Paz Estenssoro and Hernán Siles (Bolivia), Getulio Vargas (Brazil), and Juan Perón (Argentina). Despite their differences, all have been men of action, steeped in politics, possessing enormous leadership abilities, and prime movers in their countries' development.

The author approaches each of these men with meticulous care and a strong appreciation of the vital roles they played. Each of the "prophets" is set against an effectively sketched panorama of events, ideas, and forces of the times—all interacting in the fascinating unfoldment of revolution.

Professor Alexander is one of a small number of scholars with a background adequate to the demands inherent in this kind of writing. For more than two decades he has studied at first hand many of the currents of Latin America's revolution and, in the process, he has come to know most of its leaders. Only such close contacts could have produced this lively and authoritative work.

Questions need be raised on only a few minor points. The statement that Calles never returned to Mexico from exile counters this reviewer's impression that he was one of several ex-presidents who gathered together in September, 1942 to demonstrate solidarity in the war effort. In the section on Alessandri, the reference to "several attempted revolutions between 1833 and 1924" is somewhat debatable. Perhaps "revolts" would have been more precise.

But these are insignificant relative to the great merits of this book—certainly a worthy addition to Professor Alexander's list of distinguished contributions to the study of Latin America.—
BEN G. BURNETT, Whittier College.

The Conflict Society: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America. BY KALMAN H. SILVERT. (New Orleans: The Hauser Press, 1961. Pp. xi, 280. $7.50.)

Present and former members of the American Universities Field Staff recently have presented a freshet of books which are in reality selections of their report letters to the subscribers of the admirable service. Dr. Silvert's volume is of this group. Twelve of its sixteen chapters are slightly revised reprintings of papers written over a five-year period; one chapter is the substance of a convention paper, and another was written as a contribution to a book. On the whole, the volume is a pasticcio of efforts sandwiched between short opening and closing statements, and cemented into several sections by very brief explanatory remarks preceding each part. The result can be interpreted in several ways.

The intent at one level is to follow the AUFS plan of depiction in depth of selected national societies; Silvert's field experiences in Guatemala, Chile and Argentina establish general limits to the detailed papers. At another level, the four substantive sections concern, in order, the levels at which these national societies can be studied, some symbolic social and political situations, the positions of intellectuals and the Universities, and idiosyncracies which suggest reasons for some Latin reactions to common and uncommon situations. At yet another level, Silvert seeks, by means of the interspersed explanations and the foreword, as well as by the mixture of non-systematic elements, to offer the bases for several forcefully stated propositions concerning social development. Implicitly, guidelines for United States policies toward Latin America are also offered.

An unfortunate aspect of the book is its failure really to add up to an analysis or even to an argument. Aside from mild objection to the phrasing of the modest opening conceptualization, this reviewer cannot challenge its application to subsequent content; none really is undertaken. Further, Silvert makes no claim that he is more than intimating categories of analysis; this indeed is the case in comparison with the painstaking work of many other authors. The projection of broad terminal propositions, however generally acceptable they might be to the specialized students of the underdeveloped areas, comes rather abruptly; the most recently written AUFS letter employed, drawn from the challenge of Castro, is the sole groundbreaker.

A book properly should be greater than the mere sum of its parts. The offering of political taxonomies and of deviant disparities does not necessarily accomplish the job, despite the offering of undoubted literary competence. The cogency with which Silvert is fully capable of infusing his work is missing in this volume.

The end product therefore is kaleidoscopic. In book form these useful papers will reach many who are not reached by the AUFS reports. The anecdotes will give an air of authority to teachers impressed into Latin American courses by mounting departmental curricular demands and the tactics of Fidel Castro. The work will suggest the possibilities inherent in research and absorption of ambiente by a discerning reporter trained in one academic discipline but alert to the possibilities of others.—PHILIP B. TAYLOR, JR., The Johns Hopkins University (Washington, D. C.).

Social and Economic Frontiers in Latin America. BY HARRY STARK. (Dubuque: Wm. C. Brown, Company, 1961. Pp. xx, 421. $7.25.)

This book has some attractive features. Its maps, charts, and tables give us in easily assimilable form much useful data about Latin America's societies and their environments. Those parts of it that are narrowly economic in focus are interesting, sometimes insightful, and frequently provocative. The presentation is couched in terms that should be comprehensible to almost anyone, however limited his preparation. But really the book is very bad.

Lacking a discernible thesis and structural unity, the book draws indiscriminately upon the author's random impressions and his reading of an ill-sorted range of materials. (Although one finds a footnote citation of Tennyson's "Locksley Hall," one searches vainly for a specific reference to any material written in Spanish or Portuguese.) Its analyses of complex phenomena are quite unsophisticated, and woefully incomplete. It is poorly edited and produced. It is, to use a word favored by Professor Stark, "uniquivocably" a bad book.

If this were just another general introduction to Latin America, an updated Gunther, it would cause little concern. But the author of this book is a professor of Latin American Affairs at the University of Miami, and he has put it forward as a textbook designed to acquaint beginning students with Latin America's "social and economic frontiers." As a textbook it does a major disservice to the cause of serious Latin American scholarship; it greatly underestimates the intelligence and capacities of North American students who might be exposed to it; it perpetuates a distorted and stereotyped approach to Latin America that will do little to improve our understanding of the region and its peoples; and it is grossly unfair to the Latin Americans themselves.

Consider, for example, the parallel columns of "social and cultural traits" with which Chapter 3 begins. Here Professor Stark contrasts Latin Americans and North Americans in terms of twenty-eight "traits," of which the following are representative:

Latin American	North American
Follows heart	Follows head
Closer to species	More evolved
Gallery player	Team player
Lawless	Law-abiding
Ego	Social conscience
Cuts Gordian knot	Unravels Gordian knot
Procratinating (sic)	Gets things done

Aware that not all Latin Americans are properly to be classified as "lawless animals" (see the second and fourth items in the abbreviated list above,) Professor Stark qualifies what he has done: "Were it possible to fuse all Latin Americans and all North Americans into two individuals that we could call the 'average' Latin American and the 'average' North American, these two individuals would possess essentially the characteristics shown in the foregoing lists." A further qualification, not altogether compatible with the previous one, follows: "The traits I have listed as typically Latin American are those that would be possessed by an average individual taken from the numerically small but politically and economically predominant class."

In what the publishers describe as a "discerning analysis based on the author's personal and career background in this controversial country," Professor Stark undertakes a survey of contemporary Cuba. After all, as he says, "a book on Latin America appearing after 1961 . . . that did not contain some reference to the Fidel Castro revolution in Cuba would sound rather queer." The "discerning analysis," which takes up eleven pages of the book's four hundred, moves at this level of perceptiveness and profundity:

"Castro's early actions in cutting rentals in half and in announcing that large landholdings would be broken up and distributed to the landless peasant were the first inklings of things to come. The economic unsoundness of these measures gave birth to the suspicion that this bearded revolutionary might turn out to be an irresponsible demagog. . . . The seizure of property without equitable compensation goes sharply against American concepts of what is right."

That a book of this caliber could find a publisher and may find a market in our schools and universities is discouraging.—JOHN N. PLANK, Harvard University.

Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism. By STANLEY G. PAYNE. (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1961. Pp. ix, 316. $6.00.)

1961 was a productive year for books on Spain. This excellent study is the latest addition to a number of significant works—those by Burnett Bolloten, Hugh Thomas and Arthur P. Whitaker—and is a valuable contribution. Its preparation was assisted by a Social Science Research Council fellowship and, according to the jacket, the author spent a year of personal investigation in France, Italy, Portugal and Spain. He is an instructor in history at the University of Minnesota.

The author examines the genesis and evolution of the Spanish version of fascism from the formation of the Juntas de Ofensiva Nacional Sindicalista (JONS) to the Falange Española becoming the state party through the party's demise at the hands of General Franco. The first half of the book is devoted to the short career and life (1903–1936) of José Antonio Primo de Rivera, founder of the Falange. He enters the political arena in 1930 as Vice Secretary-General of the conservative Unión Monárquica; during the general election of 1933 his movement becomes the Falange Española (FE); the FE and the JONS unite; and in late 1934 he is acclaimed Jefe Nacional by the party's National Council. Now the FE is José Antonio's own instrument. The entire slate of FE candidates, including the Jefe himself, is defeated in the 1936 election and the victorious Popular Front government outlaws the FE and incarcerates its leader. Late that year José Antonio is executed.

The increasing political polarization between Left and Right precipitates a military insurrection—FE “intransigence” serves as a “secondary catalyst”—which expands into a civil war on account of German and Italian intervention on behalf of the rebels. General Franco assumes command of the rebel forces and Ramón Serrano Súñer, his brother-in-law, becomes his civilian counterpart. General Franco thus achieves a “military-civilian synthesis” and begins his transformation of the FE into the party of the Spanish state.

The author examines Franco's tactics: the “born politician” balancing one group against another, capitalizing upon each faction's hates and internal dissensions, and using the FE as a buffer against all threats to his power. Serrano proves to be an astute manipulator and is essential to Franco's gaining control of all facets of the political spectrum; but he is no match for Franco—and later, neither is Hitler's Real-politik. Thus General Franco emerges as the master pupil of Machiavelli. In the words of the author: “His formula was a conservative syndicalism, bounded by all sorts of state economic controls, spiritually tied to Catholicism, ready for any kind of practical compromise, and always backed up by the Army.”

Since the end of the Spanish civil war on the eve of World War II, General Franco has continued his policies of “divide-and-rule” and interlocking directorates. Their success is attested to by the longevity of his regime, now in its twenty-sixth year. The postwar “silent treatment” of Franco by the Western powers failed to weaken his position; it only strengthened it. Today the Falange is a corpse. It has been bled to death—with frequent transfusions along the way—by General Franco.

This significant book is indispensable to understanding contemporary Spanish politics. It is an example of good scholarship; it is extensively documented and much is from original sources, mainly in Spanish.—LARMAN C. WILSON, University of Maryland.

The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960-1961. By GEORGE BENNETT AND CARL ROSBERG. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. 230. $4.80.)

In February 1961 Kenya's first general election on a common roll basis was held. It was the culmination of a train of events that led from the Constitutional Conference at Lancaster House in early 1960. In the background of these events were the long-standing belief of many Kenya settlers that much of the best of Kenya's land was “white man's country,” the not-long past horror of Mau Mau, and the new disorders in the Congo. Out of this election emerged an African-oriented government and the outlines of a party system of Africans in Kenya.

George Bennett of Oxford University and Carl G. Rosberg of the University of California at Berkeley have given an account of these events that is much more than a simple narrative of a swiftly moving bit of history. The events in themselves were important. In a large sense this was the period in which the final turn away from settler domination in Kenya was made. It was the time in which the fundamental problems of an African-ruled nation began to emerge, and a time of crucial testing for the new political leaders. Nevertheless, the value of this book lies in its broad picture of the great complexity of politics in even a moderate-sized new African country.

Before the campaign leading to the 1961 election, Kenya politics largely consisted of a struggle over multi-racialism. In the years following the easing of the Mau Mau emergency in the middle nineteen-fifties, the surface of Kenya politics was a troubled pattern of contests between different settler groups. One, which became the New Kenya Party led by Michael Blundell, sought some means of accommodating the rising demands of the great African majority of the colony. The other, ultimately organized by Group-Captain Briggs as the United Party, sought to preserve a way of life based upon settler pre-eminence in political affairs. In these contests, despite much sympathy from overseas, the New Kenya Party lost. The heritage of the Emergency was deep bitterness among the settlers and Blundell himself had to endure great vilification from his white opponents. At the same time, the idea of multi-racialism was not accepted by most Africans. The dominant settler group, however, did not win. A complex electoral system had been contrived with much ingenuity. Although it stopped far short of satisfying African leaders, it was openly a plan of transition to a government in which Africans would have the largest voice.

Almost abruptly, then, the major arena of Kenya politics became the African parties. The Kenya African National Union sought to become a counterpart for the Tanganyika party (TANU) which was its near namesake. For this endeavor KANU seemed to have great advantages, a strong base in the two largest tribes in Kenya, the Kikuyu and the Luo, and most of the well known African leaders in the country, among whom it was increasingly evident that Jomo Kenyatta would soon be included. These advantages, however, carried correlative disadvantages. The alliance of the two largest tribes seemed to pose a threat to the numerous small tribes in Kenya. The conspicuous character of KANU's leaders laid the party open to intra-party rivalry and disunity. And in time Kenyatta proved less of an asset than he appeared while he remained in confinement.

A rival party, the Kenya African Democratic Union, appeared and it made itself spokesman for the small tribes and in general became more rural in orientation. The contest between KANU and KADU was lively but uneven. KANU was a heavy winner of popular votes. Nevertheless, this advantage was offset in part by the design of the election and by the greater cohesiveness of KADU. Through a combination of circumstances and KANU miscalculation, KADU became the party to assume the role of government to the degree possible at this stage of evolution toward independence.

The "Kenyatta election," then, was considerably more important than the title of the book suggests. Kenyatta was an issue and a lively one. Nevertheless, already in early 1962 there are signs that his charisma is wearing thin. And in any event the basic development of a system of two African parties was the fact of large significance. This book is essential to an understanding of this and of the politics of the nation that is to be.—GRANT MCCONNELL, University of Chicago.

I Speak of Freedom. By KWAME NKRUMAH. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger Inc., 1961. Pp. xiv, 291. $4.95; paper, $1.95.)

The slogan "Freedom and Unity" is increasingly heard in the new African states, and this book is Dr. Nkrumah's attempt to bring these two concepts before an American audience. This is, according to its subtitle, "a statement of African ideology," but it is not a disciplined formulation of political thought. Here is a selection of Nkrumah's speeches for the period 1947 to 1960, interspersed with his own commentary and summary of further speeches. The book begins with his return to the Gold Coast from England, and ends with a speech to the United Nations General Assembly in September 1960.

The first ten chapters cover the time dealt with in his earlier work, Ghana: The Autobiography of Kwame Nkrumah, but there is considerable variance in the two accounts of his activities, a matter of differing selection and emphasis. The first book dealt principally with political developments in the Gold Coast and the work of the Convention Peoples' Party; the second one emphasizes far more continental and international aspects of the same events. There is no account here of Nkrumah's imprisonment, the development of party technique, or the Motion of Destiny speech in 1953 on coming independence. Instead there are comments on the African personality, positive action in international affairs, the Congo, and Ghanaian membership in the commonwealth. There is mention of international crises and the Berlin blockade. Nkrumah's thesis is perhaps most clearly stated in his preface: "The greatest contribution that Africa can make to the peace of the world is to avoid all the dangers inherent in disunity, by creating a political union which will also by its success, stand as an example to a divided world. A union of African states will project more effectively the African personality. It will command respect from a world that has regard only for size and influence."

Nkrumah does not concentrate entirely on international affairs; he discusses some Ghanaian political developments, but they do not occupy him as fully as they once did. Unfortunately in becoming more international he has become less interesting. While there is evidence of absorption and dedication to the enormous tasks faced by Ghana and all of Africa today, there is much absorption also with Kwame Nkrumah. This book does not bear out recent accusations of megalomania, but every other paragraph does begin with the word "I." There is little reflection of other personalities, or the description of local background and attitudes which contributed to the earlier book. There is an African background in terms of many of the issues considered, but otherwise this might be any prime minister, writing anywhere. The prose style is reminiscent of Lord Attlee's.

Since Nkrumah is writing on African freedom and pan-Africanism, there are some curious omissions. Except for a brief mention of the Sani-quellie conference, there is no discussion of the Ghana-Guinea union, or any account of relations with Togo. Nigeria is mentioned once, and most of French-speaking Africa not at all. The Accra conference of independent African states and Nkrumah's travel to Liberia, India and the United States are considered in some detail. Since the book ends with 1960, there is no discussion of policy toward Gizenga in the Congo, or any recent political developments. Neutralism is mentioned, and carefully called non-alignment.

It would seem that Nkrumah has aimed this book at the general public rather than the specialist. Only a few speeches are reproduced in full, most of them having been excerpted in that particularly irritating fashion which gives the reader no clue as to how much of the speech he is actually reading. Nor are we given any really new information. This book might be recommended as a study in African psychology, but it is otherwise disappointing. Someday it is to be hoped that Nkrumah will give us, perhaps in his memoirs, a more systematic and informative account of his years as prime minister. In the meantime his first book stands as a far better introduction to African affairs.—MARGARET L. BATES, Goddard College.

The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa.

By VIRGINIA THOMPSON AND EARL ADLOFF.
(Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1960.
Pp. xii, 595. $8.75.)

The Adloffs have performed a valuable service in providing what is in fact the first balanced and truly comprehensive survey in the English language dealing with an area of former French Equatorial Africa. The AEF has been long neglected by English-speaking scholars; with the exception of mention in the works of Buell, Lord Hailey, and Hodgkin, and with occasional articles in periodical literature, most of the material available on the area has been of an official nature and in the characteristically lifeless style adopted by French colonial administrators. Moreover, the latter volumes tended to be compendia of economic statistics coupled with highly detailed descriptions of structures on the various levels of administration. Such works usually lacked any discussion of political matters—particularly after 1944—and one got the impression from them that apart from the aseptic consultative organisms created by the Administration from time to time, the area experienced little or no political change.

Happily, the Adloffs have devoted considerable portions of their volume to discussions on the nature of political activity in each of the four states treated (Chad, Central African Republic, Gabon, and the Congo (Brazzaville) Republic). In addition, there is a useful historical introduction and a short but excellent statement on the growth of political organizations in the AEF after 1944.

Further, the volume examines the current economic and social problems of the area as a whole and of each of the new states in turn. This approach enables the reader to compare the economic development of the AEF in its former status as an administrative federation with the social and economic problems faced by the new states in their attempts to strike out on their own. At the time this book was being written (1959) the states of the old AEF had decided on tentative steps toward a loose union (the union des Republiques d'Afrique Centrale). Even though the Union itself did not get much beyond the discussion stage, it is interesting to observe how heavily the four states' former interdependence weighed in the planning for the Union and in their subsequent (1961) decision to enter the broader functional union of the Union of Africa and Malagasy States. The Adloffs' work provides a most useful basis for assessing the four states' contributions to the larger Union, and indeed, for a realistic appraisal of the possible future integration of the whole area, including the Cameroon and former Belgian Congo.

The book is not without its defects. It is somewhat unfortunate, considering the wealth of information and insight presented by the authors, that they chose to adopt the encyclopedic format of their earlier volume on French West Africa. This format recalls the older French presentations, and undoubtedly accounts for the dryness of some of the discussions (particularly those dealing with administrative and economic matters) and for the somewhat perfunctory manner in which the accounts of political activity are handled. These drawbacks, though limiting the usefulness of the book, do not detract from its overall excellence.

The story of the AEF, less politically and economically favored than the area of the former French West Africa, makes fascinating reading not only for those interested in African affairs, but for all concerned with problems of political and economic modernization. The Adloffs' contribution deserves to be widely read, and will undoubtedly find a preferred place among the increasingly large number of valuable works on Africa.—VICTOR T. LE VINE, Washington University (St. Louis).

African Affairs: Number One. St. Antony's Papers: Number 10. EDITED BY KENNETH KIRKWOOD. (Carbondale, Ill.: Southern Illinois University Press, 1961. Pp. 164. $3.75.)

Like the inevitable double-feature movie, one a piperoo and the other a stinkeroo, this octet on Africa is of uneven quality. There is a notable essay on the differing connotations of political words like "politician" and "freedom" in Western Europe and in Africa south of the Sahara. Following this logically is an excellent analysis of the roots and shoots of nascent nationalism in the one-time colonial territories, by Thomas Hodgkin, who published a book on the subject five years ago. Other essays are on Islam in Nigeria (which essay gets lost en route from Nigerian savannah to jungle, examining individual bushes and trees); on demographic surveys in the Central African Federation (which surveys show awesome ingenuity and some important economic data); on urbanized Africans in the Union of South Africa (after a legalistic beginning, a sensitive and sensible discussion); on academic research on Africa in the Soviet Union; on the prospects for non-holocaust in South Africa (by a distinguished scholar and former Senator from Natal who reuses to despair). An essay on federation in French West Africa demonstrates that it is not only Africans but Western Europeans who use the same words differently. What French colonial administrators called federation is more like what is elsewhere called democratic centralism, and yet the author artlessly describes the breakup after de-colonization of what never existed before and which, on a truly voluntary basis, has been tried with little success since, in French-speaking Africa.

Altogether a motley lot of essays, but in various ways each provides information and within its stated competence is competent. It is well to know how provincial were Soviet scholars about Africa until after the 1955 Bandung Conference and even better to know how quickly they are now earning the realities. And it makes sense to relate the growth of Marxist parties in French-speaking Africa to the strength of the Communist party in France, in contrast to the situation in the English-speaking areas. But would it not be more relevant to consider more deeply why Marxism has become so intensely attractive to so many Africans, Chinese, Indonesians, Malaysians, and Indians regardless of language, and whether Islam is in practice any more hostile to Communism in Africa than Christianity proved to be in the Soviet Union?

To understand the various reactions of Africans to tribalism, colonialism, urbanization, and Westernization, and to ascertain their future expectations, we have to know more than the institutional and legal soil out of which burst new growths that are supplanting tribalism and colonialism—growths that not even Africans in the midst of things can adequately describe. This collection of institutional analyses is nevertheless useful.—JAMES C. DAVIES, California Institute of Technology.

South African Predicament: The Economics of Apartheid. By F. P. SPOONER. (New York; Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1960. Pp. 288, $5.00.)

There are those who say that economic pressures will finally bring apartheid to the ground or, at very least, alter it sufficiently to avoid a violent explosion in the Republic of South Africa. This argument (simplified) runs as follows: the demand for labor will force South African industry and mining to upgrade the skills and jobs of the Bantu worker. His continued presence, working and living in the European sector of the economy will be necessary. His population increase and lack of land will force him there as well. His increasing purchasing power will create increasing markets for goods, as well as demands for higher standards of living and political and social rights.

Since white and black will become so totally dependent upon each other, neither can tolerate nor pay for the extremes of total separate development or segregation, let alone a violent African nationalism. Some form of social and political compromise will thus be forced.

This book, in spite of its subtitle, does not address itself fully to the economics of apartheid. Rather, it devotes well over half its pages to a thin résumé of the physical features of the country, its historical background and the growth of the conflict between Boer and Englishman. As a matter of fact, the book is almost quaint in its pleading for a return to the days when mutual understanding and cooperation between the two European groups was hoped for by so many Englishmen. The author, a businessman of English and Afrikaner lineage, complains that the Vortrekkers have been glorified, that the Englishman's contributions have been minimized and that the politics of the country have been rigged in favor of the Boer. The faith and trust placed in the Boer community in 1910 by the United Kingdom has not been answered with corresponding fair play. The book is wistful, vague and naive in its analyses of politics. A Victorian didacticism pervades its pages.

The problem of the author is that he cannot apply the spirit of the liberal English political tradition to contemporary South Africa. He is accurate when he states that the Afrikaner's isolation caused him to miss a century and to develop a narrow and self-righteous community. But one cannot move from this type of criticism onto a useful economic or political platform by claiming that the United Party is the party of 'reason,' that White superiority over the Bantu is patent, that it is 'unthinkable' to give the Bantu the franchise or that western democratic concepts lack relevance in South Africa because they do not teach discipline.

The author ends with a plea for the vision of Rhodes, a great multi-racial federation in South Africa. Economic development would be applied evenly throughout the land and not compartmentalized into white and black 'stans.' Domination supported by race alone would be ended in favor of the guided advance of the African by the more able European. The book is a good statement, perhaps unintended, of the Englishman's dilemma in South Africa.—CHANNING B. RICHARDSON, Hamilton College.

The Edge of Freedom. By JOHN B. OAKES. (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1961. Pp. xiv, 129. $3.50.)

This book, subtitled "A report on neutralism and new forces in Subsaharan Africa and Eastern Europe," is a rapid and informed survey by a leading journalist of a key problem in contemporary politics, the meaning of "neutralism." It is a plea for "sympathy without condescension" towards the proponents of this doctrine.

The basic thesis is that the neutralism of the new African nations "is not a moral judgment, but a political one, a judgment that it is in their interest to stay away from the great power struggle." This view is sustained by brief snapshot analyses of recent political developments in Guinea, Mali, Ghana, Nigeria, Cameroon, "French Africa," Congo, Rhodesia, and Kenya-Tanganyika. Mr. Oakes combines with this African overview some equally brief statements on the evolution of new forces in some Communist states, the USSR, Poland, and Yugoslavia, in the direction of "liberalization."

Having explained that the African neutrals are often lined up with the Soviet bloc on colonial issues—or rather, as Mr. Oakes says, that the Soviet bloc is lined up with them—the book outlines the major problems facing the new African nations: national integration (against tribalism), the scarcity of national leaders, the difficulties of economic survival. These problems are the central focus of contemporary African politics. The attempts to deal with them explain the particular paths the new African nations have taken far better than any kinds of conspiracy theories (external influence of world communism, the international network of capitalist firms, the political penchants of small groups of African elites). What has become clear in the last few years is that, whatever the political leanings of various African states, they have all been pushed towards similar solutions for similar problems. The creation of one-party states in Africa has been a way of countering tribalism and promoting national integration. It has been a means of utilizing the scarce numbers of skilled personnel to the optimum instead of "wasting" a certain number in opposition politics. It has been essential to economic survival not only by protecting the national budget against excessive demands of small but effective interest-groups (salaried employees organized as trade-unions, cash-crop farmers organized in syndicates) but also by ensuring the strongest possible stance towards the external world, increasing maneuverability in obtaining external economic aid. Mr. Oakes draws from these facts a very simple conclusion:

"The new African states can succeed—and if given a chance they will—not as satellites of East and West, not necessarily as free-enterprise parliamentary democracies, but as independent entities growing along African lines out of the African soil. American policy toward them is, or ought to be, to help them stand on their own feet, help them sustain their independence, help them to achieve real freedom of choice in determining their own governmental systems. We must not be deterred from this goal because some of these countries are neutralist, many are socialist and most are, at least for the present, semiauthoritarian. None of these characteristics is in accordance with the American way; but in subsaharan Africa we are going to have to live with them."

Mr. Oakes performs a further useful service by placing before us in the same context the new forces of Eastern Europe. Here what he has to say is more familiar. He says it with the same tone of judicious patience and guarded hopefulness that he uses for his analysis of African neutralism. As we must "live with" the latter, so he suggests we must seek to "keep open the channels of communication" with Eastern Europe in the hope of hastening and intensifying the "process of dilution" of Communism that has long since been begun.

This does not pretend to be a work of scholarship, though it points to important problems to which scholars must address themselves. It is rather an attempt to cut through the daily newspaper reports with a clear viewpoint, and thus enable the reader to make more sober and more sophisticated judgments on some current happenings.—IMMANUEL WALLERSTEIN, Columbia University.

The Changing Patterns of the Middle East. By PIERRE RONDOT. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. 221. $5.00.)

This book is a skillful introductory survey of modern Middle East political forces and patterns. The "changing patterns" alluded to in the title will disappoint the student who expects to find a new key to new trends in the region, for the term refers to the fluidity associated with the entry of the Middle East into the modern world against the background of centuries of stagnation. It is perhaps the foremost merit of the book that it adroitly blends historical analysis with contemporary observation. The instructor in Middle East politics faces no more exacting problem than that of conveying old history and pointing up its relevance to students accustomed to investigating behavior by analyzing last week's events, in the apparent conviction that history was correctly defined by the late Ford. Modern social science often permits the illusion, at least, that such a procedure is possible. In the study of the Middle East even the illusion evaporates, given the different scale on which time in that region is measured, and the extent to which political behavior there consciously accrues from ancient dilemmas and myths.

A second significant merit of the book is the sure touch with which the author analytically interlocks the forces at play within each Arab country with those operating in inter-Arab relations, and in turn ties these to the relations of the Arab world within the broader international arena and the cold war. This too is a problem sharply felt by the instructor whose students may tend unduly to separate domestic politics from regional and international politics. Again, while in the west such a procedure is tentatively possible, permitting considerable quantities of data to be arranged in plausible models, it does not meet the test of the Middle East. This is so not only because of the colonial history which colors the attitudes of its people to the international arena, but the more so because of the economic and strategic significance customarily attributed to the region by external actors.

The broad historical perspective of the author enables him to select and state with unusual lucidity three basic stages in the political development of the modern Middle East. These are the "period of Arab nationalism" from 1919-1936, the "period of Arab-Israeli tension" from 1936-1955, and the "period of Soviet intervention" which began in 1955. While this selection of stages assists in the detection of patterns, it does not greatly enhance the accretion of conclusions. If the analysis permits any conclusion, it may only be that no change need be anticipated in the characteristic political patterns of the region.

One generalization which the author is at great pains to elaborate seems open to serious challenge: the prime importance of Zionism and the establishment of Israel as fundamental determinants of Arab political modes and reactions. This aberration possibly affords an instance of how the political scientist can usefully caution the political historian. There can be little doubt that the Zionist incursion accelerated the Arab revolution. However, it is patently unlikely that Israel was necessary to revolutionary Arab nationalism or significantly shaped it. Israel is but an incident in the ubiquitous clash between Islamic "tradition" and western "progress" which works itself out within the various economic and social strata of the population, within the various states, among those states, and through the avenues of the cold war. The author clarifies these forces with distinction, and on his own terms it would appear redundant to lean upon Israel for the explanation of Arab movements and diplomacy. Were Israel to be struck from the modern map of the Middle East, or indeed had it never been allowed to decorate that map in the first place, Nasser would still be Nasser and the cold war would surely rock the cradle of civilization.—NOAH LUCATZ, Southern Illinois University, (East St. Louis Center).

Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism Versus Communism. By FERENC A. VÁLI. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1961. Pp. xvii, 590. $9.75.)

Professor Váli's monumental study of recent Hungarian politics was published almost exactly on the fifth anniversary of the October 1956 revolt in Budapest. Following in the footsteps of the first excited accounts breathlessly detailing the sensational events of the revolt, this historically objective and scholarly book with its panoramic view of pre- and post-revolutionary Hungary will immensely enrich our understanding of the intricate maze of recent Eastern European politics. The diligent author has performed an admirable job in a relatively brief time-span. Indeed not only has he offered us a meticulous analytical survey of the events immediately preceding the climactic few days of the popular explosion itself, but he has also been able to investigate and present the manifold "means of coercion and control" as well as of "satellite synchronization" so shrewdly and ruthlessly practiced by the Kádár government ever since November 1956. In a lucid chronological and logical sequence the causes of the "rift" lead first to the effect—the "revolt"—and ultimately to the after-effect itself: to the tortuous road travelled and the manifold ups-and-downs staged by the present regime in Budapest.

Váli's book is divided into five major phases. The author first examines the "Hotbed of Conflicts: The Stalinist Dictatorship" (1949-1953), then the period of "Dual Leadership—Conflicting Policies" (1953-1955), followed by the era of "Single Leadership—Divided Party" (1955-1956), "The Revolution" (1956) and finally by the fifth phase: "Aftermath of a Revolution" (1957-1961). The recurring Leitmotiv throughout is the inevitable and explosive conflict of nationalism and communism which has produced not only violent popular revolts in Eastern Europe, but has also been responsible for the Polish, the Yugoslav (and more recently even the Albanian) "roads to socialism." It is the author's fervent conviction that this endemic and infectious pattern of violent nationalism will oppose Soviet-imposed forms of Communism everywhere throughout the once-monolithic bloc and will eventually denote the total "bankruptcy of Soviet-satellite relations."

This reviewer wholeheartedly agrees with Professor Váli's principal conclusions concerning the Revolution itself—namely that it was negativist (an anti-Soviet, anti-Communist outburst triggered off by massive popular resentment against Soviet rule), spontaneous, largely unplanned and overwhelmingly leaderless. The author disagrees with those of our fellow-professionals who portray the Hungarian revolt either as essentially a "test case of national Communism," or as primarily socialist in orientation, or again as a struggle in the search for self-determination for all of Eastern Europe. Actually, Váli has offered us such an eminently thorough and careful reading of Hungarian history—ranging from published sources in several languages to personal interviews of numerous refugees and to the full use of the Columbia University Hungarian research project—that his “Nationalism Versus Communism” theme looms as by far the most valid psychological-political interpretation of Hungary’s post-World War II evolution.

In this context, evolution is probably not the most felicitous phrase. Postwar Hungary looms more like a case study in galloping and involuntary political satellitism in which the principle of greatly reduced sovereignty and dependence on the dominant power remains qualitatively constant, while the degree of dependence and the means and techniques of control seem to fluctuate quantitatively according to the changing dictates of Soviet and world politics. The picture painted in this scholarly study is a far cry from the expected monolithic unity; on the contrary, even the dull ideological facade of today’s Kádár government hides fascinating and multiple political deviations both to the left and the right. The story of the post-revolutionary repressions is almost equally complex and not simply a stereotyped sequence of horrors presented to the indignant reader with television-patented breathlessness. Dr. Váli’s first-rate discussion of gradualism and selectivity in Kádár’s repression process is one of the most noteworthy aspects of his work.

A related facet of prime significance to the political scientist is an analysis of the essential duality of Hungary’s post-revolutionary government. At first political power was exercised literally on simultaneous levels by the revolutionary institutions on the one hand and the so-called “legal” institutions on the other. It then took the Kádár regime several months to liquidate, by a police process of continuous erosion, the remnants of such important revolutionary organs as the workers’ councils and finally establish the monopoly of its own, widely publicized and allegedly “legal” institutions. Indeed, there seems to be an element of creeping duality in all phases and all types of satellite government. Soviet-inspired Communism inevitably pits party-rule against government-rule, semi-popular rule against rule by a small and antagonistic clique (e.g., the perennial Rákosi-Nagy struggle for power), military against civilian, or native Communists embroiled in factional controversies with Moscow-oriented and Comintern-trained Stalinists. In Váli’s scholarly account most of these patterns of duality emerge with force and clarity despite the incredible murkiness and elusive “Now you see me, now you don’t” aspect of Hungarian domestic politics.

The Harvard University Press performed an outstanding publishing job which further enhances the professional value of the excellent bibliography, charts, maps and index of Rift and Revolt in Hungary. This reviewer emphatically agrees with the London Times which highlighted its summary of the book (in its issue of January 18, 1962) with the trenchant comment: “Mr. Váli has used his voluminous sources with skill. His narrative marches purposefully forward and his analyses are always illuminating. This is contemporary history at its best.”—ANDREW GEORGY, Boston University.

Our Fundamental Rights: Their Nature and Extent (As Judicially Determined). By D. N. BANERJEE. (Calcutta: 1960. Pp. ix, 483. 37s. 6d.)

Professor Banerjee’s monograph is a detailed examination of the impact of judicial review, as exercised by the Indian Supreme Court, on the application and extension of the Bill of Rights section of the present, republican constitution of India. The author is Professor and Head of the Department of Political Science at the University of Calcutta.

Indian scholarship, since the new constitution went into force on January 26th, 1950, has been rich in studies of various aspects of its judicial interpretation; but the interpretive writing on political and civil Rights under the constitution has largely been undertaken by foreigners—for example, by Alan Gledhill and C. H. Alexandrowicz—and the definitive study by an Indian author has still to appear. Part of the trouble may be that Indian writers, after more than a decade of working judicial interpretation of the constitution, are still too deferential in their approach to the judicial process as a whole and disinclined to take strong positions in regard to individual judicial opinions or even individual judges personally. There is, to be sure, very often a fine line to be drawn between fair comment and criticism that is purely intemperate or pejorative; but, as Jeremy Bentham points out, “the law is not made by judge alone, but by judge and company.” Certainly the detailed and continuing appraisal and criticism of judicial opinions—both as to their reasoning and also as to their end results—in the law reviews and commentaries in the United States, has been, over the years, a major factor in the effectuation of legal change and growth.

Professor Banerjee, in common with other Indian commentators, relies far too heavily on lengthy quotations from assorted judicial opinions, from both majority and minority judges, incorporated directly into the main text, the footnotes being formal and cursory. This makes for a somewhat discursive presentation and lessens the impact of Mr. Banerjee's evaluations, when he chooses to make them. When he does so, he writes with power and eloquence. Thus, after reviewing the case law on the "Fundamental Right to Property" under the constitution, and the ensuing constitutional amendments which the federal government had enacted to overcome judicial decisions hostile to its land expropriation and related measures, Professor Banerjee concludes that the right to property has "become, legally speaking, whatever might be the sociopolitical justification of the changes, almost, unlike our other Fundamental Rights, a myth." One can only regret that he has not further developed these and similar appraisals of the actual working operation of the constitutional Bill of Rights, for this would give this careful and detailed review of the case law the light and shade effects that it needs to shape and determine judicial responses in future cases.—EDWARD McWHINNEY, University of Toronto.

Parliaments and Electoral Systems: A World Handbook. Pp. 128. 15s. (London: The Institute of Electoral Research, Ltd. 1962.)

The latest publication of the Institute's series on elections and electoral systems is a thumbnail description of the formal governmental structure, the system of electing the national legislature, and the suffrage provision (usually age) in 118 countries, exclusive of unions. It is scarcely a substitute for the Statesman's Yearbook or the Council on Foreign Relations' Political Handbook of the World, but it may be a quicker reference for the items mentioned above. There is an interesting description and classification of terms, in which such devices as the block vote, the cumulative vote, the limited vote, and the single non-transferable vote are grouped together in a sub-category of "majority" systems called the simple recurring majority type. There is no index, but the countries are listed alphabetically. The date as of which the data are valid is not specified, but it must be early in 1961, because Syria is still classified under the United Arab Republic.—AVERY LEISERSON, Vanderbilt University.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

HIRAM M. STOUT

Washington, D. C.

General

Bryan, Carter R. Security and News in Liberal Countries. Journalism Quarterly, Autumn 1961.

Laqueur, Walter Z. The Emergence of Polycentrism. New Leader, January 8, 1961.

Peffer, Nathaniel. Colonialism: New Problems for Old. Virginia Quarterly Review, Winter, 1961.

United Kingdom and Commonwealth

Amory, Rt. Hon. Viscount. Preparing the Budget. Parliamentary Affairs, Autumn, 1961.

Berndt, Frank. A Free Press and a Fair Trial: England v. the United States. Western Reserve Law Review, December, 1961.

Berrington, Hugh. The Conservative Party: Revolts and Pressures—1955–1961. The Political Quarterly, October–December, 1961.

Biffen, W. J. Party Conference and Party Policy. The Political Quarterly, July–September, 1961.

Britain's Defence Services. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (R. 5064).

Bromhead, Peter. Mr. Wedgwood Benn, the Peerage, and the Constitution. Parliamentary Affairs, Autumn, 1961.

Buck, Philip W. M. P.s in Ministerial Office, 1918–55 and 1955–9. Political Studies, October, 1961.

Cassstevens, Thomas W. Party Theories and British Parties. Midwest Journal of Political Science, November, 1961.

Constitutional Development in the Commonwealth. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (RF. P 5047).

Critchley, Julian. The Intellectuals. The Political Quarterly, July–September, 1961.

Fairlie, Henry. The Exclusive Ones. Encounter, December, 1961.

Gaster, Vivian I. Planning in Cambridge. Contemporary Review, November, 1961.

Heasman, D. J. British Political Attitudes. Dalhousie Review, Autumn, 1961.

Hennessy, David. The Communication of Conservative Policy 1957–59. The Political Quarterly, July–September, 1961.

Hollis, Christopher. The Conservative Party in

- History. The Political Quarterly. July–September, 1961.
- Hornby, Richard. Conservative Principles. The Political Quarterly. July–September, 1961.
- Jeger, Lena M. The Politics of Family Planning. Political Quarterly. January–March, 1962.
- Land Use in an Urban Environment; a General View of Town and Country Planning. Town Planning Review. October, 1961–January, 1962.
- Layton, Christopher. Labour and Europe. Political Quarterly. January–March, 1962.
- London Government: Government Proposals for Reorganization. London, H. M. S. O., 1961. (Cmd. 1562).
- Marquand, David. Passion and Politics. Encounter. December, 1961.
- Mawer, R. Knox. Juries and Assessors in Criminal Trials in Some Commonwealth Countries: A Preliminary Survey. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1961.
- Mohan, Jitendra. The Commonwealth Without South Africa: An Asian View. Toronto, Canadian Institute of International Affairs, 1961. (Behind the Headlines, v. 21, no. 4).
- Negley, Glenn R. The British Administrative Staff College-Training for Executive Responsibility. Personnel Administration. January–February, 1962.
- Noel-Baker, Francis. "The Gray Zone." The Problem of the Business Affiliations of Members of Parliament. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1961–62.
- Parry, Clive. The Foreign Office Archives. International Relations. October, 1961.
- Pickles, William. The Decline of Parliament. Statist. January 5, 1962.
- Platt, D. C. M. The Commercial and Industrial Interests of Ministers of the Crown. Political Studies. October, 1961.
- Political Development in the United Kingdom Dependencies. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (I. D. 1286 rev.)
- Public Finance in Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (No. R. 5129).
- Rose, Richard. Tensions in Conservative Philosophy. The Political Quarterly. July–September, 1961.
- Rose, Richard. The Bow Group's Role in British Politics. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.
- Sanderson, J. B. The National Smoke Abatement Society and the Clean Air Act (1956). Political Studies. October, 1961.
- Schneider, Fred D. The Study of Parliamentary Government in the Commonwealth. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1961.
- The Central Government of Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (R. F. P. 5149).
- Walker, Patrick Gordon. Federalism in the Commonwealth. Journal of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth. October, 1961.

Western Europe

- Alisky, Marvin. Spain's Press and Broadcasting: Conformity and Censorship. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1962.
- Anthem, Thomas. The Greek Elections. Contemporary Review. December, 1961.
- Berlia, Georges. Essai sur la Cinquième République. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. November–December, 1961.
- Campbell, Angus, and Valen, Henry. Party Identification in Norway and the United States. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1961.
- Constitution. The Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany; Amendments as of December 31, 1962. New York, German Information Center, 1962.
- Coty, René. Portrait d'un Republicain: Marcel Plaisant. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. January, 1962.
- De Marchi, Ernest. Trends in Italy: an "Opening to the Left?" Orbis. Winter, 1962.
- Grandchamp, René. Allemagne 62: Continuité de la Politique Interieure et Exterieur. Revue Militaire d'Information, January, 1962.
- Hamon, Leo and Emeri, Claude. Vie et Droit Parliementaires. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. November–December, 1961.
- Hirsch, Felix E. Europe Today; a Bibliography. 3d rev. ed., with supplement. Trenton, N. J., Roscoe L. West Library, Trenton State College, 1961.
- Ireland: A New Chapter. Round Table. December, 1961.
- Italian Communist Party Debate, 5–7 October, 1961. Washington, Joint Publications Research Service, 1961. (JPRS: 11575).
- Lutz, Hans. Kirche und Sozial-demokratie. Zeitschrift für Politik. No. 4, 1961.
- Maranini, Giuseppe. Rapports entre le Pouvoir Exécutif et le Pouvoir Législatif en Italie. Synthèses. October, 1961.
- Marette, Jacques. L'U. N. R. et l'Election Législative Partielle du 9e Arrondissement (4–11 Juin 1961). Revue Française de Science Politique. December, 1961.
- Middleton, W. L. Gaullist Prospects. Contemporary Review. December, 1961.
- Nenni, Pietro. Where the Italian Socialists Stand. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.
- Rougier, Louis. La Tradition Insurrectionnelle de la France. Review des Deux Mondes. December 1, 1961.

The Atlantic Report on Bonn. Atlantic Monthly. January, 1962.

Triesch, Gunter. Struktur eines Parlaments. Politische Meinung. November, 1961.

Waline, Jean. Les Groupes Parlementaires en France. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. November-December, 1961.

Williams, J. Emlyn. Federal Elections in West Germany. World Today. December, 1961.

Williams, Philip. The French Army. Encounter. December, 1961.

Zeidler, Karl. Gedanken zum Fernseh-Urteil des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts. January, 1962.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Adams, Arthur E. Khrushchev's Motivations. New Leader. January 8, 1962.

Akhminov, Herman. The "Permanent Purge" in the New Party Program. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. October, 1961.

Avtorkhanov, A. The Political Significance of the Twenty-Second Party Congress. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. November, 1961.

Biddleford, James. Conflicting Orientations in Soviet Leadership. SAIS Review. Winter, 1961.

Bromke, Adam. The "Znak" Group in Poland. East Europe. January and February, 1962.

Brown, J. F. Albania, Mirror of Conflict. Survey. January, 1962.

Cabanne, Claude. Le XXIIe Congrès du Parti Communiste de l'U.R.S.S.: Retour aux Sources, Assouplissement du Régime? Revue Militaire d'Information. December, 1961.

Conquest, Robert. The Three Funerals of Joseph Stalin. Problems of Communism. January-February, 1962.

Constas, Helen. The U. S. S. R.—from Charismatic Sect to Bureaucratic Society. Administrative Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Croan, Melvin. Ulbricht: Will He Last? East Europe. December, 1961.

Crossman, R. H. S. Reading Khrushchev's Mind. Commentary. December, 1961.

Degras, Jane. Communists in Congress; the 22nd Meeting in Moscow. World Today. December, 1961.

Destalinizing Eastern Europe. East Europe. January, 1962.

Dilo, Jani I. The Communist Party Leadership in Albania. Washington, Institute of Ethnic Studies, Georgetown University, 1961.

Fainsod, Merle. The 22nd Party Congress. Problems of Communism. Special Supplement. November-December, 1961.

Galay, Nikolai. The Soviet Armed Forces and the Twenty-second Party Congress. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. January, 1962.

Ginsburgs, George. Objective Truth and the Judicial Process in Post-Stalinist Jurisprudence. The American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter-Spring, 1961.

Greenslade, Rush, V. Forward to Communism? Problems of Communism. January-February, 1962.

Handlin, Oscar. The Failure of Communism—and What it Portends. Atlantic Monthly. December, 1961.

Hoy, Gerald E. The Abolition of Income Tax in the USSR. Canadian Tax Journal. November-December, 1961.

Hulicka, Karel. The Welfare State: Soviet Ideology and Practice. Midwest Quarterly. October, 1961.

Karavaev, A. The Sick Dictatorship. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. December, 1961.

Katona, P. and Jotischky, L. Hungary: Five Years after the Revolution. British Survey. November, 1961. (Main series no. 152).

Kubat, Daniel. Communist Use of the Czechoslovak Parliament since World War II. Slavic Review. December, 1961.

Landy, Paul. Reforms in Yugoslavia. Problems of Communism. November-December, 1961.

Lawyers in the "New Society." East Europe. December, 1961.

Leading Positions and Personalities in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Soviet Government. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. November, 1961. Supplement.

Lowenthal, Richard. Schism among the Faithful. Problems of Communism. January-February, 1962.

Markham, James W. Effects of "the Thaw" on the Soviet Press. Journalism Quarterly. Autumn, 1961.

Moll, W. The Catalog as a Political Weapon. Library Journal. February 15, 1962.

Mosely, Philip E. Khrushchev's Party Congress. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Neal, Fred Warner. Titoist Theory and Titoist Practice. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1961.

Oppenheimer, Max, Jr. Some Linguistic Aspects of Mind Conditioning by the Soviet Press. Journal of Human Relations. Autumn, 1961.

Pierre, André. Le XXIIe Congrès du Parti Communiste de l'U. R. S. S., Revue Politique et Parlementaire. December, 1961.

Prittie, Terence. East Germany: Record of Failure. Problems of Communism. November-December, 1961.

Reports and Articles Follow Up the Party

Congress. The Current Digest of the Soviet Press. December 27, 1961.

Roucek, Joseph S. Albania in Geopolitics. Contemporary Review. January, 1962.

Rush, Myron. The Khrushchev Succession Problem. World Politics. January, 1962.

Shinn, William T., Jr. The Law of the Russian Peasant Household. Slavic Review. December, 1961.

Skilling, H. Gordon. Gottwald and the Bolshevization of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia. Slavic Review. December, 1961.

Taylor, Lord. Deep Analysis of the Russian Mind. The New York Times Magazine. January 7, 1962.

Vakar, Nicholas P. Creeds and Communism. East Europe. December, 1961.

Yurchenko, A. The State and the New Party Program. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. December, 1961.

Zinner, Paul E. The Vacancy in the Mausoleum. East Europe. January, 1962.

Middle East and Arab North Africa

Agwani, M. S. The Ba'th: A Study in Contemporary Arab Politics. International Studies (New Delhi). July, 1961.

Ashford, Douglas E. Elections in Morocco: Progress or Confusion? Middle East Journal. Winter, 1961.

Bayne, E. A. No Magic in Israel. American Universities Field Staff Reports Service, Southwest Asia series, v. 10, no. 9 (Israel). September, 1961.

Grandchamp, René. Elections Capitales en Turquie et en Grèce. Revue Militaire d'Information. December, 1961.

Heymann, Egon. Zerbrochene Einheit: Syrien geht seinen eigenen Weg. Politische Meinung. November, 1961.

Kapani, Munci. Outlines of the New Turkish Constitution. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1961-62.

Rondot, Pierre. Le Nassérisme après la sécession de la Syrie. Revue de Défense Nationale. January, 1962.

Sablier, Edouard. D'Ataturk à la IIe République Turque. Revue de Paris. November, 1961.

Salpeter, Eliahu. Israel Knesset Elections. Middle Eastern Affairs. November, 1961.

Seymour, I. Destins de l'Iran. Revue des Deux Mondes. December 1, 1961.

Syrian Break from the United Arab Republic. Middle Eastern Affairs. November, 1961.

The Atlantic Report on Syria. Atlantic Monthly. January, 1962.

Young, T. Cuyler. Iran in Continuing Crisis. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Africa

Austin, Dennis. The Political Scene in Ghana. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1962.

Brown, Peter. The Liberal Party of South Africa. Contemporary Review. November, 1961.

Bullard, W. E. Guinean Diary: Life in Africa's First Marxist State. Harper's Magazine. December, 1961.

Cannon, R. W. Law, Bench and Bar in the Protectorate of Uganda. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1961.

Communism in Africa. Moscow's First Steps by David L. Morison. The West African Scene by Walter Kolarz. Problems of Communism. November-December, 1961.

Congo, Gabon, Central African Republic and Chad. British Information Services. London, 1961 (R. 4982).

D., G. V. South Africa Faces the Future. World Today. December, 1961.

Dalton, John H. The Predicaments of African Developments. Social Science. October, 1961.

Davies, Chief H. O. The New African Profile. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Debrah, E. M. Understanding Ghana. Social Science. October, 1961.

Gareau, Frederick J. Bloc Politics in West Africa. Orbis. Winter, 1962.

Ghana's First Five Years. West African Review. January, 1962.

Hopkinson, Tom. The Congo's Challenge. Optima. December, 1961.

Huxley, Elspeth. Some Observations on the African Personality. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1962.

Incorporation of the Northern Cameroons into the Federation of Nigeria; exchange of letters between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Federation of Nigeria. London, H.M.S.O., 1961. (Cmd. 1567).

La Crise du Congo (ex-belge); Chronologie (Juin 1960-Aout 1961). Paris, Documentation Française, 1961. (Notes et études documentaires, no. 2834).

LeVine, Victor T. The New Cameroon Federation. Africa Report. December, 1961.

Lowenkopf, Martin. Uganda: Prelude to Independence. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1961-62.

Mittlebeeler, Emmet V. European Colonialism in Africa. Washington, Institute of Ethnic Studies, Georgetown University, 1961.

Nigeria's First Year. Round Table. December, 1961.

The Kenya Coastal Strip; Report of the Commissioner. London, H.M.S.O., 1961. (Cmd. 1585).

Uganda; Report of the Uganda Constitutional Conference 1961, and Text of the Agreed Draft of a New Buganda Agreement Initialled in London on the 9th of October, 1961. London, H.M.S.O., 1961 (Cmd. 1523).

Vermont, René. La Fusion des Cameroun; un Événement en Afrique Noire. Revue Militaire d'Information. November, 1961.

Worley, Parker, comp. Africa Today. rev. Trenton, N. J., Roscoe L. West Library, Trenton State College, 1961.

South and Southeast Asia

Ahmed, G. Changes in the Administrative Organization of the Government of Pakistan since 1953. Public Administration. Winter, 1961.

Arora, R. S. Rise of the Public Corporation in India: Some Constitutional Aspects. Public Law. Winter, 1961.

Fall, Bernard B. Reappraisal in Laos. Current History. January, 1962.

Federation of Malaysia: Joint Statement by the Governments of the United Kingdom of the Federation of Malaya. London, H.M.S.O., 1961. (Cmd. 1563).

Friedman, Harry J. Notes on Pakistan's Basic Democracies. Asian Survey. December, 1961.

House, E. Malcolm. India under the Impact of Western Political Ideas and Institutions. The Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.

Jensen, J. V. Burma's Experiment in a State Religion. Commonweal. December 15, 1961.

Linebarger, Genevieve Collins. Leadership in Southeast Asia. SAIS Review. Winter, 1962.

Nathanson, Nathaniel L. Indian Constitutional Law in American Perspective. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1961.

Pakistan. A special survey. The Economist. December 2, 1961.

Sadka, Emma. Singapore and the Federation: Problems of Merger. Asian Survey. January, 1962.

Sharma, B. A. V. and Valecha, N. M. The Indian President. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1962.

The Military Legal Systems of Southeast Asia. Military Law Review, October 1, 1961.

Turner, Ralph E. Southeast Asiatic Cultures; Special Significance for Planning and Administering American Aid. Foreword by Dewey Anderson. Washington, Public Affairs Institute, 1962.

Van der Kroef, Justus M. Recent Developments in West New Guinea. Pacific Affairs. Fall, 1961.

Woodward, Calvin A. The Trotskyite Movement in Ceylon. World Politics. January, 1962.

Far East

Bradner, Stephen. Korea: Experiment and Instability. Japan Quarterly. October-December, 1961.

Chassin, L. M. De Fourier à Mao Tse-tung ou du Phalanstère à la Commune du Peuple. Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1962.

Cohen, Arthur A. How Original is "Maoism?" Problems of Communism. November-December, 1961.

Eckersley, T. W. The Imperial Institution in Japan. India Quarterly. April-June, 1961.

Hinton, Harold C. Tiger at the Gate. Commonweal. January 19, 1962.

Langdon, Frank C. Organized Interests in Japan and their Influence on Political Parties. Pacific Affairs. Fall, 1961.

Milne, R. S. The Party System and Democracy in the Philippines. Political Science. September, 1961.

Milne, R. S. The Role of Government Corporations in the Philippines. Pacific Affairs. Fall, 1961.

Statute on Elections to Hural of People's Deputies in Aymaks, Cities, Somons, and Urban Districts of the Mongolian People's Republic. Washington, Joint Publications Research Service, 1962. (JPRS: 12135).

Worley, Parker, comp. Asia Today; a Bibliography. rev. Trenton, N. J., Roscoe L. West Library, Trenton State College, 1960.

Australia and New Zealand

Bibliography of Research in the Social Sciences in Australia 1957-1960. Social Science Research Council of Australia. Canberra, 1961.

Burns, A. L. Problems of Australian Foreign Policy; January-June 1961. Australian Journal of Politics and History. November, 1961.

Holgate, Katherine. Liberal Party Problems in N. S. W. State Politics. The Australian Quarterly. December, 1961.

Latin America and West Indies

The Center of Latin American Studies at the University of California, Los Angeles, began in January the publication of Latin America in Periodical Literature. The new monthly publication is designed "to present in summary form the material relating to Latin America included in a large number of periodicals of widely varying subject matter, published in this and other countries." The subscription price is $4.00 annually, and orders may be addressed to the Center (Los Angeles 24, California).

Alexander, Robert J. Nationalism, Latin America's Predominant Ideology. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1961.

Anderson, Charles W. Politics and Development Policy in Central America. Midwest Journal of Political Science November 1961.

- Beatty, Donald W. Middle Class Government in Chile. Current History. February, 1962.
- British Honduras. rev. British Information Services. Reference Division. New York, 1961.
- Brodowski, Joyce H., comp. Latin America Today; a Bibliography. Trenton, N. J., Roscoe L. West Library, Trenton State College, 1961.
- Carpentier, M. La Politique Étrangère du Brésil. Revue Militaire Générale. December, 1961.
- Deutschmann, Paul J., et al. Mass Media Use by Sub-elites in 11 Latin American Countries. Journalism Quarterly. Autumn, 1961.
- Grandchamp, René. Rôle et Avenir du Mexique. Revue Militaire d'Information. November, 1961.
- Holt, Pat M. Political Ferment in Columbia. New Leader. January 8, 1962.
- Johnson, John J. Politics and Economics in Brazil. Current History. February, 1962.
- Knowles, A. J. An Appraisal of the Cuban Revolution. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1961.
- Potash, Robert A. Argentina's Quest for Stability. Current History. February, 1962.
- Singer, Leonardo. Brazil's Parliamentarism in Crisis. Swiss Review of World Affairs. December, 1961.
- Stolte, Stefan C. Latin America in the Danger Zone. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. November, 1961.
- Szule, Tad. This is Castro—Three Years After. New York Times Magazine. December 31, 1961.
- Tennenbaum, Frank. The Mexican Revolution—50 Years Later. Challenge. December, 1961.
- Worsnop, Richard L. Brazil in Ferment. Washington, Editorial Research Reports, 1962.

Canada

- Hull, W. H. N. The Public Control of Broadcasting: The Canadian and Australian Experiences. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1962.
- Jewett, Pauline. Voting in the 1960 Federal By-Elections at Peterborough and Niagara Falls: Who Voted New Party and Why? Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1962.
- Scarrow, Howard A. Pattern of Voter Turnout in Canada. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1961.
- Smiley, D. V. The Rowell-Sirois Report, Provincial Autonomy, and Post-War Canadian Federalism. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1962.
- The Role of the Deputy Minister: I by J. H. Bieler; II by R. M. Burns; III by A. W. Johnson. Canadian Public Administration. December, 1961.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW, AND ORGANIZATION

America in Britain's Place: The Leadership of the West and Anglo-American Unity. BY LIONEL GELBER. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 356. $5.00.)

This is a provocative and absorbing study in recent Anglo-American relations. It is an interpretive essay, not a documented and exhaustive monograph, and it profits from the virtues and suffers from the defects of the genre. The book has many brilliant insights but these are rarely developed in full and upon occasion their impact upon the major thesis of the work is not fully realized.

The author is a Canadian, a former Rhodes Scholar at Oxford and lecturer at the University of Toronto. What makes the work of peculiar interest, however, are not these academic qualifications but the fact that Mr. Gelber is Special Assistant to the Prime Minister of Canada and puts forward a view of Anglo-American relations which many persons of authority in the Commonwealth undoubtedly share. His thesis can be put thus: Peace is preserved by an East-West balance of power and Anglo-American solidarity is the chief support of this equilibrium. This unique friendship makes feasible the coalition strategy of the West. Their special relationship is not only based upon a common law, language and literature but upon the fact that through their free institutions they have been schooled to cooperate. Their relations exhibit a dialectical process in which the English-speaking people diverge and then, on a new plane, reconcile clashing interests for the sake of a still higher common good. This higher common interest is the continuance of a free world order. It is this latter fact which enabled the transfer of primacy in the leadership of the West to occur with so little friction and jealousy. Differences did arise—there were wartime fears in Washington that Britain was trying to form an Anglo-American bloc against the Soviet Union, for example—but, given the magnitude of the problems faced and the difficult nature of the decisions taken, these differences were amazingly few. The most signal failure in cooperation involved, of course, post-war policies on atomic weapons and Mr. Gelber makes clear the tragic waste of resources which this entailed.

Although relying too heavily on the Eden memoirs, the chapter on the Suez crisis is worthy of the close scrutiny of American students. It makes clear that the chief failure of Dulles's policy lay in his inability to inspire confidence in the minds of British leaders, and that on the British side there was an inadequate grasp of the extent to which American policy was controlled by global rather than regional considerations.

The divergences at the time of Suez and the failure to continue the wartime cooperation on atomic energy suggest that, as it stands, Gelber's thesis is inadequate to explain all the facts concerning the Anglo-American relationship. A. E. Campbell has suggested (The Listener, October 4, 1961) that the idea of a special relationship between the United States and Britain is a myth which served the function of permitting Britain to withdraw gracefully from clashes with the United States. This may put the matter a trifle too baldly but it does emphasize an important point, namely that the relationship in question arose only in the last decade of the nineteenth century when the United States achieved great power. During this early period Britain did in fact give way whenever serious clashes occurred—in Venezuela, Panama and Alaska. In two world wars America intervened only when forced to do so. Certainly the thesis that a special relationship existed was always more strongly felt in Britain than in America and is reflected in the author's perfunctory treatment of the dilemmas presented by the emergence of the Common Market. He fails to grasp the significance for his thesis of the fact that, while the British consistently dragged their collective feet, the Americans could see no basic reason why Britain should oppose closer relations with Europe.

The parts of the book dealing with the impact of the new weapons upon coalition strategy are particularly fine. The complex variables involved are analyzed with acuteness and rare subtlety. In sum, this is a work of considerable penetration, clearly written and forcefully argued. If the major thesis is pressed too hard at times and cannot bear the full weight demanded of it by the author, it nevertheless serves as an organizing hypothesis for a good deal of recent international politics.—C. B. JOYNT, Lehigh University.

Around the Edge of War. BY JOHN FORTH AMORY.
(New York: Clarkson N. Potter, Inc. Pp. 185. $4.50.)

This book joins the barrage of criticism of American foreign policy which has become more intense with each passing year. The author adds a cryptic overtone to his study by writing under a pen name and depicting himself as "a strategically placed Washington expert."

The book correctly points out that a major failure of post-war American foreign policy has been the inability of the United States to understand and support the rising underprivileged majorities in the underdeveloped countries of the non-Western world. The author labels these emerging revolutionary forces as "people power." Instead of assisting the evolution of these groups the United States is supporting small reactionary elites in these countries who are suppressing the inevitable forces of progress and are primarily concerned with maintaining their dominant position.

The present nuclear stalemate between the Western and Communist blocs, the author claims, has encouraged the Soviet Union to pursue its aggressive aims by exploiting these massive discontented groups and utilizing them for its own ulterior ends. The Communists have achieved this important goal by stressing political, economic, and social reforms to needy and receptive people. The Soviet Union is already ahead of the United States in directing this revolutionary tide, and if the United States fails to halt this trend and win the support of these rising forces, the world balance of power will shift decisively and irrevocably in favor of the Communists.

One solution to this dilemma as proposed by the author is appropriate and timely. He encourages the United States to place greater stress on non-military aid programs in the underdeveloped countries. He urges an emphasis on American ideology upholding the rights of the individual—a "Jeffersonian weapon"—to capture the thinking and aspirations of these people. This policy would create a "nuclear shield" by steering the uncommitted nations away from the Communist bloc and shifting the balance of power in favor of the United States.

Yet in spite of some sound analysis and good proposals this book has several serious shortcomings. With gross oversimplification of an exceedingly complex process the author places the blame for the failures of American foreign policy on a single group: the American overseas investors. In no way does he document what he believes to be the dominant power wielded by this group over the formulation and implementation of American foreign policy. He merely assumes it exists.

The author fails to explain that the process of making foreign policy in the United States is extremely complicated and fluid. And the influence of American overseas investors on foreign policy in many regions of the world is a minor one. Dollar diplomacy has steadily declined since the 1920s. Since World War II the American military establishment has played a much greater role than American overseas investors in the conduct of foreign policy. This is especially true in Asia and the Middle East. And in many countries

American business interests are assisting, not opposing, the emerging progressive forces which are demanding a new and better life.

Another weakness in this study is the author's uninformed condemnation of the Central Intelligence Agency for many of the failures of American foreign policy. CIA is blamed for giving the top-level policy makers a distorted image of the world. Allen Dulles is depicted as a tool of "overseas business interests." While CIA has many deficiencies, its acquisition and evaluation of intelligence is probably the most noteworthy contribution it has made to the formulation of foreign policy in the post-war era.

Finally, when the author states that Latin America is the most vital region in the world to the national interest of the United States he reveals the narrow and parochial approach which distorts his assessment of the foreign policy process. He has posited certain premises regarding American objectives in one specific region and applied them to the entire world. Without adequate knowledge of the conditions in other regions of the world this is a dangerous and questionable practice.

In an era of continual tension and growing responsibility the American people need more enlightenment on the conduct of foreign affairs. They need a better understanding of the many diverse forces inside and outside the United States which actually influence their foreign policy. While this book offers some good suggestions on long-range American objectives it does nothing to shed light on the process of making American foreign policy. Let us hope it is soon superseded by a better book on this timely and vital subject.—FRANK C. DARLING, University of Colorado.

When Nations Disagree: A Handbook on Peace through Law. BY ARTHUR LARSON. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana University Press, 1961. Pp. ix, 251. $3.95.)

In recent years an increasing number of lawyers and public servants have been urging the development of a "world rule of law" as our best hope of survival in the atomic age. Rarely, however, do they make explicit the basic assumptions and components on which a "world rule of law" should be based. When Nations Disagree is an attempt by Dr. Arthur Larson, Director of the World Rule of Law Center at Duke University, to set forth the underlying premises of the "world rule of law" idea and to present a concrete description of the steps needed to strengthen the rule of law in international relations.

Unlike others who often unrealistically advocate the substitution of law for politics in world affairs, Dr. Larson views "world law" as only one approach toward the creation of a more peaceful world, arguing that "... if a concept of 'world law' is given too diffuse a scope, it loses its distinctive power to set a clear line of practical action." While acknowledging the desirability of such ancillary actions as the strengthening of the United Nations and the encouragement of political, economic, and cultural moves, his main purpose is "... to see how the resources of law can be directly brought to bear on the problem of preventing conflict and building peace."

In view of the increasing number of books and articles dealing with nuclear deterrence and the possibility if not the probability of war, it is refreshing to find a book that seeks to exploit and project the capacity of states to attain internal order rather than pessimistically accepting the contemporary condition of international disorder.

Written in non-technical terms to reach a wide audience of civil servants, lawyers, businessmen, and teachers, When Nations Disagree attempts to enlist the support of the informed public for the "world rule of law" idea. As will be apparent subsequently, however, efforts to illuminate what is inherently a complex and controversial subject by discussion essentially popular in tone may result in oversimplification.

Following in the tradition of C. Wilfred Jenks' The Common Law of Mankind, Dr. Larson argues that international law needs to be expanded into a genuine world law which would differ from its predecessor not only by virtue of an expanded range of general principles drawn from the legal systems of non-Western as well as Western nations but also in its emphasis on an expanded scope of areas subject to regulation by law. He urges but does not elaborate upon the extension of the rule of law to such matters as outer space, international propaganda, and atomic energy.

But the existence of a body of law that is accessible, up to date, and suffused with principles drawn from the world's principal legal systems is only one component of an effective system of peace through law. The author devotes a considerable part of the book to an examination of three other basic prerequisites: improved machinery for the application of world law; acceptance of the "world rule of law" idea by all nations; and effective compliance with decisions rendered by an improved system of judicial machinery.

While space does not permit a detailed analysis of these suggestions, there is one major premise of central importance to the entire concept of world law. Explicit throughout is the author's assumption that most of the critical international disputes are justiciable in whole or in part, and Dr. Larson does a skilful job of delineating the legal aspects of the Berlin problem, the Sino-Indian border dispute, and Egyptian blockade of the Suez Canal to Israeli ships. It is doubtless valid that there are legal elements susceptible to adjudication in each of these examples, but it is submitted that the author never adequately faces up to the intrinsic limitations of law as a means of solving fundamentally political disputes which involve not the clarification of existing legal rights but aggressive demands for a change in the status quo. How can it be "... pointless to try to calculate the relative gravity of those controversies threatening the peace that are capable of final settlement through the judicial process"?

Any realistic assessment of the future prospects for the judicial settlement of international disputes must in part depend upon the character of previous decisions by the International Court of Justice and its predecessor. The experience of these institutions, however, demonstrates that the cases successfully adjudicated did not involve disputes that gravely threatened peace and security. While the major contemporary disputes involve legal elements, the unwillingness of one or both disputants to accept judicial settlement renders them non-justiciable. Moreover, it is extremely doubtful that voluntary submission would result in final settlement. A very recent illustration is provided by the Indian dispute with Portugal over Goa that was adjudicated by the International Court of Justice in 1960. The decision rendered obviously did not deter India from using force to bring about a spurious kind of justice to a dispute which Dr. Larson over-optimistically predicted nearer to solution at the time the book went to press.

Only a few of the interesting aspects of When Nations Disagree have been touched on in this review. While Dr. Larson deserves credit for developing a systematic and concrete program for the realization of a "world rule of law" in contrast to the more usual banalities that accompany this concept, a more realistic appreciation of the limitations of the role of law in relation to politics in a system of nation-states still dominated by the centrifugal forces of sovereignty and nationalism would have increased the value of the book.—RONALD J. YALEM, Norfolk College of William and Mary.

Legal Problems of the European Economic Community and the European Free Trade Association. WITH A FOREWORD BY SIR KENNETH DIPLOCK. Published under the Auspices of The British Institute of International and Comparative Law. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. 110 $3.95.)

The dream of saints, savants, and statesmen, from St. Isidore of Seville to Rousseau to Briand, of a politically united Europe may yet come to pass. It may be on the way, but it will certainly not come through mere verbalized transfers of aspects of sovereignty to improvised parliamentary institutions. As John Jay so sagely pointed out in one of his Federalist Papers, union in form was ripe for the American states because already there was union in fact. The precedent essential sense of community for Europe is being developed at the center by the Inner Six with their European Economic Community and peripherally by the Outer Seven with their European Fair Trade Association. Already the centripetal forces engendered by solid success along pragmatic lines within the Common Market of the EEC have forced the Inner Six to extend their system to the hitherto omitted agricultural area of their community, have caused the United Kingdom to seek some kind of participation in the EEC, and have confronted the United States with the necessity—and opportunity—of making sweeping changes in its trade and tariff policies toward this new Europe and the larger Atlantic Community.

The present slender volume contains nine papers read at a conference held in London in September 1960 under the auspices of the British Institute of International and Comparative Law and of the Federal Trust and Institute of Advanced Legal Studies. They deal entirely with legal problems involved in the economic, not political, relationships of the Community and the Association. They are the first of a series of supplementary publications brought out by the British Institute. Other publications, in the same series, planned for 1961, deal respectively with "Restrictive Trade Practices" and "Comparative Aspects of Legal Aid." Six of the nine papers are by officers of the EEC, including one on the Court of Justice by the President of the Court, Professor A. M. Donner. The other three are by non-officers similarly expert in EEC and Association affairs.

All of the papers assume a considerable knowledge of the structure and operations of the three European Communities: the Common Market or EEC, the Coal and Steel Community, and Euratom, as well as the two institutions common to the three communities, namely, the Court of Justice and the Parliamentary Assembly. Fortunately, seven of the discussions in the present work are confined to the EEC, the remaining two dealing with the European Free Trade Association and some of its relations to the EEC.

Of the seven papers centered on the EEC, two deal, respectively, with the objectives and constitutional structure of the EEC and with its legal framework; four deal, respectively, with (1) the establishment of companies, the spread of investment, and the problem of taxation, (2) the need for more uniformity in the law relating to the international sale of goods in Europe, (3) the law relating to industrial property (patents, trade marks, and licenses) within the community, and (4) rules of competition and restrictive trade practices. Each of these papers, as well as the two on the Outer Seven Free Trade Association, discuss highly technical legal problems of greatest value to the expert in the respective fields. They reveal considerable invention of techniques, devices, formulae, and harmonizations necessitated by this mutation of relationships to a developing community. In many ways the problems encountered and in process of solution in EEC are reminiscent of those encountered within the national market of the United States, criss-crossed by the confederation and federation of the states since 1776, but not yet enjoying the salutary ordering of affairs by a central power with authority to lay down increasingly the law of the land. In due course, if union in fact in Europe continues, central formal authority may emerge.

The paper on the Court of Justice of the European Communities by its President should have special interest for students of American constitutional law. The Court is very much sui generis. Its jurisdiction in terms of law and parties, its procedure in four languages, its non-use of dissenting opinions, its use of advocates-general as substitutes for the clarifying processes of lower courts, and other unusual features make fascinating reading. Its contribution to a reign of law among the European states concerned, even if confined thus far to matters of economic significance, is most heartening. Though the Court appears to operate closely within its European matrix, "it would be surprising," as Paul Freund observed in his "Forum" lecture on the Supreme Court of the United States, if the European Court were not to find "much of value . . . in the experience of the Supreme Court during a century and a half in striking a working balance between the needs of the individual states and the freedom of the common market."—HENRY REIFF, St. Lawrence University.

The United States and the United Nations. Ed. by FRANCIS O. WILCOX and H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1961. Pp. x, 188. $4.50.)

Now that the United States stake in the United Nations is under close scrutiny, this slender volume which grew out of a mid-1961 conference held under the joint auspices of the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies and the Brookings Institution is of particular value. It is a symposium dealing with seven major subjects through seven essays. Each offers some timely observations and insights.

Joseph E. Johnson, in "Helping to Build New States" maintains that most new states should not be expected to develop Western canons of political behavior and suggests that the greatest contribution of the United Nations might ultimately be the smoothing of Western adjustment to the fact of the new nations. In the second essay, "The Six Imperatives of Economic and Social Progress," Paul G. Hoffman presents a succinct analysis of the United Nations Special Fund and proposes that a greater proportion of international public assistance—in pre-investment and investment fields—be channeled through the United Nations. Lincoln P. Bloomfield's careful observations on the "new arithmetic" of voting alignments in the General Assembly form the most perceptive part of a thoughtful essay on "The New Diplomacy in the United Nations." Ernest A. Gross, in "Shifting Institutional Patterns of the United Nations" focusses on the most significant structural developments in the world organization. Inis L. Claude's essay "The Containment and Resolution of Disputes" is probably the most valuable contribution. His comparative analysis of United States and Soviet responses to United Nations "sealing-off" activities in the "no man's land" of the cold war is truly excellent. In his essay on "The Capacities of the United Nations" Harlan Cleveland sets forth three capacities as the most crucial: to act, to befriend, and to create. A balanced assessment of United States policy in the United Nations by Francis O. Wilcox concludes the volume.

The book as a whole highlights two general problems of great importance: first, the increasing interdependence of the two great conflicts of our time—the struggle over the expansion or containment of Communism and the struggle over the liquidation of Western colonialism—and the increasing complexity of the United States position in the United Nations as a result. The Soviet exploitation of the colonial struggle and the anti-colonial exploitation of the East-West struggle are confronting United States policy makers with more and more agonizing dilemmas in all organs of the world organization. Second, and perhaps most important, the book points up the necessity for clarifying United States policy toward the United Nations. Should we regard the world body as another version of NATO, that is, as a vehicle for the furtherance of Western interests? Or should we view it as genuinely neutral ground in the East-West struggle? Inis L. Claude's thoughts on this point are well worth pondering:

"We should concentrate less on equipping the organization to override Soviet opposition than on enabling it to gain Soviet acquiescence in, or support for, its playing an essentially neutralist role—one which contributes not to the winning of the Cold War by one side or the other, but to the limitation of the scope and intensity of that struggle. . . ."

—JOHN G. STOESSINGER, Hunter College.

The United Nations: Constitutional Developments, Growth and Possibilities. BY BENJAMIN V. COHEN. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1961. Pp. 106. $2.75.)

The three all too short chapters which comprise this book were delivered as the Holmes Lectures at Harvard in the Spring of 1961. They represent the distilled wisdom of a long and fruitful association with the United Nations extending back to the author's participation as a White House adviser in the Department of State deliberations which gave birth to the American draft of the Charter of the United Nations. The author's association with this work was a fruitful one as he is what in current parlance is called an "innovator." At any moment of deadlock or stalled action he could be counted on for a fresh idea or a new approach.

Mr. Cohen's basic thesis is that the Charter of the United Nations has within it all the possibilities and potentialities for growth to deal with today's formidable problems. The trouble lies not in the Charter but in the willingness of the Members to use it and to support action under it. The lack is one of will and of consensus. It is not the Charter which impedes the expansion of United Nations activities, Mr. Cohen rightly declares, but a lack of working consensus among the Member States. The Charter, he adds, has created an organism capable of life and growth, but that life and growth depend not only on the words of the Charter but on the way the Member States meet their responsibilities and exercise their rights and privileges under the Charter.

For Mr. Cohen the basic law of the Charter is to be found in paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 2—(1) that all Members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such manner that international peace and security are not endangered; and (2) that all Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state or in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. If these obligations are accepted in good faith by the Members of the United Nations, all other matters are manageable within the four corners of the Charter. The principles of the Charter are broad and comprehensive and made flexible enough, like our Constitution, to be adapted to exigencies which in the words of Justice Holmes, "could not have been completely foreseen by the most gifted of its begetters."

The first lecture is devoted to the elaboration of key examples of the Charter's demonstrated capacity for growth. These include the interpretation that an abstention by a permanent member of the Security Council, is not treated as equivalent to a negative vote under Article 27, par. 3; that the question whether a matter is a substantive vote shall be decided by a procedural vote (the potential double veto); that the General Assembly may make recommendations for collective measures in cases of threats to or acts of aggression, when the Security Council is unable to act; that Article 2, paragraph 7 on domestic jurisdiction "was not intended to take away powers granted to the United Nations by the Charter, but to provide a guide for their construction"; and that the competence and powers of United Nations organs may derive not only from the Charter but from treaties and ad hoc agreements. The significant conclusion is that "generally speaking Charter interpretations that would seriously retard the organic growth and development of the Charter have not prevailed."

The second lecture is devoted to an examination of the exercise of their responsibilities by the Member States. "If the United Nations is to live and grow, Member States must not only observe their obligations under the Charter, but exercise their rights and privileges under the Charter wisely and prudently." While almost a truism, this proposition is far from being taken as a serious guide for their conduct by many Members in the organization's significant business. A large part of the lecture is devoted to an appraisal of the narrow limits of self defense within which Members may legally resort to the unilateral use of force under the limitations imposed by Article 2, par. 4.

The author is less persuasive in his projections in lecture three entitled "What to do"—given a workable organization, but Members who have been unwilling to exploit its resources. This is perhaps not surprising in view of the nearly insoluble dilemma presented by the absence of a community of purpose between the two principal power groups in the United Nations. It is at this point that Mr. Cohen tackles the problem with proposals which are wise but would seem to have little chance of prospering as long as the Communists persist in objectives diametrically opposed to the basic purposes and principles of the organization. His basic proposition is that ways must be found to strengthen the consensus among all nations, and among the Great Powers in particular, that force must not be used as an arbiter of international differences. It is characteristic of the author and a tribute to his faith that he insists that, no matter how hopeless the effort may seem, we must continue to rely upon an appeal to reason and common interest. We must not let Communist scorn for bourgeois thinking cause us to lose "faith in the power of right reason." The more difficult the tasks of the United Nations may be, the greater the need for pressing for a consensus of thinking that will make active cooperation possible and meaningful. "In this quest for consensus there is no role for dogmatism and self righteousness. I would close no doors. In the United Nations, as 'in my Father's house,' there 'are many mansions.' "—DURWARD V. SANDIFER, American University.

International Immunities. By C. WILFRED JENKS. (London: Stevens & Sons Limited; New York: Oceana Publications, 1961. Pp. xxxviii, 178. $6.00.)

Simultaneously, and perhaps paradoxically, with the increase in the tasks and scope for which international organisations are expected to provide solutions, there have grown in recent decades also the importance and power of the sovereign nation-state. In addition to the recent quantitative increase in their number, the authority of the sovereign states expanded also qualitatively. The newly independent nations display a passionate desire for independence from and equality with the older nations. Both are reluctant to concede to international bodies even small concessions or privileges as long as these might appear as infractions of their sovereignty.

In the municipal sphere the functions of national governments have increased not only in the totalitarian or authoritarian states but also in states with truly democratic institutions. Public controls and responsibilities are today larger than ever before. This is a natural consequence of the fact that in modern societies more and more tasks are entrusted to public authorities. In performing many of these tasks, international organisations can help individual states. Yet it is essential that international organisations carry out their activities independent of the control of the individual state in order to achieve their international goals. They are ultimately controlled by and responsible to the multi-national community of the member states. At the same time the maintenance of the municipal legal order cannot be simply brushed aside. A proper coordination between the two is imperative. International immunities are essentially a body of rules regulating the relationships between individual states and various international institutions insofar as the latter require special consideration and status within the municipal legal order. They are "an essential device for the purpose of bridling unilateral and sometimes irresponsible control by particular governments of the activities of international organisations."

With the advent of international organisations in the twentieth century it seemed at first quite natural to accord to the new international institutions and their functionaries the diplomatic immunities and privileges. This was done, for example, in the Covenant of the League of Nations [Art. 7(4)] and in the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice [Art. 19]. With the gradual growth in size and number of international organisations it soon became obvious that a wholesale application of diplomatic immunities is impossible and that even analogy to them in the process of formation of new rules concerning international immunities can suffer from serious defects.

Wilfred Jenks, long an official of the International Labor Organization, considers that of the three theories employed to justify diplomatic immunities, namely the 'extraterritoriality' theory, the 'representative character' theory and the 'functional necessity' theory, only the last one can be usefully applied to the field of international immunities. Both types of immunities correspond to certain basic functional needs of international intercourse. Since these are not identical, though sometimes comparable, different solutions and regulations will probably evolve in the field of international immunities from the already recognised ones in the diplomatic field. There exist major differences between diplomatic practices and the activities of international organisations and their functionaries. Diplomatic representatives are chosen from amongst nationals of the sending state in agreement with the authorities of the receiving state. Substantial diplomatic exemptions from the jurisdiction of the receiving state do not exempt the agent from the jurisdiction of his own sending state. The diplomatic immunities are well sanctioned by the principle of reciprocity and the possibility of effective retaliation for any violation or infraction of the diplomatic code. Hence their predominantly customary character with but a few conventional additions. International immunities, on the other hand, cannot be sanctioned by the same method and require to a much greater extent precise conventional guarantees. An international organisation will usually employ, especially at its official headquarters, a substantially larger number of multi-national personnel than an average embassy. The duration of an individual employee's service period will very often be quite extended. At its headquarters at least, an international organisation will also require extensive facilities, office buildings and premises, and it will be often involved in substantial monetary and other material transactions. All of these factors increase the potential points of friction with the local jurisdiction for which satisfactory solutions must be found in advance, at least in principle.

The author finds the conception of international immunities based on the 'functional necessity' theory confirmed in the general acceptance of certain basic principles by recent state practice. "The thinking underlying these principles is essentially institutional in character. It is not concerned with the status, dignity or privileges of individuals, but with the elements of functional independence necessary to free international institutions from national control and to enable them to discharge their responsibilities impartially on behalf of all their members." Jenks identifies two main historical sources from which the principles of functional international immunities were gradually derived, namely, the already mentioned diplomatic immunities, on the one hand, and "the writings and decisions of the great federalists, and notably of Hamilton and Marshall, on the arrangements necessary to give reasonable independence and authority to newly created federal instrumentalities," on the other.

With the use of this conceptual framework the author then carefully examines various aspects of international immunities. In the first, general, part he deals briefly with the basic theory of immunities, the legal process of determining the extent of granted immunities, and some special problems connected with international immunities such as the neutrality of a member state, subversive activities of functionaries and the relationship to third, non-member states. Parts two and three represent the core of the work. Here he deals comprehensively with immunities of international organisations as such and the immunities of persons connected with international institutions. In the last part the author discusses the future of international immunities, dealing specifically with problem areas that seem most likely to develop substantially in the future while their present regulation is still in a fluid stage. One is the pronounced trend toward uniformity of regulations that can be seen in recent practices concerning international immunities. The author weighs carefully the advantages of such uniformity as against the need to preserve the adaptability to new functions and problems arising from growth in size, scope and locality of the operations. The other special problem area is that of judicial redress against international decisions. The need to provide proper safeguards against arbitrariness on the side of international organisations in relation to their own officials and within the sphere of their immunities is weighed against the requirement for reasonable freedom of action unhampered by excessive and cumbersome legal procedures. The concluding chapter is on the central problem area, namely, the protection of international independence against national sovereignty.

The volume as such is a most comprehensive and up to date reference work on international immunities. One can only hope that the author will soon be able to fulfill his promise of a volume on The Corporate Personality for International Purposes of which the present book was originally intended to be a part.—PETER P. REMEC, Fordham University.

The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War. BY BURNETT BOLLOTEN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. 350. $6.50.)

"Although the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War in July, 1936, was followed by a far-reaching social revolution in the anti-Franco camp . . . people outside Spain were kept in ignorance, not only of its depth and range, but even of its existence, by virtue of a policy of duplicity and dissimulation of which there is no parallel in history." With this statement, Burnett Bolloten sets out to correct this situation, and a most formidable one at that, by presenting some years after the event, a thoroughly and well documented account of the techniques employed by a small group of Marxist-Leninists seeking to achieve their goal.

The author does admirably well in the task of tracing and pin-pointing the Communist intrigues in the anti-Franco government and, in particular, the efforts of Francisco Largo Caballero who, as Prime Minister, struggled to remain the master of a government beset by an externally Axis-supplied enemy and an internal enemy bent on the subversion of the existing government.

In Mr. Bolloten's account, we witness the manner in which the Communists skillfully secured pivotal positions by proselytism, defamation and infiltration in the reorganization of the police forces which, by October, 1936, were little more than an arm of the Soviet Secret Police. Once the Communists had achieved this goal, the Leftists were able to focus their attention on the left-wing opponents of Soviet policy and, as the author documents it, this became a decisive force in determining the course of events in the government of that era inasmuch as the Ministry of Justice had no control over the police forces nor their activities. The analysis of the Communist subversion of the police forces is followed by the detailed account of the creation of the Fifth Regiment, the balancing off of one class against another, control of the War Ministry, the successful infiltration of the Armed Forces, youth groups and other institutions in the society until Prime Minister Caballero, having lost his support in the coalition Cabinet, was forced out of the government and the Communists emerged the victors.

This is a masterful, highly informative work which effectively marshalls the intricacies of Communist strategy in the Spanish Civil War. In a sense, it is an "anatomy of a revolution" and provides a clear insight on the Communist tactics in a national revolution, it is timely in view of the recent events in Cuba and Laos.

In conclusion, the author writes with a high degree of skill acquired as an eye-witness to the events he speaks of plus many additional years of painstaking research on the subject. The reader is left with a detailed map of the Communist strategy in Spain. This reviewer found that Mr. Bolloten is without question justified in closing his study with a very apt quotation: "The Communist parties (of the world) are strong in proportion as the other parties and trade union organizations are weak and vacillating and play their game. That was the lesson of Spain and that, today, is the lesson of Europe and the world."—THOMAS W. NAGLE, U. S. Naval Postgraduate School.

The Backward Society. By RAYMOND FROST. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1961. Pp. 246. $5.00.)

Generalizing simply but astutely is a formidable task for the specialist, but Raymond Frost can claim top honors. His book is an ABC of the problems and possibilities of economic development in the less industrialized areas of the world. Even though such an approach necessarily loses something for the reader interested in focusing upon a particular nation or region, it nevertheless offers a good deal to all those who wish to concentrate on the larger, more general aspects of building sound economies in the developing countries.

The author, working within the context of Western values (thereby precluding forced savings), outlines three means of "breaking out of the closed circles of inadequate savings and inadequate exports": generous grants of foreign aid, the discovery of scarce mineral deposits, and the opportunity offered by a boom in commodity export prices. He discounts the first two measures as unreliable but places considerable faith in the third. Little attention is paid to such incentive factors as changes in the tax laws or land reform, and the general effects of inflation are not elaborated upon. When commodity export prices boom, he emphasizes, the developing countries must capitalize fully upon their opportunity: they must avoid the temptations of increased consumption, and the resultant savings must be invested with the utmost care.

How are savings to be utilized most productively? To start with, Frost would rely ideally on the operations of the market mechanism. He is well aware of the social forces pressing the bureaucracy to perform a wider and wider range of functions in the developing countries, but he urges that government officials undertake only responsibilities which are general and basic. Some planning is obviously required, however, and the author devotes considerable attention to setting up appropriate guidelines.

If planners are to combine land, labor and capital in order to achieve the author's goal of balanced economic growth, they must devote greater energies to technical details as well as to overall purposes. Frost takes great pains to show that a poor combination will retard development. Thus power projects and highways are useful if productive—and to the extent to which they are productive; they involve a poor allocation of resources, however, if their yield is low. Investments in education and improvement of land are preferred to impressive construction projects where the costs of the latter are high relative to returns. Poverty and population pressure, he feels, make it imperative to invest in projects yielding rapid returns. "When investment produces quick returns its beneficent effect becomes rapidly cumulative. But if there is a long delay before the first additional dollars come in, then the cumulative effect of investment is postponed." For Frost, then, extensive sacrifice at this time may cause increasing misery both in the present and the future; no doubt this approach will be less exacting than one directed toward TVA-like projects, but one wonders if it is best designed to meet the challenge of rising expectations over the long pull.

The above thesis on the need for rapid returns from investments directly affects the nature of planning for foreign trade. Exports must be increased in order to finance the importation of additional capital goods. What kinds of exports can the less technically advanced lands produce most competitively? Frost urges these lands to export consumer goods. Not only does he feel that the adoption of a simple line of consumer goods will avoid the problem of complex and expensive imported equipment, but that it will also establish a good base for progress toward more complex and more expensive projects.

It is when Frost deals with non-economic questions—many of which turn out to be impediments to sound economic growth—that he seems least inclined to consider all factors. The pressures to spread governmental power among a number of constituent authorities and to invest in display projects may retard economic progress to some extent, but if these schemes give satisfaction, they must be weighed at every stage against the more purely economic goals. To do otherwise is to oversimplify the planners' task. It is not enough to indicate that national disunity is costly in economic terms without also indicating that minority ethnic group fears are costly in human terms. It is not enough to scoff at vast expenditures on the establishment of airlines or television stations without also understanding that people gain satisfaction from such prestige projects. Planners, in short, must not operate in vacuo but must allocate expenditures according to the principle of greatest satisfaction, for both the present and the future. Judged by this yardstick, a few grandiose schemes may seem prudent.

Certainly Frost does the public a major service by grappling resolutely with some of the most vital questions of our time. The Backward Society is a concise, well written study which deserves serious scrutiny.—DONALD S. ROTHCHILD, Colby College.

The United States and the Treaty Law of the Sea
By HENRY REIFF. (University of Minnesota Press, 1959. Pp. 451. $8.00.)

This volume can be highly recommended on two counts, its assembly of relevant facts and its approach to the problems of the sea. First, it provides a comprehensive survey of the extraordinary number of treaties which the United States has entered into, bilaterally and multilaterally, with nations of the world to deal with the many problems of transportation, conservation, and jurisdiction which have arisen and will continue to arise. The extensive documentation will assist the reader to appreciate the vast amount of literature on the subject. The author rightly acknowledges his indebtedness to the late Judge Manley Hudson who first drew attention to the growing significance of treaty law in his authoritative nine-volume work, International Legislation, and convincingly shows the growing importance of multi-national conferences and especially of the increasing number of international agencies, such as the United Nations, its specialized agencies and regional international bodies which frequently work in association with national governments and private national and international associations.

The number of treaties rose greatly between World War I and World War II. Reiff suggests that rather than deal with this growth in terms of institutions and programs undertaken by the League, the United Nations, and other bodies, it is more profitable to concentrate upon the sea itself and to see national and international action in relation to it.

After World War II the nations were confronted with the older problems which had challenged mankind, plus new problems and opportunities which arose from the extraordinary range of scientific and technological developments. The treaties dealing with these new areas of activity—Antarctica, missile testing, conservation, disposal of waste, scientific cooperation, etc.—became more complex and more numerous, and required the services of the most highly-trained experts in many fields of endeavor.

The inter-relation between the United Nations, its specialized agencies, regional bodies, national bodies and private associations increased to an extraordinary degree. The formation of the International Law Commission by the United Nations bears witness to the need of constant study of legal aspects, as do the great conferences on the law of the sea.

The second major contribution of the volume lies in its theoretical and philosophical implications. The voluminous treaty law arises out of necessity, being conditioned by the very nature of the sea itself and man's dependence upon it. Certain "compulsions" arise out of the sea which imposes "a degree of unification of effort and organization" and results in a growing inter-relation of the regimes. "The sea inspires profound respect for the facts. . . . To be durable, solutions of the very practical problems arising out of man's use of the sea must perforce rest firmly upon a realistic appraisal of the material facts." The theme that legislation must reflect the realities imposed upon us by the sea is extensively sound. The author describes the many uses and abuses of the sea and emphasizes mankind must approach nature with respect or even reverence if it is to utilize it to advantage and not to suffer from the catastrophe which follows the abuse and depletion of resources, whether on sea or land. Reiff sees beneath the political problems narrowly construed, and with van Wageningen and others speaks of the "community of the sea"; he stresses the need of a social science of the sea, for individuals, groups, and nation-states are now experiencing what appears to be a historic trend toward increased dependence upon the ocean.

Focused on the sea, such a social science would assess the relation of men, groups, nation-states, and international agencies to the central phenomena and seek to discover what the interaction portends for a more secure, orderly, and cooperative world.

The community of the sea preceded the nation-state and "will most probably survive the transmutation of the state system into something else."

The sea which was once regarded as res nullius will increasingly become res communis. The implications of this approach cannot be dealt with in this review which must content itself with underlining the vital importance of constantly keeping in mind the necessity of basing human laws and institutions upon life itself. It is for this fundamental reason, among others, that changes in national and international organization must continuously take place and result in an ever increasing amount of what the present reviewer in his Foundations of Modern World Society (which appeared in 1941) called "transnational law." I perhaps may be permitted to recall that the approach which I made a generation ago paralleled that of Professor Reiff in his present work. Professor Reiff, however, has written a volume marked by a greater concentration of analysis upon the sea, a more extensive and imposing bibliography, and a greater degree of expertness in the field of international law. And one is happy to note the fluency and clarity of his prose, a contrast to some of the material now appearing in the field of the social sciences.—LINDEN A. MANDER, University of Washington (Seattle).

Food, Land, and Manpower in Western Europe.

By P. LAMARTINE YATES. (New York: St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiii, 294. $7.00.)

This volume is one of four monographs which together constitute a major study of the economic resources and requirements of Western Europe. The main volume in the series, Europe's Needs and Resources, has also been published. The study has been sponsored by the Twentieth Century Fund under the general direction of J. Frederic Dewhurst.

Yates' volume is primarily concerned with the changes which are taking place in both the consumption and production of agricultural commodities in Europe. With increasing affluence, Europeans are consuming rather more vegetables, fruit, sugar and eggs, while wheat and potatoes play an ever smaller role in diets. Aside from an excess consumption of sugar, Yates notes, the inter-war problem of lower-class malnutrition has disappeared. Or rather, it has been transformed; today the division is between nations rather than between social classes. The dividing line is roughly that between northern and Mediterranean Europe with France standing somewhere in between.

The pattern of production is characterized by the same geographic division. With the exception of Spain, Portugal, Greece, and parts of Italy, per capita production is rising rapidly. For Europe the Malthusian fear of population excess is no longer a real one. On the other hand, many countries do face the problem of surplus production and rural unemployment. Further, Southern Europe especially is still characterized by excess fragmentation of holdings, a lack of effective cooperation, a lack of effective government agricultural policies, and the continued use of primitive techniques.

Attempts to solve these problems are hampered by traditional attitudes and political pressures. Peasants are still loath to leave the land or to use the newer machinery. Further, a national tradition which glorifies the soil supports the efforts of marginal producers to obtain subsidies, and "requirements of security" result in artificial support for a highly inefficient agriculture.

Yates offers a number of policy suggestions, including an increase in technical training, consolidation of fragmented holdings, and a general attempt to develop well-run family farms of from 15 to 30 hectares. Considering European conditions, he sees no need for the larger units characteristic of the Soviet Union and much of the United States. He argues for the reduction of subsidies, and an effort to attract surplus farm labor from the land. Most of the current migration to the city is taking place from areas adjacent to large metropolitan centers. The real problem of rural overpopulation, however, lies in the more remote sections of the various countries. Yates suggests a two-pronged attack involving first attracting industry to these areas and then retraining the rural populations.

Given a modicum of intelligent attention to agricultural problems, Europe, by 1970, should be producing some 30 percent more food with some 20 percent less manpower. The effects of this transformation are likely to be substantial. Not only will it involve increasing affluence, but it will also bring about the disappearance of the most traditional-minded elements in European society. Even those who remain in agriculture are no longer the peasants of even 50 years ago. Given the rapid growth of transportation and communication networks, and the spread of universal education, the isolated peasant is disappearing, and is increasingly being replaced by farmers whose outlook does not differ overly from their urban brethren. The continuing revolution in agriculture, then, is contributing to the continuing revolution in the whole pattern of European politics.—STANLEY ROTHMAN, Smith College.

Soviet Policy towards International Control of Atomic Energy. By JOSEPH L. NOGEE. (Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1961. Pp. xiv, 306. $6.50.)

Although the seemingly endless search for the means to control nuclear weapons continues, the author of this volume contends that the attempt to place atomic energy under direct international control and ownership has become a closed subject. Since the Soviet Union played the key role in creating this lamentable state of affairs, the subject provides a very neat and significant case study in Soviet "diplomacy" and foreign policy.

Professor Joseph Noguee of the University of Houston has traced in great detail the record of the Soviet Union's response to the fact of nuclear energy and to the challenge presented by the Acheson-Lilienthal Report which advocated international ownership of atomic energy installations. His account is confined primarily to the public negotiations and debates of the 1945-1953 period and is based on readily accessible, if burdensome, sources such as the record of proceedings in the United Nations bodies which have dealt with the problem. The author has painstakingly extracted all the significant statements from this prolix record and has examined all other relevant Soviet statements. Thus three-quarters of this study is devoted to the record of fruitless negotiations which reads like the depressing chronicle of an unending journey through a morass.

The monotony with which the Soviet delegates repeated certain propaganda themes in what were to have been "negotiations" has not prevented Professor Nogee from identifying the various nuances in Soviet policy. Initially Moscow was cautious and taciturn regarding atomic weapons and minimized their significance. When confronted with the United States plan for an International Atomic Development Authority, as presented by Bernard Baruch, the Soviet Union charged that this organization would be controlled by "American monopolists" who desired to dominate the Soviet economy. The Soviet purpose was to propagate the notion of an atomic weapons ban unrelated to any effective system of international control and based exclusively upon Soviet protestations of good faith. When Soviet concessions appeared to have been made they were usually quickly nullified by reversion to the basic Soviet line.

After charting the various phases of the search for an international control system—or more correctly, its rejection—Professor Nogee devotes the two final chapters of his study to an analysis of the sources of Soviet opposition to an international control agency and the techniques of "gamesmanship" employed in eight years of negotiation. Soviet opposition was based on the conception of national sovereignty as expressed in the United Nations Charter and its veto provision. Thus an international agency exercising control over Soviet atomic energy installations and foreign penetration of the Soviet economy were regarded as a less desirable prospect than the perpetuation of the status quo in the form of an arms race. To the Soviet Union international ownership of atomic energy facilities meant "capitalist ownership" in view of Western insistence that the veto be abolished in this vital area.

Professor Nogee's trenchant analysis of Soviet gamesmanship demonstrates that the Soviet Union's participation in protracted public negotiations prior to 1954 was designed to achieve certain objectives. Foremost among these was the effort to influence world opinion as well as American public opinion in an attempt to compel the United States Government to renounce use of the bomb. At the same time the negotiations were employed to depict the policies of the Western democracies as "aggressive" and to stall for time during which the Soviet Union could rush its own atomic weapons development program to completion and in this way render the United Nations majority (Baruch) plan obsolete. The explosion of the first Soviet atomic bomb in 1949 led to a campaign designed to stress Soviet use of atomic energy for "peaceful" purposes. While Soviet spokesmen did not appear to reject Western proposals outright they did so in fact by demanding that the West agree to conditions which would nullify international controls. The Soviet delegates, by compelling the West to reject a number of unacceptable Soviet proposals, were able to displace some of the onus of negativism entailed in their rejection of Western proposals. The author has examined in detail the various techniques of stalling employed to prolong the debates over the years.

In a separate chapter devoted to the test ban problem Professor Nogee contends, very convincingly, that the Soviet Union acted on the basis of a careful calculation in unilaterally ceasing bomb tests in March 1958 and in embarking upon test ban negotiations. Although his treatment of this particular subject does not extend much beyond 1959, it clearly underlines the dilemma persistently confronting American policy-makers.

This is a very important volume for anyone interested in the record of the Soviet approach to the problems of arms reduction. The facts of this record and Professor Nogee's accompanying analysis are indispensable for an understanding of the policy and tactics of Soviet gamesmanship in disarmament and test ban negotiations.—JOHN S. RESHETAR, JR., University of Washington (Seattle).

Strategy for the 60's, EDITED BY JAY H. CERF AND WALTER POZEN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1960. Pp. 155. $4.00, cloth, $1.50, paper).

This volume provides a twenty-eight page analysis and an outline summary of thirteen studies on United States foreign policy prepared, with one exception, by private research organizations for the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate. The editors are the Director and Associate Director of the Foreign Policy Clearing House, a "nonpartisan, nonprofit, private organization devoted to communicating to U. S. foreign policy-makers the consensuses of major foreign policy research centers of the United States."

These thirteen reports are of interest not only because of the policy proposals that they advance but also because they represent a creative adaptation by the Foreign Relations Committee to the new challenges being thrust upon it. Senator J. W. Fulbright, Chairman of the Committee, succinctly describes the predicament of the Committee in an introduction to this volume. In order to operate effectively, says Senator Fulbright, "the Committee needs ideas, background, and information originating from sources outside the government." In domestic policy fields congressional committees "have available to them the wealth of ideas and information generated by the domestic press, by domestic organizations, and by constituents generally." In the field of foreign policy, however, the Senator states:

... it is the executive branch which has a near monopoly on information and ideas. This is attributable in part to the fact that the Department of State has some 20,000 employees in daily contact with countries and individuals throughout the world.

It is clear that Congress cannot long play its traditional role in our political system if it finds itself incompetent to make an independent judgment on the ever-increasing foreign relations elements of national policy.

The reports analyzed and summarized in this volume were financed by a Senate appropriation of $300,000 and printed on 1421 pages of fine print by the Senate between August 1959 and February 1960. Five of the thirteen reports discuss United States foreign policy for geographical areas: (1) Western Europe, (2) Africa, (3) Asia, (4) the Middle East, and (5) the USSR. Latin America is omitted because the Subcommittee on American Republic Affairs separately contracted for seven studies. (It is unfortunate that the editors did not include these studies.) Five studies deal with the impact on United States foreign policy of (6) world-wide and domestic economic problems, (7) nonmilitary scientific developments, (8) developments in military technology, (9) principal ideological conflicts, and (10) economic, social, and political change in underdeveloped countries. The other three discuss (11) the formulation and administration, (12) operational aspects, and (13) basic aims of United States foreign policy.

It is impossible in a short review to give much consideration to the varied content of the reports. (The reader may find useful the critiques of Morton Halperin and James A. Robinson in volume four of The American Behavioral Scientist.) The reviewer was impressed with the number of stimulating innovations which, although not all entirely new, the reports bring to the attention of the Senate—e.g., a United Nations university for advancement of science and humanities with branches throughout the world (proposed by Stanford Research Institute); development of an international career service for technical assistance personnel (Northwestern University); negotiation of an Indian aid agreement by India, U. S., USSR, and perhaps Japan, West Germany and others (Conlon Associates); a number of proposals for the further development of multilateral institutions for economic development programs (Council on Foreign Relations, Harvard, and Syracuse); and suggestions for working with the "next government" in foreign countries rather than just with the current regime (Syracuse).

Also worthy of particular attention are the proposals for further research. One recommends that consideration be given to the establishment of a foreign policy research organization similar to the Air Force-supported RAND Corporation (Brookings). Another recommends the development of a "conscious policy to promote foreign policy aims through a systematic stimulation of desirable nonmilitary scientific developments" (Stanford Research Institute). Many would agree with Senator Fulbright that additional sources of ideas and information on foreign policy problems are vitally needed—by the executive branch as well as by Congress! Hopefully, he and his colleagues will, with the stimulus provided by such ideas as these, devise means for satisfying these needs on a more continuing basis.—CHADWICK F. ALGER, Northwestern University.

National Character in Action. By WASHINGTON PLATT. (New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1961. Pp. xix, 250. $6.00.)

General Platt has essayed a highly important but much controverted task: his purpose is to make relevant for strategic intelligence contemporary investigations of national character. He writes: "In all aspects of international relations and especially in the formulation and implementation of foreign policy, an intimate understanding of the character of other nations must always be one of the vital factors in the situation. . . ." And so, indeed, it must. But the path of application of this fugitive and evanescent material to practical diplomacy is beset with hazard and difficulty. It does no particular discredit to General Platt's book to note that he has not solved all the problems or been able to sidestep the difficulties. Unfortunately but understandably, they are as present on the last pages of his work as on the first. If vain, the attempt is nonetheless courageous, and in the process of tackling a formidable subject, General Platt has shed no little light upon it. He has, I believe, shown, largely through the works of others, that the notion of national character is a viable concept.<sup>1</sup> One does not have to adopt the tattered stereotypes of German stolidity and romanticism, French ardor and logicity, or British pragmatism and lack of humor to acknowledge that certain nations behave differently from others. This is something we all know as social scientists; we only recoil from our natural and correct observations when it is suggested that they be codified into concepts of national character. Since national character can be no more and no less than the sum of influences which make a Frenchman French or an Englishman English, it must comprise inter alia "geographic location, climate, a common history . . . , common economic interests . . . " political traditions, institutions and practices, and a certain cultural or linguistic identity. It may involve a distinct practical philosophy as well. General Platt makes a useful distinction between national character conceived as the sum of individual behavior and as the characteristic posture of a nation in foreign relations. He notes that the first must be dependent upon a prior analysis of personal and group character, and that the second cannot diverge limitlessly from the characteristic behavior of individuals.

<sup>1</sup> In People of Plenty David Potter writes, for example: "After all its vicissitudes, national character is still with us. The fact is inescapable."

It is in the area of application of conceptions of national character to strategic intelligence production that General Platt most often goes awry. He affects to believe that it is feasible to make simple numerical rankings of aspects of national character. Thus, fighting qualities could be expressed by "2, 3, 4, and so on up to 10 as the 'do or die.' " "Similarly, when considering natural resources industry would be expressed by positive integers. Laziness by fractions." "An unusually aggressive spirit on the one hand or a defeatist spirit on the other hand may multiply the capability which would ordinarily be expected from a given situation by ten or one tenth respectively." Once these traits have been assimilated into national character for the purposes of a given intelligence estimate, it is then alleged that HF (Hard Facts)—NC (National Character) × Sit (Situation) can produce the required intelligence information. The disclaimers General Platt issues to this highly oversimple numerical analysis are not convincing. He says that such calculations should be regarded as a "useful guide to our judgement" rather than as a "final answer." If such computations are to influence our judgment, they will mislead us: if they are not to influence it, they should be discarded.

The author falters as well in his hints for derivations of national character. How are we to go about grasping it? Since he admits that national character shifts over time, often in the relatively short run, he cannot give a satisfactory account of how we definitively come to grips with such fleeting traits. We are told, for instance, that the national character of Americans shifted between 1916 and 1917 from peace-loving to martial and bellicose. Assuming the validity of the change (and this reviewer would not do so), we are left with no clues that would make such a sea-change in character comprehensible to an intelligence analyst. The assessments of 1916 would be false in 1917. The answer is not mechanical computations of "optimism, enthusiasm, . . . progressive spirit, . . . and the will-to-win." Indeed, General Platt's conceptions of national character hark back to the national stereotypes which proved the greatest obstacle to acceptance of notions of national character in the past.

In the final analysis, the greatest aid to strategic intelligence production is informed work on individual countries. General Platt recognizes this need, and in an apparently path-breaking appendix, he provides a brief bibliography of works informative for national character studies of specific countries. This list is probably the most useful feature of the book for intelligence officers. But the list itself is rudimentary and uneven. On the United States, David Potter, Louis Hartz, Clinton Rossiter, Daniel Boorstin, and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. are notable in their absence. The section on Latin America contains no works by George Blanksten. The British section omits the pioneering works of Sir Louis Namier, and does not mention Samuel Beer, Leslie Lipson, or Harry Eckstein. The section on France does not include Herbert Luethy, Nicholas Wahl, or Stanley Hoffman, and that on Russia egregiously neglects Merle Fainsod and Barrington Moore. In East and West Asia there is no mention of the works of George Kahin, Leonard Binder, David Wilson, and Myron Weiner. National character may be a viable notion, but General Platt has scarcely shown us how it might be employed.—R. N. ROSECRANCE, University of California (Los Angeles).

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

The Catholic University of America

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Ashford, D. E. How Non-Western Are the New Nations? World Politics. January, 1962.

———. Patterns of Consensus in Developing Countries. American Behavioral Scientist. April, 1961.

Bell, H. H. Modern Analytical Techniques Foreign Service Journal. October, 1961.

Benveniste, G. Technological Change and Foreign Policy-Making: Some Political Effects of Scientific Progress. Pasadena, Institute of World Affairs. Proceedings, 1960.

Boulding, K. E. The Prevention of World War III. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1962.

Bouscaren, A. T. The Nature of the War We Are In. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. October, 1961.

Burns, A. L. Prospects for a General Theory of International Relations. World Politics. October, 1961.

Della Porta, G. Problemi e Prospettive di Coesistenza fra Oriente ed Occidente. La Comunità Internazionale. July, 1961.

Fagen, R. R. Some Assessments and Uses of Public Opinion in Diplomacy. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1960.

Guttenberg, K. T. F. Aussenpolitik Ohne Illusion; Nachgiebigkeit des Westens Führt zur Katastrophe. Politische Meinung. November, 1961.

James, A. M. Neutral Men and Neutral Action. International Relations. October, 1961.

Janowitz, M. Mass Persuasion and International Relations. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1961.

Kaplan, M. A. Problems of Theory Building and Theory Confirmation in International Politics. World Politics. October, 1961.

Kolarz, W. Coexistence and Nationalism. Listener. February 1, 1962.

Le Vine, R. A. The Internationalization of Political Values in Stateless Societies. Human Organization. N. 2, 1960.

Marcy, C. Interparliamentary Union Conference. World Affairs. Winter, 1961.

Mayo, L. H. The New Technology and National Goals: Some Implications for Legal-Policy Decision Making. Notre Dame Lawyer. No. 1, 1961.

McClelland, C. A. The Acute International Crisis. World Politics. October, 1961.

Quandt, R. E. On the Use of Game Models in Theories of International Relations. World Politics. October, 1961.

Rose, E. J. B. The Press and International Tensions. International Affairs (London). January, 1962.

Rosenau, J. N. Consensus, Leadership and Foreign Policy. SAIS Review. Winter, 1962.

Rubin, B. Propaganda and Ideological Conflicts, 1917-1945; the Need for Psychological Peacefare—I. Contemporary Review. December, 1961.

Schelling, T. C. Experimental Games and Bargaining Theory. World Politics. October, 1961.

Sereno, R. Diplomacy for Our Times. SAIS Review. Winter, 1962.

Singer, J. D. The Level-of-Analysis Problem in International Relations. World Politics. October, 1961.

———. The Relevance of the Behavioral Sciences to the Study of International Relations. Behavioral Science. October, 1961.

Trager, F. N. Exporting and Training Experts. Review of Politics. January, 1962.

Verba, S. Assumptions of Rationality and Non-Rationality in Models of the International System. World Politics. October, 1961.

Younger, K. Is World Government Possible? Listener. January 11, 1962.

Zampaglione, G. Iniziative Pacifiste nel Ventennio tra le Due Guerre Mondiali. La Comunità Internazionale. July, 1961.

Military and Functional Questions

Atom Tests and Radiation Hazards; Test Ban Efforts; UN; Cold War Conferences; Chronology. New York, International Review Service, 1961.

Aurand, H. S., Jr. The Delicate Balance of Terror. Pasadena, Institute of World Affairs. Proceedings, 1960.

Blassel, P. Données Scientifiques et Techniques des Problèmes que Pose la Réglementation de l'Utilisation de l'Espace. Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1961.

Bowie, R. R. Basic Requirements of Arms Control. Daedalus. Fall, 1960.

Civis, P. Le Désarmement, Désarmerait-Il la Méfiance? Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1961.

Gauvenet, A. Quelques Problèmes Liés au

Désarmement Nucléaire. Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1961.

Glennan, T. K. International Aspects of Space Programs. Pasadena, Institute of World Affairs. Proceedings, 1960.

Halperin, M. Nuclear Weapons and Limited War. Journal of Conflict Resolution. June, 1961.

Nickerson, H. What of Limited War? Ordnance. January, 1962.

Read, T. A Proposal to Neutralize Nuclear Weapons. Princeton, Center of International Studies, 1960.

Singer, J. D. From Deterrence to Disarmament: the Problem of Transition. International Journal. No. 4, 1961.

———. Weapons Technology and International Stability. The Centennial Review. Fall, 1961.

Stenzl, O. Das Ringen um die Abrüstung: ein Rückblick auf Fünfzehn Jahre. Politische Meinung. November, 1961.

Stewart, C. T., Jr. Nuclear Stalemate and Simulated War. Military Review. January, 1962.

Talensky, N. Disarmament and its Enemies. International Affairs (Moscow). December, 1961.

Vizzard, W. R., Jr. Disarmament—Blunted Shovel? Royal Air Force Quarterly. February, 1961.

United States

Bell, C. American Leadership of the Western World. India Quarterly. April, 1961.

Kintner, W. R. The Role of Military Assistance. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. March, 1961.

Lincoln, G. A. Planning United States Security in a Changing World. Pasadena, Institute of World Affairs. Proceedings, 1960.

Lyons, E. M. The Politics of the Military Budget. Revue Française de Sociologie. April, 1961.

Mathews, E. G. The FSO and High Policy. Foreign Service Journal. October, 1961.

A New American Mood: Living with the Cold War. Round Table. December, 1961.

Schatz, S. P. The American Approach to Foreign Aid and the Thesis of Low Absorptive Capacity—(Illustrated by Reference to Nigeria). Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. November, 1961.

Schwarz, U. US Political and Military Strategy—a Progress Report. Swiss Review of World Affairs. December, 1961.

Canada

Keenleyside, H. L. The Canada-United States Permanent Joint Board on Defence, 1940–1945. International Journal. Winter, 1960–61.

Latin America

Alliance for Progress; Official Documents Emanating from the Special Meeting held in Punta del Este, Uruguay, from August 5 to 17, 1961. Washington, Pan American Union, 1961.

Bellegarde, D. La Quatrième Réunion Consultative des Ministres des Relations Extérieures d'Amérique. Journal of Inter-American Studies. January, 1962.

Smith, R. F. The United States and Latin-American Revolutions. Journal of Inter-American Studies. January, 1962.

Teichert, P. C. M. Latin America and the Socio-Economic Impact of the Cuban Revolution. Journal of Inter-American Studies. January, 1962.

Thorning, J. F. The "Alliance for Progress"—Opportunity and Problems. World Affairs. Winter, 1961.

Whitaker, A. P. Yankeeophobia: the United States and Latin America. Current History. January, 1962.

United Kingdom

L'Assistance Technique du Royaume-Uni aux Pays d'Outre-Mer. Paris, Documentation Française, 1961.

Watt, D. C. United States Documentary Resources for the Study of British Foreign Policy, 1919–1939. International Affairs (London). January, 1962.

Western Europe

Lauesen, M. La Défense de la Région Danoise. Revue Militaire Générale. December, 1961.

Lavaud, G. La Délégation Ministérielle pour l'Armement—Organisation et Fonctionnement. Revue Militaire Générale. December, 1961.

Snapper, F. The Dutch Republic and the NATO. Revue Militaire Générale. December, 1961.

Central Europe

Anthon, C. G. The Berlin Crisis and Atlantic Unity. Current History. January, 1962.

Berlin Air Access Sovereignty Claimed by East Germany. Washington, U. S. Joint Publications Research Service, 1962.

Cornides, W. Les Problèmes et les Perspectives de Politique Étrangère en République Fédérale après le 13 Aout 1961. Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1961.

Galay, N. Berlin: On the Eve of the Dénouement. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. October, 1961.

Southern Europe and Mediterranean

Cassimatis, G. P. What Greece Expects from the Atlantic Alliance. NATO Letter. February, 1962.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Burg, D. The "People's Friendship University." Problems of Communism. November, 1961.

Goodman, E. R. East vs. West in Communist Ideology. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1961.

Grant, N. Communist Psychological Offensive: Distortions in the Translations of Official Documents. Washington, Research Institute on the Sino-Soviet Bloc, 1961.

Guedon, M. Perspectives Militaires Soviétiques. Revue Défense Nationale. February, 1962.

Harben, W. H. Soviet Attitudes and Practices Concerning Maritime Waters. JAG Journal. October, 1961.

Kashin, A. Reactions to the Twenty-Second Congress in the Communist Camp. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. January, 1962.

———. Schism in the Communist Camp. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. December, 1961.

Keep, J. Soviet Foreign Policy: Doctrine and Reality. Survey. January, 1962.

La Rue, P. A. de. Le Neutralisme Yougoslave. Politique Étrangère. No. 4, 1961.

Meissner, B. Das Neue Parteiprogramm der KPdSU. Europa Archiv. September 25, 1961.

Methvin, E. H. Mob Violence and Communist Strategy. Orbis. July, 1961.

Rosser, R. F. Soviet Opposition to Racial Discrimination in the United Nations. Russian Review. January, 1962.

Schapiro, L. The Party's New Rules. Problems of Communism. January, 1962.

Seton-Watson, H. Soviet Foreign Policy in 1961. International Relations. October, 1961.

Shulman, M. D. Some implications of Changes in Soviet Policy Toward the West: 1949-1952. Slavic Review. December, 1961.

Towster, J. The U.S.S.R. and the U.S.: Challenge and Response. Current History. January, 1962.

Translations on East European Foreign Trade. Washington, U.S. Joint Publications Research Service, 1962.

Wraga, R. Integral Communism: A Program for Action. Washington, Research Institute on the Sino-Soviet Bloc, 1961.

Middle East and Africa

Bustani, E. Arab-European Relations. Middle East Forum. October, 1961.

The Central Treaty Organization—Why It Was Established, How It Functions and a Few Samples of Achievement During Its Sixth Year. Ankara, Central Treaty Organization, 1961.

Gidney, J. B. The King-Crane Commission, an American Policy for the Middle East. Middle East Forum. October, 1961.

Logan, R. W. Discrimination: Weakness of Our African Policy. Current History. January, 1962.

Marchat, H. Mauritanie, Nations Unies . . . et Marchandages Planétaires. Revue de Défense Nationale. January, 1962.

Mason, P. Prospects and Progress in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. African Affairs. January, 1962.

Parker, J. S. F. The United Arab Republic. International Affairs (London). January, 1962.

Rondot, P. Égypte et Syrie dans l'Orient Instable. Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1962.

S., R. L'Échiquier Africain. Revue de Défense Nationale. January, 1962.

Schwarzenbach, E. C. In Kenya Today. Swiss Review of World Affairs. January, 1962.

West Africa: Now, Freedom. Economist. January 20, 1962.

South and Southeast Asia

Blumenfeld, F. Y. India's Election and Political Progress. Washington, Editorial Research Reports, 1962.

DeRussett, A. On Understanding Indian Foreign Policy; Continuation of a Discussion. International Relations. October, 1961.

Enright, D. J. The White Man's Burden; Thoughts from Asia. Encounter. January, 1962.

Mozingo, D. The Sino-Indonesian Dual Nationality Treaty. Asian Survey. December, 1961.

Nguyen-Cao-Hach. Western Economic Policies and Asian Trade Development. Asian Survey. December, 1961.

Vergheze, B. G. A Reassessment of Indian Policy in Asia. India Quarterly. April, 1961.

Far East and Pacific

Boorman, H. L. Peking in World Politics. Pacific Affairs. Fall, 1961.

Graebner, N. A. China: Unanswered Challenge. Current History. January, 1962.

Husemann, H. Defense of the British Commonwealth in Asia and the Pacific. Military Review. January, 1962.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Altman, O. L. Foreign Markets for Dollars, Sterling, and Other Countries. International Monetary Fund Staff Papers. December, 1961.

Barkin, S. "Full Productive and Freely Chosen Employment"—the ILO Program. Labor Law Journal. December, 1961.

Bega, S. T. International Trade and Economic Expansion. American Economic Review. March, 1961.

Botting, D. C. New Concepts in Economic Assistance for Underdeveloped Countries. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1961.

Heller, C. A. Oil at the United Nations. World Petroleum. January, 1962.

Hoffman, P. G. Bootstrap Statesmanship. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. December, 1961.

International Law

The Annual Naval War College International Law Study. JAG Journal. October, 1961.

Baldwin, R. W. An Alternative to the Connelly Amendment as a Practical and Realistic Step Toward World Peace Through Law. South Carolina Law Quarterly. Summer, 1961.

Bärmann, J. Pacta Sunt Servanda. Considérations sur l'Histoire du Contrat Consensuel. Revue Internationale de Droit Comparé. January, 1961.

Calon, J. P. La Société Internationale-Eléments d'Une Théorie Générale. Journal du Droit International (Clunet). July, 1961.

Coerper, M. G. The Act of State Doctrine in the Light of the Sabbatino Case. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

Connell, H. P. United States Protection of Private Foreign Investment Through Treaties of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation. Archiv des Völkerrechts. September, 1961.

Delaume, G. R. The Proper Law of Loans Concluded by International Persons: A Restatement and a Forecast. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

De Nova, R. Prospettive Giuridiche della Guerra Cosmica. Diritto Internazionale. April, 1961.

Dietze, G. The Disregard for Property in International Law. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

Evans, A. E. Observations on the Practice of Territorial Asylum in the United States. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

Gross, L. Some Observations on the International Court of Justice. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

Hardy, M. J. L. International Protection Against Nuclear Risks. International Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1961.

Harris, C. W. International Relations and the Disposition of Alien Enemy Property Seized by the United States during World War II: A Case Study on German Properties. Journal of Politics. November, 1961.

Herzog, R. Das Grundrecht auf Freiheit in der Europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. September, 1961.

Holcombe, A. N. The Improvement of the International Law-Making Process. Notre Dame Lawyer. No. 1, 1961.

Lawford, H. J. Treaties and Rights of Transit on the St. Lawrence. Canadian Bar Review. December, 1961.

Lemaire, W. L. G. Questioni di Diritto Interpersonale. Diritto Internazionale. April, 1961.

Lissitzyn, O. J. Some Legal Implications of the U-2 and RB-47 Incidents. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

Metzger, S. D. Extending the Rule of Law by Traditional International Agreements. Notre Dame Lawyer. No. 1, 1961.

Rosenne, S. La Cour Internationale de Justice en 1960. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. July, 1961.

Schachter, O. Dag Hammarskjöld and the Relation of Law to Politics. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

Schick, F. B. Space Law and Space Politics. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1961.

Thompson, D. The Project for a Commercial Company of European Type. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1961.

Timberg, S. Sovereign Immunity, State Trading, Socialism and Self-Deception. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

Vali, F. A. Soviet Satellite Status and International Law. JAG Journal. October, 1961.

Wright, O. Domestic Jurisdiction as a Limit on National and Supra-National Action. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

International Organizations

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Assembly's Efforts to Overcome Serious Financial Difficulties. United Nations Review. January, 1962.

Berkes, R. N. The New Frontier in the United Nations. Current History. January, 1962.

Clinton, E. J. The United Nations and the Congo. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1961.

Cohen, R. The Concept of Statehood in United Nations Practice. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1961.

Goodwin, G. L. The Political Role of the United Nations: Some British Views. International Organization. Autumn, 1961.

Nicholas, H. G. The Growth of World Institutions. Listener. December 14, 1961.

Padelford, N. J. Politics and the Future of ECOSOC. International Organization. Autumn, 1961.

Stein, E. Mr. Hammarskjöld, the Charter Law and the Future Role of the United Nations

Secretary General. American Journal of International Law. January, 1962.

U Thant of Burma Appointed Acting Secretary-General. United Nations Review. December, 1961.

West, R. L. The United Nations and the Congo Financial Crisis: Lessons of the First Year. International Organization. Autumn, 1961.

Regional and Collective Security Organizations

Australia and E. E. C.—a Critical View of the Common Market. Round Table. December, 1961.

Buchan, A. The Atlantic Dilemma. Listener. December 14, 1961.

Catalano, N. La Communauté Économique

Européenne et l'Unification, le Rapprochement et l'Harmonisation des Droits des États Membres. Revue Internationale de Droit Comparé. January, 1961.

Kaplan, L. S. NATO and Adenauer's Germany: Uneasy Partnership. International Organization. Autumn, 1961.

Lombardo, I. M. What's Wrong with NATO? The Lack of Unity in Foreign Policy. British Survey. December, 1961.

Münch, F. Prolégomènes a Une Théorie Constitutionnelle des Communautés Européennes. Rivista di Diritto Europeo. April, 1961.

Ruffner, C. L. NATO—Force for Peace. World Affairs. Winter, 1961.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

ALBERTSON, MAURICE L., RICE, ANDREW E. AND BIRKY, PAULINE E., New Frontiers for American Youth: Perspective on the Peace Corps. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. vi, 212. $4.50.)

ALLEN, JAMES JAY, The European Common Market and the G. A. T. T. (Washington: The University Press. 1960. Pp. xii, 244. $6.00.)

AMERICAN ASSEMBLY, Outer Space: Prospects for Man and Society. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. ix, 203. Cloth, $3.95. Paper, $1.95.)

ANDERSON, BENEDICT R. O'G., Some Aspects of Indonesian Politics under the Japanese Occupation, 1944-1945. (Ithaca: Cornell University Southeast Asia Program. 1961. Pp. ix, 126. $3.00.)

BARCK, OSCAR THEODORE, JR. (Ed.), America in the World: Twentieth Century History in Documents. (Cleveland: The World Publishing Company. 1962. Pp. 494. $1.95, paper.)

BARKER, SIR ERNEST (Ed. and Trans.), The Politics of Aristotle. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. lxxvi, 411. $1.95, paper.)

BARKER, SIR ERNEST (Ed.), Social Contract: Locke, Hume, Rousseau. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. xlv, 307. $1.65, paper.)

BARNARD, ALAN, Visions and Profits: Studies in the Business Career of T. S. Mort. (Melbourne University Press; New York: Cambridge University Press. 1961. Pp. xvii, 234. $8.50.)

BASS, HERBERT J., I am a Democrat: Career of David B. Hill. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 315. $5.50.)

BEARD, CHARLES A., The Supreme Court and the Constitution. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. viii, 149. $1.95, paper. $3.95, cloth.)

BERGSTRASSER, ARNOLD, Politik in Wissenschaft und Bildung. (Freiburg: Verlag Rombach. 1961. Pp. 291.)

BETTS, RAYMOND F., Assimilation and Association in French Colonial Theory, 1890-1914. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 224. $5.00.)

BIRKE, Wolfgang, European Elections by Direct Suffrage. (Leyden: A. W. Sythoff. 1961. Pp. 124.)

BISHOP, WILLIAM W., JR., International Law (Second Edition) (Boston: Little, Brown and Co. 1962. Pp. xlv, 964. $13.00.)

BLACK, ALGERNON D., The Young Citizens: The Story of the Encampment for Citizenship. (New York: Frederick Ungar Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. xiv, 416. $6.00.)

BONNEFOUS, MARC, Europe et Tiers Monde. (Leyden: A. W. Sythoff. 1961. 7d fl 9,75.)

BRIGHT, JAMES R. (Ed.), Technological Planning on the Corporate Level. (Boston: Harvard Business School. 1962. Pp. vii, 253. $3.50, paper.)

BROWDER, R. P., KERENSKY, A. A. (Eds.), The Russian Provisional Government, 1917 Documents. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1961. Pp. Volume I. xxx, 477. Volume II. xxvi, 477-1193. Volume III. xix, 1193-1875. $30.00, 3 Volumes.)

BRZEZINSKI, ZBIGNIEW, The Soviet Bloc: Unity and Conflict. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1961. Pp. xxii, 543. $2.75, paper.)

CALLAN, EDWARD, Albert John Luthuli and the South African Race Conflict. (Kalamazoo: Western Michigan University Press. 1962. Pp. 75. $1.00, paper.)

- CARNELL, FRANCIS, The Politics of the New States (Bibliography). (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. xvi, 171. $2.00, paper.)
- CARPENTER, WALTER H., JR. AND HANDLER, EDWARD, Small Business and Pattern Bargaining. (Babson Park: Babson Institute Press. 1961. Pp. xi, 243. $3.00, paper.)
- CARY, JOHN, Joseph Warren: Physician, Politician, Patriot. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 260. $5.00.)
- CENTER OF LATIN AMERICAN STUDIES, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, Statistical Abstract of Latin America, 1961. (Los Angeles: University of California. 1961. Pp. x, 56. $2.50, paper.)
- CHAI, CH'U, AND CHAI, WINBERG, The Changing Society of China. (New York: The New American Library. 1962. Pp. 253. $.75, paper.)
- CHEIT, EARL F., Injury and Recovery in the Course of Employment. (New York: John Wiley and Sons, Inc. 1961. Pp. xviii, 377.)
- CHRISTENSON, C. L., Economic Redevelopment in Bituminous Coal. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1962. Pp. xxi, 312. $7.50.)
- CLARK, JOHN MAURICE, Competition as a Dynamic Process. (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1961. Pp. xvii, 501. $7.50.)
- COLLOTTI, ENZO (Ed.), The Communist Party of Germany, 1918-33 (Bibliography, Biblio. Essay). (Milan: Giangiacomo Feltrinelli, 1961. Pp. 217. 1,006 lire.)
- COOK, JAMES M., Texas Corporation Courts. (Austin: University of Texas. 1961. Pp. 141. $2.50, paper.)
- DESTLER, CHESTER MCARTHUR, Joshua Coit, American Federalist, 1758-1798. (Middletown: Wesleyan University Press. 1962. Pp. xiii, 191. $5.75.)
- DOHERTY, HERBERT J., Richard Keith Call, Southern Unionist. (Gainesville: University of Florida Press. 1961. Pp. vii, 195. $5.50.)
- DOOB, LEONARD W., Communication in Africa: A Search for Boundaries. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1961. Pp. xvi, 406. $7.50.)
- DORNBERG, JOHN, Schizophrenic Germany. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1961. Pp. ix, 302. $6.50.)
- DUNNE, GEORGE H., S. J., Generation of Giants: The Story of the Jesuits in China in the Last Decades of the Ming Dynasty. (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press. 1962. Pp. 389. $5.75.)
- ECONOMIC COMMISSION FOR EUROPE, Economic Bulletin for Europe, Volume 13, Number 1. (New York: United Nations. 1961. Pp. 55. $.75, paper.)
- ELDER, ROBERT E., The Foreign Leader Program: Operations in the U. S. (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1961. Pp. xii, 115. $2.00, paper.)
- FLETCHER, C. SCOTT (Ed.), Education: The Challenge Ahead. (New York: W. W. Norton and Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. 232. $4.50.)
- FOOTMAN, DAVID (Ed.), Soviet Affairs: Number Three (St. Anthony's Papers Number 12). (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press. 1962. Pp. 141. $3.75.)
- FOSS, PHILIP O., The Battle of Soldier Creek. (University: University of Alabama Press. Pp. 15. $.35, paper.)
- FRYE, ROBERT J. AND DYER, JOHN A., The City Manager System in Alabama. (University: University of Alabama Bureau of Public Administration. 1961. Pp. 45.)
- GERBER, ROSALIE B., The Responsibilities of Man. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1962. Pp. vi, 147. $3.25.)
- GERSHOY, LEO, Barere, Bertrand: A Reluctant Terrorist. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. xi, 459. $8.50.)
- GOETHALS, PETER R., Aspects of Local Government in a Sumbawan Village (Eastern Indonesia). (Ithaca: Cornell University Southeast Asia Program. 1961. Pp. vii, 143. $3.00, paper.)
- GHOSH, STANLEY, Embers in Cathay. (New York: Doubleday and Co., Inc. 1961. Pp. 236. $4.50.)
- GORDON, LINCOLN AND GROMMERS, ENGLEBERT L., United States Manufacturing Investment in Brazil. (Boston: Harvard Business School. 1962. Pp. xvii, 177. $2.50, paper.)
- GRANT, DOUGLAS AND MILLAR, MACLURE (Ed.), The Far East: China and Japan. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1961. $2.50.)
- GRINELL-MILNE, DUNCAN, The Triumph of Integrity: A Portrait of Charles de Gaulle. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1962. Pp. 334. $5.00.)
- GRUBER, RUTH, Science and the New Nations. (New York: Basic Books, Inc. 1961. Pp. 314. $6.50.)
- HALECKI, OSCAR, The Limits and Divisions of European History. (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press. 1962. Pp. xiii, 242. $1.95.)
- HANCOCK, W. K., Rome: Caput Mundi and Italian Capital. (Canberra: Australian National University. 1961. Pp. 15. 5s., paper.)
- HARDT, JOHN P. WITH STOLZENBACH, C. DARWIN AND KOHN, MARTIN J., The Cold War Economic Gap. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiv, 114. $4.00.)
- HATCH, JOHN, Africa Today—and Tomorrow (New Edition). (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. viii, 343. $5.00.)
- HAUSER, PHILIP M., On the Impact of Population and Community Changes on Local Government. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh, Institute of Local Government. 1961. Pp. 28. $2.00, paper.)

- HAYES, C. J. H., Nationalism: A Religion. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1960. Pp. xi, 187. $5.00.)
- HENNING, THEODORE F., Buritis in Paradise. (New York: Greenwich Book Publishers, 1961. Pp. 252. $3.00.)
- HEXTER, J. H., Reappraisals in History. (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1961. Pp. xxi, 214.)
- VON DER HEYDTE, Friedrich August, Freiherr, Volkerrecht; Ein Lehrbuch II. (Berlin: Verlag Kiepenheuer and Witsch, 1960. Pp. 445.)
- HODGKIN, THOMAS AND SCHACHTER, RUTH, French-Speaking West Africa in Transition. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1961. Pp. 375-436. $35, paper.)
- HUGHES, JOHN, The New Face of Africa South of the Sahara. (New York: Longmans, Green and Co., Inc. 1961. Pp. 296. $5.00.)
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, Texas Council-Manager Charters. (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1961. Pp. 71. $2.00, paper.)
- INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION OF JURISTS, African Conference on the Rule of Law: Lagos, Nigeria January 3-7, 1961. (Geneva: International Commission of Jurists, 1961.)
- INTERNATIONAL SOCIAL SCIENCE JOURNAL, The Parliamentary Profession. (Paris: Unesco, 1961. $2.10, paper.)
- JACKSON, PERCIVAL E., (Selected and arranged by), The Wisdom of the Supreme Court. (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1962. Pp. xvi, 524. $8.95.)
- JACOBS, DAN N. (Ed.), The New Communist Manifesto and Related Documents. (Evanston: Row, Peterson and Co. Pp. 218. $1.90.)
- JELLISON, CHARLES A., Fessenden of Maine: Civil War Senator. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1962. Pp. vi, 294. $5.50.)
- JOHNSON, FRANK J., No Substitute for Victory. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1962. Pp. xi, 230. $5.00.)
- JONES, W. T., The Romantic Syndrome. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1961. Pp. xv, 255. 23.75 guilders.)
- JOYCE, JAMES AVERY, Capital Punishment. (New York: Thomas Nelson and Sons, 1961. Pp. 288. $5.00.)
- JOYNER, CONRAD, Holman vs. Hughes: Extension of Australian Commonwealth Powers. (Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1961. Pp. 70. $2.00, paper.)
- KECSKEMETI, PAUL, The Unexpected Revolution—Social Forces in the Hungarian Uprising. (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1961. Pp. vi, 178. $4.75.)
- KELLEN, KONRAD, Khrushchev, A Political Portrait. (New York: Frederick Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 271. $5.00.)
- KING, GILLIAN (Ed.), Documents on International Affairs. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. xviii, 605. $13.45.)
- KING, WUNSZ, China at the Peace Conference in 1919. (Jamaica, New York: St. John's University Press, 1961. Pp. 39. $1.00, paper.)
- KISSINGER, HENRY A., The Necessity of Choice: Prospects of American Foreign Policy. (New York: Doubleday and Co. 1962. Pp. xii, 387. $1.45, paper.)
- KOENTJARANINGRAT, Dr., Some Social-Anthropological Observations on Golog Rojong Practices in Two Villages of Central Java. (Ithaca: Cornell Modern Indonesia Project, 1961. $2.50, paper.)
- KROPOTKIN, PETER, (Rogers, James Allen-Ed.), Memoirs of a Revolutionist. (New York: Doubleday and Co. 1962. Pp. xviii, 338. $1.45, paper.)
- KUHN, HANS WOLFGANG, Der Apokalyptiker und die Politik. (Friburg: Rombach and Co. Pp. 255. 19.10.61.)
- KUZNETS, SIMON, Capital in the American Economy. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961. Pp. xxix, 664. $12.00.)
- LAMPMAN, ROBERT J., The Share of Top Wealth-Holders in National Wealth, 1922-1956. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1962. Pp. xxvii, 286. $6.50.)
- LANGROD, GEORGES, Some Current Problems of Administration in France Today. (San Juan: University of Puerto Rico, School of Public Administration, 1961. Pp. vii, 152.)
- LA PIERRE, JEAN-WILLIAM AND NOIZET, GEORGES, Une Recherche sur le Civismisme des Jeunes. (Aix-en-Provence: Annales de la Faculté des Lettres, 1961. Pp. iv, 176. 17 NF.)
- LEAKEY, L. S. B., The Progress and Evolution of Man in Africa. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. 50. $2.25.)
- LEDERMANN, LASZLO, Considerations Epistémologiques Sur L'Étude des Relations Internationales. (Athens: A Klissiounis, 1961. Pp. 21.)
- LEFEBVRE, GEORGES, The French Revolution from its Origins to 1793. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962. Pp. xviii. $6.00.)
- LEPRINCE-RINQUET, LOUIS, Atoms and Men. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961. Pp. ix, 118. $3.00.)
- LERNER, ABBA, Everybody's Business. (East Lansing: The Michigan State University Press, 1962. Pp. 134. $3.75.)
- LIANG, C. T., The Chinese Revolution of 1911. (Jamaica, New York: St. John's University Press, 1962. Pp. 59. $1.00, paper.)
- LIEUWEN, EDWIN, Arms and Politics in Latin America. (Revised Edition) (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. xii, 335. $5.00, cloth. $1.85, paper.)
- MACRIDIS, ROY C. (Ed.), Foreign Policy in World

- Politics*. (Second Edition) (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. x, 374. $5.25, paper.)
- MAKI, JOHN M., Conflict and Tension in the Far East—Key Documents—1894–60. (Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 245. $5.00.)
- MALLORY, WALTER H. (Ed.), 35th Political Handbook of the World. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1962. Pp. 246. $4.95.)
- MASON, FRANCES NORTON, My dearest Polly: Letters of Chief Justice John Marshall to his Wife, 1779–1831. (Richmond: Garrett & Massie, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiv, 386. $5.00.)
- MCGEE, REECE, Social Disorganization in America. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. xiv, 176. $1.95, paper.)
- MENDEL, ARTHUR P., Dilemmas of Progress in Tsarist Russia. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1961. Pp. 310. $7.00.)
- MERRIFIELD, CHARLES W. (ed.), Leadership in Voluntary Enterprise. (New York: Oceana Publications, Inc. 1961. Pp. 232. $3.95, cloth, $1.75, paper.)
- MEYER, A. J. WITH VASSILION, SIMON, The Economy of Cyprus. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1962. Pp. xii, 94. $3.50.)
- MILLER, NATHAN, The Enterprise of a Free People: Aspects of Economic Development in New York State during the Canal Period 1792–1838. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1962. Pp. xv, 293. $6.00.)
- MITCHELL, GLENFORD E. AND PEACE, WILLIAM H., III, The Angry Black South: Southern Negroes Tell Their Own Story. (New York: The Citadel Press. 1962. Pp. 159. $1.25, paper.)
- MOUNT ALLISON SUMMER INSTITUTE, French Canada Today. (Sackville, N.B.: Mount Allison University. 1962. Pp. 115. $2.00, paper.)
- MURTY, K. SATCHIDANANDA, AND BOUQUET, A. C., Studies in the Problems of Peace. (New York: Asia Publishing House. 1960. Pp. vi, 375. $6.75.)
- NEALE, ALAN D., The Flow of Resources from Rich to Poor. (Cambridge: Center for International Affairs, Harvard. 1961. Pp. 83. $1.00, paper.)
- NEF, JOHN U., A Search for Civilization. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1962. Pp. xii, 210. $4.00.)
- NELSON, WILLIAM H., The American Tory. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. vi, 194. $4.80.)
- NEWMAN, RALPH A., Equity and Law: A Comparative Study. (New York: Oceana Publications, Inc. 1961. Pp. 280. $7.50.)
- OFFICE OF RESEARCH IN MILITARY HISTORY, Operationsgebiet Östliche Ostsee und der Finnisch—Baltische Raum 1944. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags—Anstalt. 1961.)
- OLIVESI, ANTOINE AND RONCAYOLO MARCEL, Geographie Electorale des Bouches-du-Rhone Sous la IVe Republique. (Paris: Armand Colin. 1961. Pp. 278. paper.)
- OLIVER, MICHAEL (ed.), Social Purpose for Canada. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 472. $7.95, cloth $4.95, paper.)
- OPPERMANN, THOMAS, Britisches Unterhauswahlrecht und Zweiparteinsystem. (Karlsruhe: C. F. Muller. 1961. Pp. xiii, 151. DM 15.)
- PADELFORD, NORMAN J. AND LINCOLN, GEORGE A., The Dynamics of International Politics. 1962. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1962. Pp. xvi, 634. $7.50.)
- PADGETT, L. V. (ed.), Community Development in the Western Hemisphere. (San Diego: San Diego State College. 1961. Pp. 88, $1.00, paper.)
- PARÉ, PETER AND SHY, JOHN W., Guerrillas in the 1960's. (Princeton Studies in World Politics No. 1) (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. 82. $3.50.)
- PERKINS, DEXTER AND SNELL, JOHN L., The Education of Historians in the United States. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. xiii, 244. $4.95.)
- PETERSON, MERRILL D., The Jefferson Image in the American Mind. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 548. $2.65, paper.)
- PIKE, DOUGLAS., Australia: The Quiet Continent. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1962. Pp. xii, 242. $3.95.)
- PRICE, DON K., Government and Science. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. ix, 203. $1.65, paper.)
- PROUDFOOT, MERRILL, Diary of a Sit-in. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1962. Pp. xiv, 204.)
- RICKELS, MILTON, Thomas Bangs Thorpe: Humorist of the Old Southwest. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 275. $5.00.)
- ROBERTSON, A. H., The Law of International Institutions in Europe. (Manchester: Manchester University Press. 1961. New York: Oceana Publications, Inc. Pp. ix, 140. $4.00.)
- ROBINSON, ALAN D., Dutch Organised Agriculture in International Politics 1945–1960. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff. 1961. Pp. 192.)
- ROGERS, CYRIL A. AND FRANTZ, C., Racial Themes in Southern Rhodesia. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1962. Pp. xviii, 427. $6.75.)
- ROY, JULES., The War in Algeria. (New York: Grove Press. 1961. Pp. 128. $7.50.)
- RUDWICK, ELLIOTT M., W. E. B. Du Bois: A Study in Minority Group Leadership. (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 1961. Pp. 382. $6.00.)

- RUSSELL, BERTRAND., Has Man a Future? (Baltimore: Penguin Books, Inc. 1962. Pp. 128. $.85, paper.)
- SALISBURY, HARRISON E., Moscow Journal. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1961. Pp. 499. $.65.)
- SALVADORI, MASSIMO., Cavour and the Unification of Italy. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. An Anvil Original. 1961. Pp. 191. $1.25.)
- SAYE, POUND, AND ALLUMS, Principles of American Government. (4th ed.) (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. x, 469. $.55.)
- SCIGLIANO, ROBERT., The Courts: A Reader in the Judicial Process. (Boston: Little, Brown and Company. 1962. Pp. viii, 503. Paper.)
- SEGAL, RONALD, Political Africa: A Who's Who of Personalities and Parties. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 475. $12.50.)
- SIEVERS, ALLEN M., Revolution, Evolution, and the Economic Order. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. vii, 173. $.35, cloth. $1.95, paper.)
- SLADE, RUTH, The Belgian Congo. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. 82. $1.00.)
- SOCIÉTÉ D'ETUDES ET DE PUBLICATIONS ORIENT, Orient-Revue Trimestrielle. (Paris: Société d'Etudes et de Publications Orient. 1961. Pp. 231.)
- SOSIN, JACK M., Whitehall and the Wilderness: The Middle West in British Colonial Policy. (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 1961. Pp. xi, 307. $.65.)
- STOESSINGER, JOHN G., Financing the United Nations. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. 72, $.35, paper.)
- STURZO, LUIGI, Church and State. Vol. I and Vol. II. (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press. 1962. Pp. Vol. I, xix, 272. Vol. II, 273-584. $.45, paper.)
- SWADOS, HARVEY, A Radical's America. (Boston: Little, Brown & Company. 1962. Pp. xvii, 347. $.50.)
- SWIFT, RICHARD N. (ed.) Annual Review of United Nations Affairs, 1960-61. (New York: Oceana Publications. 1961. Pp. xvi, 207. $.60.)
- SZAPIRO, JERZY, The Newspaperman's United Nations. (New York: Columbia University Press, with UNESCO. 1962. Pp. 190. $.25.)
- TALMON, J. L., Political Messianism: The Romantic Phase. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiii, 607. $.85.)
- TANG, PETER S. H., Communist China Today. Vol. I. (2nd edition) (Washington: Research Institute on the Sino-Soviet Bloc. 1961. Pp. xviii, 745. $10.00.)
- TAYLOR, LILY ROSS, Party Politics in the Age of Caesar. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 255. $1.95, paper.)
- THOMPSON, JOSEPH S., Taxation's New Frontier. (New York: Robert Schalkenbach Foundation. 1961. Pp. 96. $1.00, paper.)
- TOYNBEE, ARNOLD J., A Study of History. 3 Vols. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Vol. I, xiii, 484. Vol. II, ix, 452. Vol. III, viii, 551. Vol. I, $.245, paper, Vol. 2, $.235, paper, Vol. III, $.275, paper.)
- TRISKA, JAN F. (ed.), Soviet Communism: Programs and Rules. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. x, 196. $1.50, paper.)
- TUCHMAN, BARBARA W., The Guns of August. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1962. Pp. xii, 511. $.65.)
- TUSSMAN, JOSEPH, The Supreme Court on Church and State. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. xxiv, 305. $1.95, paper.)
- UNESCO: International Social Science Journal, The Yugoslav Commune. (Paris: UNESCO. $.20, paper, quarterly.)
- UNITED NATIONS: REPORT BY THE SECRETARY GENERAL, Community Development in Urban Areas. (New York: United Nations Publications. Pp. 44. $.75, paper.)
- UNITED NATIONS STATISTICAL OFFICE, Commodity Trade Statistics Part II. Exports Jan.-Dec. 1960. (New York: U.N. Pp. xv, 710, C53. $.25, paper.)
- UNITED NATIONS, Yearbook of the United Nations. 1960. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 827. $15.00.)
- U. S. DEPT. OF LABOR, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Employment & Earnings for the U. S. 1909-60. (Washington: Bureau of Labor Statistics. 1961. Pp. x, 536. $.30, paper.)
- UTLEY, FRANCIS LEE (ed.), The Forward Movement of the Fourteenth Century. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press. 1962. $.60.)
- VAN DERSAL, WILLIAM R., The Successful Supervisor: in Government and Business. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1962. Pp. 192. $.95.)
- VANEK, JAROSLAV, International Trade: Theory and Economic Policy. (Homewood, Ill: Richard D. Irwin, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiii, 426. $.75.)
- VAN RENSBERG, PATRICK, Guilty Land: The History of Apartheid. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1962. Pp. 224. $.45.)
- WALKER, EDWARD L. AND HEYNS, ROGER W., An Anatomy for Conformity. (Englewood-Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiv, 103. $.35, cloth. $1.95, paper.)
- WARD, JOHN WILLIAM, Andrew Jackson. Symbol for an Age. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. xii, 275. $1.75, paper.)
- WEEKS, O. DOUGLAS, Texas in the 1960 Presiden-

- tial Election*. (Austin: The University of Texas. 1961. Pp. 80. $2.00, paper.)
- WEINBERG, GERHARD L. (ed.), Hillers Zweites Buch. Ein Dokument aus dem Jahr 1928. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags Anstalt. 1961. Pp. 228.)
- WESTOFF, CHARLES F., POTTER, ROBERT G., SAGI, PHILIP C., AND MISHLER, ELLIOT G., Family Growth in Metropolitan America. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. xxii, 433. $10.00.)
- WHEELER, GEOFFREY, Racial Problems in Soviet Muslim Asia. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. 67. $1.75, paper.)
- WILLIAMS, CHANCELLOR, The Rebirth of African Civilization. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. 328. $6.00.)
- WOLFE, BERTRAM D., Communist Totalitarianism. Keys to the Soviet System. (Boston: The Beacon Press. 1961. Pp. xx, 328. $4.95.)
- WOOD, SUSAN, Kenya: The Tensions of Progress. (2nd ed.) (London: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 135. Paper.)
- WOOD, JOHN SUMNER, The Virginia Bishop: A Yankee Hero of the Confederacy. (Richmond: Garrett & Massie, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiii, 187. $3.50.)
- YEARLEY, CLIFTON K., Enterprise & Anthracite. Economics and Democracy in Schuylkill County 1820-75. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 254. $5.00.)

NEWS AND NOTES

1962 ANNUAL MEETING AND SLATE OF OFFICERS FOR 1962-1963

The 1962 Annual Meeting of the Association will be held September 5-8, at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D. C. Professor Byrum E. Carter of Indiana University is Chairman of the Program Committee.

At the Annual Business Meeting the Nominating Committee (comprised of J. Roland Pennock, Chairman; Dayton D. McKean; Lucian W. Pye; Weldon Cooper; Stanley J. Parry; and Jack Peltason) will propose the following officers for 1962-1963: President-elect, C. Herman Pritchett (University of Chicago); Vice Presidents, Alexander Heard (University of North Carolina); John D. Lewis (Oberlin College); Wallace S. Sayre (Columbia University); Secretary, Ruth Lawson (Mt. Holyoke College); Treasurer, Max Kampelman (Washington, D. C.); Members of the Council for two years: Franklin L. Burdette (University of Maryland); Charles B. Hagan (University of Illinois); H. Field Haviland, Jr. (Brookings Institution); Robert E. Lane (Yale University); Joseph LaPalombara (Michigan State University); Ithiel de Sola Pool (Massachusetts Institute of Technology); Harold H. Sprout (Princeton University); Sheldon S. Wolin (University of California)

PROGRAM: 1963 ANNUAL MEETING

Early appointment of the Program Committee for the annual meeting of the Association, to be held in New York City in September 1963, makes it timely now to invite anyone having program suggestions for the occasion to convey them as soon as may be convenient, and prior to October, 1962, to the Chairman or an appropriate member of the Committee. Its members are: Karl W. Deutsch (Yale University) Chairman; David Easton (University of Chicago), Political Theory; Roy C. Macridis (Washington University), Comparative Politics; William N. Chambers (Washington University), National Government and Politics; Robert C. Wood (Massachusetts Institute of Technology), State and Local Government; Arnold A. Rogow (Stanford University), Political Behavior; James C. March (Carnegie Inst. of Technology), Public Administration; Harold W. Chase (Univ. of Minnesota), Public Law, National and International; Richard N. Rosecrance (University of California, Los Angeles), International Politics; Chairmen of Special Topics: Challenges to Constitutional Government, Charles M. Hardin (Rockefeller Foundation); Evolution of the Communist World, Zbigniew Brzezinski (Columbia University); The Developing Countries, Chairman to be appointed.

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The Twelfth International Congress of Administrative Sciences will be held July 16 to 20, 1962, in the Hofburg at Vienna. Three subjects are on the program: (1) Technical Assistance in Public Administration—Lessons of experience and possible improvements; (2) Public Relations in Administration—I. Official publications; and

(3) Government Organization for Economic Development.

Special meetings for representatives of schools and institutes of public administration are also scheduled, to discuss (1) Teaching methods and materials, and (2) Cooperation among institutions. General reports to guide the debates have been in preparation for two years, with the cooperation of national reporters in some thirty countries. These Congresses attract over 500 participants from more than fifty countries, including those of Asia and Africa—officials in the control organs of central governments, directors of national institutes of training and research and professors of administration and administrative law. Further details from Don L. Bowen, director, American Society for Public Administration, 6042 South Kimbark Avenue, Chicago 37, Illinois, or from P. A. Schillings, Director General, International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 25 rue de la Charité, Brussels 4, Belgium.

The Southern California Political Science Association has held three meetings: (1) in July at Occidental College with Hans J. Morgenthau, University of Chicago, speaking on "The Paradoxes of Democratic Government"; in November at Loyola University with William Ebenstein, Princeton, speaking on "Franco's Spain"; in January (1962) at Pomona College with Maurice Shock, University College, Oxford University, speaking on "How Europe Views the Cold War." Officers of the Association for the year 1961-62 are president, Raymond G. McKelvey, Occidental College; secretary-treasurer, William F. Fitzgerald, Loyola University; executive committee: Carl Q. Christol, University of Southern California; Jeniellen Ferguson, San Fernando Valley State College; Ivan H. Hinderaker, University of California, Los Angeles; Lester H. Phillips, University of Redlands; William S. Stokes, Claremont Men's College.

Section K—Social and Economic Sciences—of the American Association for the Advancement of Science will hold sessions for contributed papers at the annual meeting of the A.A.A.S. in Philadelphia, December 26-31, 1962. Association members interested in presenting a paper at these sessions should forward titles and abstracts not later than September 10 to the Secretary of A.A.A.S. Section K, Donald P. Ray, National Institute of Social and Behavioral Science, 863 Benjamin Franklin Station, Washington 4, D. C. Papers should be based on current or recently completed research. The American Political Science Association is an affiliate member of the Section on Social and Economic Sciences of the A.A.A.S.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

1962 FOREIGN SERVICE ENTRANCE EXAMINATION TO BE GIVEN IN SEPTEMBER

The Board of Examiners for the Foreign Service of the Department of State, after careful study and consultations with private and government authorities concerned, has decided to schedule the 1962 Foreign Service Officer written examination on September 8, 1962.

The September date should give students more free time to prepare for the examination without interrupting summer or academic work. Too, the Board of Examiners will be able to begin oral examinations in November thereby enabling the induction of successful candidates soon after the close of the school year.

Candidates are eligible to take the examination if they are between the ages of 21 and 31 and have been U. S. citizens for nine years as of July 1, 1962. Candidates who are 20 years of age may take the examination if they have completed their junior year.

Application forms for designation to take the examination may be obtained by writing to the Board of Examiners for the Foreign Service, Department of State, Washington 25, D. C. The completed application form must be received by the Board by July 23, 1962.

The department of government at Indiana University will establish a faculty seminar on political and administrative development, stressing the conditions under which viable political institutions, capable of directing and controlling public bureaucracies, emerge. The role of various elites or leadership elements in these societies will be studied through selected case studies by participating faculty members, research associates and graduate students. Fred W. Riggs, professor of government, will serve as seminar director. Financing is provided by a three-year grant of $105,000 from the Carnegie Corporation.

The Merston National Security Center awarded the prize of $2,500 for the best book-length manuscript on national security submitted in 1961 to George Stambuk, department of government, Indiana University. The manuscript, American Military Forces Abroad: A Postwar Pattern In International Relations, will be published by the Ohio State University Press in 1962.

University Bureau Research in Government—An Inventory of Current Projects, published for the Conference of University Bureaus of Governmental Research, American Society for Public Administration, by the Bureau of Government, University Extension Division, University of Wisconsin, Madison, 1961. 122 pp. Copies may be secured from the Wisconsin Bureau for $1.

Dartmouth College has received a grant of $100,000 from the Carnegie Corporation of New York for two related national security studies. Eugene Lyons will examine the command of international armed forces and Louis Morton will analyze command and other problems of World War II.

The Lilly Endowment of Indianapolis, Indiana has awarded Duke University $75,000 as the continuation of its research program in Christianity and Politics. The Program was initiated by the Lilly Endowment in 1957. The program is administered by Dr. John H. Hallowell, professor of political science.

Under grants received from the Ford Foundation and the New York State Senate, Columbia University, Hunter College, and Syracuse University have established a graduate New York State Legislative Internship Program, comparable in scope and intent to the APSA Congressional Fellowship program. The three-year grant of $75,000 from the Ford Foundation is supplemented by an annual grant of $10,000 from the New York State Senate. Dr. Ruth Weintraub, professor of political science and director of the graduate program in Arts and Science at Hunter College, is director of the Internship Program. Professors David Truman of Columbia University, Frederick Zimmerman of Hunter College, and Frank Munger of Syracuse University, compose the executive committee, and Professor Donald G. Baker of Skidmore College is faculty supervisor of the program.

ROBERT J. ALEXANDER of Rutgers will serve as visiting professor of government at Columbia during 1962-63 with primary assignment to the newly created institute of Latin American studies.

CHARLES W. ANDERSON of the University of Wisconsin has been awarded an SSRC foreign area research grant for Latin-American work in 1962-63.

DAVID W. BARKLEY, associate professor of political science, Northeastern University, attended the Wilton Park conference, Steyning, Sussex, England, December 1 to December 16, as a Ford Fellow. While there, he led one of the discussions on the topic: "The Control of the State in Modern Society: An American Point of View."

PAUL C. BARTHOLOMEW, professor of political science at the University of Notre Dame, is the recipient of a $25,000 grant from a private, civic-minded donor for a study of the Third Indiana Congressional District.

RUTH BAUMANN, associate professor of political science, University Extension Division, University of Wisconsin, has been appointed an assistant to the dean of extension for the administration of the Wisconsin Urban Program which is supported by a grant from the Ford Foundation, retaining part time her position in the bureau of government.

WALTER T. BOGART of Middlebury College has retired for reasons of ill health as chairman of the department of political science. DR. HARRIS E. THURBER has been named to succeed him as chairman. LEE A. LENDT, formerly at Columbia University, is now teaching in the department.

RONALD F. BUNN of the University of Texas will serve as visiting associate professor of government at Indiana University for the year 1962-63.

FRED G. BURKE, Syracuse University, begins a leave of absence for a year of continuing research in East Africa starting in July 1962.

WILLIAM N. CHAMBERS, professor of political science at Washington University (St. Louis) will be on leave of absence for the academic year 1962-63.

JOHN W. CHAPMAN of the University of Pittsburgh, delivered a series of lectures in Poland at the Uniwersitet Marii Curie-Sklodowskiej, Lublin and at the Wyższa Szkoła Ekonomiczna, Krakow.

CARL Q. CHRISTOL, professor of international law and chairman of the department of political science at the University of Southern California has been appointed to the chair of International Law, Naval College, for 1962-63. TOTTEN J. ANDERSON will serve as chairman of the political science department at the University of Southern California during Dr. Christol's absence.

MORRIS H. COHEN, associate professor of government, Clark University, has been elected president of the Worcester Plan "E" Association, the Worcester civic improvement organization.

JOHN A. CRITTENDEN, formerly of the University of North Carolina and recently law and behavioral science research Fellow at the University of Chicago Law School, has accepted an appointment as visiting assistant professor of political science at the University of Southern California.

RALPH CROW, American University, Beirut, has been appointed visiting associate professor for 1962-63 at Indiana University.

HENRY W. EHRLMANN of Dartmouth College has been invited to deliver a lecture at the Free University of Berlin during an international gathering of political scientists organized May 8-10 to celebrate the inauguration of the new building of the Otto-Suhr-Institute (Institute of Politics) of the Free University. During July Professor Ehrmann will serve as Fulbright lecturer and director of studies at the American Seminar in political science to be held in Nice, France. He will spend the fall term on research leave in Paris and will also lecture at the Universities of Paris and Bordeaux.

DAVID G. FARRELLY, UCLA, has been appointed by the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors to a 25-man committee which is charged with the study and review of the county charter. Professor Farrelly is chairman of a subcommittee on political activities of classified county employees.

PETER J. FLIESS, professor of government, Louisiana State University, delivered the Maurice Falk Lectures at Carnegie Tech on January 10 and 11, 1962. The general subject of the lectures was Thucydides and the Politics of Bipolarity.

MERRILL R. GOODALL on leave as professor of government in the Claremont Graduate School, Claremont, California, has been appointed by the United Nations as its public administration advisor to the Government of Nepal. His assignment in Kathmandu begins March, 1962.

BERTRAM GROSS, professor of administration, Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, who is spending 1961-62 at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, is serving as visiting professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, during the spring semester, 1962.

ROBERT W. HATTERY, assistant professor of political science, has assumed the assistant directorship of the institute of world affairs education, Extension Political Science Department, University Extension Division, University of Wisconsin.

C. LEONARD HOAG has been Fulbright Lecturer in political science at Kyung-Pook University, Taegu, Korea during the academic year 1961-62, having been granted a leave of absence from Middlebury College, Middlebury, Vermont.

J. C. HUREWITZ of Columbia, who will be on leave during 1962-63, will spend the year at the center for advanced studies in the behavioral sciences.

ALDOUS HUXLEY is serving as the Ford Rotating research professor in governmental affairs in the department of political science, University of California, Berkeley, for the spring term, 1962.

THORSTEN V. KALIJARVI has been appointed visiting professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University for the winter and spring terms of 1962. He had recently served from 1957-1961 as United States Ambassador to El Salvador.

MAGID KHADDURI of the school of advanced international studies, will be at Columbia as visiting professor of government in the academic year 1962-63.

PAUL KECSKEMETI of the RAND Corporation will serve as lecturer in government and senior fellow in the research program on communism at Columbia University, in 1962-63.

KWANG-HSUN TU has been teaching on a Fulbright Exchange professorship at the University of Washington and University of California at Santa Barbara.

JOSEPH LAPALOMBARA, professor of political science at Michigan State University, who is spending 1961-62 at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, is serving as visiting professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, during the spring semester, 1962.

LOUIS E. LAMBERT has been appointed to the Governor's Advisory Committee on Traffic Safety for the State of Indiana.

WALTER H. C. LAVES has been appointed consultant to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare at Indiana University on its programs in international education.

REAM A. LAZARO has been named director of the institute of administrative management and lecturer in public administration at the University of Pittsburgh.

M. NELSON MCGEARY, professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University is on leave of absence during the spring and summer terms of 1962. He will be working in Washington in the office of Senator Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania.

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON lectured in March and April at the University of Buenos Aires, under an AID-supported cooperative arrangement between the Economics Faculty of that university and the Columbia Graduate School of Business; his subject was trends in research and teaching in public administration. In May and June he was engaged in staff work on "education and training" for the Committee on Foreign Affairs Personnel, a study group set up in Washington by the Carnegie Endowment with the cooperation of the Department of State.

DOUGLAS H. MENDEL, formerly at UCLA, has received a grant from the contemporary China committee of the SSRC/ACLS to study Sino-Japanese relations. He will also spend September and October as guest lecturer at the Department of Oriental Studies, University of Melbourne, Australia.

NORMAN D. PALMER, professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania, who is in South Asia on an assignment for the Council on Foreign Relations, with the assistance of a Guggenheim Fellowship and a grant for research on Asia from the American Council of Learned Societies, delivered a series of lectures at universities in India, Nepal and Pakistan.

RICHARD L. PARK, associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan, has been appointed representative in India of the Asia Foundation.

J. WILLIAM ROBINSON, chairman, department of political science and international relations at Whittier College, has been appointed director of the 39th annual session of the institute of world affairs to be held December 2-5, 1962 in Pasadena. The Institute will again be sponsored by the University of Southern California in cooperation with the colleges and universities of the Pacific area.

OLE S. SMOLANSKY, UCLA, received a Rockefeller research grant to conduct a study of Arab politics.

FRANCES L. STARNER, assistant professor of political science, San Jose State College, is on leave, 1961-62, on her second Fulbright Award. She is engaged in research on far eastern agrarian politics and has her headquarters in Manila, P.I.

IRVIN STEWART, professor of political science, West Virginia University, is on leave of absence from March 1, 1962 to September, 1963, in order to undertake, at President Kennedy's request, the newly created position of Director of Telecommunications Management.

JOSEPH L. SUTTON, Indiana University, has been appointed as a member of the Ford Foundation Foreign Area Training Fellowship Committee.

S. LAIRD SWAGERT, professor of political science, San Jose State College, is on leave, 1961-62, engaged in work for the Stanford Research Institute.

FRANK N. TRAGER, professor of international affairs, New York University, is on leave to serve on the faculty of the National War College for the academic year 1961-62. During the summer of 1962 he will participate in the 44th Conference on "The Defense of the West," at Wilton Park, Sussex, England. He will then return to the National War College for the academic year 1962-63.

SCHUYLER C. WALLACE has resigned as dean of the school of international affairs at Columbia and will be on leave from the University for the next two years, to serve as director of the Ford Foundation's Foreign Area Training Fellowship program.

QUINCY WRIGHT will spend 1962-63 as visiting professor of international relations at Columbia University.

HARMON ZEIGLER of the department of political science at Emory University has been appointed field supervisor (southern region) by the National Opinion Research Center, University of Chicago.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

JOHN H. BALLARD of San Jose State College has been promoted to the rank of associate professor.

ROBERT A. BARRETT, a doctoral candidate at the American University, has been appointed as lecturer in the school of government and public administration, the American University, effective February 5, 1962.

JEWEL L. BELLUSH has been promoted to assistant professor in the department of political science at Hunter College.

ELIOT S. BERKLEY has been appointed dean of the college of the Kansas City Art Institute.

PAUL BERNSTEIN has been appointed instructor in the political science department, University of Pennsylvania.

JOHN D. BORN, JR. has been promoted to assistant professor in the department of history and political science, University of Nevada, Reno.

DON L. BOWEN was appointed executive director of the American Society for public administration by the Society's council meeting here. This appointment, effective as of January 1, 1962, was announced by Elmer B. Staats, the society's president and deputy director of the U. S. Bureau of the Budget.

DONALD BRANDON has been promoted from assistant to associate professor of political science at the University of San Francisco.

DAVID BROOK recently received a doctorate from Columbia University and has been appointed an instructor of international relations and government at St. Johns University.

ARDATH W. BURKS has been appointed chairman of the department of political science at Rutgers University effective February 1, 1962.

EDWARD McNALL BURNS, professor of political science at Rutgers University, is on leave of absence during the second semester of 1961-62. He will retire at the close of the current academic year after having served as chairman of the department over the past decade.

L. GERALD BURSEY has joined the department of political science, Northeastern University, with the rank of associate professor.

DONALD S. CARLISLE, has been appointed an assistant professor at the University of Wisconsin beginning in September, 1962.

HARRY M. CHASE, JR. has been promoted to associate professor in the department of history and political science at the University of Nevada, Reno.

HSIEN T'ING PETER CH'EN has been appointed instructor in the Far Eastern studies program at Brown University.

ANDREW W. CORDIER has become dean of the school of international affairs at Columbia University.

ROGER H. DAVIDSON has been appointed instructor at Dartmouth.

VINCENT DAVIS, JR. has been appointed assistant professor of government at Dartmouth College.

After seven years as head of the all-university department of government and international relations at New York University, MARSHALL E. DIMOCK will resign at the end of the current academic year to resume his writing in Bethel, Vermont.

JACK D. EDWARDS has been promoted to assistant professor in the department of history and political science at the University of Nevada, Reno.

MALBONE W. GRAHAM, professor of political science at UCLA since 1924, will retire at the end of the spring semester. On May 25, 1962, a seminar and dinner in his honor was held at which the featured participants were three former students of Professor Graham: Malcolm Moos, of the Rockefeller Foundation, G. Homer Durham, president of Arizona State University, and Robert Walker of Oklahoma State University.

DUANE GRIMES has joined the department of political science, Northeastern University, with the rank of instructor.

ROBERT D. HAYTON has been promoted to associate professor in the department of political science at Hunter College.

HUEY BLAIR HOWERTON, a member of the faculty in political science at University of Mississippi since 1930 and chairman of the department from 1930-1958, retired in June after 32 years of service.

PETER H. JUVILER has been promoted to assistant professor at the department of political science at Hunter College.

JEROME G. KERWIN, director, honors division, University of Santa Clara, and professor emeritus of the University of Chicago, has accepted appointment as professor of political science at San Jose State College where he will be teaching one-quarter time. Dr. Kerwin's principal duties will remain at the University of Santa Clara.

MRS. JEAN KOPYTOFF has been appointed lecturer in the department of political science at Brown University.

DAVID KOVENOCK, has been appointed instructor at Dartmouth College.

FRED KRINSKY, formerly of Syracuse University, has joined the department of political science, University of Southern California, as an associate professor.

CHARLES H. KUNSMAN, JR. has joined the political science department at San Jose State College as an assistant professor, after a year at the University of Nevada.

AREND LIJPHART was appointed instructor of political science at Elmira College, beginning September, 1961.

C. PETER MAGRATH has been appointed instructor in the department of political science at Brown University.

CHARLES McCALL, Yale, has been appointed instructor at Indiana University.

STEVEN MULLER has been promoted to associate professor of government and director of the center for international studies at Cornell University.

ROBERT T. NORMAN of Harvard University has been appointed assistant professor of political science and director of the bureau of municipal research, Kalamazoo Michigan.

ROY OLTON has been promoted to associate professor of government at Western Michigan University.

STANLEY A. PEARL has been promoted to assistant professor in the department of history and political science at the University of Nevada, Reno.

JAMES W. PRATT, formerly at Lafayette College, Easton, Pennsylvania, is now assistant professor of political science at San Jose State College.

CHANNING B. RICHARDSON, associate professor of government, has been named the first occupant of the newly established Henry P. Bristol chair in international affairs at Hamilton College.

JOHN W. RYAN, associate professor of political science, University of Wisconsin's extension division, is now associated with that university's center for international studies and programs in addition to his position in the bureau of government.

EDWARD V. SCHTEN has joined the staff of the bureau of government at the University of Wisconsin as an assistant professor of political science and as an assistant director of the Bureau. He will be responsible for education and training activities of the Bureau and will be located on the Milwaukee campus. Mr. Schten was formerly the director of research of the legislative research commission of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

KALMAN H. SILVERT, formerly of Tulane University, has been appointed professor of government at Dartmouth.

GEORGE STAMBUK has been appointed assistant professor of government at Indiana University.

RICHARD W. STAVELEY, assistant professor of political science, San Jose State College, is on leave for the year 1962, teaching at the University of Queensland, Brisbane, Australia.

T. NOEL STERN, former president of West Chester State College in Pennsylvania has been appointed research associate in the bureau of government research at Indiana University.

JOHN C. STOESSINGER has been promoted to associate professor at the department of political science, Hunter College.

CLARENCE E. THURBER has been appointed associate professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University effective March 1, 1962.

JOSEPH B. TUCKER, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Ohio University.

FREDERIC A. WEED, head of the San Jose State College department of political science and public administration has been named a full professor.

IN MEMORIAM

Professor AARON M. MARGALITH died suddenly in his home at 175 Pinehurst Avenue, Saturday, October 21, at the age of 59. Dr. Margalith, former chairman of the social science department, 1949-1955, was professor of political science.

A native of Jerusalem, Dr. Margalith spent his early years in the Holy City, and there attended elementary and secondary schools. During the First World War, Dr. Margalith, although under age, joined the Royal Fusiliers of the British Army. He fought on the Sinai Peninsula where he distinguished himself by receiving both the British Victory and War Medals.

In 1921 he came to America and studied at the City College of New York and Temple University. He received both his B.A. and Ph.D. degrees at the Johns Hopkins University, the latter in 1929.

A member of the college faculty for twenty eight years, Dr. Margalith became a full professor in 1951 and also served as University librarian and chairman of the social science department. He was currently serving as faculty representative to the alumni-faculty-student relations special committee.

Mr. Margalith, a scion of a family of scholars, was the author of "The International Mandate" and co-author with Dr. Cyrus Adler of "American Intercession on Behalf of Jews" and "With Firmness in the Right," a statement of diplomatic action affecting Jews during the century before its publication in 1946.

—Yeshiva College Commentator

Professor LANE W. LANCASTER died of a heart attack in Bruges, Belgium, on March 27, 1962.

Thus came to an end a long and distinguished career as a teacher and scholar in the field of political science.

He was born in Bellaire, Ohio, on December 9, 1892, took his first degree at Ohio Wesleyan University in 1915, his Master's degree from the University of Illinois in 1918, and his doctorate at the University of Pennsylvania in 1923. He was a private in the U. S. Army in 1918. After serving as an instructor at the University of Pennsylvania from 1920 to 1923, he taught at Wesleyan University, in Middletown, Connecticut, from 1923 to 1930. He came to the University of Nebraska as Professor in 1930, and remained there until his retirement in the spring of 1960. He served as chairman of his department from 1939 to 1953, and from 1955 to 1957, a fact to which he attached no significance at all. He had no desire for administrative power, and regarded the teacher's calling as fully satisfying. He was visiting professor in several institutions, Northwestern University during the year 1940-1941, Yale University, 1948-1949, and the University of California at Berkeley, 1949-1950. He was Vice-President of the American Political Science Association in 1951-1952. He was also a member of Phi Beta Kappa.

In 1924 Professor Lancaster published a study on State Supervision of Municipal Indebtedness. His well-known book, Government in Rural America, appeared in 1937, with a second edition in 1952. In 1959 he published Volume 3 of Masters of Political Science: Hegel to Dewey. Over the years he contributed generously to political science journals and to books on American government.

After his retirement he moved to Berkeley, California, and in the fall of 1961 accepted appointment as Fulbright Professor of Political Science at University College, Swansea, Wales. He was on a holiday trip to Italy when he passed away.

Lane Lancaster was an unusually gifted teacher. He combined a genuinely friendly manner with an effortless mastery of the Socratic method. To a vast store of learning in political science he added a tremendous knowledge of English literature and history. He wrote with grace and charm, and was immensely popular with students without courting popularity. His many warm friends in the teaching profession join his widow and his two daughters in shedding a tear for a wise, decent and gallant man.—

DAVID FELLMAN

AUSTIN F. MACDONALD, Professor of Political Science Emeritus at the University of California, died in his home in Berkeley, January 8, 1962. He had retired in August, 1961, because of failing health.

Born in Philadelphia, January 21, 1898, he was an honors graduate of the University of Pennsylvania in 1920. He took his M. A. there too the following year, was a Harrison Fellow, 1921-23, and received his doctorate on a thesis published in 1923, Federal Subsidies to the States, a subject which he developed further in his book on Federal Aid, 1928. He taught at his alma mater until invited to Berkeley as a full professor in 1930. Despite his youth, he had already published four books and a dozen articles.

At California Macdonald continued his work in municipal and state government and in the late 1930's returned to an interest he had developed while still a graduate student at Pennsylvania, namely, Latin America. Professionally he was probably best known for his American City Government and Administration, first published in 1929, and American State Government and Administration, both of which have appeared in six editions. His Government of the Argentine Republic, 1942, was well received, and his Latin American Politics and Government has been widely used.

Professor Macdonald had many interests and was a prodigious worker. He travelled extensively and was an accomplished musician. He was an able lecturer, noted for his keen wit, and attracted huge upper division classes while at the same time his graduate students came to know him well. He was in frequent demand as a public speaker. He was a man of integrity, thoughtfulness, sincerity of purpose, and lived a well organized life. He is survived by his widow, Frances W. Macdonald, to whom he was deeply devoted.—ERIC BELLQUIST

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN
Indiana University

President-Elect

CARL J. FRIEDRICH
Harvard University

Vice Presidents

GABRIEL A. ALMOND
Yale University

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago

DWIGHT WALDO
University of California

Secretary

MARIAN IRISH
Florida State University

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Assistant Director

JOHN G. STEWART

Managing Editor, APSR

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

LAWRENCE DURISCH
Tennessee Valley Authority
WILLIAM O. FARBER
University of South Dakota
IVAN H. HINDERAKER
University of California, Los Angeles
JOHN T. HOLDEN
University of New Hampshire
GLADYS M. KAMMERER
University of Florida
RICHARD C. SNYDER
Northwestern University
KENNETH W. THOMPSON
Rockefeller Foundation
JOHN D. WILLIAMS
University of Utah

ALFRED DEGRAZIA
New York University
JOHN HALLOWELL
Duke University
SIGMUND NEUMANN
Wesleyan University
LEO C. RIETHMAYER
University of Colorado
LESTER G. SELIGMAN
University of Oregon
VERNON VAN DYKE
State University of Iowa
ROBERT E. WARD
University of Michigan
BRYCE WOOD
Social Science Research Council

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW
ALBERT SHAW
FREDERIC N. JUDSON
JAMES BRYCE
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL
WOODROW WILSON
SIMEON E. BALDWIN
ALBERT BUSHNELL HART
W. W. WILLOUGHBY
JOHN BASSETT MOORE
ERNST FREUND
JESSE MACY
MUNROE SMITH
HENRY JONES FORD
PAUL S. REINSCH
LEO S. ROWE
WILLIAM A. DUNNING
HARRY A. GARFIELD
JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM
CHARLES A. BEARD
WILLIAM B. MUNRO
JESSE S. REEVES
JOHN A. FAIRLIE
BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH
EDWARD S. CORWIN
WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY
ISIDOR LOEB
WALTER J. SHEPARD
FRANCIS W. COKER
ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE
THOMAS REED POWELL
CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA
CHARLES GROVE HAINES
ROBERT C. BROOKS
FREDERIC A. OGG
WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
LEONARD D. WHITE
JOHN M. GAUS
WALTER F. DODD
ARTHUR W. MACMAHON
HENRY R. SPENCER
QUINCY WRIGHT
JAMES POLLOCK
PETER H. ODEGARD
LUTHER H. GULICK
PENDLETON HERRING
RALPH J. BUNCHE
CHARLES MCKINLEY
HAROLD D. LASSWELL
E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER
V. O. KEY, JR.
R. TAYLOR COLE
CARL B. SWISHER
EMMETTE S. REDFORD

APSA ANNUAL MEETING
Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D.C.
September 3-8, 1962

Hotel Accommodations

The Mayflower Hotel is the official hotel for the Annual Meeting. Flat rates for all rooms will be: $9.00 single; $14.00 double. The Statler-Hilton, located two blocks from the Mayflower, also has reserved a block of rooms at the same rate for overflow from the Mayflower. Reservations should be made at least two weeks prior to opening of the Annual Meeting.

Monday and Tuesday, September 3 & 4

Committee Meetings

Registration—September 4-8

A registration desk will be maintained in the Chinese Room of the Mayflower Hotel and will be open during the following hours:

Tuesday, September 4—1:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m.
Wednesday, September 5—9:00 a.m. to 10:00 p.m.
Thursday, September 6—9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.
Friday, September 7—9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m.
Saturday, September 8—9:00 a.m. to 12:00 noon.

Persons arriving on Tuesday are urged to register promptly and thereby avoid the heavy registration periods later in the week.

The registration fee will be $3.00 for APSA members and $5.00 for non-members. Social studies teachers attending only the Saturday joint APSA-NCSS meetings are not expected to register.

Students

Graduate and undergraduate students of political science are especially encouraged to attend the Washington meeting. Special panels on graduate research are being scheduled in conjunction with the regular panel sections. In addition, special sessions with Professor Harold Lasswell, Yale Law School, and Professor Arnold Brecht, New School for Social Research, have been scheduled for graduate students and young instructors.

Location of Meetings

Panel meetings, special meetings, and general sessions will be held in the Mayflower Hotel unless otherwise noted. The exact location of each meeting will be indicated in the Final Program distributed at registration.

Program Committee

Chairman: Byrum E. Carter, Department of Government, Indiana University. Committee Members:

POLITICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY: Professor David Smith, Department of Political Science, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pennsylvania.

AMERICAN POLITICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY: Professor James Prothro, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT: Professor Lucian Pye, Department of Political Science, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT: Mr. Charles L. Clapp.

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT: Professor Ethan Allen, Department of Political Science, University of Kansas, Lawrence, Kansas.

POLITICAL PARTIES: Professor James Robinson, Department of Political Science, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION: Professor Vincent Ostrom, Department of Political Science, University of California at Los Angeles, Los Angeles, California.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS: Professor Vernon Van Dyke, Department of Political Science, University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa.

SPECIAL GRADUATE SEMINARS: Professor Howard Penniman, Department of Government, Georgetown University, Washington, D.C.

Professional Placement Service At 1962 Annual Meeting

(September 3-8, 1962)

A professional placement service will again be available to members of The American Political Science Association attending the Washington meeting. The placement service will be provided by the U.S. Employment Service for the District of Columbia, U.S. Department of Labor. The primary purpose is to provide an efficient means for employers to meet prospective employees and vice versa. The service operated in St. Louis in 1961 in a most satisfactory fashion.

A staff of experienced Employment Service interviewers will be available at the Annual Meeting Placement Center to review employer's orders, interview applicants, and arrange for an interview between prospective employers and employees.

If you are planning to attend the 1962 Annual Meeting and wish to utilize the Placement Service, this is how to proceed:

ADVANCE REGISTRATION: Both prospective employers with personnel needs and employees seeking a position are urged to make application before August 24 at the nearest local office of their State Employment Service and ask that the forms be forwarded to the District of Columbia Service. There are over 1800 local Employment Service offices throughout the country, including 119 urban professional placement centers. Personnel at these offices will have the appropriate forms and will assist employers and applicants to prepare them. Employers should take detailed job specifications and applicants should take a brief (preferably one page) vita when they visit the local office. The APSA National Office will send additional information on this service to department chairmen.

With the exception of instances in which a satisfactory placement has been effected before the Annual Meeting begins, the local Employment Service will forward all applications and orders directly to the Annual Meeting Placement Center after the registration deadline, August 24. The Center, located at the Mayflower Hotel, is manned by a staff of experienced professional placement interviewers who conduct the matching process of bringing together qualified personnel and interested employers.

The Professional Placement Service is entirely separate from the APSA's Personnel Service and requires separate registration. There is no fee for use of the Professional Placement Service by employers or applicants.

ACTIVATING REGISTRATION AT THE CENTER: Immediately upon arrival, the employer or applicant should check in at the Annual Meeting Placement Center so that earlier local registration can be activated.

REGISTRATION FOR EMPLOYMENT AT THE CENTER: While initial registrations will be taken at the Center, you will get quicker service if you register in advance at the local Employment Service office.

FOLLOW UP: Orders and applications will be returned to the local Employment Service Office after the Annual Meeting. The office will determine if a satisfactory placement occurred and, if not, will make further recruitment or placement efforts.

All State Employment Service local offices accept orders and applications in the field of political science on a year-round basis as a regular part of their professional service.

Three New, Noteworthy A-C-C Texts

Ogg and Ray's

INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, 12th Edition

by William H. Young, University of Wisconsin. The 12th edition of this well-known best seller includes rewritten and expanded chapters on civil rights, elections, foreign affairs, and national defense. A new chapter has been added on government in metropolitan areas. The book is completely up-to-date, including the major new programs, policies and events of 1961. Published in April. 957 pp., illus. $8.00

Also available, the 12th edition of INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, The National Government. 748 pp., illus. $7.50

THE REVIVAL OF DEMOCRATIC THEORY

by Neal Riemer, The Pennsylvania State University. In this original work of scholarship, the author analyzes the decline of democratic theory and presents a strong case for its revival. After giving the reasons for the decline, he lines out a scheme for American democracy and provides a framework within which it may operate. Throughout, the underlying definition of political theory is that of the critical study concerned with harmoniously relating the normative, empirical, and prudential components of political science. Just published.

190 pp., paper, $1.95

FRENCH POLITICS AND ALGERIA

by William G. Andrews, Tufts University. This book presents a comparative case study in the functioning of French governmental systems. From a wealth of documentary material and statistical data, the writer has woven a lucid account of policy in the making. His study demonstrates how the governmental and political institutions of the Fourth and Fifth French republics have functioned in dealing with the rebellion in Algeria from November 1954 to May 1962. The striking differences in approach to the same problem by two successive regimes are highlighted. To be published this month.

About 224 pp., paper, $1.95 (tent.)

APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS

34 West 33rd Street, New York 1, N.Y.

Division of Meredith Publishing Company

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Public Opinion and American Democracy

by V. O. KEY, JR., Harvard University

An excellent analysis of the implications for political theory of public opinion poll findings. A most penetrating study.—HARWOOD L. CHILDS, Princeton University

602 pp.; $7.50 text

Modern Organization

by VICTOR A. THOMPSON, Illinois Institute of Technology

Professor Thompson has written an unusually good presentation and integration of modern behavioral science findings with public administration and traditional organizational theory. Not only are there many insightful ideas which will supply researchers with many hypotheses but perhaps more important Professor Thompson is developing a theoretical framework that is of much promise.

—CHRIS ARGYRIS, Yale University

192 pp.; $3.75 text

Politics Among Nations

by HANS J. MORGENTHAU, University of Chicago

Without question, Professor Morgenthau's book is among the top five in the literature of the field today. It is indispensable to any course in international politics.—JOE R. WILKINSON, University of Denver.

660 pp.; $7.50 text

ALFRED A. KNOFF, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

European Political Systems

edited by TAYLOR COLE, Duke University

This was an excellent text when it was first published. It is even better in the second edition which (is) thoroughly revised, reset and printed from new plates. The various changes made have improved and strengthened the book.—ROGER H. WELLS, Bryn Mawr College

876 pp.; $7.50 text

Introduction to Government

by ROBERT RIENOW, State University of New York, College for Teachers, Albany

An explicit and factual discussion of what governments are and how they work, with new material added throughout.

620 pp.; $5.75 text

Population and World Power

by KATHERINE ORGANSKI and A. F. K. ORGANSKI, Brooklyn College

An excellent study of population as a factor in world politics today—both internal and international.—J. C. RUSSELL, University of Minnesota

280 pp.; $4.00 text

ALFRED A. KNOFF, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

5 SIGNIFICANT MCGRAW-HILL BOOKS

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE: Readings in Public Opinion and Propaganda

Edited by REO M. CHRISTENSON, Miami University, Ohio; and ROBERT O. McWILLIAMS, Eastern Michigan University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 585 pages, $4.95.

This readable anthology on public opinion and propaganda is designed for nonspecialists and students planning further study. The book includes: a discussion of the nature of public opinion; the dynamics of its process; and its role in a democracy. This is followed by a consideration of factors which influence or determine opinion. Propaganda principles, techniques, and effects, plus types of propaganda are examined. Contributors include: Walter Lippmann, Bertrand Russell, Richard M. Nixon, James Bryce, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., George Gallup, Carl Sandburg, Alexis De Tocqueville, John Stuart Mill, Harold D. Lasswell.

ELEMENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, Fifth Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, The Pennsylvania State University; and DEAN E. McHENRY, University of California, Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 512 pages, $6.95.

Concise discusses national, state, and local government by introducing background and principles and their institutions and their operation in practice. The book contains new and updated information on: Alaska and Hawaii as new states; election of 1960 and its aftermath; reapportionment of 1961; the Kennedy Administration; recent Supreme Court decisions on contempt of Congress; federal finance; new drive for state constitutional modernization.

LATIN AMERICA: An Interpretive History

By DONALD MARQUAND DOZER, University of California, Santa Barbara. 618 pages, $7.95.

Offers an important step away from the traditional nation-by-nation treatment of Latin American history and offers an organized and integrated "interpretive history" of the area. The treatment is generally chronological and covers the entire span of Latin American history. The author avoids the encyclopedic detail that clutters much of the Latin American historiography, and, instead, stresses relationships, currents of development, and the most significant events.

THE FEDERAL INTEREST IN HIGHER EDUCATION

By HOMER D. BABIDGE, Jr., Vice President of the American Council on Education; and ROBERT M. ROSENZWEIG, Assistant to U. S. Commissioner of Education, U. S. Office of Education. 224 pages, $5.95.

Presents a realistic and authoritative discussion of the background and development of relations between the Federal Government and the higher education community. This book is designed to provoke more extensive and realistic debate about major issues of public policy. It is a candid assessment of limitations of colleges and universities in dealing with the Federal Government, and of the Federal Government in dealing with colleges and universities. Its treatment of delicate political issues, such as segregation and Church-State relations, make this book valuable to the well-informed citizen.

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES

By C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, The University of Chicago. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. Available August.

A noteworthy casebook, including approximately 50 Supreme Court decisions, including Baker v. Carr—the recent Supreme Court decision on reapportionment. In general, the author has selected more recent cases which present constitutional issues with maximum impact for students and demonstrates how lively and current these constitutional controversies are. Material organized by issues . . . dissenting opinions fully treated . . . editing kept to a minimum . . . cases selected for interest to students.

MCGRAW-HILL BOOK COMPANY, INC.
330 West 42nd Street
New York 36, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY

Essays in Historical Perspective

EDITED BY IVO J. LEDERER. This pioneer effort by leading American specialists is the first major attempt to deal with the interrelation of Tsarist and Soviet foreign policy. Individual essays interpret Russian national interests and objectives; Russian attitudes toward the West; the effect of internal politics on foreign policy; the role of personalities, the foreign ministry, and economics; and such instruments of diplomacy as the military apparatus, propaganda, international movements, and negotiation. These essays were originally presented at Yale University in April 1961, at a conference that included among its participants George F. Kennan, Cyril E. Black, Frederick C. Barghoorn, Hajo Holborn, and Henry L. Roberts. $10.00

POLITICS, PERSONALITY, AND NATION BUILDING

Burma's Search for Identity

BY LUCIAN W. PYE. This study of the search for personal and political identity in Burma brings to light some of the great difficulties which confront a transitional society in creating a modern state system. Mr. Pye examines Burma's political culture, exploring both the historical evolution of the society and the psychological reactions to change. He deals with problems such as the inhibitions thwarting modernization, the tendency toward ideological agitation, and the roles of colonialism and nationalism in the complex process of transformation. $7.50

RACIAL THEMES IN SOUTHERN RHODESIA

The Attitudes and Behavior of the White Population

BY CYRIL A. ROGERS AND C. FRANTZ, WITH A FOREWORD BY SIR ROBERT C. TREDGOLD. From Algiers to Capetown, racial conflict threatens the peace of the entire African continent. Danger signals are especially clear in Southern Rhodesia, where the small white minority faces an increasingly restive African population. For the first time, in this book, a psychologist and an anthropologist have joined together to study the attitudes and behavior of the white Southern Rhodesians. The authors examine the historical background and then analyze specific categories of behavior toward Africans such as legal justice, political control, land use, educational opportunities, and sexual relations. $6.75

Yale University Press

New Haven and London

Canadian orders:

McGill University Press, Montreal 25

from RANDOM

.....

Patterns of Government

THE MAJOR POLITICAL SYSTEMS OF EUROPE
Revised Edition

by SAMUEL BEER, ADAM B. ULAM, and NICHOLAS WAHL
all of Harvard University

HERBERT J. SPIRO, Amherst College

HARRY ECKSTEIN, Princeton University

Since it first appeared in 1958, this authoritative text has challenged not only the undergraduate but the graduate student and professor as well.

Completely revised and updated, this book remains a distinguished analysis of the politics and governments of four major world powers—Britain, France, Germany, and the Soviet Union. The authors, each an authority in his respective field, have under taken to present the politics of each of the four countries as a political system. Stressing scientific method, they work from a perspective that has won high regard in present-day political science.

Summer 1962; about 700 pages; $6.95 text

.....

State and Local Government and Politics

Revised Edition

by ROBERT S. BABCOCK, University of Vermont

This is a thoroughly updated and revised edition of a lucid, well organized and highly informative text. It is infused with the practical wisdom and sense of excitement derived from the author's own successful participation in grass roots politics and offers a stimulating and authoritative description and analysis of the problems of state and local governments.

Summer 1962; 500 pages; paperbound; $5.50 text

.....

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

HOUSE

.....

Power and International Relations

by INIS L. CLAUDE, University of Michigan

Autumn 1962; about 600 pages; $5.95 text

People, Power, and Politics

AN INTRODUCTORY READER

by LYMAN J. GOULD, and E. WILLIAM STEELE,
both of the University of Vermont

1961; 725 pages; paperbound; $3.95 text

Courts, Judges, and Politics

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

by WALTER F. MURPHY, Princeton University and C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, University of Chicago

1961; 707 pages; $6.75 text

The Might of Nations

WORLD POLITICS IN OUR TIME

by JOHN G. STOESSINGER, Hunter College

1961; 468 pages; $6.25 text

Send for a List

of Random House Studies in Political Science, a series of original works attractively bound in paper covers. The most recently published books in this series are: SMALL CITY GOVERNMENT by Warner E. Mills and Harry R. Davis, THE CONSTITUTION AND THE COURT by Robert S. Hirschfeld, and THE STATE LEGISLATURE by Malcolm E. Jewell. Priced from 95 cents.

.....

RANDOM HOUSE • The College Department • 501 Madison Avenue • New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

Princeton

UNIVERSITY PRESS

---

Men and Nations

By Louis J. Halle

For over half a century it has been commonplace to complain that the long tradition of political philosophy has at last come to an end, that the world today is without a valid and relevant political philosophy. Men and Nations represents an effort to repair this fault, to present a philosophy on which we can base the continued progress of our societies. That philosophical system is presented here as a proposed foundation for the understanding and teaching of politics. It is, however, a rounded system—a complete philosophy of life—so that its illumination is not limited to politics.

275 pages. $4.50

---

The Role of the Military in Underdeveloped Countries

Edited by John J. Johnson

This volume examines the social and political role of the armed forces in the emergent countries of Latin America, Southeast Asia, Sub-Saharan Africa, and the Middle East. The contributors include such distinguished historians and political scientists as Belmont Brice, James S. Coleman, and Lucian W. Pye. They offer here some searching observations on the political structure of the new states, on the relationship between the needs of internal order and those of external defense, and on the curious fact that military regimes, while they have promoted national development, social change, and free political practices in some countries, have hampered similar growth in others. A RAND Corporation Research Study.

428 pages. Tables. $8.50

---

The Growth of Industrial Production in the Soviet Union

By G. Warren Nutter

The author's aim is to set the record straight for forty-odd years of Russian history in industrial growth from revolutionary to recent times, in its trends and fluctuations. He places developments in perspective by comparing them with those for Tsarist Russia and the United States, and estimates the volume of industrial production and labor productivity for the Soviet Union relative to the United States at benchmark dates. Published for the National Bureau of Economic Research.

734 pages. Tables, charts. $15.00

---

Order from your bookstore, or
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
Princeton, New Jersey

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

OXFORD BOOKS

OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

---

PEACE AND OPINION

By EVAN LUARD. Mr. Luard shows that efforts to bring about international disarmament are directed at the symptoms rather than the causes of disorder—since it is not weapons which produce wars, but the habit of warlike conduct which creates the demand for weapons. His original and provocative argument, presented with force and clarity, is that public opinion as represented by the U.N. must grow in power so as to become a deterrent rather than a condemnation of acts of war. $4.00

THE ELIMINATION OF CORRUPT PRACTICES IN 19TH-CENTURY BRITISH ELECTIONS 1868-1911

By CORNELIUS O'LEARY. In this volume Mr. O'Leary thoroughly explores a hitherto neglected aspect of British democracy in the nineteenth century: Britain's improvement in electoral morality from 1868, the year of the first real reform, to 1911. $5.60

THE AMERICAN TORY

By WILLIAM H. NELSON. A general study, the first in more than half a century, of the Loyalists in the American Revolution. Mr. Nelson shows who they were, and why they suffered the most abject kind of political failure. $4.80

A HISTORY OF SIERRA LEONE

By CHRISTOPHER FYFE. The first comprehensive history of Sierra Leone, colonized from Britain in 1787 by settlers of African origin, and after 1807 the center for western African slaves captured and freed at sea by the Royal Navy. Mr. Fyfe's illuminating study lays particular emphasis upon these liberated Africans and their modern Creole descendants. $13.45

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York 16

BOOKS THAT MATTER IN WORLD AFFAIRS from Praeger

RUSSIA UNDER KHRUSHCHEV

An Anthology from Problems of Communism

Edited by Abraham Brumberg. Articles from a noteworthy periodical devoted to Soviet studies, documenting and analyzing the period of upheaval since Stalin's death.

660 pages, $8.75 cloth, $2.50 paper

THE SOVIET UNION AT THE UNITED NATIONS

An Inquiry into Soviet Motives and Objectives

By Alexander Dallin. An assessment of the place of the United Nations in over-all Soviet world strategy by a foremost specialist on Soviet foreign policy.

256 pages, $5.75 cloth, $1.95 paper

CASTRO'S REVOLUTION

Myths and Realities

By Theodore Draper. "The most lucid and intelligent bit of political analysis done by any American in a decade, perhaps in a couple of decades. It is not just an excellent book on a subject of interest and importance. It is a model of clarity, reason, intellectual decency, and good American English prose."—Richard H. Rovere, in The American Scholar

220 pages, $4.50 cloth, $1.75 paper

WEALTH AND POWER IN AMERICA

An Analysis of Social Class and Income Distribution

By Gabriel Kolko. Challenging the popular theories of an affluent U.S. society, the author asserts that despite greatly increased taxation and economic innovations, wealth remains in essentially the same hands as in 1910.

190 pages, $4.85

THE KREMLIN SINCE STALIN

By Wolfgang Leonhard. A brilliant and thoroughly documented history—based almost exclusively on Soviet sources—of the internal politics and policies of the Soviet Union since the death of Stalin.

384 pages, $7.75

REVISIONISM

Essays on the History of Marxist Ideas

Edited by Leopold Labedz. The first book to deal comprehensively with the history of ideas associated with Marxist movements, providing a historical perspective for various reinterpretations of the original doctrine.

404 pages, $7.95

UNITY AND CONTRADICTION

Major Aspects of Sino-Soviet Relations

Edited by Kurt L. London. Twenty Soviet-affairs specialists debate the issue of coexistence between the U.S.S.R. and China.

476 pages, $7.50

LATIN AMERICA BETWEEN THE EAGLE AND THE BEAR

By Salvador de Madariaga. The great European liberal, writer, and historian studies the causes of the current turmoil in Latin America—dealing with the local causes for unrest, the U.S.-Latin American relationship, and Latin America's relations with the Soviet Union and China.

200 pages, $4.50

SOVIET MAN AND HIS WORLD

By Klaus Mehnert. A full-dimensional portrait of life in the Soviet Union today by one of Europe's foremost experts on Soviet politics and literature.

320 pages, $5.95

---

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publisher / 64 University Place, N. Y. 3, N. Y.

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Amateur Democrat

CLUB POLITICS IN THREE CITIES

By James Q. Wilson. The growing challenge of local amateur activity in the Democratic party, as seen in New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles.

$6.95

Jurisprudence

REALISM IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

By Karl N. Llewellyn. This collection of essays—many already known as classics—brings within easy reach the wide range of thought of one of the great American legal philosophers of our time.

$8.95

The Small Group

AN ANALYSIS OF RESEARCH CONCEPTS AND OPERATIONS

By Robert T. Golembiewski. A broad, yet thorough study of all that has been learned to date on small group analysis.

$6.00

Render Unto Caesar

THE FLAG-SALUTE CONTROVERSY

By David R. Manwaring. A powerful treatment of the legal struggle of the Jehovah's Witnesses against the compulsory flag salute in public schools. Index

$5.50

Through your bookseller or,

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Chicago 7, Illinois

IN CANADA: The University of Toronto Press

To be published shortly

SYSTEMATIC POLITICS: Elementa Politica et Sociologica

by George E. Gordon Catlin

This important work is the culmination of thirty years of leadership in the "scientific" study of politics by one of the world's foremost political scientists.

480 pages

6 x 9 inches

$7.50

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO PRESS

Selected RONALD Books . . .

European Politics and Government

A Comparative Approach

CLIFFORD A. L. RICH, Oklahoma State University; ROBERT O. GIBBON, Wisconsin State College, Eau Claire; LOWELL G. NOONAN, San Fernando Valley State College; HELMUT BADER, El Camino College; and KAREL HULICKA, University of Buffalo. Edited by CLIFFORD A. L. RICH

New. Designed for the first course in comparative government, this book presents a detailed, comprehensive, and balanced account of the politics and government of five major European powers: Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and the U.S.S.R. Specialists on each country analyze the causal determinants of political action, providing the student with a sound basis for drawing conclusions. The book systematically focuses attention on the governing process in order to impart a clear understanding of how the five major European systems compare with the United States. The final chapter summarizes the politics and institutions of European union. 1962. 780 pp., illus. $8.00

Public Administration

JOHN M. PFIFFNER, University of Southern California; and ROBERT V. PRESTHUS, Cornell University

This standard textbook provides a comprehensive account of public administration today. It integrates the descriptive-institutional material of administrative science and the behavioral analyses of administration in action. The book analyzes the nature of public bureaucracy and the political environment with its attendant pressures on the public administrator; incorporates material on decision-making and data-processing in fact-finding and planning; reflects recent research in group behavior, individual motivation, leadership dynamics, etc. 4th Ed., 1960. 570 pp. $7.50

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

15 East 26th Street, New York 10, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Economic Development in Perspective

By John Kenneth Galbraith. Knowing that new states and old states alike now recognize economic development as an imperative, Mr. Galbraith, United States Ambassador to India, delivered in late 1961 five public lectures on the essentials of the process.
$2.50

Prices and Production of Machinery in the Soviet Union, 1928-1958

By Richard Moorsteen. This study provides the key quantitative indicators for 30 years of Soviet experience in developing machinery production. A RAND Corporation Study.
$15.00

Communist China 1955-1959

POLICY DOCUMENTS WITH ANALYSIS

With a Foreword by Robert R. Bowie and John K. Fairbank. This volume presents a documented and interpretive record of Chinese domestic policy during a five-year period of intense revolutionary change.
$10.00

The American Approach to Foreign Policy

REVISED EDITION

By Dexter Perkins. In this thorough revision of a famous book, the author adds an analysis of the events of ten fateful years to his narrative. "... an extremely valuable contribution to the understanding of the distinctive character of American foreign policy."—H. J. Morgenthau
$4.95

The Future of Federalism

By Nelson Rockefeller. The Governor of New York State here presents a strong case for the usefulness, indeed the necessity of federalism in the modern world. The Godkin Lectures, 1962.
$2.75

Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959

By Harold Swayze. Mr. Swayze explores the elusive area where politics and literature meet—the junction of government directives and partisan emotions. His analysis of the Russian government's methods and mistakes illuminates not only the Soviet experience, but the basic relationship between art and society.
$5.95

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

3 SIGNIFICANT VIEWS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE IN 20th-CENTURY AMERICA

Democracy in Action

Edited by THEODORE POWELL, Public Information Consultant for Connecticut's Department of Education and member of the Manchester, Connecticut, City Council.

By bringing together the pertinent writings of American men of government and politics, Dr. Powell has shown that today's process of government is the result of the continuing contest of personal views, interests, and ambitions within the evolving framework of law. Dramatically illustrating contrasting approaches to the issues which have contributed to the contemporary scene, the editor has chosen 83 selections from memoirs, public documents, periodicals, scholarly analyses, and novels.

834 pages, paper, $3.25

---

A Bill Becomes A Law

By DANIEL M. BERMAN, faculty member of the School of Government and Public Administration at The American University.

The background of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 provides a subject for careful study of the legislative process. Reflecting one of the most complex social issues of our time, this Act called into play almost every procedure designed for the purpose of passing or defeating legislation. This analysis follows its enactment step by step. 135 pages, paper, $1.75

---

The Anatomy of A Constitutional Law Case

By ALAN F. WESTIN, member of the District of Columbia Bar.

Documents relating to the Steel Seizure Decision of 1952, from its beginning as a wage dispute through its final hearing before the United States Supreme Court "successfully commingled the techniques of the reporter and the scholar in a dramatic presentation of a constitutional law case."—Stanley P. Stern, Temple Law Quarterly. 183 pages, $1.95

---

The Macmillan Company, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 11

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Authoritative and Recommended

REVOLUTION IN HUNGARY

By Paul E. Zinner. Based on interviews with Hungarian refugees in the summer of 1957, and drawn from numerous documentary sources, this book analyzes in detail the background of the ill-fated Hungarian Revolution. Discussed are the personality and role of Imré Nagy, the struggles for power within the Communist Party, and other little known facts about Hungary's internal politics.

To be published August 13                      368 pages                      $6.00

RUSSIAN CLASSICS IN SOVIET JACKETS

By Maurice Friedberg. Why does the Soviet government sponsor the publication of Tolstoy, Pushkin, Dostoyevsky, Turgenev, Checkhov, or Gogol? Dr. Friedberg discusses the government's interest in the classics and illustrates the methods used in selection and editing of published materials.

Just published                      248 pages                      $4.75

YUGOSLAVIA IN CRISIS 1934-1941

By J. B. Hoptner. A documented account of Yugoslavia caught in an international world of great and self-centered powers and a domestic world of multinational population, pressured and manipulated from all sides. Included is an evaluation of Great Britain's role in the collapse of the regency.

Just published                      326 pages                      $6.50

EUROPE AT SIXES AND SEVENS: The Common Market, the Free Trade Association, and the United States

By Emile Benoit. "The issues in this crucial situation are admirably outlined in this analysis . . ." Saturday Review Syndicate

"An important book dealing with a subject vital to the relationship between the United States and what signs point to as the emerging United Europe." Virginia Kirkus' Service
275 pages                      $6.00

Columbia University Press
Publishers of the Columbia Encyclopedia

APSA PERSONNEL SERVICE

MEMBERSHIP—available to every member of the Association for $5.00 yearly.

NEWSLETTER—issued every 4-6 weeks. Contains a listing of current teaching and research vacancies. Upon request, the Association forwards biographical information forms directly to employers.

PLACEMENT SERVICE AT ANNUAL MEETING—see page 530.

For further information write:

*Miss Cora Prifold, Director
Personnel Service
American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.*

The Concept of Jacksonian Democracy

New York as a Test Case

By Lee Benson

Jacksonian Democracy has become almost a commonplace in American history. But in this penetrating analysis of one state—its voting cycles, party makeup, and social, ethnic, and religious patterns—Lee Benson shows that the concept bears little or no relation to New York history during the Jacksonian period. Mr. Benson's examination suggests a new theory of American voting behavior and a reconsideration of other local studies during this period.

352 pages. $6.00

Order from your bookstore, or
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
Princeton, New Jersey

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

The Galleon Series in Economics, History, Philosophy and Political Science

---

Just Out

CANADA VOTES: Howard A. Scarrow

A handbook of Federal and Provincial Election data.

$12.00
LC 62-14822

THE CONFLICT SOCIETY: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America

By KALMAN H. SILVERT, Tulane University

The Conflict Society attempts to breathe order into the complex events of social change in today's Latin America.

$7.50
LC 61-12686

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS, A British View:

The Journal of Major C. R. FORREST

Hugh F. Rankin, Editor

$2.00
LC 61-13685

Recent Publications

EXTRADITION TO AND FROM CANADA, By G. V. LA FOREST

A comprehensive treatment of Canadian law and practice in international and inter-Commonwealth extradition.

$6.50
LC 61-7029

THE CATHOLIC VOTE, By JOHN H. FENTON

"This competent study is written without bias, and constitutes a reliable exposition of a problem of great topicality at the present time."

The Book Exchange (London)

$4.75
LC 60-12512

U. S. COMMERCIAL TREATIES AND

INTERNATIONAL LAW, By ROBERT R. WILSON

". . . an authoritative contribution to the literature on treaty law . . ."
American Political Science Review

$6.50
LC 60-11021

CONTEMPT OF CONGRESS, By CARL BECK

"A masterful organization of material . . . essential for any law library with pretention to adequacy." Law Library Journal

$4.50
LC 59-15941

Wartime Origins of the East-West

DILEMMA OVER GERMANY, By JOHN L. SNELL

"His account of the development of United States policy is the fullest and most painstaking currently available." Journal of Politics

$7.00
LC 59-12404

POLITICS IN THE BORDER STATES, By JOHN H. FENTON

". . . excellent example of the combination of historical, statistical, and interviewing techniques in the study of state politics." Public Administration Review

$5.50
LC 58-16327

Once Again Available

A Distinguished Text

AN INTRODUCTION TO

PEIRCE'S PHILOSOPHY, By JAMES K. FEIBLEMAN

$7.00

THE HAUSER PRESS

720 POYDRAS ST.
NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

THE PREDICAMENT OF DEMOCRATIC MAN

by Edmond Cahn

"...is the kind of book that gains in value with the passing of months and years. The theme of the book is one with which every discussion group on democracy should concern itself. I know of no legal or political philosopher who combines in the same degree Cahn's command of the general and the particular."

—KENNETH W. THOMPSON, Vice President,
The Rockefeller Foundation

"It is an important book. It radiates confidence in the free society as the hope of the world. One who puts down this volume realizes he has acquired new strength. There is the quality of Isaiah in the text. This is a book to read and re-read."

—JUSTICE WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS,
The New York Times Book Review

"Among the teachers of law in America none is so sensitive and searching in relating the political and legal processes to the ethical concerns of the individual as Edmond Cahn."

—REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Photo of Professor Cahn
by Arnold Newman

"This book expresses my idea of a true democratic philosophy."

—JUSTICE HUGO L. BLACK

"Contributes significantly to our understanding of democratic man and the essential foundations upon which the democratic order stands."

—AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

$3.95

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, N. Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Ex-Communist Witnesses

FOUR STUDIES IN FACT FINDING

Herbert L. Packer. A challenging examination of the testimony of four former Communists—Whittaker Chambers, Elizabeth Bentley, Louis Budenz, and John Lautner—that tries to determine the effectiveness of present fact-finding processes. The author maintains that gaps and discrepancies exist in the witnesses' stories due to limitations in the fact-finding processes employed, and he discusses remedies and possible alternatives. $4.95

The Siege of Leningrad

Leon Goure. Foreword by Merle Fainsod. Using memoirs, eyewitness accounts, and captured German documents, the author has told the dramatic story of the 900 day siege that saw almost one million people die of starvation, cold, and disease. How the Soviet authorities managed not only to maintain order and control but to mobilize the people into playing an important part in the city's defense is told for the first time. Illustrated. $6.95

The Theory, Law, and Policy of Soviet Treaties

Jan F. Triska and Robert M. Slusser. This is a systematic study of Soviet foreign policy from the point of view of Soviet international treaties, agreements, and conventions. It is based on an analysis of the more than 2,000 treaties entered into by the Soviet Union between 1917 and 1957, and also on the speeches, statements, and writings of Soviet scholars and foreign policy spokesmen. A publication of the Hoover Institution. $10.00

Kingship and Community in Early India

Charles Drekmeier. This intellectual and cultural history of ancient India, from the Aryan invasions in the second millennium B.C. to the rise of Islam, places chief emphasis on political and social thought—the relation of social theory to religious belief, the values that replaced the heroic ideal of the Aryan warrior, the ways in which society was ordered and coercion justified. September. About $7.00

Order from your bookstore, please

STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

New Political Science Texts . . .

The Politics of American Democracy, 2nd Ed.

by Marian D. Irish, Florida State University, and James W. Prothro, University of North Carolina

A realistic view of the American political scene, examining both sides of controversial subjects without bias or evasion. This text coordinates behavioral findings and interpretations of American politics with legal and constitutional matters.

1962

658 pp.

Text price: $7.50

Functions and Policies of American Government, 2nd Edition

by Jack W. Peltason, University of Illinois, and James M. Burns, Williams College

A series of integrated essays on the policies and functions of American government and their history. Presents the history of our policy problems and analyzes alternate solutions. Covers problems in each area: welfare, labor, resources, fiscal, civil rights, foreign, and military.

1962

450 pp.

Text price: $5.95

An Introduction to Political Analysis: Problems in American Government, 3rd Edition

edited by Robert E. Lane, James D. Barber, and Fred I. Greenstein, all of Yale University

Stresses analysis and interpretation of concrete, lively case materials by the student, working within a framework of significant political science questions and policy alternatives. Incorporates recent research developments in political science.

1962

Approx. 384 pp.

paperbound

Text price: $4.95

Case Studies in American Government

edited by Edwin A. Bock, Staff Director, Inter-University Case Program, and Alan K. Campbell, Syracuse University and Chairman of the
I.C.P. First-Year Course Committee

Published under the auspices of the Inter-University Case Program, this book features 9 cases, researched and written by teachers experienced in using the case method approach in teaching. It focuses on communicating the realities of government to students and combines and handles the structure and problems of government within the case method framework.

1962

Approx. 384 pp.

paperbound

Text price: $3.95

For approval copies, write to: Box 903

Prentice-Hall, Inc.
Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey

---

THREE NEW TEXTS

Coming in November:

In contrast to many volumes on conditions in Africa, here is the first comprehensive analysis of the nature and significance of Africa's rapidly multiplying contacts with Europe, Asia, and the Americas. Following an analysis of the combined internal and external pressures which precipitated the quick rise of Africa, the author devotes twenty chapters to major African issues in international relations. A major theme throughout the book is the striving of Africa's new leaders to develop foreign policies of their own, independent of either the Soviet or Western powers.

Coming in January:

The Fifth Edition of the earlier work by William E. Mosher, J. Donald Kingsley, and O. Glenn Stahl. Synthesizing knowledge and experience of many scholars and practitioners, this text is now entirely up to date, is shorter than before, and gives more emphasis to principles and general practice. Several chapters have been completely reorganized and rewritten, and there is a new chapter on Personnel Research. "An excellent work . . . fills the most important void in the public personnel field," Professor Edwin A. Cottrell, Stanford University, said of the last edition. (available for quantity sale to schools and colleges only.)

Emphasizing basic facts and principles, INTERNATIONAL POLITICS deals successively with historical background of international relations; concepts reflected in the conduct of states (realism, idealism, neutralism, the principles of democracy and those of communism); the cold war (its background, methods, and issues); the conditions, forces, and movements that play so large a part in the conduct of nations (with special attention given to national power and to the balance of power); and the role of force and war and the efforts to eliminate or control it (with special reference to the United Nations).

49 EAST 33D STREET, NEW YORK 16, N.Y.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

- HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University
WALLACE S. SAYRE, Associate Editor, Columbia University (on leave) DWIGHT WALDO, University of California, Berkeley
SAMUEL H. BEER, Associate Editor, Harvard University HAROLD STEIN, Princeton University
ALEXANDER HEARD, University of North Carolina
OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University JOHN D. LEWIS, Oberlin College

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

- VICTOR T. LE VINE, Acting Book Review Editor, Washington University JULIAN FELDMAN, University of California (Berkeley)
RALPH A. STRAETZ, News and Notes Editor, New York University FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE, University of Maryland
CORINNE SILVERMAN, Woodstock, Vt. HIRAM M. STOUT, George Washington University
CECELIA M. KENYON, Smith College

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR
100 University Hall, Ohio State
University, 216 N. Oval Dr.,
Columbus 10, Ohio

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

---

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy. Prices of other issues are furnished on request.

Applications for membership, orders for the REVIEW, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the REVIEW to Harvey C. Mansfield, 100 University Hall, 216 N. Oval Dr., Ohio State University, Columbus 10, Ohio; books intended for review, to Victor T. Le Vine, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.; News and Notes items, to Ralph A. Straetz, Department of Political Science, New York University, University Heights, New York 53, N.Y.; advertising correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the REVIEW before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the REVIEW, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

---

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1962, by The American Political Science Association.

outstanding new and recent books

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL DICTIONARY

Jack C. Plano and Milton Greenberg, both of Western Michigan University

Over 1100 political terms are defined and described in terms of their significance to the problems, practices, and institutions of American government in this unique dictionary—the only dictionary to feature a chapter-subject matter approach and to discuss the significance of each of its terms. To further assist the reader, each chapter concludes with a discussion of relevant Supreme Court cases, Federal statutes, and government agencies. Written in brisk, clear language, this book is an important aid to all American government courses.

Aug. 1962, 400 pp., $5.95 casebound, $3.95 paper

Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc.

383 Madison Ave., N.Y.

SOVIET UNION:

Paradox and Change

Robert T. Holt, John E. Turner, both of the University of Minnesota; et al.

This book neither condemns nor praises the Soviet Union, but rather tries to reveal the quality of life in that changing country. Seven areas—city growth, economic change, agricultural production, science and technology, education, youth, radio and television—are studied by the authors who journeyed through Russia together and are experts on Soviet affairs.

Nov. 1962, 256 pp., $4.50 cloth, $2.50 paper (tentative)

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT ANNUAL, 1962-63

Ivan Hinderaker (Ed.), University of California, Los Angeles

A continuation of a distinguished series, this year's Annual includes: Communism, Socialism, and Democracy: Perspectives—Thomas Landon Thorson; The Supreme Court and Issues for the Sixties—William M. Beaney; Politics and Reform in American Cities—James Q. Wilson; The President and the Civil Rights of Negroes—Richard P. Longaker; Kennedy and the 87th Congress—Louis W. Koenig; American Foreign Policy: The First Year of the Kennedy Administration—William P. Gerberding.

May 1962, 116 pp., $1.95 paper

FIRST PUBLICATIONS OF
ATHERTON PRESS

NOMOS
I-V

edited by Carl J. Friedrich, Harvard University, for The American Society for Political and Legal Philosophy

Just published

NOMOS IV • Liberty The topic of NOMOS IV was occasioned by the centenary of Mill's On Liberty, but it was expanded beyond the focus on Mill into a multifaceted examination of the problems and prospects of freedom. The results of these various approaches to the subject are represented in NOMOS IV in sixteen original essays—ranging politically from left to right and philosophically over widely disparate schools of thought—written for this collection by distinguished political scientists, philosophers, lawyers, historians, and other experts in political and legal philosophy. 333 pp., $6.00

NOMOS V • The Public Interest This book is a stimulating interdisciplinary examination of many aspects of "the public and its problems." The topic has in recent years come to the forefront of popular concern as governments have increasingly intervened in conflicts between interest groups on behalf of "the public interest." The nineteen original essays written for this volume reflect the increasing concern with this topic. The essays vary widely in both conclusion and method, ranging from the reasoned conviction that the public interest is a central concern of political and legal philosophy to the pointedly argued rejection of it as merely a façade for special-interest groups and partisan position in the political battle. 256 pp., $6.00

Also available

NOMOS I • Authority; NOMOS II • Community; NOMOS III • Responsibility
$6.00 each volume

November publication

THE POLITICS OF REAPPORTIONMENT

edited by Malcolm E. Jewell, University of Kentucky

This timely and important book thoroughly analyzes the problems of both Congressional and legislative reapportionment. Fifteen key states have been selected for intensive study in seventeen original essays by political scientists who have been deeply involved in the problems of reapportionment. 350 pp., $7.50

In production

AMERICAN BUSINESS AND PUBLIC POLICY: The Issue of Foreign Trade

Raymond A. Bauer, Harvard University, and Ithiel deSola Pool, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; and Lewis A. Dexter

In this richly documented study of the participation of business in the making of foreign economic policy, the authors interviewed lobbyists, congressmen, "opinion leaders," and more than 900 corporation directors. The results of the survey are embodied in this historical study of pressure groups and legislative politics.

GOVERNMENT OF THE ATOM: The Integration of Powers

Harold P. Green, Attorney, Washington, D.C., and Alan Rosenthal, Hunter College

Forthcoming

CONTEMPORARY APPROACHES TO THE MODERN MIDDLE EAST

edited by Richard Nolte, Director, Institute of Current World Affairs

All books may be ordered directly from

ATHERTON PRESS

70 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
A DIVISION OF PRENTICE-HALL, INCORPORATED

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LVI

SEPTEMBER, 1962

NO. 3

HOW CAN WE JUSTIFY DEMOCRACY?

H. B. MAYO

University of Western Ontario

One should say at the outset what one means by democracy. I shall keep close to historical usage by excluding the economic, social, cultural and other extended meanings, and stipulate that democracy is a type of political system. A political system in turn is composed of methods of making public policies, those policies embodied in laws, orders, agreements, understandings and "conventions," at varying levels of generality, related to government and binding upon all within the system.<sup>1</sup> The approach taken here is thus to classify political systems according to how public policies are made, the assumption being that different systems use different methods or, as we may say, operate on characteristic principles.

The theory of any political system consists, in the first instance, of the operating principles on which the system works. These make up what may be called the explanatory theory, which is of course based upon empirical data. Thus we have a political theory of communism, of democracy, and of many other systems. Each theory forms as it were a stripped model of the particular system and inevitably appears somewhat abstract, analogous perhaps to the simplified model of an economic system.

In the case of democracy the operating or institutionalized principles that are the heart of the explanatory theory, appear to me as set out in what follows. They cannot, I think, be reduced in number, even by the most rigorous demands for theoretical parsimony, though they may certainly be increased by drawing out their practical implications. And they could no doubt be arranged in a different order, depending on which feature of democracy we wished to emphasize.

I

(1) Public policies are made by representatives, on a majority rule. It is a waste of time today to consider direct democracies such as that of ancient Athens, or the New England town meeting or small face-to-face groups, if we want to understand representative democracy. Even worse, great confusion can be generated by mixing the classic premises of direct democracy with the quite different premises and conditions of representative democracy.

As to the majority rule, what is meant is simply the common practice in representative legislatures that when a vote is taken the decision of the majority prevails. We are all aware of the complications introduced by special majorities, bicameralism, federalism, the relation of the legislative to the popular majority, and the like; but we cannot expect an abstract model to describe the endless variations of particular real-life specimens. The point is that these are variations from what is generally regarded as a democratic principle.

(2) The representatives are elected periodically. A policy-maker or leader may of course "represent" without being elected—history is full of examples—but it can scarcely be denied today that popular election is what gives title to make policies in a democracy; it is the generally accepted type of authorization, by which policies in a democracy are accepted as rightfully made, and hence to be obeyed—if only for the time being. Even pseudo-democracies go through the ritual of elections, thereby testifying to the almost universal acceptance of this mode of legitimation.<sup>2</sup> The general principles of political theory will not tell us how often elections should be held nor, what is the same thing, the tenure of representatives. A period of tenure is arrived at by exercising judgment on a number of often conflicting practical considerations. In a similar way, not the elements of theory, but practical wisdom, determines such matters as the secrecy of the ballot, method of voting, etc.

<sup>1</sup> This definition has the defect of evading an important question, namely that of the boundaries of the system. What, for instance, is to be the unit of democracy? Should we take the municipality? the state? the nation? the world? This is one of the most difficult and least explored questions in democratic theory, and because it is seldom even asked, many political controversies—e.g., over local government or national sovereignty—are unnecessarily confused. (The international political system is clearly sui generis.)

(3) Political equality of voting prevails, with the universal franchise and the familiar rule of one person one vote. We recognize this principle whenever we criticize plural and weighted voting, gerrymandering, and any electoral system or practice that distorts the political equality. As with election periods, so questions of voting age and the like connected with the franchise, are settled by practical considerations arising from experience.

(4) Elections, policy-making, and politicking in general, take place in a framework of political liberties. These political liberties—notably of speech, press, assembly and organization—are necessary to ensure a free choice of representatives, and to ensure that policies have popular support. They constitute only a sector of the wider field of traditional civil liberties and rights which may include, for example, trial by jury or religious freedom, and some of the latter may or may not happen to prevail in any given democracy at any given time. That is to say, democracies may be wise or unwise, good or bad in many of the policies which they enact and approve. No one can foretell the full consequences of his acts, and public policies even though undertaken for the best of reasons will sometimes turn out to have been wrong or mistaken. Moreover, the public in a democracy may sometimes endorse harsh treatment of minorities. To make democracy, by definition, an ideal system with ideal policies, is to destroy all possibility of understanding politics, and gives no help at all with our problem of justifying (or even defining) democracy.

A political system which operates on these characteristic principles, we may then call democracy. If fewer than all of them are present, we should not call the system democratic.

<sup>2</sup> Bertrand de Jouvenel apparently believes that democratic legitimacy is so widely agreed that "Argument about attribution has now, however, passed into history; the transitional period is over, and all that matters now is the realistic study of the 'what.'" Sovereignty (Chicago, 1957), p. 6.

(It is the absence of number (4) above that is usually noted when we dismiss the claims of the Soviet Union to be a democracy in any ordinary sense; the existence of political liberties forms a litmus test for democracy.)

The system is one which institutionalizes popular control of policy-makers; and this popular control may be called the broadest, most general, the highest-level principle of democracy, underlying and unifying the separate principles. It is not only that policy-makers are responsive to the public—any clever autocrat makes concessions to public sentiment; or that political authority is ultimately derived from the public—even the Roman Empire paid lip service to popular sovereignty; but the point is that a democracy provides the institutional machinery of popular control. As with the classical democracy of Athens, the system is thought of as a form of government, and at the same time is identified by and rigorously connected with certain specific institutions.<sup>3</sup> We do not imply that every democracy must push each of the principles to full application before we call the system democratic; in practice, it is a question of degree, of a system being more or less democratic in its complex of characteristics—for instance in the extent of the franchise or of the political liberties.

The operating principles can be cast in normative as well as neutral explanatory form. We can, that is, take each of the separate principles as moral imperatives—e.g., that popular control, political liberties and political equality should prevail—and in their normative form the principles provide a proximate justification for the system. There is more to justification than that, or this paper could stop here and now, but enough has been said to make the point that the theory of democracy is normative as well as explanatory. In this respect a comprehensive political theory is unlike a scientific theory; the former justifies as well as explains, whereas the scientific theory does not pass moral or esthetic judgment on the motion of atoms or the behaviour of bacteria.<sup>4</sup> A political theory may of course explain and condemn—as Marxists pass judgment on capitalist democracy, or as most of us would condemn the Soviet system—but condemnation is like justifying, in that it invariably has reference to moral discourse. The distinction between explanation and justification has frequently not been made in the history of thought; to explain has been thought to justify—as in teleological explanations, or in laissez-faire with its appeal to the assumed fact of natural harmony, or in those theories which purport to base themselves upon a scientific or rationalistic account of human nature.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Richard Wollheim, "Democracy," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 19 (1958), p. 226.

<sup>4</sup> By a "comprehensive" political theory I mean one which deals with a type of political system, in contrast to a "partial" theory, which may cover only a specific policy, or confine itself to empirical explanation alone, or to normative theory alone, or deal with the purposes that all political systems should pursue.

To call democracy a political system is also to say that it is a method of choosing leaders or rulers, and its full theory is thus both an explanation (by reference to institutionalized principles) of how the leaders are chosen, and a validation of that method of choice. This point of view has the advantage of giving us a ready method of classifying political systems, so that we can contrast democracy with other systems and their corresponding theories of leadership—for instance with hereditary aristocracy, or military rule, or that of Plato's Republic. It is not a system of registering and implementing the general or popular "will," which we might rather call Jacobinism and which could be done by a benevolent autocrat with the aid of a computing machine. There is plenty of room in the system outlined for the fact and art of leadership, the struggle for power, and the emergence of policy from the complex interplay of citizen and politician.

Everyone would subscribe to the view that the best should rule, but this gets us nowhere. The problem is how to find and agree on the credentials of the politically best, to identify such persons, to install them as rulers, to hold them accountable, to prevent their corruption by power. These are practical questions, thrust upon men by bitter experience, and are not primarily questions of philosophy or logic. Hence an important part of the justification of any political system consists of the answers it gives to the questions of leadership, questions somewhat neglected in traditional democratic theory.

II

Since history and experience are among the tests applied to judge a system, democracy too must stand on its record as well as upon its rational and moral justification in theory. In this paper, however, the empirical justification by reference to the record of democracies will not be explored. Neither will the question of empirical conditions for the success of democracy be discussed, though it too is relevant since theoretical superiority is not enough if we are to work the system and preach it to the world. (The only caveat one may enter is that democracy is certainly not immediately feasible all over the world. Neither for that matter is any alternative system. One should not be misunderstood on this—it has nothing to do with climatic, racial, or other determinism, but simply with conditions such as the requisite leadership, economic level, education, consensus, tradition, etc.) Neither do I propose to discuss the tendencies—whether logical or practical—for the principles and spirit of democracy to carry over from the political to other spheres, and so to become "social democracy"; nor the association of democracy with a capitalist or a socialist economy; nor questions of the psychological feasibility of democracy. These and other great questions must be put aside to concentrate upon the narrower, though surely central, questions of the logic of justification of democracy—i.e., what does it mean to justify a political system and what types of justification can we use?

The formal, rather than the informal policy-making system will be dealt with, i.e., the framework or model, not its detailed application to reality as the sociologist or group theorist, for instance, might reveal the actualities of day-to-day decision-making—the lines of power and influence; or as Marxists and others might speak of those behind the scenes making decisions or calling the tune. In judging the extent of democracy in a system we are, of course, perfectly entitled to ask how far the image corresponds to reality. Reform and opposition to reform of the system both presuppose such an inquiry. But that is not the same as constructing the model and justifying it.

Some people say that to desire explicit justification at all is a symptom of our declining belief in the "given" and of our "unhappy consciousness," and the famous flight of Minerva's owl at dusk is bound to be mentioned. Perhaps all this may be so. Certainly we do not feel impelled to justify our everyday habits and beliefs until doubts arise, and when put on the defensive we generally do seek to give reasons for our beliefs.<sup>6</sup> We do the same, however, when we take the offensive. A rising and confident democracy also justifies itself when challenging the status quo. One thinks of the democratic movement in the 19th century. I am not convinced that to want justification is a sign of decadence, or that beliefs wither when we can rationally justify them; whereas I do feel sure that to seek justification is a sign of intelligence, a perfectly proper and inevitable undertaking for man as he moves from myth to philosophy, from unexamined impulse to rational belief. Only if we take thought can we hope to take charge of our destiny.

<sup>5</sup> Explanatory theory could of course take other forms—e.g., it could be historical, or by reference to causality.

<sup>6</sup> Cf. F. M. Cornford, From Religion to Philosophy (New York, 1957), p. 80: "All theology is the result of doubt and criticism, not of simple and childlike faith, which has at no time felt the need for it."

One method of justifying political systems seems to me quite erroneous: that of justification by origin or source. This method has sometimes been used by political philosophers to account for the institution of political society in general, where it may be valid enough, as in Aristotle's remark that "the State comes into being for the sake of mere life." But social contract theorists have often been tempted to justify a particular form of government by the historical or hypothetical origins of government-in-general. To use this sort of justification is to fall into something close to the genetic fallacy, which Aristotle avoided by saying that "the State exists for the promotion of the good life" (i.e., regardless of what its lowly origins may have been). Origins neither validate nor invalidate any current beliefs or systems, any more than etymology dictates current word meanings. The genetic argument must be put aside; we are concerned with the present merits and validity of a system, and attention to its sources or origins will add nothing to its justification (though it may have lessons to teach on the conditions for the successful working of democracy).<sup>7</sup>

A second error is to justify a system by reference to its "intrinsic" purposes or "essence," a method which has also been common in the history of political thought. The defect here is that it is so misleading to speak of intrinsic purposes. All governments, by definition, govern, i.e., carry out the minimum function of maintaining order and security, but it is purpose beyond this of which we speak. It does not seem to make sense to say that a society, state, or political system as a whole, has an intrinsic or "natural" or "essential" purpose, other than those mundane and collective purposes which are given to it by the citizens and their rulers. In some social institutions the specific purposes are to the forefront—a joint stock company for instance, or a sports club or a traffic board—but there are others such as friendship, marriage, politics and government where purpose is too limited and too rational an explanation, and where purposes (and functions) as well as procedures change from time to time.<sup>8</sup>

A related fallacy must also be avoided, namely, that the type of political system follows logically from a statement of the purposes it should pursue. Pick any of the great names in the history of political philosophy—Hobbes for instance—and you will find a logical gap between the purpose of government as he outlines it and the form of government which he purports to deduce. It is perhaps the commonest logical fallacy in the history of political thought. (Similar fallacies are perpetrated when we start with an intrinsic or postulated human nature and purport to deduce the political system.)

Nevertheless, when all this is said, the language of purpose (as well as of social function) must be used. We might, for instance, specify the goals that a good political system should pursue and then we could justify democracy on the instrumental ground that it can best attain these goals. This is a more modest claim than that of deducing the system from intrinsic or posited goals. And it is at first sight a very promising approach to the question of justification. For instance, justice, happiness (including liberty), and improvement, are said by one philosopher to be the three accepted goals of a good political system. Democracy is then justified by showing (not deducing) that it can more nearly reach these goals than other systems can.<sup>9</sup> There is no doubt that this type of argument is very common; it appeals to our deep and proper concern with the substance as well as the form; and it makes a powerful case for democracy if certain difficulties are noted and can be avoided.

The difficulties with it are: (a) All such goals—e.g., happiness, peace, the good life, the common good, human dignity, the development of the personality, etc.—if they command universal agreement, are usually vague and at such high levels of generality that we can hardly say what they are until they are spelled out in intermediate and specific terms. They are so general that all can adopt them as desirable goals. It is extremely rare to find politicians or political philosophers disagreeing over their general aims. But when we get to the intermediate and more practical levels the agreement vanishes, <sup>8</sup> Some human behavior is hardly purposive at all—e.g., a quarrel or even a war, which may be "because of something, not for something." We may even speak of unconscious purposes.

<sup>9</sup> E. F. Garritt, Ethical and Political Thinking (Oxford, 1947).

<sup>7</sup> E.g., how we come to hold our beliefs has wide implications for education in a democracy.

and we find ourselves in the familiar disputes over policy that are typical of democracies, disputes that are over competing conceptions of the good as well as over means and over self- and sectional-interest. (b) Different democracies can and often do pursue different purposes, or the same democracy may pursue different purposes at different times, if by purposes we mean something as specific as the objectives of particular policies. The only common elements in all democracies are those of the system itself, and the effects upon purposes and policies which the democratic principles and procedures will have.<sup>10</sup> Indeed, non-democracies may also pursue many if not all of the same purposes as any given democracy. That is why it seems useless to try to distinguish forms of government by the criterion of purpose, as in the line: "Kings seek their subjects' good, tyrants their own."

The meaning of democracy as stipulated above has no reference to purpose except indirectly: purposes pursued could not, except with inconsistency, conflict with the operating principles or values of the system; and of course procedures often affect the content of policies. The purposes, whether individual or common, are left to be worked out in the system itself, and that is what disputes over public policy are about: they are not simply over means to agreed ends, Maritain and others to the contrary. It is quite impossible to believe that all men are agreed, in any politically meaningful sense, on the ends or purposes they should pursue (except as noted above, in the most general and least useful sense). The democratic system gives scope for (almost) any purposes.

The assumption behind this is presumably that purposes (and results) will take care of themselves in a democracy, and this is a very large assumption indeed. Naturally there can never be a guarantee that they will do so, and a democracy may be unwise and fall, or be wicked and deserve to fall. Infallibility is not for human beings and their institutions. That the people or their representatives can do no wrong is a grotesque assumption that has no place in democratic theory, though it is often made the basis of sneering criticisms of democracy.

<sup>10</sup> A lesser objection to this end-means justification is that it tends to make a political system merely of instrumental or expedient value, whereas a good system is surely good for itself—though not of course unconditionally good. (Loyalty to a political system should not—probably cannot—be absolute, i.e., always regardless of the content of policies.)

Several reasons account for the persistent tendency to define democracy in ideal terms: the ancient hankering that what we favour (democracy) will always be wise and right; the fact that democracy has in the course of history accumulated around it many of our best hopes for mankind, and been closely associated with many great popular reforms. Further, when we see an unpleasant reality we often define it out of sight as not "true" or "real," thereby insulating our faith and definition against shock and disillusion. But democracy does not answer all the questions of political philosophy, and certainly not the greatest of all—those concerned with "final" or "ultimate" ends.

In a very real sense the theory of democracy is not an ideology, like liberalism or socialism, say; not, that is, a body of doctrine in the grand manner dealing with the ends of government. Contemporary efforts to make democracy a kind of secular faith, an ideological substitute for religion, are I think mistaken and likely to fail. In a democracy many ideologies, many economic, social, religious and other outlooks may flourish (as indeed they do), and may do so without inconsistency so long as their principles and values are not antipathetic to the principles and values of democracy.<sup>11</sup> One may go deeper and say that in a sense all politics has of itself no content; it is an organizing principle, the principle of order and priorities and harmonizing; what it is about, what gives it content, is morality, economics, religion, education and so on.<sup>12</sup>

III

We can now move closer to the heart of our subject. The operating principles which make up the explanatory theory of democracy, discussed above, will not be further dealt with. Their validity is, one supposes, established by empirical investigation: Do democratic systems operate as the principles assert? Or are Marxists and others right who say that the democratic principles are a facade for class or élite rule?

What I shall discuss instead are the normative principles of democracy and the broad theory of justification in general. We may justify a democratic system in several ways.

(1) First, we may take the normative principles—political equality, etc.—as ultimate moral imperatives, as good in themselves, intrinsically good. Or we could take as our ultimate (our most general, basic and unifying principle) that there ought to be popular control of policy-makers; and if we grant this we could then accept the separate principles which are listed, as instrumental to that end. These might not follow in strict deductive logic, but we should be practically committed to their incorporation in some such machinery.

<sup>11</sup> Possibly Daniel Boorstin had this in mind when he wrote in The Genius of American Politics (Chicago, 1953), of the "un-American demand for a philosophy of democracy."

<sup>12</sup> Cf. E. Jordan, Theory of Legislation (Chicago, 1952), p. 73 and Ch. 7.

Some may call this method of justification an appeal to self-evidence or intuition; it is fashionable nowadays to despise both, and with considerable reason. There is clearly such a thing as a climate of opinion, a way of thinking of an age, and hence the kind of belief that one age finds self-evident or obvious seems doubtful to another. Even when we give reasons in support of a principle, the reasons that one age or culture finds convincing leave another cold. Nothing is quite so dead as obvious or self-evident truths which have ceased to command belief.

Since self-evident principles and moral beliefs—except again when they are very general or “high order”—appear to vary so much from age to age and place to place, some people dismiss them altogether and say that one is as good as another. While self-evidence is not a guarantee of truth—but of usage—the conclusion that one belief is as good as another is not one that necessarily follows from the varieties of moral experience.

Very often no doubt, our final choices of belief or of action at the end of the longest possible deliberative process, are of values which we make intuitively or call self-evident. Somewhere choice, like philosophy, must have a stop. But this is not to say that our choices are quite arbitrary and capricious, still less that they are all trivial preferences which we can shrug off as a matter of taste. We all come sometime to the hier stehe ich, some things are just right or wrong, however powerful the case against us, however weak our own case.

One is aware that this may be a dangerous ground of argument, justifying even the whirling dervish in his fanatical error; but it is also rich and fertile ground, often giving rise to and justifying the best in our heritage, for instance, belief in the rights of man. It was this kind of argument which condemned racial inequality long before the biologists could show scientifically that there were no inherent human differences between men of different shapes and colours.

Still, there are those who will incline to distrust this method of argument (as I do myself because it tends to make democracy an absolute value), and who may simply reject the principles of democracy as ultimates. If they are regarded as imperatives or “stop signs,” reasons are wanted why they are so regarded.

One immediate lesson follows, however, regardless of our opinion on self-evidence, namely, that to make a convincing case for a political system we have to put it in terms of the unexpressed assumptions of the age, the climate of opinion and belief to which we speak. No political case would go far today that did not take account of the scientific, urban, and industrial environment. Even cognition, though taking place inside the individual head, is social and affected by others. How much more so are our thinking and beliefs about politics. And this is highly relevant to any effective justification of democracy. In fact it makes our task easy, perhaps too easy. Being soaked in the attitudes and beliefs of democracy, the man on the street often believes in democracy for the most feeble of reasons. It is our job, as political philosophers, to see whether a case can be built which will stand critical analysis.

(2) The second method then is to make out a case for the separate and the underlying principles, giving arguments and reasons. The method here is to take the principles of popular control, political equality, majority policy-making, etc., and examine them in detail, weighing the pros and cons of each argument.<sup>13</sup> Such a proceeding has some resemblance to the cases which are heard daily in the law courts, where the evidence is not conclusive, but a decision has to be made that will satisfy the “reasonable man.” It resembles even more the usual debates over public policy, which involve judgments on not only facts and expectations, but also on moral principles. (Something more is said on this below.)

Behind the democratic system there clearly lies an assumption, perhaps many assumptions, about the nature of politics. Just as our criteria of reality help to determine what reality is, so our definition of politics inevitably forms part of our justification, and should therefore be made explicit. In ancient Athens, for instance, the assumption of the democrats was that politics was not an expert skill, like navigation, but something in which all were equally competent. (Plato’s view was the opposite, and so he argued that only a few were fit to rule.)<sup>14</sup>

<sup>13</sup> As in my Introduction to Democratic Theory (New York, 1960), Chs. 5 to 8.

<sup>14</sup> Just as we cannot call upon all the arguments for a direct democracy to support a representative system, so the latter is immune from some of the criticism aimed at the former—e.g., that of mob rule. Our problem is less that of the psychology of crowd behaviour than of mass manipulation.

Whatever the validity of this assumption for a direct democracy, we cannot use it in a representative democracy; and fortunately do not require it since deciding policies directly, and choosing the rulers, are two different—though some would call them related—skills.

There are many tricky problems here. One could still ask the question whether the common man can in fact judge his rulers wisely. When we put it that way we have at the back of our minds the old idea of the intelligent, informed, impartial voter deciding policy. We are then naturally driven back to consider some kind of test for “fitness” to vote, and we land in a bog of controversy about how we test the political wisdom of the voter. Voting is certainly not a scientific method of ascertaining political wisdom in the rulers, still less of finding wise policies; but there is no such scientific method open to man.

We must, I think, forget about tests of “fitness” to vote (or to rule), and fall back upon the nature of democratic politics; the parties, leadership and liberties which screen the candidates and find the political wisdom a system needs. Democracy then stands on the ground that periodic election and popular control of leaders (policy-makers) is likely to result in better rulers and policies than alternative methods. If we reject this, we are committed, like Plato, to some other method of identifying minority rulers and validating their rule.

In a direct democracy again, the argument of the democrat is that each citizen is the best judge of the public interest in making policy. Once again, in a representative system we do not require this assumption to the same extent, since the voters do not make policies. It will, however, be required to some extent, since presumably some policies (issues) will be judged by a proportion of voters on election day, and there will be some connection however indirect and complex between public opinion and policies. Being marked by popular control, and compelled to defer to the voters, democracy will have a tendency to bias government towards the popular interests. (Other tendencies work in other directions.) The notion of political feasibility reminds us that the democratic politician must carry the public with him. There is plenty of room in a democracy for political wisdom, and knowledge of the summum bonum, but it must be wedded to political persuasion.

Instead of assuming that the ordinary citizen is a competent judge of the public interest, the defender of a direct democracy could argue, for example, that the public good emerges almost automatically from the struggle over private interests, and that each is the best judge of his own interests. I do not recall ever having seen this argument put forward on behalf of ancient Athens. Something very like it is, however, put forward by interest-group theories of politics today, which thus give us a kind of corporate political version of laissez-faire. All equilibrium theories of politics make use of the same argument, which may not be quite as foolish as it sounds; but in any case we do not need it. We must fall back again upon the nature of democratic leadership, upon the debate and discussion, the complicated interplay of politician and public. The result is never an automatic equilibrium, but one that is constantly worked out afresh by the conscious efforts of many participants.

A completely sceptical argument for democracy may also be constructed: since no one really knows where the “true” interests of the individual or community lie, everyone ought to have a chance to help choose the rulers, and policy can do no better than go by the majority, just because it is a majority and as likely to be right as a minority.<sup>15</sup> Again, one need not stake anything on this argument—though it might have its appeal, at certain times and places.

(3) The third method is to justify by reference to the social and individual values realized by the democratic system. To take this approach is to trace the logical or practical consequences of the system—the values actually realized in any working democracy, even though they may not have been the purposes for which democracy was set up or which it keeps always before it. Good results are, in some moral theories—e.g., utilitarianism—the only moral justification, and while not going so far, nearly all would agree they are some justification. It would be an odd social or political theory that entirely ignored results. This type of justification (similar in its ends-means structure to that mentioned earlier) is very common, and certainly powerful; so much so that many people would regard it as quite sufficient.

Among the social values realized by democracy are: the peaceful adjustment of the disputes and conflicts that exist in any society (by treating conflict and the struggle for power as legitimate—even creative—and providing for its settlement); the closely related adaptability and peaceful social change (particularly necessary in a world of rapid technological and social change); and the peaceful and orderly succession of rulers. Many political philosophies have concerned themselves with prescribing ways to these high ends, and consequently in achieving them democracy, whatever its defects, may easily be regarded as superior to alternative systems. Judge Learned Hand put it thus: "For, abuse it as you will, it gives a bloodless measure of social forces—bloodless, have you thought of that?—a means of continuity, a principle of stability, a relief from the paralyzing terror of revolution."<sup>18</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Cf. Wollheim, op. cit. This argument also was not used by the Athenians.

To these commonly accepted values we may add: it is the system—other than anarchy, which is hardly a live option—with the minimum of coercion (not so much because the majority is presumed to favour every policy, as that policy emerges from discussion and pressure in which all may share); the promotion of diversity (which like knowledge or self-control is not unconditionally good, but good so far as it goes); the self-correctibility in the attainment of justice (a political system cannot guarantee that injustice will not be committed—an impossible political ideal—but democracy provides the means of redress); the political freedoms and rights which tend to "grow" into non-political fields. Other values, such as the promotion of science, may also perhaps be added. One does not maintain that every democracy is always successful in real life in turning up these results, but that they are, so to speak, built into the logical structure of democracy, which also provides the institutional means to their realization.

One may also think of individual values, such as the promotion of rational methods of thought, or regard free participation in politics and governing as a kind of moral self-education for the citizen—an argument as old as Aristotle. (Because of the free participation there is incidentally a wider range of leaders to draw from.) The effect upon citizens will always be one test of a political system. In general our mode of justification here is to look at the image of human nature, the qualities or characteristics regarded as admirable—e.g., independence, rationality, sympathy, tolerance, etc.—and to show that these are the qualities promoted and presupposed by democracy. A similar kind of justification is used by those—T. H. Green and others—who argue in terms of "maximum self-realization" and the like.

As with the separate principle, these systemic and resulting values may be taken as ultimates, and since some of them command nearly universal approval—e.g., peaceful succession—this method of justification carries much weight. But it would not of course carry any weight with one who rejected the values concerned.

(4) Again, as with the separate principles, we might go further and deeper and build a rational-empirical-moral case for the resulting values, and only then show that democracy best realizes them. Unlike the economist, the political philosopher cannot rest content with taking social and individual values as given, and confine himself to talking of "maximum net goal achievement." His view of rationality must be broader than the economists' means-ends definition; he must examine ends as well as means because they are always mixed together in politics.

Alternatively, the resulting values of democracy (peaceful change, diversity, means of redress, etc.) could be regarded as procedural or intermediate values, instrumental to more general values agreed upon alike by the democrat and his critic. If there is no such agreement, justification along this line is of course impossible.

(5) We may try to give the principles and values of the system support in philosophy. The mere mention of this raises at once the whole vexed question of the relationship of philosophy to political theory.

There are, to begin with, two conflicting and extreme views on the relationship. The first of those is that a close logical relationship invariably exists, so that we could by working out the implied ultimates in, say, metaphysics and epistemology, take our political theory back to a point of philosophic truth or falsehood; and conversely, from a philosophic position by a process of deduction we could arrive at the principles of a political theory. It follows, if this view is correct, that the theory of democracy might find support in a sound philosophy, and that unsound political theories could be exposed by showing their unsound philosophic basis.

The second, and conflicting view, is that philosophy has no necessary or close logical connections with a political theory, although admittedly the two may be associated in the same mind (that is, there may be psychological connections), or may go together in the same historical period (that is, the relation may be historical and more or less accidental). If the relationship is of this adventitious kind, it follows that democracy can find no support in philosophy.

Adherents of the first view argue that philosophic "absolutism" leads to autocracy; but strangely enough others argue that philosophic (or moral) "absolutism" is the necessary foundation of democracy. We are also given arguments that each of a rational philosophy, an empiricist epistemology, relativism, scepticism, pragmatism, instrumentalism, positivism, dialectical materialism and perhaps other philosophies supports (or undermines) democracy. The mind reels in the conflict of charge and counter-charge, and linguistic analysis comes along with the coup de grâce that no philosophy can provide a foundation for any political system, because that is not the sort of job that philosophy is equipped to do.

<sup>18</sup> The Spirit of Liberty, ed. Irving Dillard (New York, 1959), p. 76.

Plainly we have here a good deal of confusion and arguing at cross purposes. The debate is so heated that at times one wonders whether anybody listens to his critics. The relationship is probably extremely complex, if it can generate so much disagreement by good and able men, most of them only too anxious to defend what they understand by democracy.

IV

How are we to disentangle the threads and and weave a valid answer? It is impossible to examine each case of alleged relationship in a short space, so I can only state my position with desperate brevity.

For one thing, the attempts to prove the logical relationship, by classifying philosophers and schools as, say, absolutist and relativist and noting the correlation of philosophic beliefs with authoritarian or democratic political beliefs, are a long way from being convincing. The lines are blurred because democracy has not been a live issue, or a real alternative, throughout most of history, and the best that can be done is to say that the emphasis in the thought of this or that philosopher lay in the general direction of what today would be called democratic ideas. Further, the citing of persons is not conclusive because people may be inconsistent: men are often better than their philosophy—perhaps fortunately so.

For another, if the arguments for a close logical relationship from philosophy to political theory (and vice versa) are examined closely, they turn out in fact not to be arguments for the deductive relationship at all. The first impression given, it is true, is of such a relationship; but in the actual arguments one invariably finds a “toning down” of the tight connection. Russell, to take a typical case, argues that it is the “temper of mind” of empiricism that favours democracy—a quite different statement, which may or may not be true. “Temper of mind” is not deduction or logical implication. Kelsen, too, backs away from a rigorous connection and uses the looser language of “tendency.”

The close deductive relationship between philosophy and political theory (and vice versa)

is extremely uncommon, if not non-existent. (One is aware that if a political ingredient is inserted into the premises, a political conclusion may be drawn, but this is already to re-define “philosophy,” and make it political). Political and everyday reasoning is rarely deduction from philosophical or general premises; chains of syllogistic reasoning, while they exist here and there, are short and disconnected.<sup>17</sup>

There is undoubtedly a tendency for bodies of thought to cluster or “hang together” so that philosophic, educational, economic, religious and other beliefs all as it were buttress each other. That is why, for instance, we study political activity in the context of other beliefs. It would make little sense to study the political thought and activity of the Puritans without noting their religious beliefs; though this admittedly is an extreme case. Moreover, we (i.e., some people, sometimes) do consciously try to bring order and consistency to our varied beliefs, and are not content to weld them together by our tastes and personalities. (In a sense every philosophy tries to explain everything, by a kind of Parkinson’s Law of Ideologies.) But although we sometimes try to integrate our life with our metaphysics, and our different belief systems, the amount of logic or intellectual satisfaction demanded varies greatly among both philosophers and the unlearned.

If, like the Athenians, we treat government as a practical matter and defend democracy by listing its advantages, we do not come very close to philosophy. More precisely, perhaps, democracy may be combined with a variety of technical philosophical (i.e., metaphysical and epistemological) views. Political theory and philosophy occupy different territory. Even though we read into nature or reality (or history or experience) a moral component, at the most we can draw a conclusion which is relevant to our political theory. But though relevant, moral principles alone do not determine policy and still less a political system.

We can draw satisfaction from the looser connection of philosophy with politics: the great advantage is that we can all be democrats before we come to the end of the restless search for agreement on cosmic ultimates. As suggested earlier, even though we approach politics with a conception of the purpose or end that should be served, we still cannot deduce the political system, and can therefore accommodate our ultimates to a democracy that can be valued for instrumental reasons; as Acton agreed with Mill on liberty, though for quite different reasons. We may believe with Plato that Justice rules through every part of the cosmos and still stop short of his other belief that the political order can and should imitate it.

<sup>17</sup> Cf. Stephen E. Toulmin, The Uses of Argument (Cambridge, 1958). It seems to me that some “natural” law reasoning falls into the error of suggesting that reaching a moral decision is a matter of drawing a correct conclusion by a chain of deductive reasoning from a general moral principle; whereas we weigh evidence and arguments and then make a choice what to do. To make a decision or judgment is much more than deductive reasoning.

Why is it that the ethical relativist and the ethical absolutist may both be at home in a democracy? And if different moral philosophies can lie down together in one political system, then a fortiori general philosophies can do so. The reason is that politics is a practical art—its function is to arrange priorities and harmonize interests. Policies are usually if not always compromises, mixing many elements; seldom if ever ideal or a choice of good and evil; where they are moral then they are not only moral, and sometimes their connection with moral principles is slender or accidental. Political controversy is legitimate and normal even when we agree on moral principles. Policies are a matter of judging the components, not of applying a single standard like a yardstick. Short of abolishing politics, only relative justice is attainable, and hence political relativism does not imply moral relativism. Nor are public policies simply like private actions. Hence a knowledge of moral principles is not a guarantee of political wisdom—which explains why good men are often poor politicians, and personally bad men good politicians. Though politics “may indeed sometimes centre in a moral emphasis, political and moral argument are essentially different things.”<sup>18</sup>

The integration or inter-relatedness or “hanging together” of general and moral philosophy with political theory which we often find, is a loose kind of relationship, the only strictly logical part being that of compatibility, the usefulness of which is very limited. We must, that is, not define logic or even intelligence too strictly when we look for connections between human beliefs. There are, then, relationships that are loosely logical and rational, and people go too far who assert that they are only psychological or historical. But because relationships are loose, we never settle our political problems by a resort to philosophy.

If all this is granted we can more easily avoid the “hedgehog error”—the belief that we can discover one great principle, one unifying thought or vision that will unlock the mysteries of the universe and from which we can deduce everything else. We can not, in the present state of our ignorance, make a purely logical synthesis of human knowledge that will stand the cutting edge of analysis.

Our elders were (and some of them still are) full of hopes and ambitions of achieving a ‘synthesis’ of knowledge; science, religion, art, the practice of personal and political life were to become an orderly pattern, dominated by an agreed philosophical outlook. But it looks as if we were becoming increasingly conscious of diversities and discontinuities in our worlds of thought and experience. . . . The real problem is that our diverse worlds of thought do not make sense as a coherent unity, and probably cannot and will not do so for some time to come.<sup>19</sup>

This being a frustrating state of affairs, men turn in many directions to find a forcible synthesis or unity, and others give up philosophy altogether for the analysis of language or for existentialism. As for me, my position is that the debate is still open—as it is on other great questions, such as the metaphysics of science and its relevance, if any, for human life. The very vexations of the unsettled debate over philosophy and political theory emphasize the importance of keeping the channels open for all contributions, and this forms in itself no small justification for democracy and its concomitant liberties and public discussion. (This would not be a justification however, for those who believe they already have Truth, but instead the political question would be—as it was for Plato—to trace out the obligations of their premises.)

V

Finally, part of the defence of democracy will always rest upon the deficiencies of alternative systems. This will always be a cogent defence, since intelligent action presupposes that we understand, compare, and appraise alternatives.<sup>20</sup> As a defence it gains strength too from the consideration that our choice is never between ideal systems: if we do have a choice it is between democracy and accepting the credentials of some type of self-appointed minority rulers.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Aurel Kolnai, “The Moral Theme in Political Division,” Philosophy, Vol. 35 (July, 1960), p. 237. It is also true that a knowledge of moral principles is often not a sufficient guide to personal duty in concrete situations—indeed the whole subject of casuistry (in its original sense) takes its raison d’être from this very difficulty; hence too a partial reason why moral philosophers are often no better than anyone else: knowing the rules and knowing how to apply them (to say nothing of being motivated to apply them) are different things.

<sup>19</sup> Dorothy M. Emmet, Function, Purpose and Powers (London, 1958), p. 219.

To paraphrase F. W. Maitland slightly, one could say that the most powerful argument for democracy is based on the necessary ignorance of our masters. This—like the arguments drawn from the historical record of democracy and of other systems—will always be persuasive, because most of the problems of politics are practical, not philosophic. Politics arise from life, not logic. Bryce once wrote, in Modern Democracies: "The facts and forces that have created Popular Government are partly of the Practical and partly of the Theoretic order." And the same is true of the total justification of democracy, or indeed of any other political system or public policy.

It is at this practical point that philosophers from Plato onwards have been weak, with their belief that the (politically) best could be found, their rule validated and accepted, and their character remain incorruptible by office; and after all it is this belief, sublime often, naive always, that alternative systems, without political liberties and periodic elections, ask us to approve. It is too tall a story for us, the disillusioned generations.

It is at this point too, that democracy is so strong: it implies and institutionalizes a distrust of those with power, by offering them competition and criticism, and by providing for their removal. That is why Niebuhr's defence will always be a good one: "man's capacity for justice makes democracy possible; but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary." The same mixture of hope and pessimism, of idealism and realism, is found in James Madison and his view of human nature. It is an appropriate outlook for democrats, avoiding cynicism on one side and Utopianism on the other.

The total justification for democracy is thus a mixed case, combining the rational, the factual, the moral.<sup>22</sup> Being mixed, it compels all of us, if we want to defend democracy, to be both political scientists and political philosophers. To make such a case, to come down on the side of the weight of the evidence and the argument, involves much more than avoiding logical fallacies, or special pleading, or the rationalisation of personal preferences. There is both valid and invalid reasoning about political systems as in every type of discourse, and each has its appropriate criteria, and canons of evidence.<sup>23</sup>

Problems still remain, even when we have made the most comprehensive justification, and ranged over territory not explored in this paper.<sup>24</sup> For one thing, justification is not proof, not a conclusive demonstration, after which we can write Q.E.D. as after a theorem in Euclid, nor yet one that gives a measurable probability of truth as in much of science. It is not proof or statistical probability because it always depends upon values. The case does not compel belief but favors it. It is a matter of judgment—of weighing imponderables, of decision and choice—and there are no rules for this except in the routine case.

We may never know for certain that our political theory and system are the best, but we are better able to establish that others are worse. In this perhaps we are not very different from the natural scientists in many fields. Justification, like explanation or even description, is selective and always incomplete. In any event, however provisional our case for democracy, it must serve well enough to act upon.

For these reasons not everyone will be convinced; the democrat may not convince his adversaries but he may make disciples. Not

<sup>22</sup> Cf. Douglas N. Morgan, "On Justifying Political Action," Ethics, Vol. 71 (October, 1960), pp. 1-13.

<sup>23</sup> Cf. Stephen Toulmin, Reason in Ethics (Cambridge, 1950), pp. 67-101. Cf. also Florian Znaniecki, The Social Role of the Man of Knowledge (New York, 1940), p. 189, "... the choice between any given theories is (not) subjectively arbitrary. For there are objective standards by which inductive theories can be compared and their relative validity estimated. Of two theories, A and B, bearing on the same empirical field, if B solves all the problems A has solved and also other problems which A could not solve, B is superior to A in theoretic validity, both from the rational and from the empirical point of view."

<sup>24</sup> It will be observed that I have not attempted defences of democracy in terms of theology, religion, natural law, natural rights, psychology, economic progress, etc.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. F. H. Knight, Intelligence and Democratic Action (Harvard, 1960), p. 145.

<sup>21</sup> Possibly we could add as a further argument the impracticability of other systems: "... under modern conditions it is the only working possibility. No member of an emancipated industrial society will put up with political tutelage," Wollheim, op. cit., p. 242. (The last remark is however excessively optimistic, even false.)

everyone will accept the values which the democrat holds, and some of those who do accept them might argue they are better realized in some other system. We may apply to democracy, perhaps, what Pascal said of the argument from design: Nature proves God only to those who already believe in Him on other grounds.

So we can say that acts of faith may be demanded. But again the same is true with respect to any political system, and as for me, democracy strains my credulity less than do the alternatives. So, but not perhaps in a religious sense, we come in the end to a "justification by faith" or, as it is sometimes put, to those ultimate beliefs and ideals which we cannot wholly validate by rational means (though they are not thereby irrational). Machiavelli wrote wisely when he said in his Discourses: "There are in fact many useful truths of which a wise man will have knowledge without their having in themselves such clear reasons for their being so as to be able to convince others."

VALUES AND INTERESTS*

VERNON VAN DYKE
University of Iowa

Most political scientists concern themselves in one way or another with values and interests. References to values are ubiquitous in the literature, and one need only cite such terms as interest groups, the public interest, the common interest, and the national interest to recall the frequent reference to interests.

The two words have already been discussed a great deal.<sup>1</sup> Even so, there is considerable confusion about their meaning and about the interrelationships of their meaning. Rather than serve as effective tools for incisive analyses, they frequently lead into intellectual traps; and rather than serve as clear symbols for communication, they frequently lead to misunderstanding. These difficulties have been especially great in the field of foreign affairs, where so much has been made of the concept the national interest.

My aim here is to search for greater conceptual clarity, and to identify the roles that scholars and others can properly play in relation to various sorts of values and interests; at the same time I hope to show that some of the conceptions that have been employed in discussing the national interest and interest groups have shortcomings both in terms of their clarity and in terms of the role that they permit scholars to play. I propose first to establish a perspective from which values and interests can be viewed—a perspective that makes the two words virtually synonymous and enables them to be discussed in terms of means and ends, or of causal or functional relationships. Next I propose to examine the epistemological bases for knowledge about values and interests, indicating how they can be identified or calculated or clarified, whether for practical or for analytical purposes. And finally I will point out what seem to be weaknesses and difficulties in conceptions of interest advanced by Hans Morgenthau and the Bentleyans. A clearer and more useful meaning of the term, and a clearer and more useful role for scholars, will, I hope, emerge.

I. SEQUENTIAL AND HIERARCHICAL RELATIONSHIPS

It is a common feature of the words values and interests that they apply to items in a series, like rungs on a ladder or links in a chain; more broadly, they apply to a sequence of stages or states. A value may be endorsed either for its own sake or because it contributes to a second value; the second may be endorsed either for its own sake or because it contributes to a third; and so on. One interest may be pursued because it is held to be inherently or intrinsically worth pursuing; or it may be pursued because it is thought to promote the achievement of another interest.

In many cases this is not an "either-or" proposition. A value or interest may be endorsed both because it is thought to be self-justifying and because its promotion may contribute to a second value or interest; the second may be endorsed for a similar mixture of reasons; and so on.

Thus health in a given city may contribute to health in the country, which may contribute to greater productivity, which may contribute to greater power, which may contribute to greater security, which may contribute to the survival and development of the social order, which may contribute to human dignity and liberty. Each item in the sequence might be judged good in itself or good because it contributes to the next item, or good for both reasons.

Various terms are used to describe this situation. Especially if the reference is to purposes or ends or objectives or interests, they are likely to be classified as "immediate," "intermediate," and "ultimate," or perhaps as "proximate" and "remote" or "ulterior." Dahl and Lindblom classify goals as "prime" and "instrumental";<sup>2</sup> if values and interests are thought of as goals, they too can be classified as prime and instrumental. Harold Lasswell and others speak of "goal values," which suggests the term "instrumental values." Ralph Barton Perry classifies values and interests into categories labelled "independent" and "dependent."<sup>3</sup> His focus is on the "independent" value or interest, i.e., on the far end of the series—on the goal value that is regarded as desirable for its own sake; presumably this value is freely chosen and therefore "independent." Given the "independent" value or interest, "dependent" values or interests remain to be selected, and they are selected at least in part on the basis of their utility or desirability as instruments. This use of the terms independent and dependent is implied in every day usage. For example, if the question is whether it is in the American interest to build up its armed power, the answer might be that it depends on the prospect that more armed power will promote greater security. If it will, then the enhancement of armed power may be a dependent interest.

* For comments on an earlier version of this article I wish to thank Lewis A. Froman, Jr., Charles B. Hagan, Duncan MacRae, Jr., and Glendon Schubert.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Ethel M. Albert, Clyde Kluckhohn, et al., A Selected Bibliography on Values, Ethics, and Esthetics in the Behavioral Sciences and Philosophy, 1920-1958 (Glencoe, 1959); and Glendon Schubert, The Public Interest, A Critique of the Theory of a Political Concept (Glencoe, 1960). See also Philip E. Jacob and Jame J. Flink, "Values and Their Function in Decision-Making," American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 5, Supplement (May, 1962), pp. 5-38; this thoughtful and stimulating study became available after I had completed the present article.

<sup>2</sup> Robert A. Dahl and Charles E. Lindblom, Politics, Economics, and Welfare (New York, 1953), p. 26.

Obviously, if a value is instrumental it can also be called a means or method. Similarly, an immediate end or objective may be pursued as a means of promoting the achievement of another end farther along in the series. A dependent interest is championed as a means of promoting an independent interest. In any series of these sorts everything leading up to the end can be thought of as means.

In place of means and ends, some prefer to speak of conditions and consequences. Under this usage conditions are analogous to means, and consequences are analogous to ends—or at least the consequences are farther along in the series and may be thought of as ends. In other words, instrumental values and goals, immediate ends, and dependent interests may all be thought of as analogous to conditions through which or on the basis of which consequences come about.

The idea of a series in all of the above usages suggests the idea of cause and effect. In so far as anything is instrumental, it is—or is analogous to—a cause. If the goal-value is American security, armaments of certain sorts have instrumental value and can be thought of as a condition or cause of security. If the prime goal of a person is to live, food becomes an instrumental goal and can be thought of as a condition or cause of survival. Achievement of a dependent interest in being elected Governor may operate as a means or a condition or a cause in bringing about the achievement of the independent interest—election as President. In any process comprising a sequence of states, features of each state may be thought of as causing the development of the next succeeding state.

Instead of using any of the above sets of terms, some describe the factors that are relevant to any development as variables, and they are likely to classify variables as dependent or independent, just as Perry classifies interests. But in the two contexts the meanings of the words get reversed, an independent variable being analogous to a cause and a dependent variable being analogous to an effect. In truth, however, those who speak of variables commonly speak of functional rather than causal relationships, dependent variables being functions of independent variables.

Quite apart from their sequential relationships, values and interests also fall into hierarchical relationships. This implies the obvious point that values and interests do not all fit on the same means-ends chain. Rather, different sorts of values and interests belong on different chains, some of which are likely to intersect. Sometimes pursuit of values in one series may interfere with pursuit of values in another series; e.g., a government that seeks both higher scales of living and greater military power may have to make a choice, at least of emphasis. It can perhaps keep the conflict at a minimum by finding measures that promote both values simultaneously or by identifying different areas of activity in each of which one of the values can be pursued without adverse effect on the other. But where conflict exists, a choice is likely to have to be made, effective for a shorter or a longer period.

There is a reference above to the possibility of considering values and interests as goals. Let this possibility now be stressed. When we use the language of means and ends, we say that means can themselves be ends and that ends can be means. Both means and ends can be goals. The goal of a student may be to get credit in a course as a means of achieving another goal or end—graduation from college. When we speak of conditions and consequences, we can also say that the creation of certain conditions is a goal, sought as a means of achieving another goal, i.e., the consequence. When we speak of causal or functional relationships, similar statements are possible. A goal can be defined as an event that an actor plans or seeks to bring about or prevent, or a state of affairs that he plans or seeks to establish, maintain, or change.

<sup>3</sup> Ralph Barton Perry, Realms of Value, A Critique of the Theory of a Political Concept (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1954), p. 79.

II. CRITERIA OF CLASSIFICATION

The fact that the words values and interests apply to items in a series or to links in a chain (or network of chains) suggests difficulty when it comes to classification. By definition, the final item in a series or the final link in the chain represents a "goal value" or "independent interest." But, as a normative matter, is there any objective or scientific way of determining which items or links—which goals—should be ultimate? As a descriptive matter, are there ways of determining which goals are in fact ultimate for given actors, or are treated as if they were? If so, on what basis and within what limits? Is there a reasonable basis on which the scholar can classify values or interests simply for analytical purposes, even if his classification cannot be validated or cannot be shown to reflect reality in any way?

Similar questions can be asked concerning the hierarchical relationships of values and interests. If a conflict exists between what are admittedly goal values or independent interests, is there an objective way of determining which is the more important?

The question whether there is an objective way of validating goal values has been debated especially. The issue is the old one concerning the relationship between fact and value, between the is and the ought. No one has yet succeeded, and it seems unlikely that any one will succeed, in developing a reliable method of determining what ought to be for its own sake—what is self-justifying. As Perry says,

There do not appear to be any interests that are inherently independent rather than dependent. The basic biological interests may play either role: one may live to eat and drink or eat and drink to live. Games may be played for themselves or for money. Even self-preservation may be a dependent interest; otherwise there would be no meaning in the question, What is it that makes life worth living?<sup>4</sup>

Similarly, a candidate for office may champion certain principles in order to win an election, or may seek to win in order to champion the principles. And self-preservation is no more a categorical imperative for a corporate entity (e.g., a nation-state) than it is for an individual human being. The simplest statement, and apparently a correct one, is that, consciously or not, actors assume or postulate the goal values or independent interests that guide their behavior—sometimes seeking to justify themselves by references to alleged natural law or to religious injunction. If they try to prove the validity or rightness of goal value "A" (other than by an appeal to faith), they apparently can do it only on the assumption that it is a means of promoting goal value "B," and this automatically forces the consideration of "A" as an instrumental value.

The second question—whether as a descriptive matter there are ways of determining which goals are in fact ultimate for given actors—offers somewhat greater possibilities, but nevertheless here too there are difficulties. The fact is that people rarely proceed on the basis of a well considered and consciously entertained comprehensive conception of their values or interests. The point is implicit in a study of human motivation by A. H. Maslow.<sup>5</sup> He speaks of motivation in terms of needs, suggesting a number of categories: physiological needs, safety needs, love needs, esteem needs, the need for self-actualization, the need for the preconditions of need satisfaction (e.g., for freedom and justice), and the desire to know and understand. People have motives (goals, values, interests) in a number of such categories, but are rarely conscious of them all. When their physiological interests are threatened, concern for them is likely to be a controlling guide to behavior; temporarily, at least, they may become ultimate interests. When a reasonable degree of satisfaction for the physiological needs is assured, they are more or less taken for granted, and attention is directed to, e.g., safety needs. When satisfaction for these can also be taken for granted, they are more or less forgotten and attention shifts to another category. Maslow suggests that, in principle, there is an endless set of categories of motives or needs (goals, values, interests), new types emerging or developing as others come to be substantially satisfied. He pictures men shifting their attention back and forth among the various categories, depending on circumstances—now being guided by an "ultimate" interest (my term, not Maslow's) in knowledge or understanding, perhaps, only to shift suddenly to an "ultimate" interest, say, in physiological or safety needs if a threat to life develops. Preoccupation with one sort of interest may lead to a neglect of another sort; pursuit of peripheral interests may jeopardize those that are fundamental. The point has its parallel in politics. Time and again in the conduct of American foreign relations, for example, interests have been pursued in normal times that did not appear to be the ones that really mattered when a crisis occurred. Presidents and Secretaries of State tend to speak of those values or interests that are threatened or that seem to be in need of attention, and they tend to forget about values and interests that seem to be assured. Sometimes there has seemed to be complete unawareness of certain values and interests and complete insensitivity to developing dangers.

<sup>5</sup> A. H. Maslow, "A Dynamic Theory of Human Motivation," in Chalmers L. Stacey and Manfred F. DeMartino (eds.), Understanding Human Motivation (Cleveland: Howard Allen, 1958), pp. 28ff.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., p. 51

To a limited extent there are ways of checking statements by actors concerning their interests or values or goals. In every culture certain rules of behavior or patterns of activity come to be associated with the pursuit of specific goals; and when the statements and the activities of an actor all point in the same direction, goals (at least those pursued at the time) can be inferred with some degree of probability. Along the same line, certain criteria for identifying goals are suggestive. Under a common view goals are "recognized as the points at which prolonged patterns of activity cease with comparative suddenness."<sup>6</sup> Another statement, and a more useful one, is:

We call something a goal not because it is a natural terminating point of movements but because movements persist towards it and vary in accordance with the changes in it and with conditions that lead to it.<sup>7</sup>

The implication is that if we see where prolonged patterns of activity cease, or if we see that movements persist and vary as indicated, we will have identified a goal. But such criteria could be used to identify instrumental goals as well as prime goals. According to them, crossing the goal line in a football game is a goal, and so is winning the game itself. Further, the use of such criteria may or may not provide a very sure basis for identifying broad and general goals, such as the promotion of peace, security, justice and freedom. In complex situations the same movements or activities (e.g., building up the military power of the country) might indicate the pursuit of either war or peace—or, for that matter, prosperity or victory in the next election.

The upshot is that though it may sometimes be possible to identify, from his behavior, the goals that an actor pursues and to determine which of them is (are?) ultimate, this cannot always be done. In many cases it is plain that actors themselves have not clearly and consciously identified their ultimate goals.

Considerations of this sort commend the view that a goal is "an incentive that is chosen by the investigator as a reference point for describing observed behavior."<sup>8</sup> In other words, if we think of a series of desired events or states of affairs, the identification of the one to be picked out as the goal may be rather arbitrary, designed to suit the purposes of the investigator rather than to be a reflection of a factual situation. The investigator simply breaks into the means-ends chain at a point where he finds it useful to do so; and then for analytical purposes he treats the final link as ultimate, and all links leading toward it as instrumental.

III. THE IDENTIFICATION OR CALCULATION OF INTERESTS

Implied in what has already been said is the fact that it is frequently difficult both to identify the interests that actors do pursue and to determine those that they should pursue. The problem is obviously of concern to scholars, especially to those who are policy-oriented and who seek to enhance capacities for rational action. I will discuss it first in relation to independent interests and then in relation to dependent interests.

If the issue concerns strictly the desirability of a goal value or independent interest, then (as indicated above) no reliable method—i.e., no method that produces the same result for all qualified persons who use it—is available. That something should be desired for its own intrinsic goodness or because it is self-justifying is an argument that no one has been able to establish by evidence and logic sufficient to command the assent of all who look and listen. There is (and probably can be) no theory of ends or theory of interests if by this is meant verifiable thought about what ought to be for its own sake.

This means that methods other than scholarship are to be employed in selecting the goal values or independent interests that are to be pursued; e.g., by governments. Perhaps they will be the methods prescribed in some constitutional or legal arrangement—or the methods of civil or international war. One of the assumptions on which democracy rests is that the preferences of the majority should prevail. Whatever the method of determining goal values, the likelihood is that attitudes reflecting them will be laden with affect. They will be matters of principle, intrinsically desirable, sustained by emotion. At the extreme they will not be open to discussion.

<sup>6</sup> Raymond B. Cattell, Personality and Motivation Structure and Measurement (Yonkers-on-Hudson, New York: World Book Co., 1957), p. 440.

<sup>7</sup> R. S. Peters, The Concept of Motivation (New York: Humanities Press, 1958), p. 122; cf. pp. 5-6.

<sup>8</sup> Dalbir Bindra, Motivation: A Systematic Re-interpretation (New York, 1959), p. 54.

Nevertheless various tasks are open to the scholar in connection with goal values or independent interests. One of them is conceptual analysis. The scholar can bring reason and logic to bear in analyzing statements of goal values or independent interests with a view to identifying and reducing vaguenesses and ambiguities. If it is said, for example, that the major goal values in conducting American foreign relations should be to provide for the survival of the nation and the integrity of its territory, institutions, and culture, the scholar can analyze the crucial terms to see whether they convey clear meaning and, if so, what it is. There are bound to be intellectual difficulties in connection with any such broad formulations, and there are opportunities for real service in identifying them and seeking to reduce them.

Further, the scholar can also ask about the practical implications of the endorsement of various goal values: what are the actual or potential risks and costs of pursuing each of them? Perhaps the pursuit of one will turn out to be incompatible with the pursuit of another, or extremely costly in terms of values in other realms. Again there is an opportunity for significant service in identifying implications, for when people are made to see what their value position entails, they may choose to shift to a different position.

To express approximately the same point in a different way, the scholar may seek to influence the choice of independent interests. He can do this not by asserting that he knows best what they ought to be but rather by stimulating and contributing to clarity of thought on the part of those who make the choice. The suggestion was made above that ordinarily individual and corporate actors (including governments and governmental agencies) do not act on the basis of an articulated, comprehensive and coherent conception of their independent and dependent interests. They do not fully know their own minds, if indeed the relevant questions have entered their minds at all. They tend to fasten on certain goals and endow them with affect without fully exploring the implications and the possible alternatives. The scholar thus has an opportunity to stimulate more or less detached thought, and he may lead an actor to re-examine his assumptions concerning his independent interests. As a result some interests may be removed from the category and others placed in it.

It is probably desirable for scholars to try to get the realm of goal values or independent interests restricted to the narrowest possible confines. If it were foreordained that certain values were necessarily goal values—if a given list of interests were inherently and intrinsically independent—there would be no choice about the matter. But we have seen that this is not the case. It is difficult to imagine any value or interest that cannot be considered instrumental or dependent. Recall, for example, the alleged values or interests that should guide American foreign policies: the survival of the nation and the integrity of its territory, institutions, and culture. Whatever the phenomena or the qualities identified by these words, they are not necessarily goal values or independent interests. All of them can readily be considered as instrumental values or dependent interests. Territorial integrity is in fact very often regarded as instrumental to survival. The survival of the nation could quite plausibly be regarded as instrumental to the survival of other cherished institutions, or as instrumental to the survival of the culture. The culture might be thought worth preserving because it provides the fullest known opportunity for the development of the potentialities of individual human beings. As each interest or value is shifted into the instrumental category, two reciprocal advantages may be gained: the role of emotion in considering the interest is likely to be reduced, and the role of objective inquiry is likely to be increased.

If the present analysis is correct, those who seek to reduce the role of conflict in human affairs should be especially alert to the conception of independent interests that guides actors who are in contention. It seems highly probable that all kinds of actors have engaged in all kinds of struggle, including war, on the basis of a conception of independent interests that they would have rejected if they had thought more incisively and clearly. Certainly the states that have been primarily responsible for launching the major wars of this century have lost more than they gained, and in nuclear wars all belligerents might suffer net losses of truly catastrophic proportions. One way of reducing the likelihood of irrational war or other costly struggle is to keep asking one or both contending parties why they do what they do—to keep trying to force them farther out toward the ultimates on their means-ends chains. What was beyond discussion as a self-justifying end may then become discussable. Perhaps one party or the other may then decide that the probable consequences of its course of action are unacceptable. Conceivably the contending parties may find that their means-ends chains intersect, i.e., that they have a common interest; and in the light of the common interest (taken as independent) the courses of action leading to conflict can be reexamined in a search for common dependent interests.<sup>9</sup> This type of thing seems to be going on, for example, in Western Europe, where the question is, why seek jealously to maintain sovereign independence; and many of those who manage to transfer the principle of sovereign independence from the category of independent interest to the category of dependent interests are apparently concluding that the alleged dependent interest is not, after all, a very compelling one. A similar development seems to be occurring in interest groups that are in contention in the United States over the school segregation issue. If a man says that he wants segregation or integration simply because he wants it (that is, if he treats it as an independent interest), the opportunities for helpful objective inquiry are rather limited; but if he identifies a goal that will allegedly be served by segregation or integration, then it may be possible to determine whether his notion of the means-ends relationship is correct.

The statement is made above that a reduction of conflict can sometimes be sought by forcing the contending parties farther out on their means-ends chains. The reverse of this procedure also sometimes applies. When ultimate goals are in irrevocable conflict, the appropriate strategy for reducing conflict is presumably to draw attention away from them and to look for more immediate interests that, hopefully, may be shared.<sup>10</sup>

The foregoing is addressed to independent interests and to the role of the scholar in relationship to them. If, conversely, the problem is to identify or calculate interests of a strictly dependent sort, there are additional possibilities. The scholar, the actor himself, or any observer—all may feel qualified to take a stand. So far as the scholar is concerned, he has the same opportunities that he has in connection with independent values or interests; that is, he can seek to clarify the meanings and the logical and practical implications of propositions advanced. And he may also be able to do much more. As is pointed out above, if a precise goal value or independent interest is given (either in fact or hypothetically), the problem of identifying the dependent interest(s) is the problem of identifying the means that will bring about the desired end, the conditions that will produce the desired consequence, the cause that will produce the desired effect, or the variables associated with the desired functional outcome. Obviously, this is an area in which objective inquiry is possible, perhaps leading to conclusive proof. Studies can be made on various sorts of relevant questions, e.g., the costs of employing various alternative possible means, the degree of probability that the means will produce the desired result, the speed with which the result will be achieved, etc. On the basis of such studies it may be possible to say flatly whether a given dependent interest is a "true" interest, e.g., whether it will in fact promote the independent interest more surely or more quickly or more economically or with fewer risks than the available alternatives.

What the scholar can properly do for analytical purposes, as described above, has naturally had some influence on thoughts about what he can do for practical purposes. Thus the suggestion has been made that more of the practical problems of politics and government should be turned over to experts of one sort or another. For example, the well known distinction has been made between "politics" and "administration," the suggestion being that politics is the realm of choice among values and that administration is (or should be made to be) the realm where technical expertise is relied upon to promote the values that have been politically selected. Suggestions have been made, too, that in other areas greater reliance should be placed on the professionals (e.g., the career Foreign Service Officers) and less on the amateurs. At the extreme, the suggestion would be that virtually all governmental decisions should be the work of the expert: that he should simply be told what the goal value(s) or independent interest(s) is (are) and then be allowed to identify the appropriate instrumental values or dependent interests.

This line of thought has much to commend it; nevertheless, it cannot be pressed too far. The solution of public problems is not always a matter of specialized expertise. Clear cut situations of the sorts assumed above for analytical purposes do not always obtain in practice. In practical affairs more than one goal value is usually involved, with nothing to indicate clearly their relative importance or urgency. Means are usually not separated neatly from ends. Precisely the same thing may be both goal value and an instrumental value; an actor may want something because he considers it intrinsically desirable, and he may also want it because it will contribute to the achievement of something else that is also desirable. Further, where a number of persons are involved it is likely that what is an instrumental value for one will be a goal value for another. Moreover, though reliable methods may exist for selecting means in connection with rather narrow problems, the task is more difficult in relation to problems of a broad and general sort.<sup>11</sup> If the object is to maximize the firepower of the foot soldier, there will presumably be a fairly reliable means of choosing between two rifles; at least, the question is unlikely to be submitted to a vote, above all not to voters who have little or no relevant knowledge or experience. Even if the object is the broader one of reducing unemployment, the question whether to attempt it through a program of government spending or through cutting taxes so as to encourage private spending may be susceptible to answer on a fairly reliable scientific basis; but one need only mention the problem to make it obvious that this is a situation where goal values and instrumental values are likely to be inextricably intermixed in practice. If the problem is to maintain or create a world environment in which the American people will have a maximum opportunity to develop their way of life as they please, the scientific basis for a choice of means is still less reliable. The number of relevant variables is so large and the interrelationships among them are so obscure that reliable prediction could not be counted on even if goal and instrumental values could be kept neatly separated; and, of course, this neat separation could not be achieved. When judgment is to be exercised (i.e., when a decision is to be made on the basis of inadequate knowledge of relevant relationships) there is a fair prospect that the greater knowledge of the specialist will enable him to judge more soundly. But if he seems to claim a prescience that he does not have he may discredit himself. Given the necessity of some guessing, he may wish to have affairs so arranged that those who will enjoy or suffer the consequences share in the process and the responsibility.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. Gordon W. Allport, "Normative Compatibility in the Light of Social Science," in Abraham Maslow (ed.), New Knowledge in Human Values (New York, 1959), pp. 140-41.

<sup>10</sup> Charles Frankel, The Case for Modern Man (New York, 1955), pp. 78-84.

Much depends on the mix in connection with any given decision. Except perhaps for the purest of independent interests, the position is scarcely tenable that "the public interest, so far as the United States is concerned, is and can only be what the public, what mass opinion, says it is."<sup>12</sup> After all, a great many interests are of the dependent sort, subject to determination by more or less reliable methods. But conversely, except for the purest of dependent interests, the position is scarcely tenable that the interest of an actor is what the expert says it is. For analytical purposes the scholar can consider all interests dependent. But for the purpose of practical decision-making the value element must ordinarily be recognized. And the appropriate roles of the expert and the others are likely to vary depending on the relative emphasis on the two elements involved.

IV. Interests IN CURRENT USAGE

Those who dwell on values are usually alert to the problems discussed above, though there is a tendency to assume that all values are necessarily normative (i.e., goal) and not instrumental. Problems more commonly arise where the emphasis is on the concept interests.

Let it be recalled that the actor himself (e.g., a person, a group, a government), the scholar, or any observer may advance propositions concerning the actor's interests, and that the interests may be either independent or dependent. Independent interests are assumed or postulated or accepted on faith; and whatever will serve them is a dependent interest.

Let it be noted, also, that the word interests is commonly modified by various terms, e.g., national, public, common, which create difficulties; and much of the discussion of interests has concerned the meaning of the adjectives rather than the meaning of the noun. We are not here concerned with the adjectives.

Interest as a Guide to Foreign Policy. Where interest is the subject of discussion in connection with foreign affairs—and particularly in the writing of Hans Morgenthau concerning the national interest—much of the trouble is definitional rather than epistemological; and the examination of such trouble is not central to the present purpose. Nevertheless, brief attention to the matter is called for, if only to identify the problem.

In developing what he calls a theory of international politics Morgenthau says that this is "inherently a world of opposing interests." "The main signpost that helps political realism to find its way through the landscape of international politics is the concept of interest defined in terms of power."<sup>13</sup> Morgenthau repeatedly uses the formula, "interest defined in terms of power." But, so far as I have been able to discover, he does not himself advance a definition explicitly, whether or not in terms of power. In truth, he seems almost deliberately to accentuate the vagueness of the key terms. Thus he says,

<sup>11</sup> See Charles E. Lindblom, "The Science of 'Muddling Through,'" Public Administration Review, Vol. 19 (Spring 1959), pp. 79-88.

<sup>12</sup> Harwood L. Childs, as quoted by Schubert, op. cit., p. 39.

<sup>13</sup> Hans J. Morgenthau, Politics Among Nations, The Struggle for Power and Peace (3d ed., New York, 1960), pp. 4-5.

The kind of interest [and here he does not say "defined in terms of power"] determining political action in a particular period of history depends upon the political and cultural context within which foreign policy is formulated. The goals that might be pursued by nations in their foreign policy [note that interests are apparently goals] can run the gamut of objectives any nation has ever pursued or might possibly pursue.<sup>14</sup>

It is not clear whether Morgenthau approves such an elastic interpretation of the term interest. It is clearer, however, that he approves a similarly elastic interpretation of the term power.

Its content and the manner of its use are determined by the political and cultural environment. Power may comprise anything that establishes and maintains the control of man over man. Thus power covers all social relationships which serve that end, from physical violence to the most subtle psychological ties by which one mind controls another.<sup>15</sup>

Morgenthau does not say what kind of power he has in mind when he says that interest is to be defined in terms of power, nor does he identify the degree or level of power (of whatever kind) that the pursuit of interest requires. He identifies survival as the minimum interest of a political unit; and, in broader terms, he suggests that the concept national interest "encompasses the integrity of the nation's territory, of its political institutions, and of its culture."<sup>16</sup> But at the same time he makes it clear that persons or entities other than the nation have interests that will sometime supersede the national interest.

While the realist indeed believes that interest [but whose interest? and on the basis of whose calculation?] is the perennial standard by which political action must be judged and directed, the contemporary connection between interest and the national state is a product of history and is therefore bound to disappear.<sup>17</sup> interest, which seems to imply that some interests are something other than "true," but he does not clearly describe the tests by which "true" interests are distinguished from others. Pretty obviously, such a treatment of interests leaves many questions unanswered. And Morgenthau adds to the uncertainties when, after seeming to identify interests with goals or objectives, he warns that "a realist theory of international politics [must] guard against two popular fallacies: the concern with motives and the concern with ideological preferences."<sup>18</sup> But surely many interests in the sense of goals or objectives are closely associated both with motives and with ideological preferences. In short, Morgenthau's use of the term interest leads mainly to puzzlement. It is perhaps noteworthy that his most recent book, which is very perceptive and stimulating, focuses not on the concept interest but rather on the concept purpose—The Purpose of American Politics.

Sometimes Morgenthau speaks of the "true"

Robert E. Osgood likewise makes extensive use of the concept interest in discussing foreign policy problems, but he departs considerably from Morgenthau's extremely vague meaning.

National self-interest is understood to mean a state of affairs valued solely for its benefit to the nation. The motive of national egoism, which leads men to seek this end, is marked by the disposition to concern oneself solely with the welfare of one's own nation; it is self-love transferred to the national group.<sup>19</sup> [Italics supplied.]

Implicitly, Osgood grants that an interest might be altruistic, for he adopts a modifier for the word, speaking of self-interest. He does not define self-interest in terms of power, nor does he reject concern for motives; rather, to him an interest is an end or a motive. It is a valued state of affairs, and not a state of affairs that exists objectively—independently of human evaluations or appraisals. Though Osgood equates interests with ends, he might also identify them with means; for, as indicated above, a state of affairs might be valued either for its own sake or because of its contribution to the achievement of some other valued state of affairs, or both. In short, Osgood's definition leads to the question of the bases on which evaluations occur and to the question of the relationships between interests on the one hand and ends and means on the other.

The contention here is that the discussion of interests as a guide to foreign policy decisions is

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 9.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid.

<sup>16</sup> Hans J. Morgenthau, "Another 'Great Debate': The National Interest of the United States," this REVIEW, Vol. 46 (December 1952), p. 973.

<sup>17</sup> Politics Among Nations, p. 10.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., p. 6.

<sup>19</sup> Robert E. Osgood, Ideals and Self-Interest in America's Foreign Relations (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953), p. 4.

likely to be sounder and more cogent if a distinction is made between the independent and the dependent. Especially if an author is prescribing, it is important that he stipulate clearly the independent interests that he is postulating; given the independent interests, he then in principle has the opportunity to identify appropriate dependent interests—and he may be able to do this more soundly than any one else. Even if the author is describing, it is likely to be desirable to maintain the distinction between independent and dependent interests, or at least to place them accurately in their serial and hierarchical relationships.

Interests and Interest Groups in Domestic Politics. The tendency of those who dwell on the role of interests or interest groups in domestic policy is to think only in terms of interests as defined by the actor himself, leaving no room for the scholar or any detached observer to say that the actor goes against his own interests or that he should pursue an interest other than the one that he in fact pursues.

Arthur F. Bentley set the precedent for this: There is no group without its interest. An interest . . . is the equivalent of a group. . . . The group and the interest are not separate. There exists only one thing, that is, so many men bound together in or along the path of a certain activity. . . . The group is activity and the activity is only known to us through its . . . value in terms of other activities. . . . The interest is just this valuation of the activity, . . . the valued activity itself.<sup>20</sup>

In approximately the same manner, Jack Peltason says, "An interest consists of all kinds of activity of all kinds of people, some of whom may be public officials, in conflict with an opposed array of activities."<sup>21</sup> And Charles Hagan says, "The activity is the interest. The interest is a shorthand way of saying that there is a mass of activity operating in a given direction. . . . The present assignment of meaning to interest is to find the activity and call that an interest which the activity connotes."<sup>22</sup>

Definitions of this sort suggest two kinds of problems.

<sup>20</sup> Arthur F. Bentley, The Process of Government: A Study of Social Pressures (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1908), pp. 211, 213.

<sup>21</sup> Jack W. Peltason, Federal Courts in the Political Process (Garden City, 1955), p. 2.

<sup>22</sup> Charles B. Hagan, "The Group in a Political Science," in Roland Young (ed.), Approaches to the Study of Politics (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1958), p. 45.

The first is whether the pursuit of interests or the activity of interest groups is to be considered in the general context of purposefulness and rationality. Probably so, though the quotations cited are not very clear on the point. Both Bentley and Hagan describe the activity as going along a path or operating in a given direction. This implies that the activity is not random, and it probably implies that it is directed or controlled so as to promote the achievement of a goal. If so, a discriminating intelligence is involved, and choices are made among possible alternatives. But in stressing activity rather than the criteria of choice that guide the activity, Peltason and Hagan do little to suggest concern for the purposes, the goals, and the rationality of the behavior. They might remedy the matter by including expressions of purpose and reason in the category that they label activity; but then they would make the category so broad that they would simply join the ranks of others who are concerned with identifying and appraising means and ends in politics. The role that Bentley himself assigned to discriminating intelligence—to reason and purpose in the activity of groups—is not very clear either, though he did refer to interest as the "valuation" of the activity.

The other problem to which the Bentleyan type of definition leads is that it apparently rejects the view that anyone other than the actor has a basis for identifying the actor's interests. Hagan makes this explicit in repudiating the practice under which "interest is often utilized to designate a kind of activity which follows as an inference from a premise."<sup>23</sup> He is adversely critical of those who say in certain circumstances that an interest group acted against its interests. As noted above, he is on sound ground if the reference is to independent interests, strictly defined; but given the independent interest to be served, it is quite possible that a scholar or other detached observer may identify the dependent interests of a group more accurately than do its members or leaders. Under the conception being advocated here, for example, an observer might find that it is against the interests of a candidate for office to insult the voters; or he might find that it is against the interests of children to skip school persistently. But if the activity is the interest, then insulting the voters and skipping school automatically become interests by the fact of their occurrence.

David Truman relates the word interest to attitudes rather than to activity.

As used here, "interest group" refers to any group that, on the basis of one or more shared attitudes, makes certain claims upon other groups in the society for the establishment, maintenance, or enhancement of forms of behavior that are implied by the shared attitudes. . . . The shared attitudes constitute the interests.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., p. 46.

If interests are attitudes, an evaluation is implied; a person who has an attitude is for or against something. An attitude indicates a sense of direction if not a desired destination. This suggests again that the pursuit of an interest is the pursuit of a goal, and it again points to the question whether the goal is being pursued rationally. Obviously, a detached observer might conclude that an interest group is not acting rationally, and sooner or later some or all members of the interest group might agree. This means that the observer and the members would take the view that the activity of the interest group had not served its best interests. And it suggests that there are difficulties in a conception that identifies interests with the current attitudes of those pursuing them. Further, there is at least a certain incompleteness in the conception of "potential groups" that Truman advances. In his view a potential group consists of people with shared attitudes who have not yet become organized; but it might also be potential in the sense that the prospective members may develop certain attitudes when they become aware of their common dependent interests.<sup>25</sup> The interest group might be there potentially, regardless of both existing attitudes and existing organizational forms.

V. CONCLUSION

In sum, values and interests fall into sequences (some leading to others in the same sequence) and into hierarchies (some superseding others). In common usage the words values and interests have approximately the same meaning, and each designates two sorts of thing—approximately the same two sorts. What are called interests divide into categories that can conveniently be labelled "independent" and "dependent." What are called values divide into categories that can conveniently be labelled "goal" and "instrumental." Independent interests are equivalent to goal values, and dependent interests are approximately equivalent to instrumental values, the difference being that the term dependent interest is not so likely to connote the notion of intrinsic desirability whereas the term instrumental value may do so. No value or interest belongs inherently in one category and not in the other; any value or interest might be in either category, depending on human preference. The scholar has no scientific way of determining what goal values or independent interests should be pursued, and since in practice most actors are not clear in identifying them, the scholar may not be able to determine which ones are in fact pursued. In any event, what is an independent interest for one actor may be a dependent interest for another, and vice versa. For items in each category, however, the scholar can seek to promote conceptual clarity and knowledge of logical and practical relationships. Moreover, he can simply assume one or more independent interests for analytical purposes and then identify and appraise relevant dependent interests. If he focuses on the concept interest, he is likely to do better if he avoids defining it in terms of power or activity or attitudes—though, to be sure, different meanings may be useful for different purposes. He is likely to find it advantageous to define an interest as a goal that an actor does or should pursue. His appraisal of dependent interests may lead him to make recommendations, which is intellectually justifiable if he keeps himself within the limits of logic and evidence and if he recognizes that the independent interests that he postulates may or may not be the ones that others accept.

<sup>24</sup> David B. Truman, The Governmental Process (New York, 1951), pp. 33–34.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., pp. 34–35, 510–15.

COMPARATIVE POLITICS: A COMPREHENSIVE APPROACH

HERBERT J. SPIRO

Amherst College

This is a tentative outline of a systematic and comprehensive approach to the study of politics. Part I gives the method. Part II indicates some advantages of the approach. Part III anticipates likely objections to it. And Part IV suggests some applications. My purpose in presenting the paper in its present form is to encourage my colleagues to consider this approach and, if they find it potentially useful, to contribute to its refinement through criticism.<sup>1</sup> As David Easton said in his "Approach to the Analysis of Political Systems,"<sup>2</sup> I know "I run the definite risk that the meaning and implications of this point of view may be only superficially communicated; but it is a risk I shall have to undertake since I do not know how to avoid it sensibly."

I

Politics is the process by which a community deals with its problems. A community exists among people who are aware of pursuing common goals.<sup>3</sup> Problems are obstacles perceived on the road toward goals. Problems must therefore be recognized in order to become politically relevant or alive. But recognition of a problem by itself does not lead to the generation of politics about it. When there is complete consensus in the community on the solution of a problem, after it has been recognized, no politics concerning the problem takes place. In this sense, a community whose members always agree on solutions to their problems is not a political system. Since there are few (if any) such communities, most communities are political systems. In almost all communities, disagreements occur. Disagreements present issues. A political system, therefore, is a community that is processing its issues. While the basic prerequisite for community is consensus, though minimally only on common goals (which may be negative, like prevention of the extermination of the community of mankind), the basic prerequisite for a political system is dissensus. Politics arises out of disagreements within a network, wide or narrow, loose or tight, of agreement. (17-27)<sup>4</sup>

A problem enters politics once members of the community recognize it and disagree about it. A problem leaves politics when it has been "solved" and this solution has been recognized. Between the beginning and end of this process, the issue(s) generated by a problem passes through four phases of the "flow of policy": (1) formulation of the issue, (2) deliberation, (3) resolution, and (4) solution of the problem. Since problems are obstacles on the road to goals, disagreements may be about the substance of the goals or the procedures used to approach them. (363-372) In either case, the issue may be perceived as involving a long-term, fundamental matter or a short-term, circumstantial matter. (211-213)<sup>5</sup> A political system may be described, and two or more systems may be compared, by "plotting" the incidence of issues with reference to two intersecting axes. The vertical axis runs from the procedural to the substantive extreme, the horizontal from the fundamental to the circumstantial. (Figure 1)

In every political system, some issues arise under each of the four combinations. (I) Fundamental procedural issues are generated by problems arising out of the goal of stability, i.e., by constitutional problems. (II) Procedural circumstantial issues are generated by problems arising out of the goal of flexibility, i.e., typically by economic problems in modern or modernizing communities. (III) Circumstantial substantive issues are generated by problems arising out of the goal of efficiency, i.e., by power problems. (IV) And substantive fundamental issues are generated by problems arising out of the goal of effectiveness, i.e., by cultural problems.

<sup>1</sup> I am already indebted for very helpful critiques to V. O. Key, Jr., Harvey C. Mansfield, Franklin L. Ford, Harry Eckstein, and especially Duncan MacRae, Jr.

<sup>2</sup> World Politics, Vol. 9 (April 1957).

<sup>3</sup> This does not imply a "progressive" as distinguished from a "conservative" bias, since the goals may include maintenance of the status quo.

<sup>4</sup> Numbers in parentheses refer to pages in my Government by Constitution: The Political Systems of Democracy (New York, 1959), where the concepts used in this paper were put to work in a less systematic fashion, and which contains many concrete illustrations that could not be included here.

<sup>5</sup> This distinction is not meant to suggest that issues about fundamentals are more important than those about circumstantials.

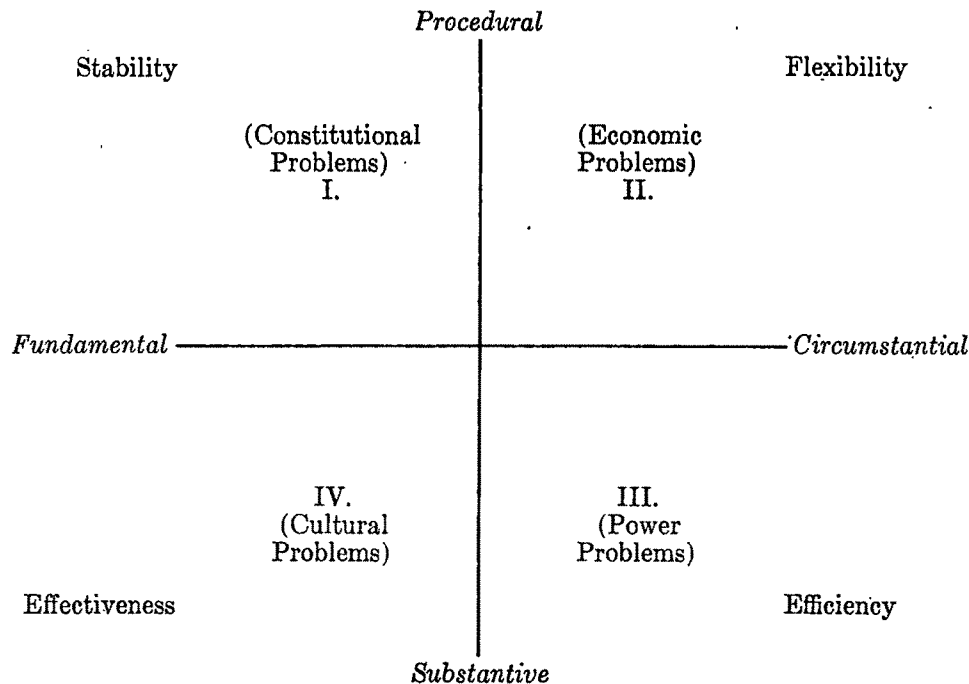

FIGURE 1. Diagram of system issues.

The relative success of political systems (or of one system at different times) can be gauged by the degree to which they manage to sustain a dynamic equilibrium among the four basic goals. (41-42) If problems are thought of as the input and solutions the output of the political system, efficiency measures the output-input ratio. If the system solves none of its problems, it will fail. But the problems it recognizes for processing, the process itself, and the solutions also have to be considered effective, or acceptable, by at least those members whose opposition could put an end to the system. At least some procedures used for the handling of problems have to remain stable over time, otherwise the system will lose its identity vis-à-vis itself and its basic goals.<sup>6</sup> But both procedures and even more the policies (or solutions) worked out within these procedures have to be sufficiently flexible to adjust to changes in the content of the community's problems; otherwise stagnation will set in.

<sup>6</sup> This should not be confused with substantive "boundary maintenance"; a political system may be stable even though its scope and membership fluctuate, that is, expand, contract, and overlap or merge with those of other systems preoccupied with the solution of similar or different problems. See also p. 595 below.

Stability and effectiveness are concerned with the long run; flexibility and efficiency with the short run. Each of these basic goals needs to be balanced by its temporal opposite. Stability and flexibility are concerned with the methods used for handling issues; effectiveness and efficiency with the content of problems and their solutions. Each procedural goal should be balanced by its substantive opposite.

None of the four basic goals by itself is sufficient for the success of a political system. Exclusive concern with stability is shown by legalistic attempts to foreorder the entire future by means of comprehensive, detailed, and consistent regulation. (211-236) This is designed to preclude the need for any future choices, to prevent changes in values or goals, and to keep efficiency at its current level, since no novel substantive problems will be allowed to come up. The final goal pursued here is a kind of regimented bureaucratism. Members of a more or less well balanced political system who are overly committed to bringing about stability only will raise a disproportionate number of issues under (I). Their political style is legalistic. The style of the subsystem of these members could be described graphically as in Figure 2.

Exclusive concern with flexibility is the temporal antithesis of legalism. (182, 189)

FIGURE 2. Subsystem distortion, I.

Here the desire is to keep opportunities for change permanently open. Constancy in goals would consequently become impossible, and policies would fail because of inability to sustain them long enough to solve the problems to which they were addressed. Even the procedures of politics would be altered in response to changes in the problems currently considered most pressing. Anarchy would be the logical end result. Members overly interested in flexibility will raise a disproportionate number of issues under (II). Their style is pragmatic. (Figure 3)

Exclusive concern with efficiency results from the desire to achieve nothing but the immediate solution of current problems. (179–180, 186–187) It manifests itself in technocratic focussing on the substance of problems, as these happen to be perceived at the moment, in order to bring available power and other resources to bear on them at once. What participants desire is quick solutions—regardless of the means used, of alternative policies that may have been suggested, or of the effectiveness of these solutions in terms of goals other than pure short-run efficiency. The end result of imposition of its rule by an efficiency-minded group would be a kind of technocratic totalitarianism. Such persons will raise a disproportionate number of issues under (III). Since they are concerned only with the application of power to the solution of problems, their political style in its extreme form is violent. (Figure 4)

Exclusive concern with effectiveness is the temporal opposite of violence. (194–210) It would seek to imprison the whole community in the rubrics of one ruling ideology. Ideological motivation would shape the recognition of problems and the formulation of issues, regardless of “objective” needs. All policy is put in the service of the long-run substantive goals to which the ideology is committed, so that nothing that deviates from it can remain stable, nor can adjustments be made to changes within, or in the environment of, the system, unless the ideology itself dictates these changes. Theocracy or “hierocracy,” in which a fanatical intelligentsia, secular or spiritual, ruled would be the result of victory by a group committed to the exclusive pursuit of effectiveness. Members of a more or less balanced political system who have this kind of commitment will raise an inordinate number of issues under (IV). Their style is ideological. (Figure 5)

FIGURE 3. Subsystem distortion, II.

FIGURE 4. Subsystem distortion, III.

The style of a successful political system, in which tensions due to pursuit of the four basic goals bring about a dynamic equilibrium, could be described by Figure 6. It also relates the political process, i.e., the four phases of the flow of policy, to basic goals and to types of issues and problems. A system is most successful when issues cluster around the intersection of the procedural-substantive and fundamental-circumstantial axes. This central clustering will happen, not because of the content of the problems dealt with, but because of the equilibrium described above. This in turn is related to the particular sequence in which each of the four phases of the political process proceeds from one to another of the basic goals.

A problem is recognized for issue formulation when fundamental substantive goals, i.e., the effectiveness of the system and its policies, call for its solution. Cultural values, in the broad sense, lead to recognition of discrepancies between goals and current conditions. But the particular formulation that the issue receives is shaped by the fundamental procedures in use. If there is disagreement on recognition of the problem and/or its proper solution, this is due to differences in the fundamental substantive goals of members. But the form in which the resultant issue is stated—two or three alternative solutions, clear or vague differentiation, etc.—is shaped by the “constitution,” and the fact that it is so shaped gives, and is usually designed to give, stability to the system, regardless of the content of all the various issues that have to be dealt with. (164–177)

FIGURE 5. Subsystem distortion, IV.

FIGURE 6. Diagram of system in dynamic equilibrium.

Deliberation consists of the consideration of alternative solutions to a problem. The alternatives, having already been formulated, are now examined in the light of the need to adjust to changes inside the system and in its environment. (239–257) Without realistic consideration of these changes, deliberation would be meaningless, and the solution would be unsatisfactory.

Deliberation normally leads to resolution, that is, the narrowing down of alternatives and the final selection of one policy. Resolution might be called “the big decision,” since the word decide means to cut off—in this case, to cut off deliberation. (258–269) But one should not identify resolution alone with decision, because the whole political process consists of a sequence of decisions: what problems to recognize, how to formulate the issues, how to deliberate and resolve, what resources to use in solution, and many more decisions. While the formulation of the issue involves fundamentals, its resolution involves short-term considerations. Resolution is always addressed to the problem as it appears at the moment deliberation is cut off. It need therefore not be final, because changes can always be made during the phase of solution. In fact, resolution rarely is final, and only rigid adherents of the mechanical doctrine of the separation of powers believe that the legislature deliberates and resolves, and then the executive puts this resolution into effect. (12–13) Actually, “the executive,” and whoever else participates in the final phase of the political process, often introduces new, or re-introduces old, alternative solutions to the problem. In any case, the resolution of the deliberated issue directs flexibility toward efficiency. While constitutional and economic considerations normally play important roles in the course of deliberation, economic and power considerations do so during resolution. And while an excess of constitutional regulation may prevent an optimal weighing of alternatives, a lack of available power or other resources may lead to inability to arrive at resolution of the issue.

The phase of solution deals with the substance of a problem, bringing to bear short-run power for the achievement of the community's long-run goals. Solution of a problem normally removes the goal on the road toward which the problem was an obstacle. Once an economy with millions of unemployed has achieved stable full employment, this achievement ceases to be a goal, though the maintenance of full employment may continue as a goal of lesser importance. In a successful system, solution links efficiency to effectiveness and thereby clears the channels of politics for the recognition and processing of new problems that are obstacles on the road to new goals.

Formulation, deliberation, resolution, and solution are called phases rather than stages or departments of the political process or, preferably, of the flow of policy, in order to emphasize that they usually overlap. In an emergency, for example, all four may be compressed into a matter of moments. (269-273) Moreover, political systems differ with respect to the relative importance of the four phases and the basic goals that are given strongest consideration in each phase. For example, a system with a very legalistic style might devote most of its politics to the concoction of "artificial" constitutional issues and their very abstract deliberation, without ever arriving at their resolution or the solution of its "real" problems. Or a system of very violent style might concentrate its politics on the quick resolution of conflicts between various armed organizations and the efficient solution of these problems, to the complete neglect of considering alternative solutions and formulating other issues about different problems. In the Fourth Republic, French politics was preoccupied with formulation and deliberation, to the neglect of resolution and solution. In the Fifth Republic, this emphasis has been reversed.

The style of a political system at any one time is rarely as one-sided as in the preceding examples of legalism and violence. Combinations with a double or triple emphasis are more common; for example, legalistic pragmatism, as often displayed in American constitutional litigation (Figure 7); pragmatic violence, as among the criminal underworld (Figure 8); ideological legalism, as in Calvin's Geneva; or alternating pragmatic and ideological violence, as in the Soviet Union (Figure 9). A triple emphasis of this kind cannot describe the style of a system at one moment, because ideologism and pragmatism are true opposites, as are legalism and violence. Triple emphasis is therefore more likely to describe style over time, when radical oscillations occur, e.g., from ideologically motivated to pragmatically motivated violence. However, simultaneous concern with stability and efficiency, or with flexibility and effectiveness, is possible when the issues of politics are clustered around the intersection of the two axes: for example, when the problem is jay-walking and the issue is means of enforcement, arguments about legality (not legalistic arguments) and the availability of traffic cops can be adduced simultaneously without calling for a description of style as violently legalistic. Or when the issue arises out of the problem of dowries in a modernizing community, arguments about cultural values and the distribution of income may be raised in the course of pushing this problem closer toward solution, without making the style ideologically pragmatic.

FIGURE 7. Combination styles, A.

FIGURE 8. Combination styles, B.

The greater the incidence of issues away from the central intersection, the weaker is consensus on those of the basic goals near which the issues cluster, and the more pathological is the style in that particular direction. For example, when the most important issues revolve around the constitutional document itself—constant proposals for its amendment, discussions of its internal consistency, of its effectiveness, of its adequacy to solve the problems different members consider most pressing—if indeed this preoccupation with the constitution leads to the formulation of artificial issues, then consensus is obviously weakest on the content of the goal of stability, and style is legalistic.

FIGURE 9. Combination styles, C.

FIGURE 10. Judicial and business firm systems.

For most subsystems, this kind of preoccupation with only one or two of the four basic goals is normal. The judiciary, for example, and parts of the bureaucracy are subsystems more concerned with stability than with anything else. (276–297) Both the internal style of these subsystems and their contributions to the style of the system of which they are parts will tend more toward legalism than toward the other three styles. However, a detail of their square, Figure 6 (I), shows that their concern with stability also has aspects of flexibility, efficiency, and effectiveness; and that, while the two phases of the central policy flow to which they mainly contribute—formulation and deliberation—deal typically with the constitutional aspects of problems, these constitutional aspects have to be looked at from the “purely” constitutional, the constitutional-economic, the constitutional-power, and the constitutional-cultural points of view. (Figure 10)

Similar details for the other squares would show major preoccupation with flexibility on the part of, say, a business firm during a period of great economic growth, Figure 10 (II), with efficiency on the part of, say, the military in some Latin American country, Figure 6 (III), and with effectiveness on the part of, say, “ideologues,” propagandists, or public relations agents of a certain type, Figure 6 (IV).

Useful comparisons can be made by examining the internal political style of similar subsystems or groups of political personnel in different systems; e.g., the governments of Paris and Stockholm, Coca Cola distributors in various countries, the general staff corps of France and Germany, or of Weimar and Federal Germany, different firms in the American electrical industry, or the top newspapers of several states. This kind of comparison would show, among other things, that the sources of authority of the personnel of these subsystems vary from one system to the next, and do so even more within any single political system. If authority is considered a kind of “additive” to central decisions, which leads those who are exposed to the consequences of these decisions to accept them, then the sources of authority can be classified in the same way as issues and consensus. (372–379) For instance, military heroes have authority among the military as a result of substantive circumstantial achievements, like a general’s victories. Some saints have authority among communicants of their religion as a result of more fundamental substantive claims, such as visions of the deity, performance of miracles, or stigmata. The Supreme Court of the United States enjoys authority among the legal profession and other Americans because it is identified with the fundamental procedures of the legal profession and of the Constitution. (282-286) Medical researchers like Dr. Jonas Salk enjoy authority among the public because they have addressed their innovating methods to the successful solution of current medical problems. I am willing to take the prescriptions my general practitioner issues to me and I regard him as an authority on my ills, because he has solved my medical problems before and because I know him to have been certified by meeting a combination of procedural and substantive requirements.

These are examples of authority in various types of subsystems. Of greater interest are the sources of authority of contributors to the central flow of policy. In a successful system, these sources vary with the phase(s) of the political process in which particular contributors are chiefly involved. To illustrate this, we can take the American problem of the costs of medical care. In Figure 11, each of the four phases of the policy flow is further broken down into two sub-phases, one on either side of the axis passing through it. The recognized problem is brought to public attention and (1) formulated as a substantive issue by leaders of affected interest groups, that is, subcommunities whose members are aware (or are being made aware) of having special goals and problems in common. Among these are leaders of underprivileged minority groups, of labor unions, of the medical profession. The issue is then (2) formulated in such a form that it can be deliberated upon, given the constitution of the system, in this case the fundamental procedures of politics in the United States. In this phase, legal advisers to the groups involved make their contributions, and other lawyers and the courts may also participate, e.g., if constitutional test cases are initiated. Some of the issues arising out of the general problem are formulated by the political parties, e.g., through inclusion of planks in their platforms, and by other national politicians through introduction of legislation, e.g., to change social security laws. These issues are (3) deliberated upon in the Congress and, occasionally, by Congressional politicians, the President, and others outside the Congress, e.g., in public debates and on television interviews. Next, (4) deliberation begins to be carried on by increasingly less "constitutional," more interest-oriented figures, like negotiating agents for the various groups involved, perhaps with the advice of economists and business consultants. The issue will come closer to (5) resolution, perhaps after further litigation, as a result of successful negotiation between the antagonists, or through Congressional action. In Switzerland, a referendum might bring resolution at this point. (6) Substantive resolution can also be accomplished through threats or the use of force, as in strikes or violent clashes between doctors' and patients' organizations and the police. Here men whose authority comes largely from substantive and circumstantial sources would be in charge. After resolution of the issue, (7) solution begins with participation of government and private administrators, like the Surgeon General, hospital administrators, Blue Cross officials, Social Security civil servants. Finally, (8) the original problem is solved and thereby removed close to the "low" or "grassroots" levels at which it was first recognized through the actions of doctors and patients and subordinate bureaucrats who operate the system that has been set up more or less in keeping with the resolution of the issue. The authority of these people is derived from their identification (which may be a new product of the earlier phases of the process) with the substantive fundamentals of the community.

In an unbalanced system, on the other hand, sources of authority will be out of keeping with the particular phase of the policy flow to which participants contribute. For example, in subphase 3 of deliberation, which calls for authority coming from identification with fundamental procedures, practicing physicians and "experienced patients" may be the main actors. Or in subphase 7 of solution, which calls for authority based on experience with administrative and medical organization, the bargaining agents of medical associations or labor unions may play the most important role. In either case, the success of the system in its handling of this problem would suffer. The mishap in subphase 3 might be an indication of ideological style. The malfunction in subphase 7 would suggest pragmatic style. If mob leaders or the police had to get involved in subphase 2 of formulation, this would be a manifestation of violent style. If constitutional lawyers opened new issues in the course of subphase 7 of solution, the system would be suffering from undue legalism.

FIGURE 11. Sub phases in the policy flow.

Handwritten signature or initials.

FIGURE 12. Post-independence system.

Perfect equilibrium among the four basic goals is hard if not impossible to achieve and it would not be desirable to insure success except under very rare conditions. Members of any non-stagnant political system change their estimates of the most important problems it faces. If they start, for example, by considering solution of the problem of independence from outside rule most important, as colonial independence movements have, the initial style of the system may be more or less violently ideological. Once independence is achieved, leaders identified with solution of the problem of colonialism will be regarded as most authoritative in all phases of the political process. If the independence movement develops successfully into a new political system, its style will add elements of pragmatism and legalism, as concern shifts to flexibility and stability, the original problem having been solved efficiently and effectively, i.e., in an acceptable fashion. In this kind of development, the phase of deliberation would be last to receive the backing of a firm consensus. (Figure 12) Consensus would initially be strongest on solution to the poorly formulated, undeliberated, and therefore technically "non-resolved" independence problem. But this would be true only within the movement, since between it and the colonial power this would be precisely the area of greatest disagreement, leading to ideological and violence in the larger system and, eventually, to its breaking apart.

On the other hand, a subsystem that starts off with an exclusive pursuit of stability, perhaps out of opposition to an efficiency-oriented totalitarianism, (1) will have an initially legalistic style; (2) slowly pay greater attention to the twin needs of flexibility and effectiveness; and (3) finally perhaps reach a point where it is ready to use violence against the totalitarian regime to solve its own crucial problem. The German resistance to Hitler seems to have followed this pattern. (Figure 13) Its members began by discussing the legality of resistance to the tyrant (and drafted a new constitution for the Reich), then constructed an ideology of resistance on this foundation of constitutionality, considered how to adjust their tactical plans to Hitler's operating procedures, and finally—after several unsuccessful attempts on his life—set off the bomb in his headquarters on July 20, 1944.

FIGURE 13. Anti-Nazi resistance movement.

FIGURE 14. Nazi suppression of resistance.

After failure of this plot, the Nazi regime's reactions followed the reverse order, though this development occurred much more quickly. The first reaction (1) was brutally violent. It then became somewhat more pragmatic in the sense that temporary concessions were made where this seemed expedient, e.g., concerning executions. At the same time, (2) the existing anti-resistance ideology was quickly elaborated. Finally, (3) the surviving major conspirators were tried by a special people's court, so that their execution could be presented as "legal" to the public. A diagrammatic presentation would look like Figure 13, except that the movement starts in (III), not (I), and that final arrows from (III) to (I) would be much farther away from the central intersection. (Figure 14)

This comparison of the resistance to Hitler and its repression by the Nazis might suggest that the development patterns of these two or any political (sub)systems are considered of equal value or, indeed, that this method of comparison pretended to be wertfrei. It does not, for two related reasons. In the first place, the purpose of comparison is to evaluate the relative success of political systems, success having been defined as a dynamic equilibrium among the four basic goals. Success was not defined with reference to the achievement of the always necessarily transient substantive goals of political systems. However, this criterion of success may be considered unsatisfactory because, for example, we might at least conceive of an ideologically violent totalitarianism that manages to indoctrinate its population so thoroughly in its ideology that it retains sufficient stability and flexibility to remain effective. No totalitarianism has in fact so far "succeeded" in this sense. On the contrary, the more successful ones are precisely those that moved away from an exclusively substantive to an increasingly procedural emphasis in both consensus and sources of authority. This objection is, nevertheless, well taken, and the normative assumptions underlying this approach can be made explicit. (30-42)

In the first instance, or in the last instance, or in both, it is individual human beings who recognize the problems that make up the raw material of politics, because these human beings are working toward goals: in the first instance, when individuals deliberately come together, as in modern interest organizations; in the last, when collectivism is at least alleged to serve the end goal of greater individualism, as according to Marx ("the free development of each . . ."). Human beings are distinguished from the rest of creation (or "existence") by their presumed capacity to work deliberately toward perceived goals. What distinguishes them even more is their capacity to invent new goals, e.g., when old ones have been reached. In this respect, human beings, or our understanding of ourselves, resemble political systems (more than our understanding of political systems resembles our understanding of human beings, since the differentiated functioning of political systems is much more open to analysis than that of individual persons). (28-29)

The individual, as a personality system, also pursues the basic goals of stability, flexibility, efficiency, and effectiveness, in terms of his own built-in or acquired substantive values. He or she also has to maintain a dynamic balance in the pursuit of these basic goals. The development of the behavior style of infants or older persons could be described in the terms used here for political systems. (366-367) Because there is general agreement that human beings are capable of forging new goals for themselves and of working toward their goals, broad consensus might also be reached on the desirability of providing individuals with optimum opportunities for "realizing themselves" in this sense. The norm of individual responsibility could serve as the highest common normative denominator for the two antagonistic camps of the Cold War, and others, at least philosophically.<sup>7</sup> This norm demands that individuals should be given opportunities to contribute to those central decisions whose consequences will affect themselves; and that their capacity to contribute to such decisions should be proportionate to the extent of their exposure to the consequences. The balance between opportunity to contribute and exposure to consequences describes the individual's situation of responsibility. To be in a sound situation of responsibility, one should be provided by the political system with four ingredients: (1) foreknowledge of the probable consequences of one's decisions; (2) choice among alternative courses of action; (3) resources with which to realize the choice; and (4) purpose or commitment on the part of the system to the norm of responsibility itself.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> See my "Responsibility and the Goal of Survival," Responsibility: Nomos III (New York, 1960), pp. 290-303.

<sup>8</sup> For an earlier application of the norm of responsibility, see my "Co-Determination in Germany," this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (December 1954), pp. 1114-1127. "Purpose" has been added as a fourth ingredient since then, for reasons that may be apparent.

FIGURE 15. Prerequisites of individual responsibility.

Without foreknowledge, one's situation in the political system would lack stability; without choice, it would lack flexibility. Without resources, the problems arising out of one's membership could not be dealt with efficiently; and without the system's commitment to the goal of responsibility, its pursuit by the individual would be thwarted even if the other three ingredients are provided. Knowledge and choice are matters of procedure; resources and purpose are matters of substance. Foreknowledge and purpose relate to fundamental goals, choice and resources to circumstantial problems. (Figure 15) The pathological systems described by Figures 2 to 5 and 7 to 9 would, each in a different way, unbalance their members' capacity to pursue self-realization, that is, to achieve a sound situation of responsibility, by putting one or more of its four ingredients beyond their reach. For this reason, disequilibrium and pathological style can also be criticized systematically from a normative standpoint.

II

Table I shows relations between various dimensions of this approach. The approach makes possible systematic comparison by allowing the same aspects of any two or more political systems, empirical or normative, to be "plotted" in systematic comparison to one another. Issues are taken as the basic data of politics. Their incidence can be plotted comparatively with reference to the two coordinates, Substantive-Procedural and Fundamental-Circumstantial. These in turn are related to the basic goals of any system, balance between which serves as a criterion of success and, at the level of the individual, of normative judgment. Political style and sources of authority can each be described systematically and in relation to one another. Style and authority can also be related systematically to the political process and the personnel of politics. (276-297) The approach also offers a tool for the comparative study of political development of systems and subsystems, in relation to their problems, issues, consensus, sources of authority, types of personnel, and the political process. It also provides a descriptive pathology of politics. So far, systematic description is the main use of this approach. Without systematic description, comparison is difficult. Without sound comparisons, explanations are impossible.

While systematic comparison is its main advantage, the method may also have some other merits. Among these is avoidance of any artificial compartmentalization of one and the same system into "polity," "society," "economy," "culture," etc. To be sure, any system studied by political scientists has all these

TABLE I RELATIONSHIPS AMONG SYSTEM DIMENSIONS

Policy Flow Sub-Phase	Policy Flow Phase	Coordinates	Basic Goal	Problem	Style	Situation of Responsibility
8	Formulation	Subst-Fdtl	8	Effectiveness	Cultural	Ideological
1		Fdtl-Subst	1
2		Fdtl-Proc	2
3	Deliberation	Proc-Fdtl	3	Stability	Constitutional	Legalistic
4		Proc-Circ	4
5	Resolution	Circ-Proc	5	Flexibility	Economic	Pragmatic
6		Circ-Subst	6
7	Solution	Subst-Circ	7	Efficiency	Power	Violent
8		Subst-Fdtl	8
1		Fdtl-Subst	1	Effectiveness	Cultural	Ideological
						Purpose

aspects, and sociologists, economists, anthropologists, and other "social" scientists have developed their own methods for studying these aspects. The approach outlined here would rely heavily upon application of these methods. For example, when we want to compare the efficiency of two systems, we would turn to economics, which is better qualified than any other "policy science" to relate output to input. Sociologists would be best qualified to study, among other things, consensus, especially cultural. The several component disciplines of political science similarly have their specialized contributions to make. For example, historians of political philosophy are better qualified than anyone else to study the evolution of consensus on fundamentals for periods for which few primary sociological data are available. (And, incidentally, our diagram, divided into sixteen squares, provides a convenient scheme for classifying political philosophies.) Jurisprudence and, in the United States, constitutional law are the disciplines best suited for the study of procedural fundamentals. Different "schools" of administration, both public and business, are well qualified to compare systems with regard to their stability and efficiency. Psychologists, in addition to providing insights into the decision process,<sup>9</sup> may be most helpful in comparing the flexibility of systems. Students of communications are well qualified to study the flow of policy as it affects consensus. And so forth. But compartmentalization among these several disciplines should be avoided and, consequently, the tendency to think of the objects of their study as separate entities having an existence apart from one another. Any system studied by political science has all these aspects, but what makes it a political system is the processing, by means of certain procedures, of issues arising out of common problems that are obstacles on the road to goals. The procedures are applied to the whole range of problems faced—economic, power, cultural, constitutional, and others. Each of these problem areas provides the data for the several specialized disciplines. As soon as these problems are converted into issues and introduced into the flow of policy, they are, as it were, raised from the rock-bottom level of givenness, and the community that so raises them is a political system. If no problems are raised in this sense by an otherwise apparently somehow coherent aggregate of human beings, these people do not constitute a political system, except perhaps in the case of a very primitive and therefore pre-political community, unaware of its problems, its capacity to do something about them, and the feasibility of inventing new goals.

Just as this method avoids system compartmentalization, so it also avoids mechanical compartmentalization of functions, like legislation, execution, and adjudication, or policy-making and implementation. Another advantage is the more systematic and symmetrical relation in this approach between functions and the other dimensions of comparison—more than, e.g., the four input and three output functions (of the American separation of powers) of Almond's method, or the seven categories of functional analysis advanced by Lasswell.<sup>10</sup> The latter, incidentally, could easily be "synchronized" with the eight subphases of the political process suggested here.

This approach, further, broadens the conventional identification of politics with power, mainly by returning to Thomas Hobbes' conception of power, which was wider than most contemporary usage of the term. Two advantages result. First, this method can be applied to any political system, regardless of size or scope, instead of being confined, as most current methods still are, to the state as defined by Max Weber. Some applications to different types of political systems, at different levels, will be sketched out below. Secondly, this approach facilitates the systematic inclusion in comparison of more factors, and more relevant factors, than are usually considered.

Partly because it broadens the conventional identification of politics with power, this method can offer improvements upon classifications like the following: constitutional democracy and totalitarianism (or autocracy), democratic and authoritarian, modern and traditional. The first of these pairs is usually defined with respect to power: its concentration and control, its exercise and scope. Friedrich's syndrome of totalitarianism, for example, cannot now be put on some kind of a scale that would permit the systematic comparison of political systems for the purpose of determining which are more or less totalitarian, or constitutional, autocratic or democratic.<sup>11</sup> In fact, his syndrome might lead to condemning as potentially totalitarian some new African states as soon as they reach a certain level of industrialization. The method suggested here, by contrast, while taking into account such factors as "totality" of control, terror, propaganda, and "one-party system," would relate all of these systematically to one another and to phasing of development, as well as success and the norm of responsibility.<sup>12</sup> A similar improvement could be made upon Eckstein's classification of authority patterns into democracy, authoritarianism, and constitutionalism, in which the main variables are "mass" and "elite," participation, choice, transmission of instructions, autonomy, and a framework of rules.<sup>13</sup> This scheme leads Eckstein to consider certain basic social relations and governmental functions as inherently undemocratic and authoritarian. For instance, if one condition of governmental democracy is "that elections must decide, in some basic way, the outcome of the competition for power and policies,"<sup>14</sup> then evidently there cannot be a high degree of congruence between this governmental authority pattern and the social authority pattern of relations between children and their parents. But the suggestion that, if the latter is not democratic, it therefore tends toward authoritarianism, with a greater or lesser admixture of social equivalents of constitutionalism, hardly helps our systematic understanding of the relation between governmental and non-governmental authority patterns. The method outlined here is designed to facilitate the systematic description and comparison of authority patterns of families and other social and political units.

<sup>9</sup> "Decision-making" was deliberately avoided, because the phrase is redundant: a decision is not a decision unless it has been made. By speaking of decision-making we suggest repeated cut-offs between successive but "separated" powers or functions and thereby deny the fluid continuity of the political process.

<sup>10</sup> Gabriel A. Almond, "The Functional Approach to Comparative Politics," in Almond and James S. Coleman, eds., The Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton, 1960), p. 17; Harold D. Lasswell, The Decision Process (University of Maryland, 1956), p. 2.

The various classifications that have been used to describe and explain French politics are another case in point: the traditionalist, bourgeois, and industrial orders; the traditions of authority, liberty, and equality; two "geological faults," one caused by the Great Revolution, the other by the Industrial Revolution; the forces of order and the forces of movement (311-314); or the representative and administrative traditions.<sup>15</sup> Each of these classifications, and the interpretation based upon it, contains valid insights which, moreover, need not contradict each other. For purposes of relating the phenomena covered by them to a systematic concept of politics, however, and for comparing them with similar or different but parallel phenomena in other political systems, they could easily be "translated" into the scheme proposed here.

Classifications based on the distinction between traditional and modern can also be refined by means of such a translation, which would widen their scope by asking questions like these: Is the stability of a traditional system more substantive or more procedural? Is a modernizing system deliberately recognizing new problems, or are these being forced on, or into, it? Is its flexibility greater with respect to constitutional procedures or technology, the production and distribution of goods, or defense against neighbors? And so forth.

Perhaps the greatest advantage that can be claimed for this approach is a very practical one, namely the easy translatability, noted in passing, of a wealth of extant material, both substantive and methodological, fruits of the labor of all the social sciences. To provide this easy convertibility was an intended purpose of this method. Conversely, the approach could be worked out in its present tentative form only by building it selectively upon the foundation of this wealth of available material. In order to put this method to use, no "staggering amount of empirical work . . . seems required."<sup>16</sup> The questions that it asks have already been asked of and answered about many political systems of all imaginable types, from a variety of small groups to the community of mankind. The empirical material is ready and waiting to be used in a comparative way.

One other advantage should be mentioned before moving on to possible objections. As already suggested in references to new and developing political systems, e.g., in Africa, this scheme is applicable to them. (431-441) In other words, it avoids the ethnocentricity of some other approaches designed to serve similar ends. It especially avoids what might be called the "Anglophile fallacy," into which many western political scientists fall—for perfectly understandable reasons. (336-344)<sup>17</sup> It

<sup>11</sup> Carl J. Friedrich and Zbigniew K. Brzezinski, Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy (Cambridge, 1956), pp. 9-10.

<sup>12</sup> For a brief effort in this direction, see my Politics in Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara (Englewood Cliffs, 1962).

<sup>13</sup> Harry Eckstein, A Theory of Stable Democracy (Princeton, 1961), p. 7. He calls for formulation of "more discriminating," "less ambiguous" categories; p. 45.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 2.

<sup>15</sup> Nicholas Wahl, "The French Political System," in Beer and Ulam, eds., Patterns of Government: The Major Political Systems of Europe (New York, 1958), pp. 216-220.

<sup>16</sup> Eckstein, op. cit., p. 46.

<sup>17</sup> This bias was brought to my attention by does not make universally valid criteria out of "the two-party system," regular alternation in office, a neutral civil service on the current British model, or "stable democracy." This method avoids the Anglophile fallacy by withdrawing our focus from the relatively transitory content of the problems faced by particular communities in periods of greatest interest to ourselves, and resetting our sights upon the basic goals that all political systems ever have been and will be pursuing. For the same reason it also avoids what might be called the "Cold War fallacy," into which many students of comparative government fall—for even more understandable reasons. They look upon all governments as either totalitarian or constitutionalist or somewhere between these two poles and tending in one or the other direction. They also sometimes convey the impression that the "history of all hitherto existing society" has been nothing but a determined preparation for the Cold War. One can almost detect the affinity of opposites between their approach and that of their Soviet counterparts. The latter assert that Soviet socialism is the penultimate manifestation of man's political genius. Our western colleagues seem to assume that western constitutional democracy is the final expression of human political genius. However, to the leaders of some of the new political systems in Africa, neither of these rather self-satisfied and ethnocentric approaches will appear very convincing. Nor does it to anyone else who retains faith in man's political inventiveness.

III

Some objections to the approach outlined here can perhaps be anticipated. The first of these is likely to be directed at the definition of community that has been used, because it fails to make "the absence or presence of violence as a means to settle disputes" the main criterion.<sup>18</sup> For Haas,

The ideal type of political community . . . assumes, therefore, that the condition toward which the process of integration is to lead is one in which a sufficient body of general consensus imposes limitations upon the violence of group conflict.<sup>19</sup>

Reginald Bartholomew of the University of Chicago. For an illustration, see Almond and Coleman, op. cit., pp. 52, 533, and passim.

<sup>18</sup> Karl W. Deutsch et al., Political Community and the North Atlantic Area (Princeton, 1957), cited by Ernst B. Haas, The Uniting of Europe (Stanford, 1958), p. xv.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., p. 6.

Our notion of community, on the other hand, requires as a minimum only awareness of the pursuit of common goals, and of members' inability to solve alone the problems arising out of these goals. In this sense, there is a community between the parties to a civil or international war, as indeed between the contestants in the current Cold War, e.g., with regard to the goal of the survival of mankind. Non-violence and loyalty to institutions, other components of Haas' definition, were deliberately left out of ours, as part of the effort to shift attention away from the sovereign state and related units. The old focus of attention easily leads to a preoccupation with questions of "obedience" that seems increasingly anachronistic. Community in our sense of the word is worth studying because there exists within it at least some consensus.

A second objection is likely to be raised against failure to make non-violence in the settlement of disputes a criterion of the political system. All we require of a community to consider it a political system is that it process its issues—regardless of its style, including the incidence of violence, regardless even of failures to solve its problems. The motive was the same as before; e.g., there is a global political system and various international political systems within it. Most of these may not have been very successful, but they do process issues and sometimes solve some of their problems. They have politics and they are certainly worthy of study. Violence is one of several means of conducting politics and should not be excluded from our purview merely because its use fortunately has been reduced and regularized within many, and between some, modern states—but more in some than in others, which again shows the need for including the incidence of violence in comparisons.

A third objection may be made to apparent neglect of institutions, like presidents, cabinets, parliaments, and the like. This omission was intentional, in order to avoid fallacious comparisons, e.g., between the United States Congress and the Swiss Parliament. What matters is not the formal function, like legislation, assigned to an institution by its name or the constitution, but the phases of the flow of policy to which the institution and its personnel contribute. For example, comparison might show that the Swiss Parliament contributes less to the resolution of major issues than the Congress, because in Switzerland resolution is often provided by the referendum. In the global system, formulation has been quite decentralized, except with regard to issues dealt with by some of the older specialized international agencies. So is resolution, while at least public deliberation is becoming increasingly centralized upon the United Nations. If we looked first for institutions and then asked what functions they performed, we would get a less comprehensive and less comparable picture than we do by first identifying the political process and then asking which subsystems and subcommunities contribute to its various phases.

A fourth objection might be raised against our apparent neglect of the role of groups in politics. This would, however, be based on a misreading of Part I. Communities whose members are aware of sharing special problems in common were discussed and are usually described as interest groups. The same is true of some of the subsystems discussed above. Again, use of the conventional words, including "political parties," was avoided on purpose, because it easily leads to erroneous universalization of the familiar, e.g., by projecting the American relation between interest organizations and parties onto, say, French or Ghanaian politics, or by assuming that interest groups everywhere are most active in bringing problems to the attention of politicians (sub-phase 1) and then later in helping lower level administrators with the solution of their own special problems (sub-phase 8), when they may actually contribute more to deliberation or to resolution.

A fifth objection might be made to the relation between "society" and the political system that we are assuming: which is "prior"? Society and its institutions are chronologically prior in the sense that all deliberately created contemporary political systems were superimposed upon pre-existing societies. But these political systems often were superimposed precisely in order to bring about changes in the society or, frequently, the several societies comprising them, and in their institutions and values. After this kind of change, and to the extent that it brought intended or unintended results, habits and characteristics conventionally called "social" or "national" become effects rather than causes of political style. (192-193)

A sixth but certainly not final objection might raise the question of agreement among investigators. Even if two students accepted this approach, could they not come up with quite different descriptions of the same phenomena, e.g., in the exercise of comparison immediately following? That is, could not an issue be described as violent by one scholar, and as pragmatic by another? This kind of disagreement should not be possible after further refinement of the method, especially with respect to comparisons. But even if it were unavoidable, the method would still have the merit of asking sets of questions that are both comprehensive and systematically interrelated.

IV

The purpose of systematic comparison is to facilitate explanation of differences. Without such explanations and the understanding to which they contribute, the conduct of responsible politics is impossible. In this sense, political science can contribute a great deal to the foreknowledge required for improvement of situations of responsibility. The following illustrations do no more than to sketch some suggestions of how this approach can be put to work to provide explanations.

A Backward Society and the Village in the Vauchuse. The southern Italian village of Montegrano analyzed by Banfield seems comparable to Wylie's Peyrane.<sup>20</sup> Banfield quotes Hume's saying that an explanation is a place where the mind comes to rest.<sup>21</sup> He considers the moral basis of the society "the strategic, or limiting factor."<sup>22</sup> This moral basis is the ethos of "amoral familism," which has been produced by three factors acting in combination: a high death rate, certain land tenure conditions, and the absence of the institutions of the extended family.<sup>23</sup>

Banfield suggests that

The village of southern France described by Wylie . . . exemplifies, perhaps, the adaptation the ethos of amoral familism would make to improved economic circumstances. The average income in Peyrane seems to be at least twice that in Montegrano.<sup>24</sup>

Wylie, like Banfield, found that the people he studied "do not unite to work together for any cause. . . ." But life is much better in Peyrane than in Montegrano. Wylie's explanation of his community's relative success is also strongly centered on the family.

These two political systems can easily be compared in terms of the incidence of issues in them. (Figure 16) In internal Montegrano politics, (a) stands for a mild anti-clericalism, <sup>20</sup> Edward C. Banfield, The Moral Basis of a Backward Society (Glencoe, 1958); Laurence Wylie, Village in the Vauchuse (Cambridge, 1957).

<sup>21</sup> Banfield, op. cit., p. 10, note 2.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., p. 163.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., p. 10.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., p. 169.

<sup>25</sup> Wylie, op. cit., p. 59.

FIGURE 16. Systematic comparisons of issues, A.

(b) for municipal elections, in which voting patterns are unstable and voting motivation mainly personal resentment against candidates, (c) for criminal violence, (d) for litigation, of which there is a great deal and (e) for petty corruption. In internal Peyrane politics, (a) anti-clericalism is a more lively issue, (b) local elections revolve around less extreme issues than in Montegrano, like the need for a new sewage system and public baths, (c) criminal or other violence is lacking, as are (d) litigation—the men say “homme de loi, homme de merde”<sup>26</sup>—and corruption. The mayor got parents of school children to threaten a unanimous school boycott (f), in order to put pressure on the French Government to provide a new school building and, at the same time, to regain local electoral support from the Communists, recently popular as a result of a successful ochre miners’ strike (g). (A village near Montegrano had strikes, but not Montegrano itself.) The organization of annual dances presented a recurrent issue (h). Opposition between Communists and Roman Catholics, while not precluding occasional alliances in municipal campaigns, is a sometimes more ideological, sometimes more pragmatic issue (i). Organization of the hunt club and its affiliation with neighboring clubs is another hotly debated item (j).

The main differences between the two systems are apparent. In Montegrano, the issues are farther from the intersection of the two coordinates than in Peyrane, and there are fewer issues. The issue formulating phase is being performed very poorly in Montegrano. In Peyrane, it is being performed very well, at least relative to the problems that citizens consider important. The conduct of a kind of politics over questions of dance organization or hunt club policies keeps the flow of policy in constant circulation and enables it to pick up the “truly” political issues when necessary. This tends to strengthen procedural consensus and suggests one intermediate explanation for the different success of the two systems: the people of Peyrane are more experienced in the use of procedures on which they are generally agreed. The people of Montegrano are utterly inexperienced in the use of any political procedures, but if they were experienced, chances are they would be in profound disagreement on the propriety of whatever procedures they were familiar with. This in turn suggests that doubling the level of income in Montegrano by itself would not make it any more successful than it is, because its people are procedurally incapable of absorbing this economic improvement or even recognizing the new problems this would raise, and even less capable of solving them. We could almost describe Montegrano as a pre-political system, because its people are largely unaware of the feasibility of doing something about their common problems. If we compared Montegrano with an economically much more backward African tribe which, however, uses old and widely popular procedures for settling quarrels or allocating land, the Africans would be found more successful in operating their political system than the Montegrani, and would probably prove more flexible in absorbing economic help from the outside.<sup>27</sup>

The pattern of external issues differs from the internal one, because it is part of the pattern of the national Italian or French systems, of which these villages are only small subsystems. (Figure 17) The external issues in Montegrano are (a) an uncomprehending opposition to the outside world which is believed to be utterly capricious in its operations as these affect the village; (b) party conflicts in national politics, on which voting behavior is as erratic as in local elections; (c) a slumbering potential of anti-state violence of the kind that has historically erupted in southern Italian peasant uprisings; and (d) relations with the State administration, which is concerned almost exclusively with the police aspects of its mission in Montegrano; and (e) the fear of corruption.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., p. 182.

<sup>27</sup> See my Politics in Africa, p. 155 and passim.

FIGURE 17. Systematic comparisons of issues, B.

The external issues in Peyrane are (a) a more clearly defined feeling of suspicion for les autres of the outside world which is, however, believed to operate according to fairly rational procedures, of which the Peyranais avail themselves in order to get out of the French State what they want from it, e.g., in national elections (b); (c) the use of organized violence in defense of firmly cherished values, as by the maquis against the Germans during World War II; and (d) relations with various branches of the bureaucracy, in which "contacts" are used pragmatically, but stopping short of bribery and corruption, in order to round out the square compartments of regulated existence into which the administration would like to fit the village and its citizens. In the case of the school issue (f), internal consensus generated by the mayor was applied to the national political process at those points where it was most likely to bring, and did bring, the desired results. Relations with other hunt clubs (j) and many other issues of "external relations"—transportation and communication, conscription, social security, etc.—also play a role, most of them arising near the central intersection.

The difference between the two patterns again revolves around the higher and more centripetal incidence of issues in Peyrane. Montegrano's internal and external patterns differ, in that the former shows no serious ideologism, whereas the latter shows no serious legalism. As members of their subsystem, the Montegranesi are not aware of any constitutional problems arising out of their relations with the Italian State. Consensus on procedures is strong, not because of general familiarity with them, but because the possibility of adapting them to changed needs does not occur to anyone. This strength of consensus, in turn, has the result of letting potential leaders of substantive reforms—like Montegrano's equivalent of Peyrane's school improvement movement—perceive their roles in a very stagnant, legalistic way: only men in official positions have the right to approach the prefect with such proposals, but they are unlikely to do so, because their official role calls for compliance with administrative instructions. Once more, Montegrano's underdevelopment is mainly procedural. New problems are not recognized in it, only for it by the outside administration, which then formulates and deliberates and, if things ever get that far, resolves issues for Montegrano. In Peyrane, by contrast, this process is operated by the local people themselves, or as part of the national policy flow with their participation. It is true that problems that have gone through the whole political process in Peyrane are not necessarily solved in the end: by the time The Village in the Vaucluse was published, the promised school had not yet been built. However, in terms of our criteria, non-solution of an otherwise fully processed problem has to be considered more successful than solution of a problem handled entirely by administrators who are not members of the community. The supreme value is balanced participation in politics itself: man is a political being.<sup>28</sup>

How can these differences be explained? We have already rejected an economic explanation in favor of a procedural one, by making the comparison with the African community. Banfield mentions an historical factor, the late and incomplete abolition of feudalism in southern Italy, by contrast with northern Italy and France. Since the Revolution, the peasants of the Vaucluse have owned their land and have been individually responsible for their own and their families' welfare. They have not been dependent upon resident or non-resident landlords. Their community has been much more egalitarian. Peyrane lacks the equivalent of Montegrano's "upper-class circle," between whose members and the rest of the village there is very little community feeling. Individual economic responsibility has combined with egalitarianism to reduce fatalism in Peyrane. Small children, both before and in school, are brought up according to very regular rules, while they are raised capriciously in Montegrano. This could be explained by reference to "family values," but the overwhelming bias of the social sciences in favor of such sociological explanations warrants at least exploration of the reverse. According to this comparison, the much more pragmatic, erratic, capricious, and incomprehensible operation of Italian politics may have contributed to equally deficient child-raising habits, rather than the reverse. The Third Republic and the Italian Monarchy were contemporaries, but France did not have an equivalent of trasformismo in its worst form. French deputies had to "produce" for their constituents to get re-elected and—at least as important—the parliamentary system enabled them to produce. For purposes of the present illustration, we cannot pursue this question any further, but it seems something other than a chicken-or-egg question.

<sup>28</sup> How much this approach owes to Aristotle should by now be evident.

Sources of political, but not only of political, authority in Peyrane are procedural, in Montegrano substantive. School children in Peyrane value honesty and non-violence most highly, whereas (though Banfield did not inquire into this) they probably value such qualities as physical strength, good looks, and substantive learning most highly in Montegrano. Banfield agrees with this estimate when he suggests that "Perhaps the best starting place [for reform] would be the organization of village soccer teams."<sup>29</sup> In Peyrane, boules is the favorite sport, with very complicated rules, about which people argue a great deal. Of course, boules is not cricket, but it is better than nothing and has been played for many generations in the Vaucluse. In any case, the problem of reform initiated from the outside does not arise for Peyrane. Its citizens are in comparatively sound situations of responsibility, in their own view. And if we or other outsiders were to advance proposals for the reform of the political system, the proposals would be torn up—as was the telegram sent to the local communist head of the maquis by the departmental "purge chief" upon the Liberation of the Vaucluse, with the words, "Nous réglons nos affaires en famille!"<sup>30</sup> Regler means "to rule" in the procedural sense.

France and Great Britain. The relative failure of French politics is often explained with reference to France's lack of consensus, and the success of British politics in terms of "agreement on fundamentals." We can compare present consensus in the two countries by showing the close clustering of major British issues around the central intersection, and the centrifugal scattering of French issues which shows up strongly in the direction of violence and ideologism. If our mind will come to rest in the England of Henry VIII, we can begin an explanation with his success in making the single problem of relations with Rome the dominant issue of his reign, and in solving this problem in an effective manner. Formulation and solution were of greatest concern in this period. Next, in the seventeenth century, this previous success in solving the religious problem facilitated the processing of another single problem, the overwhelming importance of which was generally recognized, namely, the problem of the constitution. It was solved with the help of ideological commitment (even though new issues about the already "solved" religious problem were raised) and the use of organized force in the Civil Wars. After the Glorious Revolution, sufficient constitutional consensus had been built up to enable the British to be first in recognizing the possibilities of the Industrial Revolution, another problem of single undiluted impact upon the system, and to solve the contemporary manifestations of this problem.

In the French case, the religious, constitutional, and industrial revolutions, each accorded priority by different subsystems, made a simultaneous impact, and violence was used not only to attempt resolution of each issue, but also to resolve the issue of priority among them. As a result, the use of violence itself became an issue. Much less constitutional consensus than in Britain was built up, none of the problems was solved effectively, and the issues down to this day continue to arise at the extremes. French politicians more often enjoy authority from identification with the substantive goals of the groups they lead, than from identification with parliamentary procedures, at least by comparison with British politicians. The same difference is echoed in former colonies of these two powers.<sup>31</sup>

The Soviet Union. This approach can be used to compare different periods of one political

<sup>29</sup> Banfield, op. cit., p. 173.

<sup>30</sup> Wylie, op. cit., p. 210.

<sup>31</sup> See Politics in Africa, p. 143.

FIGURE 18. Styles in successive periods of the Soviet system.

system and thereby to help explain its development. Since the Bolshevik Party "became the State," we have to start this sketch with Lenin before the Revolution (1), when he had nothing but ideological commitment. (Figure 18) Next "comes the Revolution," in which violence was used ruthlessly and ideological principle sometimes sacrificed for pragmatic considerations (2). During the N.E.P. period, Soviet style turned more pragmatic, still less ideological, and somewhat less violent (3). Under Stalin, it was pragmatically violent (4). Since his death, Soviet internal politics has become less violent, somewhat more ideological but also more purposive, and slightly "legal" without becoming excessively legalistic (5). Issues in Soviet domestic policies—both publicized and, more important, behind the scenes—seem to be clustering closer around the central intersection than ever before, though still not as closely as in constitutional systems.

There is no element of determinism in this account. Lenin was initially ideological because of his exclusion and self-exclusion from "legitimate" Russian politics. In the Revolution, power and other resources were harnessed to the ideologically defined goals in order to solve the ideologically defined problems. Because of changes in the environment of the revolutionaries, they also began to show a degree of flexibility, especially with regard to economic aspects of their problems. In the next phase of development, they could have turned toward legalism, as colonial independence movements sometimes do at a parallel stage of development, especially if they base their claim to independence on treaty obligations of the colonial power or on their "rights" under constitutional documents like the United Nations Charter. The Soviets did not turn toward legalism partly as a consequence of the Marxist rejection of the state. Similarly, Marxist preoccupation with substantive economic problems led to the increased pragmatism of the N.E.P. period. Development in the last two phases (until the present) suggests—as would comparison with other totalitarian systems—that there are no "inherent laws" of totalitarian development. More important, phases (2) to (5) illustrate the variety of totalitarianism that is logically and practically possible. An understanding of this variety may be of use in preventing the rise of and combatting totalitarianism.

Sources of authority have also been subject to change in Soviet history. At first, theoretical brilliance or orthodoxy were the most important sources. Revolutionary achievement followed. Both are substantive sources, the former being goal-oriented, the latter problem-oriented. During the N.E.P. period, managerial skills, partly procedural, began to be recognized for the first time, and they have increased in importance in the post-Stalin decade. Meanwhile, however, substantive sources continue to predominate for men in the top positions: identification with the Revolution or with its major figures, demonstrated ability in manipulating the machinery of power or propaganda, "production victories," and the like. But one can anticipate that, when the revolutionary generation has died, one of the hitherto most important sources of authority will dry up, and more procedural trends may develop.

World Politics. Since the most important phases of international politics are being conducted increasingly by the leaders of states instead of professional diplomats and military officers as formerly, these leaders' sources of authority and the style of their political systems are of some interest. (442-465) Despite poorer communications, international relations until World War I had a more unified style than they have today. Diplomats and military who, respectively, performed most of the deliberation and resolution, operated within a fairly strong consensus on the rules of diplomacy and warfare. Today, though improved communications are centralizing deliberation, and even the formulation of issues, in the global political process, such consensus is lacking. The sources of authority, for example, of the current candidates for participation in a summit meeting vary widely. A summit meeting, once it reaches agreement on its agenda (formulation of issues), would presumably conduct deliberation in hopes of reaching resolution or, at least, agreement on the postponement of resolution for issues that, for the time being, can be settled only violently. But of the four participants, only Macmillan and Kennedy have procedural sources of authority and much experience with deliberation conducted according to clearly understood rules. General De Gaulle's military career and his achievements as leader of the Free French and founder of the Fifth Republic endow him with quite a different type of authority, somewhat closer to that held by President Eisenhower at the time of his first summit conference. Khrushchev's sources of authority have just been adumbrated. Deliberation of world political issues has the disadvantages of an unbalanced system, already mentioned earlier. It also changes the types of issues that are generated for world politics. Under traditional diplomacy, typical issues related to legal and power problems. Flexibility was the most persistent goal. Today, cultural and economic problems, or the cultural and economic aspects of legal and power problems, are more often introduced into the international flow of policy. Stability is the most persistent goal. (Figure 19) This has a feedback effect by increasing the proportion of ideologically and pragmatically inclined participants in world politics, e.g., in the case of the United States the U.S.I.A. and the C.I.A. Ideologism and pragmatism have been described as true opposites, as have legalism and violence. This means that they cannot "co-exist" in a system at any one time. This fits the international system, in which one political style is usually succeeded by its opposite. While von Clausewitz's dictum was still valid, war was the continuation of diplomacy by other means. Today, subversion and guerrilla warfare are the continuation of propaganda by other means. Perhaps this is the crucial difference between old fashioned international relations and the Cold War.

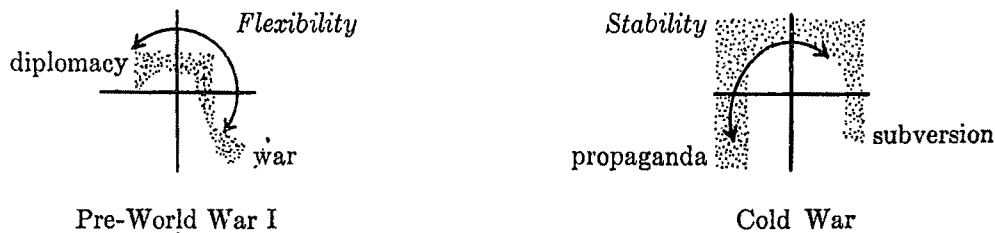

FIGURE 19. Imbalance in the international system, old and new.

The importance of propaganda and the possibilities presented by world-wide communications suggest another use to which this approach might be put. An understanding of the style of a political system and its subsystems in terms of the categories suggested here can be of help in deciding how to "pitch" one's appeal or what sort of "image" to present. Specialists in public relations have, of course, been doing that for decades, in terms of their own categories, and the great propaganda agencies are doing it today. Skillful politicians of all ages have accomplished the same thing more or less intuitively. Most opinion polls or attitude surveys concentrate upon the substance of their subjects' feelings, and this substance has been known to change even more rapidly and more radically than the issues themselves. By getting an accurate picture of the style of politics along lines suggested here, on the other hand, one should be able to get at the more enduring patterns of attitudes and behavior, because this approach focuses on the manner in which people are likely to process whatever problems come their way, rather than on specific reactions to the substance of particular problems. This should be of some use in world politics, too, because of the quick succession of vast changes in the problems that make up its raw material.

This instability and the fluctuating, overlapping, intermeshing, clashing, simultaneously centralizing and fragmenting, expanding and contracting character of world politics points to one final advantage of the method that has been tentatively put forward in this paper. In the beginning (note 6), a warning was issued—in what may have seemed a rather cavalier fashion—against confusing "stability" with "boundary maintenance." Whether this latter function was transferred to politics from biology or physics, in conventional sovereign nation states boundary maintenance is taken care of by the military together with customs and immigration police. But students of politics are no longer concerned primarily with this unit of politics. Political science is concerned with politics at all levels, in all kinds of communities. Today, and in the immediate future, its attention will be drawn especially to politics in the global community of mankind, in and for which a political system is slowly being built up. And the boundaries for that political system do not have to be maintained, they only have to be grown into.

SUBCOMMITTEES: THE MINIATURE LEGISLATURES OF CONGRESS<sup>1</sup>

GEORGE GOODWIN, JR.

University of Rhode Island

Woodrow Wilson spoke of the "little legislatures of Congress," in referring to House and Senate standing committees. Perhaps it is not out of place, then, to call subcommittees the "miniature legislatures." Little systematic academic attention has been given them since Burton French's discussion in this REVIEW in 1915.<sup>2</sup> They are worth understanding, however, for subcommittees often leave an indelible mark on legislation. As one Congressional staff member stated, "Given an active subcommittee chairman working in a specialized field with a staff of his own, the parent committee can do no more than change the grammar of a subcommittee report." This article deals with the reasons for the existence and growth of subcommittees, with the variety of ways in which they are organized, and with the issues and methods involved in their control. Conference committees are outside the scope of this study.

I. THE GROWTH OF SUBCOMMITTEES

Observers have often deplored the proliferation of subcommittees, on the same general grounds that Wilson urged in his criticism of the committee system, both for their dispersion and for their irresponsible concentration of power. Their persistence and extension nevertheless testifies to a functional utility—their convenience and congeniality to the working habits and purposes of members. When the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 reduced the number and consolidated and rationalized the jurisdictions of the standing committees, the average number of subcommittees per committee—as might be expected—increased; and the trend has continued upward. In 1945 the count was 180; of these, 106 were in the House, 68 in the Senate, and 6 from joint committees.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The author is indebted to the Faculty Research Council of the University of Massachusetts for funds to support the study that made this article possible. Much of the information was gathered from interviews with members and staff connected with each House and Senate committee in 1960 and 1961.

<sup>2</sup> "Subcommittees of Congress," this REVIEW, Vol. 9 (Feb., 1915), pp. 68–92. Congressman French (R., Idaho) later served on the naval appropriations subcommittee, and after retirement from the House taught political science at Miami University (Ohio).

By 1961 the number had grown rather more than one-third to a total of 253 of which 131 were in the House, 109 in the Senate and 13 from joint committees.<sup>4</sup> Senator Dirksen has described the problem this increase has caused for some Congressmen:

I would not dare to say to the people of Illinois that I knew all about all the things that go on, when I serve on five subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations, on seven subcommittees of the Committee on the Judiciary, and on three subcommittees of the Committee on Government Operations. To do so I would really need roller skates to get from one subcommittee to another, without even then knowing entirely everything about every subject matter which is considered by the various committees.<sup>5</sup>

A blanket condemnation of the growth of subcommittees, however, is likely to ignore their uses. The most obvious of these is to cope with the growing and shifting specialization of legislative activities as the range and complication of governmental concerns extend to new frontiers. Some changes in the subcommittee structure plainly reflect congressional adjustments to such developments. Senate Banking and Currency, for example, dropped a subcommittee concerned with rents and created a new one on international finance. House Foreign Affairs recently divided its subcommittee on the Near East and Africa into two, and Senate Foreign Relations added one on disarmament. House Judiciary has added a subcommittee on civil rights and Senate Labor one on juvenile delinquency.

Again, some division of committee functions helps solve the ever-present problem of securing a quorum. A wisely worked out subcommittee system can also cut down the total amount of time each member is required to spend with the affairs of a given committee, and at the same time allow for a greater degree of specialization. Senator Robert LaFollette commented on this in 1948:

<sup>3</sup> Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, The Organization of Congress, Hearings, 79th Cong., 1st sess. (Washington, 1945), p. 1039.

<sup>4</sup> Congressional Record (daily ed.), July 18, 1961, p. 11908.

<sup>5</sup> Congressional Record, 83d Cong., 2d sess. (1954), p. 1417.

The essential and important difference between a hodgepodge committee system and an integrated scheme is not in the relative number of subcommittees, but rather in the formalization of fixed and definite jurisdictions so that each new piece of legislation in a given field can have the benefit of the staff work and specialized experience of members of Congress.<sup>6</sup>

Further, subcommittees have often "been an outgrowth of internal friction and resentment generated by one-man rule."<sup>7</sup> They can, within limits, allow less senior legislators to gain prestige and to follow their interests and exploit their abilities as they could not in a seniority-governed committee system which tolerated no subcommittees. It is significant, for example, that Albert Rains has been able to establish a subcommittee on housing of the House Banking and Currency Committee, when all its other subcommittees are designated by numbers and given no clear jurisdiction. Other examples are John Moss's subcommittee on governmental information (Government Operations, House) and Henry Jackson's policy machinery subcommittee (Government Operations, Senate).

Whether committees are adapting to increasingly difficult times, providing for greater specialization or giving less senior men a position of greater importance, there comes a point of diminishing returns, and it would seem that Senator Dirksen had passed this point when he confessed his inability to keep up with events. This is largely a problem of the Senate and not of the House, for there are roughly one-quarter as many members to share in a task equal to that of the House of Representatives. An analysis of the number of subcommittee assignments per member in both houses shows that a Representative is likely to have two subcommittee assignments at the most, while a Senator is likely to have at least six.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Senate Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments, Evaluation of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, Hearings, 80th Cong., 2d sess. (Washington, 1948), p. 63.

<sup>7</sup> Stewart L. Udall, "A Defense of the Seniority System," New York Times Magazine, January 13, 1957, p. 64.

<sup>8</sup> In the 86th Congress, only a third of the House members had two standing committee assignments; the rest had one. Approximately half of the House committee members were assigned to only one subcommittee. In the Senate, however, one-third of the Senators had three committee assignments and the rest had two. Over half of the members of standing committees were assigned to three or more subcommittees.

TABLE I. COMMITTEES THAT HAVE RESISTED SUBCOMMITTEE AUTONOMY, 87TH CONGRESS*

Type	Senate	House
No standing subcommittees	Finance	Rules Un-American Activities Ways and Means
Numbered subcommittees		Armed Services Banking and Currency District of Columbia
Full committee handles major share of work	Foreign Relations Government Operations	Foreign Affairs Post Office and Civil Service

* The two space committees are too recently created and work in too changing a field to be included in this table. The Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences had no subcommittees in the 87th Congress, though some ad hoc subcommittees had been used previously. The House Committee on Science and Astronautics started its life without subcommittees, moved to number subcommittees without fixed jurisdiction and in 1961 established named subcommittees with fairly clear jurisdiction.

II. SUBCOMMITTEE ORGANIZATION

There is a startling variety in the pattern of subcommittee organization. Some committees have no subcommittees at all; others a few, perhaps designated by number only and without clear jurisdiction; and some perform most of their important work in full committee, even though they have a well-defined subcommittee system. These committees are listed in Table I. Other committees establish a large number of subcommittees with clear jurisdiction and grant them wide autonomy. What determines whether a committee will subdivide its work or not?

When committee work involves a great deal of detail or when it includes a number of distinct subject matter areas, there is a tendency to form subcommittees, the more so if the work is technical and non-controversial, so that it matters less who handles which assignment; no one wants to be left out of a fight that matters to him. The business of the appropriations and judiciary committees involves so much burdensome detail that subcommittees are inevitable, even though some of the work is controversial. The relatively non-controversial committees concerned with administration, interior and public works (each a consolidation of a number of different committees brought together under the Legislative Reorganization Act) have such varied tasks to perform that they also inevitably work through subcommittees. On the other hand, committees are less likely to subdivide their work if it involves broad policy rather than great detail, or if it does not fall easily into categories that can be assigned to regular subcommittees. The more controversial this work, the less likely it is to be consigned to subcommittee autonomy. The activities of the House Committee on Rules (which determines the conditions under which most major legislation reaches the floor) and on Un-American Activities (which is primarily an investigating committee) do not lend themselves to subcommittee organization, except, in the latter case, for the limited purpose of holding hearings. A somewhat better case could be made for the use of subcommittees on the two revenue-raising committees, yet they generally handle broad matters which senior members are reluctant to turn over to subcommittees.<sup>9</sup> While the foreign relations committees have carefully organized subcommittee systems for study purposes, because of the broad nature of their work, the major share of it is done by the full committee.

Beyond these limits deriving from the character of a committee's assigned tasks, organization reflects to a great extent the nature of the chairman—his personality, his political ideology and his concept of his role. No recent change of chairmen has illustrated this better than the succession of Adam Clayton Powell of Harlem to the top position on the House Committee on Education and Labor in the 87th Congress. His predecessor, Graham Barden of North Carolina, had succeeded in bottling up many liberal proposals in the eight years of his chairmanship. He formed only those subcommittees made necessary by the varied jurisdiction of his committee, and he saw that they were headed by trusted conservatives, passing over second-ranking Powell in the process. In 1961, Powell brought a burst of activity to the committee which was not expected by some observers, since he had not previously taken his committee work seriously. He followed a novel approach of creating three subcommittees on education and three on labor. Two of these six subcommittees were called "general," two "special" and two "select," but these titles meant nothing. By increasing the number of subcommittees he was able, without depriving existing subcommittee chairmen of their position, to find chairmanships for younger liberals such as Edith Green, James Roosevelt and Frank Thompson, Jr., and he channelled much of President Kennedy's controversial social program to their subcommittees.

A conservative chairman will not generally want to see much development of subcommittees, especially if he heads one of the important control committees of Congress—House Rules, House Ways and Means, Senate Finance, House and Senate Appropriations. Tight conservative control of these five committees can thwart many legislative programs of the most liberal Congress. As has been noted, the work of the first three does not lend itself to subdivision, while the work on appropriations demands it. If it were physically possible to perform the burdensome work of the appropriations committees without subcommittees, one can be sure that conservative chairmen would do so. As it is, they have to content themselves with careful appointment of subcommittee chairmen. For a conservative chairman, perhaps the next best thing to having no subcommittees is to have numbered subcommittees without specified jurisdiction and to assign bills to them according to their responsiveness to his desires. All 87th Congress examples were in the House, and the chairmen were all Southern conservatives of the older generation: Carl Vinson of Georgia, chairman of Armed Services<sup>10</sup> and 77 at the beginning of the Congress; Brent Spence of Kentucky, chairman of Banking and Currency,<sup>11</sup> 86; and John McMillan of South Carolina, chairman of District of Columbia, 62.<sup>12</sup> Vinson works largely through ad hoc subcommittees established to handle specific pieces of legislation, an approach which has been characterized as "the chairman's secret weapon." Finally, the fact that the major part of the work of Senate Government Operations and House Post Office and Civil Service is performed by the full committee can be explained in part by the fact that both chairmen are Southern conservatives.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>10</sup> This committee has not had subcommittees with clear jurisdiction since the Republican 80th Congress.

<sup>11</sup> One subcommittee on housing has considerable autonomy.

<sup>12</sup> Chairman McMillan did not abandon subcommittees with assigned jurisdiction until the 86th Congress.

<sup>13</sup> It should also be noted that Senate Government Operations is one of the smallest committees in the Senate and all members have two other committee assignments, so there is relatively little membership pressure for the creation of subcommittees.

<sup>9</sup> The House Ways and Means Committee has made use of ad hoc subcommittees but has not given them power to recommend legislation to the full committee. In the old days of tariff legislation, the majority members of this committee regularly caucused as a sort of subcommittee to mark up the bill, in order to develop a united front when the bill was reported. See E. E. Schattschneider, Politics, Pressures and the Tariff (New York, 1935).

Not all chairmen resist the development of subcommittees. Some may subdivide committee work from a desire for greater committee democracy. Clare Engle, when he was chairman of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, deliberately held his committee with a loose rein. He took a hand in drawing rules which provided for a unique degree of democratic participation in committee activities and a large measure of subcommittee autonomy. Or some may create subcommittees for some strategic reason. It may be a move to prevent a rebellion on the part of the members, which seems to have been the reason for the creation of some subcommittees on House Education and Labor by Chairman Barden; or it may be a desire to maintain friendly relations with outside groups. The chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare reportedly found it advisable to divest himself of direct contact with the problems of the aging, for he wanted to remain on good terms with the American Medical Association. A subcommittee was created in the 86th Congress to handle this subject and it was given great autonomy. In the 87th Congress it was made a select committee of the Senate and thus divorced entirely from the Labor Committee.

Two other factors play a part in encouraging the creation of subcommittees, the large size of the House and the desire of outside groups for regular points of contact in Congress. There is certainly pressure for the establishment of subcommittees in the House, which acts as a counterbalance to the tendency of House chairmen to maintain more centralized control. There are more members looking for something to do, and more demands from them for some means of achieving public recognition. Secondly, both non-governmental pressure groups and government agencies find it to their advantage to have subcommittees, preferably with permanent staffs, with which they can work. As an example, both Judiciary subcommittees on immigration, one chaired by Representative Walter and the other by Senator Eastland, provide a point of contact for interests believing in a restrictive immigration policy. Liberal interests in the field have given strong support to Senator Philip Hart's special judiciary subcommittee to investigate problems connected with refugees and escapees.

Most subcommittees are organized to handle a specific functional problem of government such as agricultural production, Indian affairs, education, flood control or disarmament. Some committees, however, have experimented with different bases of organization. The House Agriculture Committee, for example, has two sets of subcommittees, one concerned with broad agricultural problems such as farm production, and another with specific agricultural commodities. Some staff members prefer the former as a means of getting committee members to take a broader view of agricultural policy. Committee members themselves seem to prefer the commodity organization as a better means of representing their specific clientele interests.<sup>14</sup> It is significant that the commodity subcommittees generally win if there is a jurisdictional dispute between them and the functional subcommittees.

In another variation, both House and Senate foreign affairs committees have subcommittees organized on a geographical basis (Europe, Africa, etc.) as well as those organized to handle such functional problems as disarmament and national security. They are all called "consultative" subcommittees and they are used primarily as a means of liaison with the Department of State.<sup>15</sup> Legislative proposals are handled by the full committee or by ad hoc subcommittees, though recently the House committee has begun to assign some bills to the consultative subcommittees. This practice may lead to jurisdictional disputes as to whether a matter should be referred to a geographical or a problem subcommittee.

Subcommittee organization in the Senate is rarely identical with that of the parallel House committee. Where their jurisdiction falls into natural subdivisions, subcommittee organization is more likely to be similar. The Interior committees are examples; incidentally, they are the only committees to have maintained almost the same subcommittee organization since the 80th Congress. The two committees on Government Operations, on the other hand, have a far more vague jurisdiction, encompassing the entire field of government. Their subcommittees tend far more to reflect the interests of the chairmen and individual members.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>14</sup> Charles O. Jones found that, with three exceptions, members of the House Agriculture Committee in the 85th Congress served on subcommittees which dealt with commodities produced in their districts. "Representation in Congress: The Case of the House Agriculture Committee," this REVIEW, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), p. 358.

<sup>15</sup> The activity of these consultative subcommittees varies greatly with each chairman. Senator John F. Kennedy's African affairs subcommittee, for example, was largely inactive because its chairman found other demands on his time more pressing.

<sup>16</sup> In the 86th Congress, the House Committee on Government Operations had these subcom-

Even though the House and Senate Interior Committees have an almost identical subcommittee pattern, this fact does not seem to lend impetus to bicameral subcommittee cooperation. In fact, there is very little cooperation between House and Senate subcommittees. A questionnaire sent to all committees produced only four examples of joint subcommittee hearings held in recent years: the District of Columbia committees on tax problems, government operations committees on intergovernmental relations, the judiciary committees on the Immigration Act of 1952 and the public works committees on Niagara power. Six sets of committees on Niagara power. But six sets of parallel committees reported fairly close staff cooperation along subcommittee lines.<sup>17</sup>

III. CONTROL OF SUBCOMMITTEES

Neither the House nor the Senate maintains any kind of detailed control over subcommittee organization. This may seem surprising, for subcommittee recommendations often become the law of the land without suffering major changes in the full committee or in the entire Congress. It is in keeping, however, with the general pattern of committee autonomy and the lack of any very effective party discipline.

The rules of the House and Senate do specify certain procedures which must be followed by subcommittees. For example, all subcommittee hearings, with certain stated exceptions, are to be open, and a subcommittee quorum may not be less than one-third of the membership save at a meeting for the purpose of taking testimony.<sup>18</sup> Laxity in matters of procedural fairness has raised civil liberties issues from time to time in the course of subcommittee investigating activities, particularly when contempt penalties are invoked. An extensive literature deals with this topic, which is outside the scope of the present study.

The parent house has occasionally called for the establishment of specific subcommittees or instructed certain subcommittees to carry out a designated task, but the overwhelmingly prevalent practice is to leave these decisions to the committees.<sup>19</sup> The parent house may also specifically call for a subcommittee report to be made directly to the floor without the intervening approval of the full committee.<sup>20</sup> Again, however, practice overwhelmingly dictates that the full committee approve and submit subcommittee reports. The major house control is that of granting additional funds for subcommittee staff and expenses beyond the ten positions (four professional and six clerical) automatically allowed each committee by the Legislative Reorganization Act. Committees, however, are rarely denied their requested budgets.

The most effective controls over subcommittees lie clearly in the hands of the individual committees. Whether these controls are exercised by a dominant senior minority of the membership or by a majority of the full committee varies from one committee to the next. There is likely to be a tug of war between the chairman, often joined by other senior members, and the junior members. The latter may attempt to win greater control because they do not agree with the policies of the senior members, because they are impatient with committee inactivity on a particular topic, or even because they seek the publicity that can come from a skillfully timed subcommittee investigation. Chairmen are generally fearful of letting too much power slip into the hands of members. Many chairmen are painfully aware that a subcommittee, especially an investigating subcommittee, can capture the limelight and severely limit the freedom of action of the parent committee. A subcommittee tail, in other words, has more than once wagged a committee dog.<sup>21</sup> Often, though by no means always, chairmen are conservatives reluctant to share power with their more liberal junior colleagues. Again, a chairman may hold out against delegating subcommittee powers to individual committee members because he lacks confidence in their competence or readiness to discharge committee duties adequately.

In this struggle, the chairman deals from a stacked deck. He should be able to maintain mittees: executive and legislative reorganization, military operations, government activities, intergovernmental relations, foreign operations, and monetary affairs; the Senate Committees had: investigations, reorganization and international organizations, and national policy machinery.

<sup>17</sup> Committees concerned with appropriations, armed services, District of Columbia, foreign affairs, judiciary and labor.

<sup>18</sup> See section 133 of the Legislative Reorganization Act, P.L. 601, 79th Cong., 2d sess.; House Rule XI; Senate Rule XXV.

<sup>19</sup> Charles L. Watkins and Floyd M. Riddick, Senate Procedure S. Doc. 93, 85th Cong., 1st sess. 1958), p. 156 and Asher Hinds, Precedents of the House (Washington, 1907), Vol. III, sec. 1754.

<sup>20</sup> Senate Procedure, p. 529 and Precedents of the House, Vol. IV, sec. 4551.

<sup>21</sup> For a fascinating example see Bernard Schwartz, The Professor and the Commissions (New York, 1959).

control even against rank-and-file rebellion, unless he is politically inept. He can, in most cases, establish subcommittees, determine their size, establish party ratios, appoint the members, maintain ex officio membership, control the referral of bills and either assign or hold back staff and money for subcommittee operations.

The power of a chairman to establish subcommittees has been challenged in the courts on the ground that a competent tribunal must be created by resolution of the full committee. A federal Court of Appeals, however, stated that "it is the unvarying practice of the Senate to follow the method of creating and appointing subcommittees which was employed in this instance."<sup>22</sup> This allows the chairman primary control over subcommittee structure. As already noted, he may allow no subcommittees, work primarily by means of ad hoc subcommittees, create standing subcommittees but give them numbers and assign them no continuing jurisdiction, or he may establish standing subcommittees with clearly outlined jurisdiction and some degree of autonomy.

Subcommittee members are chosen by a variety of methods, depending upon custom and individual committee rules. They may be designated by the chairman alone or in consultation with the ranking minority member. Appointments may be designed to punish slackers or to punish enemies and reward friends. Often senior members will be appointed to more subcommittees than junior members, as a means of preventing the newer men from gaining too much control—or introducing their apprenticeships gradually, as a chairman might prefer to put it. Membership approval of appointments is not required on a majority of committees. Those interested in limiting the powers of committee-chairmen often advocate rules that subcommittee chairmen be chosen on the basis of seniority, so as to remove an element of discretion, and hence influence, on the part of chairmen. The House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs is the only one which has such a provision written into its rules, but the pattern evidently is widely followed. One of the major reasons for this is that senior members are often unwilling to sit under junior subcommittee chairmen in the seniority-conscious Congress. In the 86th Congress eighteen House committees had subcommittees and in half of these no senior member of the majority party had been by-passed in the choice of subcommittee chairmen.<sup>23</sup> In the Senate, five of the fourteen subdivided committees followed seniority.<sup>24</sup> Interestingly, in the less party-oriented Senate, two Republicans were allowed subcommittee chairmanships in the Democratic 86th Congress. J. Glenn Beall of Maryland was chairman of the business and commerce subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia and George D. Aiken of Vermont, of the Canadian affairs subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations. In both these cases, the geographical proximity of the senator's constituents to the subject matter of his subcommittee's jurisdiction gave him a special interest (and prerogative?) in the assignment, there being no Democratic senator from either Maryland or Vermont.<sup>25</sup>

Party ratios on subcommittees may also be controlled by the chairmen, since the full house exercises no control here. The full committee is less likely to reverse the decisions of large subcommittees, especially with a safe majority party margin. Yet sometimes a small subcommittee can serve a chairman's needs, for he may be helped by absenteeism in the minority party. The ranking Republican member of the House Committee on Armed Services asked, unsuccessfully, at its organization meeting in 1961 that the party ratio on the special investigations subcommittee be raised from three-to-two to four-to-three, so that "at least two members subcommittee chairmanship on the committees on Agriculture, Appropriations, District of Columbia, Education and Labor, Government Operations, Judiciary, Post Office and Civil Service, Science and Astronautics, and Ways and Means. Neither the Rules nor the Un-American Activities committees have subcommittees.

---

<sup>24</sup> One or more of the senior members did not have a subcommittee chairmanship on the committees on Appropriations, Armed Services, Banking and Currency, Government Operations, Interior and Insular Affairs, Judiciary, and Rules and Administration. Neither Aeronautical and Space Sciences nor the Finance committee had subcommittees. District of Columbia and Foreign Relations each had one Republican subcommittee chairman.

<sup>25</sup> Prior to the 84th Congress, the Judiciary Committee had a reciprocity custom, after a change in party control, of giving the previous chairman of the full committee a subcommittee chairmanship. Senator Wiley was chairman of patents in the 81st and 82d Congresses. Senator McCarran was chairman of judicial machinery in the 83d Congress.

<sup>22</sup> Meyers v. United States, 171 F (2d) 800 (1948).

<sup>23</sup> One or more senior members did not hold a

could be present most of the time."<sup>26</sup> Occasional complaints reach the stage of floor debate, as in 1951 when Clare E. Hoffman called for a resolution instructing the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations to divide subcommittee membership between Democrats and Republicans "in as near as possible the same ratio that exists in the House" instead of using this device to "punish members who voted against his pet idea of the way appropriations bills should be handled."<sup>27</sup> A survey of subcommittee ratios during the 86th Congress shows little uniformity. Both houses had roughly two-to-one party ratios, and yet only six Senate subcommittees and no House subcommittees had ratios less favorable to the minority party than two-to-one, and the great majority were more favorably divided.<sup>28</sup>

Chairmen and ranking minority members often retain ex officio membership on all subcommittees. While this may not mean that these committee leaders attend regularly, it is another means of exerting control if a need is felt. The rules of ten of the twenty House committees give ex officio membership to both chairman and ranking member, while in the case of Armed Services and Judiciary, only the chairman is automatically a member. There is no provision for ex officio membership by ranking minority members in the Senate, but the chairman is made a member in five of the sixteen committees.

The less automatic the referral of legislative matters to subcommittees, the greater the chairman's powers. In three House committees in the 86th Congress, for example (Armed Services, Banking and Currency and District of Columbia), subcommittees had no clear field of jurisdiction and referral was entirely at the discretion of the chairman. Other committee chairmen have used this device from time to time in the past. Charles Wolverton, Republican chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce during the 80th Congress (1947-1948) reportedly abolished subcommittee specialization because he was in basic disagreement with some of his senior Republican colleagues. Even the timing of referral can be a means of exerting the chair-man's power. Lister Hill of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee does not refer important legislative matters until he has done careful preparatory groundwork, whereas in many committees, referral is handled by the clerk in a routine fashion.

Chairmen are also in a position to control committee staff assignments. Most prefer to rotate staff members and not have them permanently assigned to a subcommittee. If a subcommittee can call a permanent staff its own it has taken a major step toward independence from the full committee. In the 86th Congress a total of sixteen subcommittees (a sixth of the total) had their own staff. These were subcommittees of Banking and Currency, Government Operations, Judiciary and Public Works. In the Senate, as might be expected, there was evidence of greater subcommittee autonomy. Forty-one—roughly half of the 86 subcommittees—had their assigned permanent staff. These were subcommittees of Appropriations, Banking and Currency, Government Operations, Interior and Insular Affairs, Judiciary, Labor and Public Welfare and Rules and Administration.<sup>29</sup> The quality of subcommittee staff varies greatly. Particularly on the Senate Judiciary Committee—and despite the admonitions to the contrary in the Legislative Reorganization Act—positions are used as patronage appointments for various subcommittee members, and this practice generally results in inefficiency of operation. Some newer members of this Committee carefully refrain from asking to have their men taken on the staffs so that they will not have to reciprocate when they have a subcommittee of their own.

Chairmen can make skillful use of the allocation of funds to subcommittees. A subcommittee appropriation with few strings attached allows great freedom in the hiring of staff and other subcommittee activities. Also, the allocation of travel funds can be used effectively to reward and punish members.

Finally, a chairman may, in the case of investigating subcommittees, withhold or restrict the subpoena power. Bernard Schwartz, recounting his experiences as staff man for the legislative oversight subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, spoke to this point:

If Moulder [the subcommittee chairman] and I were given the subpoena power and the authority to secure a competent, loyal staff, we would

<sup>26</sup> House Committee on Armed Services, "The Organization of the House Committee on Armed Services," Committee print, Feb. 16, 1961, p. 9.

<sup>27</sup> Congressional Record, 82d Cong. 1st sess. (1951), p. 1174.

<sup>28</sup> The Senate exceptions are Appropriations subcommittees for commerce, interior and treasury; Judiciary's subcommittees on patents, codification and constitutional rights.

<sup>29</sup> This information has been gathered from House and Senate telephone directories, legislative calendars of the various committees and interviews with staff members of the 36 committees.

have obtained the very tools we needed to undertake a thorough probe which no one could control.<sup>30</sup>

Taking all these factors into consideration, the Senate Finance Committee is the most centralized committee in Congress. It has no standing subcommittees whatsoever. Its budget is one of the lowest. In the 87th Congress the Committee had a staff of six, only one of whom was carried as a professional. While supposedly it uses the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, some of the less senior members on Finance claim that this staff is readily available only to the three top majority and two top minority members of the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means committees who make up the membership of the Joint Committee.<sup>31</sup> There is much dissatisfaction with the situation among those members of the Committee who disagree with Chairman Byrd's ultra-conservative views, but there are not enough of them to wrest control.

By all odds, the House Committee on Government Operations is the most decentralized committee in Congress. During Clare Hoffman's chairmanship in the 83d Congress, committee members not only mutinied, but even more unusual, they discussed the whole affair at some length on the floor of the House.<sup>32</sup> Representative Hoffman attempted to cut down on the activities of his standing subcommittees. He made great use of ad hoc subcommittees consisting of two Republicans and one Democrat, appointed Democrats without consulting the ranking minority member on the Committee, and in at least one instance evidently failed to notify the ranking Democrat of such a subcommittee's creation. These ad hoc subcommittees, according to the charges of the majority, conducted field investigations timed to influence local elections. Rebellion finally took place on July 15, 1953, when members voted 23 to 1 (6 members abstaining) to prohibit further creation of ad hoc subcommittees save by resolution of the full committee. They further voted to grant virtual autonomy to the five existing standing subcommittees, giving each the power to appoint staff members and to fix their pay, to subpoena witnesses and to hold hearings outside Washington. Throughout that Congress subcommittee chairmen signed their own expense vouchers. Even in defeat, however, Hoffman retained his powers to refer bills to subcommittees, and to approve the printing of subcommittee hearings and reports; and he used these to harass the rest of the committee members.<sup>33</sup>

Hoffman's successor, Democratic chairman William L. Dawson, a Negro from Chicago, has encountered no rebellion of this sort; he has also been either unwilling or unable or unambitious to centralize committee control greatly since the 83d Congress. As a result, subcommittees have large permanent staffs and sizeable budgets. They are housed often at some distance from the Committee headquarters, and they issue their own press releases and carry on their own mailing operations.

How is it possible to find in Congress such extremes of centralization and decentralization? Part of the answer lies in the differences between the two committees. The Senate Finance Committee has a fairly clear jurisdiction, and one that is not easy to parcel out among subcommittees. House Government Operations, on the other hand, has a broad, vague jurisdiction, and its work lends itself to subdivision. Further, the subject matter of Finance is far more important than that of Government Operations, and the conservative coalition in Congress seems determined to keep control of this committee in its own hands. Another part of the answer lies in the differing personalities of the two chairmen. Byrd is an accomplished politician who has done many favors and won many allies. He is sensitive to human relations and knows how to loosen his reins of control a little when he senses incipient rebellion. Hoffman, on the other hand, is a lone operator who had few legislative friends and had alienated President Eisenhower at the time of the 1953 revolt. He even failed to win the support of other committee chairmen with his floor comments on the episode, which were <sup>31</sup> It has been claimed that the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation is a device for keeping staff services from the more liberal, less senior members of the two revenue committees. This seems most applicable to the newer members of the Senate Finance Committee. Junior members of House Ways and Means say that they can get all the assistance they need from the Ways and Means staff which is three times as large as that of Finance. It may well be true that liberal members would not receive congenial staff assistance from any of the staff members of the three committees involved.

<sup>30</sup> Op. cit., p. 102.

<sup>32</sup> Congressional Record, 83d Cong., 1st sess. (1953), pp. 9092-9097, 9103-9107, 9242-9254, 10352-10363.

<sup>33</sup> Reportedly, it took great pressure from President Eisenhower to get chairman Hoffman to refer to subcommittees the proposals to establish the Second Hoover Commission and the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

clearly calculated to bring them to his side:

There is nothing unusual in the desire of subcommittee chairmen to increase their authority, to be free agents, to give jobs to an unlimited number of employees, or to hold hearings in this country or elsewhere, wherever fancy or reason might create a desire. . . . Once let this desire prevail and no chairman of any committee of the House will be able to stem the drive for authority and the House itself will be without control over the activities of its members.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>34</sup> Congressional Record, 83d Cong., 1st sess. (1953), p. 9094. In a brief interview granted the author on August 19, 1960, Congressman Hoff-

This "drive for authority" will continue to express itself in the subcommittee structure, though only rarely in as extreme a form as he confronted. Subcommittees allow greater specialization in the legislative branch in an era which puts a premium on specialization. They also give a flexibility to the seniority system, by allowing less senior committee members to play effective legislative roles. These advantages and the gradual coming to power of younger, more organization-minded chairmen must inevitably cut into the degree of centralized control maintained by such old-time chairmen as Harry Byrd and Carl Vinson.

---

man would only comment that the whole affair was the work of national labor leaders.

QUASI-PARTISAN CONFLICT IN A ONE-PARTY LEGISLATIVE SYSTEM: THE FLORIDA SENATE, 1947-1961*

MALCOLM B. PARSONS
The Florida State University

A standard approach to American politics, national, state, or local, distinguishes the two-party and one-party systems, with a range of modifications in between.<sup>1</sup> Florida has long been described as a one-party state, part of the "solid south." Since Reconstruction days, and until very recently, the Republican party there has had virtually no state and local organization, virtually no public office seekers nor office holders, virtually no registered voters, and virtually no supporters at the polls. In recent years this state of affairs has been in perceptible change. Traditionally Democratic Florida went Republican in the last three presidential elections. Indeed, Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman are the only Democratic presidential nominees to have won Florida's electoral support since 1924. In the past decade there has been a marked increase in registered Republican voters, in Republican candidates and votes for them; and the state and local Republican organizations have expanded and otherwise appeared to be viable. These political changes seem to be related to other changes—industrialization, urbanization, growing wealth and a population explosion whose principal cause has been immigration from other states, mostly northern.

Yet Florida congressional, state and local politics, with few exceptions, remain essentially the politics of a one-party state in the sense that holding offices at these governmental levels is virtually monopolized by the Democratic party, and in the sense that when competition for them occurs it still occurs predominantly within the Democratic party. It is a matter for speculation, beyond the scope of this study, why the two-party breakthrough has succeeded in, and has so far been chiefly confined to, presidential elections. But it is a matter for investigation, and the subject of this study, how far intra-Democratic state factional divisions conform to the workings of a two-party system. It remains to be seen whether this factionalism is related to emergent Republicanism in an evolutionary or causal sense.

It is assumed in this paper that the political system in Florida is in transition; that the attitudes, beliefs and preferences of a substantial number of Florida citizens find inadequate accommodation and expression within the national, state, and local components of the traditionally predominant single party. It is further assumed that these aspects of change in the Florida political system are reflected in the operations of the state's one-party legislature.

I. HYPOTHESIS AND METHOD

This paper reports an investigation of the Florida Senate, 1947-1961, designed to test the following hypothesis: that there is a pattern of conflict within the one-party dominance of the Florida Senate, displayed on such issues as the control of its presidency and committees and in its divisions on controversial roll call votes, that approximates the operations of a two-party system; and that this pattern occurs along a line of opposition between constituencies of continued Democratic dominance in the face of social change and emergent Republicanism, and Democratic constituencies that lack any strong semblance of either.<sup>2</sup>

There are many studies of legislative behavior in two-party settings.<sup>3</sup> The principal <sup>2</sup> The hypothesis is related to the suggestion of the Committee on American Legislatures of the American Political Science Association in 1954, that in states lacking a strong two-party system "factionalism . . . may have much the same effect. . . ." Belle Zeller (ed.), American State Legislatures (New York, 1954), p. 192.

<sup>3</sup> The seminal study of party and legislation is A. Lawrence Lowell, "The Influence of Party upon Legislation in England and America," Annual Report of the American Historical Society for the Year 1901, Vol. I (1902), p. 319 ff. In the Congress, see Julius Turner, Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1951), and David Truman's case study, The Congressional Party (New York, 1959). In state legislatures, see William J. Keefe, "Party Government and Lawmaking in the Illinois General Assembly," Northwestern Univ. L. Rev., Vol. 47 (March 1952), p. 55 ff., and "Parties, Partisanship, and Public Policy in the Pennsylvania Legislature," this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (June

* This investigation was supported in part by the Research Council and the Institute of Governmental Research, both of the Florida State University.

<sup>1</sup> See Austin Ranney and Willmoore Kendall, "The American Party Systems," this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (June 1954), p. 477 ff.

difference in the Florida setting is the traditional one-party system.<sup>4</sup> This study is of the Florida Senate rather than the House of Representatives, or both, because of the nearer monopoly of the Democratic party in the Senate;<sup>5</sup> because only senators are chosen from single-member districts; because the Senate with longer terms and fewer members is regarded as having the greater influence; and because of the economy of effort in dealing with one rather than both.

To test the hypothesis in this study, the Florida senatorial districts were classified with respect to three equally weighted variables: (1) the degree of population growth, 1950-1960; (2) the degree of Republican presidential voting strength, 1950-1960; and (3) the degree of Republican gubernatorial voting strength, 1960. It was assumed that cleavages in the legislative behavior of nominally Democratic senators could be correlated with the differences thus identified in their constituencies. A crude Index of Change ranging from 1 to 4 was used to differentiate each senatorial district on the basis of its mean position on all of the three variables, as follows:

Variable 1—Degree of population growth, 1950-1960

- 1=less than 68% of the state's rate of growth
- 2=68% to 99% of the state's rate of growth

1954), p. 450 ff.; Duncan MacRae, Jr., "The Relation Between Roll Call Votes and Constituencies in the Massachusetts House of Representatives," id., Vol. 46 (December 1952), p. 1046 ff.; Malcolm E. Jewell, "Party Voting in American State Legislatures," id., Vol. 49 (September 1955), p. 773 ff.; David R. Derge, "Urban-Rural Conflict: The Case in Illinois," in John C. Wahlke and Heinz Eulau, Legislative Behavior (Glencoe, 1959), p. 218 ff.; Thomas R. Dye, "A Comparison of Constituency Influences in the Upper and Lower Chambers of a State Legislature," Western Pol. Q., Vol. 14 (June 1961), p. 473 ff.

<sup>4</sup> For a study in a one-party setting see Murray C. Havens, City versus Farm? Urban-Rural Conflict in the Alabama Legislature (University, Alabama: Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama, 1957); however it has certain methodological weaknesses which are identified and discussed by Derge, op. cit., p. 227.

<sup>5</sup> From 1947-1961, only one Republican has served in the 38-member Senate, and only in the sessions since the 1952 elections. He has been elected from the single-county Pinellas district (St. Petersburg).

3=100% to 149% of the state's rate of growth

4=150% and more of the state's rate of growth

Variable 2—Republican presidential voting strength, 1950-1960

- 1=Democratic in all three presidential elections
- 2=Republican in one presidential election
- 3=Republican in two presidential elections
- 4=Republican in all three presidential elections

Variable 3—Republican gubernatorial voting strength, 1960

- 1=less than 15% of the gubernatorial vote Republican
- 2=15% to 29% of the gubernatorial vote Republican
- 3=30% to 44% of the gubernatorial vote Republican
- 4=45% or more of the gubernatorial vote Republican

For example, the 30th senatorial district (the Ft. Lauderdale area), ranked four on each of the three variables for a mean Index of Change of four. The 2d senatorial district (the Pensacola area), ranked two on the first, one on the second, and two on the third variable for a mean Index of Change of 1.6.

In applying this procedure to the thirty-eight senatorial districts and mapping the results (see Map), it was apparent that the alignment might be made sectional by drawing a nearly diagonal line to bisect the peninsula, leaving twenty-three districts in the northern section, and fifteen in the southern section. Each of the twenty-three northern districts had an Index of Change of 2.3 or less:

- 2.3— 2 districts
- 2.0— 4 "
- 1.6— 3 "
- 1.3— 2 "
- 1.0—12 "

The mean index of these districts was 1.35. With one exception, each of the fifteen southern districts had an Index of Change of 2.6 or more:

- 2.3—1 district(s)
- 2.6—1 "
- 3.0—3 "
- 3.3—4 "
- 3.6—2 "
- 4.0—4 "

The mean index of the southern districts was 3.35. The one exception was an interior district, included in the southern section only for the purpose of geographical symmetry, or simplicity. The twenty-three Democratic northern senators come from districts of scant (if any) population growth and stable Democratic presidential and gubernatorial voting behavior. The fifteen southern senators, with the single exception noted, come from districts of heavy population growth and increasingly significant Republican presidential and gubernatorial voting behavior, though all but one of them are nominally Democrats.

This alignment is not what has been traditionally called urban-rural conflict, although it has some of those characteristics.<sup>6</sup> Following Friedman, constituencies with cities of 50,000 and more population may be classed as urban; constituencies with cities 15,000 to 50,000, as mixed; and constituencies with cities under 15,000 in population, as rural.<sup>7</sup> On this basis, using 1960 census data, the twenty-three northern senators come from two urban, six mixed, and fifteen rural districts; the fifteen southern senators come from ten urban, three mixed, and two rural districts. Two of the state's eight standard metropolitan areas are in the north, six are in the south.

Key has demonstrated that "The cleavage between metropolitan residents and rural and small town dwellers has become a most significant foundation for dual systems of state politics."<sup>8</sup> This study in the Florida setting views the situation from a somewhat different conceptual perspective. As Friedman has said:

conflicts which superficially may be described as setting urban areas against rural areas are more satisfactorily explained in terms of conflict among social, economic, and cultural interests which have incidentally been associated with urban and rural areas, at least in the past.<sup>9</sup>

The hypothesis was tested by seeing to what extent the north-south sectional alignment was actually reflected in the operations of the <sup>6</sup> V. O. Key, Jr., for example, perceived "an imperfect sort of sectionalism" in Florida, but noted that "the political differences between the two areas are not ordinary sectionalism; they are in fact rural-urban differences." Southern Politics in State and Nation (New York, 1949), p. 92.

<sup>7</sup> Robert S. Friedman, "The Urban-Rural Conflict Revisited," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 14 (June 1961), p. 481 ff.

<sup>8</sup> V. O. Key, Jr., American State Politics: An Introduction (New York, 1956), pp. 229-230.

<sup>9</sup> Op. cit., p. 485.

Florida senate during the period 1947-1961. This period was used because its beginning marked the inception of the present senatorial apportionment and because it coincided with the period of recent political and population change. In this study those who control the senate were defined as those who regularly held its presidency, its key committee chairmanships, membership on its key committees, and who regularly prevailed in controversial roll-call votes. To the extent that sectional alignment provided an accurate perspective for viewing the senate, one would expect the data to show control in the hands of the numerically larger group of northern senators, with the smaller group of southern senators cast in a minority role.

II. FINDINGS: CONTROL OF THE PRESIDENCY

The President of the Senate has customarily been chosen by a caucus of the members at the beginning of the biennial session two years before the one in which he was to hold the position. For some time it was the practice to restrict the caucus to the holdover senators, i.e., that half of the total number whose terms ran two years beyond the immediate past election. Since 1957 the entire membership has participated—with the exception of the single Republican, as this is a Democratic party caucus.

Of main concern in this study were two powers of the President: his power to appoint members of committees and designate their chairmen, and his power to refer bills to committees.<sup>10</sup> An important use of the latter is multiple referral, i.e., referral of a bill to two or more committees, which increases the difficulty of getting measures to the floor and facilitates killing them.

All presidents during the eight sessions 1947-1961, as well as the president-designate for the 1963 session, were from constituencies in the northern section of the state.<sup>11</sup> (See Table I.)

<sup>10</sup> Two other features of the office may be noted. Florida has no Lieutenant Governor; the President succeeds to the Governorship when it becomes vacant. This feature of the office has been prominent since Senate President Charley Johns succeeded to the Governorship in 1953 upon the death of Governor Dan McCarty. And after the 1961 legislative session, Senate President W. Randolph Hodges was appointed by the Governor to be state Conservation Director. He did not resign as Senate President; under an Attorney General's opinion he is expected to occupy both posts until another Senate President is named in the 1963 session.

<sup>11</sup> In 1955 a senator from the southern section, Harry King, was designated to serve as President

In the preceding nine sessions, 1929-1945, there had been four presidents from the northern section and five from the southern section. A total of nine presidencies had been held by senators from the southern section during the 19 biennia from 1907 to 1945.

III. FINDINGS: CONTROL OF COMMITTEE CHAIRMANSHIPS AND MEMBERSHIPS

From 1947 to 1961 the Florida Senate worked with 38-40 standing committees per session, of the 1957 session. He never served, however, as he resigned from the senate to stand trial and conviction on charges of bribing a Representative from his county not to oppose him in the 1956 Democratic senatorial primary.

TABLE I. FLORIDA SENATE PRESIDENTS AND THEIR HOME DISTRICTS, 1947-1963

Session	President	City	District Index of Change
1947	Clarke	Monticello	1
1949	Brackin	Crestview	1.3
1951	Sturgis	Ocala	2
1953	Johns	Starke	1
1955	Davis	Madison	1
1957	Shands	Gainesville	2.3
1959	Johnson	Quincy	1
1961	Hodges	Cedar Key	1
1963	Carraway	Tallahassee	1.6

Sectional Alignment of Florida Senatorial Districts, Based on an Index of Change, 1950-1960.

TABLE II. THE TEN MOST AND THE TEN LEAST IMPORTANT COMMITTEES OF THE FLORIDA SENATE WITH NORTH-SOUTH SECTIONAL* CORRELATES OF THEIR CHAIRMANSHIPS AND MEMBERSHIPS, 1947-1961

Average Value on Scale of Importance†	Committee	Chairmanship Rate %	Membership Rate %
4.0	Appropriations	87.5 North	70 North
4.0	Finance and Taxation	100 North	63 North
3.94	Rules and Calendar	62.5 North	74 North
3.73	Constitutional Amendments and Governmental Reorganization	92 North	70 North
3.52	Education	50 North-South	58 North
2.89	Welfare	62.5 North	70 North
2.78	Roads	62.5 North	73 North
2.68	Judiciary "A"	50 North-South	50 North-South
2.31	Miscellaneous	62.5 North	54 North
2.31	Judiciary "C"	87.5 North	73 North
1.31	Oil and Natural Resources	62.5 South	53 South
1.26	County Organizations	50 North-South	50 North-South
1.23	Building and Loan Associations	60 South	57 South
1.22	Transportation	62.5 South	52 North
1.15	Pensions and Claims	62.5 South	63 North
1.10	Legislative Management and Population	64 North	74 North
1.10	Industrial and Atomic Energy	66.6 South	52 South
1.0	Publicity and Advertising	50 North-South	54 South
1.0	Corporations	62.5 South	54 South
.68	Veterans Affairs, Radio and TV	50 North-South	52 North

* See Map. Perfect correspondence with the sectional distribution of senate seats would show proportions of 60.5 North and 39.5 South on all Committees.

† Rated 0-4 in terms of power, influence, and prestige on questionnaire returned by 76% of a panel of experienced members of the Florida press.

each of the 38 senators holding at least one chairmanship. For my purposes, therefore, it was necessary to determine objectively the relative importance of the committees. To this end, they were ranked on the basis of the collective judgment of a panel of experts, consisting of twenty-five members of the press having extensive experience in reporting sessions of the Florida Legislature.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>12</sup> A questionnaire was mailed to each. The standing committees of the Senate were listed beside a scale of five possible judgments as to their importance: most, much, some, little, and least. Each member of the panel was asked to use this scale to appraise the committees in terms of power, influence and prestige. There was 76 per cent return, and the responses were tabulated on the basis of 4, 3, 2, 1, 0 points for each designation of a committee corresponding to the adjectives on the scale. The values were averaged for each committee, and the committees were ranked accordingly.

There was some manifestation of northern dominance of the chairmanships of the ten most important committees, and southern dominance of the chairmanships of the ten least important committees over the entire period, 1947-1961. (See Table II.) Yet for these twenty committees and eight sessions the sectional pattern did not seem to be statistically significant:  $\chi^2$  for the array was 12.40, d.f.=1, and  $p < .005$ ; the  $\phi$  coefficient of contingency = .03. However, for these twenty committees in the four most recent sessions, 1955-1961, statistical significance of the sectional pattern was more convincing:  $\chi^2 = 16.64$ , d.f.=1, and  $p < .005$ ;  $\phi = .46$ . Restricting the analysis to the five most and the five least important committees over the entire period, 1947-1961, statistical significance of the sectional pattern improved:  $\chi^2 = 19.06$ , d.f.=1,  $p < .005$ ;  $\phi = .51$ . And using only these ten committees and only the four most recent sessions, 1955-1961, the correlation was highly significant:  $\chi^2 = 18.04$ , d.f.=1,  $p < .005$ ;  $\phi = .71$ . The sectional pattern, then,

TABLE III. COMPARATIVE NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN SUPPORT FOR THE MAJORITY ON CONTROVERSIAL ROLL CALLS, REGULAR SESSIONS OF 1949 AND 1957, FLORIDA SENATE

Index of Support for Majority	1949		1957
	North No. %	South No. %	North No. %	South No. %
High (67-100)	8 35	10 67	14 61	0 0
Intermediate (51-66)	6 26	1 6	8 35	4 27
Low (50 and below)	9 39	4 27	1 4	11 73
Totals	23 100	15 100	23 100	15 100

operated in control of committee chairmanships most notably in the period 1955-1961, with northern senators dominating the chairmanships of the most important committees, and southern senators dominating the chairmanships of the least important committees.

Committee membership showed substantially the same pattern. (See Table II.) The statistical operations were not performed for membership, though, because the data showed a majority of northern members on all of the most important committees during most of the sessions and because of the long-settled practice of chairmen controlling their committees by casting proxy votes, a practice influenced by the large number of committees, multiple committee membership, and the pressure of legislative work in the sixty days of a biennial session.

IV. FINDINGS: SECTIONAL DIVISIONS ON CONTROVERSIAL ROLL CALLS

An overwhelming majority of roll calls in the Florida Senate are perfunctory and unanimous. This reflects the traditional way of handling local bills, and the function of committees in compromising or killing controversial general legislative proposals before they reach the floor. Nevertheless, a sizeable number of divisions occur at roll call on matters of general legislation. In this study a roll call was defined as controversial if the majority comprised less than 70 per cent of those present and voting. There were 666 such roll calls during the period 1947-1961, the number per regular 60-day session ranging from 49 to 88.

A number of techniques were used to test the hypothesis with respect to roll-call voting behavior. The first was an Index of Support for the Majority, computed for each senator as the ratio of the number of times he voted with the winning majority to the total number of controversial roll-calls in a given session.<sup>13</sup> The computations were mapped so as to show constituencies of high (67-100), intermediate (51-66), or low (50 and below) Indexes of Support for the Majority, and the resultant patterns were compared with the sectional alignment. A map was prepared for each of the eleven regular and special sessions, 1947-1961. None of the support patterns for the five sessions, 1947-1953, was even roughly comparable to the sectional pattern of the model. All of the support patterns for the six sessions, 1955-1961, were strongly similar to the sectional pattern of the model. Comparison of two representative sessions (see Table III) indicated that, for 1949, senators from the northern districts were distributed by approximate thirds among the high, intermediate, and low support categories; whereas two-thirds of the senators from the southern districts were high, somewhat less than one-third low, and the single remaining senator intermediate. In the 1957 session three-fifths of the northern senators were in the high category, more than one-third intermediate, and the one remaining senator low. In marked contrast, approximately three-fourths of the southern senators were low, and the balance intermediate. For the 1949 distribution, with the high and intermediate categories consolidated,  $\chi^2 = .49$ , d.f. = 1, and  $p > .10$ ; the  $\phi$  coefficient of contingency = .01. However, for the 1957 distribution, with the high and intermediate categories consolidated, the statistical significance of the sectional pattern was convincing:  $\chi^2 = 18.19$ , d.f. = 1,  $p < .001$ , and  $\phi = .69$ .

Additional techniques with respect to roll-call voting behavior were applied to sessions in tion of degree of participation with the majority, whereas the Shapley-Shubik Power Index relates also to the function of the size of the majority. See L. S. Shapley and Martin Shubik, "A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System," this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (September 1954), p. 787 ff.

<sup>13</sup> This index is simpler than the Shapley-Shubik Power Index as it relates only to the func-

TABLE IV. DISTRIBUTION OF COHESION INDEXES FOR NORTHERN SENATORS BY SUBJECTS OF CONTROVERSIAL ROLL CALLS, 1955-1961 REGULAR AND SPECIAL SESSIONS, FLORIDA SENATE

Subject of Controversy	Total No. of Roll Calls	Number of Roll Calls Northern Senators' Cohesion			Per Cent of Roll Calls with High and Intermediate Cohesion (%)
		High (71-100)	Intermediate (41-70)	Low (Below 40)
1. Legislative Reapportionment	35	20	13	2	94.3
2. Congressional Redistricting	5	1	3	3	80
3. Legislative Management	4	2	1	1	75
4. Miscellaneous	4	0	3	1	75
5. Race Relations	16	8	4	4	75
6. Constitutional Revision	15	8	3	4	73.3
7. Political Processes	7	4	0	3	57
8. Agriculture and Conservation	7	1	2	4	42.8
9. Regulation of Business	80	16	15	49	38.7
10. Education	13	3	2	8	38.5
11. Finance and Taxation	34	1	11	22	35.3
12. Codes and Judicial Processes	40	1	5	34	15
13. Roads and Highway Safety	24	1	2	21	12.5
14. Health and Welfare	21	0	2	19	9.5
Totals	305	66	66	173	Ave. 43.2%

the period 1955-1961, when the sectional alignment could be observed to be operating. These techniques were designed to test the cohesion of the northern and southern groups and the extent of inter-group conflict on controversial roll calls, which were classified according to subject. The Rice Index of Cohesion was used to test the unity of the total membership of a group.<sup>14</sup> The extent of inter-group conflict was measured initially by percentages of the total number of northern and southern senators opposing one another, and then more rigorously through the use of the Rice Index of Likeness<sup>15</sup> and the chi square test of the null hypothesis.

There were 305 controversial roll calls in the Florida Senate, 1955-1961. The twenty-three northern senators maintained high (71-100) or intermediate (41-70) cohesion on 43.2 per cent of them. (See Table IV.) The fifteen southern senators maintained high or intermediate cohesion on 50.1 per cent of these roll calls.<sup>16</sup> (See Table V.) The tables show the smaller southern group to be more cohesive than the larger northern group, but both groups maintained significant cohesion on a large number of roll calls and through a wide range of subjects of controversy covering, in the judgment of the writer, every important kind of issue that confronted the Senate.<sup>17</sup> It is not surprising that <sup>14</sup> Stuart A. Rice, Quantitative Methods in Politics (New York, 1928), p. 207 ff. Relative tests of cohesion have also been used, which reflect the percentage of a group voting on a particular roll call. The principal limitation of such relative tests is that in operation they tend to an elastic definition of the group under scrutiny, by assuming for purposes of measurement that it only comprises those of its members who vote on a given roll call. For example, if 50 per cent of a group voted "aye" and the remainder abstained from voting, a relative measure would show perfect cohesion of those voting, but the Rice Index would show a complete lack of cohesion for the entire group. The problem that each measure deals with, in its own way, is that of construing the significance of the non-voter. In this study the Rice Index was used precisely because it assumes that members of a defined group who do not vote on a roll call contribute to the group's lack of cohesion.

<sup>15</sup> Stuart Rice, loc. cit.

<sup>16</sup> Two southern seats and one northern seat deviated consistently from the patterns of sectional alignment on controversial roll calls. The rural northern seat from the St. Augustine district sided consistently with the southerners, while the southern seats from the urban Fort Myers and rural Kissimmee districts sided consistently with the northerners.

<sup>17</sup> A detailed analysis of different policy preferences is in preparation. Here it is only intended to suggest the range of subjects through which group conflict and cohesion may be traced. The 305 controversial roll calls, 1955-1961, were grouped

TABLE V. DISTRIBUTION OF COHESION INDEXES FOR SOUTHERN SENATORS BY SUBJECTS OF CONTROVERSIAL ROLL CALLS, 1955-1961 REGULAR AND SPECIAL SESSIONS, FLORIDA SENATE

Subject of Controversy	Total No. of Roll Calls	Number of Roll Calls Southern Senators' Cohesion			Per Cent of Roll Calls with High and Intermediate Cohesion (%)
		High (71-100)	Intermediate (41-70)	Low (Below 40)
1. Legislative Reapportionment	35	24	10	1	97.1
2. Health and Welfare	21	14	4	3	85.7
3. Miscellaneous	4	1	2	1	75
4. Race Relations	16	4	8	4	75
5. Political Processes	7	0	5	2	71.4
6. Constitutional Revision	15	9	0	6	60
7. Agriculture and Conservation	7	1	2	4	42.8
8. Regulation of Business	80	10	24	46	42.5
9. Roads and Highway Safety	24	4	6	14	41.6
10. Congressional Redistricting	5	1	1	3	40
11. Education	13	3	1	9	30.7
12. Codes and Judicial Processes	40	3	9	28	30
13. Legislative Management	4	1	0	3	25
14. Finance and Taxation	34	3	3	28	17.6
Totals	305	78	75	152	Ave. 50.1%

into the following thirteen categories (there was an additional "miscellaneous" catch-all) with an example of the kind of issue placed in each: (1) Agriculture and Conservation—establishing marketing standards for navel oranges; (2) Codes and Judicial Processes—abolishing the defense of entrapment in prosecutions for bribery; (3) Congressional Redistricting—providing for twelve congressional districts based on the 1960 census; (4) Constitutional Revision—authorizing the Legislative Council to prepare a revision of the state constitution; (5) Education—providing a chancellor over the presidents of the state universities; (6) Finance and Taxation—requiring consideration of specified factors other than full cash value in assessing the value of property for tax purposes; (7) Health and Welfare—authorizing cities to set and enforce minimum housing standards for human habitations; (8) Legislative Management—amending the rules to provide for open committee meetings; (9) Legislative Reapportionment—proposing changes in the number of legislative seats and reapportioning on that basis; (10) Political Processes—exempting non-state-wide candidates from the requirement of reporting campaign contributions and expenditures; (11) Race Relations—providing for referendum to close racially desegregated schools; (12) Regulation of Business—providing for minimum retail price-fixing for alcoholic beverages; (13) Roads and Highway Safety—establishing a South Florida Turnpike Authority.

both groups maintained the most consistently high cohesion on questions of legislative reapportionment which directly affected their standing in the Senate. The ranking of controversial subjects by the per cent of roll calls with high and intermediate cohesion is similar for both groups—i.e., cohesion on one side evoked cohesion on the other. With the exception of Congressional Redistricting, Legislative Management, and Health and Welfare, no subject's rank on the northern list is as much as eight positions removed on the southern list; three subjects (Legislative Reapportionment, Constitutional Revision, and Codes and Judi-

TABLE VI. PER CENT OF SOUTHERN SENATORS OPPOSING NORTHERN SENATORS ON CONTROVERSIAL ROLL CALLS ON WHICH AT LEAST 60% OF NORTHERN SENATORS VOTED TOGETHER, 1955-1961 REGULAR AND SPECIAL SESSIONS, FLORIDA SENATE

Per Cent of Southern Senators Opposing North- ern Senators	Number of Roll Calls—Per Cent of Northern Senators Voting Together
	60-69	70-79	80-89	90-100	Total
90-100	0	0	6	1	7
80-89	1	15	23	16	55
70-79	5	6	12	5	28
60-69	12	19	12	9	52
50-59	5	5	3	0	13
Below 50	27	14	1	0	42
Totals	50	59	57	31	197

cial Processes) occupy identical positions on both lists; and five subjects are only one position apart.

One measure of the variable intensity of inter-group conflict is indicated in Table VI. These data show that from 1955-1961 at least 30 per cent of the northern senators voted together on 197 controversial roll calls—i.e., on nearly two-thirds of the total of 305 controversial roll calls during that period. Further, on 142 (over three-fourths) of these 197 roll calls in which at least 60 per cent of the northern senators voted together, they were opposed by at least 60 per cent of the southern senators. On only 42 (just over one-fifth) of the 197 roll calls did less than one-half of the southern group oppose the northern. Of the total of 305 controversial roll calls, then, 155 (fully half) were marked by identifiable degrees of inter-group conflict.

The data in Table VII represent a refinement of the concept of inter-group conflict through use of the Rice Index of Likeness and the chi square test to offset the possibilities for random occurrence of the distributions. Table VII shows that 132 (not quite half) of the 305 controversial roll calls, 1955-1961, were characterized by significant north-south conflict. North won 84 per cent and south 16 per cent of these contests. Sixty-one per cent of all roll calls were won with high cohesion, and 39 per cent with intermediate. The contested roll calls ranged through all thirteen subject-matter categories. In each category, north won 75 per cent or more of all north-south conflict roll calls except on Legislative Management, Roads and Highway Safety, Health and Welfare.

V. CONCLUSIONS

The data tend to support the hypothesis. During the period 1955-1961, in particular, there has been a quite stable, cohesive bifactionalism in the one-party Florida Senate. It has been consistently demonstrated with reference to control of the Presidency and the committee system. It has characterized divisions on controversial roll calls about half the time, significantly more often than Democratic-Republican cleavage has characterized roll-call divisions in recent sessions of the two-party United States Congress.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>18</sup> "The Democratic and Republican parties took clearly opposing positions on only 115, or 36 per cent, of the 320 roll-call votes in 1961. . . . The analysis, new this year, examined only those votes

TABLE VII. DISTRIBUTION OF SIGNIFICANT NORTH-SOUTH CONFLICT* ROLL CALLS, BY SUBJECT, WON WITH SPECIFIED COHESION,† RANKED BY PER CENT NORTH WON, 1955-1961
REGULAR AND SPECIAL SESSIONS, FLORIDA SENATE

Subject of Controversy	Number of North- South Conflict Roll Calls	Won by
		North		South		North when Voting with:		South when Voting with:
						High Cohesion (71-100)	Intermediate Cohesion (41-70)	High Cohesion (71-100)	Intermediate Cohesion (41-70)
		No.	%	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%
1. Codes and Judicial Processes	4	4	100			1	25	3	75
2. Congressional Redistricting	4	4	100			1	25	3	75
3. Political Processes	4	4	100			4	100
4. Legislative Reapportionment	35	33	94	2	6	18	51	15	43	1	3
5. Constitutional Revision	11	10	91	1	9	8	73	2	18	1	9
6. Finance and Taxation	10	9	90	1	10	1	10	8	80	1	10
7. Regulation of Business	31	26	84	5	16	16	52	10	32	4	13
8. Race Relations	15	12	80	3	20	8	53	4	27	2	13
9. Education	5	4	80	1	20	4	80			1	20
10. Agriculture and Conservation	4	3	75	1	25	1	25	2	50	1	25
11. Legislative Management	2	1	50	1	50	1	50			1	50
12. Roads and Highway Safety	4	1	25	3	75			1	25	3	75
13. Health and Welfare	3			3	100					2	67
Totals	132	111	84	21	16	63	48	48	36	17	13
										4	3

* Significant North-South Conflict Roll Calls are those in which the Index of North-South Likeness is less than 60, and according to the chi square test the probability of a random distribution is not greater than .01.

† A Significant North-South Conflict Roll Call won by Northern Senators is one in which the majority winning the roll call comprises a majority of Northern but not Southern Senators; such a roll call won by Southern Senators is one in which the majority winning the roll call comprises a majority of Southern but not Northern Senators.

The alignment so manifested in the Florida Senate has paralleled to a significant degree a sectional alignment of the constituencies. The majority faction has corresponded to those relatively unchanged districts of north Florida where little if any threat to the traditional political monopoly of the Democratic party is perceptible. The minority faction has corresponded to those Democratic constituencies of south Florida that are involved in emergent Republicanism and concomitant population growth, social and economic change.

This kind of sectional alignment, then, pro-on which a majority of voting Northern Democrats and a majority of voting Southern Democrats took the same position, and were opposed by a majority of Republicans." Congressional Quarterly, Vol. 19, Weekly Report No. 47 (Nov. 24, 1961).

---

vides a useful, if limited, way of describing and analyzing certain aspects of conflict within a nominal one-party system. Other aspects would require other techniques. Further, even though there is an impressive correspondence between this kind of sectional alignment and certain aspects of the system, it must not be inferred that the only cues in legislative behavior are related to this cluster of attributes. The attitudes, preferences, perceptions and interactions of legislators, apart from constituency influences, provide other sorts of cues.

In the period 1947-1961, quasi-partisan sectional conflict, and with it, cohesive factions, developed in the one-party Florida Senate. Whether this or something like it will continue in the years ahead, or whether the system will develop in a bona fide two-party direction, depends on causal relationships that are still obscure.

GOVERNMENTAL STRUCTURE AND POLITICAL ENVIRONMENT: A STATISTICAL NOTE ABOUT AMERICAN CITIES

JOHN H. KESSEL
University of Washington

The commission plan and the city manager plan—new forms of city government launched during the early years of this century—were both devised in response to local circumstances, but were soon being heralded as improvements over the then universal mayor-council system. Enthusiasts for both of these new governmental structures claimed many advantages for them. The hopes for the city manager plan seem to have been somewhat better founded, but the passage of time has shown that both plans had limitations which the reformers did not foresee.

Almost all of the early discussion about the relative merits of the three plans neglected the role of political environment. Proponents of the different systems deduced their arguments from "the principles" on which the plans were based. A three-year study of the actual operation of manager government in the late 1930s called attention to the importance of varying local conditions. "The tremendous variety of local political conditions and administrative habits apparent in the fifty cities covered by this survey," the authors concluded, "makes it impossible to [give general answers to] many questions about the city manager plan."<sup>1</sup>

A more explicit concern with the effects of the political environment was shown in two important papers published in the early 1950s.<sup>2</sup> Specific questions were raised about the affinity between the city manager system and medium-size cities, and the apparent fact that the manager plan was more frequently adopted by cities which were either growing or declining in size. The authors also noted the concentration of manager adoptions in one-party states, and suggested that this plan had a depressing effect on the level of party activity. And they thought it significant that business groups generally supported introduction of the manager system while labor often opposed it.

1960 census data show that the city manager

<sup>1</sup> Harold A. Stone, Don K. Price, and Kathryn H. Stone, City Manager Government in the United States (Chicago: Public Administration Service, 1940), p. 258.

<sup>2</sup> Wallace S. Sayre, "The General Manager Idea for Large Cities," Public Administration Review, 1954, pp. 253-258; and Inter-University Summer Seminar on Political Behavior, "Research in Political Behavior," this REVIEW, Vol. 46 (December 1952), pp. 1003-1032.

FIGURE 1. Governmental Form and Community Size

FIGURE 2. Governmental Form and City Growth Rate, 1950-60

form now has been adopted by a majority of the medium-size cities. Though the majority is a bare one, 1960 is the first census year which has found the city manager plan the most common in any size-class of cities. The mayor-council system continues to dominate in the very large cities and in the small towns. The distribution of the three plans in cities between 250,000 and 500,000 and in those between 10,000 and 25,000 is very close to that which would occur normally. Therefore it is now possible to speak of three significant groups of cities in this context with dividing lines slightly above 250,000 and slightly below 25,000.

The failure of large cities to abandon the mayor-council plan has been much discussed in the literature. The most common explanation is that the political environment is so complex—there are so many competing interests—that a premium is placed on political leadership which can arbitrate the contest for the stakes of power in the city, and be held responsible by the electorate for its success or failure in doing so. Less has been done in analyzing the politics of the small towns. It would be consistent with our knowledge of small communities to argue that a well defined structure of socio-economic power, and widely shared norms of behavior, are usually decisive elements in the political environment of a small town. The “natives” ordinarily are well aware of the nature of this power structure and the content of these norms. Thus a local resident would probably reach decisions which would accord with local folkways in most situations, and wait for a “sense of the community” to crystallize when a novel problem came along. A city manager who accepted his cues about correct behavior from outside professional sources would be much more likely to act so as to upset the social equilibrium or violate certain local norms.

These speculations about the dominance of the mayor-council form in large cities and small towns are consistent with each other. They could be summarized by stating that a frankly political form of government is often found where there are interests which must be deferred to, or whose claims must be arbitrated, before a policy decision is made. This would imply that when the reverse is true, that when there is no one who can claim deference, or when there is a single dominant group which is disposed to cooperate with the policy maker, then viable conditions exist for a professional administrator. The question is simply whether negotiating skill or professional expertise is more important in any given situation. We have reason to suspect that political aptitudes are necessary in a small town or big city. In the medium-size city, therefore, we should look for conditions which do not call for a special talent for judicious compromise, but which do present problems beyond a layman's grasp, that can be analyzed by one with a manager's technical training.

It is possible to test these hypotheses, at least in a preliminary fashion, by inspecting certain characteristics of the medium-size cities. (Note in Figure 1, that the frequencies of use of each of the three plans are almost constant for this group of cities.) Figure 2 shows a very strong relationship between the growth rate of these communities and the structure of their governments. There is a high probability that a rapidly growing community will have adopted the city manager system. The mayor-council form is closely associated with cities having relatively stable populations. And the commission form, in the single category in which it appears to be related to the political environment, is found with striking frequency in cities which lost population in the last decade.

These findings modify earlier speculation that the manager plan is associated with growth or decline in population, but are compatible with our ideas about the political and administrative conditions appropriate to each system. A rapidly growing city faces many administrative problems in the course of providing the streets, sewers, and other services required by the expanding population. Since so many new people are arriving the political patterns tend to be rather amorphous. A professional administrator is less likely to face organized opposition. In cities with stable populations, on the other hand, political pressures are apt to be well defined and persistent. Solutions to novel problems are not called for so often as the ability to appease long-standing rivalries. This situation would call for the political responsiveness of the mayor-council system. The concentration of commission governments in declining cities is also of interest. Unless these cities want to reduce their populations, it would seem that the commissioners are unable to respond to difficult conditions or that the influential persons in these communities lack the ability to initiate a switch to another form of government.

The states having the highest percentages of medium-size cities with manager plans are Virginia, North Carolina, California, Texas, and Florida. States with marked concentrations of mayor-council cities in the 25,000-to-250,000 range are Indiana, Connecticut, and Ohio. The manager cities, as has been noted frequently, are either in one-party states or in states in which the formal party organization is rather weak. The mayor-council cities are more often found in competitive two-party states. This, in itself, is an insufficient basis for concluding that the introduction of the manager plan depresses party activity. Competitive two-party systems, after all, were not to be found in Virginia, North Carolina, California, Texas, or Florida before the spread of the manager system. But the survival of strong party organizations in Connecticut, Indiana, and Ohio is suggestive. If we are correct in assuming that the mayor-council system flourishes best in environments which require political skills, then it would follow that these same skills could contribute to vigorous party organizations.

Another way of testing our hypotheses is to look for the presence of some group in the community which would be especially dependent on political activity because of its exclusion from alternative agencies of community integration. We therefore computed the percentage of foreign-born in the population over twenty-one for each city which had a population between 25,000 and 250,000 in 1950.<sup>3</sup> This percentage was chosen to isolate within the potential electorate a group which had arrived too recently for successful assimilation. As Figure 3 shows, the higher the percentage of foreign born in a city, the more likely it is that the city will have a mayor-council form of government. The city manager plan, on the other hand, has been adopted most often by cities composed almost entirely of native-born residents.

We see here an association between the mayor-council form of government and the presence of a sizeable group which lacks social and economic opportunity. Newcomers are rarely offered invitations to long-established men's clubs or seats on the board of directors of a leading bank. As they lack opportunity to express their opinions through social and economic channels, they must voice them through political institutions if they are to be heard at all. And it is precisely in the communities where there is such a need for political opportunities for community participation that the mayor-council form has been most frequently retained. We also see that the manager plan has been adopted most frequently when most of the residents grew up in an American culture. It is possible that the values in such a community would be not only homogeneous, but would also correspond to those of a professional manager.

If we turn from the ethnic composition of the city to its economic organization, we can do more than simply infer the existence of an important group whose values correspond to those of a professional manager. An analysis of the governmental forms used by cities having differing economic characteristics can be derived from Howard J. Nelson's "Service Classification" of cities.<sup>4</sup> Nelson computed the mean percentage of the labor force engaged in given occupations in some eight hundred and ninety-seven urbanized areas. He then calculated the standard deviation from each of these means. He was thereby able to classify a city as, for example, "manufacturing" if the percentage of the labor force so engaged was more than one standard deviation above the mean percentage employed in manufacturing in all urbanized areas. In the case of manufacturing, to continue the same example, his calculations led to the conclusion that at least 43.1 per cent of the work force should be employed in manufacturing for an urban area to be so classified. Similar calculations enabled him to identify unusual concentrations of the labor force in personal service, retail trade, finance, the professions, public administration, wholesale trade, transportation, and mining. If an urbanized area had no unusual concentration of the labor force in any of these categories, Nelson designated it a diversified area.

<sup>3</sup> These data, and those on the percentage of the labor force in a given occupational category, were not available for 1960 at the time this study was made. Therefore we are dealing with a different, and smaller, group of cities. The reader will also note some minor differences in the number of medium-size cities between Figures 1 and 2 and between Figures 3 and 4. These are caused by variations in the availability of data.

FIGURE 3. Governmental Form and Minority Groups: Percentage of over 21 Foreign Born in the City Population

FIGURE 4. Governmental Form and Economic Base: Incidence of Three Systems in Different Types of Cities

Figure 4 indicates a decreasing use of the manager plan by medium-size cities if they are arranged in this order: personal service, retail, finance, professional, public administration, wholesale, transportation, diversified, manufacturing. This is suggestive for three reasons. First of all, this ranking seems to be directly related to the size of the area within which business is conducted. In the four "manager-type" classifications—personal service, retail, finance, and professional—there exist significant concentrations of businessmen whose principal market is to be found within and immediately around their own city. Diversified cities, by definition, lack any abnormal concentration of businessmen, and the industrialists in manufacturing cities are likely to be concerned with regional and national markets. A second reason for the suggestiveness of this ranking is the probability that a retail store or an establishment rendering some kind of personal service will be locally owned. A factory, on the other hand, is much more likely to be owned by stockholders and to have its main offices in some distant commercial center. Thus we see that the manager cities tend to have concentrations of local businessmen whose interests are directly related to their own communities. The mayor-council cities either lack such concentrations of businessmen, in the case of the diversified cities, or are neglected by absentee owners who are often preoccupied with national affairs. It is not implausible to assume that the small businessmen in the manager cities supply the consensus which enables the manager to concentrate on administrative problems.

A third implication of this economic classification concerns the nature of the labor force employed in these occupations. The white collar employees in retail stores and financial establishments, to say nothing of the professionals, are prone to regard themselves as self-sufficient. Industrial laborers, on the other hand, are likely to suffer the same kinds of socio-economic handicaps mentioned earlier in connection with ethnic groups. They need political channels for expression, channels which the mayor-council system is more likely to provide.

There are, of course, limits to this kind of statistical analysis. The most important is that the whole argument rests on an assumption that, given the adoptions and abandonments of the past fifty years, each governmental form will be most frequently found in that environment which is congenial to it. There are many reasons for the adoption of one system or another which have little to do with the suitability of the political environment. State laws may encourage one form and prohibit another. Local interests may advocate a different plan from the one they have, simply because they perceive some tactical advantage in changing the ground rules in their favor. A community often imitates the legal structure favored in a neighboring city. A small town frequently lacks the budget to hire a manager. And inertia often causes the retention of a governmental system long after it has ceased to function effectively.

The reader must judge for himself whether this evidence is sufficient to support the hypotheses which have been suggested. But whether we have correctly identified certain linkages between the political environment and governmental structure or not, it should be clear that some sorts of linkages do exist. We should sweep away the lingering traces of disciplinary parochialism which still contaminate the study of urban affairs. A few students of public administration still hold that a given form of government is intrinsically superior to any other. Some latter-day Marxists still insist that industrial captains exercise the real power in any community. And certain sociologists would have us believe that "upper-upper" families are able to manipulate affairs because of their status and prestige. If the data we have reviewed are valid, then none of these arguments are correct. Neither a study of organization charts nor an identification of socio-economic elites is, in itself, a sufficient explanation of urban politics. Neither the formal structure nor the political environment is independent of the other. Studies of legal form and political setting must take into account the influence of the one on the other. Only in this way will we be able to unravel the puzzle of the relationships between them.

<sup>4</sup> Howard J. Nelson, "A Service Classification of American Cities," Economic Geography, Vol. 31 (July, 1955), pp. 180-210. This classification was similar to the "functional classification" of the Municipal Year Book except that the latter is based on arbitrary cutting points. The functional classification did not permit identification of any correspondence between economic organization and governmental form.

"RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT," SEPARATED POWERS, AND SPECIAL INTERESTS: AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES IN BRITAIN AND AMERICA<sup>1</sup>

J. ROLAND PENNOCK
Swarthmore College

Political scientists today are more cautious than they used to be about comparing forms of government and evaluating their virtues. Moreover, in such comparisons as we do make, we rightly lay more stress on party systems and even more informal aspects of government than on constitutional forms. Yet much of what is said by way of comparing and evaluating the disciplined and programmatic type of political party with the American type carries an undertone of the old arguments. Virtues once attributed to the British style of Parliamentary government, honorifically tagged "responsible government," are now associated with "party government," while the evils earlier (and still) attributed to the separation of powers are now frequently laid at the door of a weak party system. To be sure, many who criticize the American constitutional and political arrangements for irresponsibility make no claim that the British system is superior.<sup>2</sup> Yet when a committee of leading political scientists studied the operation of our party system, its recommendations were based upon the conviction that disciplined and programmatic political parties, after the English model, should be our ideal.<sup>3</sup> It therefore still seems worthwhile to gain all the knowledge and insight we can about the operation of such a system in its native habitat and to compare its operation with our own political and constitutional system.

The view of the British system of government—both formal and informal—that has gained for it the designation "responsible government" may be briefly summarized. The system simplifies the alternatives placed before the electorate. It energizes and activates public opinion. Responsibility for public policy is centralized, clearly located, and easily subjected to popular control. Beyond this point the theory, seldom articulated, seems to be that the Government, with the benefit of its synoptic view of the public scene, will seek majority support by acting in the general interest. (In this way, the dubious concept of rule by "a majority" enters into the theory.) Conversely, special interests, particularly those associated with "pressure groups," are less able to secure a definition of the public interest on their own terms. Since pressure groups frequently are interested in legislation requiring the expenditure of public funds, more or less directly for their benefit, this aspect of the British system might be expected to manifest itself especially in connection with such expenditures. The inability of Parliament to vote funds in excess of the budget, and the well known device of Treasury control, as well as the disciplined and programmed nature of political parties, all seem to support this expectation. There are, to be sure, other advantages believed to flow from these features of British government, such as a more rational, coherent, and self-consistent legislative product; but the present article will be confined to the question of vulnerability to demands of special interests for subsidization.

The major objective of this essay is to apply to this problem the findings of a comparative study of the politics of agricultural subsidies and price supports in Britain and America during the postwar period.<sup>4</sup> The general method followed is to combine empirical data from the case study with a priori arguments in such a way as to contribute both to the appreciation <sup>1</sup> The basic research from which the materials for this article were drawn was made possible by the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation, for whose award the writer is deeply grateful. He is also indebted to Professor Charles E. Gilbert for helpful criticism and suggestions.

<sup>2</sup> See for example, James M. Burns, Congress on Trial (New York, 1949) and Stephen K. Bailey, Congress Makes a Law (New York, 1950).

<sup>3</sup> "Toward a More Responsible Two-Party System," Supplement to this REVIEW, Vol. 44 (Sept., 1950). For a more recent statement of a similar point of view and for a plea for an outright scrapping of the separation of powers in this country in favor of cabinet government as essential to responsible democracy, see Howard J. McMurray, "The Responsible Majority—Some Reflections on Political Parties," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 11 (June, 1958), pp. 175-182.

<sup>4</sup> For the most part the study was confined to the first decade following the Second World War, although in a few instances materials have been drawn from later years.

of the arguments and to their evaluation. The case material has two aspects, each of which has importance in itself and also gains support from the other. First, there are the substantive results. Political scientists, for understandable reasons, are inclined to focus largely upon governmental processes; yet surely the results—in terms of public policy, however formulated, adopted and executed—are normally of primary importance. It is true that effectuated policies tend to elude objective evaluation. In this case, however, the policy results—in pounds and dollars—are objective enough, though hard to isolate for measurement. To be sure, there are other difficulties, with which, as we proceed, we shall have to cope as best we may. Are the situations truly comparable?—a problem with almost any comparative study. Are variations in results properly attributable to specifiable aspects of the political process? At this point the second aspect of the study—its procedural side—becomes significant. Analysis of process, of the steps leading up to the results, may be useful not only for its own sake but also by adding to or subtracting from the plausibility of the conclusions suggested by the substantive comparisons. In other words, if we identify a difference in results not clearly growing out of differences in the situations, and if we also identify phenomena on the procedural side that might lead to such a difference in results and in a given instance provide every evidence of having done so, we are better off in our search for understanding than we would be if we confined ourselves to investigation of either results or processes alone.

In point of fact, the substantive comparison gives no support to the view that parliamentary government, British style, has any special immunity to group pressure.<sup>5</sup> If anything, it appears that the balance is tilted in the opposite direction. From 1954 to 1961, Britain subsidized her farmers, by most tests, much more heavily than did the United States. For the benefit of a relatively much smaller percentage of the population, British farm subsidies during that period were absorbing nearly three times as large a share of the gross national product as the American. (The detailed figures, using various bases of comparison, together with a discussion of technical and other difficulties in making the comparison, are set forth in the Appendix.) Moreover, the economic position of British farmers, as compared to the rest of the population, has improved tremendously over the prewar situation—far more than in the United States, where the relative standings are apparently about the same.<sup>6</sup> And more to the point, this relative gain on the part of British farmers appears to be entirely attributable to the subsidy, which in fact constituted roughly two-thirds of their net income.

But, it might be argued, there may be good reasons, quite apart from group pressure, why the British should support agriculture more heavily than we do. There is no simple, conclusive answer to this. Nevertheless the writer has carefully examined the justifications advanced in each country for subsidization, to try to gain some sense of whether they are more powerful in Britain than here. Most of the arguments, like the claimed sociological advantages of the small, family farm, are equally valid or invalid for the two countries. Two arguments, however, the validity of which is debated by the experts, apply uniquely to Britain. They are the strategic argument—that British agriculture must be kept in good fettle so that production can be quickly expanded in the event of war and blockade—and the balance of payments argument—that an expanded agriculture minimizes the drain on foreign exchange for the purchase of feedstuffs. The first of these is not seriously regarded by most of the experts<sup>7</sup> but it undoubtedly possesses a considerable (though probably declining) appeal to the populace at large, inclining the electorate more favorably to agricultural subsidies than they otherwise would be. To what degree the relatively high subsidies are attributable to this factor it is impossible to ascertain. The second uniquely British argument, that of the balance of trade, being more technical, has more appeal in Government circles than with the citizenry. Yet it seems unlikely that the Government has been greatly moved by this argument, although on one occasion they used it as an excuse for setting supports at a higher level than could otherwise be justified.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Between 1938 and 1957 national income in the United Kingdom increased by 266 per cent, while farming net income increased by 461 per cent. On a per capita basis, national income increased approximately 237 per cent, while farming net income went up by 475 per cent (for persons engaged in agriculture). In the United States, contrasting 1957 with the 1935–39 average, the total net income of the farm population from farming sources increased by 141 per cent (150 per cent from all sources), and their per capita income from farm sources rose by 215 per cent (from all sources 285 per cent), while the personal income of all persons was increasing by 285 per cent, on a per capita basis. In other words, in the United States, the average income from farming failed to keep pace with that of the rest of the population, while in the United Kingdom the farm population advanced at about double the rate of the country as a whole. (Calculations are based on figures from the Annual Abstract of Statistics [1958] and the “Annual Review and Determination of Guarantees, 1958” [Cmd. 390], for the United Kingdom; and, for the United States, from The Farm Income Situation, No. 169, July, 1958, United States Department of Agriculture, and the Economic Report of the President, January, 1962.)

<sup>6</sup> Note that in selecting British government for this study, we are taking the example and type of parliamentary government that should, according to orthodox theory, present the sharpest contrast to the presidential system.

One other general difference in the agricultural situations of the two countries may be relevant. In the United States, farming is considerably more diversified and a far larger proportion of total farm output consists of feed-stuffs—grain, etc., fed to hogs, cattle and poultry—and of agricultural products not destined for consumption as food—cotton, tobacco, soybeans for industrial uses, etc.—than in Britain. In the one case, one farmer's price is another farmer's cost, and in both cases the purchasers are not consumers, nor even wholesalers distributing to consumer markets, but rather industrial processors, large commercial organizations and the like. So it may be that conflicts of interests among farmers reduce their political and bargaining strength. And if it is thought that the large buyers to whom these products are sold are better able to assert their interest in lower prices than are unorganized consumers or the suppliers who cater directly to consumer markets, then it might be supposed that the combination of forces working to limit farm subsidies would be relatively stronger in the United States than in Britain. But this is an oversimplified picture, blurring the market effects of farm co-ops, chain store processors, etc., and the political effects of federalism, a bicameral Congress and rural over-representation. There are too many factors to disentangle here, and their net effect in combination is not clear.

It might plausibly be argued that the difference in support levels is to be accounted for neither by governmental systems nor by different felt needs, but by the effectiveness of farm organizations. Most British farmers are members of the National Farmers Union of England and Wales, or the N.F.U. of Scotland. For purposes of representing farmers at Price Reviews (negotiations with the Government for subsidies) and similar occasions, the Unions act as one. There are also commodity groups and regional differences within the national unions that occasionally give the N.F.U. national headquarters a hard time. Nonetheless the degree of bargaining and pressure group unity they maintain is remarkable. American farmers have no such monolithic organization. Many are unorganized. The others are members, often duplicating members, of numerous commodity groups and of certain general purpose farm organizations, of which the American Farm Bureau Federation—with a claimed membership of 1,591,777 farm families out of a total of 5,382,162 farms in 1953—is the largest. Farm Bureau membership is drawn most heavily from the corn-hog area of Indiana, Illinois and Iowa, and from the South. Its political orientation is conservative. The National Grange, with under a million members, is the second largest general farm organization, while the National Farmers Union, with perhaps 200,000 members during the period in question, heavily concentrated in Colorado, Minnesota and the Dakotas, represents a more militant and politically liberal group.

To what extent this difference in the pressure group organization in the two countries qualifies any conclusions that might be drawn from the comparison it is difficult to say. The tendency toward monolithic social, economic and political structures that pervades English life manifests itself in two mutually contradictory ways, however, as far as it is relevant to our present concern. It tends to produce strong, centralized political parties and it also facilitates the formation of strong pressure groups, each representing virtually the whole of the interests affected. Here, it might be argued, we have a stand-off. The homogeneity of the country produces strong pressure groups and it also produces strong parties, the better to withstand the pressure groups. The homogeneity of the pressure groups may itself owe something to the concentration of power in British government.

<sup>7</sup> They reason (1) that stockpiling can probably meet the challenge of a blockade, especially in view of the probability that a major war in the future will not be extended over many years, and (2) that in any case continuing dependence on foreign sources for food supplies is the best means of assuring the maintenance of a large merchant marine, which in the past has proved invaluable in the event of attempted blockade.

<sup>8</sup> My justification for this statement is partly that government economists themselves, in private conversation, lay little stress on this argument and freely admit that subsidies should be lowered; and partly it is that economists generally, even agricultural economists, are divided on the validity of the argument, with the weight of opinion perhaps on the side of doubting it. Austin Robinson has argued the case for subsidies to save foreign exchange; see "The Problem of Living Within Our Foreign Exchange," The Three Banks Review, March, 1954, pp. 3-19. Other economists have disputed his interpretation and contend that, if anything, the balance of payments argument calls for limitation of agricultural subsidies; see Derek T. Healey, "Increased Agriculture or Increased Exports?," Westminster Bank Review, May, 1955, pp. 10-12, and Colin Clark, "Britain's Dependence Upon Agricultural Imports," loc. cit., November, 1956 pp. 9-11.

Although we might leave the matter here, it is perhaps desirable to comment on the sharp policy division between the Farm Bureau and the Farmers Union.<sup>9</sup> It is by no means clear that this division of forces weakened the pressures for subsidy. A single, all-inclusive organization is not necessarily more aggressive because of its unity; it must find a program that can win the support of most of its members. A smaller, regional organization, heavily representative of one or two commodities, can be more radical. Was even the Farm Bureau less aggressive in support of agriculture than the N.F.U. in Britain? Both organizations in practice recognized the necessity for some retreat from the wartime levels of subsidies or price supports, yet both wished to preserve the bulk of their wartime relative gains. In the United States, however, the Farmers Union was unwilling to make this concession. Inasmuch as this country, unlike Britain, had at least one organization fighting for a more radical and expensive program than featured the war time experience, it might as plausibly be argued that any difference between the two countries with respect to pressure groups would lead one to anticipate a higher rather than a lower rate of government support for farming in the United States.

So much for the substantive comparison. The end result of agricultural politics in the two countries has been to produce heavier subsidization (in one form or another) in Britain than in the United States, instead of the reverse, which orthodox theory would lead us to anticipate. We have briefly canvassed two out of three possible sets of factors that might lead to this result: the needs or justifications and the organization of interests most directly affected. On balance, it appears doubtful that there is enough here to account for the difference in results, although one can certainly not be dogmatic on the point. At the very least, the substantive comparison suggests the need for examining the matter procedurally—that is, for looking at the processes by which key decisions were made in the two countries and asking whether or not they give support to the standard propositions about the two forms of government.

If the electoral alternatives are kept simple, the man in the voting booth can understand them and wield his power effectively, and anything that strengthens the political effectiveness of the voter-at-large tends to weaken the special interests—so runs the argument. How do the two forms of government stack up in this regard? In one sense there can be no doubt whatever that the British form wins hands down by this test, for at election time there is but one question for the voter to answer—is he for the Government or against it?—with the further possibility that he may have one additional choice if he is against it. There is no question of splitting his ticket. But if we are considering a particular subject, such as agricultural subsidies, the realistic question is whether there is any alternative at all. Since the Second World War there have been five general elections in England. Throughout this period agriculture was the beneficiary of heavy subsidies.<sup>10</sup> At none of these elections was the extent of agricultural subsidy a point at issue between the parties. Yet the policy being pursued did not lack for critics. Such journals as the London Economist kept up a continuous drum-fire of criticism of agricultural policy under both Labour and Conservative Governments, alleging that subsidies were too high. An occasional Member of Parliament, like Stanley Evans, lashed out against "featherbedding" the farmers.<sup>11</sup> And the weight of opinion of economists, including agricultural economists, favored the view that the subsidies were at a higher rate than was justifiable. On the other hand, the farmers frequently complained that their profits were not keeping pace with the rising standards of living of other occupational groups. Nonetheless, at no election did the level of subsidies become an issue between the parties. Agricultural policy was greatly debated, but the debates consisted in such matters as rival claims for credit for the benefits the farmers had received, charges that the program was being badly administered, that farmers lacked confidence in the Government (or in the Opposition, as the case might be), and so on. Labour, by promising the reinstitution of bulk purchasing and other devices, tried to hold out the prospect of greater price stability, but was careful not to suggest that average prices would be higher (or lower).

<sup>9</sup> The difference can easily be exaggerated if we are thinking about the general level of subsidy. Both organizations favored expenditure of government funds for disposal of farm surpluses in a variety of ways. Both favored price supports. The Farmers Union favored continuation of rigid supports at 90 per cent of parity for "basic" commodities. The Farm Bureau favored supports on a sliding scale, depending upon the supply situation. The Farm Bureau program, a modification of which was enacted in 1954, almost certainly involved a somewhat lower subsidy rate than would have been entailed by the Farmers Union program. On the other hand, in view of falling commodity prices, the Farm Bureau shortly after this date supported the "Soil Bank" program, which was enacted and which involved a much greater subsidy than any possible saving that might have been brought about by the lower support rates.

<sup>10</sup> Until about 1953-54 the Government bought all farm products at fixed prices. Although these prices were much above the level charged for the food (the Government paying the difference), it is possible that no subsidy would have been needed during this period of food shortage had prices been allowed to find their own level. In other words, it might be argued that the sub-

The sensitivity of the parties to the farm vote is nowhere better demonstrated than by the difficulties generally experienced by the Liberal Party in squaring its free-trade, anti-subsidy principles with electoral expediency in the matter of agricultural policy. In 1953 the Party Assembly adopted a resolution calling for the gradual abandonment of guaranteed prices and assured markets for agriculture. Not sidies during this period were really consumer subsidies, redistributing the available food among consumers rather than income among producers. For our purposes, then, the elections of 1955 and 1959 are of greatest significance, for by that time free market conditions prevailed and farmers depended heavily upon direct subsidy.

<sup>11</sup> Evans, a Labour M.P., was forced to resign as Parliamentary Secretary for the Ministry of Food for persisting in this kind of criticism, including such charges as that the taxpayers had had to pay £12 million during the last year for the production of surplus potatoes. Parliamentary Debates (Commons), Vol. 475, col. 1042. The promptness with which the Government called for Evans' resignation and publicly disavowed his views made it clear that they had no intention of being tagged as favoring any diminution of agricultural support.

only did this action call forth heated debate but, after the adoption of the resolution, a prospective Liberal candidate for Parliament announced that "speaking for at least twelve prospective Parliamentary candidates, we do not feel we can fight an election on the present policy, and give notice that we can not do so."<sup>12</sup> Presumably as a consequence of this pressure, the resolution adopted in 1954 was much more qualified.<sup>13</sup>

A nice test case is supplied by a by-election held in the Division of South Norfolk in January, 1955. The election was of particular interest because the constituency is marginal as between the major parties and highly agricultural, being in the heart of one of the major farm areas of England. The writer followed the campaign closely, attending several campaign meetings. The constituency was actively cultivated by the candidates and by their supporters ranging all the way up to the Minister of Agriculture himself, Mr. Heathcoat Amory, on the Conservative side, and to Messrs. Hugh Gaitskell and Anuerin Bevan on the Labour side. Both sides insisted that they would maintain subsidies, with no "whittling away," while hinting that their rivals were not altogether reliable in this regard. Neither made any suggestion of increasing the subsidies.

The pattern revealed for this campaign was substantially duplicated in the general elections of 1955 and 1959. In the latter year, for instance, the Conservative election manifesto pledged continuance of the long-term assurances to agriculture, continued support to horticulture by means of tariffs and also by means of new improvement grants to the extent of £7½ million. Labour promised to improve farm security, which, it claimed, had been "whittled away" since 1951, and to give the farmer "protection against unfair foreign competition."<sup>14</sup>

In the United States the picture was quite different. The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, permanent legislation, provided for price supports for "basic" commodities by means of loan and purchase arrangements at rates varying in accordance with a formula relating the percentage of "parity" at which they would be supported to the supply situation. By agreement of both parties the operation of this Act had been suspended during the war and afterwards in favor of provision for a rigid support of basic prices at ninety per cent of parity. This temporary legislation was scheduled to expire on December 31, 1948. By a series of extensions, however, the fixed supports at 90 per cent of parity were not allowed to die until six years later. By stages during this period the Democratic Party became identified with maintenance of the "rigid" support system while the Republicans championed a "flexible" arrangement. An Administration-sponsored bill providing for flexible supports was enacted in 1954 with overwhelming Republican support in both Houses, while the Democrats opposed the flexible principle (with its inevitable lowering of the extent of price support) by more than three-to-one. These positions have been adhered to subsequently and were reflected in the party platforms for presidential elections. In short, the American voter, unlike his British opposite number, had a significant electoral choice and accompanying possibility of control with regard to agricultural price supports during the 1950s.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Farmer and Stock-Breeder, Vol. 67, p. 57, April 14-15, 1953. And see The Times, April 4, 1953, p. 3, col. a.

<sup>13</sup> Farmers Weekly, April 30, 1954, p. 42.

<sup>14</sup> D. E. Butler and Richard Rose, The British General Election of 1959 (London, 1960), pp. 260 and 275.

Closely connected to the question of choice and control is the matter of energizing public opinion, also a feature included among the reputed attributes of the British system. It is not really a separate point so much as a presumed consequence of clear issues and simple methods of popular control. There can be no doubt that where the parties in Britain are divided on an issue, both the system of parliamentary debates and the election system tend to focus attention upon, and arouse interest in it. But where party competition produces identical positions on a given point, as it tends to do, and as has been the case with the level of agricultural subsidies in Britain, no occasion for public discussion arises. In this country, on the other hand, substantially this issue has played a significant role at each of the last three presidential elections. This is not to argue that there is anything inherent in the American system that accounts for this difference, or that a similar situation would be found if we examined other policy areas. It is merely to point out that the alleged advantage of the British system does not always materialize and that in certain cases the advantage may lie in precisely the opposite direction.

Having said this much, the supposed merit of clear and centralized responsibility in British government has already been dealt with, by implication. The responsibility for the level of agricultural subsidies in Britain is clear; it is pin-pointed. There is only one catch: to oust the Government would not alter the situation, although there is an abundance of opinion in the country at large and among experts to the effect that a change is in order.

<sup>15</sup> This does not mean he would necessarily elect to use it. To vote his convictions on price supports might mean going contrary to his beliefs on other matters which he deemed more important.

Among the a priori arguments advanced for the theory that British government is exceptionally well fitted to resist the demands of special interest pressures, perhaps the most frequently cited is the strength of party discipline. Members of Parliament, unlike members of Congress, are not generally susceptible to pressure from constituents to vote this or that benefit for them.<sup>16</sup> With rare exceptions, they will vote as the Whips instruct. Closely related to party discipline is the position of the Government. A single committee, the cabinet, thanks to the combination of the two-party system and strong party discipline, has the power, within limits, not only to formulate the Government's program but also to implement it. Its party members in the House are in the majority and they may be counted upon to support the Government's program. Since the Government will stand or fall, at the next election, on its record as a whole and before the electorate as a whole, so the theory goes, it will be to its interest to resist the pressures of special interests insofar as they appear to distort or run counter to the general interest.

How sound is this reasoning? Of course it is true that M.P.s seldom defy the Whips. But the Whips, as is well known, are two-way lines of communication. Through them the party leaders are kept informed of what the rank-and-file want and what they hear from their constituents and, even more pertinently, of how M.P.s, especially those from marginal districts, assess the impact of particular policies on their chances for reelection. Such information is of interest to party leaders in any democratic country. Even in the United States it is highly relevant to the party's welfare and to the outlook for its general policies. But in the United States a party may lose one House and hold the other or it may lose one or both Houses and hold the Presidency. And under such circumstances it may still see many of its policies effectuated—as was clearly demonstrated under the Eisenhower regime. In Britain, on the other hand, the winner takes all. Under such circumstances it is hardly to be supposed that the news that, say, a score of Members of Parliament might lose their seats at the next election unless something is done for the aged, e.g., or for the farmers, will be without influence on the Government.

<sup>16</sup> However, the writer was present in Westminster one day when a delegation of lobbyists for higher old age pensions called a large number of M.P.s, one by one, from the floor of the House, asked their position on the question and, if the reply was not fully satisfactory, informed them that canvassers would cover their constituencies informing the voters of their weakness on this matter. There is evidence to suggest that this kind of pressure was not without effect.

In this connection, we may well remind ourselves of Hatschek's law,<sup>16a</sup> according to which British political parties start out with well defined sets of principles but progressively lose them and become concerned primarily with obtaining and keeping power. We need only consider the most recent general election campaign to see Hatschek's conclusions substantiated. Each of the major parties seemed to be engaged in trying to prove that, at least in certain important respects, it was not so different from the other as had been thought. The Conservatives proclaimed themselves as the great supporters of the "welfare state," while Labour made light of its attenuated program of nationalization. Such a development undermines the theory that the Government—or for that matter either of the major parties—must have a consistent program. The parties tend to become as free as American parties to bid for the marginal voter, to try to build a majority by seeking the support of various special interest groups—especially those that are particularly aware of their interests and whose votes are believed to be shiftable.<sup>17</sup> Of course, insofar as a bid to one group must obviously be at the expense of other groups or of the whole, some limit is placed to this process. But it is well known that this protective mechanism is very sluggish. Producers tend to be more aware of their interests than consumers or even taxpayers. Moreover, the existence of a large number of traditional or ideological voters strengthens the hand of the special interests by enabling party managers to maneuver without fear of losses from their hard-core supporters. The British situation with respect to special interests may be put in a nutshell. The parties discipline their members, but no one disciplines the parties; and the parties are subject to the same electoral logic that operates in this country: they must bid for the support of interest groups. Another way to put the matter, using Robert Dahl's expressive phrase, is to say that in Britain, too, what passes for "majority rule" might be more aptly described as "minorities rule."

An examination of British agricultural politics during the postwar period provides numerous examples of the operation of this electoral logic. The case of Stanley Evans, above, is a clear instance of party discipline being used to prevent giving offense to a well-placed pressure group. Although Evans was somewhat of an extremist on this matter, the traditional orientation and class interest of the Labour Party is toward the interests of urban labor. Cheap food, rather than prosperous farmers, would seem to be their natural concern. Moreover, this is the definite and outspoken view of the Cooperative movement, which is affiliated with the Labour Party and sits regularly in its councils. Yet in recent times it has been the prospect of winning a few farm votes from their normal Conservative alignment that has consistently set the course of Labour policy.

How party discipline operates in this kind of situation is well illustrated by a revealing incident that occurred in late 1953 in connection with an Order, laid before Parliament for ratification, increasing the import duties on certain fruits and vegetables. This was an issue calculated to arouse Labour to an anti-farmer stand if anything would, because the cost of the proposed action would be borne directly by consumers. As a matter of fact Labour, then in Opposition, was sharply divided as to what position it should take. Many of its Members, especially those representing the Cooperative movement, were strongly opposed to the tariff increase. Indeed, it appears virtually certain that the Parliamentary Labour Party would have voted to contest the Order had it not been for a strong personal appeal by Tom Williams, Minister of Agriculture in the preceding Labour Government. Although the decision was close, and a number of Labour Members did express themselves vigorously against the order in the House of Commons, the significant fact is that the Party leadership threw its weight behind the farming interest, and prevailed.<sup>18</sup> Here was party discipline in operation—being used to force a reluctant majority to pursue a policy thought by the leaders to be essential for winning certain marginal districts. (Williams and other Labour leaders had often publicly expressed the view that Labour could not hope to return to power without winning back some of the country areas they had won in 1945 and lost in 1950.)

<sup>16a</sup> Julius Hatschek, Englisches Staatsrecht, Vol. II (1905), pp. 8 ff. Hatschek's law is described and discussed in Carl J. Friedrich, Constitutional Government and Democracy, revised edition (Boston, 1950), p. 417.

<sup>17</sup> In an editorial entitled "The Electoral Auction," the London Economist bemoaned the fact that "election manifestoes have been corrupted into expensive shrimping nets for farmers', pensioners', tenants', cotton workers', shipbuilders', shipworkers', and cinema interests' votes. . . ." The Economist, September 26, 1959, p. 998.

Compared to this situation, party discipline in the United States is notoriously weak. Orthodox theory holds that weak discipline favors the special interest; but it is not necessarily so. Big city Democrats may refuse to go along with their party's policy of favoring high price supports—and they frequently do; and Republicans from agricultural districts may vote against their party's adherence to "flexible" price supports. Under such circumstances, special interests that are powerful in a minority of legislative districts may find it more difficult to obtain legislative support than under a regime of strong party discipline, operating as described above. On at least two occasions during the Eisenhower administration major price support legislation opposed to the official policy of the Democratic Party (which had a majority in both houses of Congress) and opposed by the House Committee on Agriculture, was yet enacted into law.<sup>19</sup>

The British system is also often thought to be less easily influenced by special interests than the American system because of the subordinated role of committees. Congressional committees have great power and are notoriously likely to be controlled by Congressmen favorably disposed toward the interests whose affairs come under their jurisdiction. It is frequently overlooked, however, that the British system, structurally very different, may lead to functionally similar results. Parliament regularly delegates many important decisions to the Government or to particular Ministries. When legislation takes this form, the Ministries, in certain respects, are cast in the role of Congressional committees: they have great power; their decisions are likely to receive less publicity than those of Parliament, and in any case the process by which they reach their decisions is not one of public debate and ordinarily involves no public scrutiny; they have a tendency—so at least it is alleged in England—to become favorably inclined toward the interests under their wing; and they are readily accessible to those interests.

The case of agriculture illustrates all of these points. The controlling legislation leaves the rate at which agricultural products will be subsidized or supported entirely to Ministerial discretion, operating within the broadest of statutory policy directives.<sup>20</sup> It is true that the Treasury stands always in the immediate background, breathing down the neck of the Ministry, but it must depend largely upon the Ministry's estimate of the needs of the industry. Moreover, all orders made under this provision of law must be made after consultation with representatives of the interests concerned. In practice this means that each year, at what is known as a Price Review, representatives of the Minister of Agriculture sit down with representatives of the National Farmers Union and, in an often prolonged series of meetings, negotiate the guaranteed prices for the following year. Each side is provided with an abundance of data. Certain agreed but rather vague standards guide them. But there is much room for judgment, and hence for haggling; for what are sometimes embittered arguments; and for plain horse-trading. It has been said on good authority that the final decisions are frequently made on the basis of considering the effect in certain marginal constituencies.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Farmer's Weekly, December 18, 1953, p. 26; Parliamentary Debates (Commons), Vol. 521, cols. 2235-2237 and 2251.

<sup>19</sup> For an analysis of the voting on the first of these occasions, the Agricultural Act of 1954, see J. Roland Pennock, "Party and Constituency in Postwar Agricultural Price-Support Legislation," Journal of Politics, Vol. 18 (1956), pp. 167-210, esp. pp. 184-210. The situation was decidedly complicated by the fact that the largest of the farm organizations, the American Farm Bureau Federation, was opposing the "pro-farmer" policy of the Democratic Party. Consequently it is not a clear instance of a "general interest" prevailing over the organized special interest. Of the 47 Democrats who went contrary to their party policy at this time, however, over half were from metropolitan areas. Their defection can hardly be charged to the position of the Farm Bureau. Similarly the 23 Republicans who voted against the position of their Party and of the Farm Bureau were clearly voting for what they considered to be the special interest of their constituencies in high price supports.

<sup>20</sup> Agriculture Act, 1947; 10 and 11 Geo. 6, ch. 48. The relevant provision reads, in a passage reminiscent of an American party platform, that powers under the Act shall be used, through the devices of guaranteed prices and assured markets, to promote and maintain "a stable and efficient agricultural industry capable of producing such part of the nation's food and other agricultural produce as in the national interest it is desirable to produce in the United Kingdom, and of producing it at minimum prices consistently with proper remuneration and living conditions for farmers and workers in agriculture and an adequate return on capital invested in the industry." [Part I, 1, (1)] Full power to carry out the purposes of this Act are vested in the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries (now the Ministry of Agriculture, Food, and Fisheries), subject only to being laid before Parliament as an Order, which, theoretically, either House could veto.

The experience of the 1955 Price Review is hardly atypical. It had been the expressed hope of those charged with administering the subsidy policy that Exchequer liability could be progressively decreased at a rate approximating, or at least approaching, the increase in farming efficiency, then estimated at about £25 million per annum for products covered by the Review. Applying the principles that had been enunciated to the data as to changed costs and the like, and deducting the presumed efficiency increment, the result would have been no net change in guarantees and subsidies. In fact, however, the Ministry granted a net increase of about £40 million. The reasons advanced for this action were two: (1) that during the previous year crops had been seriously damaged by bad weather; and (2) that the balance of trade situation made it desirable to produce more homegrown feedingstuffs. However, the first of these reasons was not supposed to be relevant, since all figures are based on "normal" weather; and it was not even contended that the second argument was sufficient to justify the increases.<sup>22</sup>

To understand the Price Review of 1955 one must know that a General Election was imminent and that the farmers were known to be disgruntled. The mood of the annual meeting of the National Farmers Union in January was described in the pages of the Economist as one of "gloomy resentment."<sup>23</sup> A direct vote of no confidence in the Government's farm policy was narrowly averted; and, as it was, the Union condemned the Government for "gradually undermining" the provisions of the 1947 Act.<sup>24</sup> Off the record, Government officials in a position to know were quite ready to concede (and decri) the effects of the political winds. In Parliament, Labour members, not surprisingly, testified to the same effect. George Brown, Parliamentary Secretary for Agriculture under the Labour Government, declared:

The price this year was very nearly not an agreed one. It became an agreed price only because someone politically a little higher than the Minister came along and said, "There will be an election soon, and we must have an agreed price." The Council of the N.F.U. know that. My friends in the industry tell me what is happening.<sup>25</sup>

And Tom Williams, Labour Minister of Agriculture, asserted that the N.F.U. was on the point of voting its lack of confidence in the Government when the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his peace with them in a speech at the N.F.U.'s annual dinner.<sup>26</sup> Note that it was the Chancellor of the Exchequer who was chosen for this task. Possibly he was chosen (or invited by the N.F.U.) because he was a farmer. But if George Brown was right it appears that this was a clear case of political intervention, perhaps by cabinet action, to urge the Minister of Agriculture to go farther on behalf of the farmers than even he was prepared to do on his own initiative.

This incident will also serve as a comment on the frequently heard claim that the British Treasury is a powerful roadblock in the way of special interest demands upon public expenditures. Undoubtedly it is, in many situations; but it may also be acutely vulnerable to electoral pressures.

In appraising the argument for, and evidence of British vulnerability to the demands of a special interest group, it should be remembered, too, that British farmers constitute a small part of the population. As a percentage of total production, agricultural production in Britain is less than two-thirds as large as in the United States. In terms of the percentage of the labor <sup>21</sup> One of the top Government economists dealing with these matters has been quoted as saying that the annual determinations of agricultural subsidy levels are "primarily political" and hardly susceptible of being explained or justified in terms of "statistical measurements." Private correspondence from J. H. Kirk, quoted in J. Anthony Mollett's "Britain's Postwar Agricultural Expansion: Some Economic Problems and Relationships Involved," Journal of Farm Economics, Vol. 41 (1959), pp. 3-15, at p. 9, note 15.

<sup>22</sup> See "Annual Review and Determination of Guarantees, 1955" Cmd. 9406; and The National Farmers Union of England and Wales, "Information Service," Vol. 10, No. 1, January/February, 1955.

<sup>23</sup> "Resentment on the Farm," The Economist, Vol. 174, Jan. 29, 1955, p. 345.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid.

<sup>25</sup> Parliamentary Debates (Commons), Vol. 540, col. 1622, May 3, 1955.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., col. 1532.

force involved, the discrepancy is even greater. Nor is the distribution of farm voters such as to increase their political effectiveness; but rather the contrary.

Touching another of the weaknesses often attributed to the separation of powers, the division of responsibility, we must be careful to examine both sides of the ledger. Divided responsibility does muddy the waters and so complicate the task of a displeased majority wishing to enforce accountability for the act of commission or omission that occasioned its displeasure. This much is true. But how often, on a particular issue, is there a majority? When pressure groups secure special consideration, it is generally the work of an active minority translating its demands into law thanks to the passivity of a large number of legislators. In the American system there are many check-points to the exercise of power; this is the very meaning of the system of checks and balances. If the farm lobby wins at one point its opponents may effectively defend a roadblock at another. This is precisely what often happens. Critics of the system who emphasize vulnerability to pressure groups all too frequently point to examples of success at a particular point in the process without following through to the ultimate result. Moreover, when that ultimate result is to prevent action, it follows from what has just been said that it is by no means necessarily true that a majority will is being frustrated. On the contrary, the necessity of mobilizing more power, or making it effective at another point, tends to mean that there will be more debate, more public discussion, more general education with respect to the matter in question, with the result that other groups than those immediately affected, consumer groups, for instance, are aroused to support their own interests, with the further consequence that when action is taken it will have a wider representative base—and perhaps a very different one—from what would otherwise have been the case. There is every evidence that this is precisely what happened during the long debate over flexible versus rigid price supports. Farm leaders were outraged at moves by Secretary Benson that they interpreted as appeals for consumer support.

Finally, a special word should be said about the presidential veto power, even though it is one of the checks to which reference has just been made. Representing a national constituency, the President is generally in a better position than anyone else to resist the demands of particular interests. The same argument was cited in support of the view that it is to the interest of the Government in England to support a consistent policy, and one that does not give undue concessions to special interest. Applied to the presidency, this argument tends also to be subject to the same weaknesses. But here an important qualification is to be noted. A British Government desiring to remain in office is wholly dependent upon having its party continue to hold a majority of the seats in Parliament; hence it must consider the electoral situation in all of the constituencies. The President also has a large stake in having his party control the Congress. But it is not so large a stake. It is not all or nothing. He may remain in office even though his party is in the minority in both Houses of Congress and he may even continue to exercise very considerable power under such circumstances. To this extent the "general interest" base provided by the veto power is stronger than its equivalent under the cabinet system.<sup>27</sup>

For examples from agriculture, we may go back to the spring of 1946. Wool production had been heavily subsidized during the war and was in excess supply. In spite of recommendations by the Secretary of Agriculture and a special committee established for the purpose, Congress failed to act. The Secretary of Agriculture then discontinued all support of wool prices, which had been provided under general war powers. Congress responded by passing a bill which included among its provisions a special fee on imported wool. This provision ran directly contrary to our postwar foreign trade policy and its enactment threatened to wreck the Geneva Trade Conference, then in session. In spite of the strong opposition of the Department of State, the bill passed both houses of Congress. The President vetoed the bill and Congress sustained his action. A new bill, omitting the import fee provision, was thereupon speedily enacted. A special interest that was threatening our foreign economic policy was successful in Congress, but was checked by action of the President.

Eight years later another President was able to take advantage of the special interest in wool to prevent the success of a move in behalf of high price supports for basic crops which he believed to be counter to the general interest.

<sup>27</sup> In referring to the "general interest" base of the veto power I do not mean to obscure the fact that the veto may be used in support of special interests. It should be pointed out, too, that the peculiarities of our electoral college system are generally thought to operate in such a way as to favor certain special groups. It is arguable, however, that in a crude fashion, this inequality is offset by the rural orientation of the legislative branch.

The President had recommended a system of production payments for wool, substituting this for commodity loans. He had also recommended reversion to a flexible price support system for basic crops, as already mentioned. The House Committee on Agriculture, apparently in a move to outwit the President, combined his wool bill with an extension of the then-existing price supports for basics at a fixed 90 per cent of parity. However, they had miscalculated. On the eve of the crucial vote, Secretary Benson himself is said to have carried the word to Congressmen from wool states that the President would veto a 90 per cent bill even though it carried the wool payments plan with it. Thus in the end Congressmen from wool states had to vote for flexible supports for basics in order to get their wool subsidy. Five out of a possible 32 did so. This is not a particularly strong case, but it at least suggests the possibility of a situation in which the threat of a veto might bring some pressure on one interest group to help check another.

Many cases can be cited when the bicameral system has tended to work in the same way—to obstruct the demands of special interest groups. In both 1948 and 1949 the House of Representatives first voted to prolong the operation of high price supports, ultimately acceding to the Senate's insistence on a downward modification. Only the Korean war prevented this action from being allowed to take effect. One may find other instances in which either one House of Congress or the other or both or the Administration has manifested a great—perhaps too great—sensitivity to agricultural interests and demands. Frequently, however, the requisite concurrence of all three is lacking.

In spite of what has just been said, it is often true that the inertia of government tends to favor the special interest. Where an emergency situation develops, Congress may act fairly quickly—especially if a well organized interest is prodding it; but, where legislation favoring a special interest is already on the books, it is difficult to get it removed even in the face of conditions that seem to call for such action. But for many situations there is a technique to counter this tendency, and Congress often sees fit to use it. This is simply the device of granting a demand for a limited period, requiring renewal if it is to be extended beyond the original grant. In this way the weight of governmental inertia is shifted. In the battles over flexible versus rigid price supports, the proponents of flexible (which in effect meant lower) supports always enjoyed the great advantage that inertia, and therefore the check and balance system, was on their side; for no action at all meant a return to an even lower level of price guarantees than they were proposing.

To summarize briefly what has been said: the purpose of this case study was to examine the commonly held belief that "responsible government," British style, is markedly superior to the system of separated powers in its ability to resist the demands of special interests—to examine this belief in the light of the evidence of postwar agricultural subsidies and price supports. From that evidence it appears that in Britain, the all-or-none nature of party competition may make leaders extremely sensitive to the demands of pressure groups, and party discipline may be used to suppress elements in the party that would like to resist the demands of those groups. The American system, it is true, may be less responsive to a clear popular majority, when such a majority exists. But, in the more common event that only minorities have clear positions, these minorities have more hurdles to cross, more roadblocks at points where their demands may be checked, than similar groups face in Britain. No single case establishes a general rule. But viewing the case of agricultural subsidies and price supports in combination with more general analysis, the writer concludes there are strong grounds, at least, for doubting that the American form of democracy is any more susceptible than the British to the pressures of minorities.

APPENDIX

BRITISH AND AMERICAN AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES: FACTS AND ARGUMENTS

A comparison of rates of subsidy for British and American agriculture can only rest on approximations based on more or less arbitrary assumptions and allocations. The difficulties are several. In Britain, price controls were retained until 1953 and 1954. Before that, during the period of wartime and postwar shortages, the food and agriculture industry was heavily subsidized but (see note 10 above) it is arguable that the subsidies were consumer subsidies. In the United States, war-induced scarcities led to a similar ambiguity. Accordingly, the comparison is confined to the post-price control period.

For the United Kingdom, then, I shall use the years since the free market has been reestablished, 1954–1955 through 1960–1961. The average annual cost of agricultural support in the United Kingdom for that period amounts to $716 million.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Computed from official data. See Parliamentary Debates (Commons), Fifth series, Vol. 618, cols. 21–22, Feb. 22, 1960; ibid., Vol. 617, cols. 35–36, Feb. 9, 1960; and ibid., Vol. 634, col. 71, Feb. 8, 1961.

TABLE I. FARM SUBSIDY COST COMPARISONS ON A PER CAPITA BASIS

	United Kingdom		United States
	Number (in millions)	Subsidy per capita	Number (in millions)	Subsidy per capita
Population <sup>a</sup>	51.0	$ 13	164.3	$ 13.44
Population engaged in agriculture <sup>b</sup>	1.1	$ 651	9.0	$246
Farm operators <sup>c</sup>	.29	$2,469	5.4	$409

<sup>a</sup> Population figures are for the year 1955.

<sup>b</sup> These figures are for the year 1951. I am informed by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, and Food that their estimate of the present farm labor in the United Kingdom, reduced by a complex calculation to full-time male adult equivalents, is .9 million.

<sup>c</sup> The United Kingdom figure is from the 1951 census and is for "farmers and farm foremen." The Ministry of Agriculture, using different definitions, estimates that farm operators at present number about 350,000. (Information supplied by Mr. J. H. Kirk, Ministry of Agriculture, letter of February 10, 1959, to the author.)

For the United States, no such accurate measure of costs to the Treasury is possible. Here, in large measure, instead of paying a direct subsidy we (in effect) buy farm products and store them. Some of these stored commodities are eventually sold on the market, some are given away, and some are diverted to secondary (and less remunerative) uses. What our price support program for any given year will cost cannot be ascertained until long after the event, if at all—not, at least, until the commodities have been disposed of and the proceeds realized; these may be in blocked foreign currencies.<sup>29</sup> The costs actually realized each year can, of course, be calculated. These figures are made available by the Department of Agriculture and we rely on them here.<sup>30</sup> The comparisons set out in Tables I and II use the average of the realized costs for the six years endings June 30, 1960, the latest for which figures are currently available. The figure so derived is $2,209.6 million.<sup>31</sup>

<sup>29</sup> During World War II it may be recalled, the entire accumulation of price-supported farm surpluses from the depression years was disposed of at an over-all profit to the Government.

<sup>30</sup> It must be emphasized that we are considering the cost of agricultural subsidies to the taxpayer. Much of this sum is expended for storage and other costs that do not go to the farmer. Whether the farmers profit more or less than the cost of the program is, fortunately, not a question that need be answered for the purpose of this article. Incidentally, it would be a difficult question to answer for Britain as well, although there most of the costs of the program go directly into the farmers' pockets.

<sup>31</sup> This calculation includes all farm programs classified by the Department of Agriculture as "primarily for stabilization of farm prices and income" and also the item for Agricultural Conservation Payments. The latter is included to make the total comparable to the figures used for the United Kingdom where so-called "production grants" (e.g., for lime and fertilizer) are used more or less interchangeably with "deficiency payments" and other forms of direct subsidy. Costs

TABLE II. FARM SUBSIDY COST COMPARISONS IN RELATION TO VARIOUS NATIONAL INCOME AND EXPENDITURE FIGURES*

	United Kingdom		United States
	Amount (in millions) Col. 1	Subsidy as a percentage of amount in Col. 1 Col. 2	Amount (in millions) Col. 3	Subsidy as a percentage of amount in Col. 3 Col. 4
Gross farm income	$ 3,699.9	19.3	$ 33,788	6.5
Net agricultural income	$ 843.1 <sup>a</sup>	84.9	$ 11,473	19.2
Gross national product	$49,311.0	1.4	$400,300	0.5
Governmental expenditures (national govt.)	$13,821.6	5.1	$ 68,122	3.2

* All figures are averages for the six fiscal years 1954-55 through 1959-60.

<sup>a</sup> After allowance for excess of replacement cost over original cost of certain assets used during the period. (Cmnd. 390, pp. 11 and 12.)

Sources for both tables: United Kingdom: Annual Abstract of Statistics; 1951 Census, Occupation Tables; Cmnd. 390; and private communications from the National Farmers Union and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, and Food; United States: 1950 Census; Census of Agriculture (1950); The Farm Income Situation, No. 169, July, 1958; Agricultural Statistics, 1966.

At this point a possible objection must be noted: the cost to the public treasury is only part of the social cost of price supports. How much has been added to the consumers' bill for farm products by the existence of price supports? This question takes us into a far more speculative field than the calculation of costs to the government. What would prices be if they were not supported? The answer would depend in large measure upon how much would be produced in the absence of acreage controls. Even more difficult to calculate, and perhaps even more significant, is the effect of price guarantees in encouraging farmers to use more fertilizer, buy more labor-saving machinery, and in other ways improve their efficiency. It may be questioned, however, whether the average voter is much influenced by this factor. He hears about the cost of the farm program to the government, but it is doubtful whether he gives much thought to that part (very small at most) of the cost of a shirt or a loaf of bread that can be charged to price supports.<sup>32</sup> of the soil bank "acreage reserve program" are included but, following the practice of the Department of Agriculture, the soil bank "conservation reserve program" is excluded. If the latter were included, the average annual cost figure would be increased by $112.5 million, or about five per cent.

<sup>32</sup> It may be that, under exceptional circumstances, some public opinion can be stirred up

Using the crude cost figures that have just been developed, then, the next step is to make them more comparable, as between the two countries, by reducing them to ratios or percentages of such factors as population, farm operators, farm income, national income, and governmental expenditures for all purposes. This is shown in the opposite page. It will be observed that, by all but one of these measures, during the period in question, British agriculture was subsidized at a much higher rate than American. For the one exception (subsidy per capita of total population), subsidy rates were substantially equal.<sup>33</sup> According to the other bases of comparison, the difference ranges (very roughly) from a factor of a little over one and one-half, using total governmental expenditures as the standard, to one of six in another instance (farm operators). Using a sort of rough average of these indices, it would not be grossly misleading to say that the rate of British agricultural subsidies was running, proportionally, at from two to three times the rate of their American counterparts.

against a particular program on the basis of its presumed effect in raising prices. The case of butter before Secretary Benson's cut in the support level of dairy products in the spring of 1954 may be a case in point.

<sup>33</sup> This basis of comparison, of course, leaves out of account the fact that per capita income in the United States is far in excess of that in Great Britain; hence the subsidy bears less heavily on the American taxpayer.

EQUILIBRIUM, STRUCTURE OF INTERESTS AND LEADERSHIP: ADENAUER'S SURVIVAL AS CHANCELLOR<sup>1</sup>

PETER H. MERKL

University of California (Santa Barbara)

In studies comparing the Bonn Republic with the Weimar Republic, few aspects of the former have received more attention from political scientists than its extraordinary political stability. Contrary to all expectations in the immediate postwar era, and under the same leadership, Germany's second try at parliamentary democracy has already outlasted the Nazi millennium and will soon have exceeded—successfully—the life span of its ill-fated democratic predecessor, the Weimar Republic. Interpretations abound which attribute the political stamina of the Bonn government to the economic prosperity of Western Germany, its Allied tutelage, its firm Western-oriented course, or its disenchantment with political extremism of either variety. Of particular interest to political scientists, however, are the theories which identify the political stability of the Bonn Republic with the “reign” of Konrad Adenauer from the beginning to this day.

At the time of the Bundestag elections of September, 1961, the octogenarian Chancellor had already governed the Federal Republic for three terms and there were abundant signs that his time was up. Having captured a majority of the Bundestag seats in the two previous elections, his Christian Democrats (CDU/CSU) now lost their absolute majority to the two opposition parties, the Free Democrats (FDP) and Social Democrats (SPD).<sup>2</sup> The FDP was willing to enter a coalition with the CDU/CSU, but its chairman, Erich Mende, definitely rejected Adenauer as the new Chancellor in favor of Ludwig Erhard or any other prominent CDU/CSU politician. A coalition between the CDU/CSU and the SPD was an unlikely choice for reasons we shall return to. During the campaign, Adenauer's popularity had slipped far from the heights of public veneration<sup>3</sup> and the press claimed that he was already beginning to confuse things and names in public speeches and had lost his zeal and touch for appealing to crowds.<sup>4</sup> Most damaging of all, a revolt against him was threatening in his own party where an opposition, the fronde, had formed since the presidential elections of 1959,<sup>5</sup> centering around Minister of Economics Erhard, Bundestag President Eugen Gerstenmaier, and the Hamburg deputies Bucerius and Blumenfeld.<sup>6</sup> At the height of the election campaign, Adenauer's internal enemies publicly attacked him, when the old Chancellor made the mistake of questioning the personal integrity of the SPD candidate, Willy Brandt, a few days after the outbreak of the Berlin crisis. They began to campaign for Erhard; and the ambitious Minister of Defense, Franz Josef Strauss (CSU), joined them in the last weeks before the elections. It was surprising that the CDU/CSU in spite of this internecine war managed to win a plurality at the polls.

Two days after the elections, therefore, when the 85-year-old Chancellor faced his Executive Board (Parteivorstand), angrily upbraiding his critics for showing him the door after twelve years of successful leadership, this seemed to be the end of the Adenauer era. Yet before the week was over, gasps of uncomprehending protest could be heard throughout the editorial offices of the German press. Cartoons appeared depicting Adenauer as a naughty child refusing to go to bed. Newspaper editors wrote the letter of resignation he should have written, and some compared him to the famous surgeon Sauerbruch who, stubbornly refusing to retire from the operating room because of his advanced age, had contributed to the death of several patients. Six weeks later, Adenauer had once more become Chancellor for at least another two years.

<sup>4</sup> Der Spiegel, Sept. 6, 1961, p. 17.

<sup>5</sup> On this occasion, Adenauer at first decided to go into semiretirement by running for the largely honorific office of Federal President. He changed his mind, however, when he learned that his successor as Chancellor would be Ludwig Erhard, of whom Adenauer declared in public that he lacked the ability and stature for this position.

<sup>6</sup> “Brandt alias Frahm,” Der Spiegel, Aug. 23, 1961, p. 18.

<sup>1</sup> This study was made possible by a travel grant from the International and Comparative Fund of the University of California for which credit is due to the Ford Foundation.

<sup>2</sup> The popular vote was distributed as follows: CDU/CSU 45.4% (1957: 50.2); SPD 36.2% (31.8); and FDP 12.8% (7.7).

<sup>3</sup> “Protest ist keine Denkmalsschaendung mehr,” Sueddeutsche Zeitung (hereafter referred to as SZ), Sept. 13, 1961.

What had happened? Could Adenauer's survival against all odds be understood with the help of the various theories advanced by political scientists and other observers to explain his dominant role in West German politics? It is the intention of this study to reexamine these theories of Adenauer's leadership in the light of the revealing events accompanying the formation of his new coalition cabinet, and to supply a new explanation of this phenomenon of leadership and of the peculiarities of the West German political system which sustain it.

I

A cursory survey of the literature about the astounding stamina of Adenauer as a leadership figure shows a good deal of agreement among political scientists, journalists and other observers about the basic elements of his dominant role. Four major themes recur in most articles, books and comments about him: his personality, his international stature, his constitutional position and the plebiscitary character of West German democracy.

The personality of the Old Man is pictured as sly, authoritarian, paternalistic and single-minded. Sigmund Neumann, for example, describes him as ... one of the great statesmen of the 20th century ... astute and arrogant, committed and cynical, indefatigable and decent, stubborn and sensitive, autocratic and humane. . . .<sup>7</sup>

Richard Hiscocks speaks of "a mixture of judgment and forcefulness, wisdom and astuteness" and of "masterly political tactics" but criticizes his authoritarian attitude toward his cabinet and the Bundestag.<sup>8</sup> Arnold J. Heidenheimer, in his book on the subject, explains Adenauer's authoritarianism by pointing to his background as a politico-religious leader of the old Center Party and as the mayor of an important city, a quasi-feudal chief of great skill in dealing with the regional and socio-economic group interests of Weimar Prussia.<sup>9</sup> In another penetrating analysis of Adenauer's leadership,

Heidenheimer draws attention to the fact that, as Lord Mayor of Cologne and member of the Prussian Council of State, Adenauer patterned his role in the bureaucratic tradition of leadership rather than in the Anglo-American tradition of party government.<sup>10</sup> Fellow politicians, the West German press and, in particular, the news magazine Der Spiegel often picture the Old Man as a crafty tactician whose chief technique seems to be to let things develop, deal with them one by one as they come up, and not to make any particular effort to force his own concept upon a world of contrary currents of opinion; in other words, a master of Bismarck's art of the possible. Other observers have called him primitive, sterile, unrealistic and lacking depth.<sup>11</sup>

A consensus of opinion also stresses the importance of his international stature for his authority at home.<sup>12</sup> For his West Germans, the Old Man symbolizes their return to a respected position among other nations. Adenauer's rise owes much also to the fact that the time was ripe for his concept of reconstructing the German position step by step from the Rhineland into a definite commitment to the West and to European integration. Georg Wolff in his recent series on Adenauer in Der Spiegel even goes so far as to suggest that the domestic policies of the Old Man have to be seen from the standpoint of foreign policy.<sup>13</sup> Guenter Gaus, in an editorial in the Sueddeutsche Zeitung, sums up the secret of Adenauer's success and the likely end of his era of inflexibility in the following words:

His imposing one-track-mindedness had to coincide with a corresponding attitude on the part of our Western Allies. Never letting anyone change his preconceived course enabled Adenauer to bring about reconciliation with France and earned him the friendship of John Foster Dulles. For a decade, his basic ideas have coincided so much with those in Washington and Paris that almost every one of his political decisions turned out to

<sup>7</sup> In Taylor Cole, ed., European Political Systems (2d rev. ed., New York, 1960), p. 418; also Alfred Grosser, Die Bonner Demokratie (Duesseldorf: Rauch, 1960), pp. 418-20.

<sup>8</sup> Democracy in Western Germany (London: Oxford University Press, 1957), pp. 79, 122-7. See also Robert G. Neumann, European and Comparative Government (New York, 1960), p. 423 fn.

<sup>9</sup> Adenauer and the CDU (The Hague: Nijhoff, 1960), pp. 235-7.

<sup>10</sup> "Der starke Regierungschef und das Parteiensystem: der Kanzlereffekt in der Bundesrepublik," Politische Vierteljahresschrift, Vol. 2 (Sept. 1961), pp. 251-2.

<sup>11</sup> See especially the comments quoted by George Wolff in "Mein Gott—Was soll aus Deutschland werden?," Der Spiegel, Sept. 27, 1961, pp. 60-2.

<sup>12</sup> See Grosser, op. cit., pp. 415-6; Sigmund Neumann, op. cit., p. 419; Hiscocks, op. cit., pp. 79-80; and Heidenheimer, "Der starke Regierungschef . . .," pp. 257-8.

<sup>13</sup> Der Spiegel, Nov. 15, 1961, pp. 57-69.

be right in the end. But who would claim that this will continue to be true?<sup>14</sup>

About the contribution of his constitutional position as Federal Chancellor to the durable dominance of Adenauer in West German politics, there is some disagreement. The Basic Law of 1949 attempted to strengthen the position of the Chancellor vis-à-vis cabinet and Bundestag in many ways, in the hope of forestalling the ministerial instability of the Weimar Republic. The chief device for this purpose was the so-called "constructive no-confidence vote," a modification of orthodox parliamentary government which requires the election of a new Chancellor for the overthrow of the incumbent. By this means, the framers of the Basic Law hoped to prevent the extreme wings of a multi-party parliament like the Weimar Reichstag from combining to topple governments solely for the sake of obstruction and chaos. One prolific writer on German affairs, Alfred Grosser, however, considers it most unlikely that the situation of the last years of the Weimar Republic will ever be repeated. Hence the "constructive no-confidence vote" has never been used in Bonn and plays no particular role in strengthening Adenauer's position.<sup>15</sup> On the other hand, Ruediger Altmann, a German political journalist, makes a strong argument for the importance of the "constructive no-confidence vote" in his recent book Das Erbe Adenauers.<sup>16</sup> He maintains that this device has brought about the virtual paralysis of West German parliamentarism by setting the price of insurrection against the Chancellor exorbitantly high. Before 1953, dissatisfied coalition partners would have had to line up a new coalition of small parties with the Social Democrats in order to exercise pressure against the Chancellor. Since 1953, and in the crisis year 1951, the price of insurrection would have included the breaking away of parts of the CDU/CSU to form a coalition with the SPD.

On balance, there seems to be some merit on both sides of the argument. A constitutional device designed for the prevention of the unique predicament of the Weimar Republic can hardly hope to be a panacea for all conceivable ills of a nascent parliamentary democracy. In fact, if the constructive no-confidence vote had been a part of the Weimar Constitution in 1930, it would have stopped neither the inundation of the Reichstag by a majority of totalitarians from the right and the left, nor even the legal—not to mention violent—ascendancy to power of Hitler. On the other hand, Altmann is quite right in suggesting that such a considerable modification of parliamentary government was bound to have a noticeable effect on the position of Adenauer with regard to his cabinet, the Bundestag and even his own party. But then again, Altmann's argument proves too much: while it may be true that a small coalition party in a pre-1958 French government, for example, could get the ear of the premier without such an extreme step as having to form a new coalition with the opposition, this was not a particularly desirable situation in the interest of democracy and good government. Regarding the supreme sacrifice of party unity, moreover, the dilemma of the labor wing of the CDU/CSU is not unique. It is found also in British parliamentarism where the wings of the party in power have no more authority over the Prime Minister than they can impose at caucus meetings by virtue of their votes. And just as the power of the British Prime Minister over the House of Commons cannot be explained without mentioning his party leadership, Adenauer's authority over his own party in the Bundestag is also largely a matter of party cohesion and party leadership. When the CDU/CSU tires of him—and that day may be near—it will replace him without straining the constructive no-confidence vote or any other formal part of law and constitution.

The fourth and perhaps most interesting part of Adenauer's leadership has been the development of West German democracy in the direction of plebiscitary democracy. Whether one believes that the authoritarian charisma of Adenauer made the West German elections into plebiscites for or against him, or that the Germans needed somebody like Adenauer in the wake of Hitler's dictatorship and the disillusionment with politics, there is no denying the fact. Friedrich Naumann, a German writer and politician, predicted this development even before the first World War and the sociologists Max Weber and Alexander Rüstow sought to encourage it under the Weimar Republic: the chief executive office in Germany has become the focal point of the authority of the state which is derived from the people and periodically reaffirmed by them although they do not directly elect the Chancellor. There are different ways of looking at this phenomenon. Erich Kuby, another German political journalist, feels that Adenauer owes his long tenure to the leadership cult by means of which the Germans are trying to drop their political responsibility into the lap of someone trustworthy so they can concentrate on their pursuit of happiness.<sup>17</sup> Hiscocks talks about "Chancellor democracy," a phrase also used by the German political scientist Theodor Eschenburg and widely adopted in the German press.<sup>18</sup> Heidenheimer, finally, who has dealt with this subject more analytically than anyone else, prefers the term "Chancellor effect" to connote the added authority of office by which Adenauer attracts a vast fringe of unpolitical voters, job seekers, patriots, people who never even vote in state elections and who often lack the interest and knowledge to understand Adenauer's position or the ideology of the CDU/CSU. Heidenheimer uses the same term for Adenauer's hold over a loyal following within his coalition parties, the "Chancellor party," which is said to be latent within the CDU/CSU and all one-time coalition parties of the Old Man. This "Chancellor effect" is partly the creation of Adenauer and partly the result of circumstances tending in this direction. After Adenauer's retirement, Heidenheimer believes that its benefits will accrue to any popular, forceful Chancellor, such as Ludwig Erhard or Willy Brandt.<sup>19</sup>

<sup>14</sup> "Adenauer," SZ, November 4/5, 1961.

<sup>15</sup> Grosser, op. cit., p. 415. Richard Hiscocks attributes to it a part of the responsibility for Adenauer's authoritarianism towards cabinet and Bundestag; op. cit., p. 428.

<sup>16</sup> (Stuttgart-Degerloch: Seewald, 1960), pp. 31, 37, 41-2.

These four elements of Adenauer's tenacious dominance in West German politics, personality, international stature, constitutional position and the "Chancellor effect," are the basic conceptual tools offered in the endeavor to understand and explain Adenauer's survival against great odds in the almost seven weeks of bargaining over the new coalition government. His personality obviously had much to do with his success: his stubborn refusal to bow to the storm of public indignation and ridicule; the brazenness with which he seized the initiative both toward the public and within his own party;<sup>20</sup> the superior skill with which he outmaneuvered his chief rivals Erhard, Strauss and Gerstenmaier, and finally his future partners of the FDP. His international stature helped him little, although he lost no opportunity to show his own party leaders and the FDP negotiators letters and telegrams he had received from Washington. Later he insisted that he should be reelected soon, since President Kennedy was expecting him in Washington. His constitutional position also did not help him. It may on the contrary have made his prospective partners more wary of him: once they helped reelect him Chancellor, how could they be sure that he would retire at the agreed moment; how could they be certain of a reasonable measure of control over him short of forming a new coalition with the opposition? The charm of the Chancellor effect over the people had already worn thin and was used up even more rapidly by the refusal of the Old Man to resign while his people still respected and admired him. Only over his own party did his call for loyalty still have effect, especially after he had outmaneuvered the fronde and his most serious rivals.

Yet when one reviews the changing scenes and battles of the formation of the new Adenauer coalition, these four tools of analysis fall definitely short of explaining how and why Adenauer succeeded once more. They fail to explain, in particular, why Ludwig Erhard, the popular architect of the West German "economic miracle" and the choice for Chancellor of the people,<sup>21</sup> of large parts of the CDU, the FDP and the CSU, did not press through his demand to become Chancellor. Nor can they make plausible the failure of the ambitious Strauss (CSU) to take control of the situation and either to end or to limit to a transitional one-year period the tenure of the Old Man. Nor do they make intelligible the similar failure of Gerstenmaier, the popular and experienced President of the Bundestag. These three men certainly did not fail for lack of trying. Least of all can the four elements mentioned above explain the slow but inexorable collapse of the position of Mende and his FDP who started out dictating the end of the Adenauer era and ended up content with little more than an empty gesture of compliance with their minimal request: to share the control over German foreign policy.

II

Dissatisfaction with these explanations leads us to probe further into the structure and substructure of the political system which made it possible for Adenauer to weather the storm

<sup>17</sup> Alles im Eimer (Stuttgart: Goverts, 1960), pp. 203-7. See also Grosser, op. cit., p. 420.

<sup>18</sup> Op. cit., p. 126.

<sup>19</sup> "Der starke Regierungschef . . .," pp. 254-61.

<sup>20</sup> The morning after the Bundestag elections, Adenauer called a press conference without consulting his party in order to assert his leadership toward the public from the start. Three days later he disarmed his Party Executive Board so successfully that they appointed him as chief negotiator for the coalition talks, thereby prejudging the question of his continued leadership.

<sup>21</sup> According to Time (Atlantic Edition), Nov. 10, 1961, p. 30, a public opinion poll gave Erhard 70% of the electorate over Adenauer as Chancellor. I have not been able to ascertain the source or verify the statistics.

facing him after the 1961 elections. The stability of his leadership, it is submitted, is the consequence of two structural aspects of the West German system which are linked together and will continue to favor anyone with the qualities necessary to become the leader of the CDU/CSU. This statement presupposes, of course, that the political camp to the right of the SPD will continue to enjoy a popular majority. One of the structural factors is the equilibrium among the group forces of which the CDU/CSU is composed. We shall describe in this section how this equilibrium has operated in Adenauer's favor. The other factor consists of the forces which have increasingly driven the German multi-party system into a bipartite mold. After dealing with this second factor in the next section, we can draw the conclusions for any third party from the presence and interaction of these two structural aspects of the West German political system.

By equilibrium among the group forces we mean a relative state of balance among several pairs of distinct and antagonistic groups within the CDU/CSU which tends to operate in favor of the status quo. This state of balance need not be static or exclusive of the wax and wane of individual groups. There can be shifts of emphasis or orientation owing to the changing weight of individual groups. It is essential to this concept of equilibrium, however, that there is a consensus among the groups not to wipe out one another at times of superiority and to give each group its due voice, according to its size, in the formation of the policy of the whole organization. Such an equilibrational system will tend to operate similarly to the American system of the great sectional and socio-economic interests, or "veto groups": a candidate for leadership or a new policy, in order to be accepted, must not arouse the strong opposition of any one group. Once a leader or a policy has become accepted and managed to unify the whole system behind it, however, efforts at overthrowing the leader or the policy face the same obstacle: the opposition of a single group, albeit a small minority, can frustrate them once and for all.

The CDU/CSU indeed operates like such an equilibrational system. It is composed of a number of distinct and separate groups which oppose each other in pairs and yet are held together by a consensus mixed of mutual respect, Christian Democratic ideas about government and society, and the tangible advantages of party unity: organized labor and organized business, Protestants and Catholics, centralists and states righters, on the one side Big Business and Big Labor, and on the other, the Mittelstand, i.e. farmers, small business and the civil service.

Members and voters of the CDU/CSU come from all layers of society. A web of associations from the Catholic labor organizations to business and farm organizations and the far-flung system of church organizations ties the party to all kinds of groups and social forces in West German society.<sup>22</sup> An elaborate system of party committees on several levels, moreover, channels the programmatic demands of labor, business, the Mittelstand, refugees, local government organizations, women and youth groups through Social Policy Committees, Mittelstand Policy Committees, and further committees on communal policy, and the women's and youth organizations, respectively, into the policy-making agencies of the party.<sup>23</sup>

As in our equilibrium model, this system has called for a leader who is basically uncommitted to any one group. While Adenauer could not help being a pronounced Catholic, a man of business associations and a former local government official of considerable reputation, he has remained far from becoming the herald of any of these groups. He has bent over backwards to win the confidence of Protestants and to get along with organized labor and the states righters whose interests at times clash with those of the local government organizations. His role as a leader has been mainly that of a moderator and mediator among all the groups, a task which is also implicit in Christian Democratic thinking and in Catholic social philosophy.

This concept of leadership also implies a rather passive role in the making of domestic policy. Under such circumstances, the leader is not expected to come up with an imaginative policy of his own. He fares better if he is content with being the broker of the policy trends developed by the dominant groups of his party, or the executor of the resultant of the parallelogram of forces among these groups. As has been noted by many an observer, Adenauer has never exhibited a pronounced conception of his own in domestic policy.<sup>24</sup> Only in foreign policy, he has a definite commitment to European unification and to the Western alliance.

<sup>22</sup> For details, see Gerhard Schulz, "Die Organisationsstruktur der CDU," Zeitschrift fuer Politik, Vol. 3 (1956), p. 161. On the theory of parties of integration, see Sigmund Neumann, "Towards a Theory of Political Parties," World Politics, Vol. 6 (1954), p. 501 ff.

<sup>23</sup> Gerhard Schulz, "Die CDU—Merkmale ihres Aufbaus," in Max Gustav Lange, ed., Parteien in der Bundesrepublik (Stuttgart-Duesseldorf: Ringverlag, 1955), p. 143.

<sup>24</sup> See the quotations in Der Spiegel, Sept. 27, 1961, pp. 64-5.

Adenauer's broker role becomes evident especially if we review the spectacular changes in the economic policy of the CDU/CSU in the period during which he headed his party in the Bizonal Economic Council and later in the Bonn government. The CDU programs of Neheim-Huesten (1946) and Ahlen (1947) still advocated a planned economy and the socialization of the coal industry,<sup>25</sup> thereby reflecting both the hard times and the dominance of the labor wing within the CDU/CSU which at that time also frequently entered coalitions with the SPD. Then came the rise of Erhard's "social market economics," coalitions with the FDP and the Conservatives (DP), and the Duesseldorf Principles of 1949 in which the "regulated competition" of ordo liberalism<sup>26</sup> replaced the earlier socialism. In the following four years, the CDU/CSU dropped its labor orientation more and more while its business and Mittelstand wing came into full control. After 1952, Erhard and his free enterprise policy increasingly fell out of favor with the protectionist interests of Big Business, the Mittelstand and the farmers. This new trend of the CDU/CSU reached its climax with the postponing of Erhard's anti-cartel bill until it was finally passed in an emasculated form in 1957, half a decade after it was first submitted.<sup>27</sup> But while the economic policy of the CDU/CSU thus traversed a half-cycle from socialism to recartelization, Adenauer remained party chairman and Chancellor without even once losing control, due to his lack of commitment and flexibility in domestic affairs.

With this party structure of the CDU/CSU and the corresponding leadership model in mind, we can reexamine the situation which Adenauer was facing after the elections of 1961. With his Bundestag majority lost, the Old Man had to choose between SPD and FDP as coalition partners. Apparently he preferred the latter because he would have to share less power with a small party, if for no other reason. However, the FDP had campaigned with the slogan "No more one-party dominance in Bonn" and a promise not to enter a coalition with the SPD under any circumstances—thus encouraging a good many dissatisfied CDU/CSU voters to vote for the FDP instead. It appealed in particular to right-wing voters who had so far voted for Adenauer. Widely acclaimed as the real winner of the 1961 elections, the FDP interpreted its gains as a popular mandate to overthrow the Old Man. Favored by the conservative character of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic and by the position of strength he had created for himself, Adenauer could afford to ignore the popular clamor for his resignation. But the adamant refusal of the FDP and the insurgents within his own ranks were a serious challenge to his survival as Chancellor. Knowing the way in which his party operates, Adenauer apparently decided to tackle his internal opposition first. Once the CDU/CSU had committed itself to reelecting him Chancellor, the fear of losing face would keep it from backing down before the small FDP which would have no choice, therefore, but to accept Adenauer or to go into the opposition. We shall see how the equilibrical system of the CDU/CSU helped the Old Man to stifle his internal opposition.

The FDP had counted on the assurances of Erhard, Strauss, Gerstenmaier and the Hamburg deputies of the CDU to topple Konrad Adenauer. Mende's sharp rejection of Adenauer as Chancellor of the next coalition was to give the cue for this internal revolution. To be sure, a party leader who has headed the government for such a long time is likely to have accumulated supporters who owe their position to him, in this case men like the Minister of the Interior Schroeder, or the Foreign Minister von Brentano. Adenauer also had personal friends from his home state who were likely to support him even at a time of declining popularity, such as the banker Pferdmenges or the trade unionist Blank. Yet it was doubtful whether such supporters were numerous enough to continue him in office against overwhelming odds. As Gerd Bucerius, the most outspoken of the frondeurs, argued persuasively in his weekly magazine Die Zeit (Hamburg), Adenauer had come a long way from his peak in 1957 due to his age and immense burden of work. Unlike Erhard as a Chancellor, Adenauer's continued tenure of office would also cost the CDU/CSU very considerable concessions to the FDP in questions of personnel and policy.<sup>28</sup>

While Adenauer's "Chancellor effect" thus

<sup>25</sup> See Wolfgang Treue, Deutsche Parteiprogramme 1861-1961 (Frankfurt: Musterschmidt, 1961), pp. 183, 189; and Bruno Doerpinghaus und Kurt Witt, Politisches Jahrbuch der CDU/CSU 1950 (Generalsekretariat der Arbeitsgemeinschaft CDU/CSU fuer Deutschland, 1950), pp. 226-9.

<sup>26</sup> Duesseldorfer Leitsaetze, July 15, 1949, Sonderdruck des Deutschland-Union-Dienstes. See also Carl J. Friedrich, "The Political Thought of Neo-Liberalism," this REVIEW, Vol. 49 (June 1955), pp. 509-25.

<sup>27</sup> "Wege zur Sicherung des freien Wettbewerbs," Das Parlament, July 24, 1957, pp. 5-8.

<sup>28</sup> Dieter Schroeder, "Die Erben Adenauers muessen noch warten," SZ, Sept. 30/Oct. 1, 1961, p. 4.

failed to save him at this crucial moment, the prospect of a coalition of the CDU/CSU with the FDP under Erhard set into motion the mechanics of the equilibrial system of the CDU/CSU. Wary of the economic and social policy of such an industry- and Mittelstand-dominated cabinet, the labor wing of the CDU/CSU utilized the general impasse to extract a number of concessions and promises from Adenauer in exchange for throwing its weight against the attempts to remove him. The CDU/CSU labor wing in the Bundestag and in the extra-parliamentary party apparatus has always been a factor to be reckoned with<sup>29</sup> and has lately moved more into the foreground under the leadership of Hans Katzer, the Executive Manager of the Social Policy Committees of the CDU/CSU. According to press comments, Katzer received specific assurances regarding the extension of the Law of Savings Premiums, the "social discount" in the stock of further denationalized enterprises, an increase in the workers' share of productive capital, a reform of corporation law, higher sickness benefits and family allowances, a stronger Cartel Office, and the establishment of an Economic and Social Council to extend labor co-determination above the plant level.<sup>30</sup> The labor wing would probably have preferred a coalition of the CDU/CSU with the SPD, but, rather than upset too much the balance of the equilibrial system, it contented itself with a firm commitment to its program of social policy by a CDU/CSU-FDP government.

Adenauer clearly stood to gain from the motion of the CDU/CSU labor wing to restore the balance as long as he was known to be flexible enough to return to the earlier CDU/CSU tradition of Kaiser and Arnold if need be. At the same time, he wanted to avoid becoming dependent on his new allies. This was the Archimedian point from which he could unhinge his entire opposition and yet retain his freedom of choice. He resolved, therefore, to swing the equilibrial pendulum all the way to the left in order to be sure of a reaction: one week after the elections, he invited the SPD leaders Ollenhauer, Brandt and Wehner for an extended discussion of German foreign policy which they had already requested months before. There was no mention of a "black-red" coalition, but most observers understood that the Old Man was exploring his only logical alternative for a coalition as long as the FDP refused to accept him. The reaction came instantly: the two top officials of the Bundesverband der Deutschen Industrie came to see Adenauer and assured him that they did not want Erhard as Chancellor either. CSU chairman Strauss and the CDU/CSU Minister President of Baden-Wuerttemberg, Kiesinger, hastened to express their horror of a "black-red" coalition. Most important, industry spokesmen put the FDP under pressure not to drive Adenauer to such an "extreme step." At this point Ludwig Erhard gave in and made it known that he no longer expected to become Chancellor right away. From this we can also gather that the fronde was a personal faction rather than one of economic interest. Without their favorite candidate, the internal opposition against Adenauer collapsed and, a mere ten days after the elections, the Old Man received the unanimous endorsement of the CDU/CSU caucus in the Bundestag. Erhard took it upon himself, in fact, to persuade his party to reelect Adenauer once more.<sup>31</sup>

At this point it may be well to stop and review the reasons for the failure of Erhard, Strauss and Gerstenmaier to end the Adenauer era. Erhard, who had accumulated broad support in the CDU/CSU as a result of his treatment by Adenauer after the presidential elections of 1959, seems to have underestimated the obstacles in the way of his immediate succession. In particular, he misjudged the tenacity of Adenauer when he saw him faltering during the election campaign and underestimated the power of the groups within his own party that have mental reservations about his economic policies. On the other hand, he overrated the power of public opinion and of his friends in the CDU/CSU and FDP to help him into office. Finally, neither Erhard nor any other important politician would have wanted to incur the odium of being Brutus to the eighty-five year old Caesar. Adenauer not only fought off Erhard's feeble attempt at insurrection, but added further insult to the long list of injuries which Erhard owes to him: when he was pressed by the Erhard faction to designate his Minister of Economics and Vice Chancellor as his heir apparent, he simply said that there were many CDU/CSU leaders who might succeed him some day. When Erhard proposed that as the Vice Chancellor and likely successor he ought to be given an opportunity to familiarize himself with his future duties and to participate in foreign policy decisions he was brusquely rebuffed. Finally, at the last stage of the negotiations over the new coalition with the FDP, Adenauer took away further substantial functions from the Ministry of Economics, a process which has gone on since 1952, in order to incorporate them into a new cabinet position for the FDP. This last slight occurred after Adenauer had already promised Erhard that no such transfer of functions would take place. The Minister of Economics consequently left the Bundestag at the election of the Chancellor, so as not to have to congratulate him, and the press attributed a good share of the negative votes to the incensed adherents of the humiliated Erhard.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>29</sup> According to Dr. Juergen Domes of the Institut fuer Politische Wissenschaft at Heidelberg University, the labor wing of the Bundestag CDU/CSU is the most cohesive and well-organized group of the parliamentary party, second only to the CSU Landesgruppe. Its strength has been consistently at 23 or 24% of the total, excepting only the period from 1953 to 1957. It also constitutes the largest single group within the Party Executive Board of the extra-parliamentary party.

<sup>30</sup> Der Spiegel, Oct. 11, 1961, pp. 27-8.

<sup>31</sup> See SZ, Sept. 25, 26 and 29, 1961.

Franz Josef Strauss, in contrast to Erhard, miscalculated the situation in that he expected to cut the Gordian knot with an energetic display of power. The ambitious Minister of Defense tried to force a one-year transitional Chancellorship as a compromise with the FDP upon the old Chancellor. As chairman of the CSU Landesgruppe in the Bundestag, he intended to use the votes of his Bavarian deputies as a lever to dislodge Adenauer and clear the way for Erhard. The CSU has always jealously guarded its last vestiges of autonomy against the CDU, and Strauss's efforts were generally interpreted as an attempt on the part of the CSU to reestablish itself as an independent party. However, Strauss's CSU deputies fell away from his cause one by one when they were supposed to vote against continuing Adenauer in office without any limitations. The Social Policy Committees and business and industrial interests of the Bavarian CSU, it seems, cherished their federation-wide interests in Bonn far more than the autonomy of the CSU. The Adenauer loyalists in the CDU/CSU were frankly delighted to see the ambitious Minister of Defense fall on his face. As some of his enemies claimed, Strauss wanted to help Erhard into the office of the Chancellor only in order to govern through him and in the hope of succeeding him soon. Now the Minister of Defense fell definitely out of grace with the Old Man who used to treat him fondly as the eventual heir of his system of inflexibility. At the inauguration of the new Adenauer cabinet, <sup>32</sup> Guenter Gaus, "Der ewige Zweite," SZ, Sept. 29, 1961, p. 3. Also Der Spiegel, Nov. 15, 1961, pp. 23-6.

TABLE I. SCHEDULE OF NEGOTIATIONS OVER THE NEW COALITION

Time Period	Moves
Sept. 17 (Elections)--19	(1) General Orientation: Adenauer seizes the initiative, meets the press and sounds out the FDP and SPD about a coalition.
Sept. 19-27	(2) Stage-Setting Maneuvers: (a) The labor wing of the CDU/CSU throws its weight behind the Chancellor in exchange for certain promises; (b) Adenauer invites the leaders of the SPD for a discussion of West German foreign policy; (c) Franz Josef Strauss tries to decree a compromise, a transitional Adenauer Cabinet, with the help of his CSU; (d) Representatives of West German business and industry appeal to Adenauer and put pressure on the FDP in order to prevent a "black-red" coalition. (e) Adenauer gains the support of his party (Sept. 27).
Sept. 28-Nov. 7:	(3) Actual Negotiations: (a) First phase of negotiations between a reluctant FDP and a self-confident Adenauer; (b) Second phase: Unsure of itself, the FDP Bundestag caucus calls on the FDP Main Committee to make the basic decision of accepting or rejecting Adenauer; (c) Third phase: Bitter wrangling over the coalition contract between the two parties; (d) Final phase: Pressed by Federal President Luebke's threat to take action, the CDU/CSU and FDP come to a compromise.

an occasion at which one can gauge the political future of a Minister by the seat which he occupies, Strauss no longer was in the front row as at previous inaugurations. Instead, his place was taken by a new pretender to the throne whom Adenauer favors as a counter-weight against both Erhard and Strauss: Heinrich Krone, the former caucus chairman of the Bundestag CDU/CSU who was given a cabinet post without portfolio in reward for his loyalty during the negotiations. To forestall Strauss's ambitions for the Foreign Office, moreover, Adenauer chose the old rival of the Minister of Defense, Schroeder, as the successor of von Brentano. Schroeder resembles Adenauer in his lack of commitment to any social or economic group of the CDU/CSU and in enjoying the firm support of the North Rhine Westphalian CDU. Strauss decided to give no more offense to his Chancellor. But twenty of his CSU deputies were said to have abstained from voting for Adenauer at the election of the Chancellor by the Bundestag.<sup>33</sup>

The third aspirant for the Chancellorship, Eugen Gerstenmaier, was considered very eligible not only in the eyes of his friends in the CDU/CSU, but also by the FDP, the SPD and by the Federal President, Heinrich Lübke (CDU). At the 1959 convention of the CDU at Kiel, he defended free enterprise against Katzer and the labor wing of the party and knew, therefore, that his chances of a quick ascent to power were no greater than those of Erhard. Hence he limited himself to encouraging Erhard and the fronde spokesman Bucerius who periodically and fruitlessly called for the resignation of Adenauer. When the Old Man was about to come to terms with the FDP on the basis of a coalition contract whose content was kept secret from the public and from the rank and file of the CDU/CSU, reprints of this document suddenly appeared in many German newspapers. First Strauss and then especially Gerstenmaier and his friends were accused of having leaked a copy of the contract to the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung in order to stir up the rank and file of the CDU/CSU against the coalition. The CDU/CSU deputies indeed appeared with newspaper copies of the contract at the final caucus meeting, and Katzer once more insisted that Adenauer abide by his pledge to the labor wing. But Adenauer seems to have convinced his party (1) that the passages most obnoxious to labor, e.g., the injunction against extending labor co-determination above the plant level, had already been removed from the contract; and (2) that the coalition contract had little significance, either because it could not be legally enforced or because it was unconstitutional in content. The purposive indiscretion at any rate helped the Gerstenmaier group very little as long as Adenauer could claim that the newspaper versions of the coalition contract deviated from the signed original. In the end both Erhard and Gerstenmaier could be seen leaving the caucus room before the final vote on the new coalition was taken.<sup>34</sup>

In this fashion, Adenauer outmaneuvered the most dangerous threat to his continued tenure. Once the balances of the equilibrial system of the CDU/CSU had begun to rock up and down, the question of continuing an eighty-five-year-old man in the Chancellor's office seemed quite insignificant to the CDU/CSU group leaders as compared to the overriding importance of the relative position of each group in the system.

III

Once the CDU/CSU was solidly behind Adenauer, he could return to his negotiations with the FDP. Before we can fully understand his final victory over this party, we have to draw into account the forces which have driven the multi-party system of Weimar Germany into a bipartite mold. There may be some doubt whether the long evident trend toward a two-party system in Western Germany was not reversed by the 1961 elections which cost the CDU/CSU its majority and brought a third party, the FDP, dramatic gains.<sup>35</sup> However, it appears that the FDP became a mere appendix of the CDU/CSU from the minute it pledged itself not to enter a coalition with the SPD after the elections, because thereby it allowed itself to become a mere instrument of CDU/CSU voters who desired to register their protest against Adenauer without voting for the SPD. This FDP pledge automatically made the SPD the only alternative to continued CDU/CSU rule and, by implication, made the FDP a splinter of the CDU/CSU which had split off from the mother party over some grievance and now wished to coerce it to mend its ways. If there had been any doubt about the dependence of the FDP on the CDU/CSU, it was quickly dispelled after the elections: for a while, there was still talk that the FDP would simply remain in the opposition, if it could not dislodge Adenauer from his post. Rumor had it that the <sup>35</sup> Some observers have called the West German party system a one or a one-and-a-half party system because of the seeming inability of the SPD to challenge the dominant position of the CDU/CSU. However, the West German situation appears to be more like the alternating periods of Republican and Democratic supremacy before and after 1932 in the United States than like comparable post-colonial examples. Cf. Heidenheimer, "Der starke Regierungschef . . .," p. 241 ff.

<sup>34</sup> Der Spiegel, Nov. 15, 1961, pp. 26-8.

<sup>33</sup> Hans Ulrich Kempfski, "Die Kanzlerdemokratie in der Sterbestunde," SZ, Sept. 23/24, 1961, p. 3; and Josef Riedmiller, "Franz Josef Strauss auf der Waage," SZ, Oct. 2, 1961, p. 3. Also Parlamentarisch-Politischer Pressedienst, November 8, 1961.

FDP might prefer to do so in order to avoid the blame for some of the unpopular concessions which Western Germany might have to make with regard to Berlin and reunification.<sup>36</sup> But it soon became evident that the FDP had no such choice, quite apart from the lure of cabinet posts and patronage. It was driven by the same force which has reduced the number of political parties represented in the Bundestag from election to election, until in 1961 there were only two left to contend, the CDU/CSU-FDP and the SPD.

At first glance, the difference between the party systems of the Bonn and Weimar Republics is indeed striking and not easy to explain: the Weimar Reichstag was composed at times of more than thirty and never of less than eight distinct groups, of which none was able to get more than a third of the vote—except in the final Nazi landslide. There were the Communists, the Social Democrats, at least two middle-class Liberal parties, the Catholic Center, the Bavarian People's Party, the German Nationalists, and the extreme right, not counting the wax and wane of smaller groups in between. The new party system of 1945, by comparison, started significantly with the reappearance of the SPD and the foundation of the CDU/CSU as a broad "political rally to the right of the SPD," to which old Weimar politicians flocked, ranging from former left-wing Liberals (DDP) to the German Nationalists (DNVP). In comparison to these two great forces, SPD and CDU/CSU, there was little else to report: even at the time of its origin, the FDP barely escaped the "rally to the right of the SPD."<sup>37</sup> The Communists did not for long outlast the Sovietization of East Germany. Neofascist parties died out or were outlawed almost as fast as they were founded. The refugees and other splinter groups of discontent failed to survive the economic boom. Regional parties like the Bavarian Party (BP) and the German Party (DP), once called Lower Saxonian Land Party (NLP), did not fare well in Bonn. With the benefit of hindsight, one may say today that the trend toward a two-party system in West Germany was evident from the start.

What could have transformed the complex

Weimar system into the far simpler system of the Federal Republic which in this way resembles the Anglo-American democracies? It was hardly the electoral system, a mixture of single-member district plurality with proportional representation, with the latter rather preponderant.<sup>38</sup> Nor can it be explained satisfactorily with the argument that the West Germans learned to shy away from political extremism, considering that most Weimar parties were not extremist in this sense. Even less plausible would be the statement that the German voters and politicians learned from the Weimar experience. The West German voters are not overwhelmingly in favor of a two-party system.<sup>39</sup> Nor would it be reasonable to expect such a self-conscious electoral conduct from any people, least of all the Germans whose interest in politics has been very low although their voting participation is high. Politicians also can hardly be expected to be motivated by such considerations: for years the FDP and other third parties have campaigned against the trend toward a two-party system and, at the Laender level, many CDU/CSU and SPD politicians favor their cause for practical reasons. The only frequently advanced argument which seems to have merit is that Adenauer's domineering role has tended to create two camps, one for and one against him. However, it should be noted that until 1961 the anti-Adenauer voters have always had other alternatives than to vote in increasing numbers for the SPD.

If these arguments fail to explain the change from the Weimar party system to the new bipolar trend, what others are available? A number. In particular, socio-economic and physical changes distinguish the Federal Republic from its predecessor. The Federal Republic is considerably smaller and economically more integrated than its predecessor. The loss of land and sectionalism, for example, removed

<sup>36</sup> Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (hereafter referred to as FAZ), Sept. 21, 1961.

<sup>37</sup> See especially Hans Georg Wieck, Die Entstehung der CDU und die Wiedergründung des Zentrums im Jahre 1945, and Christliche und Freie Demokraten in Hessen, Rheinland-Pfalz, Baden und Württemberg, 1945/46 (Duesseldorf: Droste, 1953 and 1959).

<sup>38</sup> For details, see James K. Pollock, "The West German Electoral Law of 1953," this REVIEW, Vol. 49 (March 1955), pp. 107-30. Also Gerhard Loewenberg, "Parliamentarism in Western Germany: The Functioning of the Bundestag," ibid., Vol. 55 (March 1961), pp. 87-102.

<sup>39</sup> When in February, 1956, the Institut fuer Demoskopie asked a national sample: "Would you welcome it if only the CDU/CSU and the SPD were left in Germany?" only 36% of the respondents answered yes. Forty per cent said no and 24% were undecided. Jahrbuch der Oeffentlichen Meinung, 1957 (Allensbach: Verlag fuer Demoskopie, 1957), p. 260.

the geographic basis of the bulk of German Nationalist support, and has softened the old states rights movements in various parts of the country. The dismemberment of Prussia and the new geopolitical situation at the fringe of the Iron Curtain, moreover, has further reduced the causes of faction which might arise from many alternatives of foreign policy. The class structure of Germany, finally, which was still basic to the Weimar social and party system, was subjected to a long series of shattering experiences—the economic crises under the Weimar Republic, totalitarian and post-totalitarian reshuffling of rank and status, the impoverishment resulting from war, air raids and mass expulsion and, most recently, the socio-economic changes of a rapid economic boom. A few years after the end of the last World War, most Germans were fairly equal in economic terms, namely at the bottom of the economic ladder. The accumulation of wealth since that time has created a new society of status, expressed in the ownership of automobiles, washing machines, refrigerators and television sets, but hardly a society of class distinctions.<sup>40</sup> With the class lines went another important division of the Weimar party system. With most of the old causes of faction removed, a new alignment could form.

One should also mention the organizational changes among parties and interest groups in the direction of greater simplicity and unity which have occurred between the time of the Weimar Republic and its current successor. In the political field, the CDU/CSU now unites Catholics and Protestants, Conservatives and Liberals, and the FDP consolidated the remainders of the several Liberal parties. The cohesion of Adenauer's coalitions and especially the formidable size of the CDU/CSU itself forced the organized interests to coordinate their efforts and align their organizations behind the majority party and its leader rather than trying to have a separate little political party for every little interest. There was also the consolidation of interest groups as a consequence of Nazi regimentation. Under the Weimar Republic, the major and minor interest groups from the trade unions to the farm, business and professional organizations of all kinds were divided along numerous lines according to class prejudices, ideological convictions, geographical considerations, economic interests and political preferences which added up to "an infinitely differentiated labyrinth"<sup>41</sup> and contributed considerably to the political chaos. This complex interest group system was rudely forced into a highly simplified and rigidly controlled "corporative mold" by the Nazis. After 1945, the reconstituted groups tried to undo some of the enforced group consolidations, but by and large retained much of the newly found unity. In most cases they no longer found the issues that once divided them very pressing and appreciated the political advantages of unity in a free society. The result was an interest group system so powerful and well organized that the German political scientist, Theodor Eschenburg, has called the Federal Republic "a federation of associated interest groups, churches, county and city republics,"<sup>42</sup> and interest groups are said to be closer to the voters than the political parties.

It is against this new background of simplified interest and party politics that the rise of Adenauer and his CDU/CSU has to be understood as a bundle of mutually reinforcing processes which have led to this concentration of political power and interests. Somewhat comparable perhaps to Franklin Delano Roosevelt and his New Deal Democrats of the 1930s, the rise of Adenauer and the CDU/CSU to their dominant position was less a success of personal mesmerism than a great alliance of important interests held together by the ingenious integrative system through which the CDU/CSU allows them to satisfy their demands. Where the party committees and the more informal devices for channeling demands were not considered sufficient "access" for the more "respectable" groups, in fact, Adenauer personally acted as the master integrator who would satisfy the group demands as he saw fit.<sup>43</sup> The dissatisfied groups and interests left out by this <sup>40</sup> About the socio-economic changes since the 1920's, see Thomas Wellmann, "Die soziologische Grundlage der Bundesrepublik," Deutsche Rundschau (June 1953), pp. 591-600. Regarding the "status symbols," about 30% of West German households in 1961 had television sets and washing machines, mostly of the wringer type. Forty-two per cent had refrigerators and there was one automobile for about every ten persons or three families.

<sup>41</sup> Gerhard Schulz, "Ueber Entstehung und Formen von Interessengruppen in Deutschland seit Beginn der Industrialisierung," Politische Vierteljahresschrift, Vol. 2 (July 1961), 126.

<sup>42</sup> Herrschaft der Verbaende (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlagsanstalt, 1955), p. 87.

<sup>43</sup> As Drs. Wolfgang Kralewski and Rupert Breitling of the Institut fuer Politische Wissenschaft of Heidelberg University told this writer, this aspect of Chancellor democracy has become more and more prominent during the last term of Adenauer. See also Altmann, op. cit., p. 47.

great rallying around Adenauer's pork barrel then tended to support the SPD as the only opposition party capable of doing something for them.

Many SPD voters, to be sure, are still motivated by traditional attachments. But we must guard against the fallacy of seeing in the new alignment a class alignment. Public opinion polls conducted in 1956 by the Institut fuer Demoskopie have shown that the magic word bourgeois, which once separated parties like the CDU/CSU and FDP from the SPD and revolutionary movements at both extremes, has a most hazy meaning for the man in the street.<sup>44</sup> During the last federal election campaign it seemed, in fact, as if the new alignment had something to do with the participation in the great economic boom of Western Germany: those who felt the "economic miracle" had passed them by or was unjustly distributed voted SPD. The SPD also enjoyed the support of local government interests, especially in the big cities, of other consumer interests whom the Adenauer government forgot, and of the giant German Trade Union Federation (DGB) with which it has shared many goals. The bipolar arrangement of interests is both partially caused by and behind the new West German trend towards a two-party system.

IV

To return to our original question, what does all this have to do with Adenauer's continuation in office? Apparently, this new alignment of interests leaves no secure place for the FDP or for other third parties to the right of the SPD. The FDP is even more dependent than the CDU/CSU on industrial, professional and Mittelstand groups—in other words, on the whole combine of interests behind the governing coalition. Their financial support is vital to the party, but the party's fate is not nearly as important to these groups as the fate of the CDU/CSU which is far too large to be ignored or circumvented in the striving for favorable government policies. A brief review of the history of the FDP in Bonn will show that this was not the first time that the ability of the FDP to maneuver freely between CDU/CSU and SPD was curtailed by the group sponsors and finance sources of the Free Democrats.

Most notably in the 1953 elections, but possibly as early as 1949, the campaign contributions of industry to the FDP were made dependent on a promise not to attack the CDU/CSU but only the SPD. During the second term of Adenauer, the FDP became restless as the partner of a coalition in which the CDU/CSU alone possessed a majority of the Bundestag votes and repeatedly outvoted the FDP on key issues. In 1955 another restless coalition partner, the Refugees (BHE), drew the consequences and went into the opposition, leaving behind their leaders who had been cabinet ministers and now joined the CDU/CSU. Early in 1956, chafing over issues of foreign policy and a CDU/CSU threat to introduce an electoral law injurious to the FDP, restlessness turned into open revolt. The "Young Turks of Duesseldorf" broke up their coalition with the CDU in the state government of North Rhine Westphalia and joined with the SPD in a new coalition in order to demonstrate their freedom of choice. Adenauer forced the issue also at the federal level and sent the FDP to the opposition benches, again alienating most of its leadership in ministerial positions. This Adenauer faction of the FDP, sixteen deputies in all, split off, formed the Free People's Party (FVP) and ended up joining the DP, Adenauer's last surviving coalition partner. Immediately after the Duesseldorf rebellion the Sponsor Societies (Foerderergesellschaften), through whom the contributions of industry and business flow into the party treasuries of the government coalition, cut off all financial support from the FDP.<sup>45</sup> For the next three years, the FDP maintained a precarious freedom from such entanglement, though not from want. In the election campaign of 1957, the party hammered home the point that it could enter a coalition with the SPD just as well as with the CDU/CSU. The result was an alarmingly low vote (7.7 per cent) barely above the 5 per cent minimum required by law for representation in the Bundestag, while Adenauer won his biggest majority ever, 50.2 per cent of the popular vote. Under its new chairman, Erich Mende, a sobered FDP made its peace with the Sponsor Societies in 1959. Once more the vital funds <sup>44</sup> To the question "Do you feel that the SPD is a bourgeois party?", 36% of the respondents said yes and 35% no. Among workers the percentages were 40% yes and 30% no, among SPD adherents 48% yes and 34% no, and among adherents of the CDU/CSU 34% yes and 39% no. The question is ambiguous, to be sure, but the percentages of positive responses are far too large to have come from the extreme left wing with the exception of a small fringe. Jahrbuch der Oeffentlichen Meinung 1957, p. 266.

<sup>45</sup> See also Dieter Schroeder, "Mende's Ziel: Eine liberale Volkspartei," SZ, Sept. 23/24, 1961, p. 4. For more details about the Sponsor Societies, see the forthcoming publication of Rupert Breitling on this subject.

began to flow, and advocates of FDP freedom, such as Thomas Dehler or Wolfgang Doering, were relegated more to the background. In the 1961 campaign, the FDP faithfully promised the voters not to enter a coalition with the SPD under any circumstances and thereby bought a short new lease on life. How long this lease will last, however, and whether it will stave off the merciless alternative between financial starvation and the deadly embrace of the CDU/CSU and the interests sustaining it remains to be seen.<sup>46</sup> The right-wing elements that switched their votes from Adenauer to the FDP in 1961 appear to be numerically too weak and politically too unreliable to assure the survival of the FDP between the two blocs. If they have voted CDU/CSU in the past they may do so again.

In 1960, the DP, which had lasted longest as Adenauer's coalition partner, met the same fate at his hands as the BHE and FDP before it. Deprived of some of its leaders, it was forced to go into opposition and finally concluded a disastrous electoral alliance with the remainders of the BHE in order to overcome the 5 per cent hurdle in the 1961 elections. The alliance failed in this attempt, and the last sequel of the DP story occurred like a bad omen for the FDP one week before the reelection of Adenauer as the Chancellor of the new CDU-/CSU-FDP coalition: the long-time chairman, founder and leading spirit of the DP, Heinrich Hellwege, ex-Minister President of Lower Saxony and Federal Minister, became a member of the CDU, taking with him a number of other prominent DP members.

These precedents explain a good part of the fear with which the FDP views Adenauer, its anxiety to replace him with Erhard and its distrust of the CDU/CSU in general. The course of the negotiations over the new coalition between the CDU/CSU and the FDP likewise bears out the thesis that the FDP has very little choice: the real situation of the FDP revealed itself within a week after the elections encouraged Mende to his proud words "Never again Adenauer" and Strauss to his abortive attempt to force the Old Man into a compromise with the FDP. Let us review the slow but certain retreat of the FDP from position to position, its high-handed treatment by Adenauer, and the tension which the painful process of retreat provoked within the FDP.

The erosion of the FDP position during the negotiations involved several distinct aspects. First of all, there was the question of the continuation of Adenauer as Chancellor. Then there were issues of coalition policy and of the FDP share of the personnel of the new cabinet. Finally, there was the controversial coalition contract between the two parties.

On the question of Adenauer's tenure of office, the retreat of the FDP began on the day when Adenauer won the unanimous endorsement of the new CDU/CSU caucus. Before that day, the kindest word about the Old Man had been a suggestion by the FDP Pressedienst to create an advisory position for ex-Chancellors in the cabinet. But now the Freie Demokratische Korrespondenz began to speak of "new aspects" which had arisen, namely the eagerness of the SPD for a "black-red" coalition and the withdrawal of Erhard as a candidate. At a rally for the by-elections at Cochem, moreover, Mende owned that, "Perhaps the FDP will have to examine whether it cannot give Federal Chancellor Adenauer its confidence for a transitional period."<sup>47</sup> In their despair, the Free Democrats tried to stall for time in the hope that Adenauer would not allow his international prestige to suffer from long delays during a state of crisis. As Mende put it, "Neither typhus, cholera, hunger or danger of war will break out if the new government is not formed right away."<sup>48</sup>

But it was not until a full month after the elections that Adenauer condescended to a declaration that he did not intend to serve another four years but would retire early so as to give his successor time to take charge of the office and to prepare for the elections of 1965. He would announce this intention in a letter to the caucus chairmen of the coalition, but would not name a specific date of retirement. Erhard undertook to defend this stand most eloquently before the CDU/CSU Bundestag caucus which endorsed it with warm applause. Unsure of itself, the FDP now responded by demanding a limitation of eighteen months and by turning the decision over to the Federal Main Committee of its extra-parliamentary party. It was a heart-wrenching decision for the FDP, but the Main Committee and even the former party chairmen Theodor Heuss and Reinhold Maier advocated entering a coalition with Adenauer. Mende still tried to allay the fears of the anti-Adenauer wing of his party with the argument that the FDP could topple the Old Man after two years, if necessary, by leaving the government or refusing to pass the budget.<sup>49</sup> And thus it came to pass that the FDP contented itself with the vague promise embodied in the coalition contract:

<sup>46</sup> One of the most popular election posters of the FDP in the 1961 campaign read "People who think ahead vote FDP." Toward the end of the coalition negotiations, a new version of this slogan made the rounds: "People who think ahead might as well vote CDU to begin with."

<sup>47</sup> SZ, Sept. 29, 1961; and Guenter Claus, "Die FDP und ihr Wankelmotor," ibid., Oct. 6, 1961, p. 3.

<sup>48</sup> Der Spiegel, Oct. 11, 1961, pp. 25-6.

The coalition partners take as their point of departure that the CDU chairman Dr. Konrad Adenauer will not occupy the office of the Chancellor for the entire legislative period.<sup>50</sup>

On the closely interrelated issues of personnel and policy, the FDP was not much more successful than on the question of ending Adenauer's tenure. At first glance, the biggest obstacle to agreement seemed to be the position of the FDP on foreign and defense policy. In 1956 the FDP had left the government, because, according to Thomas Dehler,

... we recognized the political sterility behind the swashbuckling policy of strength, saw the goal of German reunification recede into the distance and watched the tensions in Central Europe rise instead of fall.<sup>51</sup>

At its Frankfurt Convention in March 1961, the FDP suggested a policy of disengagement, greater flexibility in negotiating for reunification, and, in a pointed rebuff for Strauss, stated that military policy was not a purpose in itself but only an instrument of foreign policy. Germany should support NATO only until its future political and military status after reunification could be secured by a European system of mutual guarantees.<sup>51a</sup> Adenauer and the CDU/CSU, on the other hand, insisted on the continuation of their old foreign policy as their minimal demand for the coalition. If this had really been so important to the CDU/CSU it should have entered a coalition with the SPD rather than the FDP. But this goes to show that the domestic reasons attracting CDU/CSU and FDP to each other, the same reasons which produced the trend towards a two-party system, were much stronger than the adamant insistence of Adenauer on his policy of strength or the "new foreign policy" by which the FDP had distinguished itself both in 1956 and in the 1961 elections.

<sup>49</sup> SZ, Oct. 23, 1961.

<sup>50</sup> FAZ, Nov. 7, 1961.

<sup>51</sup> SZ, Oct. 2, 1961.

<sup>51a</sup> XII. Ordentlicher Bundesparteitag der FDP 23. bis 25. März 1961 in Frankfurt/Main (Bundesparteileitung der FDP, Bonn, no date), pp. 20-3, 81-4, 126.

Then the negotiations turned to matters of economic and social policy where the preferences of the FDP were known to clash with the promises which the CDU/CSU labor wing had extracted from Adenauer as well as with some details of social policy which the Bundestag had already enacted into law. Here too, the FDP dropped its demand for a revision of existing legislation, whereupon agreement followed all too quickly. In a short meeting of two hours at which no representative of the CDU/CSU labor wing was present, Adenauer convinced the FDP that there was enough common ground in economic and social policy between their two parties to skip specifics. Since there were rumors about a sell-out of the labor wing goals in the coalition contract, Hans Katzer wrote later in Soziale Ordnung, one of the publications of the Social Policy Committees, that the contract contained no provisions that stood in the way of an extension of labor co-determination above the plant level or of the introduction of a compulsory levy for the trade unions.<sup>52</sup>

The discussion of ministerial posts for the FDP began in the midst of the negotiations over questions of policy. The CDU had indicated that it would agree to a ratio of five FDP, four CSU and nine CDU ministers, not counting the Chancellor. But by the time Adenauer had slipped in his new protégé, Krone, and yielded to the pressure of CDU/CSU women for a female minister, the CDU share had increased from nine to eleven without any adjustment for the FDP. A brief look at the ministries the FDP received shows how small its share in the making of government policy was to be. Its biggest catch, the Finance Ministry, is no longer the position of strength it once was under Fritz Schaeffer (CSU).<sup>53</sup> Three further FDP ministries, Justice, Refugees and Federal Property, are not positions of great leverage. The fifth ministry, European Coordination, was painfully carved out of the functions of Erhard's Ministry of Economics. The CSU, by comparison, received two important ministries, Defense and Interior. Furthermore the FDP was granted five state secretaries in ministries it did not receive.<sup>54</sup>

The spirit of distrust which lay over the unequal alliance of FDP and CDU/CSU prompted the FDP to search for further guarantees for a true partnership. A coalition contract is not new in German political practice: previous coalition governments at the federal and Laender levels, both under Weimar and until 1957 also in Bonn, had committed their policy agreements to paper. The campaign proclamation of the FDP for the 1961 elections had ended with a statement of readiness to join a coalition "in the spirit of partnership," provided that "(1) the political and material aims of the government coalition are committed to writing; (2) all important political questions are discussed and decided by a common coalition commission."<sup>55</sup> As it was laid down in the coalition contract, this commission is to review in weekly meetings all bills and policies emerging from within the cabinet or coalition parties in the Bundestag before their submission to cabinet or Bundestag. It is composed of the chairmen, vice-chairmen and executive managers of both Bundestag parties and occasionally also of experts from the two parties. This formula carefully excluded the party chairman and Federal Chancellor Adenauer.<sup>56</sup>

<sup>52</sup> Soziale Ordnung, November, 1961.

<sup>53</sup> Der Spiegel, Nov. 22, 1961, pp. 25-6.

<sup>54</sup> For a list of the new ministers, see FAZ, Nov. 15, 1961.

As already pointed out, this coalition contract embodies in some detail the principles of the foreign, defense, constitutional, economic and social policies agreed upon between the two parties. To be quite safe, the FDP also inserted into the contract the following clause:

The chairmen of the coalition parties and caucuses are obliged to see to it that the coalition parties in the Bundestag will not vote in changing majorities; in particular, that individual groups of the coalition parties in the Bundestag do not form majorities in some cases with the opposition.<sup>57</sup>

This injunction against a possible combination of the CDU/CSU labor wing with the SPD in voting for projects of social policy and perhaps also other details of the coalition contract provoked a major crisis in the negotiations over the coalition. After fruitless efforts by the CDU/CSU to revise "the FDP paper," as Adenauer called it, Strauss devised the following preamble for it:

<sup>55</sup> Aufruf der Freien Demokratischen Partei, zur Bundestagswahl 1961.

<sup>56</sup> Erich Mende, "Regierungspartnerschaft und Koalitionsausschuss," SZ, Nov. 25/26, 1961, p. 4; and Thomas Dehler, "Die Stimme der FDP," Abendzeitung (Munich), Nov. 9, 1961.

<sup>57</sup> A perhaps less obvious but quite real purpose of this clause might also have been the prevention of cooperation between the CDU/CSU and SPD in matters of foreign policy and European integration, two other fields in which the SPD position is much closer to Adenauer's policies than that of the FDP.

The contents of coalition policy are the notes edited by representatives of both parties on October 20. This document together with the other papers submitted during the coalition negotiations represents basis and goal of our common task.<sup>58</sup>

This passage (italics supplied) meant nothing less than that all kinds of memoranda and notes handed to the FDP leaders during the meetings would have just as much force as the coalition contract itself. The FDP caucus rejected this preamble by a vote of 50 to 10. The German press had already blossomed forth with headlines about the "final agreement," when it turned out that the coalition negotiations had once more reached an impasse. It took considerable efforts on the part of Adenauer to overcome the new distrust aroused by this last maneuver. Finally the FDP had the signatures of both parties on its contract, with which it hoped to make up for what it lacked in power and stamina for this societas leonina, the coalition between the lion and the mouse.

The efficacy of such a contract under these circumstances is doubtful. First of all there is the question of good faith on the part of the CDU/CSU: the SPD Pressedienst claimed that at the signing of the contract by the CDU/CSU, Adenauer told his party that he considered the contract worthless and therefore its questionable constitutionality<sup>59</sup> a moot issue. Then there is its dubious tactical value. To be sure, the FDP has a very real power to walk out on Adenauer if he should violate their agreements. But how can the FDP coerce groups of the CDU/CSU not to break the contract by voting with the SPD? By leaving the government coalition and forming a new one with the SPD or encouraging the CDU/CSU to do so?

We can also gather the limitations upon the FDP's freedom of choice from the treatment which the party had to endure at the hands of Adenauer and the CDU/CSU as well as from the tensions arising within the party. There was no lack of public statements by CDU/CSU leaders accusing the FDP of being "unrealistic," "disloyal" and an object of understandable distrust. Very revealing, too, was the dispute between SPD and CDU/CSU over whether the Bundestag President should have two or four Vice Presidents. The CDU/CSU preferred the latter, which would enable it to give one Vice Presidency to the CSU. The FDP at first inclined to the SPD solution, yet was soon persuaded to vote along with its coalition partner. But even its initial thought of independent action was far more than the CDU/CSU intended to tolerate from the FDP.<sup>60</sup>

<sup>58</sup> Dieter Schroeder, "Der grosse Zank um das Koalitionspapier," SZ, Nov. 4/5, 1961, p. 3; also the Neue Zuercher Zeitung, Nov. 4, 1961.

<sup>59</sup> The coalition contract violates arts. 38 and 65 of the Basic Law. Art. 38 declares that Bundestag deputies are not bound by instructions such as the injunction against voting with the SPD but only by their consciences—which apparently have never been an obstacle to strict party discipline. Art. 65 designates the Federal Chancellor and not a coalition commission as the agency which determines the principles of government policy. See Guenter Gaus, "Ein Koalitionsabkommen ist nicht bindend," SZ, Nov. 11/12, 1961, p. 4.

The tensions within the FDP provoked by the new coalition with Adenauer also bore witness to the violence done to the party by the circumstances. The initial rejection of Adenauer had behind it a determined minority composed of FDP politicians who remembered his past treatment of the party all too well, others who toyed with the thought of playing the "national opposition" during the international trials and tribulations that lay ahead for Western Germany, Hamburg deputies who feared the wrath of the voters in the imminent state elections, and the Young Democrats who impatiently awaited the end of the Adenauer era. Accepting Adenauer after rejecting him so emphatically was extremely embarrassing and apt to make the FDP the laughing-stock of Western Germany. Under the pressure of events, the internal fronts pro and contra Adenauer soon crystallized. Some state parties, e.g., Baden-Wuerttemberg and North Rhine Westphalia, were for a coalition with the CDU/CSU because they feared that continued resistance to Adenauer would diminish their chances of participating with the CDU in their state governments. In other states, such as Hamburg, Hesse and the Saar, on the other hand, the opposition to Adenauer was so bitter that the state party chairmen of the latter two eventually resigned their positions when the last doubt about his survival vanished.

Three or four weeks after the elections, the FDP leaders in the Bundestag were so unsure of themselves that they proposed to call a party convention or at least the Federal Main Committee of their party in order to share the responsibility with the whole party and to avoid offense to the anti-Adenauer minority. After some discussion they called the Main Committee, a body composed of sixty advisory members—mostly Bundestag deputies—and 96 voting members of whom 31 were members of the Party Executive Board and 65 were state party delegates. Adenauer made it difficult for the Main Committee to decide in his favor by insisting a few days before its meeting that he would tolerate no limitation of his tenure, no change in the Foreign Office, and no revision of past legislation on social policy.<sup>61</sup> Still the Main Committee endorsed a coalition with Adenauer and the record of the coalition negotiations to this date, provided that Adenauer's term was somehow limited and that the personnel of the Foreign Office was to the party's satisfaction.<sup>62</sup> But in the end, there was a feeling both among FDP and CDU/CSU deputies that the birth of the new coalition called for a personal sacrifice. Since they had not been able to topple the Old Man, another whipping boy had to be found to save the face of Adenauer's would-be assassins. The Deutsche Zeitung published a cartoon showing in the background a guillotine operated by the leaders of the FDP. In the foreground, Mende is imploring Adenauer for "a head, a little head, a very tiny head." Next to Adenauer stands the victim, Foreign Minister von Brentano.<sup>63</sup>

V

While the political rigidities of the West German system and in particular the persistence of the coalition of interests have prolonged Adenauer's life as Chancellor, they have not been able to remove the causes of his growing weakness: his reelection by the Bundestag revealed the waning of his political power. With the prolonged coalition crisis, his popularity reached an all-time low. During and after his visit to Washington, his system of foreign policy showed signs of coming apart at the seams. Least reparable of all, his aged physique responded to the strain of it all with illness. The days of the Adenauer era are numbered.

On November 7, 1961, six and one-half weeks after the elections to the Bundestag, Konrad Adenauer for the fourth time was elected Federal Chancellor. Of the 490 deputies present, not counting those from Berlin, he received 258 votes, a slim margin of eight more than he needed. There were 206 votes cast against him and 26 deputies abstained. Forty-nine deputies of his coalition parties either abstained or voted against him. The composition of this internal opposition in the new

<sup>61</sup> Der Spiegel, Oct. 25, 1961, p. 28.

<sup>62</sup> SZ, Oct. 23, 1961.

<sup>63</sup> Dieter Schroeder, "Bonner Planspiele um Ministersessel," SZ, Oct. 14/15, 1961, p. 3. For the cartoon, see the reprint in Der Spiegel, Nov. 1, 1961, p. 21.

<sup>60</sup> FAZ, Oct. 18, 1961.

TABLE II. CHANCELLOR ELECTIONS BY THE
Bundestag, 1949, 1953, 1957, 1961

Year	Legal Number of Deputies	Votes Neces- sary for Election	Deputies Present	Deputies voting
				Yes	Abstaining	No
1949	402	202	389	202	44	142
1953	487	244	467	305	14	148
1957	497	249	476	274	9	193
1961	499	250	490	258	26	206

coalition government can only be guessed. About 15 FDP deputies may have voted no. Twenty abstentions were said to have come from the CSU. This leaves about eight no votes and six abstentions for the frondeurs and friends of the offended Erhard in the CDU. The size of this negative vote surprised many observers, although the press had often estimated Adenauer's secret enemies in the CDU/CSU to number between forty and fifty. If we compare this Chancellor election with the previous elections of Adenauer, it becomes quite clear that his margin of safety has not been so small nor his opposition so large since 1949 (Table II). We can also attempt similar comparisons of the size of his internal opposition in these election years, although we cannot say with certainty when deputies in the opposition parties crossed party lines to support him and thereby made up a deficit in his own coalition parties (Table III). But even a very rough estimate shows clearly that the opposition to Adenauer within the parties of the government coalition has never been as great as at this time.

The decline of Adenauer's popularity is accelerated by the public sentiment that his whole political system is in need of drastic adjustment and that he is not the man to bring it about. Since the conservative Basic Law deliberately frustrates such sudden popular passions as the desire to remove a party leader from among the eligible men for the office of Chancellor, West Germans experienced the coalition crisis as a crisis of democracy. As CDU Vice President von Hassel wrote in the Politisch-Soziale Korrespondenz, the critical attitude of the public toward the parties, democracy and the state in reaction to the elections and coalition negotiations has assumed forms reminiscent of the last phase of the Weimar Republic. Other observers call for the democratization of the Basic Law and express their fear that once more, as in 1848, 1908 and 1928, constitutional reform will be delayed in Germany until it is too late.

Already the state elections of Hamburg have shown a significant drop in electoral participation as compared to the last state elections and the federal elections of 1961. But the need for responsibility in foreign policy is no less than in domestic policies, and the real dilemma appears to lie in the accumulation of unsolved problems rather than in the difficulties of any single question. We can conclude, with an editorial writer of the Sueddeutsche Zeitung, that ... the case has now arisen that thoughtful opponents of Adenauer's policies wish he would continue to stay in office, the longer the better, so that one would not have to deal at once with everything that has been left unfinished during the last twelve years. But even if we gain a breathing spell in this manner, the day is near when the politics of the Federal Republic is no longer made by one man.<sup>64</sup>

<sup>64</sup> Guenter Gaus, "Adenauer," SZ, Nov. 4/5, 1961.

TABLE III. INTERNAL OPPOSITION AT CHANCELLOR ELECTIONS, 1949 TO 1961

Year	Coalition Parties	Total Coalition	Voting Yes	Internal Opposition	Total Noes and Abstentions	SPD Deputies
1949	CDU/CSU-FDP-DP 139 52 17	208	202	None (?)	186	131
1953	CDU/CSU-FDP-DP-BHE 244 48 15 27	334	305	About 15	162	151
1957	CDU/CSU-DP 270 17	287	274	About 2	202	169
1961	CDU/CSU-FDP 242 67	309	258	49	232	190

HAGGLING FOR THE EQUILIBRIUM: THE RENEGOTIATION OF THE AUSTRIAN COALITION, 1959*

FREDERICK C. ENGELMANN

University of Alberta, Calgary

On May 10, 1959, Austrian voters, in giving overwhelming support to the coalition that has been governing them since 1945, split their ballots about as evenly as possible between the two competing coalition partners. The Socialist Party (SPOe) obtained 50.3 per cent of the vote cast for the coalition parties; but the People's Party (OeVP), despite a rigorous system of proportional representation,<sup>1</sup> moved into the new Parliament with 79 seats, a plurality of one over the SPOe. The election of 1953 had shown strikingly similar results. Then, the Socialists had not been able to translate the electoral tie into a complete governmental equilibrium.<sup>2</sup> This time, stung by losses sustained in the government negotiations after the OeVP's victory in the 1956 parliamentary election, and encouraged by its own victory in the 1957 presidential election,<sup>3</sup> the Socialists demanded the formation of a government based on perfect equality of the two partners. They had waged the campaign with a plea to the voters to place the ship of state in equilibrium,<sup>4</sup> and the voters had responded. For eleven weeks following the balloting, OeVP and SPOe engaged in coalition renegotiations which are recounted and analyzed in this study because of the light they throw on the nature of the rigid coalition that has become postwar Austria's contribution to the taxonomy of political institutions.

I

The rigid coalition between OeVP and SPOe has been introduced—though scantily—to the American reading public. While critics and objective observers agree with Austria's leading politicians in the assessment that the coalition was a response to the civil-war tension of the First Republic,<sup>5</sup> outside observers have generally been satisfied to present the coalition system primarily as a double-veto, double-patronage arrangement of two political organizations.<sup>6</sup> Such a characterization, though * Research for this article was made possible by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, supplemented by a grant from the Alfred University Research Foundation, Alfred, N. Y. The writer wishes to express his gratitude to both foundations.

<sup>1</sup> The system, using the Hagenbach-Bischoff method within the basic districts (25), and the d'Hondt method for the figuring of remainders in the superior districts (4), is described in U. W. Kitzinger, "The Austrian Electoral System," Parliamentary Affairs, Vol. 12 (1959), pp. 392-404. Representation is based on population. Since the birth rate is higher in predominantly OeVP areas, seats come slightly more cheaply to that party; hence the discrepancy between the pluralities of votes and seats in a close election.

<sup>2</sup> In 1953 the Socialists, with 50.5% of the major-party vote, obtained 73 seats, and the OeVP 74. Though the OeVP had declined to this position from a 10-seat advantage in 1949, it was able to maintain its 6:5 preponderance in ministries, though it had to make concessions in policy matters. A revision of the ministerial balance was averted by the OeVP in view of the fact that the SPOe had been, if anything, unduly successful in 1949. In that year, the party, though not victorious, had seized control of the nationalized industries from the coalition partner.

<sup>3</sup> In 1956, the OeVP obtained 45.96%, the national-liberal opposition (FPOe) 6.52% (a total of 52.48%), against 43.04% for the SPOe.

In 1957, Wolfgang Denk, the OeVP-FPOe candidate, received 48.88%, while Adolf Schaerf, the Socialist candidate, was elected with 51.12% of the vote.

<sup>4</sup> The equilibrium theme, which will be discussed throughout this paper, was emphasized, with apparent success, in a widely displayed Socialist election poster which showed the ship of state listing dangerously toward the side of the People's Party. For a presentation of the poster and a discussion of its impact on the campaign, see Forum (Vienna), Vol. 6 (1959), pp. 167-169; see also Matthias Glatzl, "Die Zahlen der Wahlen," Oesterreichische Monatshefte, May 1959, pp. 2-4, and Kitzinger, "The Austrian Election of 1959," Political Studies, Vol. 9 (1961), pp. 119-140, at p. 125.

<sup>5</sup> For accounts of these tensions, see Adam Wandruszka, "Oesterreichs politische Struktur," in Heinrich Benedikt (ed.), Geschichte der Republik Oesterreich (Vienna, 1954), pp. 289-485; and Charles A. Gulick's monumental and detailed, but strongly biased, Austria from Habsburg to Hitler (Berkeley, 1948).

<sup>6</sup> The only American scholarly writing dealing entirely with the Austrian coalition is Herbert P. Secher, "Coalition Government: The Case of the

justified by the practices of the coalition, fails to do justice to the true nature of Austria's governing alliance. A description of this alliance and of any institution and process through which it operates must come to grips with the central socio-political fact in the life of post-1918 Austria: the Republic had developed under conditions of cleavage so deep as to leave it with a high potential for—and a sporadic actuality of—civil war. The coalition must be viewed as an effort to establish minimum consensus in the face of this cleavage.<sup>7</sup>

Once the Treaty of St. Germain forbade the Anschluss of German Austria to Germany, each of the three powerful party-interest-ideology combines—aptly called Lager<sup>8</sup>—within the young republic attempted to impose its image on the state. These Lager were the Catholic clerical, the Marxist socialist, and the German national; the first two each claimed the steady allegiance of about two-fifths of Austria's Second Austrian Republic," this REVIEW, Vol. 52 (1958), pp. 791–808. The coalition is discussed in Richard Hiscocks, The Rebirth of Austria (New York, 1953), pp. 46–52, and in Gordon Shepherd, The Austrian Odyssey (New York, 1957), pp. 183–188; it is also partially the topic of Otto Kirchheimer, "The Waning of Opposition in Parliamentary Regimes," Social Research, Vol. 24 (1957), pp. 127–156, especially pp. 136–152, and of Gulick, "Austria's Socialists in the Trend Toward a Two-Party System," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 11 (1958), pp. 539–562. For a trenchant but only partially valid account of the coalition, with undue emphasis on its personnel practices, see John MacCormac, "The Improbable Coalition that Governs Austria," Reporter, January 23, 1958, pp. 33–37. Hiscocks and Gulick (for all his Socialist bias) deal seriously with the basic aspects of the coalition, especially the socio-political and psychological ones, while Shepherd and Secher are concerned more with a critique of its policy-making and personnel practices. Particularly incisive and, at the same time, sympathetic observations on the coalition are contained in Gustav E. Kafka, "Die verfassungsrechtliche Stellung der politischen Parteien im modernen Staat," Veröffentlichungen der Vereinigung der deutschen Staatsrechtslehrer, Vol. 17 (1959), pp. 53–102.

<sup>7</sup> The juxtaposition of these terms stems from S. M. Lipset, Political Man (Garden City, N.Y., 1960), pp. 21–22.

<sup>8</sup> Lager means camp, or armed camp. The term stems from Wandruszka, loc. cit. See also Alfred Diamant, "The Group Basis of Austrian Politics," Journal of Central European Affairs, Vol. 18 (1958), pp. 134–155.

voters, while the national camp was the weakest until strengthened by Hitler's rise to power in Germany. The Buergerblock<sup>9</sup>—an anti-socialist coalition, mostly under clerical domination—governed Austria from 1920 on, with the Social Democrats in total and generally nonconstructive opposition. Some of the political warfare among the three Lager was carried on in the streets by para-military organizations. But, despite eighteen years of Christian Social rule, no Lager had any lasting success in making itself the state. The Social Democrats were smashed in the frantic attempt of the Mussolini-backed Christian Social dictatorship to establish a united front against Hitler; the Christian Socials and their sterile Patriotic Front were in turn smashed by the Nazis; and the Nazis themselves went under with the ruins of the Austrian section of the Thousand-year Reich. But the seven years of Austria's obliteration by Germany had given some of the leaders of the Social Democrats and the Christian Socials the opportunity to reflect on the tragedy of the First Republic's socio-political tension, often during common imprisonment in Nazi jails and concentration camps. Then, at least a few individuals developed the notion that the two non-national Lager would have to collaborate in resurrecting a liberated Austria.<sup>10</sup> The presence of the Red Army in Vienna and Eastern Austria in April, 1945 shaped these notions of collaboration not into a two-party coalition, but rather into an anti-Fascist concentration of Communists, Socialists, and People's Party.<sup>11</sup> Only the sheerest luck, and grave miscalculations of Austrian Communists, led to inter-Allied agreement on free elections to be held in all of Austria in

<sup>9</sup> Buergerblock (bourgeois bloc) coalitions consisted invariably of the Christian Social (Catholic clerical) Party, and, simultaneously or alternately, of the Pan-German Party and the Agrarian League, both nationalist groups.

<sup>10</sup> Varying accounts of Socialist-Catholic contacts during the Nazi occupation can be found in Alfred Kasamas, Programm Oesterreich (Vienna 1949), pp. 12–13, and Adolf Schaerf, Oesterreichs Erneuerung 1945–1955 (Vienna, 1955), pp. 21–22.

<sup>11</sup> The most detailed account of the formation of the concentration government is found in Schaerf, Oesterreichs Wiederaufrichtung in 1945 (Vienna, 1960), pp. 69–86. The formation of the Austrian People's Party—in most respects the successor of the Christian Social Party—in 1945 is reported most reliably in Lois Weinberger, Tatsachen, Begegnungen und Gespraechе (Vienna, 1948), pp. 243–248. For the original basis of party collaboration see Kafka, loc. cit., p. 86n.

November, 1945. These elections, in which only the three concentration parties were allowed to compete, gave one half of the vote to the OeVP, and only 5.4 per cent to the Communists.<sup>12</sup> Prior agreement to divide major offices and portfolios according to the proportion of parliamentary seats obtained made the hitherto equally represented Communists a junior partner in the concentration. In a wage-price crisis in 1947, the sole Communist minister resigned from the government, and an OeVP-SPOe coalition, the vision of some of the common sufferers of Nazism, remained.

During the years leading up to 1955, when the Austrian State Treaty ended the occupation on the part of the U. S., Britain, France, and the U.S.S.R., the coalition regime and its stability gave Austria maximal unity vis-à-vis the occupying powers. The coalition made it impossible for any of these powers to take advantage of Austrian internal politics, it enabled the impoverished country to profit fully from Marshall Plan aid, and it gave Austria the necessary strength to deal with Russian chicaneries. Through the occupation period, then, the coalition was a virtual necessity for Austria, and its strong support by the electorate in 1949 and 1953 was to be expected. By 1955, the coalition had become so much part of the post-war political scene that it was able to attain massive electoral victories in 1956 and 1959.<sup>13</sup>

The continuation of the coalition beyond 1955 shows that it is more than a marriage of convenience. The fact that it binds the chief political exponents of the two major Lager<sup>14</sup>

<sup>12</sup> The OeVP gained 49.9% of the vote, the SPOe 44.7%. The OeVP obtained 85 seats, an absolute majority; the SPOe, 76 seats; the Communists, 4 seats.

<sup>13</sup> This statement remains valid even when it is conceded that the vast majority of Austrian voters vote primarily for one of the coalition parties, and only secondarily for the coalition itself. The voters are of course acquainted with the coalition partners' pre-election resolve to continue the coalition; also, a private public-opinion poll, taken in 1958, showed 90% of those asked as favoring the continuation of the coalition. This poll was commissioned by anti-coalition elements; most friendly to the coalition were housewives, with 94% affirmative replies, and least friendly upper- and middle-income groups, with 86% affirmative replies.

<sup>14</sup> The third Lager, the nationalist, does not participate for the very reason that the coalition began as a union of non-Nazi Austrians. The formally organized national-liberal party (League gives it a second, socio-economic, dimension, especially since the rigid Lager-interest tie-up of the First Republic—excellently demonstrated by Alfred Diamant<sup>15</sup>—continues in the Second Republic. Austria has today, to be sure, a supra-partisan Trade Union Federation (OeGB), but all of the workers' unions are led by Socialists and the OeGB is therefore led by its Socialist fraction. Elections to the Chamber of Labor, moreover, show heavy Socialist majorities. Peasants, on the other hand, are heavily in the camp of the OeVP, both organizationally and electorally. The same can be said of the business community, and of many of its white-collar employees.<sup>16</sup> The coalition is thus more than a political coalition of the two major political parties with an extremely stable vote and a history of tense relations; it is also a social coalition between the leaders, organizations, and the bulk of the members of Austrian business and agriculture on the one side, and the leaders, organizations, and the bulk of the members of Austrian labor on the other. The congruence between these social and political line-ups remains despite recent signs of some social mobility, and despite the loosening of the ideological fronts on both sides, of which the principal tokens are the withdrawal of the Catholic church from partisan politics,<sup>17</sup> and the adoption of the new Socialist Party program of 1958.<sup>18</sup> The interests them-of Independents, VdU; since 1955 Liberal Party, FPÖe) does not contain all of Austria's former active Nazis, nor are all of its adherents former active Nazis. The party was licensed in 1949 after a Socialist drive to bring about the launching of a second non-Socialist group, which would end the parliamentary majority of the OeVP; see Schaerf, Oesterreichs Erneuerung, pp. 238-247; Oskar Helmer, 50 Jahre erlebte Geschichte (Vienna, 1957), pp. 247-248.

<sup>15</sup> Loc. cit., pp. 136-141.

<sup>16</sup> For Austria's chamber and interest structure, see Secher, "Representative Democracy or 'Chamber State': The Ambiguous Role of Interest Groups in Austrian Politics," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 13 (1960), pp. 890-909. Elections held since those reported by Secher have shown similar results.

<sup>17</sup> In 1945 Cardinal Innitzer prohibited political activity and office-holding on the part of the Catholic clergy; Schaerf, op. cit., p. 189. This prohibition was in sharp contrast to the practice of the First Republic. Then, Ignaz Seipel, a cleric, was the principal leader of the Christian Social Party, and twice Federal Chancellor.

<sup>18</sup> The program, drawn up by a committee headed by Benedikt Kautsky—the son of Karl selves have come to understand one another better through their coalition dealings;<sup>19</sup> but the parties—in a special position in the Second Republic because they were the agencies that took the legitimate steps of reestablishing the Austrian Republic in 1945<sup>20</sup>—maintain their primacy in political life. Thus, at this time when Lager mentality tends to decline, the organizational rigidity of the Lager, and therefore their political relevance, remain as strong as ever.

In addition to the political and social aspects of the Austrian coalition, a psychological one should be noted. The equality of the parties is to some extent itself the result of two inequalities. The Socialist Party is the better and more rationally organized, and it commands more readily mobilized resources.<sup>21</sup> The People's Party, on the other hand, continues to enjoy a psychological advantage which stems from Austria's past. Neither of the two parties can claim to be the legitimate successor of the Habsburgs; but the Christian Social rule from 1920 to 1938 identified that party with the state—an identification that continues to live in the minds of most people who are not in the Socialist camp.<sup>22</sup> It leads to apprehension on the part of the SPOe that it might at some future date be again relegated to a position of permanent opposition.

The political culture within which the Austrian coalition operates is a typical representative of the Continental European political system as described by Gabriel Almond.<sup>23</sup> The Austrian Lager correspond to Almond's three components, the Catholic pre-industrial, the older middle-class, and the industrial.<sup>24</sup> While the older middle-class sub-culture is weak and partially submerged, the two major components of Austrian society continue to show elements of what Almond calls an alienation from the political market. But the hard-won realization in the Second Republic is that bargain they must, and the coalition emerges, in Almond's terms, as a set of institutionalized under-the-counter transactions,<sup>25</sup> a modus vivendi between the two main forces in a cloven society.

II

The coalition operates in an extra-constitutional area. Its modes and procedures are set by formal agreements between the parties and by practices that have developed since 1945. The process of the coalition will be explained in the following schematic statement.

The dissolution of Parliament (agreed upon prior to the expiration of the four-year term in all cases after 1949) takes place by agreement of the coalition partners, yet most accounts agree that each one of the premature dissolutions resulted from the challenge of one of the partners.<sup>26</sup> The campaign does not start officially till the election date is set, but party newspapers and press services on both sides immediately launch attacks on the partner, which exceed in severity the normal day-to-day criticism each party makes of the partner's policy proposals or vetoes, and of the administration of ministries controlled by the partner. Each partner issues an election manifesto that contains favored policy proposals, and party speakers and the party press labor the issues selected for emphasis by the party executives. At some point, each of the parties announces its intention to continue the coalition after the election, though the OeVP is likely at least to hint at the possibility of including the national liberal opposition (FPÖ) in the coalition, if only to strengthen its bargaining position.<sup>27</sup>

Kautsky—and adopted on May 14, 1958, says: "Socialism and Christianity, the religion of love of one's neighbour, are entirely compatible with each other. There can be no conflict between a Socialism which is based on ethical convictions, and the religious communities, so long as the latter avoid using the machinery of the state for the attainment of denominational demands. . . ." SPOe, The New Programme of Austrian Socialism (Vienna, 1958), pp. 6–7.

<sup>19</sup> Secher, loc. cit. note 16 above, pp. 904–906.

<sup>20</sup> This point is emphasized by Kafka, loc. cit., pp. 66–67.

<sup>21</sup> The party, united by Victor Adler in 1889, is one of the truly remarkable political organizations of political history; witness its sudden and effective resurrection in 1945, after eleven years of suppression. Its most formidable potential resource is the strike threat it wields through its domination of the OeGB. Paradoxically, the party also controls Austria's largest private bank, the Arbeiterbank.

<sup>22</sup> The writer will offer evidence for this and similar assertions in a later work on the Austrian coalition and democracy.

<sup>23</sup> "Comparative Political Systems," Journal of Politics, Vol. 18 (1956), pp. 391–409.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., pp. 405–408.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., p. 407.

<sup>26</sup> The dissolutions of 1953 and 1959 were urged by the OeVP, that of 1956 by the SPOe. The challenger sustained losses in every case.

<sup>27</sup> See note 14. For a detailed, though hostile, account of OeVP efforts to include the VdU in the coalition (in 1953) see Schaerf, Oesterreichs Erneuerung, pp. 328–331, 334–336.

Since the election is not expected to bring about a massive shift of votes, the slightest change in the popular vote and in the distribution of mandates is noted emphatically on either side, in speeches of party leaders and by the party press. The election is followed by negotiations to which both party executives appoint committees. These committees go about the task of renegotiating the terms of the coalition in the light of the election results. There are proposals and counterproposals, some submitted with diplomatic discretion and others broadcast by the party press services. Most of the time and effort of the negotiators is spent in changing, however slightly, the distribution of portfolios between the partners, and their relative influence over government corporations and nationalized industries. Policies receive but scant notice, and the resulting government declaration is essentially a somewhat compromised addition of the competing election manifestoes.<sup>28</sup> The distribution of portfolios, as well as the agreed-upon arrangements concerning government corporations and nationalized industries, are laid down in the final coalition pact.<sup>29</sup> From then on, policy-making, which in all essentials requires agreement of the two partners,<sup>30</sup> tends to take place in an essentially quantitative manner. The coalition committee, a body containing the five principal leaders of each of the partners, normally clears policies only when the negotiators of one party have bought agreement to one of their policies by agreeing to a policy proposed by their partners. These joint policy agreements, called Junktim, are, next to the Proporz (the much discussed and criticized double-patronage system by which the coalition partners divide public employment between their adherents),<sup>31</sup> the main point of attack on the coalition from the opposition and the independent press. A Junktim may be pointed to with pride by the party press on both sides, or the partner may be attacked for having exacted an undue or an irrelevant price. A refused Junktim is almost always made the subject of attacks on the coalition partner.

While the distribution of portfolios has been the main business of all renegotiations of the coalition since 1949, only few have ever changed hands. Finance, education, commerce, and agriculture—portfolios connected with business, agriculture, and religion—have always been the domain of the OeVP; while the Socialists have kept interior, justice, and social welfare—portfolios connected with labor and with the internal protection of the republic. Civil service rules make it impossible to remove all civil servants of the other party (a problem for Socialists only, since virtually all civil servants of the First Republic were non-Socialists), but the government departments just mentioned have become the distinct domain of one or the other of the coalition parties.

III

Four aspects of the negotiations following the election of 1959 should be noted particularly: first, the implementation of the equilibrium; second, the role of President Schaerf; third, the tension between clericalism and liberalism in the OeVP; fourth, Socialist insistence on the rigid coalition. Concerning the first aspect, the People's Party's predominance gained in 1956 had been turned into an equilibrium between the partners, which could be implemented on the governmental level only after protracted haggling. Regarding the President's role, he entered the scene after Julius Raab and Bruno Pittermann, their parties' chief negotiators, had failed to reach agreement. Schaerf, though himself the former leader of the SPOe, exercised (for the first time in republican history) the function of a "pouvoir neutre."<sup>32</sup> His mediating solution, for which he enlisted the aid of the caucus leaders of the Parliament, not that of the deadlocked <sup>28</sup> In 1959, the government declaration was an amalgam of the wishes of both parties. Earlier declarations had reflected primarily the policy intentions of the chancellor.

<sup>29</sup> Prior to 1956, the coalition pacts were secret. Schaerf, claiming as his justification the publication (in 1954) of the 1949 pact by a VdU journal, published the 1953 pact in Oesterreichs Erneuerung, pp. 332-334. The 1956 and 1959 pacts were published in pursuance of inter-party agreement; Wiener Zeitung, June 27, 1956, p. 1; July 26, 1959, p. 1.

<sup>30</sup> The struggle over exceptions to this unanimity requirement (the so-called coalition-free area) is one of the major themes of the two subsequent sections of this article.

<sup>31</sup> Secher, loc. cit., MacCormac, loc. cit., and others have overdrawn the specter of the Proporz. The system applies to the personnel of the governing boards and management of government corporations and nationalized industries, but not to the ordinary bureaucracy. There is, on the other hand, no regular merit system; rather, with exceptions, the party of the minister dominates the appointments to his department. For an accurate description of the Proporz see Kafka, loc. cit., pp. 87-91.

<sup>32</sup> For an earlier account of the position of the President, see ibid., p. 82.

Cabinet leaders, was to continue the coalition under Raab's leadership. In respect to the situation within the OeVP, its defeat brought to the fore the tension between its main body of clericalism and agrarianism on the one side, and its liberal wing on the other. This tension, which became apparent in the Kamitz episode (discussed below), continues to beset the party and colors its attitude toward the coalition, which is opposed in whole or part by the liberal wing.

The final aspect, Socialist insistence on the rigid coalition, was manifested in the political, social, and psychological tension of the pre-campaign sparring, the campaign itself, and the negotiations. The OeVP, having tasted victory in 1956, felt a yearning for at least part of its First-Republic primacy. To the SPOe, the removal of the absolute veto on coalition policy would bring about the domination of labor by business and agriculture. If anything, the party's apprehension of a resurrection of the Buergerblock was heightened by the gradual removal of socialists from other European governments.

In 1956, the OeVP had outpolled the Socialists largely because of its stand against the nationalization of the enterprises acquired by Austria through the State Treaty of 1955 (oil, civil aviation, broadcasting).<sup>33</sup> In the negotiations, the SPOe lost control of already nationalized industries to a bipartisan body (IBV)<sup>34</sup> in which the Chancellor had the casting vote. One year later, Adolf Schaerf, the SPOe leader, was elected President over a supra-partisan surgeon nominated by Raab; one of the winning slogans was the balancing of a "black" chancellor by a "red" president.<sup>35</sup> The discrepancy of these election returns, a stroke suffered by Raab, alleged intransigence of Pittermann, and a number of scandals (involving primarily, but not solely, the OeVP),<sup>36</sup> all but paralyzed the coalition by 1958. The OeVP, as plurality party, had been the author of most of the items in the government declaration of 1956; in its eagerness to enact some of them despite Socialist opposition (a circumstance necessitating a loosened-up coalition), it wanted to move up the parliamentary election, not due till 1960. The Socialists for their part were in no hurry to go to the polls.

Raab forced the election issue in a statement of March 5, 1959, which contained the following:

In the interest of maintaining Austria's political stability, we will have to rejoin in a coalition once more after the next election. What will have to be changed is the present rigid form of the coalition pact, which contains in practice an absolute veto for a partner who is not willing to negotiate, a feature preventing necessary decisions in vital questions.<sup>37</sup>

The Socialists, whose consent was required for a premature dissolution, agreed on a May 10 election, reminding the voters in their reply of "... the opportunity to decide against the autocracy of one party and for the continuation of ... political and economic collaboration. . . ."<sup>38</sup> Thus, even before the campaign began, the issue was joined between a reluctant and an eager partner, a situation enhanced by a Raab statement that a three-party coalition (including the FPÖe) should be contemplated after the election.<sup>39</sup>

The opposing manifestoes, issued at the official start of the campaign, April 1, brought little that was surprising. While the Socialists came forward with such doctrinaire terms as "collective economy" and "property gained through labor," they mainly advocated a <sup>33</sup> The OeVP voting percentage climbed from 41.26% in 1953 to 45.96% in 1956. The FPÖe voting percentage showed a corresponding decline, from 10.95% in 1953 (VdU) to 6.52% in 1956. The Socialists more than held their own, rising from 42.11% in 1953 to 43.04% in 1956. In Vienna, however, where the fortunes of the SPOe are watched most closely, its percentage fell from 50.15% to 49.73%, and it actually lost 36,692 votes. The decline, expressed mostly through abstentions, was ascribed by many to the considerable increase in streetcar fares in 1955 by the Socialist city government. The writer was told that many thousands put streetcar tickets instead of ballots in their voting envelopes. For a discussion of the internal issues arising from the State Treaty, see Secher, "Coalition Government," loc. cit., pp. 799-807.

<sup>34</sup> The letters stood for Industrie- und Bergbauverwaltung (Industrial and Mining Administration). From 1956 to 1959, the IBV was the parent body for the government of the nationalized industries.

<sup>35</sup> See note 3. Schaerf's voting percentage of 51.12% in the face of bipartisan opposition contrasts with Socialist parliamentary-election percentages of 42.11% in 1953, 43.04% in 1956, and 44.79% in 1959.

<sup>36</sup> The scandals are described concisely by Kitzinger, loc. cit., p. 123. The OeVP, as the party of business, is bound to sustain damage from alleged scandals, just as alleged unseemly trade-union practices are bound to hurt the Socialists.

<sup>37</sup> Wiener Zeitung, March 6, 1959, p. 1.

<sup>38</sup> Id., March 7, 1959, p. 1.

<sup>39</sup> Id., March 12, 1959, p. 2; Die Presse, March 12, 1959, p. 3.

stepped-up welfare program and steps against political patronage.<sup>40</sup> The manifesto of the People's Party stressed the "Raab-Kamitz Kurs," since 1952 the party's Erhard-like economic program, while some sops were thrown in the direction of the clerical wing. While both programs advocated further collaboration within the coalition, the OeVp noted sternly: "The coalition loses its meaning when, through the egotistically partisan veto policy of the SPOe, it degenerates into a dictatorship of the minority over the majority."<sup>41</sup>

While the bulk of the mutually dull campaign oratory dealt with economic issues, the question of the future nature of the coalition—already foreshadowed by Raab's statement on the FPOe and by the OeVP manifesto—was raised sharply by the main liberal exponent on the side of the OeVP. Reinhard Kamitz, Minister of Finance, non-party member, and spokesman of Austria's larger industries, said to the press on April 3 that "in his opinion, only questions of foreign policy, the currency, and the budget were to be based on common decisions, everything else, if agreement could not be reached, was to be left to the decision of the Parliament."<sup>42</sup> To the Socialists, Kamitz' statement smacked of a new Buergerblock, since the reference to the Parliament could only mean an OeVP-FPOe majority outvoting the SPOe. In response, the Socialists developed the theme of the need for preserving the Gleichgewicht (equilibrium), the alternative to which was Alleinherrschaft (sole rule) by the OeVP. The theme, by nearly general agreement the most potent of the campaign, was countered only feebly by the OeVP with the assertion that to give chancellorship and presidency of Parliament to the party of the "red" President would lead to pure Socialist domination.<sup>43</sup>

When 94 per cent of the Austrians cast their ballots on May 10,<sup>44</sup> the majority of those relatively few voters who do not have a fixed party allegiance had voted for the reestablishment of the equilibrium between the coalition partners. They did so all over Austria: the People's Party share of the vote decreased in each of the twenty-five electoral districts, and the Socialists' share increased in each district. The total vote for the coalition parties remained quite steady; but the Socialists, 127,000 votes behind the OeVP in 1956, received 1,953,935 votes, the OeVP, 1,928,043. As in 1953, the higher birth rate in OeVP-dominated areas gave the People's Party a plurality of parliamentary seats: they captured 79 as against 78 for the Socialists. What may be called the epitome in equilibrium was reached: one party had an infinitesimal vote advantage, the other the minimal advantage in seats, and a "black" chancellor would continue to balance a "red" president.<sup>45</sup>

IV

Elections under the Austrian coalition, Uwe Kitzinger writes, serve "... to furnish a revised index of strength according to which the organized groups can bargain to settle their differences."<sup>46</sup> This bargaining includes the distribution of portfolios and the mode of party collaboration; questions of public policy are left generally to inter-election rather than to the post-election bargaining. Both parties delegated their real leaders to the post-election negotiations of 1959—each of them seven (including the five delegates of each party to the permanent coalition committee).<sup>47</sup> The

<sup>40</sup> There is some room for argument as to what the voters intended. Hans Thuer-Porta (Salzburger Nachrichten, May 16, 1959, p. 18) argues strongly that the voters voted for the predominance of their respective parties, and not for the equilibrium. The writer, however, is not convinced by this argument, especially in view of the equilibrial election outcomes of 1953 and 1957, which were of course known to the electorate. One OeVP aide told the writer that his party, by going into the voting with 82 of 165 seats and not asking for a majority mandate, actually asked for a moderate defeat. As is usual in Austria, there are, in the interpretation of political phenomena, three "truths": one "black," one "red," and one anti-coalition.

<sup>41</sup> Kitzinger, loc. cit., p. 123.

<sup>42</sup> When asked about the desirability of having real power vested in an extra-constitutional group, a leading Socialist politician said to the writer: "In no country is there a complete congruence between official and real leaders. In Austria, at least, everyone knows who the real leaders are: the ten members of the coalition committee."

<sup>40</sup> Arbeiter-Zeitung, March 29, 1959, p. 1.

<sup>41</sup> Neue Tageszeitung, April 3, 1959, pp. 1-2. The economic program of Raab and Kamitz as an election issue is analyzed by Kitzinger, loc. cit., pp. 126-127.

<sup>42</sup> Wiener Zeitung, April 4, 1959, p. 2. For Socialist rejoinders, see Oskar Pollak's editorial in Arbeiter-Zeitung, April 12, 1959, p. 2, and Pittermann in Salzburger Nachrichten, April 14, 1959, p. 10.

<sup>43</sup> Maleta in Wiener Zeitung, April 18, 1959, p. 2.

<sup>44</sup> Information in this paragraph was compiled from official returns. Note also Kitzinger's analysis, loc. cit., pp. 137-140.

OeVP delegation, headed by Chancellor Julius Raab, included representatives of the party's constituent federations, of the provincial parties, and of liberals and industry; the SPOe delegation, headed by Vice-Chancellor Bruno Pittermann, included representatives of the trade unions and of "red" Vienna.<sup>48</sup>

This negotiating committee of fourteen delegates first met on May 21, after Raab had been redesignated as Chancellor. Not until two months later, after one major crisis and a successful presidential intervention, were they to emerge with the product of their protracted bargaining: an implementation, on the governmental level, of the equilibrical verdict of the voters, and an essentially negative answer to the OeVP's foredoomed demand to change the basis of the coalition.

It was on the latter issue that the first post-election exchange between the parties dwelled: the OeVP demanded a strengthening of Parliament,<sup>49</sup> while the SPOe, pointing to the voters' "... clear refusal of the plans for the domination by one party ..." insisted that "the future government of the two parties can only be a government based on the complete balance of forces."<sup>50</sup> The OeVP persisted with its demands for free votes in Parliament in its first comprehensive proposal to the negotiating committee, on June 5. The same proposal suggested that the foreign ministry be ceded to the SPOe, in order to approximate a balance of portfolios.<sup>51</sup>

<sup>48</sup> In addition to Raab and Pittermann, the delegates were: for the OeVP, Alfred Maleta (parliamentary caucus chairman and then general party secretary), Alfons Gorbach, the present Chancellor (provinces), Reinhard Kamitz (liberals and industry), Josef Kraus (peasants), Johann Wagner (commerce and small business), and Lois Weinberger (Catholic workers and employees); for the SPOe, Franz Olah, labor's strong man (then parliamentary caucus chairman, now OeGB president), Oskar Helmer (then Minister of the Interior), Karl Waldbrunner (Minister, then for Nationalized Industries, now of Transport), Bruno Kreisky (now Foreign Minister), Otto Probst (central secretary), and Felix Slavik (Vienna).

<sup>49</sup> Wiener Zeitung, May 14, 1959, p. 2.

<sup>50</sup> Id., May 12, 1959, p. 2.

<sup>51</sup> Id., June 6, 1959, p. 1. In view of Austria's dependent status till 1955, and the neutrality imposed by the State Treaty, an independent foreign ministry had not heretofore been considered essential. Such considerations seem to have guided the OeVP when it selected this ministry for an offer. Another consideration was the decision, most likely reached by that time,

The slumber that had settled over Austrian politics during the dull first post-election month was rudely interrupted by a terse announcement, on June 13, emanating from private talks between Raab and Helmer, both party organization men tied by a long-standing friendship. The announcement stated that Raab had proposed "... the taking over of the Federal Ministry of Finance by a minister of the SPOe. ..." <sup>52</sup> The foreign ministry was to stay with the OeVP and, said the OeVP press, the Socialists, after all their attacks on Kamitz, should now themselves be saddled with the responsibility for the management of Austria's economy. The Socialists accepted Raab's proposal and nominated Kreisky for Minister of Finance.

The "Kamitz sacrifice," as the episode came to be known, must of course be accepted as a sincere attempt by Raab to reactivate the deadlocked negotiations. Yet, more basically, it was also an attempt of the leader of the OeVP's traditional, Catholic, pre-industrial organization to assert primacy over the spokesman of liberal-national industrialism. Raab's offer, by the way, closely followed similar attempts by Konrad Adenauer to exclude Ludwig Erhard, the manager of the Wirtschaftswunder, from political leadership. The immediate violent reaction of organized industry and of the non-clerical OeVP provincial organization of Styria<sup>53</sup> showed that the basic issue between Catholicism and liberalism, and between small shopkeepers and industrialists, was clearly understood. Industrialist pressure and the votes of numerous provincial delegates led to the almost unanimous reversal of Raab's offer when the OeVP Executive met on June 15. Yet the repudiated leader was immediately given a vote of confidence and asked to resume negotiations with the Socialists, but on the basis of the withdrawal of the Kamitz sacrifice.<sup>54</sup> to retire Felix Hurdes as President of Parliament and to replace him with Leopold Figl, then the Foreign Minister.

<sup>52</sup> For the original offer and immediate comments, see Wiener Zeitung, June 13, 1959, p. 1; Die Presse, June 13, 1959, pp. 1, 3; Salzburger Nachrichten, June 13, 1959, pp. 1-2, 4.

<sup>53</sup> Die Presse, June 13, 1959, pp. 1, 3; June 14, 1959, p. 1; Salzburger Nachrichten, June 13, 1959, p. 4; June 15, 1959, pp. 2, 5; Wiener Zeitung, June 14, 1959, p. 2; Arbeiter-Zeitung, June 14, 1959, pp. 1-2.

<sup>54</sup> Wiener Zeitung, June 16, 1959, p. 1; Die Presse, June 16, 1959, pp. 1, 3; Salzburger Nachrichten, June 16, 1959, p. 1; Neue Zürcher Zeitung, June 17, 1959, folio 1.

The episode indicated that seven years of "Raab-Kamitz Kurs" had enlarged the basis of the OeVP to include liberals who do not have Catholic organizational ties. Although Kamitz exchanged his key post for the presidency of the national bank in 1960, his supporters continued to exert, and still exert, the influence they showed in this episode; despite the outcome of the election and the negotiations of 1959, they continued to struggle against the rigid coalition, and they continue even today.

The withdrawal of the Kamitz sacrifice again paralyzed negotiations, until the SPOe, on June 25, proposed a reversion to the settlement of 1953, when the electoral verdict had been almost identical.<sup>55</sup> The proposal marked a shift in Socialist tactics: no longer were aspirations in the field of finance to be pursued, but the direction of nationalized industries, lost in 1956, was to be recaptured. This new Socialist push appeared successful, and by early July there was general agreement that the SPOe was to control foreign affairs as well as nationalized industries; only details remained to be worked out. On July 7, negotiations broke down over a relatively minor issue concerning the government of the nationalized industries, and Raab resigned.<sup>56</sup>

At this point, President Schaerf acted as deus ex machina. Aided by a suggestion of the OeVP Executive to the effect that negotiations should continue in small committees, he devised a roundabout scheme to reach his objective: a continuation of the coalition under the leadership of his erstwhile political opponent, Julius Raab. This objective would perpetuate the partnership of the political parties and the socio-economic partners, and it would insure that both parties would be led by pro-coalition elements. The roundabout scheme was to place the deadlocked negotiations into hands other than those of the leaders. In fact, the delegations nominated by the two parties did not include a single member of the government. On July 9, Maleta, Kraus, Gorbach (OeVP) and Olah, Probst, Slavik (SPOe), all members of the large negotiating committee, met with Schaerf's instructions to solve the governmental crisis by July 11. In order to underline the new spirit of negotiation, they even moved from the Chancellery (the traditional meeting-place of coalition committees) to the Parliament building.<sup>57</sup>

Agreement was reached in the evening hours of July 10. While details were to be spelled out later in the law delineating the functions of the ministers, in the government declaration, and in the coalition pact, broad outlines of the settlement emerged immediately. The Socialists were to control the now autonomous foreign ministry, whose boundaries with the OeVP-controlled ministry of commerce were spelled out. The IBV was dissolved, and all powers of management of the nationalized industries were lodged with the Socialist Vice-Chancellor. The result of this new distribution of portfolios was to give each party six ministries, and to reestablish the equilibrium between the parties in the economic sphere. In addition, Socialist influence over nationalized banks, the tobacco monopoly, and broadcasting was increased. The mode of collaboration, to be expressed in the new coalition pact, was yet to be worked out by a committee consisting of Maleta, Gorbach, Olah, Slavik, and legal counsel.<sup>58</sup>

On July 17, Raab, sworn in as Chancellor for the third consecutive time, read the government declaration to the Parliament. Though the declaration had been discussed by spokesmen of both coalition partners, it did not emerge as an integrated whole, but was essentially a restatement of some of the electoral demands of the two parties. It therefore resembled more the State of the Union message of a weak president than the Speech from the Throne, and the extent of its fulfillment would depend on day-by-day negotiations in the coalition committee. On the economic side, the declaration did not suggest any major departure from what the OeVP had considered "its" Raab-Kamitz course all along, indicating the essentially consensual nature of such matters as currency stability, full employment, and wage-price stability. A controversial item included by the OeVP was the demand for a stepped-up emission of "people's shares" in nationalized enterprises.<sup>59</sup> Socialist policy dominated the section on housing, but the program to increase

<sup>55</sup> Wiener Zeitung, June 26, 1959, pp. 1-2.

<sup>56</sup> Id., July 7, 1959, pp. 1-2; July 8, 1959, pp. 1-2; Die Presse, July 7, 1959, pp. 1-2; July 8, 1959, pp. 1, 3; Salzburger Nachrichten, July 8, 1959, p. 1; Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, July 7, 1959, p. 3.

<sup>57</sup> Die Presse, July 9, 1959, pp. 1, 3; Salzburger Nachrichten, July 9, 1959, p. 2; Neue Zürcher Zeitung, July 9, 1959, folio 1; July 10, 1959, folio 2.

<sup>58</sup> Wiener Zeitung, July 11, 1959, p. 1; Die Presse, July 11, 1959, pp. 1, 3; July 14, 1959, p. 1; Salzburger Nachrichten, July 14, 1959, p. 2.

<sup>59</sup> "People's shares" in nationalized industry had been included in the government declaration of 1956, but the SPOe had blocked nearly all action on what it alleged would constitute reprivatization of public property.

the construction of dwellings had been agreed upon by both parties. The OeVP's desire for an increased development of apartment ownership was incorporated also. The People's Party appears to have determined the formulation of the sections on agriculture and religion. While the demand for a general education law stemmed from the OeVP platform, demands for school construction were taken from the Socialist election program. Guides for the general development of pension laws showed some similarity to the Socialist platform as did the demand for a widespread merit system in public employment.<sup>60</sup>

In the brief parliamentary debate on the government declaration, Maleta admitted that his attempt, to turn over to the free decision of the Parliament such matters as were not agreed upon by the coalition committee within a reasonable time, had to be given up. "Coalition means a bond. The fixing of a coalition-free area, meaning an area without such a bond, amounts to squaring the circle."<sup>61</sup> These remarks about the inevitability of a rigid coalition were the first public intimation that the OeVP had failed in its prolonged attempt to establish a coalition-free area in which important decisions could be made by parliamentary majorities rather than by coalition agreement. The decision actually had been made earlier. Under the signatures of Raab, Maleta, Pittermann, and Waldbrunner, the 1959 coalition pact had been concluded as early as July 16. It was published in the press on July 26. The central policy-making provisions were quite similar to those of the 1956 pact. Article I, Section 5, reads as follows:

- (a) Government bills on which the coalition parties represented in the government have reached unanimous agreement as to substance and form, are, on account of their importance, binding on the two coalition parties as represented in the Parliament. Fundamental proposals for amendment require the assent of the coalition committee.
- (b) If no decision was made to require such parliamentary support, both coalition parties have a free hand in Parliament.<sup>62</sup>

The formulation of conditions under which there is to be a coalition-free area differed in only one respect from the 1956 version. Then such an area was to obtain only "if in deciding a government bill the Government has resolved to release to the discretion of the coalition parties the parliamentary treatment of a government bill."<sup>63</sup> All the OeVP gained in attempting to establish a coalition-free area of parliamentary discretion was thus a provision for a free vote whenever the coalition committee failed to bind the partners, instead of when the free vote had been agreed upon specifically. The facts of Austrian party discipline and the prevailing mode of operation of the coalition committee render it improbable that the revised clause will bring about any noticeable change.

Thus, the SPOe had not only reached the equilibrium in the distribution of portfolios, it had also prevailed on the question of the mode of collaboration. The SPOe had claimed that one of the foremost mandates of its "equilibrical victory" would be the maintenance of the rigid coalition. The OeVP had asked the voters for more freedom and lost votes and seats in the process. The Socialist "victory" in 1959 left the coalition as rigid as ever.

V

The basic questions decided by the negotiators in their eleven-week haggling were the same that had been decided in previous post-election negotiations. These questions were: "Who gets to do what?" and "On what terms do things get done?" The first question took up most of the time of the negotiators; on the second, they merely confirmed what can be interpreted as the verdict of the electorate.

The length of the negotiations over the distribution of portfolios can be understood only when one realizes that while the Austrian coalition is a government coalition, departments of government belong, as a rule, to one party or the other. The Hapsburgs once maintained their position in the Holy Roman Empire by maintaining their Hausmacht in Austria, Bohemia, and Silesia; the Austrian parties maintain their governmental position through phenomena like the Socialist Hausmacht in social welfare and the People's Party Hausmacht in education. Looked at in the light of individual ministries that are under one-party domination, the Austrian coalition has in fact, as has been observed several times,<sup>64</sup> two Reichshaelften, like the Austro-Hungarian mon-

<sup>60</sup> Die Presse, June 27, 1956, p. 1.

<sup>61</sup> For the complete text of the declaration, see Wiener Zeitung, July 18, 1959, pp. 1-3.

<sup>62</sup> Id., July 22, 1959, pp. 1-2.

<sup>63</sup> Id., July 26, 1959, p. 1.

<sup>64</sup> The comparison is made with particular poignancy and humor in Roland Nitsche, "Die Jungwaehler werden entscheiden," Die Weltwoche, May 1, 1959, p. 27. See also Kafka, loc. cit., pp. 92-93.

archy. To carry the comparison further, one could consider the 1959 settlement an Ausgleich like the Austro-Hungarian settlement of 1867.

The 1959 Ausgleich was just about as evenly balanced a settlement as could be obtained.<sup>65</sup> The making of the Foreign Office into a full ministry and its transfer from OeVP to Socialist control, and the transfer of the over-all management of the nationalized industries from the bipartisan IBV to the Socialist Vice-Chancellor, did away with the People's Party's preponderance in governmental strength. As a result of the 1959 negotiations everything was balanced: in the economic sector, the OeVP controlled finance and commerce; the SPOe controlled nationalized industry, transport, and electricity. Control of the Exekutive (the armed force) is divided, leaving the OeVP in external control with the army, and the SPOe in internal control with police and Gendarmerie. Agriculture is "black," social service "red." The OeVP controls education, culture, and religious affairs, the SPOe foreign affairs. The OeVP's over-all leadership through the chancellorship is balanced by Socialist control of justice.

Since the coalition marriage is not only one of convenience but also of distrust, the parties check each other in several respects. There is the shared control, already mentioned, of the economy and the armed force. Control of foreign affairs is divided into Socialist control of the general diplomatic apparatus and OeVP participation in foreign-affairs decisions through the ministries of trade and defense. Finally, there are OeVP state secretaries in the Socialist ministries of the interior and of foreign affairs, and Socialist state secretaries in the OeVP ministries of trade and defense.

With the question of "Who gets to do what?" solved by maximizing the equilibrium solution, there remained the question of "On what terms do things get done?" Prior to 1959, proceedings had been based on bipartisan agreement. The twin formula of no government bill without bipartisan agreement, and disciplined bipartisan vote in Parliament for every government bill, was under the fire of those who agitated for a coalition-free area. It was to this, the area of decision making, that the OeVP wanted to extend the preponderance it enjoyed in the division of portfolios after the 1956 election. The outcome of the 1959 negotiations was of course the maintenance of the two-party equilibrium in the area of policy-making, by keeping rigid the decision-making features of the coalition pact.

An accounting for the arduousness of the 1959 coalition renegotiations must go beyond a recognition of the amazing electoral balance shown in the voting of May 10. The difficulty in reaching agreement emerges more clearly when the socio-economic aspects of the Austrian coalition are taken into full consideration. The fourteen men who did the negotiating were not just the representatives of rival party organizations; seven of them represented labor, and the other seven a coalition—uneasy at times—of business, agriculture, and white collar employees. It was never seriously questioned that the "black" social partner would retain control of affairs most directly related to business and agriculture, and the "red" social partner control over affairs closest to labor. The point driven home by the representatives of labor was that social partnership as they understood it could only be had by allowing them a codetermination of, and thus a veto on, all policies. The equilibrium registered in the settlement was thus a social as well as an electoral equilibrium.

Furthermore, the negotiations of 1959 constituted a Socialist effort to establish the psychological equilibrium between the two parties and, simultaneously, between the two social partners. Enough remained of the memory of the First Republic to keep alive the image of the OeVP as the governing party, with the SPOe at best in the role of a co-governing party. Most elements in the People's Party, especially the Catholic-clerical ones, knew throughout—either because of conviction or by necessity—that a revival of a First-Republic-type Buergerblock government would be ruinous. Yet, OeVP demands for a coalition-free area did much to call back ghosts of the First Republic, especially when these demands were made by such liberal elements within the OeVP as Kamitz or Josef Krainer, the Governor of Styria, or by such independent liberal-bourgeois elements as the Industrial Federation or Austria's major non-party newspapers, the Vienna Presse and the Salzburger Nachrichten. All of these elements displayed confidence that the eight FPÖe deputies would side with the OeVP whenever economic questions on which there was no agreement within the coalition might be determined by a free vote in Parliament. The extremely strong opposition voiced by these elements to Raab's proposal to sacrifice Kamitz and appoint a Socialist minister of finance only increased Socialist uneasiness over the psychological imbalance between the partners. Only the granting of most of its demands and the recognition of a thoroughly rigid coalition by the OeVP sufficed to convince the Socialists themselves that they were "gleich stark" (equally strong).

<sup>65</sup> For Kafka's interesting observations on the "unstable equilibrium," see ibid., p. 95.

Most equilibrical was the role of President Schaerf. In the absence of any reliable public-opinion data on the 1959 election<sup>66</sup> it would yet seem reasonable to infer that the election was decided by the same narrow segment of voters that had brought about Schaerf's election to the presidency in 1957: a relatively small group of non-socialist independents who voted the Socialist ticket.<sup>67</sup> It was therefore only proper that the same President who was elected by these equilibrium voters should use the weight of his office to help bring about the equilibrium solution: a perfectly balanced government, headed by a "black" chancellor to balance himself, the "red" President. It was ultimately Schaerf's personal intervention which kept Raab from forcing the formation of a minority government under Pittermann, and which prevailed upon Raab himself to head the new government. The people had voted for the equilibrium, but it was reasonable to infer that not only a "black" chancellor, but the venerable person of Julius Raab himself, was part of that equilibrium. And Schaerf, one of the authors of the coalition system, was able to use his office as "pouvoir neutre" between the parties, yet partial to the coalition.

Most of the nine-tenths of Austria's voters who supported the major parties on May 10, 1959, voted primarily for the party of their choice; yet most of them knew as individuals that they were in effect casting a vote for the continuance of the coalition. By giving equal votes to the partners, they voted for an equilibrical coalition with a rigid pact, though many realized that this involved all the evils and frustrations of the Junktim in policy-making and the Proporz in administration. Their response to the OeVP campaign indicates that they feel safest under a system which guarantees social peace, under a rigid pact, through the co-determination of issues by the representatives of both the Catholic and the industrial sub-cultures. Their support—prudent rather than fervent—of the coalition registers their feeling that, even with declining ideological acrimony, the organizational fact of the Lager persists—especially among professional politicians—and that the system institutionalizes the kind of political bargaining for which Austria is ready.<sup>68</sup>

<sup>66</sup> There is, however, the 1958 poll referred to in note 13; see also note 45.

<sup>67</sup> Such a mythical voter is described in a little ditty made available to the writer by its author, the drama critic and humorist Hans Weigel. After much soul-searching about his coming vote, this mythical voter opines: "If one could only tell for sure that the 'blacks' will come out ahead, one could safely vote for the 'reds'."

Repudiators of the system are not restricted to the pitifully weak Communists, the ineffectual FPÖ, and a few high-minded liberal intellectuals. More important loom Austria's independent newspapers and the non-clerically oriented segment of Austria's industry and finance. The latter, long rallied around Kamitz, have been working, with partial success, ever since the Kamitz "sacrifice" on strengthening their influence in the OeVP. In fighting the double shackles of the coalition, they also attempt to overcome clerical, agricultural, and small-business domination of the People's Party. As Austria's industrialization progresses, and her prosperity increases even more, they may eventually win both struggles.

Meanwhile, as long as Austria remains a typical example of a Continental European political system, and one with a civil-war memory at that, neither party is likely to be willing to entrust the country's government solely to the other. Austria may have to approximate Anglo-American political homogeneity, at least to the extent of the Scandinavian countries, before a government-opposition relationship between the two major parties will be considered a stable alternative. Barring this homogeneity, the two major political forces of Austria will continue to prefer the limited bargaining of the coalition to a government-opposition alternation, certainly as long as the present party-interest structure and present social conditions remain. The slide-rule implementation of the electoral verdict of 1959 was a necessary manifestation of this limited-liability arrangement which is Austria's way of bridging, with minimum consensus, her continuing cleavage.

<sup>68</sup> Kafka argues the latter point cogently; loc. cit., pp. 96-97.

THE PEDAGOGY OF DEMOCRACY: COERCIVE PUBLIC PROTEST IN INDIA

DAVID H. BAYLEY
University of Denver

Throughout the history of Indian politics in the 20th Century runs a curious and disturbing thread. Both before and after the achievement of independence in 1947, large segments of the Indian populace felt that the institutional means of redress for grievances, frustrations and wrongs—actual or fancied—were inadequate. Since the British withdrawal a fuller panoply of democratic procedures for influencing government has been introduced, but a basic suspicion persists that government is still alien and elite—although now the separation is based upon indigenous social division rather than upon foreign conquest and race. The fact is that the gaining of independence has marked very little change in the use of the more direct and agitational modes of public suasion. The Congress Government has been treated to an almost constant tattoo of demands supported by the same techniques popularized during the independence struggle, such as hunger-strikes, black-flag demonstrations, the courting of arrest, impeding of public business, and violent riots.

For the statesmen of contemporary India the continuation of public protests and agitations constitutes a unique problem. They are charged with the task of building a stable democratic polity. Yet they are constantly confronted with a bewildering array of methods of suasion which, if they do not fall altogether outside the bounds of democratic permissibility, at least constitute the development—or continued development—of a supplementary system of representation and redress. In solving this problem, Indian statesmen are severely limited in the means to which they may have recourse. They must create the social, psychological, and economic requisites of democracy without resorting to means which are themselves patent departures from the canons of democratic theory. Put briefly, the question which perplexes and constrains India's leaders is, how can Indian democracy be strengthened democratically? Within these limitations, both of ends and means, the architects of the country's political future must contend with the many forms of coercive public protest so characteristic of its political life.

I

Coercive public protest has three attributes: (1) it is aggregative;<sup>1</sup> (2) it is public, as opposed to conspiratorial or clandestine; and (3) it imposes a constraint upon government by its presence and actions. Coercive public protest can thus be distinguished clearly from the public excitations and clashes which spring more particularly from social cleavages and which are not directed at affecting the decisions of formally constituted governmental authority.

Coercive public protest may have a specific or a generalized object. For instance, participants may barricade the house of a district magistrate or chancellor of a university, demanding from this particular individual a specific response of accommodation or at least of strong sympathy. On the other hand, coercive public protest may be directed against a more generalized state of affairs with no single, readily discernible focus of action. "Satyagrahas" by railroad commuters, in which all train travel along a rail line is blocked as a protest against late-running trains, are an example of this. The object, if articulated at all, is to dramatize by disrupting; the target is simply officialdom.

Coercive public protest has assumed six primary forms in modern India: (1) processions and public meetings; (2) hartals (work stoppages not aimed at employers), boycotts, and strikes; (3) fasts; (4) obstruction; (5) courting of arrest; (6) riots. These general type-forms can be divided into two main groups, the legal and the illegal. In turn, the category of illegal protest can be subdivided into the violent and the non-violent. These distinctions may be organized schematically as shown in diagram on next page.

Not all of these forms of protest fall outside the preserve of democratic tolerance. Processions and public meetings are an accepted part of democratic interaction. Obstruction and the courting of arrest are known in India as satyagraha, or nonviolent civil disobedience, and were made popular by Mahatma Gandhi. The dividing line between obstruction and courting of arrest is artificial, to be sure, but the distinction highlights the two most prevalent modes of protest assuming the guise of satyagraha. Some of these campaigns, for example, are designed to bring a particular phase of community or governmental activity to a halt. By paralyzing, the satyagrahis coerce. The primary motive in this case is not to break the law—although the satyagrahis would not shrink from this if it were necessary. On the other hand, other non-violent civil disobedience campaigns have as their avowed object the challenging of constituted authority by deliberately violating promulgated laws and rules. The mark of accomplishment is to be arrested and hauled off to jail. The frequent organized defiance of orders issued under Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which allows police authorities to ban the assembly of five or more persons in designated areas, are instances of law-breaking satyagrahas. So, too, are those campaigns in which people refuse to pay taxes. The distinction between the two forms of satyagrahas involves a difference in mode of behavior and the degree to which one intention or the other predominates in the minds of their leaders.

<sup>1</sup> Coercive fasting is an apparent exception to this, although its intermediate effect, by building suspense, is to focus the attention of an ever-growing audience on the faster and his demands.

Although violence may be ranged upon a continuum with other forms of coercive public protest, as above, it is an extreme form which stands apart in two particulars. First, violence lacks the element of self-control, corporate and individual, which is a feature of most nonviolent protest. Violence usually involves a bursting of restraints. It may, of course, be carried on with dispassionate sang-froid; but generally it is not. Second, the goals to which non-violent agitation is directed are a good deal more definite and explicit than those which impel violence. In violence, self-control, reason, and purpose are generally overmastered by emotion and the individual or group lashes out indiscriminately.

Let us now examine more carefully the precise problem. Specifically, is there indeed a need for corrective action on the part of the Indian Government? What would be the consequences of allowing coercive public protest to go unrestrained?

In part the answers to these questions are dependent upon the proportions the phenomena have assumed; for it could hardly be argued that isolated instances, even if violent, posed a significant threat to the maintenance of Indian democracy. A detailed examination of these proportions is beyond the purview of this paper. Instead, I shall proceed on the basis of two assertions: (1) the Indian Government is faced with a pervasive and continued threat to the maintenance of law and order and (2) law and order are jeopardized to an extent known only extremely infrequently in either the United States or the United Kingdom and then never for prolonged periods of time.<sup>2</sup>

II

What interests and concerns are affected by these manifestations? Why should a government concerned with the strengthening of democracy feel impelled to undertake constraining action toward coercive public protest of this magnitude? At least six closely connected reasons may be given for governmental anxiety and action:

First: coercive public protest imposes an economic burden upon the nation. This cost is a consequence of the physical destruction visited upon public and private property, the loss of life and health to individuals, the disruption of services, and the diversion of resources, time and energy from constructive economic programs to the essentially neutral task of maintaining law and order. In an economy already straining to the utmost for rapid economic development the cost may be unacceptable, spelling the difference between Plan success and Plan failure. Political protest in any form, but more particularly in its illegal forms, causes some reallocation of resources; established industrial nations may be able to afford it, India perhaps cannot.

<sup>2</sup> For the evidence supporting these assertions see my Ph.D. dissertation, "Violent Agitation and the Democratic Process in India," Princeton University, 1961.

Second: one of the most fundamental duties of any government is the preservation of minimal conditions of law and order. No government, whatever its political form, can outlive a successful challenge to its ability to meet this need. If the government is unable to contain violent public protest and enforce its rules and regulations, it may lose its justification for existence, its claim to legitimacy.

Third: coercive public protest which succeeds in its object of affecting the decisions of government represents a derogation from majority rule. It is possible, of course, that demonstrators sometimes present a truer picture of majority sentiments than the elected representative sample. Rather special circumstances must exist to support this hypothesis, circumstances which in the Indian case are most uncommon. Usually, coercive public protest has been the tool of an aggrieved minority. As such, it strikes at the basic premise of democratic government, namely, that the will of the majority as expressed in free elections and through elected representatives is sovereign. If coercive public protest is seen to succeed, the representative integrity and efficacy of the erstwhile democratic government will be lost.

Fourth: coercive public protest represents not only the introduction of a supplementary means for the suasion of government, but a fundamental threat to the rule of law. If laws can be disregarded, sloughed aside arbitrarily, the prospect of equality and impartiality before the law is destroyed, and the efficacy of constituted means of representation and adjudication is impaired.

Fifth: as a result of the destruction of the rule of law and of the rule of the majority, a sort of Gresham's Law begins to affect the nature of political responses. Direct action and recourse to social violence—either threatened or actual—begin to drive out the orderly, constitutional responses demanded in a democratic state. Every success for direct action sets a precedent for its utilization by other groups and individuals. Coercive public protest, if allowed to go unrestrained, will be more widely imitated and become an even greater rival to the processes of peaceful change through democratic government.

Sixth: democracy demands a considerable measure of social discipline in order to work successfully. Coercive public protest involving forms which are illegal or violent represents a breakdown of discipline. It is based upon the destructive principle that certain ends justify recourse to undemocratic means of resolution.

If government fails to apply its sanctions, it allows new linkages to become established between ends and means. Due to the default of government, people are permitted to persist in the belief that certain deeply felt needs, desires, or interests are beyond compromise and that extreme solutions are appropriate to satisfy them. Social accommodation based on compromise tends to give way to a series of internecine wars. The failure of government to restrain coercive public protest represents a failure to secure acceptance of legitimate rules established to govern the relation between articulated wants and the procedures for their fulfillment.

These, then, are the consequences of giving coercive public protest its head. The Government of India has often demonstrated that it is well aware of them. Law and order have often been the subject of parliamentary debate and of ad hoc comments by Prime Minister Nehru and other leaders of government. Moreover, special reports on police firings and repeated investigations into important disturbances, as in Assam in 1960 and 1961, have brought out clearly the obligations which rest upon government. Rather less attention, unfortunately, has been given to the other side of the problem, namely, to an examination of the possible consequences of successfully restraining coercive public protest. Yet it seems elementary that any policy which would trench upon a widespread social response must be based on an appraisal not only of need but also of probable repercussions. The remainder of this paper will be devoted to an initial reconnaissance into these neglected regions.

III

It is important to realize, first, the theoretical implications of a policy of social control in any nascent democracy. Democratic political theory has always recognized that coercion and even violence are sometimes justifiable means for resisting the encroachments of government upon the preserve of human rights. There are boundaries which no authority can be allowed to transgress without provoking, justly, a violent response on the part of its oppressed constituents. The crucial question endlessly debated, and not only by political theorists, is where are these boundaries to be drawn? Are there any principles which can guide policy-makers in the permissible use of organized social power? From time to time in the history of the western democracies first principles have been laid down, often in the form of constitutional clauses or statutory laws; but such strictures are not absolute or immutable. Fundamental rights are to some extent contingent upon circumstances. Thus, when the Government of India becomes engaged in devising a policy to cope with coercive public protest, it is establishing de facto boundaries to permissible governmental regulation. It is engaged, like it or not, in giving operational content to the fundamental rights contained in Part III of its written constitution. In preserving law and order, the Government of India is determining a balance between the inalienable prerogatives of the individual and the legitimate concern of the State. These are the stakes.

Let us look now at the probable response of the Indian people to any policy directed to the repression, or at least regulation, of coercive public protest. Since the raison d'être of a policy of restraint is the strengthening of democracy in India, our search is for types of feedback incompatible with the long-run development of a stable democratic polity.

The first probable result of a repressive policy is the heightening of the feeling of impotency and frustration among the people. Underlying this supposition is the familiar hypothesis that social protest acts like a safety-valve for the social system, permitting the dissipation of accumulated discontent. Public displays of anger and dissatisfaction serve the purpose of allowing the people the appearance of an opportunity for lashing out at their milieu in general and for the representation of their smoldering resentment to persons in positions of responsibility. Coercive public protest, according to this hypothesis, represents catharsis. Or, it can be described as the syndrome of socially acceptable responses to situations of stress acknowledged to be such by the group. This alternative formulation underscores the fact that coercive public protest is a human response conforming to a pattern, which, specifying both occasioning stimuli and resulting modality, is familiar to the entire society.

The safety-valve hypothesis—in either of its formulations—points to the important fact that coercive public protest may have social utility. Overt mass responses of anger or disaffection may be functional to the social system. Eliminate this mode of expression and the society might crack apart in other even more serious ways. In the words of one Indian observer: "In India, agitation is not always bad; in fact, in a country [such] as ours it may be dangerous to limit popular urges in inter-election period[s] to strict constitutional methods of petition."<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Parliamentary Studies, Vol. 3, No. 7 (July, 1959), pp. 1-3, editorial.

This view is supported by the observation that coercive public protest often exhibits a formalistic character. In many of its outbreaks there seems to be a tacit reference to rules so that participants and law enforcement officials alike operate within a set of shared expectations. Of the illegal forms of protest, satyagraha campaigns most often exhibit this peculiar structured quality. They are, for instance, usually announced publicly well in advance of their occurrence. The satyagrahis are schooled in the tactics of the campaign and are kept under strict discipline. An excellent example of this occurred in May, 1956. A satyagraha was offered on Netaji Subhas Road in central Calcutta in defiance of an order under Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The campaign had originally been called to protest the proposed merger of Bihar and West Bengal. When the proposal was withdrawn the organizers continued the demonstration as a protest against the general attitude of the Government of West Bengal toward the issue of linguistic states. Police organized the target areas at noon on May 7. One thousand constables and 400 officers were brought to the scene. Large crowds of office workers began to gather to watch the confrontation. The procession of satyagrahis appeared in view about 2:15 P. M. and were roundly cheered and applauded by the spectators. The 76-year-old leader of the march climbed upon the back of a bullock cart and read a statement of intent and belief to the assembled throng. He was then ceremonially daubed upon the forehead with colored paste and liberally garlanded. Supporting himself on his bamboo staff, he descended from the cart and moved slowly toward the police cordon. The police allowed him to pass through and then bundled him into a waiting police van. One by one, groups of satyagrahis followed their leader through the cordon, there to receive similar treatment. Crowds of volunteers from leftist parties made way for them through the by then dense crowd of onlookers. During the deliberate violating of the law conch shells were blown and flowers were thrown upon the protestors. Representatives of the office employee's union in the Dalhousie Square area gave an orange to each male member of the satyagraha just as he crossed the line.

The circumstances of this particular occasion may have been extreme in modality but the mood of ritualistic participation is characteristic. The most common occasions for structured trials of strength with the authorities are the promulgations of Orders under Section 144, usually banning the assembly of five or more persons in a designated area. Magistrates and police both seem to be aware that they are participating in a public game; accordingly police incitement is kept to a minimum and magistrates award only token fines of one or two rupees to those arrested. The purpose of such a movement is simply to break the law and the mark of accomplishment is the number of persons who voluntarily court arrest. In a "Save Hindi" campaign in the Punjab in 1957 it has been estimated that over 12,000 persons were arrested and detained.<sup>4</sup> Earlier, during two months in the summer of 1955, over six thousand demonstrators were arrested in the Punjab during the Akali Dal's "morcha" or protest.<sup>5</sup> Law breaking in such instances becomes the test of the adherents' perseverance and dedication. The failure of a campaign is marked by a dwindling of volunteers ready to dare arrest and the imposition of a jail sentence or fine.

These ritualistic agitations place the government in an awkward position. If the government does not proceed against all forms of law-breaking, however disciplined, straight-forward, and self-sacrificing, it tacitly condones the flouting of legally promulgated rules. It is then forced into making ad hoc decisions in each case based upon the nature of the threat posed to government and society. An element of hesitation and indecision is injected into the situation. Agitating groups begin to claim precedents from other agitations; they charge discrimination by the government; and they are encouraged to toy with the authorities, edging closer to the brink of serious action without actually crossing over. When government moves unsurely, the people, in turn, respond uncertainly.

The Government of India is caught in a cruel dilemma. If it is conceded that even illegal demonstrations are or may be functional to the system, then the government must consider very carefully the consequences of repressing in a blanket fashion all forms of illegal coercive public protest. On the other hand, if the government does not draw the line clearly at illegality, it must draw the line at much more vague and ambiguous points, such as whenever an agitation threatens public welfare, law and order, domestic tranquillity, or economic development. Since the seriousness of a threat depends upon circumstances, such decisions are bound to appear arbitrary, at the whim of officialdom.

In sum, in order to teach the easier lesson—that all law-breaking will be punished—the government runs the strong risk of closing off a necessary safety-valve and occasioning an even greater revulsion against the system of law enforcement.

Another effect of strict control of organized, illegal public protest is a deterioration of consensus. Democracy thrives on the feeling among its people of joint participation in the affairs of government; the feeling that government is a creature of the people; the feeling that it is amenable to change as a result of popular, or mass, pressures. The Indian people, new to self-government, have habitually thought of government as "They." One of the tasks of the Nehru Government has been, and will continue to be, to convert the image of government as something which happens to people into one of government as something in which people can participate. Every time, however, that the Government restricts the area in which people may maneuver and determine actions for themselves, it drives wedges of alienation between itself and the people. If the government is to win the trust of its people, it must appear to be sympathetic to their pleas. The repression of coercive social protest will seem to many as the negation of sympathetic concern, the denial of the right of petition. The new government, supposedly "of the people," begins to give the impression of becoming just another Raj.

It is ironical that government in India perhaps cannot in fact afford to be truly sympathetic; perhaps consensus must be founded on a pose rather than a reality. To the extent to which the Indian masses are unprepared to accomplish the social changes necessary to the radical economic development which they so stridently demand, the Government of India will be forced to choose between social disaffection consequent upon unfulfilled hopes, on the one hand, and social constraint which will impel requisite development, on the other. If coercive public protest reinforces movements for social change compatible with economic development, then the Indian Government can afford to be more lenient toward it. If, however, coercive public protest is the tool of movements in opposition to requisite development, the government cannot afford to be sympathetic.

In short, democracy demands consensus, but the government in India may not be able to build that consensus without pandering to movements whose designs are set athwart long-run economic development. Harsh social and economic decisions must be made in the next few years, decisions which may in the short run cause a forfeiture of trust among certain sections of the people. When these decisions occasion coercive public protest the government cannot afford to mitigate the feeling of alienation, but must, indeed, intensify it by dealing strictly with the manifestations of protest. The Government of India may thus find itself reinforcing an already unfavorable image.

<sup>4</sup> Indian Civil Liberties Bulletin, October, 1959, p. 7.

<sup>5</sup> Times of India, July 13, 1955, p. 1.

A third form of negative feedback from governmental attempts at regulating public protest works through a peculiarly Indian syndrome. Mahatma Gandhi, during the protracted struggle for independence, capitalized upon traditional elements in Hindu religion and culture to develop his unique form of non-violent civil disobedience. Satyagraha stressed the element of individual sacrifice for a cause, for Truth. Unpossessed of political advantage or military strength, the Indian masses were taught to use their very weakness as an instrument of persuasion. The image of uncomplaining and non-violent self-sacrifice laid hold of the Indian mind, and resulted in the sanctification of the violated agitator.

The Gandhian political methodology is still very much a part of the Indian political scene. Unfortunately, it survives today, for the most part, without Gandhi's philosophical integrity or his immense compassion and understanding. What remains is the employment of passive resistance as a tool of naked coercion. There is example after example of governmental attempts at curbing popular protests that result in an intensification of what may be called the Gandhian "martyrdom syndrome." An increase in repression produces an increase in the numbers of people willing to champion the martyr's cause. Through this means the cause draws hitherto quiescent adherents who join not necessarily because they strongly approve the cause, but because the example of selfless sacrifice commands respect and reverence.

There are undoubtedly limits beyond which repression would produce fear and apathy, rather than imitation and respect. During the independence struggle satyagraha worked in India precisely because it was directed against an alien race afflicted with an active Liberal conscience; it could hardly have achieved success in Stalin's Russia. But the government of modern India cannot transgress these boundaries either. The Gandhian legacy is most damaging to the Nehru Government because it, like the British government, is committed to democratic principles of social control.

The attractiveness of martyrdom before the law is readily apparent in Indian politics. Few members of Parliament have not served some time in jail, most often at the hands of the British. Parliamentary debates are replete with instances of members claiming special knowledge of the meaning of democracy by virtue of having been incarcerated by an anti-democratic regime, either British or Congress. Hardly a week goes by in the Lok Sabha without notice being given by the Speaker that some MP has become involved with the police, usually as a leader or prominent participant in some campaign of civil disobedience. A. K. Gopalan, former leader of the Communist parliamentary delegation, was the subject of the first test case under the Preventive Detention Act of 1950. S. P. Mookerjee, president of the Bharatiya Jana Sangh, was detained under the same Act in Kashmir, 1953. He died in custody and the case became a dramatic cause célèbre. The respected Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia, prominent leader in the Praja Socialist Party, was detained briefly in 1955. Reports of the arrest of lesser political figures or of esteemed members of the bar are legion. An MP from Uttar Pradesh was arrested in 1958 for defying a Section 144 order;<sup>6</sup> six Praja Socialist Members of the Uttar Pradesh Legislative Assembly were arrested, September, 1958, for leading a satyagraha against grain storage warehouses;<sup>7</sup> two senior advocates and eleven lawyers were taken into custody in Jaipur, July, 1958, for invading banned areas as a protest against the abolition of a High Court Bench in that territory.<sup>8</sup> The upshot is that no stigma attaches to an elected official who has run afoul of the law. On the contrary, politicians in India win their spurs by spending time in jail in the name of some righteous cause.

Speaking about the debasement of satyagraha which has occurred since Gandhi's death, Nehru had this to say in 1956:

Then again, I am a little weary of hearing this word satyagraha hurled at me, and having heard this word many times in different contexts previously. When Gandhiji first used it and practiced it, when the time came he told us that nobody in India is a satyagraha except himself. He told us that, and quite rightly too. In spite of all our efforts, now everybody in India is a satyagrahi. Everybody who breaks the law, everybody who breaks heads is a satyagrahi. Every stone-thrower in India is a satyagrahi. This is most extraordinary, where words are misused and abused. Well, if a person wants to break a head, if I can stop him, I will stop him. But I do hope that the word "satyagrahi" will not be used in that connection.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Times of India, May 20, 1958, p. 9.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., September 6, 1958, p. 1.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., July, 1958.

<sup>9</sup> Lok Sabha Debates, 28 May 1956.

Professional politicians have made cynical use of the Indian respect for self-sacrifice. Political groups deliberately seek to create situations in which martyrdom cannot be avoided. A lathi charge, a tear gassing, police arrests, court fines and jail sentences are provoked in order to publicize a case and whip up public support for it. The image is created of dramatic insurgence against overbearing and autocratic government.<sup>10</sup>

The following description by an Indian observer gives a detailed picture of the tactics of mob utilization:

Processions have become a routine affair particularly in large cities. The technique is to have convergent processions surrounding the Legislative Assemblies when they are in session. There is dislocation of traffic when it is even normally most congested and there is a passionate shouting of slogans and fire-eating speeches. The processionists are inevitably held in check by an elaborate arrangement of the police force. Questions are raised by sympathizers inside the Legislature and the Government leaders are requested to meet a deputation from the procession. It is inevitably turned down and the signal for increasing the pressure of the procession is given. The police lathi-charge or tear-gassing the mob is welcomed by the leaders of the processionists in a morbid mood. If there is firing and some are wounded, it is considered a great victory for the day, once again demonstrating the callousness and the brutality of the party in power.<sup>11</sup>

As the preceding illustration would indicate, police firings provide the most emotion-laden instances of the utilization of suffering as a political weapon. Firing upon an unarmed crowd, even a belligerent and unreasonable one, immediately stirs up a wave of popular sympathy for the protagonists and hatred against the law enforcement authorities which engulfs and obscures the merits of the agitation. The issue uppermost in the public mind becomes the investigation and judgment of the action of the police. All thought of inexcusable provocation is wiped away by official killing. The defensive attitude of the government can be seen in the following rather plaintive appeal made by Mr. Nehru on the same occasion in 1956:

There was no doubt reference to police zulum.

<sup>10</sup> The Communist Party, in India and elsewhere, has used this tactic for years. See Eugene H. Methvin, "Mob Violence and Communist Strategy," Orbis (Summer, 1961), pp. 166-81.

<sup>11</sup> K. K. Sinha, Towards Pluralistic Society (Calcutta: Writers House, 1957), p. 25.

It is a constant factor that is brought in everywhere because it is expected that everybody will immediately accept any charge of misbehavior by the police. The poor police is so used to be kicked and cuffed like that and always condemned. It is easy to make a charge against the police. . . . It is becoming intolerable always for this poor policeman to be condemned for trying to do his duty in the most difficult of circumstances. Let us punish the policeman when he is guilty or anybody else when he is guilty. But the stone-thrower becomes a hero and is taken out in procession—may be—and the poor policeman who gets the stone on his head is a person who is guilty of zulum and atrocities.<sup>12</sup>

A fourth possible result is the political advantage which may accrue to agitational parties and groups vis-à-vis the government. In a country where the meaning of democracy is as yet largely unfixed in the public mind and has not been hallowed by years of reflexive experience, a policy of the government designed to establish rules, particularly rules for the expression of public opinion, can be too easily labelled as anti-democratic by the opposition. If the Government passes a Preventive Detention Act, amends the Indian Penal Code to provide stiffer penalties for incitement to communal violence, arrests "satyagrahis" raiding grain storage warehouses, or simply cordons off troubled areas in large cities, it hands the banner of democratic rectitude to the opposition. Acharya Kripalani, for instance, a respected leader of the Praja Socialist Party, thundered against the Congress Government in these words during a debate on the Preventive Detention Act:

It is not the Opposition, it is not the goondas,<sup>13</sup> it is not the black-marketeers, it is not even the Communists, it is you [referring to the Government] who are the greatest enemies of this infant democracy. If ever this democracy dies, you will be responsible for it. You may live for a day and be no more; but this will be the judgment of history to your everlasting shame.<sup>14</sup>

The Communist Party, especially, uses the law and order policies of the Government to present itself as the sole champion of democracy in India. Their thesis, proclaimed loudly from every rostrum, is that democracy means an absence of restrictions. Resistance by the Government to any popularly held belief or interest is ipso facto proof that the Government is anti-democratic. "Vox populi, vox dei" is the base line of their propaganda. The relation between freedom and regulation, between discipline and license, is a grudging lesson to teach in any country. It is doubly difficult to understand in India where the public is, first, largely unlettered and inexperienced in the ways of democracy and, second, so surfeited upon extreme portrayals of the nature and benefits of democracy. Any governmental policy of legal restriction will inevitably provide an opposition with an unparalleled opportunity to question the government's integrity and intentions.

<sup>12</sup> Lok Sabha Debates, 28 May 1956, Col. 9822.

<sup>13</sup> Hooligans.

<sup>14</sup> Lok Sabha Debates, 13 December 1954, col. 2731.

The fifth and most immediately serious consequence of a restrictive policy is the damage which it inflicts upon the position and prestige of the police and the law courts. The Indian police establishment must take the van in any attempt to discipline the masses, hence it becomes the primary target for abuse and vilification. The invidious position of the police is not an entirely new development in India, for they have been encumbered from the very beginning by the reputation earned when they were a paid tool of the British. People in India have not quickly forgotten that it was these same police who carried off friends and loved ones into detention, often to be held incommunicado for considerable periods of time. They remember the police breaking heads and firing tear gas squibs at non-violent demonstrators protesting for nothing more (or less) than the freedom of their country. An intensified policy of constraint resuscitates memories of this bitter period, memories which the police have strenuously sought to sponge clean since Independence.

The Law Commission, appointed by the central government, had this to say in 1958 about the stock of the police among the Indian people: "It must be conceded that in India, the police force as a whole is not, even today, regarded as a friend of the citizen."<sup>15</sup> This same theme was echoed in a recent article in the Indian Police Journal "... in actual fact, the feelings of the people toward the Police are anything but friendly."<sup>16</sup> In part, suspicion of the police can be traced to such ordinary factors as inefficiency, haste, lack of consideration, as well as the usual incidence of corruption, brutality, and partiality.<sup>17</sup> More important, however, in the opinion of the Law Commission, has been the extensive use of the police for law and order control. So serious has the trend toward non-cooperation with the police become among the mass of the people that the Law Commission recommended in 1958 that the investigating sections of the police establishment be separated from the law and order sections.<sup>18</sup>

The flame of antagonism toward the police is fanned constantly by opposition politicians, both in and out of legislative bodies. There is an axiom among these politicians that if violence occurs, it is the fault of police provocation. A Communist MP replied in these words to the Government's claim that there was a tendency to violence among the people: "How is this violence generated? Is it initially from the people or does it come as a reaction to police violence, the violence on the part of the executive?"<sup>19</sup> And another MP charged:

If violence has occurred, it has occurred not because of any activities of the detenus. It has occurred on account of the activities of the police.<sup>20</sup>

In the Bombay Legislative Assembly, 1955, twenty-two Opposition MLAs tabled the following statement:

It is true that the mob pelted the police with stones—that should not have been done—but when firing and lathi charges are resorted to indiscriminately, it would be too much to expect the people to be totally non-violent. The Government failed to understand the spontaneity of the people's demand and tried to suppress the will of the masses by force.<sup>21</sup>

Even the redoubtable J. P. Narayan has added his voice to the refrain:

The Prime Minister has warned again and again that the days of street demonstrations and the like are over. But let me say humbly that as long as his Government and its officers do not act justly and fairly, there will be demonstrations and things like that. After all why should a lover of freedom and democracy get so upset? Are these not the usual processes of democracy?<sup>22</sup>

<sup>17</sup> See, for instance, a comment by the Eastern Economist, November 13, 1959, p. 758, about the police force in New Delhi.

<sup>18</sup> Report of the Law Commission, Ch. 34, para. 29-31.

<sup>19</sup> Lok Sabha Debates, May 30, 1956, col. 10059.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., December 22, 1953, Col. 2840.

<sup>21</sup> Times of India, November 23, 1955, p. 5.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., September 3, 1955, p. 5.

<sup>15</sup> Law Commission of India, Fourteenth Report (Ministry of Law, Government of India, 1958), ch. 34, para. 36.

<sup>16</sup> B. N. Mullik, "Police Ethics," Indian Police Journal, October, 1960, pp. 1-10.

In the hands of J. P. Narayan such a comment cannot be dismissed lightly, for it sounds a note which has reverberated in modern political history. In the hands of a less scrupulous opposition such a doctrine can become a powerful cudgel with which to beat the government for any enforcement activities.

The police of India have become the chief whipping boys for all disorders. They can expect little cooperation from the people, and often not even a fair hearing of their case. The Indian Government has ample cause to hesitate before it embarks upon any policy which might augment this appreciable burden of hostility.

The attitude of the mass of Indians toward the judicial system is equally subject to deterioration as a result of government repression. Many Indians, particularly in rural areas, continue to exhibit what Sir Percival Spears has called a "slot machine" attitude toward the court system. The more tradition-minded Indian treats the courts not as a means of resolving disputes, of gaining justice, or of deciding the merits of a case, but as an instrument for getting all he can from a situation and, perhaps, for financially ruining his opponent. Courts become convenient adjuncts to personal vendettas. Furthermore, courts are not thought of as the arbiters of impartial justice or as the primary line of defense against the encroachments of predatory government. Rather, they are collaborators with government in the task of exploitation and control and they should be avoided at all costs. The story is told of the litigant who, when his solicitor triumphantly wired "Justice has prevailed," replied immediately, "Appeal at once."<sup>23</sup> Clearly, then, if government should tighten the laws governing public agitation and administer them more strictly, the courts, like the police, will become a focus of hostility. They will be forced to conform to an already distasteful image.

The Report of the Law Commission noted two disturbing signs in this connection. First, that there is a great reluctance on the part of potential witnesses to appear in court. Second, that perjury has been increasing alarmingly of late. "The sanctity of the oath has almost disappeared and persons seem prepared readily to make false statements on oath in courts of law."<sup>24</sup>

An impartial court system and incorruptible and trusted police force are cornerstones of the system of voluntary social regulation, or regulation by consent, which is the hallmark of democracy. The estrangement of the people from police and judicial systems would represent an ominous portent for the future of modern India.

So far we have noted five possible disadvantages of a policy of limiting coercive public protest: (1) the stoppering of a socially useful or functional response; (2) the weakening of consensus between ruler and ruled; (3) the intensification of the Gandhian martyrdom syndrome; (4) the creation of a tactically advantageous position for the non-democratic political opposition; (5) the alienation of the people from the police and court system. These have one point in common. They work through the responses of the non-participant mass of the people, that is, through those who have played no part in the formulation or implementation of law and order policy. But there may also be negative effects which operate through the participating or ruling elite. I shall name three.

Restriction of coercive public protest impinges directly upon the ability of individuals and groups to dramatize dissident viewpoints and, hence, to affect the course of government policy. The need for some amount of restraint of this process is conceded. At the same time, however, a democratic nation must be quite sure that the rules for the separation of proper from improper protest are clearly formulated and impartially applied. Efforts to discipline the expressions of popular opinion, even for the most unimpeachable reasons, may end in the suppression of all unwanted opinion. Elitism in a country like India exerts a powerful hold over the official mind. Officials are already separated from the masses by a chasm of education, training, and experience. It would be very easy to extend a policy of tutelage in the rules of democratic interaction into one of authoritarian suppression of opposition viewpoints. The task of regulating coercive public protest must not end in the elimination of protest; the purpose of the policy should be the re-canalization of protest. Democratic pedagogy must not become a crutch to elitism.

In any policy of regulation officials should be entirely clear about their aims. The criterion herein adopted has been the creation of the social requisites for democracy. This is a very different goal from, say, yearly increments in per capita income or rate of industrialization. It is not efficiency which is the goal, but the peculiar kind of social interaction known as democracy. India is today straining tensely for economic development. It would be perilously easy to substitute a materialistic development criterion for a political one. The difficulty, then, with any policy of social regulation in India is that the bureaucratic impulse may supplant the pedagogic one.

<sup>23</sup> Statesman, March 7, 1955, editorial, p. 6.

<sup>24</sup> Report of the Law Commission, ch. 40, para. 1.

Another risk is implicit in any attempt to limit the scope of political persuasion. The very nature of the task, namely, the inculcation of an understanding of the bounds of propriety in a democracy, suggests that any policy which places reserves of power in the hands of government will be less firmly restrained than in well established democratic states. The inertial conservatism of the people of the United States and England, trained for generations in democracy, causes the political system, when unbalanced, to return as a rule to the familiar ways. In India the familiar ways are not democratic. The society's homeostatic mechanism, whatever it is, will not impel the society back to an anterior democratic condition. Cures to any problem which require the concentration of large amounts of power in a few hands are less likely to be voluntarily relinquished when the moment of crisis is past.

Habituation to power, therefore, may be a destructive after-effect of controlling tightly the various forms of political protest so popular in contemporary India. This tendency among the agents of governmental authority may operate the more freely because of the relative absence of institutionalized countervailing forces. A return to the status quo ante, with regard to accretions of governmental power, would be more dependent upon the character, restraint, and commitment to democratic ideals of India's leaders than would need to be the case in long-established democratic countries.

A policy of social control may, therefore, by the manner of its impingement upon the ruling coalition buttress existing tendencies toward (1) elitist isolation, (2) the pre-eminence of exclusively materialist developmental goals, and (3) authoritarianism.

It should by now be clear that in designing policies for the regulation of coercive social protest, whether exacting or permissive, the Indian Government must steer between Scylla and Charybdis. There are grave dangers implicit in a too rigorous adherence to the letter of the democratic blueprint, and also grave dangers in disregarding portions of it. Decisions should not rest upon theoretical considerations alone. Dogmatic suppression of all forms of illegal, or even violent, protest might well be as damaging to the long-term prospects of democracy as an unperceptive lack of concern. Not doctrinal purity, but pragmatic viability within a framework of ideals, should be the guiding concern.

COMMUNICATIONS

EXPERIMENTAL APPROACHES TO VOTE-COUNTING THEORY IN NOMINATING CHOICE

TO THE EDITOR:

Professor William H. Riker's essay on "Voting and the Summation of Preferences" (this REVIEW, Vol. 55, December 1961, pp. 900-11) is a most useful contribution. It needs to be supplemented by some comment on the applicability of this material in the field of nominating choice; also on the applicability of experimental approaches to ascertain the frequency with which the problems that concern Riker may in fact occur in nature.

The best-known elections in the United States in which a choice among three or more alternatives is likely to occur are those involved in making party nominations. In either one party or the other, almost every presidential year has seen three or more candidates competing for a presidential nomination. Situations involving as many as six or seven candidates have been relatively common in state primaries, as for example those involving the gubernatorial candidates in Alabama and Texas in 1962.

If the work by Duncan Black and his predecessors to which Riker calls attention had been known fifty years ago, the evolution of primary elections in this country might conceivably have taken a somewhat different form. Black seems, in fact, to have produced a fundamental discovery showing why either plurality choice without a majority, or a run-off between the two leading first-choice candidates, can easily result in the selection of the "wrong" candidate if the candidate or candidates at the center of the spectrum happen to be weakest in first-choice strength, although strong in second- or third-choice strength—an event which one could suppose must be relatively common.

A simple illustration of a familiar kind will make the point. Suppose three candidates, A, B, and C, of whom A and C are leading, but are strongly opposed to each other. The supporters of each reject the other, but would be willing to accept B, the man in the middle. In this case, the distribution of the voters in terms of their preference orders might be about as follows:

Preference	Per Cent of Voters
	40	15	10	35
1st	A	B	B	C
2d	B	A	C	B
3d	C	C	A	A

Black argues that in such a case, that candidate should be chosen who could defeat each of the others when paired against them one at a time, as B could do in the present case. Yet B would be defeated in any primary election decided on the basis of an initial plurality or of a run-off between the two first-choice leaders. Such a plurality defeat is exactly what happened to Governor Thomas E. Dewey in the 1948 Wisconsin primary, when the Republican vote divided Stassen 40 per cent, Dewey 24, and MacArthur 36—a situation, moreover, in which Dewey was undoubtedly the candidate of the center and could probably have defeated either of his opponents in a two-way test.

We used Blacks' work to some extent in The Politics of National Party Conventions (p. 315, n. 24, and p. 489, n. 7), but if it had come to our attention sooner and we had assimilated it more fully, our treatment of the alternative vote and of the hazards of plurality voting would have been somewhat different. In a more recent study, I applied Black's criterion directly in attempting to assess the results of the Democratic convention of 1960, and concluded, on the basis of the Gallup poll data, that Kennedy probably could have defeated each of the other candidates in a two-way test and could therefore be regarded as a majority choice of his party (David et al, The Presidential Election and Transition 1960-61, pp. 18-19). In this particular instance, there was no evidence of nontransitivity of social choice. The "Arrow problem" to which Riker devotes so much attention apparently did not arise, although on a priori grounds, the situation was especially conducive to nontransitivity because of the cross-cutting effect of the religious issue.

The Arrow problem is so intriguing intellectually that it is easy to overlook the paucity of empirical data demonstrating cases in which it actually occurred, despite the extensive discussion the problem has received over a ten-year period. If I understand Riker's essay correctly, he does not cite a single case of nontransitivity of social choice in an actual situation involving real people, although he refers at pages 909-910 to various types of experimental work leading to somewhat conflicting results. Gordon Tullock of the University of Virginia, co-author with James M. Buchanan of The Calculus of Consent (1962), tells me that he not is aware of any documented cases in the literature, and furthermore seems to be in at least partial disagreement with Riker on the frequency with which such cases might be expected if there were enough experimental work to provide a basis for a conclusion. On a priori grounds arising out of theories of his own, Tullock believes that actual cases would be quite infrequent in situations involving only three or four alternatives, although they would occur; while Riker seems to think they might occur rather often.

The subject is one that lends itself readily to classroom experimentation, as well as to use of sample surveys; and the problems involved in a simple lack of majority preference on a first-choice basis will always be important, whatever happens to the Arrow problem. In hopes of finding a factual example of nontransitivity on a legislative issue, as well as other potential results, I made up a ballot offering three alternatives, as follows:

- A. Federal aid for public schools only
- B. Federal aid for public and private (including parochial) schools
- C. No federal aid for either schools

Each respondent was also asked to indicate whether he considered himself a Democrat, Neutral, or Republican.

This ballot was presented to a class in an introductory course in government and 68 usable ballots were obtained. The party split proved to be 24-D, 21-N, and 23-R. The numbers of students in the total group voting each preference order were as follows:

32	11	12	1	11	1
A	A	B	B	C	C
B	C	A	C	A	B
C	B	C	A	B	A

Policy A was thus a heavy majority preference on a first-choice basis, with 43 votes to 13 for B and 12 for C. Policy A was also the majority first-choice for each party group counted separately, although most of the minorities who preferred Policy B as their first choice were Democrats and most of those who preferred Policy C as their first choice were Republicans. Nothing approaching nontransitivity of choice could be found by taking any of these groups separately. Repeated further use of this ballot with other and varying types of groups might find some actual case of nontransitivity, but it doesn't look as easy as it did before the first attempt was made.

A similar experiment was made with a ballot offering four potential candidates for the Republican presidential nomination of 1964, namely, Nelson Rockefeller, Richard Nixon, George Romney, and Barry Goldwater. With four candidates, 24 different preference orders are possible. In a group of 70 usable ballots, 21 of these possibilities occurred at least once, 16 at least twice, and 10 at least three times; hence only summaries of the voting can be presented. The preference distributions were as follows:

Preference	Rockefeller	Nixon	Romney	Goldwater
1st	26	18	6	20
2d	21	24	16	9
3d	11	18	29	12
4th	12	10	19	29

In this group, no one had a majority as either first choice or last choice. Rockefeller would have been the winner on a first-choice plurality basis; a run-off would have occurred between Rockefeller and Goldwater. In this group, Rockefeller would win the run-off by 41 to 29—assuming no vote-shifting—and in this case a run-off would also produce the "correct" outcome, since Rockefeller could defeat each of the other candidates in a two-way race. Nixon, however, would have defeated Goldwater in a two-way race, 42 to 28, and it could be argued that if there is to be a run-off, it should take place between Rockefeller and Nixon rather than Rockefeller and Goldwater. On a Borda count according to the method of marks (see Black), by which 3 marks are given for each first choice, 2 for each second choice, 1 for each third choice, and 0 for each fourth or last choice, Rockefeller's count was 131, Nixon's 120, Goldwater's 90, and Romney's 79. In a two-way race, however, Romney would have defeated Goldwater by 37 to 33.

The results just given for outcomes in the various two-way combinations were derived from the original counting chart, set up as a series of tree diagrams in which each of the four first-choice possibilities is followed by its three second-choice possibilities, those in turn by their two third-choice possibilities, and those in turn by the corresponding fourth-choice possibilities. Use of such a chart greatly facilitates the original ballot counting and thereafter makes it possible to assemble results on any desired basis with a minimum of retabulation.

When the 23 Republican ballots in this group were tabulated separately, the preference distributions were as follows:

Preference	Rockefeller	Nixon	Romney	Goldwater
1st	5	7	2	9
2d	7	8	6	2
3d	5	4	9	5
4th	6	4	6	7

In this group, again no one has a first-choice majority, but Goldwater would be the winner on a plurality basis. In a run-off, however, Nixon would have his chance and would defeat Goldwater 13 to 10. On a two-way basis, Nixon defeats each of the other candidates, Goldwater defeats Rockefeller and Romney, and Rockefeller defeats Romney; there is no evidence of nontransitivity. The Borda count is Nixon 41, Goldwater 36, Rockefeller 34, and Romney 27.

The four candidates were arranged from left to right in the previous tabulations on the basis of commonly held opinions about their positions in relation to each other. The voting distributions on the tree diagrams, however, provide empirical evidence for an ordering in which Rockefeller and Goldwater occupy the polar positions, with Nixon nearest to Rockefeller and Romney nearest to Goldwater. Evidences of these relationships are apparent in all the diagrams, but especially in those for the 23 Republican voters, where Nixon was the second choice of all the Rockefeller voters, Romney was the principal second choice of the Goldwater voters, and Rockefeller was the second choice of most of the Nixon voters. Goldwater and Romney divided the last choice positions for the Rockefeller and Nixon voters, while Rockefeller and Nixon performed this office for the Goldwater and Romney voters. All of this suggests that the actual voting results can be used to array a group of candidates along a spectrum in the absence of other evidence, if the voting process provides a complete array of preference data, as it could at least in classroom experiments or sample surveys.

These experiments have been reported in part because the results have some intrinsic interest, but primarily to illustrate a method of experimentation that can be used either in the classroom or in sample surveys. This in turn suggests a number of conclusions of some potential interest to the profession:

1. An experimental method is available to demonstrate to students the complexity of preference structures in situations of multiple alternatives. Such properties of opinion as conflict and consensus or the lack of it can be studied. With the addition of other scaling devices, intensity could also be studied.

2. Used repeatedly, such experiments could be used to demonstrate some of the other properties of opinion, notably stability, instability, and latency—properties of special importance in the development of a presidential nominating choice.

3. Such experiments can be used to demonstrate the difficulties inherent in arriving at valid majority decisions in situations involving a choice among multiple alternatives of candidates or policies. This is the classic problem of the national party conventions and of any primary election where there has been no effective pre-election screening of the candidates.

4. Sample surveys along these lines, used effectively with adequate publication of the results, could do much to create a more informed public opinion in situations involving multiple alternatives, including preconvention proceedings on presidential nominations and primary elections in states where multiple candidacies are typical.

5. If some method of accumulating the results can be devised, it would be possible to obtain empirical answers to at least three questions on which answers are needed, namely, (a) whether existing primary election systems involving mere plurality choice or a run-off tend frequently to select nominees who are not in fact the majority choice of their party on any basis; (b) whether such systems tend to select from the extremes more often than from the center in situations of multiple candidacies, as Black implies at page 75 of his book; and (c) whether the problem of non-transitivity of social choice exists in nature with sufficient frequency to deserve consideration in the design of electoral systems.

6. In future election years, substantial research funds could appropriately be invested in sample surveys during the intervals preceding the holding of primary elections in a considerable number of situations involving multiple candidacies. It would be desirable to pre-test situations involving three or more candidates that will be settled by a plurality as well as those that will be settled by a run-off. Sample surveys in as many as fifteen or twenty primary election situations in the same year could do much to clear up the questions raised in the preceding paragraph.

7. Finally, after the steps indicated, presumably it would be possible to develop a vote-counting theory in nominating choice, as well as an improved system for holding primary elections, that would not only rest on a sounder empirical foundation than is presently available, but could be understood by teachers, students, and opinion leaders after it had been produced.

If it is true that the existing plurality and run-off systems select from the extremes more often than from the center in situations of multiple candidacies, as Black's theories suggest, the result may be a type of instability or of adverse selection that complicates any movement toward a more effective two-party system in states where multiple candidacies are common. On the other hand, it is probably one of the virtues of the national conventions that they tend to move toward the center of each party in the search for a presidential candidate who can be nominated. The reasons why this is both true and necessary can probably be demonstrated if the appropriate kind of sample survey evidence is obtained in future years; and classroom experiments may be useful for the same purpose in the meantime. At any rate, an exploration of Black's theories has tended to confirm my own faith in the national convention system of presidential nominations.<sup>1</sup>

PAUL T. DAVID

University of Virginia

<sup>1</sup> An article of mine on the presidential nominating process, in the Spring 1962 issue of Law and Contemporary Problems, deals more fully with some applications of the notions discussed here.

ON BRZEZINSKI'S USE OF HISTORY

TO THE EDITOR:

May I comment on some aspects of the article on "Deviation Control" in your March issue?

Since differences in organizational purposes may condition methods of action and the kind of organizational unity that is required, I question whether "the most vital and distinctive aspect of the activities of the Church," the "spiritual" aspect "which defines its unique character," "can be altogether excluded from consideration" in a discussion of tactics toward deviation. The role of concentrated force, the rationale of command and obedience, the methods through which cohesion is best attained may very well differ for an organization that hopes to achieve an external remodeling of institutions, through revolutionary seizures of power and through techniques of control preceding general consent, and for an organization that conceives its goal as a continually repeated process, inherently uncoercible, occurring within individual men. The Church has always been aware that diverse and spontaneous movements of thought and action initiated by persons apart from the hierarchy have been a major factor in its success (insistence on conformity of thought and method would have decimated the roster of saints—eliminating Aquinas, among others). As a matter of historical fact, the conditions within which the Church developed gave it no chance to become "a single homogeneous unit" in which "the center" could exercise a degree of control remotely comparable to that of Stalin in the Party. Both its purposes and its possibilities have required it to depend heavily on persuasion, reasoning, tradition, the rule of law, and diplomatic compromise; it has always had to combine an insistence on some fixed principles and procedures with an acceptance of a considerable degree of internal diversity and autonomy, open debate, and unresolved disagreement. Thus the conception of organizational unity within which issues of deviation are to be considered has never, I suggest, been the same for the Church as for the Party.

Moreover, the relation of doctrine to action differs for the two institutions. The dogmas on which the Church insists do not purport to be determinative of organizational policy in relation to the course of history; they deal with relationships presumed to be invariable; and the maintenance of the faith, believed to be divinely revealed, is itself an intrinsic part of the Church's goal. The concrete applications of the faith to moral conduct and organizational action are understood to be to some degree contingent on shifting circumstance, open to dispute, and subject to merely positive determination; but wherever conceptions of the ultimate, invariable relations of God and man are at issue, the Church is inherently committed to seek consistency and to insist on conformity. In principle, this means that the condemnation of a statement clearly incompatible with dogma already defined can not properly be subordinated to any tactical consideration; to suggest that the Church could maintain its unity through ignoring such a deviation is to suggest that it should abandon what it has always conceived to be its role. But the authoritative definition of doctrines not yet clearly defined must necessarily proceed with great caution and take into account the system of previous commitments and the consensus—or lack of consensus—of theologians. These distinctions, I suggest, are highly relevant to the cases of deviation that Professor Brzezinski treats.

Descending from principle to historical fact, I would also suggest that the Church's policies have always been conditioned by some major differences between its relations with other systems of power and those of the Party. It has never controlled much of the world's physical force; its economic resources have always been widely dispersed and hard to protect from the acquisitive interests of outsiders; there is a measurable difference between the Soviet Union and the Papal States as a base of operations and a concern of policy. Thus the activity of the Church has been generally dependent on a policy of peaceful co-existence; and, since the nature of its goals does not commit it to an ultimate antagonism to any system of political and economic organization as such, it has a superior capacity for compromise and stable alliance with other centers of power. Such alliances may compensate for, but do not abolish, its intrinsic vulnerability; in practice, such alliances have often been very entangling; and, obviously, the exact state of its relations with other forces at any given moment of history may be highly significant for the prospects of "deviation control."

Aside from these basic differences between the Church and the Party, other differences apply to the Church on the eve of the Reformation. Professor Brzezinski's summary of the Church as, like the Party, a proselytizing and "expansion-oriented" institution, in which "the success of any one unit of the movement" is "the source of satisfaction to the entire membership," is strikingly inappropriate to the Church of that period. It had then, as has often been observed, the characteristic pattern of an ancien régime. Except in Spain (and there, under monarchic impetus), it was not proselytizing nor oriented toward expansion. Its various institutional units (including the papacy) were engaged, with considerable mutual jealousy, in the pursuit of particularist interests to a degree that effectively prevented concerted action on the common problems commonly recognized as serious: internal corruption, the century-old Hussite heresy, the advance of the Turks. Its financial resources were under strain, maldistributed, and very noticeably often misspent for non-organizational purposes. Powers once demanded as essential to its operation—especially, control over the appointment of its own officers—had been, in large areas, relinquished. Its officials (including incumbents of the papacy) were too often ill-suited to and uninterested in the organizational functions and insensitive to new movements of public opinion. The trahison des clercs was well under way; popular respect for the élite was at an all-time low. Reform movements were still rudimentary. Is the problem of deviation in an ancien régime comparable to the problem of deviation in a revolutionary movement on the make? Early Protestantism could perhaps have provided case-histories somewhat comparable with the case of Titoism; but if one must seek a twentieth-century analogy to the situation of the sixteenth-century Church, some of the dilemmas of "capitalistic democracy" are at least as relevant as those of international Communism.

Aside from my distrust of Professor Brzezinski's premises, I am bewildered by his presentation of the case of Luther and the inferences he draws from it. I should have expected an assessment of tactics toward a doctrinal deviant to be based on a careful examination of available alternatives in the light of the total situation at the time: the immediate pattern of interests, purposes, antagonisms, loyalties; the immediate and potential resources of the organization and the deviant, including their immediate and potential allies; the content of the deviant doctrine, its implications, its compatibility or incompatibility with previous commitments, its potential appeal to others. Professor Brzezinski's résumé of factors that had in the remote past been useful to organizational unity and papal leadership is no substitute for an analysis of the instruments available in 1517. The Crusades and the military orders are as irrelevant to consideration of Leo X versus Luther as Danegeld and the Domesday Survey would be to consideration of the Stuarts versus Parliament. The mendicant orders and the universities were not the assets they once had been; one could plausibly argue that they had become liabilities. One wonders why Professor Brzezinski explains the theory of episcopal equality rather than the current theory and status of conciliarism; why he ignores such a vitally relevant topic as the current structure of ecclesiastical finance; why, disregarding the effects of the concordats and their English equivalents, he supposes that the transformation of the Church into a composite of national units was occurring only "underneath the surface" (and why he regards this as analogous to a transformation in the Communist Party, whose officers, I believe, have not yet been appointed by fellow-travelers); why, except for a vague allusion to "national power" (the Elector of Saxony?), he has nothing to say about the religious, political, economic, and intellectual situation in Germany.

His conception of the late-medieval Inquisition as an instrument of papal control and a parallel to the Stalinist purges is remarkable. Control of the Spanish Inquisition had been ceded to Ferdinand; it was an instrument of national unification and of reforming piety. Elsewhere, pre-Reformation applications of the Inquisition were typically sporadic and haphazard, largely dominated by local antagonisms, fears, and avarice, or by the local Inquisitor's professional zeal, and dependent on the collaboration of secular government. (Incidentally, there was an authentic campaign against witchcraft as such.) Professor Brzezinski's assurance that the Inquisition "doubtless" increased papal power is oddly at variance with the actual preoccupations of the Renaissance popes, notably tolerant of free-thinking and not greatly concerned with general leadership in the Church, which they regarded chiefly as the source of certain kinds of income to be spent on the local projects in which they were engrossed. Sixtus IV, in fact, had been willing to jeopardize the universal role of the papacy to transform it into an hereditary monarchy in the Papal States; this abortive project was not, I must add, an ecclesiastical version of "socialism in one country." Professor Brzezinski's summary of the Stalinist spiral ("the result of the purges was a further concentration of power at the center. The fear of violence intensified the violence, and the violence . . . intensified the fear") scarcely applies to the pre-Reformation Church, in which the ultramontane influence of the papacy was diminishing and was exerted largely through financial and political deals; in which doctrinal debate was carried on with more than usual freedom, and widespread, devastating criticism of every facet of the organization, including the papacy, went on unchecked; in which the most important interplay of fear and violence was connected with the activities of quite unpurgeable armies in Italy.

The Lutheran movement was not, of course, "the first major crisis of unity" that the Church had faced. It had struggled for centuries with Arianism; it was still vainly attempting to heal the centuries-old schism of East and West; it had successfully dealt with widespread popular heresies through a major effort requiring a variety of techniques; more recently, it had resolved a quarter-century schism, but was still unable to muster up sufficient resources of force or persuasion to counter the Hussite heresy. Moreover, when Luther first attracted notice, no one imagined that his theological statements, neither novel nor clearly heretical, would lead to "a crisis of unity"; his main teachings had been expressed a few years earlier by the French theologian, Lefèvre d'Étaples, with no effect on the popular mind. And, as between Luther and Friar Tetzl, it was Tetzl who talked heresy. Initiative in opposition to Luther did not come from "the center" (that easy-going connoisseur, Leo X, scarcely fits the role of Stalin), but from the Archbishop of Mainz and the Dominicans, whose zeal to get Luther silenced was directly motivated by his effect on their lucrative racket. Leo X had to be prodded into taking an interest in what he originally, and with fifty per cent accuracy, regarded as a "squabble of monks." Far from "precipitously" following a routine technique with Luther, Leo, bedeviled by conflicting pressures, had great difficulty in making up his mind what to do about him; the order of arrest of August, 1518 (based on an indictment, not a judgment) followed months of indecision and was quickly withdrawn; the subsequent prolongation of debate, which gave Luther wider publicity and assisted him to clarify his thoughts, was partly due to the influence of his various defenders, partly to the difficulty of catching him in any statement that could with assurance be "branded heretical," and partly to some political strategy with regard to the imperial election, which Leo, unlike Professor Brzezinski, considered worth taking into account.

Granting that the tactics adopted were unsuccessful, I remain unimpressed by the alternatives Professor Brzezinski proposes. His suggestion of a "quiet liquidation" of Luther, without "personalizing the conflict (!)," with a subsequent "open condemnation" (by whom?) "of the improper views" (which?) is quite enchanting, but not quite convincing. I assume that Professor Brzezinski does not mean that preventative assassination of every critic who might later have become a heretic or schismatic should have been adopted as a general Reformation-averting policy: aside from the sizable administrative difficulties it would have entailed, and some incompatibility with the Church's professed goals and habitual procedures, such a wholesale assault on the population of Europe could scarcely have been kept quiet and might, indeed, have contributed to the result it aimed to prevent. Assuming that he contemplates the preventative assassination of Luther only, I can only inquire how anyone could possibly have known, before the debate developed, that it would be Luther's "improper views," rather than those of numerous other people, that would spark an explosion—especially as no one had reason to think that an explosion was imminent. His alternative recommendation, that Luther should have been "ignored," may seem superficially more feasible; however, even if "the center" had "refused to engage in open debate," it could not possibly have silenced other debaters (I suspect that Professor Brzezinski is visualizing the Stalinist dictatorship rather than the pre-Reformation Church); and if Luther's views had developed under this stimulus, could the pope have continued to ignore them? Professor Brzezinski's confidence that, if Luther could have been eliminated or ignored, the Protestant split would probably have been averted is gratuitous. It tacitly assumes a number of highly controversial theses—about the causes of the Reformation, the indispensability of Luther's role, his mental processes, the reasons for his influence, the potentialities of alternative movements—that can not be taken for granted in this fashion. There is a mass of historical discussion on the difficult questions that Professor Brzezinski glides over here; apparently he is unfamiliar with the literature on the topic and unaware of the terms in which the discussion is, and must be, carried on.

The fact that Jansenism was successfully contained by somewhat different tactics is no indication that these tactics could have been successfully applied to Lutheranism. Professor Brzezinski's analysis ignores significant differences in the situations in which these two doctrinally somewhat similar movements appeared—differences that undermined the potential appeal of Jansenism, regardless of the tactics used. France was not Germany, with its special problems and frustrations; Jansenism lacked the significant political and economic connotations associated with Luther's religious teachings; the French kings had long since been entrenched, through generally satisfactory concordats with the papacy, in ecclesiastical rights that German princes gained only by going Protestant; even at the height of Reformation fervor, Calvinism had captured only a fraction of Frenchmen and, in the seventeenth century, the Huguenots were declining in numbers and zeal. Moreover, Lutheranism and Jansenism are separated by a period in which, unobserved by Professor Brzezinski, the Catholic Church had successfully remodelled and tightened its organization, cleaned up its scandals, rearranged its budget, improved the quality of its personnel, clarified many of its doctrines, developed new techniques of control and persuasion to fit the needs and temper of the time, regained the respect of its continuing members, intensified their religious earnestness, and embarked, with notable success in France and elsewhere, on a program of proselytization and expansion. (It had, one might say, adapted itself to the Cold War through ecclesiastical equivalents to, e.g., the Dennis Case, NATO, the Common Market, and the Ford Foundation.)

Professor Brzezinski's thesis that experience with Luther had made the Church "deviation-conscious" and thus prepared it for a more moderate handling of the Jansenist problem slides over the fact that the Church had met many cases of "deviation" since the time of Luther and handled them in various ways, though usually with greater decisiveness and harshness rather than greater moderation. His account of the Jansenist controversy is distorted by his failure to notice that the Gallicanism of the French episcopacy and that of the French monarchy were by no means identical nor even, usually, allied; that the papal treatment of Jansenism was conditioned by several considerations besides a hope to keep the Jansenists in the fold; that when the Jansenists focussed their attacks on the Jesuits they quite accurately selected their actual opponent; that the French monarchy (i.e., in effect, Richelieu, Mazarin, and Louis XIV) was actively anti-Jansenist; that Mazarin and Louis XIV were, in fact, instigators of repeated attempts to secure more thorough-going papal condemnations. The chance that "France might be lost" had its roots, not in Jansenism, but in episcopal Gallicanism—which actually "became defiance" as a result of Innocent XI's intransigence on the quite undocctrinal issue of the régale, which temporarily allied the king and the Gallican bishops. The schismatic movement, however, quickly collapsed, since Louis had been playing for a limited objective and was thoroughly averse to heading a schismatic and potentially anti-monarchic church. There is no reason to think that Jansenist defiance could ever have had a greater effect.

Historical comparison can be valuable, but it is always dangerous—history is so annoyingly specific. I have argued that Professor Brzezinski's analogies and inferences are based on some serious misconceptions of the situations that he discusses. I have not commented on some incidental errors, not crucial to his theses.

EWART LEWIS

berlin, Ohio

ON METHOD, ANALOGY, AND DETERMINISM

TO THE EDITOR:

Much, if not all, of the disagreement between Mrs. Lewis and myself involves ways of looking at the world, of approach and method. She is concerned with making certain that the immensely complex pattern of reality is not distorted or oversimplified by theoretical analysis. I am concerned lest this admittedly complex reality does not obstruct entirely any theoretical analysis or suggestive generalizations.

Thus in comparing the Church and the Party it is not sufficient merely to list a series of factual parallels or differences. It is also essential to compare the two organizations in terms of their dynamic relationship to the world around them, the degree of homogeneity and doctrinal commitment relative to that world in different times, and not just one organization with the other. In this connection, two simple definitions are in order: "Analogy: A relation of likeness between two things or of one thing to or with another, consisting in the resemblance not of the things themselves but of two or more attributes, circumstances, or effects"; "Identity: Sameness of essential character. Sameness in all that constitutes the objective reality of a thing; self-sameness; oneness." (Webster Collegiate Dictionary, 1946, italics in original.)

Mrs. Lewis' comments, sometimes quite acute, might have been a great deal more relevant had she been more observant of these distinctions. Unfortunately, she did not. Thus much of her effort to prove that the Catholic Church is not the Communist Party is superfluous. I agree that it is not. However, to prove that it is not (i.e., non-identity) is not to prove that there are no pertinent resemblances in orientation, function and organization (i.e., analogy). To assert simply that there were, and are, significant differences, or that the Church's "conception" of unity "has never . . . been the same" as for the Party, or that the Papacy did not have the same power as Stalin, is to suggest that the only basis for making comparisons is a complete identity in experience and behavior, which is simply bad logic for then there would be nothing to compare.

Furthermore, my purpose was not merely to describe a certain similarity in events or patterns although I am pleased that Mrs. Lewis' delightfully specific historical treatise does not shake the factual basis of my effort. I was concerned with attempting some generalizations concerning deviation-control on the basis of the analogous organizational experience of two international, doctrinal movements which are

"action-oriented." Mrs. Lewis, in her effort to demonstrate what appeared to me to be obvious differences between the Church and the Communist Party, may or may not be right when she states categorically that the Church conceived its "goal as . . . inherently uncoercible" but the fact is that coercion was used; and it was with organizational behavior, and its consequences, that I was concerned. It is also quite true that in the time under discussion the Church was not actively engaged in proselytization. I did not say it was. However, it did before and after the period under discussion; at a certain stage the Communist movement also was not actively proselytizing or expanding. That, however, does not prove that either movement is not "inherently committed to proselytization" and extra ecclesiam, nulla salus was taken literally for a long time, with certain operational consequences. (Incidentally, Mrs. Lewis' description of the inner decay of the Church on the eve of the unity-crisis bears striking resemblance—I hope she will forgive me—to the inner corruption of the Kremlin in the years 1945–1948, so well described by Džilas in his recent Conversations with Stalin.)

Her defense of the Inquisition as an instrument of "reforming piety" is quaint although not central to the issue at hand. (From the point of view of the orthodox Stalinist, the purge was also a "reforming" instrument of purification.) However, even her generous version of it does not contradict the proposition that its effect was the dogmatization of the movement and centripetal political pressure. Furthermore, in her effort to depict the late medieval Church as a pluralist, tolerant community of prayerful pacifists practising "open debate and unresolved disagreement," Mrs. Lewis ignores such minor details as the burning of John Huss and Jerome of Prague by the Council of Constance or the little military expedition led by Cardinal Cesarini, the Papal legate, to suppress the deviants in Bohemia. Nor were the Crusades as anachronistic to Papal Power as she alleges; as late as 1459 Pius II organized a Congress of European princes in order to prepare one.

Mrs. Lewis is somewhat too hasty in alleging that I consider the factors which made for the growth of Papal power to be the factors of power available to the Papacy for dealing with Luther. They were not. In the course of a very brief summary I had no intention of exploring all the ramifications of the relationship between the Papacy and Luther—as I also did not when dealing with the Stalin-Tito conflict. Instead, I wished to point to certain specific errors of judgment in the center's handling of the crisis. That Luther was not taken seriously in the beginning is quite true but it is not much of an argument. Neither was Tito—but so what? Her subsequent comments, designed to demonstrate that other means also would not have been very effective (although she does find the thought of assassinating Luther “enchanting”) strongly imply that the Reformation was inevitable, irrespective of what the Papacy did with regard to Luther. Contrary to this rigid notion, H. Jedin in his authoritative A History of the Council of Trent indicates clearly that errors in handling Luther were of some importance. I suppose a determinist could argue that National Communism was inevitable, irrespective of Stalin's handling of Tito. Determinists have always the advantage of arguing backwards from events which did happen, but that does not necessarily establish the true causes of the events or the degree of probability of alternatives.

Contrary to Mrs. Lewis, the Luther case was “the first major crisis of unity” which the Church, as the type of doctrinal, international organization defined in my paper, had faced. So was Tito with respect to the Communist movement, irrespective of Trotsky, Bukharin, the Mensheviks, etc. Conceding Mrs. Lewis' superior knowledge of medieval history (which with justification she explicitly stresses) I am not unaware of Arianism, the East-West schism, etc. My point is that both Christianity and Communism have experienced organizational transformations in relationship to new forms of social-political organization as well as their own expansion.

Lastly, Mrs. Lewis' argument that the Church was more effective against Jansenism because it “had successfully remodeled and tightened its organization . . . clarified many of its doctrines, developed new techniques of control and persuasion . . .” etc., simply elaborates some of my own points. (Mrs. Lewis describes these as “ecclesiastical equivalents to, e.g., the Dennis Case, NATO, the Common Market, and The Ford Foundation.” Might we have avoided our disagreement had I used the word “equivalent” instead of analogy?) The Church had learned its lesson, it became more effective, finally it succeeded. However, here too, Mrs. Lewis falls victim to a propensity to substitute determinism for explanation. Thus in a curious contradiction to her perfectly sound and apt observations cited above, Mrs. Lewis concludes by flatly asserting that “There is no reason to think that Jansenist defiance could ever have had a greater effect.” Either her first point quoted above is quite irrelevant or her second quote is quite untrue.

To sum up: Mrs. Lewis' criticism suffers from a confusion of analogy with identity which makes it difficult for her to understand a comparative study; from a consequent misunderstanding of my purpose, which was to generalize some principles of deviation-control and not merely to establish factually descriptive symmetry; and from implicit determinism.

ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI

Columbia University

TO THE EDITOR:

I agree with Professor Brzezinski that the difference between us is partly one of approach and method. But may I restate that difference? There are of course no identities in history; but I would argue that cause-and-effect conclusions drawn from a comparison of non-identical historical situations can be safely made only if one examines, for each instance, the differences as carefully as the resemblances. How otherwise can one know whether the differences were not crucial to the outcome? And if one does not examine equally the context of differences, how can one be sure that what appear to be similarities are really similar?—My position is certainly “determinist,” in the sense that I am accustomed to think that historical processes are determined by the interplay of many factors, and that I can conceive of no way to establish what might have been the effect of changing any single factor except through examining its role in relation to the whole situational context. I consider it debatable whether a different tactic toward Luther could have averted the Protestant Reformation; I see no reason to believe that Jansenism, however defiant, could ever have induced the splitting off of the French church; but I think that the burden of proof is on Professor Brzezinski, and that he has failed to shoulder it.

But our difference is also, I think, a dispute on questions of fact; we apparently disagree widely as to the analogies between the Church and the Party “in terms of their dynamic relationship to the world around them, the degree of homogeneity and doctrinal commitment relative to that world,” in the periods under consideration. It was, I thought, precisely from this viewpoint that I criticized Professor Brzezinski's opinions about the state of the Church on the eve of the Reformation; and an assessment of “the dynamic relationship” of the seventeenth-century Church “to the world around it” seems to me rather significantly affeeted by our differences of opinion as to whether it was still "seeking new formulae for doctrinal and organizational unity" or had already found them; whether its post-Reformation adjustments had tended toward less or greater doctrinal rigidity; and what was the actual posture of "the most influential Catholic monarchy in Europe."

Two specific points in his reply require some comment. I apologize to him for having misinterpreted his phrase, "its first major crisis of unity." His assumption that the stages of Church and Party history can be made comparable through the use of extremely different time-scales confused me; and, since the Church had been, in many important respects, "a composite of nationally-based units" ever since the break-up of the Roman Empire and the conversion of the barbarian kingdoms, I failed—and still fail—to understand where in its history Professor Brzezinski locates an "internationalization" of the Church that both corresponds to the Party's conquests of the states of Central Europe and also enables him to define the case of Luther as a subsequent "first." Second, without any wish to "defend" the Spanish Inquisition, to discover "pacifists" in the pre-Reformation Church, or to ignore the burning of Huss and the Cesarini expedition, I continue to wonder just how "the power of the center" had been increased by applications of violence that were made by an institution it could not control, were guided by purposes distinct from its own, and that failed to accomplish their intention. The effective "pluralism" of the structure of power in the pre-Reformation Church, the comparative doctrinal tolerance of the Renaissance papacy, and the conspicuous existence of "open debate and unresolved disagreement" are, I believe, commonly recognized features of the Church of this period; it cost me no "effort" to state them.

EWART LEWIS

Oberlin, Ohio

TO THE EDITOR:

While Mrs. Lewis is right that the issue is primarily one of method, her argument that it is incumbent upon me to examine all the similarities and all the differences between the medieval Church and the Communist movement before generalizing about deviation-control is absurd. That she really does not mean it is shown in her listing of several "ecclesiastical equivalents to NATO, the Ford Foundation, etc." without once troubling to point out certain obvious differences. Her request is tantamount to requiring every medical researcher engaged in cancer research on mice for the purpose of discovering a cure for human cancer to qualify any findings by a statement that he realizes that a mouse is not a man, certain organic similarities apart.

For her flat assertion that Lutheranism had to come and Jansenism had to fail, her only argument is the deterministic one that this is how it turned out. My point was to suggest that methods used in handling these crises had some bearing on their outcome. Whether they might have succeeded in preventing a rupture is a matter of speculative judgment, and the demand for "proof" is simply unrealistic.

On the "internationalization" of the Church, my point was and is that this process was connected with the emergence of effective, homogeneous political units with a sense of national identity. Her dating of this process is wrong. Finally, the center's power was both expressed and then maximized by initiatives such as the attempted crusade or the Cesarini expedition, a cumulative process, involving the dynamic interaction of the right to initiative and the consequences of such initiative, quite familiar to students of political power. The reader can judge whether her description of the pre-Reformation Church as tolerant of "open debate and unresolved disagreement," and her reference to the burning of Huss and to the Cesarini expedition against deviants are compatible.

ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI

Columbia University

REJOINDER TO CROPSEY

TO THE EDITOR:

Cropsey in his reply to my article (in the June issue, pp. 353-359) argues that in order to make my case I must refute certain of Strauss's assertions as to the implications of positivism and historicism, viz., that positivism leads logically to historicism and that both positivism and historicism are vitiated by the application of each to itself. This, of course, is neatly to shift the burden of proof. I was only required to demonstrate that Strauss had not made his case. Cropsey deals with my argument concerning the relation between positivism and historicism by ignoring it. However, later in his essay he asserts that I admit the historicist implications of positivism because I refuse to argue that science itself is "more worthy than other pursuits." (p. 356) I still reply, as, indeed, I wrote in my original essay: it is not a contradiction to assert that the method of science is the only way in which to discover truth, and at the same time to recognize that there is nothing in the structure of the universe which justifies acquiring knowledge.<sup>1</sup>

Cropsey also rejects my characterization of Strauss's efforts as an attempt to fuse normative and descriptive judgments. I may misunderstand both Strauss and him here, but the following observations seem in order:

A. The proposition that one cannot describe without evaluating must mean, it seems to me, one of two things. Either it is psychologically impossible to do so, or, given the structure of reality, it is logically impossible to do so. Since, I gather, Strauss is not making a psychological case, he must be developing an ontological argument. To me such an argument involves the fusion by which I characterized it.

B. It is true that Strauss (as I indicated in my original essay) qualifies his argument by the word "important." Again, however, it seems to me that only two alternatives exist. Either it is possible to describe social phenomena without evaluating or it is not. Certainly Strauss offers us no coherent reason for limiting his claim to "important" phenomena only.

C. In his rejoinder Cropsey characterizes Strauss's position as simply that "... judgments of value are not to be excluded from the class of judgments as to fact, and that such judgments as to value cannot be excised from social science without sterilizing it." This argument seems to constitute a retreat from Strauss's original position. However, it does not strengthen his argument, for if judgments of fact and judgments of value are indeed different, although of the same class, it is not impossible on the face of it to make important judgments of fact without making judgments of value.<sup>2</sup>

Cropsey, incidentally, reverses my charge against Strauss and accuses me of confusing moral with other value judgments. Readers can verify this for themselves, but it still seems to me that when Strauss offers as examples of evaluation the terms "noble" and "base" and "prudent" and "imprudent," without distinguishing between them, in an attempt to prove the "objectivity" of value judgments, he is involved in a confusion of some sort.

Next, and most important, Cropsey denies that Strauss has shifted his position as to the dependence of natural right upon classical cosmology. (He does not, incidentally, deny my point as to Strauss's shift from Hobbes to Machiavelli.) His argument here is in two parts. First, he asserts that, in the passage I quote from Natural Right and History, Strauss is merely stating the conventional position, a position which his writing transcends. Second, Cropsey offers some positive arguments to demonstrate that, in fact, natural right is not dependent upon classical physics or classical cosmology.

As to the first, the passage I quoted from Strauss concludes as follows:

The fundamental dilemma, in whose grip we are, is caused by the victory of modern natural science. An adequate solution to the problem of natural right cannot be found before this basic problem has been solved.

Needless to say, the present lectures cannot deal with this problem. They will have to be limited to that aspect of the problem of natural right which can be clarified within the confines of the social sciences.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> It is conceivable that Strauss and Cropsey are merely asserting that social scientists are forced to make judgments of significance. I considered this possibility while writing my original essay but rejected it because, frankly, I regarded such an argument as essentially trivial. No reputable social scientist in the empirical tradition would deny the point, but to use the term "value judgment" so broadly as to include under one rubric both these kinds of judgments and moral judgments proper is to prove one's case by definition and to obscure the issues involved. Particular judgments of significance are compatible with a variety of value systems, as is evidenced by the fact that many people who agree as to the relevant facts still disagree as to which course of action is morally correct in a given situation.

<sup>3</sup> Leo Strauss, Natural Right and History (NRH) (Chicago, 1952), p. 8.

<sup>1</sup> Because I argue that the direction of a scientist's efforts may be determined by his interests or commitments, Cropsey builds up a fanciful case, whereby I am supposed to mistake Nagel's critique of Weber for his critique of Strauss and at the same time really to take Weber's position. Since any comparison of my position with Nagel's will reveal that the two are almost exactly the same, I can be confused on this point only if Nagel is. And the remarks made are only irrelevant to a rounded discussion of the relationship between science and values if one assumes the correctness of Cropsey's position. Compare p. 344 of my essay with pp. 486-7 of N. Nagel, The Structure of Science (New York, 1961).

I defy any reasonable man to take these words as a summary of the views of others.

One can find additional support for my analysis on pages 78-9, 166, and 172 of Natural Right and History, but I should like, at this point, to quote from a review which Strauss wrote for Social Research somewhat earlier (in 1946) and which is reprinted in What Is Political Philosophy? (pp. 284-286). The review is of Anton C. Pegis (ed.), Basic Writings of Saint Thomas Aquinas. Strauss criticizes Pegis's introduction to the volume as follows:

An introduction to the work of Thomas must point the way toward overcoming the typical present-day obstacles which prevent its genuine understanding. These obstacles are the two forces that dominate all present-day thought—science and history. With regard to science Pegis simply capitulates; he grants that there is "much bad science" in Thomas, yet he holds that this does not affect the value of his philosophy. Can one as easily as that get rid of the enormous difficulty presented by the inseparable connection between Thomas' physics and his natural theology? It would have been more fruitful to indicate why and how far the questions raised by Thomist, or Aristotelian, physics retain their full significance regardless of any progress that modern science has achieved by raising questions of an entirely different type.<sup>4</sup>

The passage speaks for itself.

As to the second, Cropsey offers two argu-

<sup>4</sup> It is true that at one place in NRH (not the passage Cropsey cites, but rather a passage on p. 94) Strauss does imply that classic natural right may not be logically related to classical cosmology. However, given the other evidence, all we can assume from this is that Strauss was of two minds on the question. I should say here that in summarizing Strauss's historical discussion I have, in one sense, been unfair. As far as I can determine Strauss's presentation of the views of the classics is in itself a demonstration of the reasonableness of these views, just as the use of the dialogue form in Plato's Republic is, through the example of Socrates, a demonstration of the virtues of philosophy. My failure to summarize the classics (as Strauss views them) in more detail is based on my conviction that no matter how reasonable some of these views seem, the systematic issues are paramount.

Incidentally, Cropsey's remarks as to the relevance of indeterminism (his statement of the principle is incorrect or at least one-sided) to a full discussion of the implications of contemporary physics do not, then, touch on the issues involved.

ments designed to demonstrate that the natural right position does not depend upon classical physics. In the first he tells us that the natural is good essentially because: it simply makes sense to call each thing "excellent" "in the degree to which it can do the things for which its species is naturally equipped." (p. 356) It follows from this that, since man is most naturally defined in terms of reason, both his natural end and his "excellence" are to be defined in these terms.

Of course, most contemporary empiricists would agree that it makes sense to characterize man (in contradistinction to other animals) by his ability to reason. Cropsey's statement of the classical position, then, does not differentiate it clearly from the modern.

The real differences between the classical (and I assume Strauss's) and the modern positions lie (1) in the analysis of what is meant by the word reason, and (2) in the implications of the classification. A definition of man as a reasoning animal does not logically entail the assumption of one "natural end" as against any other unless it can be demonstrated that it is impossible to say anything meaningful about men except in terms of the "natural end" or standard which is accepted. (One can, for example, agree as to the uniqueness of the capacity to reason and argue for an aesthetic life or a life dedicated to the acquisition of power.) I am convinced that Strauss recognizes this, and that his attack on what he calls the reductionism of modern science, and his insistence that neither man nor society can be understood except in terms of its "end," is based on this recognition.

Strauss can demonstrate this assertion in either one of two ways. Either he can argue that contemporary science, contrary to conventional belief, is teleological, or he can argue that while other natural objects can be analyzed non-teleologically man to be understood, must be examined in terms of a "natural end." Strauss does not attempt the first task, and, in fact, Cropsey now denies that he has to do so. The second involves tremendous difficulties, for somehow one must demonstrate that in some decisive way man is different from other natural objects. All that Strauss ever offers us here are remarks about man's reason and conscience. But both "reason" and "conscience" can be dealt with by a social science which (broadly) takes its bearings from natural science.

The second argument involves an attempt by Cropsey to justify understanding provided by "the light of nature." This argument also involves an attack upon the verification principle. The statement that propositions must be capable of empirical verification to be meaningful, Cropsey argues, is not itself an empirical proposition, but rests on certain assumptions. He then suggests "intelligibility" as a criterion for knowledge and offers the example of the "unmoved mover." Cropsey is, of course, careful to disassociate himself from the example which means, presumably, that he cannot be held responsible for it. Let us examine the position and the example anyway.

The assertion that knowledge must be related to observation is much more compelling than any particular empirical proposition. It is implicit in the very definition of knowledge itself. Unless we insist upon this assumption there is no conceivable way of differentiating fact from fantasy, of differentiating "intelligible" little green devils from "intelligible" automobiles. The requirement does not rule out propositions which, it is claimed, may constitute a necessary base for any particular set of statements or, indeed, for all of science. Unfortunately these tend, on the whole, to be extremely difficult to handle in any meaningful way. The assumption of an unmoved mover is neither more nor less self-contradictory than the assumption of a universe infinite in time and space, and neither of these (except for some comforting anthropomorphic elements in the first) is more or less contradictory than the assumption that the universe is its own unmoved mover.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Cropsey asserts that the verification principle rests on the assumption that "to be is to be sensible," and suggests as an alternative the assumption that "to be is to be intelligible." If I understand him correctly the following remarks are in order: First, the statement is simply not true. One may accept the possibility of the existence of objects which, by definition, cannot be "sensed," and still argue that we can only have legitimate knowledge of that which can in some way be related to sense experience. Second, the statement is inaccurate. The principle should be stated as: "to be is to be sensible or capable of being related to things sensed in certain determinate ways." Scientists believed in the existence of atoms before they had observed them or even were sure they could be observed. Third, the dichotomy is a false one. Contemporary empiricists would agree that "to be is to be intelligible," i.e., capable of being related to a general body of knowledge and explained in terms of general scientific laws. The real difference between Cropsey and me lies in our views as to what constitutes "intelligibility." To the contemporary definition, Cropsey would add understanding in terms of some "end" or "essence."

Finally, in my essay I argued that while Strauss cites America as the only country founded on the basis of an anti-Machiavellian tradition, the whole thrust of his analysis is to the effect that the American tradition is based on Locke, and, hence, represents "respectable" Machiavellianism. Cropsey's reply cites Strauss's chapter on Rousseau in Natural Right and History to prove that this interpretation is incorrect. However, there is no evidence in Strauss's writing that he regards Rousseau as having exercised any significant influence on the American experience. Thus, Cropsey's rejoinder is clearly irrelevant. Further, since Rousseau is regarded by Strauss as the source of modern totalitarianism, his remarks actually suggest that Strauss's critique of American values may be even more fundamental than I originally contended.

Just one minor point. Cropsey argues that my characterization of scientists as being motivated by their commitments and interests "incriminates" scientists and social scientists. His point is that by interest I must mean "self-interest." In my use of the term I was thinking primarily of "curiosity," but I accept Cropsey's expansion of it. Only a very sanctimonious person would refuse to admit that scientists and social scientists are motivated, in part, by the desire for professional advancement and recognition, or even by the feeling of power which comes from mastering an element of reality. It is indeed a bloodless morality which denies a role to legitimate self-interest of this type.

STANLEY ROTHMAN

Smith College

TO THE EDITOR:

The exchange between Professors Rothman and Cropsey on "The Revival of Classical Political Philosophy" (June, 1962) turns in one important instance on the well known remarks of Professor Leo Strauss at pp. 7-8 of his Natural Right and History. There Strauss speaks of the "victory," not the successes, of modern natural science. This victory "would seem to have" destroyed the teleological view of the universe, "of which the teleological view of man forms a part." The victory, in turn, poses a "fundamental dilemma": on the one hand men today can accept both a non-teleological moral doctrine and a non-teleological science, or they can accept a teleological moral doctrine and a non-teleological science.

The statement "to be is to be intelligible" in Cropsey's terms requires the existence of such essences or ends.

Here—and this is the only instance if I may say so—I have some sympathy for Professor Rothman. This is not the best example of Strauss's clarity nor is there anything "perfectly obvious" about the position he adopts. Cropsey might better honor his mentor by acknowledging that the latter's work is not free of difficulties. And whether Cropsey would want to say so or not, I should venture to suggest that these difficulties stem essentially from the fact that Strauss has not worked out a metaphysics for himself. Indeed, this is the fundamental distinction between him and the "Thomists."

Finally, Cropsey should be aware that

"Thomists" (they are not Straussians, after all) do not find themselves impaled on the "teleological moral doctrine"—"non-teleological science" horns of Strauss's dilemma. The exclusion of finality from the considerations of modern science is a "methodological requirement" of modern science—the necessary consequence of its empirico-logical structure. What is settled about the reality of final cause by the silence of the natural sciences? This silence points to the relationship between metaphysics and the modern sciences and to the resolution of the "dilemma."

JAMES M. ROHERTY

Mount Mary College

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS

Zagoria , The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961; Hsieh , Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era; Hudson, Lowenthal, and MacFarquhar . The Sino-Soviet Dispute. H. ARTHUR STEINER.....	688
Means , Pricing Power and the Public Interest. EARL LATHAM.....	690
Huntington, Ed. , Changing Patterns of Military Politics; Coles, Ed. , Total War and Cold War. LEWIS J. EDINGER.....	692
Kauper , Civil Liberties and the Constitution. ROBERT J. STEAMER.....	694
Engler , The Politics of Oil. HENRY A. TURNER.....	695
Gottmann , Megalopolis: The Urbanized Northeastern Seaboard of the United States. ROBERT H. CONNERY.....	696
Gentile , Genesis and Structure of Society. JOSEPH LAPALOMBARA.....	698

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY	700
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	717
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	742
INTERNATIONAL LAW, POLITICS, AND ORGANIZATION.....	759
OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED.....	768

BOOK REVIEWS

The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961. By DONALD S. ZAGORIA. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1962. Pp. xii, 484. $8.50.)

Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era. By ALICE LANGLEY HSIEH. (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.; Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. Pp. xx, 204. $4.50 (Cloth); $2.25 (Paper.)

The Sino-Soviet Dispute. DOCUMENTED AND ANALYZED BY G. F. HUDSON, RICHARD LOWENTHAL, AND RODERICK MACFARQUHAR (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1961. Pp. ix, 227. $5.00.)

Mr. Zagoria's analysis of the Sino-Soviet conflict is the product of a heavily documented effort to break the private code the antagonists employ in their open communications with each other and thus pin-point the specific issues around which the controversy revolves. He demonstrates that the conflict is a deep-seated and real one—not an elaborate fiction, as some have argued—which “became acute in recent years because some basic potentialities for conflict were brought to life by a series of developments within and without the Communist world to which Moscow and Peking had different answers and different needs.” While believing that the causes of dispute cannot be eliminated by paper settlements, Zagoria holds “that Communist China and Communist Russia have much more in common with each other than with the Western world,” and hence “that there are rational limits to the conflict between them” that operate to prevent a definitive rupture of their relations.

He finds the “seeds of conflict,” as distinguished from basic causes or potentialities, in the 1956-1957 debate over de-Stalinization and in what he takes to be a “swing to the Left” in Peking begun in June 1957. Somewhat out of time sequence, he deals with the controversy over the Chinese people's communes in 1958-1959, seeing in this an exemplification of such “basic factors producing conflict” as the contests over power, economics, the pace of the revolution, and the different ideological perspectives arising from the Sinoization of Marxism-Leninism. He then passes to the origins of the dialogue on intra-bloc relations and global strategy in 1957-1958, as preliminary to explanation of the intensified controversies of 1959-1960, and concludes with an analysis of the Moscow parties' meeting in 1960 and the breach over Albania in 1961.

A secondary purpose of the study is “to demonstrate the value of the Communists' own stream of communications as raw material for penetrating through the dialectical fog to the political calculations and conflicts which lay behind it,” although Zagoria concedes that “sometimes . . . the Kremlinologist [defined as “the analyst of Communist communications”] weaves a web of interpretations on too fragmentary evidence.” A separate “note on methodology” identifies some ground rules of the occult art of Kremlinological content analysis, and suggests ways in which the incessant search of the “detective-scholar” for “indicators of political significance” leads him to find clues in many improbable places. Zagoria does not squarely face the fact that Kremlinology, instrumental as it may be, is at best an insufficient substitute for first-hand research in such original sources (now generally denied us) as stenographic reports of private meetings, internal communications, etc., as the vehicle for testing and validating hypotheses and assumptions concerning the purposes and motivations of others. Nor does he explain how the Kremlinologist evaluates third-hand journalistic reports, anonymously attributed to “private,” “reliable,” or “authoritative” sources, concerning the literal textual content of secret communications and conversations (although he appears to rely heavily for several key interpretations on such material from a wide range of papers reaching from Link and Blitz to Deutsche Zeitung, including Observer and the New York Times). Of course, all scholars who work the Communist beat are compelled to be at least part-time Kremlinologists and share Zagoria's dilemma, but the responsibility for discreet evaluation of sources and for qualifying the most plausible but unverifiable deduction is inescapable.

One of Zagoria's examples of the “polemical tone” of Sino-Soviet communications as one clue available to the Kremlinologist points directly to the problem of translation and raises questions which in a less exacting context might be merely academic. He quotes a sentence from the “Yü Chao-li” article in Hung Ch'i (Red Flag) of April 1, 1960, from the official NCNA translation as follows: “It is absolutely impermissible for us to mistake certain tactical changes on the part of imperialism for changes in the very nature of imperialism.” To Zagoria, “the language clearly suggests that someone, and someone in a position of authority, was doing precisely what Hung Ch'i said was impermissible. In this case, the ‘someone’ seemed to be Khrushchev.” Various translations are possible, but in the original Chinese the first few words of the sentence ("Wo-men chüeh pu-neng pa. . .") are constructed in the first person plural, and a more literal translation would read: "We certainly cannot mistake . . .," a reading which discounts the polemical tone and renders Khrushchev a less likely target. If such "communications" are intended to convey meaning to Khrushchev, it becomes germane to inquire whether his translators have rendered into Russian the punctilious sense of the Chinese original. And, since Khrushchev seldom (if ever) responds by citing chapter and verse, how is the Kremlinologist to be certain that he and Khrushchev have the same appreciation of a particular Chinese "message"?

Zagoria admits that interpretations differing from his own "are sometimes possible," and grants the reader "liberty to make his own judgment" of the significance of the material cited. To this end, he assertedly supplies "a substantial number of extracts from Communist media in part to enable the interested reader to form his own interpretations." At the same time, however, he muffles the warning bell by omitting such qualifying phrases as "the above suggests that," or, "it is likely that", in connection with interpretations where their use would be "appropriate," on the ground that "such qualifiers would soon become tiresome." In such a well-written book as this, where the author carefully pyramids his analyses within a structure characterized by a high degree of internal logical consistency, this policy makes it almost impossible for the reader to exercise a discriminating judgment—unless he happens to have available to him the same total mass of communications that Zagoria has used.

Thus, for example, Mao Tse-tung is represented as going to Moscow in November 1957 to obtain from Khrushchev some assurance that the Soviet Union would actually play a central role of leadership within the bloc and thus suppress the growing "confederal" tendencies to which the Chinese Communists had contributed in their 1956 policy statements. Several problems are involved: one is whether Mao's call of November 6, 1957, to "all socialist countries to strengthen the solidarity of the socialist countries headed by the Soviet Union" was an actual reversal of the previous Chinese policy of emphasizing "the need for genuine discussion rather than diktat in resolving differences within the Communist world. . . ." Another is whether the question of solidarity, which received basic emphasis throughout, was to be achieved by the leadership of the Soviet Union other than in the context of intra-bloc discussion which the Chinese seemed consistently to regard as the pre-condition of solidarity. Nearly every Chinese statement on the subject after 1957 mentions "leadership of the Soviet Union" only within the context of "solidarity," for which discussion appeared to be the necessary prerequisite. Chinese statements acknowledging the "central position" of the Soviet Union because of objective factors of size and development sedulously refrain from attributing to the Soviet Union any measure of ideological or moral pre-eminence. If Mao also had in mind to compel Khrushchev to employ advanced Soviet technology, (then only recently revealed), in the interest of a more adventurist revolutionary policy toward the West (as Zagoria persuasively argues), was it logically compatible for the Chinese to argue in support of a stronger assertion of bloc decision-making at a Soviet center, which would deny them and others the capability of challenging the course of policy then and subsequently followed by the Soviet Union? Zagoria structures his material so tightly and logically as to leave the reader with no awareness that alternative interpretations can be supported by a substantial documentation.

Similarly, the reader has no real alternative but to accept Zagoria's interpretation that the asserted change of Chinese attitude in Moscow had been preceded by a leftward swing in Chinese domestic policy after mid-June 1957. He finds the "best evidence for this" in the belated revival in September 1957 of the Chinese 12-year plan for agriculture, leaving the reader to infer from Chou En-lai's disparagement of it in 1956 that the plan had a highly leftist character and, from other statements, that it somehow foreshadowed the "big leap forward" and the commune movement of 1958. The reader is given no hint that the 12-year plan was cast in the mood of the "high tide of socialism" which saw the substantial completion of cooperativization and practical sequestration of private industry and commerce during 1956, and that it was in largest part concerned with the technical improvement and rationalization of agriculture rather than with suggesting significant revisions of the collective system.

In connection with the Taiwan Straits crisis of 1958, Zagoria considers the omission from the Mao-Khrushchev communique of August 3, 1958, of any reference to Taiwan to be highly significant in view of the "liberation" propaganda that had been waged in China in preceding weeks. But the same communique did refer to joint consideration by Mao and Khrushchev (accompanied by Malinovsky) of "major questions confronting the two countries in Asia and Europe," and their complete agreement "on measures to be taken to oppose aggression and safeguard peace"—formulations sufficiently broad to include both Quemoy (where Chinese shelling began within three weeks) and Taiwan, and at least capable of being interpreted as part of an arrangement under which a demonstration of Chinese military power against Quemoy would take advantage of the American obsession with the notion that an attack on Quemoy might be the prelude to an attack on Taiwan. Thus, the common Sino-Soviet interest in bringing the American intervention in Lebanon to an end would have been served. A careful reader would have difficulty in visualizing such admissible interpretation on the basis of Zagoria's presentation and data. This is not the place to perform an exercise in counter-Kremlinology on the detailed scale needed to validate the several lines of alternative interpretation not foreclosed by Zagoria's system.

In evaluating Zagoria's massive work on its substantive merit, however, there can be no doubt that he has contributed significantly to the solution of a great political puzzle of our day. Appreciating that Sino-Soviet conflict engages the politics of the entire complex of bloc countries, he probes in depth the core issues of organization, ideology, personality, economy, and political strategy and tactics that are reshaping the entire Communist world. With imaginative craftsmanship, he has pinned down and identified many essential elements of transition in a rapidly changing situation, and much that is to be written on his subject in the near future will probably take the form of postscripts to his present work.

Mrs. Hsieh's Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era is a RAND Corporation study in Hsietanology, if this term—borrowed from the official quarter in Peking—can be taken as a Chinese equivalent to Kremlinology. On the basis of Chinese statements and documents, Mrs. Hsieh concerns herself with the growing Chinese awareness of the effect of nuclear technology on military strategy after 1954, and its consequences for military doctrine and politics in China and on Sino-Soviet relations (including differences over nuclear weapons-sharing, dependence on the Soviet deterrent shield, etc.). In these respects, she explores Chinese materials on this specialized aspect of potential Sino-Soviet conflict more exhaustively than Zagoria, but their basic treatments of military factors in Sino-Soviet relations are not dissimilar. Mrs. Hsieh is much more generous in her qualifications of tentative suppositions, and candidly admits that "the range of considerations accounting for the September 1959 shift in [Chinese] military leadership is far from clear." She tends to equate expressed fears in 1955 of "sudden" or "surprise" attack with fears of "nuclear" attack, when legitimate fears of a sudden or surprise attack by conventional means from Taiwan could have been held following the December 1954 treaty between the KMT and the United States. Similarly, the discussion of the politics of "modernization" of the Chinese army seems to infer some equivalence between modernization with respect to conventional weapons (hardly discussed) and modernization of tactics and equipment in anticipation of some relatively early nuclear weapons-delivery capability. If the textbook by Ch'ao Chung-yao and others on The Theory and Practice of Atomic Power (Yüan-tzu-neng ti yüan-li ho ying-yung, Peking, 1956) is any reflection of the levels of nuclear information then available to the Chinese military, Mrs. Hsieh may have attributed an undue degree of sophistication to Chinese statements concerning nuclear warfare in the 1955-1956 period. The dilemma of identifying the "political" as against the "professional" characteristics of such a top-ranking military figure as Lin Piao is well illustrated by quotations from him that could be "worked" both ways, but in the end Mrs. Hsieh judges that the military reorganization of 1959 politicized the General Staff (under General Lo Jui-ching) and gave fuller responsibility for modernization to the Ministry of National Defense under Lin Piao. We cannot hold Mrs. Hsieh accountable for resulting difficulties in constructing a military organization chart!

The Sino-Soviet Dispute is a valuable reference collection of documents bearing mainly on the polemical development of that controversy during 1960. Richard Lowenthal's "Diplomacy and Revolution" is the most significant of the short introductory essays, and his views on the Moscow meeting of 1960 are partly incorporated by reference in Zagoria's treatment of the subject.

H. ARTHUR STEINER

University of California (Los Angeles)

Pricing Power and the Public Interest, A Study Based on Steel. BY GARDINER C. MEANS. (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1962. Pp. xxi, 359. $7.50.)

How can steel companies be induced to forego exorbitant profits, to set prices approximately at the level of the cost of services, and to keep them steady? One tested approach is to beat them with the heavy sticks of public authority, as President Kennedy did in April 1962 to threaten punitive taxes, to divert Government contracts from the offenders to others, to stimulate Congressional investigations, inaugurate criminal prosecutions, and raise the hue and cry on television and in the press. But the unaesthetic disorder and noise of this rout, its lack of grace and subtlety, the risk it courts of costly political reprisals—these are blemishes of procedure that Agamemnon could have had in mind when, in answer to the complaint of Menelaus, "Woe's me! I have no friends," he said, "Not if you slay them." Although it may seem like a piece of bribery to promote the public interest, Gardiner Means has devised a scheme to keep the steel companies from jacking up their prices and doubling their profits. The existing incentive system rewards managers who do both; he would give the bonuses to managers who did neither.

By now the analysis is familiar—and the early work of Mr. Means did much to make it so—that some business is big, although not monopolistic; that giant corporations are under the control of managers who do not own the enterprises they govern; that competition among the few is different from competition among the many; that competition among the few produces administered prices that exceed cost and subsidize social and economic waste; and that this concentration of pricing power is not only not in the public interest—it works actively against it. The experience of the steel industry since the end of the Second World War is, for the author, a Baedeker of bad practise. Until 1953, he says, price rises in the industry were commensurate with economic change, and were economically justified; but increases between 1953 and 1959 doubled profits from an average of 8% on investment to an average of 16% on investment, and they were not economically justified. The unwarranted increase in the price of steel contributed to the inflation of those years, and helped to create that sad travesty of upside-down economics—a recession (two of them) and inflation at the same time.

Now there is no bar in law or government against high profits in steel. Although economic urgency will, in a general way, control the most egregious forms of managerial cupidity, the decisions of steel managers about price enjoy a considerable immunity from quick and drastic economic retribution. That is to say, in a system of administered prices, the discretionary margin within which levels may be set is broader than it is in more extensively competitive enterprises. In the area of enterprise that Mr. Means calls "administered competition," the constraints of the market simply do not operate as they are supposed to when there is a multiplicity of small sellers and buyers, no one of whom is able by his entry or exit, to influence the price. Big steel has all the privileges of a free market without its discipline.

But because it is in the free sector of the economy, steel is also exempt from the regulation that Government imposes upon monopolies or near monopolies, the object of which is to do by rule what the interaction of thousands of enterprisers does in the classical theory, namely, keep prices somewhere near costs. In sum, it is characteristic of the "gray area" enterprises that they are neither monopolistic nor free, and that they enjoy some of the reputation of the second while they reap some of the advantages of the first.

Borrowing a rejected phrase from the literature of the law, Mr. Means thinks of these businesses as characteristically "affected with a public interest." The original formulation of this concept by Chief Justice Waite was intended to make valid certain forms of direct price control by the Government. Mr. Means does not go so far. In another characterization, he describes the "gray area" firms as "collective enterprises," and he advocates legislation to establish a procedure for so designating them. The corporations to be defined as "collective enterprises" would be those showing "the existence of unregulated pricing power of sufficient magnitude to affect the corporation with a substantial public interest." In the steel industry, these might be the top eight firms, and would certainly be the top three—United States Steel, Bethlehem Steel, and the Republic Steel Corporation.

For the collective enterprises, measures of "economic performance" would then be devised, presumably by private management engineering firms, although this is not clear: standards which, if met, would realize the classical ideal of the well-tempered economy—the optimum use of resources in the satisfaction of wants. Once these gauges of performance were established, top managers who met the specifications would be given a bonus which, sweetened by certain adjustments in the tax laws (it would be taxed as capital gains, not income, for example), would surpass the net now allowed, and thus increase the incomes possible to the principal company officials. They would receive less than the most for overshooting or under-shooting their targets of performance. Optimum economic performance would presumably be assured or, at least, made more likely by this manipulation of economic incentives.

The place of the great corporations in the American society has been a concern of economists and sociologists for some time, but the subject has not attracted the attention of many political scientists. It should be a matter of central interest, inasmuch as the corporation in its internal governance and in its relations with society presents all of the familiar issues of political theory. And in the relations of the corporations with other elements of the economy and with the Government, there is much material to support empirical investigation into the behavior of power holders. What Means—like other commentators whose interest is not politics—tries to develop in default of work by political scientists is a political theory of monopoly power. How should we deal with these concentrations of private power in a democratic system? Galbraith says that other private powers will arise to countervail them. Mills says that they are already irrecoverably out of control. Berle thinks that the welfare of the society can be entrusted to the consciences of corporate commanders. Means would like to purchase their consent.

It would enrich understanding of the problem of the giant corporation in a democracy—it would enrich understanding of the specific proposals made by Mr. Means—if the insights of political science could be brought to bear. This would be true not only for the treatment of great themes of power and authority but for more modest matters of political practice and procedure. The author's proposal that Congress pass an Economic Performance Act, for example, seems a little unreal. He does not consider the necessary political circumstances under which Congress might consent to the characterization of big businesses as "collective enterprises," subject to unusual controls, but the prospect is probably not near. The political difficulties he slights could make the difference between the program he proposes and the pastiche he would get (if anything) from the traditional defenders of the "American way."

But if political experience has lessons for the author, it may also have lessons for the steel companies and other leviathans of enterprise who can make the economic deep "to boil like a pot." If they are to continue to enjoy extraordinary freedom from public control, they will have to conform, by private choice, their behavior to the standard that public authority may one day enforce. Or—to put the matter as it appears in The Leopard—"If we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change."

EARL LATHAM

Amherst College

Changing Patterns of Military Politics. EDITED BY SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON (Volume 3, International Year Book of Political Behavior Research. The Free Press of Glencoe, Inc., 1962. Pp. 272. $7.50.)

Total War and Cold War: Problems in Civilian Control of the Military. EDITED BY HARRY L. COLES. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1962. Pp. 300. $7.00.)

These volumes are most welcome contributions to a field in which scholarly interest and systematic analysis has badly lagged behind public involvement. The subject matter encompassed by the designation "military politics" is vast—as indicated by the excellent bibliographical essay by Huntington in the volume he has edited—and the proliferation of topics discussed in these two symposia greatly complicate the task of a reviewer. It is impossible within the space available here to do justice even to the most important contributions—let alone twenty-one essays. The authors' interests ranged from lofty theories to detailed case studies, from civil-military relations in classical antiquity to the present time, in Western as well as non-Western countries. As Huntington put it disarmingly in his introduction to Changing Patterns of Military Politics, a symposium of this sort is particularly vulnerable to the charge that it lacks unity and focus. But in that respect, it simply reflects the contemporary state of academic research on civil-military relations. Along with quite a number of theoretical models we have at present numerous case studies of varying quality. What seems missing is the link between the vast generalizations and the detailed investigations, as well as a more explicit distinction between normative and scientific analysis.

Changing Patterns of Military Politics includes three theoretical studies by Huntington, Lasswell and Rapoport which may provoke and even irritate, but never bore the reader. Huntington's stimulating discourse on "Patterns of Violence in World Politics" holds that the locus of violence in the world arena has shifted in recent years from the interstate to the intrastate level, particularly in the developing areas. Most important among contemporary forms of interstate violence seem to him revolutionary war and the reform coup d'état. The former he describes as essentially struggle between a ruling elite and a counter-elite, divorced from the existing political system, for support of a communal or socio-economic group that is more or less alienated from the existing political system. The reform coup, unlike the governmental coup—or palace revolution—and the revolutionary coup, Huntington perceives “as a healthy mechanism of gradual change, the nonconstitutional equivalent of periodic changes in party control through the electoral process.” Based in part on what seem somewhat dubious analogies and assumptions, Huntington’s major hypotheses deserve to be subjected to careful empirical testing so that the field may gain maximum profit from his challenging propositions.

In contrast to Huntington’s essay, Harold Lasswell’s “The Garrison State Hypothesis Today” advances a number of propositions which defy any efforts toward empirical validation. Brilliantly argued, like the original hypothesis of 1937 and 1941, the thesis “that the arena of world politics is moving toward the domination of the specialists in violence” seems to be based on the normative culture-bound impressions of an American liberal rather than the careful observations of a social scientist. Essentially, Lasswell’s “developmental construct,” then as now, seems to belong in the realm of moral philosophy rather than political theory. His essay sounds dire warnings about the future of civil-military relations in the United States in terms of traditional liberal democratic norms. The garrison state hypothesis provides for Lasswell the probable image of the future of our epoch and the only hope he holds out to us is that it may be possible “to civilianize a garrisoning world, thereby cultivating the conditions for its eventual dissolution.”

One man’s garrison state is another’s school for citizenship, as David Rapoport’s “A Comparative Theory of Military and Political Types” makes clear. According to his three-fold typology, in the “Praetorian State” the military maintains the rule of a wealthy oligarchy over an impoverished population, in the “Civilian-and-Military Polity” it supports the nation’s foreign policies, and in the “Nation-in-Arms” it provides the principal civic bond for the entire polity. “The dominant ethic of a nation-in-arms is public service—virtu—and it is best expressed in military duty,” we are told. Sparta, in classical antiquity and Switzerland and Israel in modern times are cited as cases in point and the nation-in-arms is offered as “an ideal model for those interested in ‘remaking’ praetorian countries” today. Rapoport’s categories seem practically useless for analytical purposes. Most developed countries are classed under the civilian-and-military type and underdeveloped nations under the praetorian type. Only little Israel and Switzerland qualify, according to Rapoport, as nation-in-arms, and his evidence here is not very convincing. While Lasswell sees the Garrison State as highly undesirable, but well nigh inevitable, Rapoport perceives the nation-in-arms as desirable but highly unlikely in most of the countries of the world.

Four case studies complete the volume edited by Huntington. Laurence Radway provides an analysis of the NATO Defense College. Philip Abrams considers recent efforts to make the British military establishment more “democratic” as well as professional, and Martha Derthick examines the politics of the national guard as a lobby in the missile age. Raoul Giradet, recently arrested for complicity in an attempt to assassinate President deGaulle, offers an enlightening presentation of the principles of the more sophisticated O.A.S. supporters in the French army. It should be read in conjunction with Richard Challener’s contribution to the Coles volume on the role of the French military in the destruction of the Third Republic.

Total War and Cold War is more modest in both size and content, though scarcely cheaper, than the Huntington symposium. The eleven essays have a certain common focus, given by the theme of the 1959 conference on civil-military relations at Ohio State University, for which all but one were originally prepared. The useful introduction by the editor further underscores—and somewhat exaggerates—the basic unity in approach and plainly states that most of the essays are concerned with the “positive and constructive approach to civil-military relations” which holds that “the real problem . . . is not so much to recover the principle of political primacy as to modify and adapt it to present-day circumstances.” In this respect, “political control of the military” is declared to be “little different” from “scientists, civil servants, and other technical types.” With the exception of Hinton’s essay on Communist China, all the contributions are concerned with civil-military relations in “advanced, industrial societies characterized by a fairly high degree of internal stability and of professionalism of their military.” These are quite different and not comparable to civil-military relations in underdeveloped areas, according to the editor, and the latter countries were, therefore, arbitrarily excluded from consideration.

Given these restrictions, the authors tend to concentrate on the efficacy, nature, and extent of civilian control over the military in peace and war, in liberal democracies and in totalitarian dictatorships, in the past and in the present. A number of the papers have appeared previously in one form or another or elaborate merely on points which their authors have stated in earlier publications. While most of them add little that is new, they provide useful overviews of civil-military relations in Britain, Nazi Germany, France, the Soviet Union and China, and the United States which should be read in close conjunction with the essays in the Huntington volume.

LEWIS J. EDINGER

Michigan State University

Civil Liberties and the Constitution. By PAUL G. KAUPER. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1962. Pp. xii, 237. $6.00.)

In 1961 Professor Paul G. Kauper delivered to the Special Summer School for Lawyers held at the University of Michigan Law School a series of lectures designed to illuminate the "critical areas in current constitutional development." Now fortunately in print, they are worthy of a detailed reading by all serious students of constitutional law. Although the lectures, by Kauper's own admission, are not exhaustive, they are sharply analytical and keenly perceptive in differentiating the subtle distinctions which the Supreme Court has made and continues to make as it attempts to strike a balance between conservation and creativity in the law. Each new term brings to the Court a rash of cases in the broad area of personal rights and liberties, and the Court must make such delicate choices that the logic of one alternative over another rarely points to a clear and unencumbered path.

In his first essay the author discusses the American concept of separation of church and state which he describes as symbolic but not very relevant to the American scene. Our plurality of states and churches makes the phrase legally meaningless, constitutionally indefinite, and useful only for conveying the twin ideas of the religion clause of the First Amendment. Kauper observes correctly that the truly important questions today arise not from any formal confusion of traditional church-state functions but from the practical problems arising out of their interrelationships. Very often the church and the state have identical interests and occasionally they exercise similar functions concurrently. After a careful discussion of governmental practices and Supreme Court decisions, Kauper concludes that the government can constitutionally aid such church-supported functions as hospitals, schools, and help for the aged and the needy. As a result of a growing secularization the state is merely taking over what was once a virtual church monopoly and the government now supports the function, not the religious institution. Kauper argues that since parochial schools serve a recognized public purpose they may be governmentally aided so long as the assistance is not identified with religious instruction.

In his discussion of recent decisions on obscenity the author concludes that the Court's use of the term "prurient" as a constitutional standard for determining obscenity is no substantial advance over the term "obscene" and that further clarifying opinions are needed. In any event the contemporary moral sense of the community as interpreted by jury or judge is what determines finally whether a book is obscene. Professor Kauper registers mild approval of Justice Harlan's (and the late Justice Jackson's) thesis that the Court ought to distinguish between the First Amendment as a direct limitation on Congress and its inclusion in the Due Process Clause as an indirect limitation on the states, with the latter being somewhat less restrictive and permitting the states a latitude under the police power that would be denied Congress because of the First Amendment. Of course, the Harlan position is meaningless so long as the Supreme Court continues to place obscenity, as properly defined, outside the protection of the First Amendment, thus permitting governmental restrictions on any level, federal, state, or municipal. Only if the absolutist concept of Justice Black becomes the standard for decision in this realm will the Jackson-Harlan viewpoint be worthy of consideration.

In a chapter on freedom of association Professor Kauper assesses the dramatic contrast between rights guaranteed those who affiliate with the NAACP as opposed to those who join the Communist Party. In the case of the former the state may not require public disclosure of its membership lists, but the federal government may require all Communist-action organizations to register and furnish a list of their officers and members. The Supreme Court has thus distinguished between types of associations in terms of lawful versus unlawful ends and purposes, and the freedom to associate, though not absolute, has emerged as a fundamental right under the Due Process Clause. Within this framework the author raises the concomitant question of non-association. May a person be required by law to pay dues to a labor union that carries on political activities with which he disagrees? The Court has skirted the issue but so far has given no clear-cut answer.

The two final sections of the book cover the complex and sensitive areas of private versus governmental action and the role of the federal government as a positive protector of civil liberties. The author suggests that the Supreme Court is still groping for a definitive rationale in these matters. He asks whether it is not the assurance of judicial protection that gives content and meaning to all private rights, and he observes that the critical question is "whether a court in protecting one man's interests is thereby subjecting another person to an unconstitutional impairment of his rights or liberties." There is no easy answer to the question whether enforcement of a trespass statute against Negroes who are staging a sit-in demonstration at a lunch counter is a denial of equal protection of the laws. A trespass statute cannot be enforced at the expense of constitutional rights, but unless a person can claim a statutory or common law right to enter a business establishment and be served, the owner may assert the right to choose his own patrons in a manner that will best promote his business. In this assertion of equally valid claims, the state may legally prefer to protect the owner's interest, which means that the state is protecting the right of a private business to discriminate against Negroes.

This leads Professor Kauper to his final lecture which deals with the recent bold and positive intervention of the federal government in what were formerly either state matters or private affairs for the purpose of protecting personal liberties. Of particular interest is his elucidation of the federal equity power as a means of enforcing equal protection of the laws. Characterizing the injunction as a "peculiarly effective and drastic remedy" because of its flexibility, adaptability, possible rapidity of issuance, and punishment capabilities without a jury trial, the author nevertheless aptly compares the current use of equity power with its application to labor disputes in an earlier period when, as today, the charge of government by judiciary was leveled at the courts. The reach of the equity power was clearly demonstrated in New Orleans during the 1960-61 school year when the desegregation crisis produced injunctions against the Governor, the Attorney General, a state judge, the Superintendent and School Board of New Orleans, and the state legislature. Even a private person whose active racial discrimination is normally beyond the scope of federal judicial authority may be snared in the equity net if he persists in interfering with court decrees which order desegregation.

In a few instances I do not hold with Professor Kauper's generalizations. For example, I find the balancing-of-interests test unsatisfactory as a judicial standard in civil liberties cases whereas he approves of it, albeit with some reservations. Moreover, I dissent from his persistent contention that one can ignore the wisdom of legislation in assessing its constitutionality. Prudence and constitutionalism are hardly mutually exclusive. But this does not detract from what is a solid treatise and a refreshing diversion from the contemporary output of sociological analyses of the Supreme Court. Not only has the author succeeded in disentangling the web of technical legal issues in the current civil liberties mélange, but he has provocatively framed the new, emerging questions which must soon find their way to the Supreme Court's docket.

ROBERT J. STEAMER

Louisiana State University

The Politics of Oil. By ROBERT ENGLER (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1961, Pp. viii, 565, $7.50.)

Although the relationship of organized interests and government has been a topic for speculation and comment by students of American politics from the days of the founding fathers, recent commentaries in professional journals attest the lack of a universally accepted interest-group theory. Undoubtedly a principal reason for the differing views currently held regarding the group approach to politics is that our knowledge of the manner in which groups organize for political action and function in the political arena is still fragmentary. If viewed in this context, Robert Engler's book, The Politics of Oil, is a significant contribution.

The author's central thesis is that the petroleum industry constitutes a private government which seeks to utilize public government to promote its goals of greater economic power and larger profits. Engler asserts that the oil industry "is increasingly public in every aspect except responsibility and profits." With ample documentation, he illuminates the pervasive efforts of oil to influence political decisions on the local, state, national, and international levels. Although he states that the focus of his study is on "the relationship of the new industrial system, as illustrated by oil, and the American political system," his account conveys the impression that oil is unique in its efforts to gain political advantages, for relatively little acknowledgment is made of the fact that there are other powerful economic and social groups competing for political influence.

The book could well serve as a handbook or manual on pressure group methods. According to his account, virtually the entire gamut of tactics and techniques available to organized interest groups have been employed by segments of the oil industry. Examples are cited of efforts to achieve unity of action within the industry and to influence public opinion, related business and professional groups, party platforms, the nomination and election of officials, the appointment of administrative personnel, and the decisions of both elective and appointive officials. Of particular interest is his discussion of oil's public relations activities, which illustrates the thoroughness with which oilmen have approached the task of shaping the political environment favorable to their industry. In this chapter he describes the well-coordinated efforts of committees and other organized units which have been created for the primary purpose of molding attitudes through such methods as institutional advertising, disseminating literature to the public schools, speakers bureaus, and other means.

Unfortunately, however, the author detracts from the potential influence of his study by engaging in a general criticism of the current social order in a manner reminiscent of the muckrakers of half a century ago. Throughout the volume, the author intersperses his discussion of the organization and political power of oil with discourses on "the corrosive impact of acquisitive society upon democratic assumptions." Cautioning that one should not "too quickly sort the heroes and the villains," he presents an analysis which indicates that few persons in public life have not been influenced in some fashion by oil. Regardless of the appropriateness of the muckraking approach during the Progressive era of American history, muckraking is no longer in style. In this age of continual world crises, a dispassionate approach would have been more effective.

The Politics of Oil illustrates the magnitude of the problems posed by powerful organized interests seeking economic and political concessions in a country with decentralized political parties and with a federal system of government characterized on each level by the tripartite division of governmental powers. The author, rejecting the notion that the countervailing power concept provides a satisfactory answer, suggests proposals which he believes are commensurate with the problems. Within the United States, he calls for a coordinated and well defined national oil policy with "careful study" being given to "placing oil in the category of a public utility." An entirely satisfactory solution, in his opinion, demands a "world approach," and "one step toward" such an approach would be achieved by "placing oil and all energy resources under international authority, with the United Nations as the parent body." Irrespective of the desirability of such proposals, the problems inherent in effecting them are obviously so overwhelming that comment regarding their feasibility appears unnecessary.

Many individuals who are aware of the campaign contributions and other political activities of oilmen, as well as the political controversies in recent years over such issues as the control of the tidelands and the regulation of the natural gas industry, will agree that a comprehensive study of oil and politics has long been overdue. While the reactions to this volume will vary according to the social and economic predilections of the readers, there will be general admiration for the prodigious research efforts of the author. In gathering the data for his book, Engler perused a wide variety of printed sources, including reports of congressional investigations and other government documents, memoirs and biographies, newspapers and periodicals, trade association publications, and corporation reports, newsletters, and other records. In addition he traveled widely interviewing oilmen, public relations personnel, lobbyists, government officials, and newspaper editors and reporters. The book is replete with the names of individuals and business organizations and with facts, figures, and statistics regarding the oil industry; but, because of the logical and coherent presentation of the material and the clarity of literary style, it is not dull or difficult reading. This volume is indeed a valuable source of information regarding the economic and political power-structure of the oil industry, and because of its factual information it should be read by public officials, political scientists, and others interested in American politics.

HENRY A. TURNER

University of California (Santa Barbara)

Megalopolis: The Urbanized Northeastern Seaboard of the United States. BY JEAN GOTTMANN. (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund, 1961. Pp. xii, 810. $10.00.)

Gottmann is a French geographer, a professor at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes and the School of Political Science at the University of Paris. Recently he has been a member of the Institute for Advanced Studies at Princeton. A man of considerable experience with government both in France and with various international bodies he is widely recognized as an expert on problems of metropolitan growth.

Far from assuming that the northeastern seaboard will, in time, become one monstrous city, a kind of indefinite extension of Times Square, Gottmann believes that the area contains forces and counter-forces which will develop great variety within its over-all unity. Megalopolis, the name which Gottmann applies to the Northeast, with its population of more than 38 million, is one of the largest industrial belts in existence and the greatest financial and political hub on earth. This study is not intended to be simply a portrait of the area and its people. Rather, it is an attempt to analyze and understand "the extraordinary dynamics they have created, in a place that was a wilderness three centuries ago, the enormous concentration of people and activities now achieved in Megalopolis. Nowhere else have men ever built anything comparable and with such a rhythm."

To be sure, the trend towards concentration of dense population in large urbanized regions has gradually become a worldwide characteristic of this century. But the northeastern region of the United States is unique in many ways. Megalopolis provides the whole of America with so many essential services, of the sort a community used to obtain in its downtown section, that it may deserve its nickname of "Main Street of the nation."

In this area the old distinctions between rural and urban do not apply any more. Even the people living in the so-called rural areas have very little to do with agriculture; "in terms of the interests and work, they are what used to be classified as 'city folks,' but their way of life and the landscapes around their residences do not fit the old meaning of urban."

Tomorrow's society, Gottmann asserts, will certainly be more urban than today's. More and more people will follow non-agricultural ways. In a sense, the Northeast thus might be considered "the cradle of a new order in the organization of inhabited space." Population trends, however, provide less insight into the nature of the area than do the inter-relations that exist between the processes that cause the growth, attracting certain groups and providing the means by which they could live and work together.

The author starts with a sketch of what he calls the dynamics of urbanization and shows in historical terms how the Northeast came to be what it is. Then he considered the modern revolution in land use, noting that urbanization devours time and space as well as food and industrial goods. The new patterns of intense living that have become normal in urban centers exert a strong influence on the economical and social foundations of society. The density of activities and of movement of all kinds is the most extraordinary feature of the new urban region, but they also present a dilemma. While the growth of the regions owes much to the automobile, now highway traffic jams are beginning to strangle city activities. Finally Gottmann points out the "many millions of people who find themselves neighbors in Megalopolis even though they live in different states and hundreds of miles from one another are barely becoming aware of the imperatives of such a neighborhood." These imperatives include transportation, land use, water supply, cultural activities, use of natural resources and government and politics.

In solving these challenging problems the political scientist can learn much from the geographer. The basic economic, social and political factors of Megalopolis are so interwoven that one is meaningless without consideration for the others. Land is partitioned in many ways—physically by rivers, bays, ridges and valleys, and also by administrative boundaries which frequently follow these same lines. The Hudson river, once a major physical barrier, today is more of a political one. It has not been much more difficult to overcome the physical obstacle of the Hudson than of the East River but it still costs more to cross it than it does the East River. Cheaper tolls on the East River point to the interest of both the city and the state of New York to favor development of territory under their jurisdiction rather than under another state.

In the past, administrative partitioning has favored local growth. Modern technology and economic progress, however, demand more regional integration. The multiplicity of governmental units has put obstacles in the way of economic growth and the more comfortable use of the region's facility. "Financial entanglements are only the budgetary consequences of the governmental partitioning of a space crowded with people and activities."

Much of the discussion regarding problems of government in a growing metropolitan region is not new to readers of Luther Gulick, Victor Jones and Robert Wood. Indeed many of the techniques are similar to those used with profit in Raymond Vernon's New York Metropolitan Regional studies. But Gottmann brings a wealth of facts and a stimulating freshness of approach to these problems. Moreover, his study, profusely illustrated with 280 charts and maps, covers a much larger area than Vernon's and thus he is able to observe relationships between metropolitan clusters. As a foreign scholar who is no stranger to the American scene, Gottmann is able to draw upon a rich experience of more than 20 years of study of metropolitan problems. These are important factors in making his account particularly useful to American political scientists.

ROBERT H. CONNERY

Duke University

Genesis and Structure of Society. BY GIOVANNI GENTILE. TRANSLATED, WITH AN INTRODUCTION. BY H. S. HARRIS. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1960. Pp. 228. $4.50.)

Giovanni Gentile was something of an enigma all of his life. He combined the ivory-tower qualities of the abstract philosopher with a passion—consistent with his philosophy—for direct involvement in politics and service to the "State," which he equated with the essence of the individual. Even as the present volume was being written, and shortly prior to his assassination during Italy's bitter civil war, he was the object of bitter attacks from both die-hard Fascists and elements of the Resistance who sought to destroy a political system that was partially his own handiwork. The volume will not erase the enigma. It represents not merely a philosophical exercise but also veiled reflections on Gentile's political past—as well as a rationale for his choosing to identify with a crumbling Fascist state, rather than with emergent democracy, when Il Duce appealed to him in 1943.

For those who would more fully understand a major figure in the Italian idealist school, this excellently translated work is required reading. In the space of 150-odd pages, the reader is treated to Gentile's trenchant hostility toward positivism, empiricism, liberalism—and to any system of thought that fails to understand that the "State is the common aspect of the will," that "positivism or any form of empiricism is absurd," that all forms of realism "are very naive," or that the idea of community as a collection of individuals "smashes and destroys the idea of human community, making it no more than an accident and depriving it of value as an end in itself—the only kind of value that matters." Gentile's anti-pluralist and anti-materialist views are clearly laid out, as are his notions regarding economics, the relationship of religion to the state, the relationship between "public" and "private" acts, the role of philosophers in politics, the problem of a plurality of "infinite" states, and many other subjects. There are more than the usual problems of obtuse Hegelianisms and idealist jargon here; there are also all sorts of contradictions which the translator is assiduous in recognizing and concerning which his frequent explanatory and critical footnotes are of considerable assistance. More than most Anglo-American students, Professor Harris knows and understands his Gentile. This, coupled with an extraordinary sensitivity to the nuances of the Italian language, results in a translation that is outstanding for its lucidity—as well as for its frank recognition of passages that might be the object of controversial interpretations. The volume, for many reasons, deserves more recognition than the translator (in a laconic footnote on page 7) predicts for it.

It is difficult, in the space of a short introductory essay such as Harris', to assess all of the problems concerning Gentile that Harris, himself, raises. Some of these problems are strictly philosophical and academic, concerning the translator's assertion that Gentile has often been misread and misunderstood in the Anglo-American world. I do not wish to enter the philosophical controversy, except to say that the essay itself contributes little to its resolution. The reader who is interested in such things will have to repair to the copious bibliography cited by Professor Harris.

Other portions of the introductory essay, however, deal with Gentile's relationship to Fascism, with the nature of Gentile's reforms of Italian education, and with the controversy regarding the impact of the reforms on the Italian school system. Professor Harris is clearly on strong ground when he differentiates Gentile from those in the Fascist movement who crassly sought to substitute a "nationalist" spirit of the party for the "national" spirit of "actual idealism." A superficial equation of the noble and moral constructs of Gentile with the crude practices of the Fascist state involves an injustice to Gentile of considerable magnitude. Those who view him as the willing "philosopher of Fascism," must come to terms with his controversy with the Vatican and his appalled response to the Lateran Agreements. Gentile clearly saw in Fascism a political instrument for the kind of revolutionary changes that Italian society so desperately needed (and needs!). He, like Bottai and many others, was bitterly disillusioned over the realization that ideas were cynically used, that Fascism was essentially sterile of any serious philosophical underpinning, and that anything—certainly any system of ideas—would be sacrificed in the overriding interest of maintaining and expanding power. The kind of state that Mussolini and his cohorts hammered out was clearly not consistent with the philosophical posture Gentile assumes in the volume he wrote in 1943.

Professor Harris, however, is sometimes carried away with his defense of Gentile, as for example, when he is critical of Lamberto Borghi and others who have underlined the anti-democratic implication of the Riforma Gentile. It may be, as Harris claims, that Borghi is unfair to Gentile's "conscious intentions." But, if one is to judge at least in part by empirical consequences, it is obvious that what emerged from Gentile is a school system shot through with historicism, anti-liberalism, class-oriented curricula, authoritarianism, and all sorts of rigidities that have made the Italian educational system widely recognized as incapable of providing the kind of political socialization that a liberal democracy requires. Moreover, as the volume here reviewed clearly illustrates, fragments of Gentile's philosophy could clearly be utilized to justify the creation of a totalitarian school system as well as a totalitarian state. After all, it was not pure caprice or abject ignorance that moved Il Duce to affix his signature to sections of the Enciclopedia written by Gentile. It seems to be the unhappy lot of Hegelians that their true meaning and intentions are never fully understood by mortal men.

As the translator anticipates, it would be easy to poke fun at many of Gentile's formulations. For those who might approach the man and his work more dispassionately, the last ten pages of Professor Harris' essay provide a most lucid presentation of the basic structure of "actual idealism."

JOSEPH LAPALOMBARA

Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

A Theory of Foreign Policy. By GEORGE MODELSKI. (Princeton Studies in World Politics, No. 2. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1962. Pp. xi, 152. $5.00.)

This reviewer has come to look forward with anticipation to any new publication by George Modelski on the theory of international politics. His The Communist International System<sup>1</sup> was an analytical gem. His model was clearly defined and it was applied productively in the analysis of a body of empirical data. His second piece, "Agraria and Industria: Two Models of the International System,"<sup>2</sup> is an original contribution to political theory, for it makes the point that international political systems are political systems and are capable of being analyzed, at least in part, with the same conceptual scheme that one uses in the analysis of national political systems. It thus becomes possible to compare international political systems with national ones, and, furthermore, the conceptual scheme which Modelski employs is moving in a direction which will make it possible to compare international political systems with one another (i. e., contemporary subsystems of the international political system, or international political systems at earlier points in time).

It was, therefore, somewhat disappointing to take up Modelski's most recent publication and to find that it falls considerably short of the standard in the two pieces referred to above. It is understandable that his Theory of Foreign Policy should fall short of the quality of his other work, since it represents a recent revision of his doctoral dissertation, which he completed in June, 1954, for the University of London. I doubt very much whether Modelski writing today would have produced this kind of book.

Like most of us engaged in reconsidering the categories and analytical schemes of political theory, Modelski is greatly influenced by economic and sociological theory, particularly the former. This is so much the case that the book should properly be called "An Economic Theory of Foreign Policy," just as Anthony Downs called his book, "An Economic Theory of Democracy." Perhaps to an even greater extent than was true of Downs, Modelski distorts the data of politics in such a form as to render them susceptible of economic analysis. The ultimate goal toward which his theory is directed is to develop a "balance sheet for foreign policy." To make this balance sheet concept seem feasible, he uses a concept of power-input and power-output, which assumes that the means which go to make up power are exchangeable in some common currency. This is where his economic theory misled him, for the means of foreign policy are not exchangeable in a common currency. And what now occupies only a few pages of his book—an explication of the properties of the means of foreign policy—would have occupied several chapters had he been thinking as a political theorist rather than as an economic one.

He asks us to accept two conventions. The first of these is that we reduce political systems to policy-makers and their communities; the second, that we reduce the means of power to a total quantity of power. Modelski's contribution stops where it should properly have begun, first by placing foreign policy in the context of a sound theory of the political system and secondly by explicating the properties of the chief means of instruments of foreign policy, i. e., military, diplomatic, economic and communications means. Had Modelski proceeded this way, he would have found an opening between a theory of foreign policy and a theory of the international political system. While he rejects the theory of national power, he gives us a "theory of foreign policy power" which is equally regressive. It does not lead us forward to a more effective grappling with the empirical data of international transactions and the interactive structure which results from these flows, but offers a spurious simplicity and precision instead. Having said all this, the point should not be overlooked that Modelski has in his theoretical scheme potentialities of great promise. Let him apply his balance sheet theory in a few empirical cases and he will discover the bugs himself and produce a theory of foreign policy which will combine elegance with relevance in the style which his more recent work has led us to expect.—GABRIEL A. ALMOND, Yale University.

<sup>1</sup> "The Communist International System," Research Monograph No. 9, Center of International Studies, Princeton University, Dec. 1, 1960.

<sup>2</sup> "Agraria and Industria: Two Models of the International System," World Politics, Vol. XIV, No. 1, October, 1961, pp. 118-143.

Beiträge zur Staatssoziologie. By KARL LOEWENSTEIN. (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1961. Pp. 485.)

This book gives the student of politics and constitutional law a convenient access to a number of articles written during various periods of an exceptionally fruitful intellectual career reaching from the declining days of the Wilhelminian Empire to the post-Stalinist world. The variety of themes included in the selection bears testimony to the author's erudition and catholic range of interest. Loewenstein's chosen method of comparative institutional analysis exercised against a background of intimate historical knowledge of the respective societies and with a constant endeavor of critical confrontation of legislative and constitutional enactments with the corresponding social realities may seem by now an uncontested line of scientific procedure. Yet, Ernst Fraenkel in his thoughtful introductory pages rightly reminds us of its comparative novelty. The author first brought it to bear on his studies of the unique "constitutional laboratory" of the French revolution and especially his justly famous 1923 studies on the sociology of parliamentary representation in 18th and 19th century England. Fortunately reprinted here (though regrettably unavailable in English) they still—after nearly 30 years—stand out as an exemplary picture of the interrelation of constitutional, social and party structure under the conditions of relatively orderly social change.

Among the other items included in the collection, also unavailable in English, the reader's attention should be specially drawn to the article on the constitutional monocracy of Augustus analyzing the process of transformation of Roman institutions, and the critical analysis of W. J. Mommsen's new work on "Max Weber und die deutsche Politik 1890-1920" showing the risks of reinterpretation under the changed horizon of later generations. The same piece, incidentally, raises some interesting questions as to the use of the charisma concept in present day society and also expresses considerable doubt as to the usefulness of the legality—legitimacy dichotomy. Did Loewenstein, as he says, never make use of the distinction "in his own scientific endeavors," because the analysis of so many stillborn, evanescent, social-reality-wise restructured texts has made him sceptical about attempts to set up untouchable core areas invariably claimed by all and any regimes? His stupendous knowledge of past and present regimes and his realistic analysis of the relations between political authorities and judicial agencies set up for the protection of such core areas—extended in the present volume so as to embrace the constitutional aspects of the South African tragedy—may have made him still more doubtful about the survival chances of specific value structures in a process of rapid change. Is the typologist par excellence of constitutional systems necessarily a relativist? In working his way through this exceptionally rich collection which unveils the kaleidoscope of shifting institutional arrangements and in this process draws a sort of balance sheet, the attentive reader will doubtless find enough food to draw his own conclusions.—OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University.

The Herzl Paradox: Political, Social and Economic Theories of a Realist. By JOSEPH ADLER. (New York: Hadrian Press and Herzl Press, 1962. Pp. 178. $5.50.)

Theodor Herzl (1860-1904) was the founder of political Zionism, the prophet of the modern state of Israel. His dramatic vision of statehood as the means to dislodge the Jews from the chronic peculiarity of their history and secure for them a normal place in "western" international society evoked an immediate response among the Jews of eastern Europe. It was they who soon became the dominant element within the Zionist Organization founded by the westerner Herzl, and while they carried Herzl's political solution of the Jewish problem to practical fruition they expanded the ideological context of this concept, making room for a messianic spirit and for social aspirations drawn from a variety of sources other than those which underlay Herzl's own thinking.

A brilliant visionary and charismatic leader, Herzl also exercised unusual diplomatic and political talents. He has been recognized as the most revolutionary figure in nineteen centuries of Jewish history. A prolific writer, Herzl formulated the core of his political analysis in the classic essay "Judenstaat" ("The Jewish State"), while his social ideas were developed in the later romantic novel "Altneuland" ("Old-New Land"). It is Adler's contention that the appreciation of Herzl's practical political genius has proven detrimental to the appraisal of his contribution as a social and economic thinker. As an addition to the Herzl literature Adler's book may stimulate a broader appreciation of the man and the thinker behind the Herzl myth. If the book fails to accomplish this it may be because Herzl's social thought emerges as a banal collection of half-digested ideological clichés, whether that be the fault of Herzl's thought or the author's analysis. A clue to the misfiring of the book may be its inadequate appreciation of Herzl's most original and profound political thought, his analysis of the Jewish problem. It is probably true that the quality of Herzl's thought on the Jewish problem has been neglected by followers and scholars captivated by his magnetic personality and practical political skill. It is now doubtful, in the light of Adler's essay, whether it is worth considering Herzl seriously as a contributor to the mainstream of social and economic thought.

This is a painful verdict to the present reviewer as an admirer of Herzl who would like, in Herzl's very spirit, to release the brilliant contributions of a galaxy of Zionist thinkers of the turn of the century from the academic ghetto of Jewish historiography, and to place them in their proper relation to the heritage of European social insights from which they are in large part derived. Adler's sincerity of purpose and apparent similarity of motivation render the verdict only the more painful to deliver. Perhaps the fault lies after all with the subject. One might have better luck with Syrkin and Borochoy, who could hardly be accused, justly or unjustly, with Herzl, of utopianism.

Leaving unanswered the question of the quality or poverty of Herzl's social thought on its own merits without Adler's mediation, the inadequacy of Adler's study is apparent in his concluding chapter in which he tackles an interesting side-issue: the measurement of Herzl's influence upon Israeli social ideas and institutions today. One of the more fascinating problems confronting the student of Zionism and Israeli politics is the extent to which the eastern-European principals were or were not influenced by Herzl's social vision. The impact of the labor-Zionist leaders, especially Syrkin, Borochoy, Gordon, and Ben-Gurion, who have shaped Israel's present social institutions, can certainly be broadly understood, plausibly analyzed, without reverting to Herzl. And yet the student cannot escape the suspicion, given the tangential patterns of correspondence, that links might be demonstrable between their social ideas and those of Herzl. But not only does Adler misunderstand the structure and trends of the Israel economy, he also lacks any trace of method in his attempt to connect its contours with Herzl's ideas. The following is typical: "Herzl's concern with town planning has also borne fruit in Israel. . . . It is curious that in the exceptional cases where the state has departed from Herzl's warning not to build shanty towns—as it did under the pressure of heavy immigration—much conflict has arisen. The feeling of insecurity and discontent bred in the maabaroth (temporary villages for new immigrants) has re-emphasized for the Israeli Government the wisdom of Herzl's insistence on model towns." As well say that the misery of Hooverville re-affirmed for F.D.R. the profundity of Jefferson's thought.—NOAH LUCATZ, Southern Illinois University, East St. Louis Center.

The Measurement of Social Welfare. By JEROME ROTHENBERG. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc, 1961, Pp. XII 357, $7.95)

With great professional skill, even if not with distinguished gifts of lucidity, Rothenberg has provided an excellent survey of the economics of welfare as it has developed during the last twenty-five years. It is a branch of economics that, despite its frustrations, has clarified and illuminated many once badly posed issues. He has organized his survey around the problem of aggregating individual preferences into something that might be called social choice, giving prominence to Kenneth Arrow's formulation of the problem in Social Choice and Individual Values (New York; Wiley, 1951) and to proposals from various scholars for resolving or bypassing Arrow's difficulties. Rothenberg's own original contribution is a proposal for a "useful, rather than merely a formally correct, welfare economics."

In elementary terms, the task of measuring social welfare is the task of ranking different social states so that in some useful sense one state of affairs can be said to be better than others. If economists sometimes think of this problem as a kind of technical problem in measurement, political scientists will recognize it as a set of problems in political philosophy fundamental enough to have engaged a long line of powerful intellects, all deeply respectful of the problem's subtleties and surprising scope.

Economists have advanced their work on this age-old problem by characteristic simplification. (Theirs is a profession whose reputation rests on its success with modest assignments.) They have postulated that the best state is the most preferred state; hence evaluation is no more than measurement of preference.

Whose preference? Everybody's. But economists have learned that the mere addition of preferences is not satisfactory—and is not possible anyway. So the problem, as they see it, is of somehow aggregating individual preferences other than by addition. It is a problem of finding some kind of a rule so that, given any combination of preferences in a population, one can declare a collective preference or preferred social choice.

No doubt the conversion of amorphous ethical questions into problems in measurement of preference does simplify. But the problem of evaluation remains formidable. For one's commitment to any rule for "aggregating" individual preferences would imply that one has finally managed to settle many of the great old controversies in distributive ethics. "Aggregate" is a deceptive word, a question-begging word; to aggregate individual preferences into collective preference is in fact to decide who ought to get what.

Rothenberg's proposal for making headway is to abandon the task of aggregating individual preferences by rule and instead "read off" the aggregation of individual values (whether preferences or not) by empirical observation, admittedly expensive and prolonged, of "those strategic social decision-making processes within the society which value the kinds of social states pertinent to the economic problem." He thus considers "treating the social ordering (or social preference scale) as the ordering of social states which results from the operation of those processes."

Rothenberg's proposal, which he sometimes refers to as a proposal to accept "prevailing values" as criteria, is an attempt to extend the applicability of the notion of consumer sovereignty. Within some limits, he is saying, whatever a society chooses tells us what we should rate highly. As he recognizes, the proposal therefore seems to have the flavor of "what is, is right." He meets this objection in several ways, all showing that one is permitted to distinguish between those social states that can be presumed to be validated by the decision-making processes and those social states that are in observable fact brought about. In a particular case, the social state brought about may reflect only an aberration of the decision process. Here a reader might imagine that he hears, from a kindred spirit looking over Rothenberg's shoulders: "... the general will is always right, and always tends to the public good; but it does not follow that the deliberations of the people will always have the same rectitude" (Rousseau, Social Contract, Book II, ch. 3).

With his proposal, which is put with more intelligence than my brief summary of it might imply, Rothenberg stumbles out of formal welfare economics onto the edge of a world that the political philosophers have never left. As a welfare economist, he is equipped with new devices for making sense of this world, devices not much used in political philosophy. Yet it is a bigger, more complex, tougher world than Rothenberg's glimpse into has permitted him to see. It is a world in which Rothenberg will be asked whether the key decision processes themselves need sometimes to be evaluated and how, when such an occasion arises, one would propose to do the job. It is also a world in which research evidence that any  $x$  is a prevailing value can be countered by argument that the population has merely been coerced, cajoled, or deceived into acting as though it valued  $x$ . And it is a world in which challenges to consumer sovereignty on principle are much more serious than they are in the special case of the market. To these and other difficulties Rothenberg is sensitive, and he has important things to say. Habituated, however, to the narrow defile of welfare economics, he does not explore the new land far enough to see how wide it ranges.—CHARLES E. LINDBLOM, Yale University.

Neo-Freudian Social Philosophy. By MARTIN BIRNBACH. (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 283. $6.00.)

This book attempts to extract the elements of a social philosophy from the writings of the Neo-Freudian psychoanalysts. Birnbach presents a short overview of Freud's system of thought and his social philosophy, discusses the Neo-Freudian departures from the Freudian scheme, and analyzes the ideas of six writers: Erich Fromm, Karen Horney, Abram Kardiner, Harry Stack Sullivan, Franz Alexander, and Harold Lasswell. The purpose of the volume is to demonstrate that the ideas of these people constitute an important contribution to social philosophy.

What is this contribution? Allowing for many variations among members of the school, a few sentences will suffice to state it.

Man, in the view of the Neo-Freudians, has the capacity for psychic growth; some of them even claim that he strives for mental health. At the same time, man is a product of his social environment, so that growth may be helped or hindered by the individual's social experience. Culture and social institutions may be judged good or bad according to their ability to foster or impede individual growth. By this criterion, modern Western society must be judged wanting. Competitive pressures and the de-personalization of human relations generate anxiety, low self-esteem, and a tendency to regard all things, including one's self, as commodities in the market. This diagnosis of the modern world, together with humanistic principles, leads the Neo-Freudians to a variety of recommendations, ranging from the therapeutic principles of a Horney or Sullivan to the communal socialism of a Fromm.

The views of the Neo-Freudians can hardly be considered a coherent social philosophy, much less a political one. As Birnbach points out, they lack—with few exceptions—specific applications to political processes and programs of action. Nonetheless, they should be considered carefully by political scientists, for they challenge much of what has come to be the consensus of the profession. Lasswell (whom the author was wise to include although he scarcely qualifies as a Neo-Freudian psychoanalyst) has indeed pointed out that much of political life is pathological, partly because professional politics attracts people with serious personality defects, and partly because the symbols bandied about in the political forum tend to mobilize anti-social tendencies which ordinary people repress in their day-to-day relations with others.

Such views were heterodox a generation ago when they were first expressed, and they are perhaps even more heterodox today. For, having shed its earlier moral indignation over corrupt practices in public life, political science has come to believe in a latter-day Fable of the Bees—that the private vices of politicians and pressure groups make for public virtues. Conflict, it is believed, is almost invariably productive, and public debate is the life-blood of democracy. The pith of the Neo-Freudian and Lasswellian critique is that it denies this old-fashioned liberalism. Political competition, instead of resolving issues, may well serve to perpetuate them; and public debate, instead of leading to clarification, may bring only obfuscation and a hardening of positions. One cannot help being reminded of the pathetic futility of so many "great debates," domestic as well as international.

The Neo-Freudian position thus implies a psychology of conflict which could be a powerful tool for political analysis and an important ingredient of an ethic for the profession of political science. If much of competitive political behavior is motivated by anxiety and at the same time reinforces the anxieties from which it stems, we have here a self-perpetuating circular process similar in many respects to the typical course of certain mental diseases. Is it possible that the majority of the professional students of politics regard as healthy the very processes that careful analysis coupled with humanistic convictions would reveal to be symptoms of diseases? Are they doctors who advocate sickness and oppose health?

This, it would seem, is the weighty question which Birnbach attempts to raise through his examination of Neo-Freudian thought. Unfortunately, neither the question nor the content of Neo-Freudian thought emerge from the author's writing with the amount of clarity one might hope for. Psychoanalytic thought is, by itself, complicated enough and it is often far from lucid; yet Birnbach seems to complicate matters further by a dual allegiance to traditional political philosophy and to scientific method.

Whether or not Freud was really a philosophical materialist, and whether Fromm expounds a new version of the natural rights doctrine may be moot points. But what, except the satisfaction of scholastic curiosity, would be gained if such questions could be satisfactorily answered? Also, the author's frequent attempts to translate psychoanalytic propositions into the language of one or another school of social philosophy tend to make the conceptual apparatus more complex and less manageable.

At the same time, the author's commitment to scientific method (as he understands it) leads to rather surprising assertions. He claims that the Neo-Freudians have contributed to social philosophy a "qualitative" method which—for unexplained reasons—he also calls "deductive," as opposed to "quantitative analysis" and "induction." The "method" appears to consist in drawing conclusions about social processes from information obtained in the psychoanalyst's office.

The advantage of this procedure is that it explores human motives in depth. While such depth may be very desirable, the "scientific" procedure here advocated seems to be analogous to exploring a salt-mine and deciding on the basis of the evidence gained that the earth's core is made of salt.

Nor is the author's concern with scientific validity quite credible. Take, for instance, his critique of Fromm's utopia.

"Fromm's application of natural law theory has much to offer. . . . All will acknowledge the good service done by that doctrine in furthering the development of modern political institutions under the rule of law. . . . Very probably, however, it is insusceptible to validation [sic] by an empirical investigation of human nature and its formation . . ." (emphasis added).

In what sense does a theory have "much to offer" if it cannot be demonstrated to be true? Evidently, the author is not looking for truth but for an effective social myth—a formula which will do "good service." For the same reason the book makes no attempt to choose among alternative views on the basis of the evidence; rather, there is a tendency to accept and reject ideas because of the consequences to which they may lead.

Birnbach's lack of concern with evidence is further reflected in his choice of authors and texts. He reads exhaustively the writings of his six authors, but he ignores a large and varied literature of studies devoted to the empirical testing of psychoanalytic propositions, including the now classic study of The Authoritarian Personality. His is, rather, an interest in writers and schools, and his technique is chiefly that of scriptural interpretation.

The flaws of this volume are perhaps less those of its author than of the intellectual tradition from which it springs. Political philosophy, unfortunately, has foundered in a stale scholasticism. To require it now to be scientific is asking the impossible. To be sure, the factual assumptions upon which a living political philosophy must be built should be consistent with empirical knowledge. But this calls for a concern with evidence rather than the thought of particular writers. Beyond this, one cannot expect the ethical propositions of a social philosophy to be proven rigorously. They should rather, serve as value assumptions for empirical research and as standards of action in human affairs.—FRANK A. PINNER, Michigan State University.

Modern Government. BY DELL G. HITCHNER AND WILLIAM H. HARBOLD. (New York: Dodd, Mead & Company, 1962. Pp. xviii, 718. $7.50.)

This book, the newest in the Dodd, Mead series in political science, done under the advisory editorship of Professor David Fellman, constitutes an addition to the steadily growing number of texts for the introductory course. The authors are both at the University of Washington in Seattle. Their book is among the very good ones.

In basic organization of material, the book follows the accepted pattern for texts in this area. In order, it deals with the nature of political science—its dimensions, its methodology and its values; with the State—its evolution and differentiation from other social forms; with the evolution of democratic and antidemocratic ideologies; with constitutional government and liberty; with interest groups, parties and elections; with institutions of government—executive, legislative, judicial and administrative; and with international relations. More attention is given to this latter aspect of the subject than in the usual introductory text. Following a short epilogue, there is offered an excellent study guide to political science, covering over 50 pages. It includes listings of reference materials, classics, supplementary readings, periodicals and political novels. It even offers help in the preparation of investigative papers in political science. Beginning students should be grateful indeed for this section. An added attraction is also available to instructors in the course—in the form of an instructor's manual, offering useful suggestions for paper assignments, essay exam questions and multiple choice test items.

Perhaps the outstanding characteristic of the book is its unusual balance. Overall, there is balance in the amount of attention devoted to each of the indicated aspects of political science. Further, within each of these aspects, there is balance in treatment. The authors do not get out on any political limbs. In their analysis of political methodology, for example, they recognize the utility of philosophy, history and empirical research alike, and gently chide some modern political scientists for their total concentration on the latter. In their treatment of democracy, there is the same cautious balance in viewpoint; fair and objective consideration of the modern challenges to democracy, especially communism and fascism, is offered. Even so, the authors elect for democracy, but with qualifications: "if western civilization has erred in its understanding of human life, democracy is meaningless. If we share its values we really have no choice."

The writing is sprightly, and frequently brightened with humor and insight—e.g., "a bottle drifting in the ocean is neither free nor unfree." In one respect the book might have been improved by giving more attention to regional international organization such as EEC. Surely, however, a book with so few faults as this one seems to have, is a very good book indeed.—PAUL G. STEINBICKER, St. Louis University.

Latin American Social Thought. BY HAROLD EUGENE DAVIS. (Washington, D. C.: The University Press, 1961. Pp. iv, 557. $7.00.)

Dr. Davis has selected wisely from myriad authors in presenting a spectrum of topics ranging from "beauty" to "Marxism." His volume's parts, although actually arranged by time periods, are headed: 1) "The Enlightenment and Independence," 2) "Liberalism and Utilitarianism," 3) "Positivism," and 4) "Twentieth Century Trends."

Part One (Bolívar, Cecilio del Valle) illustrates contradictions in Latin American thought, with European, North American and Roman Catholic influences contrasted to indigenous aspirations and spirit of revolt. Part Two (Alberdi, Sarmiento) rejects the scientific philosophy of history and the significance of emerging class consciousness. Part Three (Prada, Barbosa, Hostos, Rodo) reflects the conflict between Church and State, and largely accepts the scientific sociology of August Comte. Part Four (Manuel Galvez, Freyre, Arevalo, Figueres and Betancourt) shows the intellectual stimulation of European refugees, the influences of Marxism and of the Mexican revolution. Within the four Parts are 42 sections with biographical data on each writer, and Dr. Davis' characterizations of the man and his influence. There is a selected bibliography of fifty general works, of which a bare half dozen are in English. The absence of an index requires much digging to find patterns, comparisons or contrasts of thought: Martí on revolution is at page 259, the Mexican Luis Mora at page 150. Race is treated by the Brazilian Da Cunha at p. 219, by the Argentine Galvez at p. 424. Nationalism, federalism, regionalism, labor, race, law, marxism, democracy and education are the topics treated most frequently. There is surprisingly little on militarism or caudilloism, and nothing from a feminine pen. The volume consolidates years of gathering of materials and gives representation to some forty Latin American writers in excerpts from their important works. The translations are a bit uneven.

The Latin American writers are commentators upon, rather than the originators of, social thought or of political forms. The excerpts are replete with references to Spinoza, Aquinas, Hegel, Descartes, Locke, Bentham, Engels, Renan, Ortega y Gasset, Carlyle, Spencer, William James and Unamuno. Davis concludes that the Latin Americans are much more given to speculative thought than to descriptive analysis. This volume is a signal contribution in an area regrettably underdeveloped in our country and theirs. It has been a prodigious effort to bring us up to date after the two decades since W. Rex Crawford's "A Century of Latin American Thought." But events move on, and subsequent to Dr. Davis' volume we have the writings and actions of Quadros and Goulart, of Arosemena and Frondizi, of Guevara and of Castro. And as the Vatican's Rerum Novarum of the last century marked many Latin American writings, so the 1961 Mater et Magistra may inspire and expand the bounds of social, political, and economic thought in Latin America in the next decades.—WILLARD F. BARBER, University of Maryland.

Political Ideas in the Modern World. By D. B. HEATER. (New York: Barnes and Noble, Inc., 1962. Pp. 208. $3.00.)

Two things are attempted here. First, (and to this the author's major attention is directed) an analysis and evaluation is conducted of several salient contemporary political ideals and their enveloping movements. Secondly, there is an exposition of the proposition that ideas have consequences, and that the consequences at this particular time are not very pleasant. The entire presentation is directed to a politically and ideologically unsophisticated audience. "It is hoped that examination candidates for (British) university entrance, officers of the armed services preparing for staff college and those who are 'just interested' will find these pages of some use." To this end a rudimentary bibliography is included together with a set of examination questions.

The pursuit of the author's first purpose consists of a series of chapters devoted to nationalism, communism, democracy, and religion, respectively. The basic format of these chapters consists of an examination of the ideational structure appropriate to each movement, the history of the movement's development, and an analysis of the movement's influence in the significant areas of the western and non-western world. A clearer idea of the range of this book can be gained from the subdivision of the chapter concerned with democracy (running 43 pages) which includes: "Classical Greece," "The English, American and French Revolutions," "Utilitarianism and Liberalism," "Democratic Socialism," "The Basic Elements" (equality, popular sovereignty, humanitarianism, the rule of law, liberty), "The Myth of Totalitarian Democracy," "Conditions for Democracy," and "Conclusions." At this point it is only a formality to point out that Mr. Heater has spread himself rather thinly, but there is some merit here. His judgments are temperate throughout, as befits one writing primarily within the liberal tradition ("A strong following for a beneficent idea is, naturally to be encouraged, but fanaticism is always to be deplored."). A further strength (especially noticeable in the chapter treating of nationalism) rests in the wealth of meaningfully presented historical and other illustrative materials. This, to the reviewer, seems to be the book's principal merit; the "just interested" reader could not but gain from this a broader understanding of the forces shaping the modern world.

However, there are serious deficiencies involved in the overly simplified presentation of political theories and their development. Admittedly, Mr. Heater faced a difficult problem: the significant presentation of complex material to untrained readers, but simplification can bleed into inadequacy. E.g., the analysis of Marxism is routine; the grosser elements are introduced in terms not too remote from journalistic exposition. What is presented is a reasonably fair but quite casual examination. It is to be regretted that the major Marxian contributions to the social sciences and the resultant modification of non-Marxian political philosophies are not made more apparent. A more serious disability, given the author's intent, is the failure to adequately plumb the strengths of communism as an ideology.

Numerous other objections of this kind could be raised. In the final analysis this book is not an adequate base for formal college instruction. The ideas dealt with are too isolated and simplified to permit systematic elaboration. However, as was noted above, in less formal circumstances the book has substantial merit.

Finally, a few words must be said concerning Mr. Heater's second point: the thesis that a powerful malaise has fallen upon political philosophy to the detriment of mankind. Extended remarks to this thesis are unnecessary since the argument is not carefully developed but only briefly sketched in.

Heater holds that the evils to which ideas or philosophies have contributed substantially are twofold: the threatened destruction of civilization as we know it through war, and the engulfment of the individual by the state. His point is not that ideologies, per se are dangerous, but that we are attempting to use obsolete political philosophies dating from the 18th and 19th centuries. These are identified as the Benthamite form of liberal democracy, extreme nationalism and Marxism. In each case the idea's obsolescence consists in its assumptions not matching reality (e.g., Marxism doesn't fit the facts of welfare economics, etc.). This disrapport between reality and our political ideas partially explains our current predicament.

What is needed therefore, is a set of more realistic political concepts. However, Mr. Heater believes we are encumbered in this by the decline of political philosophy in the modern world; we have lost the propensity to generate alternative systems. He accounts for this failure in familiar terms (thus logical positivism plays its usual instrumental role, etc.).

In the last three pages there is a tentative solution based upon a "refurbished natural law" which seems to represent a cross between the "biological principle of the preservation and development of the human race" and a myth of unspecified content (to "excite the imagination as well as satisfy the intellect"). So much for one of our current problems; the second problem is killed with the same stone: "Natural law insists on the natural and indefeasible rights of the individual."

Mr. Heater has thus traced an outline of a reforming political ideal, one sufficient to overcome nationalism and its companions. The substance of the argument is less to be noted here than the style. It is remarkable when one sets about to oppose a monster in a manner so drained of passion, and when judgments are so muted, bangs and whispers can fall together.—WILLIAM A. RITCHIE, University of Delaware.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

CECELIA M. KENYON
Smith College

Achminow, Herman. Khrushchev's "Creative Development" of Marxism-Leninism. Studies on the Soviet Union. 3/II/1962.

Agesta, Luis Sanchez. El principio de función subsidiaria. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1962.

Anan, Seiichi. Some Trends of Legal Thought and Natural Law Study in Japan. Natural Law Forum, 1962.

Aron, Raymond. A propos de la théorie politique. Revue Française de Science Politique. March, 1962.

Bamborough, Renford. Plato's Modern Friends and Enemies. Philosophy. April, 1962.

Bartsch, Günther. Marxismus und Arbeiterbewegung. Politische Studien. March-April, 1962.

Bergner, D. Die Deutsche Demokratische Republik würdigt Johann Gottlieb Fichte. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 4/X/1962.

Bracken, Harry M. Locke-Berkeley-Hume. Indian Journal of Philosophy. August, 1961.

Buhr, M. Das Verhältnis von Handeln und Denken in der Philosophie Johann Gottlieb Fichtes. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 4/X/1962.

Colwell, James L. The Populist Image of Vernon Louis Parrington. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1962.

Clarac, Pierre. La politique dans l'oeuvre de Chateaubriand. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. March, 1962.

Constable, George W. Who Can Determine What the Natural Law Is? Natural Law Forum. 1962.

Crosson, Frederick J. On the Ground for History in the Classical Philosophy of Human Nature. The Modern Schoolman. May, 1962.

Davis, Jim E. Alexander Hamilton and His Politics and Policies. The Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Dewey, Donald O. Madison's Views on Electoral Reform. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Echeverría, Rafael. El valor político del consentimiento popular. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.

d'Entreves, A. Passerin. Due domande intorno al diritto. Revista di Filosofia. 1/LIII/1962.

Espinosa, Miguel. La reflexión política configuradora. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1962.

Fairbanks, Matthew J. Pierce and Hegel. The New Scholasticism. April, 1962.

Fassò, Guido. On Natural Law as the Basis of Democracy. Natural Law Forum. 1962.

Fay, Charles. Toward a Thomistic-Anthropological View of the Evolution of Obligation. Natural Law Forum. 1962.

Feinberg, Joel. Problematic Responsibility in Law and Morals. The Philosophical Review. July, 1962.

Fetscher, Iring. Faschismus und Nationalsozialismus—Zur Kritik des sowjetmarxistischen Faschismusbegriffs. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. March, 1962.

Fetscher, Iring. Marxismus und Bürokratie. International Review of Social History. 3/V/1960.

Feuer, Lewis S. Travelers to the Soviet Union 1917-32: The Formation of a Component of New Deal Ideology. American Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Frisch, Morton J. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Problem of Democratic Liberty. Ethics. April, 1962.

Gini, Corrado. Las manías del mundo contemporáneo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.

Ginsberg, Morris. The Concept of Law. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1962.

Glickman, Harvey. The Toryness of English

- Conservatism. Journal of British Studies. November, 1961.
- Gottfried, Alex, and Davidson, Sue. Utopia's Children: An Interpretation of Three Political Novels. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.
- Grasso, Pietro Guiseppe. "Stato di Diritto" e "Stato Sociale" Nell'attuale ordinamento italiano. Il Politico. December, 1961.
- Gregor, A. James. La filosofía política de Giovanni Gentile. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1962.
- Greifer, Elisha. The Conservative Pose in America: The Adamses' Search for a Pre-Liberal Past. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.
- Gummere, Richard M. The Classical Ancestry of the United States Constitution. American Quarterly. Spring, 1962.
- Hancock, Roger. Ideas of Freedom. Review of Metaphysics. June, 1962.
- Hendel, Charles W. The Eighteenth Century as an Age of Ethical Crisis. Ethics. April, 1962.
- Hexter, J. H. Thomas More: on the Margins of Modernity. Journal of British Studies. November, 1961.
- Higham, John. Beyond Consensus: the Historian as Moral Critic. American Historical Review. April, 1962.
- Hilbig, K., and Grohmann, G. Der humanistische Charakter des Programms und der Politik der Kommunistischen Partei der Sowjetunion und das antihumanistische Wesen des Imperialismus. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 2/X/1962.
- de la Iglesia, María Rosa Saurin. Momentos y problemas del liberalismo ochocentista alemán. Hispania: Revista Española de Historia. No. LXXXV, Vol. XXII, 1962.
- Iribarne, Manuel Fraga. Carl Schmitt: el hombre y la obra. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.
- Kaderschafka, G. u. K. Die Rolle des sozialistischen Staates und der sozialistischen Arbeit bei der Herausbildung der sozialistischen Moral. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 2/X/1962.
- Kapadia, B. H. Predecessors of Kautilya. Journal of Indian History. December, 1961.
- Keane, E. F. Bertrand Russell and the Emotive Theory. Indian Journal of Philosophy. August, 1961.
- King, Robert W. Communism, A Self-Limiting Political Order. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1962.
- Krippendorff, Ekkehart. Legitimität als Problem der Politikwissenschaft. Zeitschrift für Politik. March, 1962.
- Ladd, Jr., Everett C. Helvétius and d'Holbach. Journal of the History of Ideas. April-June, 1962.
- Leclercq, Jacques. Natural Law and the Unknown. Natural Law Forum. 1962.
- Leiserson, Avery. ¿Están trabajando los científicos en problemas importantes? Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1962.
- Levine, Daniel. The Social Philosophy of Albert J. Beveridge. Indiana Magazine of History. June, 1962.
- Lévy-Bruhl, H. Juge et prudent. Revue Historique de Droit Français et Étranger. January-March, 1962.
- Lindbeck, George A. Natural Law in the Thought of Paul Tillich. Natural Law Forum. 1962.
- Lindner, H. Fichtes Humanismus der Tat. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 4/X/1962.
- Lombardi, F. L'elemento politico nella formazione del pensiero speculativo europeo. Revista di Filosofia. 1/LIII/1962.
- Losos, Joseph, O. Relativism and the Legal Process. The Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. June, 1961.
- Marti, Paul. Tolstoï "Krieg und Frieden" und Pasternaks "Dr. Schiwago." Schweizer Monatshefte. April, 1962.
- Mesnard, Pierre. The Psychology and Pneumatology of Jean Bodin. International Philosophical Quarterly. May, 1962.
- Midgley, Louis, Paul Tillich's New Science of Values. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.
- Mohler, Armin. Konservativ 1962. Der Monat. April, 1962.
- Morgenthau, Hans. A Political Theory of Foreign Aid. American Political Science Review. June, 1962.
- Muller, W. Der marxistische Freiheitsbegriff. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 4/X/1962.
- de Pablo, Luis Santiago. El tránsito del socialismo al comunismo en la ideología soviética actual. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1962.
- Paechter, Heinz. Radikalismus in den USA. Der Monat. February, 1962.
- Plattel, M. G. Personal Response and the Natural Law. Natural Law Forum. 1962.
- Pole, J. R. Forward from McCarthyism. The Political Quarterly. April-June, 1962.
- Pole, J. R. Historians and the Problem of Early American Democracy. American Historical Review. April, 1962.
- Pressly, Thomas J. Bullets and Ballots: Lincoln and the "Right of Revolution." American Historical Review. April, 1962.
- Rose, Richard. The Political Ideas of English Party Activists. American Political Science Review. June, 1962.
- Rothman, Stanley F. Marxism and the Paradox of Contemporary Political Thought. Review of Politics. April, 1962.
- Rothman, Stanley F. The Revival of Classical

Political Philosophy: A Critique. American Political Science Review. June, 1962.

Rubel, M. Deux interviews de Karl Marx sur la Commune. Le Mouvement Social. January-March, 1962.

Sandoz, Ellis. Voegelin's Idea of Historical Form. Cross Currents. Winter, 1962.

Schall, James V. Cartesianism and Political Theory. Review of Politics. April, 1962.

Shuchman, Philip. Aristotle's Conception of Contract. Journal of the History of Ideas. April-June, 1962.

Schweitzer, Arthur. Ideological Strategy. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Sigler, Jay A. Politics and the Philosophy of Science. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

Sontheimer, Kurt. Der antiliberale Staatsgedanke in der Weimarer Republik. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. March, 1962.

Stocking, George W., Jr. Lamarckianism in Social Thought. Journal of the History of Ideas. April-June, 1962.

Stoppino, Mario. Libertà e "Rule of Law." Il Politico. December, 1961.

Stumpf, Samuel E. International Law: The Testing Ground of Theory. Natural Law Forum. 1962.

Suffel, Jacques. La politique dans l'oeuvre d'Anatole France. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. April-May, 1962.

Tinder, Glenn. Is Liberalism Out-of-Date? The Journal of Politics. May, 1962.

Ulbricht, Walter. Das Banner der Volksdemokratie auf deutschen Boden. Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft. 1/X/1962.

Van Der Kroef, Justus M. Lenin, Mao and Aidit. The China Quarterly. April-June, 1962.

Waltz, Kenneth N. Kant, Liberalism, and War. American Political Science Review. June, 1962.

Ward, Bernard. Hume's Non-Utilitarianism. Ethics. April, 1962.

Wolff, Robert Paul. Reflections on Game Theory and the Nature of Value. Ethics. April, 1962.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

JULIAN FELDMAN

University of California, Berkeley

Philosophy of Social Science

Allport, F. H. A structuronomic conception of behavior: Individual and collective I. Structural theory and the master problem of social psychology. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 1, January.

Research Methods

Banerjee, K. S. A unified statistical approach to the index number problem. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 4, October.

Blau, P. M. Operationalizing a conceptual scheme: The universalism-particularism pattern variable. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 2, April.

Briggs, F. E. A. The influence of errors on the correlation of ratios. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 1, January.

Broadhurst, P. L. Coordinate indexing: a bibliographic aid. American Psychologist, 1962, 17, 3, March.

Camilleri, S. F. Theory, probability, and induction in social research. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 2, April.

Campbell, J. T. Assessments of higher-level personnel: I. Background and scope of the research. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.

Campbell, J. T., Otis, J. L., Liske, R. E., and

Prien, E. P. Assessments of higher-level personnel: II. Validity of the over-all assessment process. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.

Carter, L. F. Automated instruction. American Psychologist, 1961, 16, 11, November.

Cattell, R. B., and Sullivan, W. The scientific nature of factors: A demonstration by cups of coffee. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 2, April.

Charnes, A., and Cooper, W. W. Chance constraints and normal deviates. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 297, March.

Coppinger, N. W., and Saucer, R. T. Multidimensional psychophysics as a method of studying institutions. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.

Creager, J. A., and Valentine, L. D., Jr. Regression analysis of linear composite variance. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.

Crozier, R. B., and Darcovich, W. Time series analysis by electronic computers: A report on some recent applications at the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, 1962, 28, 1, February.

Easterfield, T. E. A short cut in a class of simulation problems. Operational Research Quarterly, 1961, 12, 4, December.

Ehrlich, H. J., Rinehart, J. W., and Howell,

- J. C. The study of role conflict: Explorations in methodology. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.
- Engel, J. F. Tape recorders in consumer research. Journal of Marketing, 1962, 26, 2, April.
- Fisher, F. M. Identifiability criteria in nonlinear systems. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 4, October.
- Geisler, M. A. Appraisal of laboratory simulation experiences. Management Science, 1962, 8, 3, April.
- Gibson, W. A. An asymmetric approach to multiple factor analysis. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 2, November.
- Gibson, W. A. Extending latent class solutions to other variables. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.
- Glasser, G. J. A distribution-free test of independence with a sample of paired observations. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 297, March.
- Gold, D. Independent causation in multivariate analysis: The case of political alienation and attitude toward a school bond issue. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.
- Guertin, W. H. Research with the Wechsler intelligence scales for adults: 1955-60. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 1, January.
- Halpern, S. Hypno introspection: a contribution to the theory of hypnotherapy. Part I. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.
- Hazewinkel, A. Some uses of the square root method as a tool in multiple prediction. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.
- Hirschman, A. O., and Lindblom, C. E. Economic development, research and development, policy making: Some converging views. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 2, April.
- Hoffman, P. J. Assessment of the independent contributions of predictors. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 1, January.
- Hurley, J. R., and Cattell, R. B. The Procrustes program: Producing direct rotation to test a hypothesized factor structure. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 2, April.
- Jarrett, R. F. A note on rotation and psychological space. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 2, November.
- Kahneman, D., and Ghiselli, E. E. Validity and nonlinear heteroscedastic models. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.
- Kaiser, H. F. Formulas for component scores. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.
- Keats, J. A., and Lord, F. M. A theoretical distribution for mental test scores. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.
- Kennedy, J. L. The system approach: organizational development. Human Factors, 1962, 4, 1, February.
- Kindahl, J. K. Estimation of means and totals from finite populations of unknown size. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 297, March.
- Kish, L. Studies of interviewer variance for attitudinal variables. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 297, March.
- Knapp, R. H. A factor analysis of Thorndike's ratings of eminent men. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.
- Konijn, H. S. Identification and estimation in a simultaneous equations model with errors in the variables. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 1, January.
- Lazer, W. The role of models in marketing. Journal of Marketing, 1962, 26, 2, April.
- Lee, Joan C., and Tucker, R. B. An investigation of clinical judgment: a study in method. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 4, April.
- Leong, Y. S. The use of an iterated moving average in measuring seasonal variations. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 297, March.
- Locke, E. A., and Hulin, C. L. A review and evaluation of the validity studies of activity vector analysis. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.
- Mandelbrot, B. Paretian distributions and income maximization. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1962, 76, 1, February.
- Mandelbrot, B. Stable Paretian random functions and the multiplicative variation of income. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 4, October.
- McKenney, J. L. Simultaneous processing of jobs on an electronic computer. Management Science, 1962, 8, 3, April.
- Messinger, S. L. Life as theater: Some notes on the dramaturgic approach to social reality. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.
- Namias, J. A rapid method to detect differences in interviewer performance. Journal of Marketing, 1962, 26, 2, April.
- Pearce, I. F. An exact method of consumer demand analysis. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 4, October.
- Ray, W. S., Hundleby, J. D., and Goldstein, D. A. Test skewness and kurtosis as functions of item parameters. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.
- Ross, H. L. The local community: A survey approach. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.
- Rydborg, S. Methods of correcting correlations for indirect restriction of range with non-interval data. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.
- Sandon, F. The means of sections from a normal distribution. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 2, November.
- Stricker, G. The construction and partial validation of an objectively scorable apperception test. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Suits, D. B. Forecasting and analysis with an econometric model. The American Economic Review, 1962, 52, 1, March.

Textor, R. B. A statistical method for the study of shamanism. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 1, Spring.

Thompson, J. W. Meaningful and unmeaningful rotation of factors. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 3, May.

Vandenberg, S. G., Green, B. F. and Wrigley, C. F. A survey of computer usage in departments of psychology and sociology. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Zelditch, M., Jr. Some methodological problems of field studies. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Zellner, A., and Theil, H. Three-stage least squares: Simultaneous estimation of simultaneous equations. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 1, January.

Motivation and Personality

Bendig, A. W., A factor analysis of personality scales including the Buss-Durkee hostility inventory. The Journal of General Psychology, 1962, 66, 2nd half, April.

Borgatta, E. F. The coincidence of subtests in four personality inventories. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, 2nd half, April.

Bramel, D. A dissonance theory approach to defensive projection. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.

Budner, S. Intolerance of ambiguity as a personality variable. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Burt, C. The gifted child. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 2, November.

Cerbus, G., and Nichols, R. C. Personality correlates of picture preferences. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 1, January.

Cooper, A., and Cowen, E. L. The social desirability of trait descriptive terms: a study of feeling reactions to adjective descriptions. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, 2nd half, April.

Crockett, H. J., Jr. The achievement motive and differential occupational mobility in the United States. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 2, April.

Dufort, R. H., and Wright, J. H. Food intake as a function of duration of food deprivation. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Dunnette, M. D., McCartney, J., Carlson, H. C., and Kirchner, W. K. A study of faking behavior on a forced-choice self-description checklist. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.

Edwards, A. L. Social desirability and expected means on MMPI scales. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1962, 21, 1, Spring.

Epstein, S., and Fenz, W. D. Theory and experiment on the measurement of approach-avoidance conflict. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.

Epstein, S., and Levitt, H. The influence of hunger on the learning and recall of food related words. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.

Evans, G. C. The influence of "fake" personality evaluations of self description. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Field, J. G. An interpersonal validation of the MPI. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.

Hetrick, W. R., and Haas, K. Some personality correlates of verbal conditioning. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Loevinger, J. Measuring personality patterns of women. Genetic Psychology Monographs, 1962, 65, 1, February.

Longenecker, E. D. Perceptual recognition as a function of anxiety, motivation, and the testing situation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 3, March.

Maccoby, E. A. Class differences in boys' choices of authority roles. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.

Martin, C., and Nichols, R. C. Personality and religious beliefs. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.

Miller, N. E. Analytical studies of drive and reward. American Psychologist, 1961, 16, 12, December.

Sampson, E. E. Birth order, need achievement, and conformity. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.

Shaw, M. E. The effectiveness of Whyte's rules: "How to cheat on personality tests." Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 1, February.

Spreen, O. The translation of personality scales and their adaptation for cross-cultural and clinical use. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.

Veroff, J., Feld, S., and Gurin, G. Achievement motivation and religious background. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 2, April.

Wiggins, J. S. Strategic, method, and stylistic variance in the MMPI. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 3, May.

Wrightman, L. S., Jr. Authoritarianism and self awareness. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, 2nd half, April.

Zander, A., and Curtis, T. Effects of social power on aspiration setting and striving. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 1, January.

Opinions and Attitudes

Bolda, R. A., and Lawshe, C. H. Evaluation of role playing. Personnel Administration, 1962, 25, 2, March-April.

- Brock, T. C. Cognitive restructuring and attitude change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 4, April.
- Fishbein, M., and Raven, B. H. The AB scales—an operational definition of belief and attitude. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.
- Geiser, R. L., and Newman, R. W. Psychology and the legal process: Opinion polls as evidence. American Psychologist, 1961, 16, 11, November.
- Leventhal, H. The effects of set and discrepancy on impression change. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.
- Rettig, S., and Pasamanick, B. Invariance in factor structure of moral value judgments from American and Korean college students. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.
- Wells, H. K. Religious attitudes at a small denominational college as compared with Harvard and Radcliffe. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.
- Cognitive Processes and Individual Decision Making
- Alberoni, F. Contribution to the study of subjective probability. I. The Journal of General Psychology, 1962, 66, 2nd half, April.
- Alberoni, F. Contribution to the study of subjective probability: Prediction. II. The Journal of General Psychology, 1962, 66, 2nd half, April.
- Appel, J. B., and Hiss, R. H. The discrimination of contingent from non-contingent reinforcement. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1962, 55, 1, February.
- Baker, C. H. Maintaining the level of vigilance by means of knowledge of results about a secondary vigilance task. Ergonomics, 1961, 4, 4, October.
- Becker, G. M. Objective measures of subjective probability and utility. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 2, March.
- Becker, S. W., and Siegel, S. Utility and level of aspiration. The American Journal of Psychology, 1962, 75, 1, March.
- Bitterman, M. E. Techniques for the study of learning in animals. Analysis and classification. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 2, March.
- Blake, R. R., and Mouton, J. S. Comprehension of points of communality in competing solutions. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.
- Brackbill, Y., Kappy, M. S., and Starr, R. H. Magnitude of reward and probability learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 1, January.
- Chapman, J. P. The spacing of sequentially dependent trials in probability learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 6, December.
- Cohen, J., and Cooper, P. A model for choice in equiprobable situations. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 3.
- Davies, J. C. Toward a theory of revolution. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.
- Demsetz, H. The effect of consumer experience on brand loyalty and the structure of market demand. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 1, January.
- De Soto, C. B., and Bosley, J. J. The cognitive structure of a social structure. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 4, April.
- Edwards, W. Subjective probabilities inferred from decisions. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 2, March.
- Feather, N. T. The study of persistence. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 2, March.
- Ferber, R. Brand choice and social stratification. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business, 1962, 2, 1, February.
- Ferber, R. Research on household behavior. The American Economic Review, 1962, 52, 1, March.
- Fowler, W. Cognitive learning in infancy and early childhood. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 2, March.
- Frank, R. E. Brand choice as a probability process. The Journal of Business 1962, 35, 1, January.
- Frijda, N. H., and van de Geer, J. P. Codability and recognition: an experiment with facial expressions. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.
- Gagné, R. M. Military training and principles of learning. American Psychologist, 1962, 17, 2, February.
- Gagné, R. M., and Smith, E. C., Jr. A study of the effects of verbalization on problem solving. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 1, January.
- Games, P. A. A factorial analysis of verbal learning tasks. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 1, January.
- Gardner, R. A., and Forsythe, J. B. Supplementary Report: Two-choice decision behavior with many alternative events. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 6, December.
- Goetz, B. E., and Bennis, W. G. What we know about learning and training. Personnel Administration, 1962, 25, 2, March-April.
- Gogel, W. C. The effect of convergence on perceived size and distance. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.
- Goldstein, M. J., and Himmelfarb, S. Z. The effects of providing knowledge of results upon the perceptual defense effect. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.
- Griswold, B. J., and Luce, R. D. Choices among uncertain outcomes: A test of a decomposition and two assumptions of transitivity. The American Journal of Psychology, 1962, 75, 1, March.
- Gyr, J., Thatcher, J., and Allen, G. Computer simulation of a model of cognitive organization. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Harary, F., and Lipstein, B. The dynamics of brand loyalty: A Markovian approach. Operations Research, 1962, 10, 1, January-February.

Holland, H. C. Judgments and the effects of instructions. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 3.

Holt, C. C. Linear decision rules for economic stabilization and growth. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1962, 76, 1, February.

Haywood, H. C. Novelty-seeking behavior as a function of manifest anxiety and physiological arousal. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Jewell, W. S. A linear risk model. Operational Research Quarterly, 1961, 12, 4, December.

Kanal, L. A functional equation analysis of two learning models. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.

Kanal, L. The asymptotic distribution for the two-absorbing-barrier beta model. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 1, March.

Kaplan, S. J. Radiation research in psychology: An analysis of techniques in maze experimentation. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 2, March.

Karn, H. W., Gregg, L. W., and Pitz, G. F. The effect of systematic and nonsystematic presentation of stimuli on peripheral visual acuity. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

King, H. E. Anticipatory behavior: temporal matching by normal and psychotic subjects. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Kinkade, R. G., and Kidd, J. S. The use of an operational game as a method of task familiarization. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 1, February.

Koenig, F. W., and King, M. B., Jr. Cognitive simplicity and prejudice. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Korn, S. J., and Welch, L. Conditioned responses: fact and artifact. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Krugman, H. E. The learning of consumer preference. Journal of Marketing, 1962, 26, 2, April.

Lacey, O. L. The human organism as a random mechanism. The Journal of General Psychology, 1962, 66, 2nd half, April.

Lewis, D. J., and Duncan, C. P. Expectation and resistance to extinction under partial reinforcement and risk-taking. The American Journal of Psychology, 1962, 75, 1, March.

Lindman, H., and Edwards, W. Supplementary report: Unlearning the gambler's fallacy. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 6, December.

Luce, R. D., and Shipley, E. F. Preference probability between gambles as a step function of event probability. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 1, January.

Luchins, A. S., and Luchins, E. H. The effect of the degree of freedom of choice on learning and perception. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, 2nd half, April.

Mayzner, M. S., and Tresselt, M. E. Verbal concept attainment: a function of the number and strength of positive instances presented. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Newman, S. E., and Saltz, E. Serial position as a cue in learning. The American Journal of Psychology, 1962, 75, 1, March.

Phelan, J. G. An exploration of some personality correlates to business risk-taking behavior. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, 2nd half, April.

Roby, T. B. Utility and futurity. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 2, April.

Roelofs, C. O. Equidistance tendency. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.

Rommetveit, R. Perceptual, behavioral and ideational components of discriminatory and conceptual activities. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 3.

Samuel, A. L. Artificial intelligence: A frontier of automation. The Annals of The American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Schubik, M. Some experimental non-zero sum games with lack of information about the rules. Management Science, 1962, 8, 2, January.

Singh, S. D., and Singh, V. The effect of stimulant and depressant drugs on the latency of autokinetic illusion. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.

Smedslund, J. The utilization of probabilistic cues after 1100 and 4800 stimulus-presentations. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.

Spence, D. P., and Bressler, J. Subliminal activation of conceptual associates: a study of "rational" preconscious thinking. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Spencer, J. Estimating averages. Ergonomics, 1961, 4, 4, October.

Spielberger, C. D., Levin, S. M., and Shepard, M. C. The effects of awareness and attitude toward the reinforcement on the operant conditioning of verbal behavior. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Toda, M. The design of a fungus-eater: A model of human behavior in an unsophisticated environment. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 2, April.

Voronin, L. G. Some results of comparative-physiological investigations of higher nervous activity. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 3, May.

Wagner, A. R., and Miller, N. Choice behavior and resistance to extinction. The Psychological Record, 1962, 12, 1, January.

Waters, J. E., and Kodman, F., Jr. Abstract conditioning. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Westfall, R. Psychological factors in predicting product choice. Journal of Marketing, 1962, 2, April.

White, L. A. Symboling: a kind of behavior. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Interpersonal Influence

Barth, E. A. T. Community influence systems: Structure and change. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Cohen, A. R. A dissonance analysis of the boomerang effect. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Deutsch, M., Krauss, R. M., and Rosenau, N. Dissonance or defensiveness? Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 1, March.

Goldstein, M. J., Himmelfarb, S., and Feder, W. A further study of the relationship between response bias and perceptual defense. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 1, January.

Graham, D. Experimental studies of social influence in simple judgment situations. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, 2nd half, April.

Levitt, E. E., Lubin, B., and Brady, J. P. The effect of the pseudo-volunteer on studies of volunteers for psychology experiments. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 1, February.

McGuire, W. J. Persistence of the resistance to persuasion induced by various types of prior belief defenses. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 4, April.

Manfield, E. Technical change and the rate of imitation. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 4, October.

Richmond, J. F., and Buehler, R. E. Interpersonal communication: A theoretical formulation. The Journal of Communication, 1962, 12, 1, March.

Thumin, F. J. What psychologists should know about marketing and advertising research. The Journal of Psychology, 1962, 53, April.

Group Behavior

Albert, R. S., and Brigante, T. R. The psychology of friendship relations: Social factors. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.

Blau, P. M. Patterns of choice in interpersonal relations. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.

Blake, R. R., and Mouton, J. S. Overvaluation of own group's product in intergroup competition. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 3, March.

Calvin, A. D. Social reinforcement. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.

Cleveland, S. E., and Morton, R. B. Group behavior and body image: a follow-up study. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.

Cohen, A. M. Changing small-group communication networks. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 6, 4, March.

Fishman, J. A. Some social and psychological determinants of intergroup relations in changing neighborhoods: An introduction to the Bridgeview study. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Gallo, P. S., and Mc Clintock, C. G. Behavioral, attitudinal, and perceptual differences between leaders and non-leaders in situations of group support and non-support. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.

Gidwani, K. A., Valunjkar, T. N., and Chowdry, K. Leader behavior in elected and non-elected groups. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 1, Spring.

Harsanyi, J. C. Measurement of social power in n-person reciprocal power situations. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1 January.

Harsanyi, J. C. Measurement of social power, opportunity costs, and the theory of two-person bargaining games. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Hoffman, L. R., Harburg, E., and Maier, N. R. F. Differences and disagreement as factors in creative group problem solving. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 3, March.

Howells, L. T., and Becker, S. W. Seating arrangement and leadership emergence. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.

Lerner, M. J., and Becker, S. Interpersonal choice as a function of ascribed similarity and definition of the situation. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.

Maier, N. R. F., and Hoffman, L. R. Group decision in England and the United States. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.

Rapoport, A., Chammah, A., Dwyer, J., and Gyr, J. Three-person non-zero-sum nonnegotiable games. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Rapoport, A., and Orwant, C. Experimental games: A review. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Shapley, L. S. Simple games: An outline of the descriptive theory. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Snoek, J. D. Some effects of rejection upon attraction to a group. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 3, March.

Theodorson, G. A. The function of hostility in small groups. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, February.

Tuckman, J., and Lorge, I. Individual ability as a determinant of group superiority. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.

Turk, T., and Turk, H. Group interaction in a formal setting: The case of the triad. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.

Weinstein, E. A., and Geisel, P. N. Family decision making over desegregation. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.

Wilson, K. V., and Bixenstine, V. E. Forms of social control in two-person, two-choice games. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 1, January.

Ziller, R. C., Behringer, R. D., and Goodchilds, J. D. Group creativity under conditions of success or failure and variations in group stability. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 1, February.

Organizational Behavior

Ashburn, A. Detroit automation. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Buckingham, W. The great employment controversy. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Collett, M. J. Simulation as a management development tool. Personnel Administration, 1962, 25, 2, March-April.

Daniels, M. J. Levels of organization in the role position of the staff nurse. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Diebold, J. The application of information technology. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Emery, F. E. Heuristic models of the marketing process. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.

Emery, F. E., and Marek, J. Some socio-technical aspects of automation. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.

Erbe, W. Gregariousness, group membership, and the flow of information. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Faunce, W. A., Hardin, E., and Jacobson, E. H. Automation and the employee. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Feinberg, M. R., and Lefkowitz, J. Image of industrial psychology among corporate executives. American Psychologist, 1962, 17, 2, February.

Ferguson, C. E., and Pfouts, R. W. Learning and expectations in dynamic duopoly behavior. Behavioral Science, 1962, 7, 2, April.

Fisch, G. G. Organization center analysis. Business Quarterly, 1961, 26, 4, Winter.

Forehand, G. A., and Guetzkow, H. Judgment and decision-making activities of government executives as described by superiors and co-workers. Management Science, 1962, 8, 3, April.

Fouraker, L. E., and Harnett, D. L. An experimental disposition of alternative bilateral monopoly models under conditions of price leadership. Operations Research, 1962, 10, 1, January-February.

Guetzkow, H., Forehand, G. A., and James, B. J. An evaluation of educational influence on administrative judgment. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 6, 4, March.

Harris, C. C., Jr., and DeLoach, D. B. Profit motive: A stimulant to federal administrative efficiency? Public Administration Review, 1962, 22, 1, Winter.

Harris, E. F., and Fleishman, E. A. Patterns of leadership behavior related to employee grievances and turnover. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, Spring.

Katzell, R. A. Contrasting systems of work organization. American Psychologist, 1962, 17, 2, February.

Kornhauser, A. Mental health of factory workers: A Detroit study. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 1, Spring.

Litwak, E., and Hylton, L. F. Interorganizational analysis: A hypothesis on co-ordinating agencies. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 6, 4, March.

Marcson, S. Organization and authority in industrial research. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Parker, J. P. Some organizational variables and their effect upon comprehension. The Journal of Communication, 1962, 12, 1, March.

Peabody, R. L. Perceptions of organizational authority: A comparative analysis. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 6, 4, March.

Pearlin, L. I., and Rosenberg, M. Nurse-patient social distance and the structural context of a mental hospital. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.

Read, W. H. Upward communication in industrial hierarchies. Human Relations, 1962, 15, 1, February.

Reintjes, J. F. The intellectual foundations of automation. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Rim, Y. Dimensions of job incentives and personality. ACTA Psychologica, 1961, 18, 5.

Roth, J. A. "Management bias" in the study of medical treatment. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 1, Spring.

Shubik, M. Incentives, decentralized control, the assignment of joint costs and internal pricing. Management Science, 1962, 8, 3, April.

Speroff, B. J. Automation and human relations: Some problems and predictions. Personnel Administration, 1962, 25, 2, March-April.

Sprowls, R. C., and Asimow, M. A model of customer behavior for the Task manufacturing corporation. Management Science, 1962, 8, 3, April.

Stanton, E. S. Which approach to management-democratic, authoritarian or . . . ? Personnel Administration, 1962, 25, 2, March-April.

Stout, T. M. Process control: Past, present, and future. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Whisler, T. L., and Shultz, G. P. Automation and the management process. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1962, 340, March.

Voting Behavior

Dempsey, Paul. Liberalism-conservatism and party loyalty in the U. S. Senate. The Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 56, 2nd half, April.

Horton, J. E., and Thompson, W. E. Powerlessness and political negativism: A study of defeated local referendums. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Lustig, N. I. The relationships between demographic characteristics and pro-integration vote of white precincts in a metropolitan southern county. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Middleton, R. The civil rights issue and presidential voting among southern negroes and whites. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Searles, R., and Williams, J. A. Jr. Negro college students' participation in sit-ins. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Culture and Institutions

Ball, H. V., Simpson, G. E., and Ikeda, K. Law and social change: Sumner reconsidered. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Becker, E. Socialization, command of performance, and mental illness. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Berkowitz, L., and Green, J. A. The stimulus qualities of the scapegoat. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 4, April.

Bornstein, M. The Soviet price system. The American Economic Review, 1962, 52, 1, March.

Bose, S. P. Peasant values and innovation in India. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Catton, W. R., Jr., and Hong, S. C. The relation of apparent minority ethnocentrism to majority antipathy. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 2, April.

Chenery, H. B., Shishido, S., and Watanabe, T. The pattern of Japanese growth, 1914-1954. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 1, January.

Christensen, H. T., and Carpenter, G. R. Value-behavior discrepancies regarding premarital coitus in three western cultures. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.

deCharms, R., and Moeller, G. H. Values expressed in American Children's readers: 1800-1950. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1962, 64, 2, February.

Emerson, R. M. Power-dependence relations. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.

Greenfield, R. W. Factors associated with attitudes toward desegregation in a Florida residential suburb. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Gusfield, J. R. Mass society and extremist politics. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.

Hughes, E. C. Ethnocentric sociology. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Kogan, N., and Shelton, F. C. Beliefs about "old people:" a comparative study of older and younger samples. The Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1962, 100, 1st half, March.

Kornai, J., and Liptak, T. A mathematical investigation of some economic effects of profit sharing in socialist firms. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 1, January.

Kriesberg, L. The bases of occupational prestige: The case of dentists. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 2, April.

Kubat, D. Soviet theory of classes. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Medalia, N. Z. Myrdal's assumptions on race relations: A conceptual commentary. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Mowrer, E. R. Sequential and class variables of the family in the suburban area. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 2, December.

Musgrove, F. The educational and geographical background of some local leaders. The British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 4, December.

Nye, F. I. Maternal employment and marital interaction: Some contingent conditions. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 2, December.

Pasamanick, B. Comparative psychological studies of negroes and whites in the United States: a clarification. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 3, May.

Peck, R. F., and Galliani, C. Intelligence, ethnicity and social roles in adolescent society. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.

Remmling, G. W. Karl Mannheim: Revision of an intellectual portrait. Social Forces, 1961, 40, 1, October.

Ross, H. L. Reasons for moves to and from a central city area. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Rowntree, G., and Pierce, R. M. Birth control in Britain. Population Studies, 1961, 15, 1, July.

Roy, P. The measurement of assimilation: The Spokane Indians. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Sommer, R. The distance for comfortable conversation: A further study. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 1, March.

Stub, H. R. The occupational characteristics of migrants to Duluth: A retest of Rose's migration hypothesis. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 1, February.

Thomas, E. M. Reinspecting a structural position on occupational prestige. The American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 5, March.

Vallier, I. Structural differentiation, production imperatives and communal norms: The kibbutz in crisis. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 3, March.

Walters, A. A. The theory and measurement of private and social cost of highway congestion. Econometrica, 1961, 29, 4, October.

Waterman, A. The National Science Foundation. Impact of Science on Society 1961, 11, 4.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process. EDITED BY WALTER F. MURPHY AND C. HERMAN PRITCHETT. (New York: Random House, 1961. Pp. xviii, 707. $4.95.)

Where Francis Heller (Introduction to Constitutional Law, 1952) and then Glendon Schubert (Constitutional Politics, 1960) proved the relevance of non-case material to casebooks in constitutional law, Murphy and Pritchett show the appropriateness of cases to a book of readings in the nature of the judicial process. Since these amount to almost a third of the items in the book and are marvelously revealing of the judicial process, I conclude that opinions in court cases will always remain central in the study of public law! Cases are not strictly parallel to statutes in being the end product of comparable processes, as is sometimes asserted nowadays. Cases are more than that if only in the many instances where judges relate factors that pushed them toward one decision rather than another.

This book reflects the tension between old and new ways in which political scientists and lawyers look at law. The new ways are at least as old as Holmes' Common Law and the old as new as the latest editorial piety that the Constitution is what the Framers said it was. Murphy and Pritchett, like many of the rest of us, find "there are many ways of looking at law and at the function of judges" and this is the feeling that marks their book. Yet they gesture toward current political science ideology by saying, awkwardly enough, that their book attempts "a behavioristic kind of analysis." Further, "we have heard much talk of the governmental process, the administrative process, the legislative process. The process type of analysis contrasts generally with the institutional approach, in which attention is centered on governmental structures and their legal status, functions and powers. Process analysis professes to go beyond the appearance to the reality, beyond the legal facade to the actual operating mechanism." But having made this bow the editors do not rely heavily on the work of political scientists who have recently sought unique approaches to the judicial process. These are by no means absent but they are not a prominent feature of the book and, moreover, Murphy and Pritchett do not themselves provide a behavioral overview of the subject.

What the book does is to give an eclectic view, a catholic view of American law, chiefly at the Supreme Court level, in relation to the rest of the political landscape. Juxtaposition of contrasting viewpoints, the staple of successful anthologies, is exquisitely achieved at a number of points: Joseph Perry's fresh "How I Got to Be a Federal Judge" next to the Brennan Hearings; Justice Frankfurter's appraisal of the 28 men who came on the Supreme Court without any prior judicial experience next to the Talmadge bill that would require Supreme Court justices to have five years of judicial service; Charles P. Curtis and Henry S. Drinker debating the ethics of advocacy; and Jack Greenberg and Edmond Cahn disagreeing on the social science testimony in the School Segregation Cases. Excerpts from seven decisions in Virgil Hawkins' case give one instance of several where the editors pursue a point to its logical (or illogical) end.

Courts, Judges and Politics is most clearly suited to undergraduate instruction in political science for several reasons. It is organized in a common-sense way, by topics, to illustrate the variety of conditions that hedge or help judicial action in the United States. It provides introductory essays that will give any student his bearings and fill the cracks among the readings. These essays, 18 in number in addition to the preface, treat theories of the judicial role, the characteristics of state and federal judicial systems, attributes and relations between bar and bench, and access to and sources of judicial review in a democratic government, among others. A collection of readings from Presidential statements, press conferences, messages and letters; from proposed bills, hearings, speeches on the floor of Congress, and statutes; from judicial opinions, court rules and ex cathedra writings of justices and judges; and from a range of academic sources the book reflects the range and diversity of the subject. It amply shows that the courts cannot be unzipped for study, apart from the fabric of society and its government. This is a book that opens many vistas, tells something about each one and indicates that there is yet more to learn. And since individual readings and their relation to others are often exciting, the book will doubtless capture the interest of many students.

The success achieved by Murphy and Pritchett in introducing students to the romance of the subject of judicial politics may possibly make this book inappropriate for graduate students. At least this is a deficiency I see when the book is measured by Whitehead's admonition that the stage of precision should follow that of romance. It fails in at least three ways to serve the interest of advanced students. First, it does not attempt a systematic framework for analysis in spite of the announced aim of contributing to the literature of political behavior. Second, it does not sufficiently mark out the historical dimensions of the topics under study. For one thing there is no indication on the face of the book that about 85 of the 125 odd readings are post-World War II. For another the underlying social, economic and political forces that have influenced the law in this period are not stressed. Third, the selections have been edited so that countless ellipses mark the textual cuts and an apology covers the omitted footnotes. This makes the book far less serviceable than it would otherwise be to serious students. The modern judicial craftsmanship of Black and Frankfurter is concealed by such omissions. This is all the more striking when we read Congressman Patman's charge of the influence of law reviews in Supreme Court citations. Academic craftsmanship is also marred when only parts, and not those dealing with methodology, of a Fowler Harper certiorari article and a Schubert game-theory article are included in a book of readings.

In sum, I think that full documentation is desirable in a book of readings on the judicial process to be used by advanced students. But Murphy and Pritchett have created an excellent, readable, exciting book on the key topics on the relation of politics to courts and judges.—CLEMENT E. VOSE, Wesleyan University.

A Century of Civil Rights. By MILTON R. KONVITZ—WITH A STUDY OF State Law Against Discrimination BY THEODORE LESKES. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1961. Pp. VIII, 272. $6.00.)

Though the title implies more, this is a book on racial discrimination. The first part by Professor Konvitz is mainly a historical survey of developments at the federal level. The second part by Mr. Leskes supplies a similar survey at the state level. The materials used consist principally of statutes and court decisions. These are carefully analyzed and their significance assessed. Inevitably in such a work there is included, as in a bride's raiment, "something old and something new." The authors' combined efforts supply the reader with sufficient detail to enable him to follow the main lines of policy, both state and national, that mark attempts to overcome this problem.

The problem of civil rights is, of course, a matter of deep concern to Professor Konvitz. Much of his latest work covers familiar ground. Especially is this true of the content analysis of the Civil War amendments, the five congressional statutes enacted thereunder between 1866 and 1875 and the Supreme Court decision in the Civil Rights Cases that discarded most of the Civil Rights Act of 1875. All of this is a familiar story often told with greater detail than Professor Konvitz here attempts. More recent developments are possibly less well known. Of these, analyses are made of the recommendations of the President's Committee on Civil Rights (1947), the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and the report of the Commission on Civil Rights created under this law, the Civil Rights Act of 1960, and the Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education.

Probably Professor Konvitz's most novel and interesting contributions are contained in the opening chapter in which he analyses the philosophical background of slavery and in chapter five where he speculates about the constitutionality of student sit-ins. The philosophical analysis traces the conflict between the institution of slavery and the idea of humanity from ancient times down to the present. The ancients believed that to be civilized one had to be a slaveholder and that slave ownership demanded brutality. These views were first challenged by the idea of humanity, with its emphasis on the dignity of the individual, that appeared first among the ancient Hebrews. It has taken over two thousand years for humanistic views to overcome pro-slavery views in the western world. The relevance of this to the American scene is apparent when the point is stressed that the American South removed itself from the mainstream of western thought and its conditioning influence. Slavery, to the southerner, was judged more in terms of race than economics. To him, a slave was not human, or if human, he was of an inferior species. This key difference accounts for the intransigence of the South against manumission and its willingness to adopt extreme repressive measures the residue of which still lingers on.

Student sit-ins present a delicate legal problem because they raise the issue of what action is "state" and what is "private." Professor Konvitz argues that repression of student sit-ins is "state" action and therefore unconstitutional. Clearly state legislation or municipal ordinances denying Negroes access to places of public accommodation are void. The suggestion is also made that it is "state" action when proprietors of public places refuse service to Negroes merely in conformity with state and local custom. If these propositions are accepted, then the use of police to enforce either the state's or proprietor's race policy becomes state action and hence void. Chief support for this view is found in the restrictive covenant cases. A subsidiary argument is based on the doctrine of Yick Wo v. Hopkins that voids acts of enforcement of a valid law when racial discrimination is involved. These are reasonable arguments, but who would predict that they will impress the courts? Possibly those who employ statistics to analyze judicial behavior can give us some advance word.

Mr. Leskes, in slightly less than half of the book, makes a historical survey of state laws against discrimination and their interpretation by state courts. Since public attention tends to be focused more completely on federal than on state action, this portion of the book may, for most readers, prove to be the more informative. State laws and their interpretation by state courts are analyzed with reference to places of accommodation, fair employment practices, fair educational practices and fair housing practices. Approximately one half of the states now have laws on one or more of these subjects. A quick count reveals that Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Washington and Oregon have shown the greatest concern. These are followed closely by Michigan, Wisconsin, California and Colorado. While state courts have generally upheld these laws, they have shown some tendency to construe them narrowly. Mr. Leskes feels that the increasing tendency to place enforcement of antidiscrimination laws in the hands of administrators rather than courts will yield better results through the substitution of education and negotiation for prosecution as means of enforcement.

This book is a clear and concise analysis of the major efforts in the United States to overcome discrimination. It is not concerned with the even more extensive efforts, especially in the South, to preserve discrimination. While the authors' preferences are clear enough, the text is devoid of disputation or critical comment. Scholars, and especially the general reader, will find the book to be a most useful reference.—GLENN G. WILTSEY, University of Rochester.

Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative. By JAMES A. ROBINSON. (Homewood, Illinois: The Dorsey Press, Inc., 1962, Pp. x, 262. $5.50.)

One of the standard commonplaces in discussions of the separation of powers system of the United States is the observation that the policy role of the Congress has declined in the twentieth century compared to that of the executive. Woodrow Wilson was appalled at the dominance of Congress in policy-making at the beginning of the century; and, though he himself contributed to it, he might have been equally concerned had he viewed the pre-eminence of the Presidency at mid-century. Thoughtful students of the American policy-making process are troubled about the proper roles of the Congress and the executive in an era of harrowing domestic and international crises and of the complexity of problems, issues and alternatives.

It is in this connection that the present book makes a constructive addition to our understanding. James Robinson selects for investigation a policy arena which has traditionally involved the primacy of the President, that of foreign policy. He observes the subordinate role of Congress in foreign policy-making vis-à-vis the President, concisely accounts for it, and then proceeds in a workmanlike fashion to dissect the patterns of influence within the Congress to the extent that it does affect the total foreign policy process.

In developing the theme that the primary influence of Congress in foreign policy is that of legitimating and amending policies originating with the executive partly because of "the changing character of the information or intelligence needs in modern policy-making," Professor Robinson employs a variety of data neatly tied together. He utilizes case studies, interviews with congressmen who occupied foreign policy positions during the 85th Congress, interviews with State Department liaison officers, and the personal and official papers of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, as well as the papers of other key figures in the foreign policy process since the New Deal. The book represents the employment of these varieties of materials blended together in a sophisticated way.

In terms of data utilization, it seems to me that the book makes its outstanding contribution in the manner in which case studies are made the basis of part of the analysis. Robinson presents, in capsulated form, twenty-two cases of foreign policy-making since 1933, from neutrality legislation to the Cuban decision in 1961. Special attention is given to the Monroney Resolution of 1958 as the clearest case of congressional initiative in foreign policy among those examined. The cases are presented, not simply for cumulative or illustrative purposes, however, but for their relevance either in suggesting or testing hypotheses about the behavior of policy-makers in the sphere of foreign policy.

From the viewpoint of findings, I found most interesting the analysis of the relationships between Congress and the State Department as a communications network. Professor Robinson hypothesizes that the more satisfied congressmen who play foreign policy roles are with inter-institutional information processes, the more likely they will approve Department policy. He finds three information processes significantly correlated with policy approval: satisfaction with responses to requests for foreign policy information, satisfaction with the Department's record for voluntarily furnishing foreign affairs information, and perception of weight given congressional opinion in Departmental decision-making. Further, his data suggest that congressional satisfaction with the information process may be more important for the congressmen whose party affiliation differs from that of the President than for the members of the President's own party. This suggests, says Professor Robinson, "that information processes and satisfaction with them may be an important element in establishing and maintaining bipartisan foreign policies."

The author is worried about the secondary, and still declining, role of Congress in the foreign policy process. While he recognizes and gives attention to some important ways in which the Congress has sought to retain some semblance of initiative in foreign policy-making, he suggests improvements in congressional organization and procedure so as to strengthen its initiating function. He agrees, after thoughtful consideration of its latent effects, with the proposal of the Brookings Institution that a National Security Policy Committee be created, as a joint committee either replacing or supplementing the work of present congressional committees, in order to facilitate coordination of foreign policy considerations. He urges greater centralization of leadership in the House and Senate, lamenting the passing of Lyndon Johnson's central role in the Senate and proposing transfer of coordinating powers in the House from the Rules Committee to the majority party leadership. Finally, he advocates increasing the size and professionalization of committee staffs, primarily to permit independent congressional study of long-range foreign policy objectives.

Here is a book both methodologically and substantively stimulating and thoughtful, clearly written, well-edited and printed, sweetened by the addition of three engaging appendices, and capped with an impressively extensive bibliography. It is a book to be highly recommended.—SAMUEL C. PATTERSON, State University of Iowa.

History of the House of Representatives. BY GEORGE B. GALLOWAY. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 1962. Pp. xii, 333. Price $7.50.)

Rich in content, clearly and interestingly written, History of the House of Representatives succeeds in what it purports to do— "... to promote understanding of our national House of Representatives, where the public's business is performed."

By introducing the reader to the House of Representatives through a series of questions which confronted the writers of the United States Constitution, Mr. Galloway captures the interest of students of government and laymen alike. For among the problems encountered at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 were questions so fundamental to our governmental philosophy that some of the governmental problems familiar to today's reader are the same questions raised in 1787 in different form.

The question of "What qualifications should be required of those who were to elect the Congress?" is currently raised in the literacy test bill initiated by the President and filibustered in the Senate. To the question "Should the members of the first branch of the national legislature be elected by the people or by the state legislatures?" one may answer that the House of Representatives is popularly elected, but present overrepresentation of rural areas raises the question of reapportioning seats to follow the population shift to urban areas. This, of course, has just been done, to some extent, based on the 1960 census, but ideal reapportionment certainly has not been achieved. To the question regarding the method of selecting the President we know that the original intention that the President be elected in most instances, not by the Electoral College, but by the House of Representatives found fulfillment only twice. But currently the question is raised in terms of electing the President by a popular majority instead of by a majority of the votes cast in the Electoral College.

Not only does this volume present a comprehensive history of the House of Representatives, but in it one finds factual data analyzed and telescoped in such a manner that one feels the relatedness of historical events to contemporary House practice and procedure. The line of development appears to depict movement from one stage to, in some instances, another almost inevitably logical stage of development. The chapter on the "Evolution of House Rules" is one such example.

Of particular interest to a reader who wishes to know about the relationship that exists between a representative and his constituents in a republican form of government is the chapter on "The Role of the Representative." This is another very basic question, yet unresolved in our system, and unresolved in the book. Should the representative reflect the wishes of his constituents, or should he vote according to his own beliefs and principles, or should he weigh the competing interests with each other and effect a compromise? According to the opinions cited in the book regarding the representative's view of his relationship to his constituency, more voiced the opinion that voters are to be listened to rather than to be followed. The representative is to vote his own belief, based not necessarily upon moral or ethical principles, but based upon a regard for the general welfare of the whole country. This is a vague, amorphous concept, difficult if at all possible to ascertain. It would appear that the general welfare, in the final analysis, is a concept based upon the individual representative's personal attitudes and opinions which are influenced by his desire for reelection.

Added to the text are ten valuable appendices which facilitate finding some specific information such as the number of laws enacted by each Congress since 1789 and the names of the Clerks of the House of Representatives.

In this volume we are given an over-all view of the history of the House of Representatives, not a jargon-ridden text nor a dry, technically detailed account of the history and workings of the first branch of the national legislature. The book is flavorful, informative, and useful.—Lois B. MORELAND, Spelman College.

Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics. By AARON WILDAVSKY. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1962. Pp. x, 351. $6.75.)

This book has two main parts, either of which, with some editorial doctoring, might stand by itself. The first is a detailed history of the complicated Dixon-Yates controversy; and the second is a concluding chapter in which Wildavsky, in effect, backs off, looks at what he has written, and asks what may be learned from it.

The history of Dixon-Yates, although not easy to follow, is a scholarly summary of a huge quantity of data and will be very useful to historians and others interested in the details of the controversy. More casual readers may wonder whether the benefit received is worth the effort required to grasp the intricate account, but the history does convey a sense of the complexity of governmental decision-making and should appeal to teachers on that ground.

The concluding chapter contains some provocative ideas and is likely to be the most interesting part of the book to the majority of readers. One of these ideas is that the degree of inhibition exerted by stereotypes upon decision-makers' perceptions is likely to vary from one kind of issue to another. Decision-makers may look at a novel issue with fresh eyes and may perceive the relevant information available to them. But when they confront old and hard-fought issues they may draw upon a stock of prefabricated attitudes assumed to include all that can be appropriate.

Wildavsky's hypothesis is that the Eisenhower Administration's inability to perceive a conflict of interest in the Dixon-Yates negotiations resulted from the fact that the battle of public vs. private power had been fought for so long and so bitterly that they, like the public power people, had accumulated a kind of standard kit of attitudes. The author suggests that there is likely to be an inverse relationship between the freshness of a decision-maker's approach to an issue and the duration and intensity of previous public conflict over the question.

I am not certain whether Wildavsky sees the use of AEC as the agent for buying Dixon-Yates power as the result of a choice between alternatives. But his evidence suggests that the Administration's assumption that it had some kind of responsibility to meet the power needs of Memphis was the crucial element in the employment of AEC. Although Wildavsky tells us nothing about the origin of this feeling of responsibility for Memphis, once the Administration accepted it (whether or not as the result of a considered choice), then the use of AEC and Dixon-Yates followed as a matter of course, since the Administration was ideologically opposed to expansion of TVA and surmised that it could not get TVA to buy Dixon-Yates power. The question of whether a decision, in the sense of a choice, was actually made is, of course, one that often comes up in studies of decision-making. As Raymond Bauer has written in an unpublished memorandum, "... accepted resolutions of [issues] X and Y may rule out all but one resolution of issue Z, so that when the parties begin to discuss Z they find that without intending to do so they have already taken a stand on Z."

To Wildavsky the ultimate decision of Memphis to build its own plant is an example of the superiority of a decision reached through group conflict over one hierarchically determined and imposed. The Dixon-Yates scheme was the first choice only of the Administration and Dixon-Yates; but the decision of Memphis, although the first choice of only one participant, was the second choice of all the rest. It was the solution that satisfied the widest range of preferences, and I judge that the range of preferences satisfied is Wildavsky's measure of the public interest.—OWEN STRATTON, Wellesley College.

The Political World of American Zionism. By SAMUEL HALPERIN. (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1961. Pp. IX, 431. $8.00.)

This analytical survey, primarily concerned with Zionist efforts to win the support of our Jewish citizenry, should be of considerable interest to Americans of all religious persuasions.

Samuel Halperin provides us with a much needed objective study of developments in the United States which were instrumental to the creation of Israel. Concentrating on the period 1929-1948 and beginning with the reactions to the Palestinian Arab riots of 1929, he shows how the Jewish community was slowly won over to accepting the views of Theodor Herzl. In 1896 Herzl "transfigured" the Jewish world with his thesis (in The Jewish State) that an independent Jewish nation was absolutely necessary if extinction of the culture and of its contribution to humanity was to be avoided.

The majority of American Jews, and their social and religious organizations, were not easily convinced. Until the community fully comprehended the enormity of the horrors being perpetrated by Nazi Germany, it was seriously divided on the question of supporting the Zionist political goal of a new Jewish Commonwealth. Committed, now as then, to a full espousal of this democracy, the heterogeneous leadership procrastinated. Only the Nazi blood-bath shocked it into a change of position, to ensure the salvation of the remnants of European Jewry.

Jewry's spiritual conception of Zion has been and remains quite apart from modern Zionism. A longing to be proud and free once again, near holy Mount Zion, was a dream sustaining displaced Hebrews for two thousand years. Dispersed like beads from a broken necklace they made their prayers for deliverance from wandering and oppression a rock of their faith. Behind that cherished vision is seemingly endless suffering, documented in the pages of histories which trace the inhumanity of man to man.

Regarding Zionist programs of this century, each of the three main branches of Judaism in the United States—Orthodox, Conservative and Reform—were cautious about converting the spiritual conception into the practical reality of a new Jewish state. That caution was manifested by considerable divisions amongst the faithful reflecting such divergent reactions as zealous adherence to Zionist programs, luke-warm agreement in principle, and positive anti-Zionist activities.

Professor Halperin deserves commendation for taking an emotionally-charged subject and treating it with scholarly precision and detachment. There is much value in his application of basic principles evolved by contemporary political scientists. He tests his material against the findings of specialists in the public opinion, propaganda, pressure groups and social psychology fields. The author avoids the temptation to take sides. He keeps to his promise that the "only moral I would impart . . . is that the associations observed constitute a legitimate segment of the American political scene and, as such, are to be neither condemned nor praised, but studied and understood."

Not the least consequential contribution of this research, is that it provides evidence that the overwhelming majority of American Jews finally came to espouse the Zionist cause in order to secure a haven for their co-religionists outside of the United States. They could not ignore their humane sentiments or the teachings of Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln. They could not ignore the fact that the peril point had been passed by too many millions in Europe. Israel emerged out of tragedy, partly as a triumph of the Zionist movement. Sadly, that triumph, in large measure, was based on a social affliction cursing all mankind.—BERNARD RUBIN, Boston University.

The Farmer's Dilemma. By STANLEY ANDREWS. (Washington D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1961. Pp. vii, 184. Price $4.50.)

Mr. Stanley Andrews has attempted an answer to one of the tantalizing mysteries of the American scene. How can the American farmer be so abundantly productive and yet in almost continual, and worsening, economic straits? He answers this question in a well-written, interesting style. It is plain to the reader just where Andrews stands on this matter of "the farm problem." What he has to say has already been said many times before, for the most part, but his exposition is lucid and logical. The lay person would be well-advised to give this book a careful reading.

Andrews describes the farmer's dilemma in familiar fashion. The commercial farmer is one of the main remnants of our ostensibly competitive economy. Within this environment he is trying to maximize his profit. To do so, he attempts to reduce production costs by the efficient utilization of capital and technological improvements. Improved credit facilities, seeds, fertilizers, cultivation practices and the like have been employed and the farmer's rate of economic growth has clearly exceeded that of urban industry. Nevertheless, within about the last 40 years, the commercial farmer has only been prosperous when the nation has been at war, or in the early post-war years. Relative food costs to the consumer, in terms of his per capita income, have rather constantly decreased; meanwhile the cost-price squeeze has been slowly strangling the farmer.

The dilemma of the low-income farmer is of a different type. Price support programs are of little real value to him. Improved public credit has, to a very limited extent, helped improve his condition. The odds are strongly against him, however. If he moves to the city—which he has done and will continue to do—he is ill-prepared to enter into the skilled labor market or into a white collar job, so his economic position is about as weak as before.

Andrews describes what the federal government has done, particularly since 1929, to try to improve the conditions of both the commercial and the low-income farmers. He has been directly and importantly involved in the farm politics of the United States during the last 30-odd years, so he brings some new insights into an already well-told story. His analysis of the farm export programs is especially useful and challenging. In the immediate post-World War II period he was director of the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations in the U. S. Department of Agriculture. He concludes that our export programs have been basically "dumping" programs. We had to get rid of the mounting agricultural surpluses or cut back drastically on the production thereof. Congress and the farm organizations took the easier path—in the short run—and let the U. S. Treasury pay the bill in the form of Public Law 480 and other programs of that type.

Andrews does believe there is value in the export programs and in the domestic legislation which brought about the school lunch, special milk, and food stamp programs. In the area of foreign policy, the export programs have been downright harmful in some instances, clearly helpful in others. Andrews' insightful comments about our food policies relative to India, Pakistan, the southeast Asian countries, and Yugoslavia probably constitute the most original contribution the book has to make.

Why have the attempts on the part of the federal government to improve the farmer's economic condition been so costly and yet only minimally successful? Andrews answers that question accurately, in my opinion. First, for political reasons there has always been considerable "slip-page" in the farm programs: too many loopholes, so to speak, for the farmers to take advantage of, legally to be sure. Secondly, the farm cooperatives have not developed the kind and amount of bargaining power which the farmer needs in order to be in an equal power position with those from whom he buys and those to whom he sells.

Andrews believes that there are two alternative courses of action regarding the future of farming in America. Either the federal government steps out of the scene, at least in terms of meaningful price supports and production controls; or the federal government provides the farmer with price and income assistance which can be of some real economic value to him, for which the farmer will—if he chooses to do so by referendum—cut back substantially on his production. Either we will move to an "estate-based agriculture" in which our food will be produced by some 300,000–500,000 farms; or, we will legislate a supply-management program which will enable the "family farm" to survive and prosper. His choice is clearly for the second alternative.

To bring about the kind of an American agriculture which he considers to be in our national interest, Andrews states eight "fundamental problems" which will have to be resolved. His proposed "national farm policy" cannot be delved into in any detail here, but it resembles, to an important extent, the proposals made by President Kennedy to Congress in early 1962. He calls for "market allotments," "adequate" national food reserves for emergency purposes, an international "food bank," a "sound" international trade policy for agricultural products, more emphasis on assistance to low-income farmers, "fair food prices" to the consumers, farmer-choice in regards to the two alternative programs and—if the supply management route is accepted—farmer-administration of them, and certain structural changes in the bureaucracy of the USDA. All this will have to be sought for, he notes, in a period of declining farmer political power!

This book needs an index, but, much more importantly, it needs to be read.—ROSS B. TALBOT, Iowa State University.

The Development of the Social Security Act. By EDWIN E. WITTE with a foreword by FRANCES PERKINS. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1962. Pp. xix, 220. $5.75.)

This volume is a posthumous publication. The manuscript was originally prepared in 1936 at the request of the Committee on Public Administration of the Social Science Research Council, but for some reason it remained for more than twenty-five years in the typescript stage, on deposit in the University of Wisconsin and Social Security Administration libraries. In its published form, the book consists of two parts. Part I, entitled "General History of Committee and Act," is a case study highlighting the principal personalities and political relationships involved in the formulation of the organic statute which laid the foundations of American social insurance and welfare policy. The immediate story starts in February, 1934, when the first Wagner-Lewis bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, but the major part begins with the President's message to Congress in June and the appointment of the author as Executive Director of the Committee on Economic Security in July. From that point until the signing of the bill a year later on August 14, 1935, the memorandum is an "instructive lesson in political dynamics, illustrating the interplay of ideas and interests within an Administration, the relations between the President and key persons in Congress (as well as their respective staffs), and the responsiveness of government to political pressures."

Part II, "Provisions of the Social Security Act," describes in detail how and why the major technical policy provisions of the law came to be written. The presentation is so similar in pattern and style to Part I that it is not clear to the reader why the two were not woven together. Presumably Dr. Witte was responding to different audiences and historical interests, and thought that clarity of the record would be promoted by making the differentiation. At all events, our published literature on the legislative process is now enriched by an outstanding example of participant observation at the highest policy level.

While the book can be accurately described as a legislative case history, it is much more than that. It gives a picture of a remarkable man at work, an expert in the field of labor and social insurance who was also skilled in the arts of research direction, interagency negotiation, legislative counselling, and continuous political mediation and coordination. Witte was called to Washington from a lifetime of work in state government and university teaching to act as secretary of a cabinet committee, a representative advisory council, at the same time directing a research staff and coordinating its work with the deliberations of a high-powered Technical Board of government experts in economic security. Under Executive Order 6757 (June 29, 1934), the (Cabinet) Committee on Economic Security was to report its recommendations within four months, (December 1). Considering the novelty, range and complexity of the problems, in retrospect it is truly amazing that this machinery was put into operation, the report delivered by December 24, and the President's message transmitting the Administration's program and draft legislation sent to Congress by January 17, 1935. There is a model here of one type of policy-formulating strategy in American national government, together with an account of the differences of opinion and principle among the experts that get mixed up with departmental interests and Congressional alignments to obstruct even the best-laid plans. Dr. Witte's analysis of the Advisory Council on Social Security points up the basic difficulties underlying the concept of group representation in politics, although he is careful to point out that group consultation is not only essential but highly constructive, when properly planned and competently conducted. Finally one is given an insight into the peculiar American legislative practice of giving technical assistance and political credit to politicians who oppose bills, thereby securing their support in ultimate passage.

With respect to the substantive issues of social insurance, the reader will find here authoritative explanations of why the same law provides for a wholly federal old age insurance system, a tax-offset scheme of federally-financed, state-established and administered unemployment compensation, and statutory grants-in-aid to states for the several categories of public assistance. The tax actuarial problems of social insurance are treated in a political rather than a technical perspective, which is simply to say the issues are described in the context as the responsible decision-makers visualized them rather than in the language of economics and insurance. There is no fictitious Congressional "Intent" or "Will" here; there are only persons acting in official and group capacities who took positions and, under political pressures, made agreements out of which public policy was forged.

It is a pleasure to note that two political scientists, Thomas H. Eliot and Joseph P. Harris, find frequent recognition throughout the pages of the book.—AVERY LEISERSON, Vanderbilt University.

Conservatism in America: The Thankless Persuasion. BY CLINTON ROSSITER. (New York: Vintage Books, 1962. Second Edition, Revised. Pp. xii, 306. $1.45.)

Seven years after its original publication Professor Rossiter's instructive study re-appears, substantially revised, as a paperback. It could be called the sober second thought of a conservative, were it not that the author now explicitly disavows the label. He locates his position somewhere in the misty mid-regions between Peale and Niebuhr, between Lippmann and Kirk, between Reuther and Goldwater, and admits to being "at once the most liberal of conservatives and the most conservative of liberals." This is artful dodging, but Professor Rossiter may be permitted his little joke.

With a few slight qualifications the major definitions remain the same, as does the taxonomic approach of the early chapters. The useful distinction between Burkean Conservatism and normative American conservatism is retained, though the semantic difficulties have not been entirely overcome. Rugged economic individualism receives, as before, a stern rebuke. The views of Kirk, Buckley, Viereck and other not-so-new conservatives come in for more extensive criticism, though one looks in vain for an adequate analysis of the current Radical Right. The concluding chapters have been thoroughly revised, not merely to bring them up to date but to moderate the hortatory tone which marred the first edition. The excellent bibliography is duly enlarged.

The sober side of the new edition appears in Rossiter's sharpened stress on the difficulties of achieving the kind of reformed conservatism for which he calls. In the face of the "benevolent tyranny" of the dominant liberal tradition of the United States, conservatism is a "thankless persuasion" indeed. It needs a "viable theory," but "the mere intention to spin out a full-bodied theory is somehow an unconservative impulse," and in any case experience must precede logic: "a conservative way of life must go before and shape a conservative pattern of thought." The conservative, says Rossiter, must hold the middle ground as mediator. But if, as this reviewer supposes, the task of mediation assumes the givenness of the positions to be mediated, how shall the conservative also act to brake the present slippage in the political spectrum which carries him willy-nilly toward the Radical Right? The issue of desegregation would seem to furnish a critical test of conservative doctrine, but here, Rossiter admits, the tradition affords no authoritative guide; "the signals are off," and each conservative must muddle through on his own. Seven years have made Rossiter rather less sanguine about the resolution of such dilemmas, yet they must be resolved if conservatism is to become intellectually coherent and relevant.

What, then, are the prospects? Rossiter's answer is ambiguous. On p. 237 he foresees "no sudden check or reversal in the glacial shift of the American intellect" to the Center and Right. But on p. 4 it appears that "we are not quite so conservative a country today" as in 1955. The campuses which in 1955 were said to "run over" with conservative academics now merely "shelter (if they do not exactly teem with)" them. Nevertheless, Rossiter suggests that "a reformed theory of American conservatism" enjoys "excellent prospects." How this can be when the "creative conservative" is expected to perform simultaneously as "the chief sponsor of change in American life, the chief opponent of the reforms that are needed to civilize it, and the chief mourner for the civilization that has gone forever" does not appear.—MICHAEL MCGIFFERT, University of Denver.

Six Crises. By RICHARD M. NIXON. (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday and Company, 1962. Pp. 460. $5.95.)

In this book the former Vice President gives us an account of the 1960 campaign for the Presidency; his 1959 encounters with Nikita Khrushchev; his tour of Latin America in 1958; his role in the events precipitated by President Eisenhower's heart attack in September, 1955; his fight to stay on the Republican ticket in 1952; and the fall of Alger Hiss. The book is loosely integrated by Mr. Nixon's efforts to describe his personal reactions in each of these situations and "to distill out of my experience a few general principles on the 'crisis syndrome.'" He disavows, however—modestly and rightly—any pretense to having written a scholarly treatise on conduct in crisis: once distilled, his principles ("Confidence in crisis depends in great part on adequacy of preparation," "Experience is a vitally important factor") turn out to be trite but true and vice versa. Scholars will find Six Crises interesting mainly as a source of footnotés to recent political history and as an intensely political man's exercise in looking at the past with an eye to the future.

Nixon's comments on his relations with General Eisenhower will provide some of the best fodder for footnotes. On more than one occasion the General was anything but helpful in Nixon's crisis hours. When the fund issue broke in September, 1952, Eisenhower remained out of communication with his running mate for five days—while the attack mounted, influential Republican newspapers called for Nixon's resignation, and the General himself implied in a statement to the press that Nixon would have to prove himself "clean as a hound's tooth." When the General's anxiously awaited call finally came through, he was to say, "I have come to the conclusion that you are the one who has to decide what to do. After all, you've got a big following in this country and if the impression got around that you got off the ticket because I forced you to get off, it is going to be very bad. On the other hand, if I issue a statement now backing you up, in effect people will accuse me of condoning wrongdoing." He recommended that Nixon put his case before the country in a television speech. Later Nixon, only an hour before he was to make that speech, was thrown into confusion by a new communication from Eisenhower headquarters: the top Eisenhower advisers, he was told, presumably with the General's agreement, wanted him to close his speech by submitting his resignation. On a second occasion Eisenhower could properly be charged with having created a crisis for Nixon. Announcing his own intention to seek re-election in 1956, the General evaded any commitment as to a running mate. Nixon, he said, would have "to chart his own course." This statement came after he had privately suggested that Nixon might consider a Cabinet post and had observed that the Vice President was running behind Earl Warren in the Gallup Poll. After several humiliating weeks in which Eisenhower gave him only the most equivocal indications of intent or preference, Nixon was finally forced to ask for a place on the 1956 ticket. In the 1960 campaign, Eisenhower embarrassed his heir apparent at least two more times. In a press conference he said that, if given a week, he might be able to think of an important decision in which Nixon had participated. He later explained that this was intended as a facetious sally, but Nixon regards it as having been a serious blow to his efforts to capitalize on the experience issue. Finally, in the last days of the campaign, Nixon tried to get approval for a White House announcement that the Justice Department would look into the arrest of Reverend Martin Luther King. His efforts were to no avail. Attorney General William Rogers was ready to act, according to Nixon, but the White House, for some reason, was not.

Although Nixon has these and many other inside stories to report, scholars must proceed with some caution when using Six Crises as a source. A statement about Alger Hiss's Woodstock type-writer has had to be corrected in later printings of the book and another—that Allan Dulles briefed John F. Kennedy on CIA preparations for the invasion of Cuba—has been denied by both Kennedy and Dulles. And these are not the only points on which Nixon's comments are apt to be misleading. He says, for instance, that Looking back, I suppose the politically expedient course would have been for me to grant without argument that we had been standing still for the past eight years and then to promise, if I were elected, to do everything he [Kennedy] had promised, and more besides.

He may be showing the same kind of wry humor here that Eisenhower displayed in his statement about Nixon's participation in the decisions of the Eisenhower Administration; but certainly it is hard to believe that a repudiation of the Republican record would have been Nixon's most expedient course in 1960, or that he believes it would have been. It is equally hard to accept at face value his characterization of the 1960 post-convention session of Congress as "one of the shrewdest moves" of the Democratic campaign. His reasoning: it pinned him to Washington because he might have to break a tie vote in the Senate, while Johnson and Kennedy could roam more freely, secure in the knowledge that they could arrange pairs for their votes.

Although he devotes relatively little space to the discussion of substantive issues in his book, Nixon's current political stance emerges with considerable clarity. He is critical of the "liberalists" who opposed the Un-American Activities Committee's investigation of the Hiss case but careful to note that liberalists "are not even remotely disloyal." He makes a thinly veiled (but nonetheless veiled) attack on the methods of the late Senator Joseph McCarthy. He has harsh words to say, passim, about the Kennedy Administration's handling of the Cuban invasion and the Laotian crisis. By implication he charges Nelson Rockefeller with opportunism and hypocrisy. He remains a thoroughgoing Eisenhower Republican; any difficulties the General may have caused him, are no sooner described than excused. For Nixon Eisenhower was—and is—a great leader with an orderly, quick, far-ranging, and versatile mind whose "thoughts far outraced his speech."

Many of Nixon's asides will be of interest to students of image building, but one in particular will intrigue political scientists—his version of "the Great American Legend as to how presidential candidates are born and made":

The legend goes something like this. A mother takes a child on her knee. She senses by looking into his eyes that there is something truly extraordinary about him. She says to herself and perhaps even to him, "You, son, are going to be President some day." From that time on, he is tapped for greatness. He talks before he walks. He reads a thousand words a minute. He is bored by school because he is so much smarter than his teachers. He prepares himself for leadership by taking courses in public speaking and political science. He drives ever upward, calculating every step of the way until he reaches his and—less importantly—the nation's destiny by becoming President of the United States.

Frankly, this reviewer had never been exposed to this account of the Great American Legend before, (it is most probably a Californian interpretation of a Massachusetts variation on the Legend) but was naturally flattered to learn that the members of his profession were central figures in it.—STANLEY KELLEY, JR., Princeton University.

The La Guardia Years: Machine and Reform Politics in New York City. By CHARLES GARRETT. (New Brunswick, N. J.: Rutgers University Press, 1961. Pp. ix, 423. $8.50.)

Thirty Explosive Years in Los Angeles County. By JOHN ANSON FORD. (San Marino, California: The Huntington Library, 1961. Pp. xv, 232. $6.00.)

Similarities and contrasts mark these two studies of reform movements in local government, dealing with the geographical extremes of the nation. The Garrett volume recounts machine and reform politics in our largest city over a century and a half, while Ford's work is a first-hand account of demographical changes and governmental reforms during three decades in the nation's fastest growing urban area.

The Garrett volume on New York City leads off with an analysis of machine and reform traditions in American municipal politics. Succeeding chapters carry New York City politics from the earliest days of Tammany Hall to the fusion movement of the early 1930's which put Fiorello H. La Guardia into the mayoralty. The heart of the volume deals with the La Guardia personality and his activities in the realms of administration, finance, the underworld, public welfare, structural changes in government, and the political campaigns that carried reform beyond its usual one-term duration. Garrett's conclusion covers the decline of reformism in New York City and the mayors and their administrations since the La Guardia years.

Historian Garrett displays insights into the motivations of bosses and reformers, and the differing conceptions of human nature upon which they pattern their actions. His purpose is not to write a biography of La Guardia, but to appraise machine and reform politics in the setting of La Guardia's three terms as mayor.

Professor Garrett is no hero-worshipper, for he sees Mayor La Guardia as a many-faceted personality—on the one hand, humorous, charming, sociable, sentimental, moralistic, while on the other, difficult to get along with, autocratic, impatient, opinionated, and vindictive. This reviewer cannot quarrel with Professor Garrett's summation of La Guardia as New York's greatest mayor.

The political scientist will find particularly valuable the discussions of fusion movements, charter reforms, proportional representation (toward which the author is sympathetic), and campaign techniques utilized in a metropolitan area. The author's notes are profuse, and show especially his use of newspaper files.

The volume by John Anson Ford is on social and governmental changes in Los Angeles County during the past thirty years. His vantage point was that of a participant-observer, having served on the county board of supervisors during twenty-four of those years.

Ford justifies the writing of this volume by citing the county's tremendous growth, diversity of its functions, and the microcosm it provides of the nation. In more than twenty brief chapters he summarizes and provides examples of metropolitan growth problems and attempted solutions. The varied and vast undertakings of Los Angeles County are catalogued and the author indicates the role of the board of supervisors in the government of the county. Of concern to political scientists are Mr. Ford's discussion of county charters, city functions and relationships to counties, the "Lakewood plan" (contract cities plan), financing, purchasing, and personnel procedures, planning and zoning, and establishment of the Los Angeles County sanitation districts—a case in intergovernmental cooperation.

Mr. Ford defines what he calls "the cancer in politics"—the mounting costs of political campaigning and the difficulties arising from dependency on a relatively few large contributors. Candidates frequently, he writes, tell their managers in effect: "Now you get the money, but don't tell me any of the details as to amounts or who the donors are." The author's proposal, basically the remedy of Theodore Roosevelt a half century ago, is that every voter should share on a minimal basis the cost of campaigning—a "poll tax." The registrar of voters would collect the estimated dollar per year per voter and disburse these funds to party and nonpartisan committees. "These provisions would not be a cure-all . . . but they would greatly lessen corruption and the inequities . . ." The value of his proposal is not its novelty but the extensive practical political experience of the man who makes it.

This book centers on developments viewed by the author as accomplishments, and therefore seldom deals with shortcomings or failings. Critics go mostly unnoticed, while the author defends some of his past actions as a county official. Personal recollections serve as a principal source of information, for the volume is not documented.—ROSS R. RICE, Arizona State University.

Hawaii Pono: A Social History. BY LAWRENCE H. FUCHS. (New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1961. Pp. ix, 501. $6.95)

"Hawaii Pono signifies that Hawaii is worthy of praise," explains Professor Fuchs, "since 'pono' means right or excellent." Hawaii is no longer an experiment in race relations for today it presents "the world's best example of dynamic social democracy." The explanation and support of this sweeping assertion is the primary task which Fuchs has set himself in this account of our "50th state, its people and politics, from annexation to statehood."

This attempt to portray the "big picture" necessarily invites comparison with that more popularized account of recent fame, Michener's Hawaii. Indeed, such a comparison is directly invited by Michener in a dust-jacket blurb in which he suggests that "a careful reading of Hawaii Pono" will enable the reader to "understand where I might have gone wrong in some of my interpretations and where I fell short of writing the detailed truth." Michener's well-taken commentary on his own work points to the essential difference between these two accounts. While both he and Fuchs paint on a broad canvas, Michener enjoyed that artistic license available to those whose writings lie in that never-never land which is located somewhere between the domains of fact and fiction. His historical-fictional technique enabled him to splash his canvas with vivid, undiluted tropical hues and occasionally to achieve brilliant literary effects at the price of considerable historical distortion. Fuchs, by contrast, has produced a more scholarly work which, if it attracts less popular attention, will nevertheless serve the more important long-term purpose of advancing serious research and writing on Hawaii.

Fuchs has succeeded in avoiding the sins of over-simplification in no small measure because of his remarkable capacity to bring together and coordinate the activities of a stalwart band of mainland and Island researchers from a number of disciplines, among them sociology, political science and economics. He and his assistants have labored mightily, both in the archives and in the field, and have produced an account of Hawaii which, if not correct in every detail, is none the less a thorough and largely sound piece of work.

Hawaii Pono presents in quick review a series of sketches of the major ethnic groups which have populated modern Hawaii. The perplexing diversity of Hawaii's social fabric becomes somewhat more understandable as viewed through the detailed account of the waves of immigration which first supplemented and then gradually replaced the native Hawaiian stock as it was decimated by disease and diluted through intermarriage. Fuchs depicts with warmth and sensitivity the ensuing human drama as Hawaii was reseeded by successive waves of Haoles (white men or Caucasians), Chinese, Japanese, Filipinos and many other peoples. This portion of Fuchs' work, while intensely interesting, covers largely familiar ground which has been rather intensively explored by such Island sociologists as Lind and Hormann of the University of Hawaii.

It is in his reporting and analysis of the politically decisive developments of twentieth-century Hawaii that Fuchs makes his most important contribution. He presents a balanced account of the rise of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union to dominance in Hawaii's union movement and a long-needed explanation of its role in Island politics. He handles in a constructive manner the politically explosive issue of the I.L.W.U. leadership's alleged Communist Party affiliations. Recounted here adequately for the first time to this reviewer's knowledge is the story of Imua (the Hawaiian word for "forward"), the militantly anti-Communist, anti-labor organization which provided the focal point of old-guard resistance to the rising force of unionism. Fuchs also provides a clear and useful account of the difficult battle for statehood. Somewhat less spectacular, but of deeper importance, is his explanation of the rise to political hegemony in Hawaii's legislature of the lawmakers of oriental ancestry, the sons and grandsons by and large of those Japanese and Chinese immigrants who were brought to the Islands as plantation laborers.

Fuchs has purportedly adopted a now conventional mode of analysis by claiming in the subtitle of his work that Hawaii Pono is "social history." Fortunately, this claim is largely belied by the work itself, for Fuchs is too sound a political scientist to restrict his analysis merely to social history. It is rather the rich drama of Hawaii's turbulent constitutional history which dominates his work and gives it structure, even when the author's primary emphasis is placed elsewhere. Accordingly, the attention of the political scientist is drawn persistently to political considerations, and he can hardly fail to be instructed by the panorama of constitutional changes which in less than a century and a half have transformed Hawaii from the absolute monarchy of Kamehameha the Great to constitutional monarchy, thence toward oligarchy and currently toward democracy. In the broadest terms, Fuchs thus provides an account of what might be termed "the changing regime in Hawaii," an account which at its best succeeds in relating constitutional changes to such related considerations as economic development, the acquisition of full rights of citizenship by plantation workers or their descendants, and the rise of a militant labor union movement. Fuchs reveals the primacy of the political by showing that the manifold problems associated with the cultural and ethnic diversity of the peoples of Hawaii have been resolved chiefly through the institutions of government.

Those who are skeptical of this interpretation may well ask themselves how it has come about that the contemporary Hawaiian polity differs so radically from that of a number of Latin American "banana republics" which it so nearly resembled some three-quarters of a century ago. In its plantation economy and semi-colonial status, Hawaii closely resembled Cuba. How is it then that the Hawaiian regime has moved strongly in the direction of egalitarian democracy while the planter republics of Latin America have all too frequently been transformed from oligarchies into tyrannies? To understand this difference we must go beyond Hawaii Pono in tracing the relationships between Hawaii's "social history" and the constitutional politics of the United States. One may well imagine that questions such as these are very much in the forefront of Fuchs' attention as he currently addresses himself to direction of the Peace Corps program in the Philippines, a nation whose constitutional development could profitably be contrasted to that of the Hawaiian polity.

Hawaii Pono will considerably facilitate the task of those mainlanders desirous of acquiring a rudimentary understanding of the politics of Hawaii, while Islanders will find this work useful in dispelling those opinions, myths and rumors which have provided a surprisingly persistent substitute for knowledge within their own community. Above all, it may be hoped that Hawaii Pono will provide impetus and encouragement to those scholars who are prepared to provide related accounts of Hawaii's excessively centralized governmental structure, business and labor monopolies and the politically crucial questions stemming from the Island state's unique concentration of land ownership, both public and private.

—ROBERT HORWITZ, Michigan State University.

National Party Platforms: 1840-1960. COMPILED BY KIRK PORTER AND DONALD BRUCE JOHNSON. (Urbana: The University of Illinois Press, 1961. Pp. 640. $10.)

It is a truism that American party platforms are not binding on the behavior of party leaders in office, and are often ambiguous trumpetings composed of a medley of themes, aimed at satisfying the various groups or publics to which the parties must appeal. Nonetheless, platforms do express the general, loose central perspectives or ideologies of our parties. A compendium of such statements over the last 120 years offers interesting tracings of ideological change and development.

The present volume, an enlarged edition of Professor Porter's earlier collection, provides an abundance of such materials. It ranges from the first declaration in the Democratic convention of 1840, through the platforms of the Democratic and Republican parties and four minor parties in 1960.

Platforms have tended to grow longer as the years passed. Thus, the Democratic "resolutions" of 1840 take less than one large double-column page in this book, and even the tortuous Democratic planks of 1856 consume only a little more than three pages, whereas the defensive Republican platform of 1932 occupies nearly twelve pages and the "New Frontier" Democratic statement of 1960 takes twenty-six. Parties can be brief in modern times, as the Democrats were in a two-page platform in 1944. By and large, however, more and more items are included as the complexity of society gives birth to more and more interests and shadings of opinion whose claims must be recognized.

This compendium of platforms provides confirmation for the thesis that American major parties exhibit dualism in a moving consensus, as V. O. Key puts it. Again and again, the aims set forth by a party-of-movement in a given period and originally opposed by a party-of-resistance appear in the later statements of the erstwhile opposition party, though often in a muted, ambiguously formalistic, or modified fashion. Minor parties of protest and such schismatic eras as the 1850s and the Civil War aside, it is hard to find evidence for profound, continuing social cleavage in American party platforms.

It is interesting to note that of more than one hundred minor, fragmentary, or "third" party platforms included by the editors, scarcely a dozen were the products of parties whose position was significantly to the right of the contemporary major parties. The "Know Nothings" of 1856, the Coughlin-Lehmke Union party of 1936, the "Dixiecrats" of 1948, and the Christian Nationalists of 1952 are representatives of a scarce breed beside the would-be tigers of reform, socialism, or other left protest. Frustration, of course, was the common lot of virtually all of them.

The editors provide brief introductory notes to the platforms of each quadrennial campaign, but one could often wish that the notes were fuller and more informative. Thus, for example, we might like to know more about the circumstances of the framing of this or that major party statement, or about just who the Christian Nationalists were and what their impact was. This is a small complaint, however, about an already very big volume which will remain the standard collection of its kind.—WILLIAM NISBET CHAMBERS, Washington University (St. Louis).

The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781-1788. BY JACKSON TURNER MAIN. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press for The Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, 1961. Pp. xv, 308. Price: $7.50.)

Like poor Patrick Henry, the Antifederalists seem to have been given the short end of the stick in American history in general and in the development of American political institutions in particular. Even the Bill of Rights, their major contribution, are popularly ascribed to Madison who introduced them to Congress only under Antifederal pressure. In part this situation is a natural one due to the unparalleled success of the Constitution. But, by way of contrast to the success of the Federalists, the opposition has been discredited to the point of appearing almost "un-American," to use a vague popular term. Historians have suspected their motives and chastised or pitied them for their lack of vision. With this book, which is a manuscript award winner from the Institute of Early American History and Culture, Professor Main has taken a solid step in the direction of re-assessment which should lead to a new understanding of the Antifederalist dilemma and appreciation of their approach to the problems of political organization.

The Antifederalists is a state by state analysis of Antifederal strength according to geography and the significant economic views attached thereto. The author found coastal, commercial, urban environs generally Federal, while the remote agricultural areas were Antifederal. He convincingly demonstrates that the pattern of alignment of forces found in the Constitutional debate of 1788-89 was initiated by the dispute over a Confederate impost beginning in 1781. He documents the close relationship between the economic issues of the day—impost, public debt, commercial advantages—and the Antifederalist camp. His analysis of issues follows the approach of Charles A. Beard. But whether or not his work is a “vigorous counterstatement to the revisionists,” as the dust jacket states, is another question. Professor Main more than reasonably proves the close proximity of economic and political views, but he does not convincingly demonstrate that the relationship is a strictly causative one.

The second half of the book collects the Antifederal objections to national government and the various counter-proposals to the Constitution. Following these chapters is a convention by convention account of Antifederal defeat at the hands of the Federalists, whose superior organization, greater newspaper coverage and keen sense of political timing turned minorities into majorities and won the day.

Professor Main balances the need for generalization with that of accuracy and detail to present the kind of concise, over-all account essential to an understanding of the Anti-federalists. His abundant footnoting of sources is helpful, while the restraint evident in his conclusions is as refreshing as his straight-forward admission that some important source material is lacking.

While filling a gap in the history of post-Revolutionary War politics, to paraphrase the Introduction, the author does not assess the theoretical foundations of the Antifederal position. In this regard, his work is an hors-d'oeuvre rather than a main course. It contains short discussions on the meaning of “federal” and “democracy” before the Federalists succeeded in modifying these terms; the Antifederal view of the incompatibility of a large, diverse country and national government with a democratically based republic; and the Antifederal fear that centralized power would be destructive of liberty. This book is at its best in bringing to life and explaining the political dilemma of the Antifederalists. No less important, it points the way toward assessment and appreciation of their contribution to our political institutions.—ELDON BOWMAN, College of Wooster.

Design of Regional Accounts: Papers presented at the Conference on Regional Accounts, 1960.

EDITED BY WERNER HOCHWALD. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1961. Pp. xx, 281. $6.00.)

This volume presents a series of nine papers dealing with various aspects of the design of regional accounts. In addition to the thirteen economists who wrote the major papers, seventeen commentators added their brief evaluations and criticisms. From the point of view of methodology, the approach here represented is one that might well be emulated in political science, for the critical interaction and interchange among a group of scholars exploring a frontier problem provides a stimulating volume.

This collection of papers is a part of the growing literature on regional economics, much of which has been sponsored and supported by Resources for the Future, Inc. This literature of the new regionalists is to be distinguished from that of twenty-five years ago by its greater rigor and by its search for operational concepts, models and data which can serve as a foundation for analysis and prediction. The interest in policy decisions remains strong, although there is frequent recognition of the primitive state of knowledge and the difficulties of acquiring useable data. Generally restrained is philosophical speculation as to the nature of regional development, and many of the unstated and unanalyzed major premises of earlier regional literature are avoided.

The difficult problem of regional definition has not been solved (if indeed it needs to be solved) and often the contributors make clear that they are speaking about metropolitan regions (the Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas of the Census Bureau). This focus is not particularly justified, although it is clearly implied that these units are used because it is in the SMSA's where most significant economic activity occurs and for which data are collected and organized.

While in the first instance this volume will have a primary appeal for economists (Only the chapter by Edward B. Berman, “Impact of Local Government Policies on Local Capital Formation and Output,” would seem to have an obvious political relevance), it is this reviewer's conviction that these papers and related literature should receive greater attention from political scientists. This conviction rests on two premises: first, that political-governmental decisions in the next decades will have to be made in the context of their economic effects, local as well as national, and second, that some of the most critical political struggles and conflicts in this period will concern the geographic allocation of public benefits (as well as costs).

Perhaps allocation questions will continue to be settled largely through group alliances and alignments, through horse trades and pork-barrel bargains. But in so far as political science may also be concerned with the development of more rational decisions, it may find the work of the new regionalists useful as indicating some of the constraints within which political decisions may be made. Perhaps, too, political science can build upon the work of the regional economists and upon their data, since their writings often seem oblivious to the nature of political decision-making.

In addition to the paper by Berman referred to above, the volume includes the following: "A General Structure for Regional Economic Analysis," by Werner Z. Hirsch; "Relative Regional Economic Growth: An Approach to Regional Accounts," by Harvey S. Perloff; "Investment Return as a Measure of Comparative Regional Economic Advantage," by George H. Borts and Jerome L. Stein; "Regional Breakdowns of National Economic Accounts," by Richard Ruggles and Nancy D. Ruggles; "Regional Income and Product Accounts: Construction and Applications," by Charles L. Leven; "Regional Account Projections in the Context of National Projections," by Louis Delwart and Sidney Sonenblum; "Microanalytic Models for Regional Analysis," by George H. Orcutt; and "The Role of Accounts in the Economic Study of the Pittsburgh Metropolitan Region," by Edgar M. Hoover and Benjamin Chinitz.—NORMAN WENGERT, Wayne State University.

The Role of the Federal Government in Financing Higher Education. BY ALICE M. RIVLIN. Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution, 1961. Pp. xii, 179. Price $3.00, cloth; $2.00, paper.)

"Direct federal control (of higher education institutions) would in the end produce uniformity, mediocrity, and compliance. Verve, initiative, and originality would disappear. . . . We know of no one who advocates this central control. But those who advocate the extension of federal financial support are treading down this path."

Since 1952 when this warning was sounded by the Commission on Financing Higher Education,<sup>1</sup> the amount of federal aid and its contribution to total higher education income have continued to rise. Yet, the impassioned words of the Commission, though a mere decade old, have an anachronistic sound to the contemporary academic ear. Today lay leaders and educators are more closely in tune with the President's Commission on National Goals: "The federal role must now be expanded. . . . Federal aid to higher education must include increased scholarship and loan funds, support of research as an essential part of the educational process, and direct assistance for buildings and equipment."<sup>2</sup>

Though today the idea of increased federal aid is well-received, only an unusually optimistic educator-recipient would assert that the questions raised by the Commission a decade ago are no longer relevant. Dr. Alice Rivlin's comprehensive review points up the vital questions. Here is an informative account of the history and present status both of federal support for higher education and of issues of educational philosophy and public policy. In avoiding exhaustive treatment, Dr. Rivlin achieves a valuable overview, with documentation sufficient to illustrate forcefully the issues of policy raised by a continuing accumulation of federal programs and federal dollars.

The story begins with a clear statement of the "crisis" in higher education finance which makes this Brookings Institution study timely. In successive chapters it traces the origins of federal involvement through land grants and other aid programs, the development of federal support of research, programs of student assistance and of funds for buildings, and federal educational institutions. It focuses attention on the impact of changing federal policies upon the colleges, states the case against and for federal subsidies, and appraises principal alternatives in methods of assistance. The subject is treated from the point of view of an economist who is not blind to political reality or to other value considerations.

The timeliness of this study is underlined both by the rapidity of the growth of federal support and by the apparent inevitability that recent trend-lines will continue. The report warns that "Although the primary motivation of federal activity has not been educational, federal actions have profoundly affected the development of our system of higher education." In the report one finds assorted documentation for this statement but none is more impressive than the influence federal support for research has exerted upon higher education through its impact upon the relatively few universities in which it is concentrated. In 1957-58, 36 institutions received approximately 75 percent of all federal research funds for higher education; the same institutions produced a decided majority of all doctorates. These universities have in turn contributed directly, and indirectly through their graduates, to the current dominance of a point of view that places research and graduate instruction on a pinnacle so high that other important functions—such as undergraduate general education—are difficult to include in the same focus. Whether or not this emphasis is entirely healthy is debatable, but that it flows in no small part from the growth of federal support seems undeniable.

There never has been a clearly defined federal policy toward education. Yet, as the federal role increases, federal influence upon the educational system will increase. Against the background that Dr. Rivlin provides it seems important that a wide variety of programs continue to receive varied types of federal aid for there is strength in the very plurality of federal interests. However, the large number of federal agencies involved and the diversity of programs can be a source of strength, rather than a possibly fatal weakness, only if ways can be provided both for educators and for makers of federal policy to take a total view of present and future needs and of the impact or possible impact of present and future federal programs. The President's Committee on Education Beyond the High School, the American Assembly (notably Douglas M. Knight), the American Council on Education, and others have concerned themselves with this important point, but little has yet been achieved.

<sup>1</sup> Nature and Needs of Higher Education (N. Y., Columbia Univ. Press, 1952), p. 162.

<sup>2</sup> Goals for Americans ([Englewood Cliffs, N. J.], Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1960), p. 7.

Dr. Rivlin's study points up the significance of higher education control and finance as areas deserving the attention of the political scientist qua political scientist as well as qua educator.—FRANK C. ABBOTT, Montana State University.

Constraint by Copyright. By M. B. SCHNAPPER. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1960. Pp. 154. $3.75.)

Turn to page 80 of M. B. Schnapper's call of protest to the American people against extensive copyrighting of official material by public officials and you will find a reproduction of an advertisement that goes a long way toward making his case for him. The advertisement bears the name of the Chilton Co. of Philadelphia and announces publication of "The United States Secret Service" by Walter S. Bowen and Harry Edward Neal, at $4.95 in the month of March, 1960.

The title of the book is superimposed over a large and most official looking star bearing the words, U. S. Secret Service. The upper-left fourth of the advertisement contains in large type this eye-catching statement: "4 reasons why we predict this will be one of the best selling books of 1960."

The first reason given is this: "It's the first really authentic story of the U. S. Secret Service, taken straight from the files of the Service itself." Second: "It's filled with spine-tingling dramatic cases of how the Secret Service cracked down on the Mafia, broke up the Ku Klux Klan, arrested members of Congress for land frauds, investigated the Teapot Dome scandal, exposed one of the most gigantic foreign sabotage plots of all time, and much more." Still another reason: "It's written by a former Assistant Chief of the Service and the Official Historian of the Service."

This announcement of the Bowen-Neal book about the United States Secret Service suggests some pertinent questions to Mr. Schnapper. In the lines under the reproduction he asks: "Was the advertising copy writer merely indulging in over-statement or was he sticking pretty close to the truth? Did Messrs. Bowen and Neal obtain most of their material while in the Secret Service? Did either of them prepare for official purposes material constituting a substantial portion of their copyrighted book?"

Numerous other illustrations of the private copyrighting of public material are cited by the author who regards this as a serious evil that should be stopped as contrary to the free speech and free press guarantees of the Bill of Rights, contrary to the constitutional oath that every public official takes, and contrary to specific provisions of the Federal Copyright Act.

The widespread practice, as Mr. Schnapper puts it, is a resort to monopoly via copyright limitations which places "private property restrictions on and around a vast amount of official information that has cost the taxpayer countless billions of dollars." Since copyrights run for a minimum of 28 years and a maximum of 56 years, public information that goes into private commercial hands goes for a long time at the shortest.

But that is not all. Mr. Schnapper's analysis of the situation goes much further. For, to quote him again, "inherent in copyrighting by public officials is presumption of the right to suppress completely whatever they consider their personal property and arrogation of private authority to restrict access to or use of such property if and when they should see fit to disclose its nature."

Here, in short, is a matter about which relatively few Americans have thought anything and about which most have not thought even slightly. Yet it is a matter which should concern us all because it is our government and the materials at stake are owned by the people. M. B. Schnapper deserves widespread appreciation for heading up the effort to bring the abuse to widespread public attention.

The author is executive director of the Public Affairs Press in Washington. Significantly he says on his book's own copyright page: "Statements made by the author can be quoted without permission."—IRVING DILLIARD.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Administrative versus Judicial Determinations of Citizenship. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1962.

Cooper, Joseph and Ann. The Legislative Veto and the Constitution. George Washington Law Review. March, 1962.

Deportation and Exclusion: A Continuing Dialogue between Congress and the Courts. Yale Law Journal. March, 1962.

Goldie, L. F. E. The Connally Reservation: A Shield for an Adversary. University of California, Los Angeles, Law Review. March, 1962.

Green, Harold P., and Alan Rosenthal. Fusion of Government Power [by Joint Committee on Atomic Energy]. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. June, 1962.

James, Louis C. Senatorial Rejections of Presidential Nominations to the Cabinet: A Study in Constitutional Custom. Arizona Law Review. Winter, 1961.

Maxey, David W. Loss of Nationality: Individual Choice or Government Fiat? Albany Law Review. June, 1962.

Nieburg, H. L. The Eisenhower AEC and Congress: A Study in Executive-Legislative Relations. Midwest Journal of Political Science. May, 1962.

Pressly, Thomas J. Bullets and Ballots: Lincoln and the "Right of Revolution." American Historical Review. April, 1962.

Riddick, Floyd M. The Eighty-Seventh Congress: First Session. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

The U. S. A. under Kennedy. [Symposium.] Political Quarterly. April-June, 1962.

State Government

Ash, Henry L. The West Virginia Department of Finance and Administration. Bureau for Government Research, West Virginia University. 1962.

Bell, James R. State Government Reorganization in California. State Government. Spring, 1962.

Carley, David. Legal and Extra-Legal Powers of Wisconsin Governors in Legislative Relations—Part II. Wisconsin Law Review. March, 1962.

Hyink, Bernard L. The California Legislature Looks at the State Constitution. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Larson, James E. Reapportionment and the Courts. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1962.

Nusbaum, Joe E. State Departments of Administration. State Government. Spring, 1962.

Rothenberg, Leon. State Budgets—1962. Ibid.

Trends of State Government in 1962 as Indicated by the Governors' Messages. Ibid.

Wheeler, John P., and John E. Bebout. After Reapportionment. National Civic Review. May, 1962.

Williams, G. Mennen. A Governor's Notes. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1961.

Zubrow, Reuben A., and Robert L. Decker. The Taxation of Legalized Gambling in Nevada. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Local Government

Anderson, Robert M. The Board of Zoning Appeals—Villain or Victim? Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Birkhead, Guthrie S., ed. Metropolitan Issues: Social, Governmental, Fiscal. Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University. 1962.

Brazer, Harvey E., Daniel B. Suits, and Muriel W. Converse. Municipal Bond Yields: The Market's Reaction to Michigan's Fiscal Crisis. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Burnett, John M. Some Problems on Urban Renewal Law. Santa Clara Lawyer. Spring, 1962.

Carrell, Jephtha J. The Role of the City Manager: A Survey Report. Public Management. April, 1962.

Deming, George H. What Can Citizens Do [about Metropolitan Problems]? National Civic Review. April, 1962.

Donovan, Thomas B. Zoning: Variance Administration in Alameda County. California Law Review. March, 1962.

Eshelman, W. Richard. Municipal Regulation of House Trailers in Pennsylvania. Dickinson Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Fitch, Lyle C. A Transit Paradox. National Civic Review. April, 1962.

Inequality in Property Tax Assessments: New Cures for an Old Ill. Harvard Law Review. May, 1962.

Jones, Russell D. The Changing Role of the City Manager. Public Management. June, 1962.

Labaree, Benjamin W. New England Town Meeting. American Archivist. April, 1962.

Lash, James E. Renewal: Area Problem. Na- tional Civic Review. April, 1962.

Lockard, Duane. The City Manager, Administrative Theory and Political Power. Political Science Quarterly. June 1962.

Magnusson, Jon. Off-Street Parking Facilities for New York. Brooklyn Law Review. April, 1962.

Martin, Albert B. Home Rule for Kansas Cities. University of Kansas Law Review. May, 1962.

McClain, Jackson M., and Robert B. Highsaw. Dixie City Acts: A Study in Decision-Making. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1962.

Netzer, Dick. Paying for Services. National Civic Review. April, 1962.

Public Ownership of Land through Dedication. Harvard Law Review. May, 1962.

Rosenfeld, W. P. Conflict of Interest and the Ontario Municipal Act. Faculty of Law Review, University of Toronto. April, 1962.

Swanton, James H. The Municipal Quest for Industry. Public Management. April, 1962.

Sweet, Morris L., and Finn B. Jensen. The Planned Community. National Civic Review. May, 1962.

Techniques for Preserving Open Spaces. Harvard Law Review. June, 1962.

Toward an Equitable and Workable Program of Mobile Home Taxation. Yale Law Journal. March, 1962.

Weinstein, James. Organized Business and the City Commission and Manager Movements. Journal of Southern History. May, 1962.

Wilson, James, and Robert W. Crowe. Managers in Maine. Bureau for Research in Municipal Government, Bowdoin College. 1962.

Zoning against the Public Welfare: Judicial Limitations on Municipal Parochialism. Yale Law Journal. March, 1962.

Intergovernmental Relations

Cowdery, Richard C. Intergovernmental Transportation Planning. Public Management. April, 1962.

Duggar, George S. Federalism and Self-Government in the United States: Urban Renewal as an Example. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1961.

Dye, Thomas R. Metropolitan Integration by Bargaining among Sub-Areas. American Behavioral Scientist. May, 1962.

Esgain, Albert J. State Authority and Responsibility in the Atomic Energy Field. Duke Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Humes, Samuel. Organization for Metropolitan Cooperation. Public Management. May, 1962.

Jones, Victor. Cooperation Pattern. National Civic Review. June, 1962.

Levenson, Rosaline. Improving State Assistance to Local Assessors. Institute of Public Service, University of Connecticut. 1962.

McQuery, Elton K. Interstate Compacts for Traffic Safety. State Government. Spring, 1962.

Systems of Economic Accounts and Analysis for Urban Regions. [Symposium.] American Economic Review. May, 1962.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Alfange, Dean, Jr. "Under Color of Law": Classic and Screws Revisited. Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Barker, Lucius J. The Supreme Court as Policy Maker: The Tidelands Oil Controversy. Journal of Politics. May, 1962.

Bartholomew, Paul C. The Supreme Court of the United States, 1960-1961. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Bender, Paul. The Retroactive Effect of an Overruling Constitutional Decision: Mapp v. Ohio. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1962.

Boner, Marian O. Erie v. Tompkins: A Study in Judicial Precedent. Texas Law Review. April, 1962. Part II. Ibid. May, 1962.

Brandwen, Maxwell. The Battle of the First Amendment: A Study in Judicial Interpretation. North Carolina Law Review. February, 1962.

Breitenbach, H. Eugene. Due Process of Law for Juveniles Revisited. Journal of the State Bar of California. January-February, 1962.

Contempt by Publication: The Limitation on Indirect Contempt of Court. Virginia Law Review. April, 1962.

Cox, Archibald. Understanding the Supreme Court. Natural Resources Journal. April, 1962.

Fernandez, Ferdinand F. Prisoners' Religious Freedom. Southern California Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Fisk, Jedolyn Jean Johnson. Compulsory Testimony of the Congressional Witness and the Fifth Amendment. Oklahoma Law Review. May, 1962.

Gorski, Jerome C. The Exclusionary Rule and the Question of Standing. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Hardin, Paul, III. Executive Privilege in the Federal Courts. Yale Law Journal. April, 1962.

Henkin, Louis. Shelley v. Kraemer: Notes for a Revised Opinion. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. February, 1962.

Janoff, Lester D., and Philip I. Aaron. The Law of Search and Seizure—Federal Standards of Reasonableness. Brooklyn Law Review. April, 1962.

Krislov, Samuel. Some Enduring Misconceptions of American Constitutional History. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1962.

Lawless, William B. Mr. Justice Jackson: The Struggle for Federal Supremacy. Notre Dame Lawyer. May, 1962.

Legal Responsibility for Extra-Legal Censure. Columbia Law Review. March, 1962.

Miller, Arthur S. An Affirmative Thrust to Due Process of Law? George Washington Law Review. March, 1962.

Murphy, William P. State Sovereignty and the Ratification of the Constitution. II. Mississippi Law Journal. March, 1962. III. Ibid. May, 1962.

Open Meeting Statutes: The Press Fights for the "Right to Know." Harvard Law Review. April, 1962.

Ritz, Wilfred J. Twenty-five Years of State Criminal Confession Cases in the U. S. Supreme Court. Washington and Lee Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Sedler, Robert Allen. Standing to Assert Constitutional Jus Tertii in the Supreme Court. Yale Law Journal. March, 1962.

Smith, Allen E. Blue Ridge and Beyond: A Byrd's-Eye View of Federalism in Diversity Litigation. Tulane Law Review. April, 1962.

Supreme Court Review of State Findings of Fact in Fourteenth Amendment Cases. Stanford Law Review. March, 1962.

Torcia, Charles E., and Donald B. King. The Mirage of Retroactivity and Changing Constitutional Concepts. Dickinson Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Westin, Alan F. Out-of-Court Commentary by United States Supreme Court Justices, 1790-1962: Of Free Speech and Judicial Lockjaw. Columbia Law Review. April, 1962.

Wright, Benjamin F. The Supreme Court Cannot Be Neutral. Texas Law Review. May, 1962.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Barrett, Edward F. The Adversary System and the Ethics of Advocacy. Notre Dame Lawyer. May, 1962.

Barrett, Edward L., Jr. Police Practices and the Law—From Arrest to Release or Charge. California Law Review. March, 1962.

Brennan, William J., Jr. The Administrative Judge—The Key to Effective Court Management. Journal of the American Judicature Society. April, 1962.

California Jury Procedure. [Symposium.] Hastings Law Journal. May, 1962.

Criminal Law. [Symposium.] Boston University Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Economos, James P. Justice Court Improvement and Traffic Courts. State Government. Spring, 1962.

Eminent Domain—Rights and Remedies of an Uncompensated Landowner. Washington University Law Quarterly. April, 1962.

Frautschi, Timothy C. Personal Jurisdiction

Requirements under Federal Change of Venue Statutes. Wisconsin Law Review. March, 1962.

Hagan, Raymond James. Interviewing Witnesses in Criminal Cases. Brooklyn Law Review. April, 1962.

Inbau, Fred E. Public Safety v. Individual Liberties: The Prosecutor's Stand. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. March, 1962.

Judicial Intervention in Disputes over the Use of Church Property. Harvard Law Review. April, 1962.

LaFave, Wayne R. The Police and Nonenforcement of the Law—Part II. Wisconsin Law Review. March, 1962.

Leavy, Zad, and Jerome M. Kummer. Criminal Abortion: Human Hardship and Unyielding Laws. Southern California Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Legislative and Constitutional Courts: What Lurks Ahead for Bifurcation. Yale Law Journal. April, 1962.

Lenoir, James J. Congressional Control over Suits to Restrain the Assessment or Collection of Federal Taxes. Arizona Law Review. Winter, 1961.

Northrop, F. S. C. Law, Language and Morals. Yale Law Journal. May, 1962.

Oliver, John W. The Grand Jury: An Effort to Get a Dragon out of His Cave. Washington University Law Quarterly. April, 1962.

Orfield, Lester B. Indictment and Information in Federal Criminal Procedure. Part III. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Phillips, Orie L., and A. Sherman Christenson. Should Corporations Be Regarded as Citizens within the Diversity Jurisdiction Provisions? American Bar Association Journal. May, 1962.

Professor George H. Dession's Final Draft of the Code of Correction for Puerto Rico. Yale Law Journal. May, 1962.

Prospective Overruling and Retroactive Application in the Federal Courts. Ibid. April, 1962.

Recidivism and Virginia's "Come-Back" Law. Virginia Law Review. April, 1962.

Schubert, Glendon. Policy Without Law: An Extension of the Certiorari Game. Stanford Law Review. March, 1962.

Selected Articles on Eminent Domain Compensation and Valuation Problems. Virginia Law Review. April, 1962.

Skoler, Daniel L., and John M. Janewicz. A Survey of Judicial Salaries in the United States and Canada. Journal of the American Judicature Society. March, 1962.

Snyder, Orvill C. Criminal Responsibility. Duke Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Swinney, Everette. Enforcing the Fifteenth Amendment, 1870-1877. Journal of Southern History. May, 1962.

Symposium on Insanity as a Defense in Criminal Law. Marquette Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Weinstein, Noah, and William J. Shaw. Grand Jury Reports—A Safeguard of Democracy. Washington University Law Quarterly. April, 1962.

Zald, Mayer N. Power Balance and Staff Conflict in Correctional Institutions. Administrative Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Alger, Chadwick F. The External Bureaucracy in United States Foreign Affairs. Administrative Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Barr, Andrew. Accountants and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Journal of Accountancy. April, 1962.

Borchardt, Kurt. Congressional Use of Administrative Organization and Procedure for Policy-Making Purposes: Six Case Studies and Some Conclusions. George Washington Law Review. March, 1962.

Brewer, William A. The Federal Power Commission and "The Folklore of Capitalism." American Bar Association Journal. May, 1962.

Byse, Clark. Proposed Reforms in Federal "Nonstatutory" Judicial Review: Sovereign Immunity, Indispensable Parties, Mandamus. Harvard Law Review. June, 1962.

Caldwell, Kenneth S., and Joseph M. Lowery. Role of Management Consultants in Government. Municipal Finance. May, 1962.

Caplin, Mortimer M. New Directions in Tax Administration. Accounting Review. April, 1962.

Chester, D. N. Research as an Aid in Public Administration. Public Administration. Spring, 1962.

Collective Bargaining in the Public Service: A Symposium. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1962.

Connor, Martin F., III. FTC Procedure Revisions: A Critique. Villanova Law Review. Spring, 1962.

The Federal Trade Commission and Reform of the Administrative Process. Columbia Law Review. April, 1962.

Fick, Winston M. The Reform of Administrative Procedure and the Controversy over Judicialization. Santa Clara Lawyer. Spring, 1962.

Friedland, Louis L. Fair Employment Practices in the Public Service. Public Personnel Review. April, 1962.

Friendly, Henry J. The Federal Administrative Agencies: The Need for Better Definition of Standards. Part II. Harvard Law Review. April, 1962. Part III. Ibid. May, 1962.

Gallas, Nesta M. The Use of Sociometric Tests in Personnel Selection. Public Personnel Review. April, 1962.

Green, David, Jr. Depreciation of General Fixed Assets in Governmental Accounts. Muni- cipal Finance. May, 1962.

Harris, Curtis C., Jr., and Daniel B. DeLoach. Profit Motive: A Stimulant to Federal Administrative Efficiency? Public Administration Review. Winter, 1962.

Hughes, Charles E., Jr. Problems in Administering Local Records. American Archivist. April, 1962.

Judicial Review of Administrative Agency Actions in Indiana. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1962.

Lang, Theodore H. Future Trends in New York City's Personnel Administration. Public Personnel Review. April, 1962.

Lichty, Lawrence W. The Impact of FCC and FCC Commissioners' Backgrounds on the Regulation of Broadcasting. Journal of Broadcasting. Spring, 1962.

Long, Norton E. After the Voting Is Over. Midwest Journal of Political Science. May, 1962.

Murphy, Charlotte P. Money Penalties—An Administrative Sword of Damocles. Santa Clara Lawyer. Spring, 1962.

Public Authorities. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Autumn, 1961.

Ralston, Charles S. Inspection of Public Records under California Law. California Law Review. March, 1962.

Rauner, Robert M., and Wilbur A. Steger. Simulation and Long-Range Planning for Resource Allocation. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1962.

Riggs, Robert E. Arizona State Personnel Policies. Bureau of Business and Public Research, University of Arizona. 1962.

Scher, Seymour. The Politics of Agency Organization. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

Slesinger, Jonathan Avery. Personnel Adaptations in the Federal Junior Management Assistant Program. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1961. [1962].

Stover, Carl F. The Government of Science. Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, Santa Barbara, Calif. 1962.

Takasaki, Richard S. Measuring Efficiency in Government. Municipal Finance. May, 1962.

Thompson, Helen. Atlanta's "Segregated" Approach to Integrated Employment. Public Personnel Review. April, 1962.

Thorne, John E. The Government Employee and Organized Labor. Santa Clara Lawyer. Spring, 1962.

Wade, H. W. R. Law, Opinion and Administration. Law Quarterly Review. April, 1962.

Willbern, York. The Public Service. Texas Western College. 1962.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Abernethy, Lloyd M. The Progressive Campaigned in Pennsylvania, 1912. Pennsylvania History. April, 1962.

Barrett, Harold. Scott of the Oregonian vs. William Jennings Bryan. Quarterly Journal of Speech. April, 1962.

Blodgett, Geoffrey T. The Mind of the Boston Mugwump. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. March, 1962.

Cain, Marvin R. Edward Bates and the [Republican Nomination] Decision of 1860. Mid-America. April, 1962.

Clem, Alan L. South Dakota Political Almanac: A Presentation and Analysis of Election Statistics, 1889-1960. Governmental Research Bureau, State University of South Dakota. 1962.

Clover, Frank. Political Contributions by Labor Unions. Texas Law Review. May, 1962.

Converse, Philip E., and Georges Dupeux. Politicization of the Electorate in France and the United States. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Cosman, Bernard. Presidential Republicanism in the South, 1960. Journal of Politics. May, 1962.

Cox, Edward F. Congressional District Party Strengths and the 1960 Election. Ibid.

Dalenius, Tore. Recent Advances in Sample Survey Theory and Methods. Annals of Mathematical Statistics. June, 1962.

The Darkened Channels: UHF Television and the FCC. Harvard Law Review. June, 1962.

Dempsey, Paul. Liberalism-Conservatism and Party Loyalty in the U. S. Senate. Journal of Social Psychology. April, 1962.

Dewey, Donald O. Madison's Views on Electoral Reform. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Flinn, Thomas A. How Mr. Nixon Took Ohio: A Short Reply to Senator Kennedy's Question. Ibid. June, 1962.

Frawley, Ernest D. TV and Public Service: A Proposal for Action. Harvard Business Review. May-June, 1962.

Frisch, Morton J. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Problem of Democratic Liberty. Ethics. April, 1962.

Froman, Lewis A., Jr. Learning Political Attitudes. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

Galligan, David J. Program for Citizens [in Practical Politics]. National Civic Review. June, 1962.

Gilbert, Charles E., and Christopher Clague. Electoral Competition and Electoral Systems in Large Cities. Journal of Politics. May, 1962.

Goldsmith, Adolph O. The Roaring Lion of Vermont. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Graham, Jean Charters. Patronage—Fact and Fancy. Public Personnel Review. April, 1962.

Greenberg, Bradley S., and Percy H. Tannenbaum. Communicator Performance under Cognitive Stress. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Haglund, Donn K. The Alaska Marine Highway Referendum: A Case Study in Sectionalism. Social Science. April, 1962.

Henderson, Keith M. The Politics of Answering Interview Questions. American Behavioral Scientist. May, 1962.

Jacob, Philip E., and James J. Flink. Values and Their Function in Decision-Making. Ibid. Supplement.

Johnson, Benton. Ascetic Protestantism and Political Preference. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Jones, Charles O. A Suggested Scheme for Classifying Congressional Campaigns. Ibid.

Kerr, Harry P. The Election Sermon: Primer for Revolutionaries. Speech Monographs. March, 1962.

Levin, Murray B., and Murray Eden. Political Strategy for the Alienated Voter. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Moore, Joan W. Social Deprivation and Advantage as Sources of Political Values. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

O'Brien, George Dennis. State, Academy, and Church. Journal of Religion. April, 1962.

Pole, J. R. Historians and the Problem of Early American Democracy. American Historical Review. April, 1962.

The Question of Poll Taxes and Literacy Tests. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. May, 1962.

Ross, Hugh. Roosevelt's Third-Term Nomination. Mid-America. April, 1962.

Roucek, Joseph S. Political Limits of Cultural Pluralism. Issues. Spring, 1962.

Scheinberg, Stephen J. Theodore Roosevelt and the A. F. of L.'s Entry into Politics, 1906-1908. Labor History. Spring, 1962.

Takács, Lajos. A Generalization of the Ballot Problem and Its Application in the Theory of Queues. Journal of the American Statistical Association. June, 1962.

Wilcox, Walter. The Press of the Radical Right: An Exploratory Analysis. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Williams, Donald E. Charles G. Dawes: The Conscience of Normalcy. Speech Monographs. March, 1962.

Wimer, Kurt. Woodrow Wilson and a Third Nomination. Pennsylvania History. April, 1962.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Brandt, Karl. Economic Conditions for a Free Society. Modern Age. Spring, 1962.

Chase, Sam B., Jr. Tax Credits for Investment Spending. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Goffman, Irving J. The Taxation of Capital Gains: An Economic Analysis. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. May, 1962.

Goode, Richard. Critique of Public Finance.

Harvard Business Review. May-June, 1962.

Hansen, Reed R. An Empirical Analysis of the Retail Sales Tax with Policy Recommendations. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Hazard, Leland. Can We Afford Our National Goals? Harvard Business Review. May-June, 1962.

Hirschman, Albert O., and Charles E. Lindblom. Economic Development, Research and Development, Policy Making: Some Converging Views. Behavioral Science. April, 1962.

Miller, William L. The Magnitude of the Discount Rate for Government Projects. Southern Economic Journal. April, 1962.

Moonitz, Maurice. Should We Discard the Income Concept? Accounting Review. April, 1962.

Schlesinger, James R. Emerging Attitudes toward Fiscal Policy. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1962.

Tax Problems. [Symposium.] American Economic Review. May, 1962.

Thompson, John H., et al. Toward a Geography of Economic Health: The Case of New York State. Annals of the Association of American Geographers. March, 1962.

White, William H. Illusions in the Marginal Investment Subsidy. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Natural Resources

Economics of Water Resource Use. [Symposium.] American Economic Review. May, 1962.

Fox, Irving K., and Lyle E. Craine. Organizational Arrangements for Water Development. Natural Resources Journal. April, 1962.

Hall, George R. Conservation as a Public Policy Goal. Yale Review. Spring, 1962.

Hamilton, Roy. The Senate Committee on National Water Resources: An Ethical and Rational Criticism. Natural Resources Journal. April, 1962.

Krieger, James H., and Harvey O. Banks. Ground Water Basin Management. California Law Review. March, 1962.

O'Connell, Jeffrey. Iowa's New Water Statute—The Constitutionality of Regulating Existing Uses of Water. Iowa Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Ostrom, Vincent. The Water Economy and Its Organization. Natural Resources Journal. April, 1962.

Agriculture

Chambers, Clarke A. The Cooperative League of the United States of America, 1916-1961: A Study of Social Theory and Social Action. Agricultural History. April, 1962.

The County Officials' Guide to the U. S. Department of Agriculture. County Officer. May, 1962.

Fite, Gilbert C. Farmer Opinion and the Agricultural Adjustment Act, 1933. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. March, 1962.

The Political Impasse in Farm Support Legislation. Yale Law Journal. April, 1962.

Scruggs, Otey M. The Bracero Program under the Farm Security Administration, 1942-1943. Labor History. Spring, 1962.

Business and Labor

Aaron, Benjamin. Arbitration in the Federal Courts: Aftermath of the Trilogy. University of California, Los Angeles, Law Review. March, 1962.

———. Reflections on the Legal Nature and Enforceability of Seniority Rights. Harvard Law Review. June, 1962.

The Admissibility and Scope of Guilty Pleas in Antitrust Treble Damage Actions. Yale Law Journal. March, 1962.

Balmer, Donald G. The Role of Political Leadership in the Passage of Oregon's Migratory Labor Legislation. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Berle, Adolf A. Modern Functions of the Corporate System. Columbia Law Review. March, 1962.

Broker Silence and Rule 10b-5: Expanding the Duty to Disclose. Yale Law Journal. March, 1962.

Coons, John E. Non-Commercial Purpose as a Sherman Act Defense. Northwestern University Law Review. January-February, 1962.

Dakin, Melvin G. The Changing Nature of Utility Rate Regulation: Just Compensation, Due Process, and Equal Protection. Tulane Law Review. April, 1962.

Day, Richard E. Exclusive Territorial Arrangements under the Antitrust Laws—A Reappraisal. North Carolina Law Review. February, 1962.

Dolan, James V., and Richard S. Rebeck. Corporate Criminal Liability for Acts in Violation of Company Policy. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Feldesman, William. The Supreme Court and Collective Bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act. Labor Law Journal. May, 1962.

Forkosch, Morris D. The Doctrine of Criminal Conspiracy and Its Modern Application to Labor: II. Texas Law Review. April, 1962.

Gellhorn, Walter, and Louis Lauer. Administration of the New York Workmen's Compensation Law. Part II. New York University Law Review. April, 1962.

Gordon, Joseph A. The Rights of the Taxpayer to Withhold Records during a Tax Investigation. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Gould, William B. Taft-Hartley Revisited: The Contrariety of the Collective Bargaining Agreement and the Plight of the Unorganized. Labor Law Journal. May, 1962.

Graves, Glenn R. The Agency Shop vs. the "Right to Work." Texas Law Review. April, 1962.

Indemnification of the Corporate Official for fines and Expenses Resulting from Criminal Antitrust Litigation. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Kamm, Solomon M. Venue in Private Antitrust Suits. New York University Law Review. April, 1962.

Kaplan, Bernard I. The Asphalt Clause—A New Weapon in Antitrust Enforcement. Boston College Industrial and Commercial Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Klebaner, Benjamin J. Federal Control of Commercial Bank Mergers. Indiana Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Kohn, James A. The Antidumping Act: Its Administration and Place in American Trade Policy. Michigan Law Review. February, 1962.

Kreindler, Lee S. Admissibility and Effect of Government Approval and Certification of Aircraft. Boston College Industrial and Commercial Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Lindsey, John M. The Legislative Development of Civil Aviation, 1938–1958. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Winter, 1961–62.

Manne, Henry G. The "Higher Criticism" of the Modern Corporation. Columbia Law Review. March, 1962.

Marcus, Philip. The Big Antitrust Case in the Appellate Courts. Northwestern University Law Review. January–February, 1962.

Marshall, Arthur M. Carrier Service and the Picket Line: A Dilemma. Labor Law Journal. April, 1962.

Matteoni, Norman E. A New Antitoxin to Advertising Artifice—Television Advertising and the Federal Trade Commission. Notre Dame Lawyer. May, 1962.

Paley, Robert J. Antitrust Pitfalls in Exclusive Dealing: Recent Developments under the Sherman, Clayton and FTC Acts. Ibid.

Petro, Sylvester. Trade Unionism and the "Public Sector." Modern Age. Spring, 1962.

Private Recovery under the Robinson-Patman Act. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1962.

Rockefeller, Edwin S., and Robert L. Wald. Antitrust Enforcement by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice: A Primer for Small Business. Dickinson Law Review. Spring, 1962.

The Role of State Law in Federal Antitrust Treble Damage Actions. Harvard Law Review. May, 1962.

Smith, Russell A. Arbitrability—the Arbitrator, the Courts and the Parties. Arbitration Journal. Vol. 17, No. 1. 1962.

Sovern, Michael I. The National Labor Relations Act and Racial Discrimination. Columbia Law Review. April, 1962.

Spielman, Lester. The Taft-Hartley Law: Its Effect on the Growth of the Labor Movement. Labor Law Journal. April, 1962.

Sturges, Wesley A., and Richard E. Reckson. Common-Law and Statutory Arbitration: Problems Arising from Their Coexistence. Minnesota Law Review. April, 1962.

Summers, Clyde W. American Legislation for Union Democracy. Modern Law Review. May, 1962.

Swihart, R. Dale. Federal Taxation of Life Insurance Wealth. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1962.

Transacting Business as a Basis for Venue over a Corporation under the Antitrust Laws. Washington University Law Quarterly. April, 1962.

Tucker, William H., and John H. O'Brien. The Public Interest in Railroad Mergers. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Weinstein, Jerome E. Problems in the Field of State Securities Regulation. Boston College Industrial and Commercial Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Weiss, Leo. Federal Remedies for Racial Discrimination by Labor Unions. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Boyer, William W. Sectarian Teachers in Wisconsin Public Schools: A Study in Administrative Decision Making. Religious Education. May–June, 1962.

Brestel, W. Christopher, Jr. The California Motor Vehicle Pollution Control Law. California Law Review. March, 1962.

Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act: Recent Amendments. Minnesota Law Review. April, 1962.

Harrison, Joseph W. The Bible, the Constitution and Public Education. Tennessee Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Moreland, W. D. State Statutes Affecting the Social Studies Curriculum. Social Studies. April, 1962.

Morrison, Joseph L. Josephus Daniels and the Bassett Academic Freedom Case. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Mulrooney, Keith F. Community Responsibility for Mental Health. Public Management. June, 1962.

Rada, Edward L. Capital Costs of Cal-Vet Housing. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Roemer, Ruth. Mental Health Legislation Affecting Patient Care. Journal of Public Health. April, 1962.

Shaffer, Helen B. Outdoor Recreation. Editorial Research Reports. May 9, 1962.

Wiener, Phyllis R. Doorbell-Ringing for a State Education Measure. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

Military Affairs and National Security

Avins, Alfred. "Important Service" in Military Law. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1962.

Clayton, James L. Defense Spending: Key to California's Growth. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1962.

Disarmament and Coexistence. [Symposium.] Current History. May, 1962.

Dupré, J. Stefan, and W. Eric Gustafson. Contracting for Defense: Private Firms and the Public Interest. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Levine, Robert A. Breaking the Arms Stalemate. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. June, 1962.

McAuliffe, A. C. The Role of Local Government in Civil Defense. County Officer. April, 1962.

Newton, Isham G. The Negro and the National Guard. Phylon. Spring, 1962.

Sutton, John L. The German General Staff in U. S. Defense Policy. Military Affairs. Winter, 1961-62.

Warren, Earl. The Bill of Rights and the Military. New York University Law Review. April, 1962.

Wildavsky, Aaron B. Nuclear Clubs or Nuclear Wars. Yale Review. Spring, 1962.

Winston, Frank D. Criminal Responsibility and Mental Capacity under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Santa Clara Lawyer. Winter, 1962.

Zawodny, J. K., ed. Unconventional Warfare. [Symposium.] The Annals. May, 1962.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. To Amend the Smith-Lever Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Adult Basic Education. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1551. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Amendments to Davis-Bacon Act, and a Bill to Establish a Work-Hours Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1554. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Equal Pay for Equal Work. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1714. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Federal Grants to States for Elementary and Secondary Schools. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. The Improvement of Educational Quality Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1752. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Integration in Public Education Programs. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Radiation Workers Compensation Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Special Education and Rehabilitation, 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Government Operations. The Administration of Grants by the National Institutes of Health. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Civil Defense—1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Evaluation of the Donable Surplus Property Program. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Illegal Actions in the Construction of the Airfield at Fort Lee, Va. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Investigation and Study of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1962 (Office of Science and Technology—National Science Foundation). Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on House Administration. Federal Elections Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. National Cemetery Policy. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. All Channel Television Receivers and Deintermixture. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Child Health Institute. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Clear Channel Broadcast Stations. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Daytime Broadcast Stations. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st and 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Intensive Immunization Program. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Water Carrier Bulk Commodity Exemption; To Repeal Inland Waterways Corporation Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Abolition of Poll Tax in Federal Elections. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Improvement of Storm Forecasting Procedures. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Higher Level Compensation for Postal Employees. Hearing. Also House Report No. 1722. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Improving Federal Transportation Statistics. House Report No. 1700. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Manpower Utilization in the Federal Government. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Public Works. Federal Highway Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Right-of-Way Acquisition Practices in Massachusetts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Standby Improvement Act of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Science and Astronautics. Patent Policies Relating to Aeronautical and Space Research. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Guide to Subversive Organizations and Publications. House Doc. No. 398. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Direct Housing Loans. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Judicial Review of Veterans' Claims. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Legislative Objectives of Veterans' Organizations. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Veterans' Administration Medical Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Temporary Increase in Debt Ceiling. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Trade Expansion Act of 1962. Hearings. Also House Report No. 1818. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Development, Growth, and State of the Atomic Energy Industry. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Review of AEC and Army Food Irradiation Programs. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

Senate. Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. Communications Satellite Legislation. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Military Cold War Education and Speech Review Policies. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Urban Mass Transportation—1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Commerce. All-Channel Television Receivers. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1526. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Communications Satellite Legislation. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Study of the Domestic Textile Industry. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1314. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Finance. Advance Refunding and Debt Management. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Public Assistance Act of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Revenue Act of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Create a Commission on Science and Technology. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Functions of the General Accounting Office. Senate Doc. No. 96. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Pyramiding of Profits and Costs in the Missile Procurement Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Outdoor Recreation Act of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Antitrust Problems of the Space Satellite Communications System. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Appointment of Representatives. Senate Report No. 1449. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Constitutional Amendments. Senate Report No. 1305. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Constitutional Rights. Senate Report No. 1455. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Literacy Tests and Voter Requirements in Federal and State Elections. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Study of the Federal Judiciary System. Senate Report No. 1479. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Improvement of Educational Quality Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Work Hours Standards Act. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Public Works. Public Works Acceleration. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1358. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Rules and Administration. Depository Libraries. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Election Law Guidebook 1962: Summary of Federal and State Laws Regulating the Nomination and Election of United States Senators. Senate Doc. No. 86. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

Other Federal

Department of Agriculture. Farm Economics Division. Economic Research Service. Farmers and Urban Expansion: A Study of a Michigan Township. By Charles Press and Clarence J. Hein. 1962.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. State Sources of Data on Local Government Finances. 1962.

———. Governments Division. Compendium of State Government Finances in 1961. 1962.

———. Finances of Employee-Retirement Systems of State and Local Governments in 1961. 1962.

———. State Distribution of Public Employment in 1961. 1962.

———. Summary of State Government Finances in 1961. 1962.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Public Health Service. Office of the Surgeon General. PHS Public Advisory Groups: Authority, Structure, Functions. 1962.

President's Commission on Campaign Costs. Financing Presidential Campaigns. Report. 1962.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan. By ROBERT A. SCALAPINO AND JUNNOSUKE MASUMI. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1962. Pp. ix, 190. Price $3.75.)

Within the compass of a seemingly modest little book, the authors succeed in presenting an outstanding interpretation of the nature of party politics in contemporary Japan. The number of questions raised, the complexity of the factors analyzed, the wealth of evidence adduced, and the astuteness of the hypotheses advanced—all without clutter, confusion, or overcrowding—are remarkable for a work of this size.

The mass demonstrations of May-June 1960 serve both as the point of departure and as the concluding test case for this concise but wide-ranging study. Far from being Communist-inspired, anti-American, student riots, these demonstrations are shown to have been the greatest mass movement in Japan's political history, stemming from underlying domestic issues that pertain to the whole nature of Japanese politics. Thus the demonstrations "threw a strong spotlight on the changing character of Japanese politics and the continuing weaknesses of Japanese democracy."

The authors elaborate by examining the historical background, the general trends in postwar Japanese politics, the internal composition of Japanese parties, and the Japanese political process. In accordance with its announced design, the entire book manifests a strong historical sense which points up the cultural background, the element of timing in Japan's modernization, and the concept of Japanese politics as a developmental process. Also the work goes beyond mere analysis to project meaningful hypotheses about the Japanese political process. Finally the concluding chapter constitutes a case study against which these hypotheses are tested.

In a work so rich and variegated, readers will probably differ as to what aspects are the most significant. At the risk of distortion through oversimplification, it might be ventured that the main theme is the problem of reconciling borrowed political institutions with native social conditions. This dichotomy, however, is not simple. The borrowed political institutions are in effect being modified by the penetration of indigenous procedures, while the native social institutions are undergoing constant "Westernization," or, more accurately, modernization. At any time there is the necessity of finding some arrangement to bridge the differences between the two as they constantly shift in their relationship to each other.

Historically it has generally been the borrowed political institutions that had to be drastically modified to adjust them to the continuing "feudalistic" aspects of Japanese society. The political parties in particular thus took shape as closed groups operating in a closed society. Recently, however, accelerating socio-economic changes are so transforming Japanese society that it is now the political institutions that are lagging behind. While some contrary aspects persist, Japan has now become essentially an open mass society in which the established political components paradoxically continue to remain exclusive closed groups. Until this anomaly is corrected, Japan will suffer from dangerous tensions.

The characteristics of the closed party system are examined in considerable detail, supported by 24 pages of statistical data. The new open nature of Japanese society does not receive comparable attention. The preponderantly big business orientation of the conservative Liberal-Democratic party, and the almost exclusive identification of the Socialist party with one section of organized labor, are seen as conducive to class warfare. At the same time both parties are disclosed as being loose coalitions of tight little leader-follower groups more loyal to their respective factional interests than to their party, thus adding the instability of intra-party fragmentation to the tension of inter-party polarization. The so-called one-and-a-half party system—in which the conservatives, appealing almost as much to little business and agriculture as to big business, can always outvote the narrowly labor-class socialists—tempts the conservatives to arrogant abuse of parliamentary power and the socialists to forlorn resort to extra-parliamentary obstructionism, resulting in threats to democracy from both directions.

Meanwhile the recent socio-economic changes have created a large mass of intellectuals, technicians, white collar workers, people in the service trades, unorganized labor, and others who fail to find adequate representation in the existing closed party structure, who see no satisfying alternative as between the two major parties, and who are consequently alienated from the established political system. Whenever these politically unorganized but increasingly politically expectant classes are catalyzed by a special set of circumstances into united action, there is likely to be an explosive crisis. Some hope is seen in the emergence of multiple-interest, mass-based groups which will affiliate with political parties and so change the nature of the parties as to correct the imbalance between politics and society.

Stated thus baldly, these may not be especially startling ideas, but they are expounded with the cogency and insight one has come to expect of Professor Scalapino from his earlier masterly study of the prewar Japanese parties. This time the collaboration of a capable Japanese colleague lends added verisimilitude to the work.—KAZUO KAWAI, The Ohio State University.

The Japanese People and Foreign Policy: A Study of Public Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan. By DOUGLAS H. MENDEL, JR. With a foreword by Edwin O. Reischauer. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1961. Pp. xv, 269. $6.50.)

Professor Mendel describes the foreign policy issues faced by Japan, Japanese public opinion concerning these issues, and the implications of popular attitudes for policy makers. In 1953 and 1957, Dr. Mendel hired and supervised teams of university students who personally interviewed samples of 500 voters for about one hour each. To discover rural-urban differences, his surveys were conducted both in a typical farming community (Izumo) and a metropolis (Osaka). Dietmen, prefectural governors, mayors, and municipal assemblymen were also interviewed. The polls of other investigators, notably of Lloyd Free and the Asahi Shimbun, are frequently cited, and they tend to confirm Mendel's own data. Popular attitudes remained fairly stable during the period covered. The Japanese public appears to be more divided over basic foreign policy issues than are Americans.

Dr. Mendel omitted nonvoters from his tables "because they tend to be inactive politically, disinterested in foreign affairs and usually made no response to questions." Since the normally apathetic may sometimes be mobilized for political purposes and may often be counted upon to support the decisions of others, it would seem that the attitudes of these "semisovereign people" might bear some study. "Politically inactive" people sometimes hold the political balance of power with surprising results for pollsters. The author frequently uses the plurality index, which shows the percentage spread between yes and no answers rather than indicating the percentages of yeses and noes. This somewhat confusing device has the advantage of simplifying many of the charts, but unfortunately fails to indicate the percentage of "don't know" answers.

Some of the data yielded by the surveys may come as a surprise even to fairly well informed observers of Japanese politics, but there seems little ground to dispute the accuracy of the statistical data. Much more work remains to be done, as Dr. Mendel suggests, in the scientific analysis of why people answered the pollsters as they did. It is, of course, difficult to measure the intensity of views or the propensity to action by means of questionnaires alone. Here Dr. Mendel has not come up with much quantified data, but does provide the reader with educated guesses.

Considerations of space apparently prevent the author from analyzing in depth the role of public opinion in the political decision-making process in Japan. The strikes and demonstrations against the U. S.-Japan Security Pact in 1960 made it clear that the foreign policies of the Government ran counter to the views of a substantial number of people. One is today tempted to view with some reservations Professor (now Ambassador) Reischauer's assertion in his foreword that on the whole the domestic and foreign policies of the Japanese government appear to reflect "quite accurately" the general attitudes of the Japanese people. Partly because of the failure of the government in 1960 to appreciate what popular attitudes were, President Eisenhower's visit to Japan had to be cancelled and Premier Kishi had to resign. It appears that the Japanese government may occasionally disregard popular attitudes and adopt important foreign policies which have little or no support in public opinion. The government may assume such an autocratic posture because, in Diet elections, personal and domestic issues are often of greater importance than foreign policy issues.

The scope of Dr. Mendel's study is very broad, and he has apparently left no aspect of public opinion on foreign policy untouched. The richness of his data permits him to discover subtle nuances in attitudes and to relate these attitudes to specific age, educational, sex, and socioeconomic groups.

He finds, for example, that women are vastly more pacifist and neutralist in their views on rearmament and alliance than are men. Younger, better educated, and urban groups are much less favorably disposed to the American alliance than the older, less educated, and rural groups. It would appear that as this neutralist youth matures and the country becomes better educated and more urbanized, Japan may become less oriented towards America. The United States appears to be the favorite foreign country and the Soviet Union the most disliked of the respondents. There is widespread criticism in Japan of specific American policies, such as the maintenance of United States air bases in Japan, nuclear tests, and the occupation of Okinawa, but the principal complaint of the Japanese is the "selfish superiority" of the Americans. While Liberal-Democratic leaders are prone to support the revision of the disarmament clause of the Constitution, almost half of the Liberal-Democratic voters oppose the proposed revision. Public opinion on constitutional amendment, of course, is decisive, because proposed amendments must be submitted to popular referendum.

The book contains maps illustrating Japan's territorial disputes with South Korea (the Rhee Line and Takeshima), the Soviet Union (the Kurile, Shikotan, and Habomai Islands), and the United States (Okinawa and the Bonins). The data which Professor Mendel has painstakingly assembled is effectively presented and constitutes an important contribution to our understanding of Japanese political behavior and foreign policy. —THEODORE McNELLY, University of Maryland.

The Chinese Anarchist Movement. BY ROBERT A. SCALAPINO AND GEORGE T. YU. (Berkeley. Center for Chinese Studies, University of California, 1961. pp. v+81. Paper.)

A good deal of work has recently been done in the United States on the intellectual history of modern China and the University of California has been specially active in this. Though the Chinese anarchist movement died out in the 1920's it was an influence in the general ferment of ideas in the first quarter of this century when active discussion among all sorts of revolutionary groups influenced the thinking of the generation which still rules China.

As the authors point out, "It is most significant that the Chinese intellectuals had so short a time to adjust to the political currents of the modern world." While "The Japanese intellectual had had some four decades of Mill, Locke, Burke and Rousseau before he got the Fabians, Kropotkin, or Marx," only a few Chinese intellectuals had much contact with the West before the beginning of this century and not many until after the 1911 revolution. "Then in less than a decade—and a decade filled with extraordinary political chaos—they were forced to cope with an unending variety of new, often conflicting ideas."

At the beginning of this century Anarcho-Syndicalism was a powerful force in the revolutionary movement in Western Europe and it is not surprising that the main inspiration of the Chinese anarchist movement came from France. In 1902 over twenty students travelled to France with a new Chinese Minister and two of these, from upper class Chinese families, became converts to anarchism. They were deeply influenced by Darwinism and the general prestige of science and attracted by the ideas of Kropotkin and Reclus. Anarchism seemed for them to be the "wave of the future," and their convictions became a strongly felt faith. The members of the Chinese anarchist movement adopted a code of personal austerity and devoted their efforts and resources to the cause, these efforts including the publication of a periodical and schemes to bring Chinese students to France.

The other inspiration of Chinese anarchism came from the anarchist movement in Japan. The movement was, therefore, largely a movement of Chinese students overseas reacting violently against the Chinese tradition and seeking the newest fashion in Western ideas as a new basis but also, in many cases, deeply influenced by the Chinese tradition in which they had been educated and trying to find some basis for their new ideas in the Chinese classical tradition.

After the 1911 revolution many of these students returned to China and formed the "Society to Advance Morality" with various grades of membership of which the higher ones were pledged not to take any part in government. The authors suggest that this had some adverse effect on the early republic by leading some of the few men available with competence and high standards of morality to refuse official responsibilities.

The high point of anarchism in China came in the years from 1916 to 1920. Thereafter it lost out in competition with Leninist Communism, both in China and among the Chinese students in Europe. Leninism offered a more effective programme of action and was more willing to appeal to nationalism.

The authors give a fairly long account of a controversy between Ch'en Tu-hsiu, the first leader of the Chinese Communist Party, and an anarchist spokesman, Ou Sheng-pai. To meet the anarchist case, Ch'en had to make explicit the authoritarian aspects of the Leninist position—the masses, backward and emotionally unstable, could only be saved through "strict interference" by an "enlightened despotism." One can see echoes of the classical Chinese dispute between the Confucian view that man was by nature good and the Legalist view, here represented by Ch'en that man was by nature evil and could only be reformed by strict government. As in the China of two thousand years ago, the despotic Legalist system has been victorious, but the authors end by suggesting that anarchism represented the goal of "complete freedom for self realization within the limits of social justice" which has also been part of the Chinese tradition.—MICHAEL LINDSAY, American University.

Central Authority and Regional Autonomy in Indonesia: A Study in Local Administration, 1950-1960. By J. D. LEGGE. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1961. Pp. xiii, 291. $5.00.)

One of the most difficult problems confronting Indonesia since independence has been the development of a satisfactory and effective relationship between the centre and the constituent parts of the archipelago. In this carefully documented book, one in the series published under the auspices of the Modern Indonesia Project at Cornell, Professor J. D. Legge of Monash University in Victoria, Australia, has sought to deal with the emergence of the system of local administration in Indonesia during the crucial years of 1950-1960.

In a nation of 90,000,000 people, 55,000,000 of them on the island of Java and the rest widely scattered about the islands, the problem of the administrative relationship between the central authority and local units would be certain to be a challenge. Mix this with the fact that Indonesia has a host of diverse ethnic groups and many different languages. Set it against a background of traditional autonomy for many of the local areas. Do this and the motto of the Republic, "Unity in Diversity," becomes more meaningful. It also helps to explain why local administration in Indonesia has had such an uncertain development thus far.

When the Dutch and Indonesians finally agreed to Indonesian independence in 1949, it was as a federal republic, The United States of Indonesia, that Indonesia was born into the family of nations. From the very beginning, the Indonesians professed distaste for this federal arrangement. This reviewer, who was in Indonesia at the time, can attest to the fervor with which the Djakarta government attacked the federal system; perhaps only the Irian issue has drawn such concentrated central government fire. In less than a year, the federal form had been abolished and a unitary form of government established.

Professor Legge, who made four visits to Indonesia between 1956 and 1960, painstakingly reviews the efforts of the Indonesian government to do two things: one to grant local areas as much autonomy as possible, and the second to enforce the authority of the central government in all areas. That these two goals have often proven difficult to reconcile in practice is shown through the experience with various legislative acts and presidential edicts.

RI Law 22 of 1948 of the original Republic of Indonesia, NIT Law 44 of 1950 for the State of East Indonesia, and Law 1 of 1957 were the main enactments dealing with local administration: the law of 1957 was the "high-water mark" in legislation for local areas. The provisions of these laws are analyzed in considerable detail by the author. Extracts from them are also reproduced in the Appendix to the book. A very useful "Glossary of Indonesian Terms" is also appended.

After tracing the modern origins of Indonesian local government, Legge devotes separate chapters to the areas and units involved, the role of the regional head or kepala daerah, the development of local councils, and the powers of both regional heads and councils. He also treats the problem of the development of the civil service at local levels, the matter of financing local administration, and the factor of regional feeling. His discussion of the role of the pamong praja (territorial administrative service of the central government) is especially acute.

In Law 1 of 1957, it was stated that "The regional government is composed of the regional representative council and the regional executive council." Much of the story of local government in Indonesia since independence can be told through the analysis of what this statement came to mean in practice. The Dewan Perwakilan Rakyat Daerah (DPRD) or Regional Representative Council and the Dewan Pemerintah Daerah (DPD) or Regional Executive Council were both intended to bring about greater local participation in government and for some months there were signs of progress in this regard.

But along with the formal steps towards greater local participation, there were also other developments which did not bode well for the cause of local government. Various Army colonels in Sumatra and Sulawesi assumed the leadership in 1956 and 1957 of dissident movements directed against the central government. In February 1958 the so-called "Revolutionary Government of the Republic of Indonesia" was proclaimed in Padang. The author feels that while a desire for greater local autonomy was involved in many of these struggles, other factors were also responsible.

Whatever the exact motivation for these uprisings may have been, the response of the central government in Djakarta was significant for local government. Under his concept of "guided democracy," President Sukarno announced that Indonesia was returning to the Constitution of 1945. Parliament was suspended and the role of political parties curtailed. In September 1959, a Presidential Edict No. 6, announced important modifications of the basic law 1/57 for local government. The controls of the central government over local units were drastically tightened. The move towards greater local autonomy was definitely halted.

Legge's book provides a valuable insight into the efforts of one new Asian state to develop satisfactory institutions of local government. It is a book primarily for the specialist; it should also be of use to Indonesian authorities involved in local government affairs. The book emphasizes the study of forms to a great degree, as the author himself points out. Later study may permit greater attention to the actual workings of Indonesian local government, but this is a first rate study of a complex and important subject.—EDWARD W. MILL, Occidental College.

Venezuela. By EDWIN LIEUWEN. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. x, 193. $4.00.)

Area specialists, students, and those simply curious about the prospects of the Alliance for Progress can all be grateful for this most recent addition to the series of introductory Latin American country studies sponsored by the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Consistent with the format established in earlier volumes, the author deals briefly but perceptively with the geographic and social setting, history, economy, political dynamics and international relations of Venezuela, a country important at present not so much for the strategic significance of its enormous petroleum and iron ore wealth as for its crucial relation to that very vital question: Can fundamental social and economic reform be achieved in Latin America within the context of democratic procedures and institutions? In a very real sense, the contest between democratic and totalitarian techniques of development and reform, more familiar to most of us in the competition between India and Communist China, is being fought as strenuously, although on a smaller scale, between the Venezuela of Rómulo Betancourt and the Cuba of Fidel Castro. The still heterogeneous forces of reform in the remainder of Latin America will not be indifferent to the outcome. The radical nature of the experiment is indicated by the author's contention that "the key to understanding contemporary Venezuela is to appreciate the inexorable, but for the most part non-violent, social revolution that has been sweeping that nation since the end of the Second World War. In this process, the class structure is being altered; wealth and property are being redistributed; the economy is being transformed; institutions are undergoing drastic changes, and political processes have come under the control, for the first time, of genuine reform elements." Given the country's history of militarist tyranny and the persistence of powerful opposition from both the traditional political right—certain segments of the military, the landowning aristocracy and the conservative faction of the Church—and the radical left, it is unhappily only too clear that the efforts of President Betancourt and the Acción Democrática party enjoy no guarantee of success. Nevertheless, Professor Lieuwen's treatment affords evidence which justifies a guarded optimism.

In view of the brevity required in a handbook of this sort, it is inevitable that some of the author's judgments will seem to the specialist insufficiently established or qualified. The course of events resulting in the revolution of 1945, and the actual extent of Acción Democrática's social, economic and political achievement from 1945 until its overthrow in 1948, for example, are subject to somewhat more controversy than the casual reader would gather from this account. Particularly with respect to the latter, a less exclusive reliance on Betancourt's own massive apologia, Venezuela: Política y petróleo, would have been advisable. To refer to a very minor point, this reviewer would also like to suggest that not even the notoriously unreliable character of Latin American statistics can justify including the village of Lagunillas in the list of principal Venezuela cities with an alleged population of 200,000. Something on the order of 5,000 would be considerably more probable. Such criticisms—perhaps quibbles would be a better term—can detract little, however, from Professor Lieuwen's excellent and skillful summary of a situation so complex and a range of materials so varied. He is to be congratulated on a job very well done.—RICHARD D. BAKER, University of Oklahoma.

Government and Politics of Uruguay. By PHILIP B. TAYLOR, JR. (New Orleans: Tulane University, Department of Political Science, 1960. Pp. 285. $3.00.)

Professor Taylor has provided us with a carefully written report on key aspects of government and politics in a small, relatively advanced republic of Latin America. There is much emphasis on description of institutions and evaluation of policy as well as a wealth of data useful to those interested in development of analytical schemes for cross-cultural examination of political phenomena.

The report is essentially pessimistic in contrast with some earlier studies. The author is telling us that failure to make painful adjustments can only lead to intensification of growing currents of violence with consequent hazards for political stability and moderate government.

Most strategic aspects of Uruguayan political groups and governmental institutions in the 1960's clearly bear the mark of the gifted statesman, José Batlle y Ordoñez, who dominated the country's politics for the greater part of the first half of our century. Since Batlle's death in 1929, the complexity of the system has increased to the point that its operation mystifies most Uruguayans outside those making a career of politics. The result has been a widespread sense of futility in the face of clearly felt need for change.

Too much effort has been directed toward establishment of machinery for temporary accommodation of group interests and too little attention has been given the need for decision-making capability with regard to basic reforms. The "pact of the parties" has never produced power distribution arrangements supported by permanent consensus and has remained a stopgap device for dividing governmental spoils and control. Proportional representation has not helped to mobilize popular support behind the coherent, enduring majorities so necessary for solving basic problems. Under PR it is not uncommon to have a national party, a national party fraction or sub-party and territorial subparties all proposing lists of candidates. Aside from the small, disciplined "ideological parties"—the Communists, the Socialists and the Catholics—the pattern of fluidity in formation and dissolution of coalitions is the keynote of politics.

Hundreds of organized special interests have thrived on this fragmented party situation and parties and subparties have come to depend upon financial and voting support of the special groups. The plural executive for which Uruguay has received such notoriety among students of government has not had a mitigating effect upon the general picture of fragmented power since the majority group of the so-called National Council of Government generally is divided on major policy questions and is unable to provide the necessary leadership for legislative action.

Inflation, poverty and the threat of revolution, Castro style or Fascist style, have increased significantly during the past five years; but it is difficult to change. Interests have been built upon poor administration of government services and enterprises and upon inadequate budgeting and accounting arrangements. Improvements in these areas might help; so would some concern for austerity, e.g., cutbacks in government services, surplus personnel and subsidies. The crux of the matter has been, and continues to be, the incapacity to make decisions that hurt the powerful interests, i.e., the incapacity of government to mobilize the power necessary to promote a more effectively functioning society.

—L. VINCENT PADGETT, San Diego State College

Politics in Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara. By HERBERT J. SPIRO. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc. Pp. vi, 185. $1.95.)

The pace of development of the political process in tropical Africa is proving a sharp challenge to practitioners of the techniques of comparative government. Herbert J. Spiro accepts the practicality of imposing a formal schemata for the interpretation of the turbulent events of the past decade. "To identify the most persistent political patterns in the new states and the independence movements that brought about their establishment I have used the method worked out in my Government by Constitution: The Political Systems of Democracy. . . . Before examining the degree of success achieved along methodological lines, the value of the book as a lively account of the impressions gained by an exceptionally well equipped scholar from a year's experience in sub-Saharan Africa in 1959-60 should be stressed. Shrewd judgments and imaginative flair combined with meticulous preparation have produced some notable observations on current African politics. However, the author is entitled to an evaluation based on his objective, which was to provide a new perspective for understanding the African political scene in relation to the rest of the world.

In Government by Constitution, Spiro stresses the importance of prevailing values. "Prevailing values—the goals in pursuit of which people act in politics—affect the functions of seemingly similar institutions. More than that, dominant values shape the very raw material of politics: the problems that the political system is facing." This viewpoint leads to the conclusion that "completely novel types of political association may be coming to life in Africa." Judgment of the African political process in terms of Western constitutionalism is considered inadequate. This provides a healthy and exciting start to a fresh appraisal of African governmental processes. Presumably the next step would be to outline the nature and specific character of both "prevailing" and "dominant" values in current African society. It is on this point that the author's method as applied to the African situation must come under question. What are the opportunities for a Western scholar from a background of university life in the United States to assess dominant values of a culture as ill documented as that of tropical Africa? Spiro gives somewhat cavalier treatment to the contributions from the period of colonial administration on the grounds that "they concentrated on the apparently static aspects of 'native' society, which could be manipulated in the interest of the European administration." Possibly true, but what are the alternatives to the experience of decades in the field, accepting responsibility for the solution of day to day problems?

De Tocqueville comes immediately to mind, and we could wish for the appearance of a modern counterpart on the African scene. Even a cursory reading of the French scholar impresses one with the degree of his reliance on the statistics and the governmental documentation of the times. Is there anything approaching a sufficiency of basic materials for a scholarly appraisal of the true objectives of African society at the present time? A glance at the selected bibliography at the end of the book is not reassuring, particularly in light of the omission, perhaps deliberate, of the classic East Africa Royal Commission (1953-1955) Report. To determine the true social values of an organized political group it seems essential to probe beneath rhetorical pretensions and discover how the group is prepared to allocate public funds. For example, one would hesitate to describe Britain as a social welfare state without reliance on budget figures open to analysis by competent experts. The budgets of independent African states do not as yet appear available in the open market place of scholarship. Though the author may not be blamed for failure to employ unobtainable information, the right to generalize in the absence of basic material is open to question. Descriptive material tracing institutional evolution from colonial bases still requires collection and arrangement, though it may appear a pedestrian approach. But in the main part of his work Spiro carries out this type of analysis in a penetrating manner. The methodology may fail to fulfil its promises in light of the lack of a sufficiency of the raw material of scholarship, but the capacity of the author to make valuable comments on the African scene is well sustained. THOMAS R. ADAM, New York University.

Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt 1804-1952. By NADAV SAFRAN. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961. Pp. 298. $6.75.)

Nadav Safran, in this interpretative study of the political evolution of modern Egypt, has added a fifth book to the recent, yet already widely esteemed, collection of Harvard Middle Eastern Studies. He attempts here to analyze the basic cause of Egypt's instability which, as he correctly points out, lies in the conflict between traditional ideology and modern reality. He focuses attention on the evolution of ideas in Egypt from 1804 to 1952 using as the analytical structure of his work three historical-sociological propositions. The first is that "a political community cannot be viable and stable unless it is founded upon a more or less generally shared set of ideas, modes of thinking, norms and values"; the second is that "there is an intimate connection between material realities and modes of thought, ideas, norms and values"; the third suggests that there is "one experience which most, if not all, societies must undergo, and which nearly always exerts such pressure on the existing belief-system as to disrupt it and lead to the breakdown of the political community." This reviewer finds these propositions both relevant and applicable.

This objective and sympathetic study does not intend to measure results, but rather attempts to dissect the nature of the conflict and expose the efforts of modern Egyptian intellectual and political leaders to evolve an ideology adapted to modern realities in lieu of the "obsolescent traditional belief-system of Islam"; to elicit the difficulties they encountered, and the reaction which their artificial achievements provoked.

The book is divided into five parts. In Part I, "Modern Historical Evolution Versus Traditional Belief," the author analyzes the outstanding factors of the Islamic ideology which, up to the rise of Muhāmmad 'Ali, had controlled tightly the Egyptian political community, discovering that there existed certain possibilities for initiative in introducing new subjective norms. Then he reviews briefly the main economic, social and political transformations that took place there up to 1882, illustrating the challenge they constituted on the traditional Islamic ideological system. This challenge, one of the basic factors of the 'Urabi revolution, "consisted of a contradiction between the Islamic world view and the world view implicit in the new condition of life."

Part II is an excellent and thorough analysis of the "Main Trends of Ideological Evolution." Here, the author gives a just evaluation of the impact of the West on Egyptian intellectual and political leaders since 1882, and describes the hasty and timid progress of Egyptian political thought by commenting on the works of outstanding Egyptian Islamic reformists and liberal nationalists. His explanation of the reasons for the failure of the liberal-Islamic program is thought-provoking.

Part III describes the "Triumph of the Liberal Nationalist Movement"; this victory is accurately attributed to a handful of Western-educated and Western-oriented leaders who managed to use advantageously the two elemental forces which moved the Egyptian masses, namely, xenophobia and privation. Safran rightly refuses to see in this triumph any expression of a popular consensus.

Moving on to more practical ground, he examines some of the government's actions which had a direct bearing on the relations between the modern state and traditional Islam in the period between 1919 and 1952.

Part IV focuses attention of the "Progress and Decline of Liberal Nationalism." It contains a chapter devoted to brief biographical sketches of important intellectual leaders. Safran then examines their work ably, showing how the progressive phase, Western in origins and orientation, motivated by a vigorous rationalist spirit and aided by propitious historical conditions, propelled the evolution of Egyptian political thought on a boldly liberal nationalist path. It could not sustain, however, an ominous head-on collision with the Muslim traditionalist forces because of the superficiality of its appeal and the artificiality of its foundations, and because it had become exceedingly vulnerable as a result of the ever-deteriorating historical conditions.

Part V, "The Threat of Traditional Reaction," elucidates certain aspects of the Moslem Brotherhood's program and ideology. Safran finds that because of the Liberal Nationalist's failure to develop a generally accepted ideology, explaining and justifying the existing order of things, a dangerous vacuum developed which the Brotherhood sought to fill with "faith." The final chapter contains some very relevant requisites for an eventual solution of Egypt's search for political community. It remains to be seen if the new regime of President Nasir is taking them into consideration; an answer to this question may be found in P. J. Vatikiotis, The Army and Politics in the United Arab Republic (1961).

The conclusion of Safran is unequivocal: "The leaders [have] failed to work out any such viable ideology." Safran, however, attempts to de-emphasize this conclusion by invoking several major extenuating circumstances: (1) Egypt "had to undergo change at a more accelerated rate than the Christian West." (2) The forces of change were of foreign origin at a time when Egypt was under the sway of foreign imperialism. (3) Islam from the outset had been far more involved in "the politico-social order" than Christianity. These extenuating circumstances are the more convincing because throughout his study Safran compares Egypt to the Christian West in its earlier attempt to respond to the challenge of modernism.

Mr. Safran's ideas on the Islamic views of history have much in common with those of Gustav von Grunebaum, although the approach Safran adopted in his study is indeed original; for he does not, like H. A. R. Gibb, in Modern Trends in Islam, D. Lerner, in The Passing of Traditional Society, and W. C. Smith, in Islam in Modern History, approach his subject solely as an Islamist or a social scientist, but rather, in synthesizing all their views, he analyzes a particular Islamic society from both points of view. All in all, this book is a welcome and scholarly contribution that will be of interest to the Islamist, the political philosopher, and the social scientist and the historian as well as the student of comparative government. Safran's selection of primary sources is, indeed, impressive. This reviewer, however, cannot concur as to the sincerity of Victorian England's declaration of its intention to evacuate Egypt promptly. At any rate, such an argument is both polemic and irrelevant.—ALFRED G. GERTEINY, St. John's University (New York).

Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings. By ROY C. MACRIDIS AND BERNARD E. BROWN. (Homewood: The Dorsey Press, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiii, 577. $5.25, paper.)

This is an unusual volume of readings, unrivalled at present in the field of comparative politics. It is comprehensive in scope and varied in content. It contains traditional and modern readings, and opens its doors generously to the sister disciplines, such as social psychology, and particularly sociology. Perceptive, sophisticated, and well written, though at times over-condensed, introductory notes to the individual chapters weave together often seemingly incongruous material, and give the impression of continuity and coherence to a field of study which is actually in a state of flux.

This wide horizon is manifest also on another level: the various methods of analysis are applied to every kind of contemporary political system. This leads, unfortunately, to certain contradictions which cannot but confuse the beginner. They appear first in the introductory section in which the authors reveal their basic general conception, namely that "a political system is, above all, a mechanism for the making of decisions," the efficiency of which "can be gauged in terms of its ability to make decisions which are widely accepted." This can be tested by looking into the responses governmental decisions will "elicit among the social groups, interest groups, and voluntary associations." So far so good. But how can one really say without misleading the as yet uninitiated reader that "in a totalitarian system the test is ultimately the same?"

This problem of giving democracies and totalitarian systems the same analytical treatment re-occurs from time to time. The authors state, for instance, that the "mass party" characterizes both modern democracies and dictatorships. In Great Britain and in the Soviet Union "the party remains the most important instrument used by social groups in their quest for power." This is, however, rather effectively contradicted later in this very book by Gabriel Almond, when he says that "the structure we call party in the totalitarian system is not a party at all" because it is the manifestation of a totally different political culture.

As one proceeds through this collection, three questions, which have irked the teacher of beginning courses in contemporary politics, constantly come to mind. The answers this volume suggests may be worth further thought. (1) At what point of undergraduate studies should one introduce theory and methods, and on what level of abstraction? If theory and method are necessary to the understanding of case studies, it must be done rather early in the game, no matter how difficult this seems to the student. If, however, theorizing takes place on a highly abstract level and is not followed by application to concrete instances, it may become a pedagogical dud. Pioneering moves in theory should be inspiring to the enterprising and—one hopes—knowledgeable graduate student, but could hopelessly confuse the beginner. (2) Should a highly comparative discussion precede or follow a country-by-country presentation? Here the reply seems clear: the more sophisticated and suggestive the comparative approach, the more it requires from the reader a general idea of the Gestalt of at least certain governments, which are representatives of the archetypes compared. (3) Finally, can democracies and totalitarian governments be compared within the same discussion? Clearly, the answer here is negative. While the present volume sheds light on some of the most intricate problems of democracies, totalitarian government seems to appear, on the whole, as a kind of foil. Nowhere can one find a really penetrating discussion of communist government in action, nor is there much attention paid to fascism. The more the authors try to bring totalitarianism within the ken of their so highly comparative approach, the more it seems to elude them.

Clearly, however, for students who have already been exposed to a country-by-country study, this collection offers more stimulating, important and varied comparative analyses than have ever before been assembled in one volume.—GEORGE A. LANYI, Oberlin College.

The Art of the Possible: Government and Foreign Policy in Canada. BY JAMES EAYRS. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 232. $6.95.)

Professor Eayrs prepared this study of historical developments and contemporary practices in the conduct of Canadian external affairs in conjunction with his participation in the program financed by the Rockefeller Foundation and sponsored by the School of International Service of the American University to investigate the making of foreign policy in various countries. Beginning with a discussion of the role played by the political executive, the author proceeds to examine various agencies concerned with foreign policy including the bureaucracy, Parliament, and the military. Concluding chapters deal with functions of a foreign service: intelligence, planning, negotiation, and propaganda. In these chapters there are some particularly acute comments on the Canadian experience in the modern world, where the diplomat must perform negotiating functions as in the past while also fulfilling the propaganda function in an age when technology has made it first possible and then necessary to address and persuade mass publics at home and abroad.

The development of the Department of External Affairs is expertly traced from its humble origins in a small office (above an Ottawa barber shop) staffed by a Deputy Minister, two clerks, and a secretary to the present large and efficient organization. Personalities of major political figures were an important factor in this development, as might be expected in a country where the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs was held by the Prime Minister until 1946. Consequently, the Prime Ministers adapted the Department of External Affairs to their own goals and operational methods. A considerable knowledge of Canadian politicians and domestic politics enables the author to analyze the making of foreign policy in the context of Canadian government. As W. L. Mackenzie King was Prime Minister longer than any one else, he left his own unique stamp upon the conduct of foreign policy. The picture which emerges is that for much of the twentieth century external affairs have been conducted by a remarkably able bureaucracy under the suspicious eye of a Prime Minister guided by intuition and domestic political problems while occasionally referring to a Parliament largely indifferent and uninformed in the area of foreign affairs. No less than in other areas, King succeeded in attracting to external affairs a bureaucratic elite largely recruited from "promising young university graduates." Emphasis has been placed on the generalist rather than the specialist in the Department of External Affairs. Not only are members of this elite rotated among the major positions in the Department of External Affairs, but there is also considerable posting of key civil servants from one department to another for the filling of top administrative positions. Formal devices for achieving interdepartmental liaison are reinforced by the intimate and friendly relations among the senior bureaucrats and with many political leaders in the relatively small circle of the elite in Ottawa.

The scholarship represented by this volume is formidable, but presented in a most congenial format. It is apparent that the author is thoroughly familiar not only with Canadian sources but also with the broad spectrum of literature bearing upon his topic, so that he has examined the Canadian experience in the vista of the larger world and has reached conclusions valid to the analysis of other departments concerned with external affairs whether they be the State Department, the Foreign Office, or the recently created ministry of a newly established nation. Particularly in the areas of intelligence and planning the evaluations of the Canadian experience should be useful for anyone searching for general principles of foreign policy and its administration as well as for the specialist in Canadian affairs. There are, for example, cogent comments upon the assumptions with which planning is justified and upon reasons for planning in the liberal democracies.

Professor Eayrs has not hesitated to generalize about national characteristics in the formation of foreign policy so that there are some challenging insights such as in explaining that Canadian policy makers have described their endeavors as "cautious, patient, compromising, flexible" in accord with an ethic based on a non-revolutionary tradition different from that in the United States where "From the American revolutionary tradition derives that characteristically American belief that some swift and spectacular stroke may permanently solve problems which in their nature admit only of amelioration." This difference, the author believes, is part of the reason why Canada has not advocated the "crash program" and enunciated "doctrines" so popular south of the border. Through a pragmatic process of trial and error, the Canadian government, fully aware of the role and limitations of a small power, has developed an effective technique for responding to particular external factors and situations and has made a virtue of the "art of the possible."—JOHN R. WILLIAMS, West Virginia University.

Green Belts and Urban Growth: English Town and Country Planning in Action. By DANIEL R. MANDELKER. (Madison: The University of Wisconsin Press, 1962. Pp. 172. $5.00.)

Contrary to the implication of the title, this study is not an examination of Green Belts as such, but an account of the way planning is administered in England. Green Belts are used as the focus, and applications to develop land are traced from their initial submission to the local planning committee through an appeal to the Ministry of Housing and Local Government. Green Belts are rings, sometimes several miles deep, around large cities which are kept free of urban development. English practice is contrasted with contemporary planning in the United States. The value of this approach is that it goes below the more frequently publicized policy aims of British planning and investigates the way the system actually works.

As in the United States planning decisions are largely decentralized to the local level. Here some of the similarity ends. The English development plan (a sort of combined zoning ordinance, subdivision ordinance, general land use plan, urban renewal program, and official street map) is wider in scope than a zoning ordinance, but less detailed and not legally binding. It is applied in a general manner by local planning committees and its application is subjected to internal review by the Ministry. External review by the courts, as is the American practice, is virtually non-existent. Professor Mandelker feels that internal administrative checks on local planning action compare favorably with external judicial review. At the same time he documents a need for improved procedures.

English development policy is most restrictive in the Green Belt areas. Even here, however, it is sometimes fuzzy and vague, leaving a great deal to administrative or local discretion. As a consequence there are radical variations in the way it is applied from place to place. Ministerial review of plans and appeals for development is ad hoc and has not served to clarify policy or establish precedent on which future action can be based. Further, ministerial directives have not served as a mechanism for clarifying policy. However, the keynote of British planning administration is flexibility. This is an advantage if not carried to its ultimate extreme of haphazard administration. There are in fact many inconsistencies in administration and the workload is staggering.

Administrative delay is common—almost standard operating procedure.

American planners overplan while their English counterparts underplan. Policies restricting development in the Green Belts around large metropolitan areas when combined with an otherwise flexible system of land control have accomplished much. These devices have prevented uneconomic exploitation of land on the periphery, compelled developers to use vacant lots where services are available, and limited sporadic and ribbon development. On the other hand, underplanning in concert with restrictive Green Belt policies have led to a number of serious problems. Existing towns and cities have filled up very rapidly causing an inflated demand for vacant land. Land prices have skyrocketed. Population growth has continued, outstripping the forecasts, and as a result redevelopment is lagging and housing shortages are mounting pressures for change.

This review of British experience is particularly timely for several reasons. First, there are some indications that American planning is moving toward a more flexible system of land control. Therefore it should be of considerable interest to persons considering this course of action. It goes beyond objectives and considers the practical aspects of a flexible system. The use of Green Belts as a focal point is also of current interest as a result of proposals for a federal aid program to preserve open space in our large metropolitan areas. It illustrates the impact of such a policy and documents its side-effects in a nation where open space is a much more critical commodity.

This is a short, well organized treatment of English planning presenting a relatively new approach to the subject, at least insofar as American readers are concerned. Nonetheless this is not a book that can be easily consumed at one sitting. The author successfully bridges the "terminology-gap" by presenting a concise glossary of terms.—G. ROSS STEPHENS, University of Connecticut.

Parliament and Public Ownership. By A. H. HANSON. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. 248. Price $4.80.)

In the United Kingdom, as Lowell long ago said, it is the cabinet that legislates, with the advice and consent of parliament. At the same time, no one questions the right of members of the legislature to investigate the activities of ministers in the government. As Lowell also noted, the cabinet administers subject to the constant supervision and criticism of the House of Commons. To what extent this principle affects the administration of publicly-owned industries is the subject of Mr. Hanson's book, published for the Hansard Society. Mr. Hanson recognizes that it may be natural to progress from democracy to socialism to what constitutes a quasi-independent bureaucracy in fact. The thinking of the Labour Party braintrusts such as R. H. Tawney, G. D. H. Cole, and Lord Morrison progressed similarly from belief in politically controlled and/or worker-controlled socialized industries (public corporations were earlier termed examples of "capitalist nationalization") to a position very similar to that of the Conservative Party with regard to the B.B.C. and the L.P.T.B.

Mr. Hanson deals with the public corporation's development in idea and fact. At the end of the second world war there were two major factors of influence: the acceptance of the idea of planning and the election for the first time of a Labour Government with an absolute majority. But the T.U.C., largely ignoring past experience with the public corporation, definitely insisted on ministerial responsibility for the conduct of policy-making. The Coal Industry Nationalization Act of 1946 was drafted with this principle in mind, and was the subject of criticism by the Conservative Opposition. Labour's reply was that parliamentary control would diminish the need for statutory control. Discussion of nationalization bills themselves were more fruitful than subsequent debate on nationalized industries, although annual submission of the report and accounts on each industry provided regular opportunity for such debate. Question Time provides a further (and perhaps better) opportunity, and the author discusses this. Few questions have produced impressive information, although the matter of retention of miners' cottages by former miners no longer employed touched a "controversial issue." The doctrine that the minister might in many cases provide information while disclaiming responsibility received varying applications from Messrs. Shinwell and Gaitskell, and was interpreted by the Conservatives when they took office in 1951 differently from the way in which they had interpreted the doctrine when they were in opposition. The prospect held out when nationalized industries were new that "clearly defined conventions would gradually establish themselves has not materialized." Select Committees have been limited in the scope of their subject matter by the necessity of avoiding majority and minority reports if their authority is not to be jeopardized. The difference in Anglo-Saxon parliamentary tradition from that of continental Europe minimizes the value of taking foreign experience as a guide.

To one observer it seems odd that there is so little suggestion of the establishment in the United Kingdom of a parliamentary equivalent of the congressional investigating committee, to which directors of public corporations could be summoned. In the United Kingdom there would be no question of executive privilege. But in the absence of such an inconvenience, the tradition that only members of parliament may be questioned by parliament provides, perhaps, an equally insurmountable obstacle, and Select Committees will continue to make "non-controversial" reports.—ARTHUR BUTLER DUGAN, The University of the South.

Questions in Parliament. By D. N. CHESTER AND NONA BOWRING. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962. Pp. vi, 335. $5.60.)

Question time is as British as fish and chips and Hyde Park, and its quaintness and ritual have long attracted the American. Now we have a compendium of information about its development and use, particularly in the latter part of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Warden Chester of Nuffield College and his research assistant, Mrs. Bowring, have explored fully the history of the constitutional rules, precedents and usages surrounding this unique institution. They pay particular attention to the developments of the first decade of this century when the present rules achieved something of their form and structure. They then explore its uses from both the Members' and the Ministers' roles.

Their most interesting finding is that in spite of an enormous growth of governmental activities and a much lessened role for the back bench, this form of back bench activity has not greatly increased in use since the days of the Liberal Governments of Campbell-Bannerman and Asquith. They explain this, in part, by noting the greatly increased use of private correspondence between Members of Parliament and Ministers, and discuss the value of this form of seeking information and redress as opposed to putting an oral Question in the House. It is clear from their findings that today's M.P. is acquiring errand boy duties for his constituency analogous to those of his American counterpart. That these have not spilled over into a greater number of Questions and demands for an extended Question time surprises the authors and the reader.

The study takes up problems of the degree to which the Question Hour is an influential access for back bench interests and suggests some tentative answers to these questions. But the authors are very reluctant to utilize systematic and statistical techniques to order their mass of detail. They state their belief that each Question put to a Minister is unique, and each Ministerial reply and the set of following supplementary Questions and answers is a particular situation, making statistical analysis difficult if not misleading.

This reviewer, for one, wishes they had been more venturesome in this regard.

The study further suggests to me, without stating or developing the concept, that Parliamentary activity is often the outward sign of hidden activity. The authors do not consider the degree to which Questions are supplied by organized interests, or reflective of such, though they do go into the evidence that some are parts of party campaigns. There are numerous unconscious suggestions of that enormous part of the British political glacier below the ceremonial waters, but these are rarely followed through. The authors do reject the idea that Question Hour is an adequate reflection of the real concerns of back benchers at any one time, and for good reason. But to an American, the problem of reconciliation of particular with broader generalized interests which the British so take for granted is still open for investigation.

This work will probably remain for some time the best study of Questions in Parliament. It is so full of detail that those attempting to construct the shape of the British structure of interests and power may have to do some ferreting to find just what he desires. But the basic material and evidence are there, and we can thank Warden Chester for his long standing interest in this aspect of British politics.—JOHN H. MILLETT, University of Wichita.

Party Politics (Volume III): The Stuff of Politics. By SIR IVOR JENNINGS. (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1962. Pp. x, 493. $8.50.)

Efforts to synthesize knowledge from the diverse fields of history, philosophy and political science should almost always be applauded. The Stuff of Politics gives grounds for the qualification. Sir Ivor wisely notes in his introduction that this book could not have been written unless "the conventional boundaries of academic learning were ignored." Unfortunately, he has also ignored the substantive contributions which these disciplines could make to his attempt to grapple with the chief ideas of party politics in England since the Reformation.

Historians may be put off by the introduction, and underscore the author's admission that "little attention has been paid to primary sources." There is no sense of historical evolution, or even of chronology. The English Civil War, which provides a crucial test for his thesis, is nowhere treated entire. Only by ignoring events since 1918 has the author remained true to the English school of 'modern' history.

Philosophers will not regard this book as a study in philosophy, for Jennings claims he is dealing with politicians, who by definition have no ideas. Hobbes is mentioned only in passing, and Harrington and T. H. Green are omitted. Joseph Chamberlain bulks far larger than the Utilitarians. Edmund Spenser merits a reference, but not Herbert Spencer. The author's dislike of defining concepts shows he has no time to waste on the linguistic philosophers.

Political scientists will recognize that Jennings is, if only in intention, a political behaviorist. Psychological explanations abound. Political ideas, we are repeatedly told, spring from emotion and inspire emotion; they have no rational basis. They are affectual instruments used by politicians in their perpetual struggle for power. Ideas are useful insofar as they produce favorable responses from voters. They change slowly through time, as new generations come forward. The ordinary person is slow to adapt his ways of thinking, and apathetic towards politics.

Buried within mountains of obiter dicta and quotes from pre-1939 secondary sources are sufficient ideas to sustain a reasonable essay on the persistence through the centuries of a common political culture in England. But in this sort of exercise almost everything depends upon how the points are made. (Cf. Professor Oakeshott's Political Education.) Jennings' style combines many different faults. First, there is the suggestive epigram which is left unexplored: "There is no Liberal who is not a little conservative, and no Conservative who is not a little liberal." Then there is the platitude: "Changes in the physical environment produce changes in social conventions; and conventions change even when there are no very evident changes in the physical environment." Frequently one finds statements which are accurate only if words are stretched beyond their breaking point: "Newspapers, magazines, books and broadcasts publish much the same ideas." Then there is the inaccurate statement: "One third of the electorate is over 48, one third under 38, and one third between 38 and 48." Legalistic interpretations abound: "The primary purpose of a fiscal law is to raise money for the Crown." Finally, and incessantly, the grating, patronizing chattiness: "The American colonies were juvenile delinquents who needed a good spanking."

The amount of space given to different issues and men is somewhat idiosyncratic. Ten pages are devoted to Ireland before 1690, and hardly two pages to the Commonwealth and Empire since 1918. Foreign policy in this century seems to be of no importance. Eden, rightly, is ignored, but so are Sir Eyre Crowe, Norman Angell, Lord Robert Cecil and the pacifists. Nothing much appears to have happened to the welfare state since the Education Act of 1902; the landmark Act of 1944 is ignored. Professor J. R. Seeley receives full attention as an historian and political figure; Professor R. H. Tawney is ignored. But then, he is in good company in this. Phillip Snowden appears as an important figure in economics, and the ideas and influence of a mere bursar of Kings, J. M. Keynes, are passed over completely.

Anyone interested in an introduction to the subject which Jennings purports to treat would do far better to read the volumes on the English political tradition edited by Alan Bullock and F. W. D. Deakin or Dicey's Lectures on the Relation Between Law and Public Opinion in England During the Nineteenth Century.—RICHARD ROSE, University of Manchester.

The Administration of British Foreign Relations.

By DONALD G. BISHOP. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1961. Pp. 410. $7.00.)

Professor Bishop has given us a most interesting and informative book which deals with the governmental structure and operations by which British foreign policy is formulated and administered.

In the opening chapter the nature of the general executive control of foreign relations is explored and detailed consideration is given to the constitutional powers over certain basic foreign affairs—the declaration of war, the making of treaties, and the recognition of new governments. Subsequent chapters are concerned with the role of the Monarch and how the King influences the control of foreign relations, the relations between the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, the Cabinet and its influence upon foreign relations, Parliament and its efforts to control foreign affairs, the problem of maintaining continuity in foreign policy, and the role of public opinion and the press in policy determination. Key chapters deal with the organizational aspects and with administrative procedures and problems. Attention is devoted to the historical development of the Foreign Service during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and the significant 1943 reforms are closely analyzed. Major personnel problems facing the Foreign Service are examined—recruitment, including efforts made to broaden the educational and social basis of selection, examination techniques, promotional criteria, and remuneration. The present administrative organization of the Foreign Office is described, emphasis being given to the geographical area, the functional subject, and administrative departments.

The analysis of how the Foreign Service actually operates is most informative. The author drawing upon historical materials gives the reader thumb nail sketches of a number of "typical" Foreign Secretaries, analyzes their duties, and charts the major responsibilities of their principal administrative aids—The Permanent Under-Secretary of State, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, and Minister of State. In the overseas sphere, the work of the embassies is dealt with, particularly the issuance and carrying out of diplomatic instructions, the principal duties of diplomats, and the work of the Consular Service. The Foreign Office possesses no monopoly of control over "foreign affairs." Actually, the entire gamut of governmental affairs is involved, particularly the work of the Treasury, the Defense Departments, Board of Trade, and the Home Office.

Professor Bishop concludes that in the future four major problems confront the British government in the conduct and administration of foreign affairs. And, interestingly enough, these are the same problems which continually concern our own leaders and those of other major democratic nations. The first of these is a pressing need to secure the continuous co-ordination of the policies of the various ministries and departments, as they relate to foreign affairs, with the work of the Foreign Office. Today there is a high degree of intermingling of "foreign" and "domestic" problems. Few governmental activities can be exclusively classified as purely "domestic." Another important problem involves the recent democratization of the control of foreign affairs. Since the decline of the Monarch's power, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have been responsible for the conduct of foreign affairs. The Cabinet, as a whole, has less real control over foreign affairs than the theory of parliamentary government indicates, and individual members, although they may be well informed of developments, are often unable to influence the making of decisions and must rely primarily upon the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary. "Parliament has developed a new and considerable interest in foreign relations," Dr. Bishop observes, "though it has not yet found any effective way to control them." The achievement of continuity in foreign policy has been made possible by the development of a high degree of party responsibility, so that except in isolated instances government proposals are almost certain of approval by the House of Commons. In the modern day issues of foreign policy are openly debated in the Parliament, in the press and in a variety of forums throughout the country. Public opinion affects the making of foreign policy more than in earlier periods, and the Foreign Office of necessity must devote more attention to shaping and cultivating public attitudes. The desire of the press to publish as much news as possible and the necessity of the government to conduct its relations with foreign nations in secrecy still constitute an unsettled dilemma.

The third problem, that of devising the most effective form of organization for the conduct of foreign relations, is one concerning which most progress has been made. The reorganizations which took place after the end of World War II have done much to raise the administrative efficiency of the Foreign Service to new high levels. The fourth and final problem is the development of a staff broad-visioned enough to deal with the increased scope of foreign affairs in the contemporary world.—JOHN S. HARRIS, University of Massachusetts.

British Broadcasting in Transition. By BURTON PAULU. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1961, Pp. viii, 250, $5.00.)

This tightly-organized general survey will interest not only students of public opinion and British politics, but also any concerned with framing new policies for American broadcasting. The author, Director of the Department of Radio and Television Broadcasting at Minnesota, based his work on a mixture of observation, interviewing, and printed materials (including reports of scientifically-minded audience researchers). While no interview schedules are found, a listing of respondents suggests a broad coverage of participants and informed observers. Largely a description of the history, policies, programs, and audiences of the competing government and commercial television systems, the study contains separate chapters on programs of "News and Opinion" and "Political Broadcasting." Description is blended with skilled analyses of the effects of the systems upon each other, and of the relationships between outside action and the systems' behavior. Some existing commentary on British political coverage will need revision due to the combined effects of competition in broadcasting and the abolition of the fourteen-day rule. Those desiring fuller background to recent developments in radio should consult Paulu's British Broadcasting (1956). Since decision-makers are unlikely to consider seriously a government operated network, those seeking experience relevant to U. S. policy-making will probably find the form of commercial television of primary interest. The Independent Television Authority, a government-established group, establishes and operates transmitters and has broad supervisory powers over the programs which are produced by private corporations. Advertisers have no connection with any program. Without detracting from the present study, it would seem highly desirable that a more systematic analysis of the precise relationship between the Authority and the program companies be performed. Those impressed with the institutions of British commercial television should remember that both regulator and regulated know their status is subject to official review (ITA's license expires in 1964, as does that of the BBC) and that politically-articulate publics are watching. Review is not likely to end either system, but it may determine standards of regulation and performance for a long period.

Paulu's final chapter contains a summary and evaluation of both networks' past performance as well as detailed suggestions for future policy. Competition has improved British television service, giving viewers a second choice and causing improved performance by the BBC. Although applauding commercial TV for the most part, Paulu opposes proposals for commercial radio. He observes the difficulty already encountered by the BBC in an already-complex frequency jungle, but his main argument is in terms of the wide choice already available to the radio audience. The three BBC programs do not have a monopoly on the radio audience since English-language, commercialized Radio Luxembourg has long attracted a wide following.

Among the most fascinating sections was that discussing how commercial TV came into being. Many Conservative M.P.'s, the Labour Party, and most educators, churchmen, and newspapers formed the opposition. Many were opposed out of fear that standards would be lowered—the specter of U. S. TV haunted them. The BBC license and monopoly would have been renewed by the last Labour government if it had made a decision. The case illustrates an interest (BBC) not having a champion in the decision-making group (Labour cabinet) so that decisions affecting it were delayed through lack of attention. At the end the parties both took stands contrary to the polled opinion of most of their supporters. And the Greek tragedy element was present too—Labour insures the adoption of the policy it dislikes (commercial television) by causing a party issue defeat of what apparently could have been a free vote and victory.—R. J. ALPERIN, University of Maryland.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

HIRAM M. STOUT

The George Washington University

General

Apter, D. E. Some Reflections on the Role of a Political Opposition in New Nations. Comparative Studies in Society and History. January, 1962.

Economic Development and Planning in Asia and the Far East. Economic Bulletin for Asia and the Far East. (UN) v. 12, December, 1961.

Perham, Margery F. The Colonial Reckoning. London, Collins, 1961. (The Reith Lectures, 1961).

Von der Mehden, Fred R., and Anderson, Charles W. Political Action by the Military in the Developing Areas. Social Research. Winter, 1961.

United Kingdom and Commonwealth

British Government Information Services. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (R. 5256).

Christoph, James B. Capital Punishment and British Party Responsibility. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1962.

Glickman, Harvey. The Toryness of English Conservatism. The Journal of British Studies. November, 1961.

Health Services in Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1962. (RF. P. 5154).

How Many Orpingtons? The Economist. March 24, 1962.

Keith-Lucas, Bryan. The Government and the Greater London Plan. Contemporary Review. February, 1962.

Marquand, David. Has "Lib-Lab" a Future? Encounter. April, 1962.

Martin, Christopher. Telling our Left from our Right. Listener. April 5, 1962.

Martin, Kingsley. Strange Interlude: Edward VIII's Brief Reign. Atlantic, May, 1962.

Martin, Kingsley. The Cost of the Crown. Atlantic. June, 1962.

Migration in the Commonwealth: the United Kingdom Bill. Round Table. March, 1962.

Social Services in Britain. British Information Services. Reference Division. New York, 1961. (I.D. 780).

Technical Co-operation; a Progress Report by the New Department. London, H.M.S.O., 1962. (Cmd. 1698).

Younger, Kenneth. Reflections on Africa and the Commonwealth. World Today. March, 1962.

Western Europe

Anghelatos, A. G. New-found Political Stability in Greece. World Today. March, 1962.

Ashcroft, Edward. How de Gaulle Makes Decisions. New York Times Magazine. March 18, 1962.

Blood, Sir Hilary. What Prospect for Malta Now? New Commonwealth. April, 1962.

Bone, Robert C. The Dynamics of Dutch Politics. Journal of Politics. February, 1962.

Chilcote, Ronald H. Opposition to Portugal's Dictatorship. Contemporary Review. April, 1962.

Coddington, George A. Jr. The New Swiss Military Capability. Foreign Affairs. April, 1962.

Documents on Germany, 1944-1961. U. S. Congress. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. (87th Cong., 1st sess.). Washington, G.P.O., 1961.

Europe's Other Island; a Survey. The Economist. March 17, 1962.

Europe's Political Future. The Times (air edition). March 26-29, 1962.

Heckscher, Gunnar. The Swedish Constitution—1809-1959. Stockholm, Swedish Institute, 1961.

Hodgson, John H. Postwar Finnish Foreign Policy: Institutions and Personalities. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Jakobson, Max. Finland's Foreign Policy. International Affairs (London). April, 1962.

Jallut, Maurice. Propositions pour un Nouveau Régime: Essai sur la Constitution Naturelle de la France. L'Ordre Français. February, 1962.

Krippendorff, Ekkehart. Das Ende des Parteienstaates? Monat. January, 1962.

Leibholz, Gerhard. Die Stellung des Bundesverfassungsgerichts im Rahmen des Bonner Grundgesetzes. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. March, 1962.

Organisation et Aménagement de la Région de Paris; Documents. Paris, Documentation française, 1962. (Precueils et monographies, no. 39).

Philip, André. The Structure of Socialist Parties. Dissent. Winter, 1962.

Roditi, Edouard. The Homing Pigeons of Algiers. Dissent. Spring, 1962.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Anthem, Thomas. Whither Albania? Contemporary Review. April, 1962.

Bird, Christopher. Scholarship and Propaganda. Problems of Communism. March-April, 1962.

Crankshaw, Edward. Dissension Inside the Kremlin. Atlantic. June, 1962.

Dallin, Alexander. Long Divisions and Fine Fractions. Problems of Communism. March-April, 1962.

Dallin, Alexander. The Soviet View of the United Nations. International Organization. Winter, 1962.

Degras, Jane. Moscow in Ferment. Problems of Communism. March-April, 1962.

Election Results; Membership of the Supreme Soviet. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. April 11, 1962.

Griffith, William E. Myth and Reality in Czechoslovak History. East Europe. March, 1962.

Le Gouvernement, l'Administration et la Justice de la "République Démocratique Allemande." Paris, Documentation française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, no. 2876).

Pistrak, Lazar. Soviet Views on Africa. Problems of Communism. March-April, 1962.

Schultz, Lothar. Die neue Verfassung der Tschechoslowakischen Sozialistischen Republik. Europa Archiv. January 25, 1962.

Skendi, Stavro. Albania and the Sino-Soviet Conflict. Foreign Affairs. April, 1962.

The Soviet Electoral System, by A. Gorshenev and I. Chelyapov. Washington, Joint Publications Research Service, 1962. (JPRS: 12931).

Ulysses, pseud. The International Aims and Policies of the Soviet Union: the New Concepts and Strategy of Khrushchev. Review of Politics. April, 1962.

Middle East and Arab North Africa

Capil, M. Middle East 1961—a Political Review. Middle Eastern Affairs. February, 1962.

Colombe, Marcel. Où va l'Égypte? Orient. 4e trimestre, 1961.

Decentralization in the Sudan. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. April, 1962.

Democratic Party of Kurdistan (Iraq). Program and Administrative Regulations of the Democratic Party of Kurdistan (1960). Translated by Harold W. Glidden. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1961.

Ellis, Ellen D. Post-Revolutionary Politics in Turkey. Current History. April, 1962.

Haim, Sylvia G. Arab nationalism; an anthology. Selected and edited, with an introduction by Sylvia G. Haim. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1962.

Hottinger, Arnold. The Political Struggle in Iran. Middle East Forum. March, 1962.

Huebbenet, Georg von. Persien nimmt Pakistan zum Vorbild. Aussenpolitik. February, 1962.

Jargy, Simon. La Syrie d'hier et d'aujourd'hui. Orient. 4e trimestre, 1961.

Johnston, Scott D. Party Politics and Coalition Cabinets in the Knesset of Israel. Middle Eastern Affairs. May, 1962.

Kerr, Malcolm. The un-Egyptian Activities Committee. SAIS Review. Spring, 1962.

Lenczowski, George. Syria: a Crisis in Arab Unity. Current History. April, 1962.

Lewis, Geoffrey. Turkey: the Thorny Road to Democracy. World Today. May, 1962.

Longrigg, Stephen Hemsley. Iraq under Kassim. Current History. April, 1962.

Loya, A. Radio Propaganda of the United Arab Republic—an Analysis. Middle Eastern Affairs. April, 1962.

Priestly, Vito. The Political Situation in Iraq. Middle Eastern Affairs. May, 1962.

Sharabi, H. B. The Egyptian Revolution. Current History. April, 1962.

Simpson, Dwight J. Israel: the Continuing Struggle. Current History. April, 1962.

Tesdell, Loren. Planning for Technical Assistance: Iraq and Jordan. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1961.

Tusan, Jean. L'Union Nationale de la République Arabe Unie. Orient. 4e trimestre, 1961.

Vatikiotis, P. J. Nasser's Second Revolution. SAIS Review. Spring, 1962.

Westwood, Andrew F. Reform Government in Iran. Current History. April, 1962.

Young, Richard. The State of Syria: Old or New? American Journal of International Law. April, 1962.

Africa

Adam, Thomas R. Area and Environment in African Political Processes. American Behavioral Scientist. April, 1962.

Baring, Arnulf and Bazin, Henri. Nkrumah and Ghanas Afrikanischer Sozialismus. Aussenpolitik. February, 1962.

Berg, Elliot J. France's Legacy in Tropical Africa. Challenge. March, 1962.

Campbell, Jane. Multiracialism and Politics in Zanzibar. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1962.

Decraene, Philippe. La Guinée seule avec elle-meme. Preuves. March, 1962.

Franck, Thomas M. Some Thoughts on Legal Studies in Africa. American Behavioral Scientist. April, 1962.

Gonidec, P. F. Les Institutions Politiques de la République Fédérale du Cameroun. Civilisations. No. 4, 1961.

Greenwood, A. F. Ten Years Local Government in Ghana. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. January, 1962.

Land, Harry. Sierra Leone Needs the Middle Road. New Commonwealth. March, 1962.

Lewis, Paul. Nigeria Shows the Federal Way. New Commonwealth. April, 1962.

Lye, K. L. Tanganyika since Independence. British Survey. Main series, No. 155. February, 1962.

MacColl, René. Gambia: the Colony Nobody Knows. Atlantic. May, 1962.

MacLure, Millar, and Anglin, Douglas, eds. Africa: The Political Pattern by Jaja Wachuku et al. Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1961.

Milverton, Lord. Africa Still Needs a Middle Road Policy. Optima. March, 1962.

Percival, J. E. Federal Cameroon Republic. West African Review. April, 1962.

Reynier, Anthony S. Tanganyika: Africa's Newest Country. World Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Roberts, Esther. New Hope for South Africa. Contemporary Review. April, 1962.

Senghor, Léopold. Some Thoughts on Africa: a Continent in Development. International Affairs. April, 1962.

The Atlantic report on Angola. Atlantic. March, 1962.

The Atlantic Report on East Africa. Atlantic. May, 1962.

The Evolution of Madagascar since Independence. Asian Review. January, 1962.

Uganda. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1962 (R. 5316).

Uganda: Report of a Commission of Privy Counsellors on a Dispute between Uganda and Bunyoro. London, H.M.S.O., 1962. Cmd. 1717.

United Nations Source Materials for the Study of Africa: a Selected Bibliography. American Behavioral Scientist. April, 1962.

Young, Roland. Political Research in the New African Nations. American Behavioral Scientist. April, 1962.

Zolberg, Aristide R. One-Party Systems and Government for the People. Africa Today. May, 1962.

South and Southeast Asia

Anstey, Vera. Land Reform in India. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. April, 1962.

Batwell, Richard. The Four Failures of U Nu's Second Premiership. Asian Survey. March, 1962.

Darling, Frank C. Modern Politics in Thailand. Review of Politics. April, 1962.

Eberhard, Wolfram. Afghanistan's Young Elite. Asian Survey. February, 1962.

Galanter, Marc. Equality and "Protective Discrimination" in India. Rutgers Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Grimes, Paul. India: 15 Years of Freedom. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1962. (Headline series, No. 152.)

Kanesalingam, V. Problems of Financial Administration in a New State—with Particular Reference to Ceylon. Public Finance. No. 1, 1962.

Khan, Hafeez-ur-Rahman. Pakistan's Relations with the Commonwealth: Political and Strategic Aspects. Pakistan Horizon. Second Quarter, 1962.

Maddox, William P. Singapore: Problem Child. Foreign Affairs. April, 1962.

Newman, K. J. Basic Democracy as an Experiment. Political Studies. February, 1962.

North Vietnam; a Special Survey. China Quarterly. January-March, 1962.

Rondot, Pierre. Aperçu de Quelques Problèmes du Pakistan. Orient. 4e trimestre, 1961.

Sarker, S. C. The General Election in India. World Today. May, 1962.

Smith, T. E. Proposals for Malaysia. World Today. May, 1962.

Welty, Paul S. Viet-Nam Today. World Affairs. Spring, 1962.

The Atlantic Report on Laos. Atlantic. May, 1956.

Zinkin, Taya. Caste Today. London, Oxford University Press, 1962.

Far East

Barnett, A. Doak. Communist China; Continuing Revolution. New York, Foreign Policy Association, 1962. (Headline series, No. 153, May-June, 1962.)

Choh-ming Li. Statistics and Planning at the Hsien Level in Communist China. China Quarterly. January-March, 1962.

Communist China: Ruthless Enemy or Paper Tiger? A Bibliographic Survey. Washington, Department of the Army, 1962. (Pam. 20-61.)

Guelzo, Carl M. Korea: the Divided Peace. Yale Review. Spring, 1962.

Kim, C. I. Eugene. Japanese Rule in Korea (1905-1910): A Case Study. Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society. February, 1962.

La politique étrangère de la République populaire de Chine en 1961. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. January, 1961.

Lee, Luke T. Chinese Communist Law: Its Background and Development. Michigan Law Review. February, 1962.

Olson, Lawrence. A Note on Japan. American Universities Field Staff Reports Service, East Asia series, v. 10, No. 2 (Japan). April, 1962.

Pavlov, K. Communist China: a Reluctant Dragon. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. March and April, 1962.

Ravenholt, Albert. A Note on the Philippines. American Universities Field Staff Reports Service, Southeast Asia series, v. 10, No. 8 (Philippines). March, 1962.

Ravenholt, Albert. Tony Diaz Runs for Congress. American Universities Field Staff Reports Service, Southeast Asia series, v. 9, No. 5 (Philippines). November, 1961.

The Atlantic Report on Japan. Atlantic. March, 1962.

Australia and New Zealand

Sawyer, Geoffrey. Australian Government Today. Paperback ed., rev. and enl. Victoria, Melbourne University Press, 1961.

Tweedie, Alan D. Australia Emergent: the Post-war Pattern. Colorado Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Latin America and West Indies

Anderson, Charles W. Central American Political Parties: a Functional Approach. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Brazil and United States Policies. Report of Senator Mike Mansfield to the Foreign Relations Committee, U. S. Senate. (87th Cong., 2d sess.) Washington, G.P.O., 1962.

Caldera, Rafael. The Christian Democrat Idea. America. April 7, 1962.

Crockett, Joseph P. Tax Pattern in Latin America. National Tax Journal. March, 1962.

Freyre, Gilberto. Misconceptions of Brazil. Foreign Affairs. April, 1962.

Huelin, David. Conflicting Forces in Argentina. World Today. April, 1962.

Le Pérou. Paris, Documentation Française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2,888.)

Linke, Lilo. Ecuador's Politics: President Velasco's Fourth Exit. World Today. February, 1962.

Patch, Richard W. The Pro- and Anti-Castristas in La Paz. American Universities Field Staff reports service, West Coast South America series, v. 9, No. 2 (Bolivia). February, 1962.

Phillips, Fred. The Administrative Problems of an Emergent Federation. Canadian Public Administration. September, 1961.

Report of the Jamaica Independence Conference, 1962, Held in London in February, 1962. London, H.M.S.O., 1962. (Cmd. 1638.)

Rodrigues, M. R. Local Government in Jamaica. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. April, 1962.

Schmitt, Karl M. Communism in Mexico Today. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1962.

Canada

Conant, Melvin. Canada's Role in Western Defense. Foreign Affairs. April, 1962.

Supplement on Canada. The Times (air ed.). February 26, 1962.

Waengler, Ernest. Separatism among the French Canadians. Swiss Review of World Affairs. March, 1962.

INTERNATIONAL LAW, POLITICS, AND ORGANIZATION

The Making of the Good Neighbor Policy. By BRYCE WOOD (New York and London: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. x, 438. $7.50.)

For thirty years now the term "good neighbor" has had wide use in the language of international politics in the Western Hemisphere. Like other commonplaces of this idiom the phrase has served varying purposes in a number of distinct and specialized vocabularies. Statesmen have praised the policy of the Good Neighbor. The policy has helped journalists to fill their columns. Certain entrepreneurs have expressed their doubts about its wisdom. Few of the interested parties, however, have undertaken to examine the policy systematically or to identify its substance. Did the United States government assume the role of the Good Neighbor as a consequence of a searching re-appraisal of interests sometime around 1930? Did policy-makers embark on a program of reform in Latin American relations after an examination of national conscience? Re-appraisal, reform and certain other motivations have been cited as sources of the Good Neighbor Policy without further clarifying of what went into the policy or how it was worked out.

A complete contrast to this general fuzziness is offered in this excellent study by Bryce Wood. The precision and thoroughness of his work give it a two-fold merit which will be immediately obvious to any student of Inter-American affairs. First, Wood succeeds in making a comprehensive identification of the substance and the reality of the Good Neighbor Policy. In the second place, an indirect but not unimportant consequence of his effort is the enrichment of a wide range of scholarship dealing with Latin America and the United States.

In connection with the first, careful research of the whole record between 1926 and 1943 establishes the Good Neighbor Policy in the "patterns of policy actions" that emerged in the period. In the Coolidge administration the possibility of domination of the hemisphere by superior force alone began to lose any attraction it might once have had for United States policy-makers. By Franklin Roosevelt's third term not only the attraction but even the possibility had disappeared. The latter did not vanish because United States interest in Latin America had diminished or because United States involvement in the area had become less intense. It was rather that a new rationale of power and responsibility had emerged from the post-World War I experience of the United States. Wood traces this development chiefly through case studies of Nicaragua, Cuba, Bolivia, Mexico and Venezuela. These cases, along with other materials, supply the means for delineating the policies of non-intervention and non-interference on the part of the United States and the consequences of these policies in what the author calls the "idea of reciprocity." These developments are related in vivid and convincing detail.

It is perhaps inevitable that readers will here and there take issue with the author on the use made of some of the detail. For example, the presentation of certain quotes from United States sources, notably Welles' and Caffrey's despatches from Havana, may on occasion appear needlessly ironic, especially when a similar tone is lacking in the presentation of material from Grau San Martin. The difference in tone invites the suggestion that somehow Grau was a wiser or more responsible statesman than the two Ambassadors, a suggestion to which this reader is not prepared to assent. At the most, however, this represents only minor flaws which do not mar the author's real achievement.

As noted above, the second merit of this book is that it constitutes a significant enrichment of the whole range of scholarship in recent and contemporary Latin American studies. Students of United States policy toward Latin America are in large part familiar with the ground that the study covers. They have not, however, previously been presented with so comprehensive an exploration of the political and diplomatic history of the period. The principal sources on which the work is based are the published and unpublished documents of the Department of State and the documents in the Franklin D. Roosevelt Library. Access to the unpublished documents of the State Department has undoubtedly enhanced the value of the study. As the "Note on Sources" at the end of the book makes clear the conditions attached to the permission to consult unpublished documents in no way restricted the author's freedom of interpretation, although the use of certain quotes and references was limited.

The author's independence of judgment, his meticulous research and presentation have combined to produce a first-rate book which, in all probability, will remain the standard reference on the Good Neighbor Policy for a long time to come.—JOHN J. KENNEDY, University of Virginia.

Pan America in Crisis. BY WILLIAM MANGER. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1961. Pp. vii, 104. Price $3.25.)

Dr. William Manger, the author of this slender but penetrating volume on the inter-American system, is peculiarly well qualified to write on the subject. For more than four decades he was associated with the Pan American Union, the system's secretariat, and for more than a fourth of that time was the Assistant Secretary General of the Organization of American States. Few if any people have had a better opportunity to observe the high-level working of an organization of this sort.

The formalized inter-American system, now operating under the rubric of the Organization of American States, is, unfortunately, relatively little known in the United States even though its headquarters has always been in this country's capital city, almost literally—which was bad for the symbolism of the relationship—under the shadow of the old State Department building. The public often confused, and still does, the OAS with the Pan American Union, its secretariat. Many persons think that all Latin American Countries' ambassadors to the United States are identical with their ambassadors to the OAS.

Dr. Manger dispels these misconceptions. Further, he lays an excellent historical foundation in brief form, in Chapters III and IV for the development of the system through twelve decades from 1826 to 1948. Two other chapters deal with the post-Bogotá (i.e., post-1948) period and the contemporary situation. A final chapter treats of the United States relation to the OAS.

The high point in cooperation and effectiveness, Dr. Manger tells us, was reached in the years from 1945 to 1947. According to the author even at the Bogotá conference in 1948, when the cornerstone of the present structure of the system was laid, the evidences of recession of confidence were beginning to be shown.

In his later chapters Dr. Manger becomes increasingly critical of the operation of the regional organization. A substantial portion of the fault, he maintains, rests with the United States, but Latin American states themselves are by no means free from responsibility as well. One of the current difficult problems which the OAS has not successfully solved, Dr. Manger avers, is that of reconciling the potentially conflicting principles of unilateral nonintervention and collective responsibility for continental peace and security. Relations among the states of the hemisphere have sadly deteriorated in recent years, he says, and the ouster of Cuba from the system, following the ill-fated invasion attempt of April, 1961, and the action involving the Dominican Republic after Trujillo's alleged complicity in the assassination attempt on President Betancourt of Venezuela are but two of the more dramatic evidences of the decline in the effectiveness of the system.

Those officially connected with the inter-American system will doubtless want, and deserve, their day in court to refute some of the accusations made in this volume. Nonetheless, attention must be given to the charges Dr. Manger levies if for no other reason than the soberness and seriousness with which he makes them and the experience from which he writes.

The continuance of a viable inter-American system must necessarily surmount various built-in obstacles, not the least of which is the incongruity of one great power in the hemisphere operating vis-à-vis twenty lesser powers of varying strengths. It is undoubtedly true that abrasive incidents and trends have characterized the operation in recent years. Still, there are solid bases for hoping that the OAS may yet deserve the label of the most effective as well as the oldest regional organization in the world. Let us hope that Dr. Manger may give us a new edition of his stimulating study in a few years from now, and also that the circumstances of that time may inspire less pessimism and fewer reservations than he now feels.—RUSSELL H. FITZGIBBON, University of California, Los Angeles.

Middle Eastern Affairs: Number Two (St. Antony's Papers No. 11). ALBERT HOURANI, editor. (U. S. Publisher, Southern Illinois University Press, Carbondale, Illinois). 167 pages, price: $3.75.

This book consists of five research papers and a "Note," prepared under the auspices of St. Antony's College, Oxford. It is edited by Professor Hourani, a distinguished Oxford scholar on the Middle East. As the papers are written by different scholars on divergent topics, it is best to treat each separately. Elizabeth Monroe of Oxford writes on "Mr. Bevin's 'Arab Policy.'" During his service as Foreign Secretary, Ernest Bevin was "accused" by "all Jews, most Americans and many Englishmen" of pursuing an "Arab policy." Yet the Arabs never thought of him as "their man." Bevin was able to sway King Abdullah and Nuri al-Sa'id to his side, but these two old men were already pro-British. In the rest of the Arab world he had little success. Monroe rightly attributes his "Arab policy" to the Palestine question. His policy was in line with the British defense considerations in the area, and with the treaties he hoped to sign with the Arab states. The Zionist leanings of his party, the pressure of the U. S. at a time when Britain was her economic dependent, the crisis in Germany, the economic difficulties at home, the little help he got from the Arabs, all conspired to defeat his policy in Palestine. In despair he submitted the conflict to the U.N. The author succeeds in putting Bevin's policy in its proper perspective—as a minor item in a crowded world agenda.

"A Decade of Discovery: America in the Middle East, 1947-1958," is contributed by William Polk of Harvard. After alluding to America's missionary and commercial activities in the Middle East Professor Polk examines briefly but lucidly the increasing American involvement in the area after 1947, when its immediate cause was Britain's inability to carry its post-war imperial burdens. In order to defend Greece and Turkey against Communist threat the "Truman Doctrine" was proclaimed. The U. S. has sought stability in the Middle East through economic aid. Economic policy, however, without a propitious political policy remains ineffective. The author discusses the Baghdad Pact, the Eisenhower doctrine, the Suez "war," and correctly examines the American landing in Beirut in the context of the Iraqi coup. However, his figure of 5,000 for the landing force may, in the private opinion of American officials in Beirut, be safely multiplied by two.

"Dragomania: The Dragomans of the British Embassy in Turkey," by Allan Cunningham of the University of London, is an interesting account of the role played by the Dragomans (i.e. interpreters) who worked at the British Embassy in Constantinople during the nineteenth century. They were mostly Levantines-descendants of European families long resident in the East. The Dragomans were not merely interpreters but skilled negotiators who understood the Turkish mind and the labyrinths of the Turkish court. However, they were not always reliable nor liked by the polished ambassador who employed them. They had to do for lack of Turkish-trained Englishmen. In the 1830's there was only "one person in all London teaching Turkish." To tackle the problem a member of the Foreign Office recommended the recruiting of "British subjects upon whom entire trust and reliance may be placed, in lieu of foreigners upon whom no reliance whatever can be placed." In 1877 the Turkish interpreter-ships were made subject to civil service examination. This act meant the end of the Dragoman, but not the end of the "problem of language" in diplomatic intercourse.

"Salisbury and the Tunisian question, 1878-1880," by André Raymond of the University of Bordeaux, is based in part on Raymond's researches at Oxford on British policy toward Tunis, 1830-1881. It provides an enlightening chapter on European diplomacy toward North Africa. Tunis became a pawn of European diplomacy largely through the Bismarckian policy of "compensation," which aimed at solving European difficulties at the expense of Turkey. Bismarck, whose interest was in solidifying Germany's position in Europe, was eager to divert the European powers—namely France and Britain—into African ventures. Salisbury, unlike Palmerston, believed English interests could best be maintained through "territorial re-arrangements" in the Ottoman Empire. Britain's interest in occupying Cyprus pleased Bismarck. "Take Egypt," he added. France, said Bismarck, need not be vexed, she could have Tunis or Syria. "Do what you like in Tunis" was the British advice to the French. Italy's hope of getting British support in annexing Tunis did not materialize. Italy was encouraged to look toward Tripoli. Such was the "international brigandage" of imperial Europe.

The researches of Elie Kedourie of the London School of Economics on Sa'ad Zaghlul, the leader of the Wafd deflates, as all researches tend to do, the myth of a hero. Fortunately, however, his conclusion will never reach the Egyptian masses to whom Sa'ad was a hero, a savior and a national symbol. That he was once moderate, turned an opportunist, and a demagogue, who did not flinch from resorting to religious fanaticism, do not, as the author implies, diminish his qualifications for leadership. Leadership is a relevant concept that accommodates itself to the values of the society in which it operates.—ELIE SALEM, American University of Beirut, Lebanon.

Ambassadors Ordinary and Extraordinary. By E. WILDER SPAULDING. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1961. Pp. 302. $4.50.)

This is an era in which criticisms of the diplomatic techniques of the United States have risen to extraordinary heights. Books attacking the professional training and qualifications of our overseas emissaries have won fame and presumably fortune for their authors. At the same time, because of the modern revolution in communications some political scientists have tended to write off diplomacy below the presidential or cabinet level as no longer significant. Adherents of either position could profitably examine the balanced views of this volume.

Dr. E. Wilder Spaulding, historian and State Department officer, has produced an interesting, well-written, and frequently witty book which summarizes the careers of over sixty American diplomats. For purposes of convenience his subjects are classified into "The Old Masters," newspaper men, scholars, college presidents, women and the professionals. A chapter entitled "Pot-pourri" examines the careers of politicians, millionaires, and merchants. As might be expected, the individuals selected range from the sublime to the ridiculous, from the well-known to the obscure. The evidence presented indicates that although the historical procedures by which American diplomats have been selected produced ambassadors with an amazing breadth of background "successes" and "failures" can be found in any of the author's conceptual categories. Apparently there are no reliable criteria by which predictions can be made as to whether skills acquired in one field will be transferable to diplomacy. Advocates of a completely professional foreign service will gain little comfort from Spaulding's temperate conclusion that while the spoils system may be outrageous, a "generous smattering" of amateur appointees may in fact be desirable.

If the purpose of this book is indeed to illustrate the qualities that "go to make a competent diplomat," it falls short of its objective at a number of points. The only clearcut standard for measuring competence which emerges is enthusiasm on the part of the emissary for the country to which he is assigned. This leads the author to describe Andrew Dickson White as "one of our greatest chiefs of mission . . ." while brushing to one side the fact that during the Spanish American War he permitted the German foreign office to assume that the "United States would not object to a few German naval bases on the former Spanish islands in the Pacific) including the Philippines. . . ." There is never any serious attempt to separate the negotiating efforts of the overseas representatives from those taking place simultaneously in Washington or other capitals, or to consider diplomacy in a power or national interest context. The excellent introductory and concluding chapters are drawn more from the outstanding literature in the field than from the case studies presented in the book. Moreover, analysis in depth is sacrificed for quantity of examples. With only 193 pages devoted to examining the various overseas representatives, the author has allowed himself an average of but slightly over three pages to discuss each of his subjects. This is hardly enough material for the reader to gain any real appreciation of the merits and demerits of the individuals concerned. The result is a series of thumbnail sketches which frequently emphasize the non-diplomatic backgrounds of the subjects more than their competence as negotiators.

Yet, Dr. Spaulding's ability to caricature his subjects with a few well-turned phrases is delightful. Thus: "Joseph Patrick Kennedy . . . was one of the least appropriate appointments that Franklin Roosevelt, famous for his inappropriate appointments, ever conjured up." "Max Gluck had done us no great harm. He had only made his country look ridiculous in the eyes of intelligent foreigners. . . ." "As the man primarily responsible for preventing Napoleon the Little from saving the Confederacy . . . John Bigelow deserves to rank with our greatest. . . ." "As one might expect, Time, Life, and Fortune found more to be enthusiastic about with regard to Mrs. Luce's Italian venture than did the State Department."

Although biographies of ambassadors are not uncommon, there has never been a serious effort by political scientists to analyze diplomacy through a systematic survey of the careers of our foreign emissaries. Perhaps a biographical school of diplomacy is not necessary, but this book is evidence enough that serious studies in depth which relate the personalities and career backgrounds of diplomats to their negotiating tasks might well shed new light on the perplexing problems of diplomacy.—HUBERT S. GIBBS, Boston University.

Perspectives on Peace, 1910–1960. Published under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for In- ternational Peace. FOREWORD BY JOSEPH E. JOHNSON AND BERNARD BUSH. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc.; London: Stevens & Sons, 1960. Pp. viii, 202. $3.00.)

The title of this important collection of essays by world figures does not do it justice. The book does not look backward to 1910, when the Carnegie Endowment was founded. Rather, the authors, distilling a formidable aggregate of experiences, re-assess the past only to draw conclusions for the future. These papers should indeed, as President Johnson says, increase public awareness of the dynamic nature of peace. These men are very much in earnest. Some are deeply worried. Most of them plead for changes and new initiatives they consider imperative to maintain the peace. The book should be pondered, and it should create controversy.

In the first piece, the indefatigable former president of the Endowment, James T. Shotwell, offers wise but not sedate "Reflections on War and Peace," focusing on the background and continued meaning of the Kellogg-Briand Pact. There follow essays by Sir Harold Nicolson (U.K.), Salvador de Madariaga (Spain), Dag Hammarskjöld, Paul-Henri Spaak (Belgium), Jean Monnet (France), Alberto Lleras Camargo (Colombia), Lester B. Pearson (Canada), Ismet İnönü (Turkey), Max Huber (Switzerland), Henri Bonnet (France), and Sir Norman Angell (U.K.) We are told that efforts at wider geographic representation "were unfortunately unsuccessful."

Since most of the pieces are tersely reasoned, and shades of opinion count decisively, no full summary is possible within limited space. But a few characteristics stand out. The author with the longest experience at the U.N.—Mr. Pearson—is the one most satisfied with the U.N. Against the clamor of nationalisms, the most frequent theme is the need for integration. The greatest obstacle to a more harmonious world is mutual fear and suspicion. The principal villain is the clinging to out-dated concepts of sovereignty.

De Madariaga's "Blueprint for a World Commonwealth" goes farthest in this respect. Only self-deception prevents nations from realizing that "their separate destinies have merged" and that they should "surrender their sovereignties to a sovereignty embodying that merged sovereignty." The matter is complicated but also made more urgent by the pluralistic character of the loci of sovereignty: many a small country's sovereignty is fictitious, and even within big ones "some institutions become too strong for the national sovereignty to resist." He mentions the Communist Party in the USSR; the army, often, in France; and sees the USA exercising more "sovereignty" over Guatemala and Panama than over the CIO-AFL or giant corporations at home.

Objectively, "the World Community is already a fact"; hence, it "must be governed, i.e., must become a World Commonwealth." (ital. added) Looking at the East-West conflict, de Madariaga arrives at the same conclusion. He concedes to the USSR two decisive advantages: "it has an aim while the free world has none; and it seeks world unity, which is consonant with the need of our day." (p. 63) The free world must also set its sight at world unity and solidarity. The U.N., "too loosely conceived" and built on the counting of votes, does not fill the bill. He proposes, as basis for discussion, an ultimate "ideal system of federations," consisting of nine large units: the USA; the Commonwealth; Europe up to the Russian frontier (!); the USSR; Yellow Asia; Islam (from Pakistan to Morocco); Africa south of the Sahara; Iberian America. Each unit would be governed by a council and an assembly. A "Council of Nine" would "rule world affairs." A World Court would administer "world law," to be defined by a "World Legislature."

Mr. Pearson emphasizes the link between diplomatic techniques and organizational set-ups. Less critical of open diplomacy than Sir Harold Nicolson, he draws highly significant conclusions from what he calls the guide of unhappy experiences from both secret and public diplomacy. He is not in disfavor of group or bloc diplomacy but credits it with preventing further polarization of the world community. In fact, "the healthier practices of bloc diplomacy may provide the best hope of maintaining orderly diplomatic processes at the U.N. and elsewhere." He is concerned over the lack of progress in such collective diplomacy in NATO, stating that unless a method to take collective political decisions is found, "NATO is not likely to survive." He has much, albeit not un-critical, praise for the U.N. In "these indispensable halls" plans to preserve the peace "are much more likely to emerge . . . than . . . from voyages to Canossa or to Berchtesgaden." He reiterates his well-known view that negotiation is indispensable as the only alternative to nuclear cataclysm. This point is stressed, also, by General İnönü, former president of Turkey: "Mankind must be taught ceaselessly, in every possible way, that at the present stage of civilization, nations are under compulsion to, and should be able to, co-exist peacefully."—JOHN H. E. FRIED, New York University.

Studies in World Public Order. By MYRES S. MCDUGAL AND ASSOCIATES. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1960. Pp. xx, 1058. Price $15.00.)

This volume is a collection of studies and essays previously published in learned journals over the past two decades by Professor McDougal and associates (Harold Lasswell, Asher Lans, Richard Gardner, and others). Integrated by the conceptual framework of the contextual, policy-oriented jurisprudence espoused by Professors McDougal and Lasswell, the studies suggest effective policies for the achievement of a world legal order. The conceptual framework is set forth in two introductory essays, "The Identification and Appraisal of Diverse Systems of Public Order," and "Legal Education and Public Policy: Professional Training in the Public Interest." The latter essay, containing the authors' initial suggestions that legal education must be training for policy-making and that the content of the law depends upon the goals and values to be achieved, is doubtless well known among those interested in legal studies. In the former essay, one of more recent vintage, the authors consider the effective contribution of students of international law to the establishment of a world legal order based on respect for human dignity. In this regard, they challenge legal scholars "... to develop a jurisprudence . . . which will assist the peoples of the world to distinguish public orders based on human dignity and public orders based either on a law which denies human dignity or a denial of law itself for the simple supremacy of naked force, and . . . to invent and recommend the authority structures and functions . . . necessary to a world public order that harmonizes with the growing aspirations of the overwhelming numbers of the peoples of the globe and is in accord with the proclaimed values of human dignity enunciated by the moral leaders of mankind."

For such a policy-oriented inquiry, the traditional concept of international law as a body of conventional and customary legal rules governing the relations of states is insufficient. International law must instead be envisioned "... as a whole process of authoritative decision in the world arena, a process in which authority and control are appropriately conjoined and which includes, along with an inherited body of flexible prescriptions explicitly related to community policies, both a structure of established decision-makers and a whole arsenal of methods and techniques by which policy is projected and implemented."

In the substantive studies (some of which are quite lengthy), the authors test the conceptual framework by applying it to specific contemporary problems related to the development of a world legal order. These problems include such matters as the interchangeability of treaties and congressional-executive agreements, the United Nations Charter and the veto power, the law of the sea, and the law of outer space. Because of limited space (and the fact that these studies have been previously published), it is unnecessary to assay each one. This reviewer particularly appreciated the study entitled "Treaties and Congressional-Executive or Presidential Agreements: Interchangeable Instruments of National Policy." Published in 1945, this study (of interest to students of both international and constitutional law) is a scholarly and persuasive statement of the legal equality of the congressional-executive agreement with the treaty instrument. Moreover, the former instrument, the authors assert, is more in accord with the basic principles of American government and more responsive to the national interest than the treaty instrument. Within this context, a discussion of the Bricker proposal of the last decade would have been quite instructive. It is unfortunate, however, that this study and several of the others were not brought up to date for subsequent publication. Their revision in the light of more recent developments would have enhanced the volume's usefulness.

One study of particular interest is that entitled "The Hydrogen Bomb Tests in Perspective: Lawful Measures for Security." After examining the traditional legal rules subsumed under the rubric of "freedom of the seas," the authors conclude that under contemporary conditions the claim of the United States to conduct hydrogen bomb tests in the Pacific Ocean is a reasonable assertion that contravenes no prescription or policy with respect to the law of the sea.

Although many political scientists and legal scholars may be unsympathetic to Professor McDougal's policy-oriented jurisprudence, none can deny that he exercises a significant impact on legal studies and the study of international law in particular. He is a prolific and persuasive scholar. His deductive analyses of contemporary international legal problems suggest a wealth of further research requirements and possibilities. No student of international law can well ignore his writings. For one interested in a convenient collection of these studies, this volume is a welcome addition to the literature.—DON C. PIPER, Duke University.

World Polity II. A Yearbook of Studies in International Law and Organization.—(Washington, D. C.: The Institute of World Polity, Georgetown University; Utrecht and Antwerp: Spectrum Publishers, 1960. Pp. 414.)

Such questions as what is right and what is wrong, what is legal and what is not, still puzzle the mind of man. However, it seems that the most immediate question of the day, which is characterized as a status of intermediacy, i.e., a twilight zone between war and peace, is the question of the survival of nation-states.

The Institute of World Polity of Georgetown University, which gives priority to research on the problems of legal and ethical control of force in international community, in its second volume of World Polity reminds those who are committed to the defense of material well-being that the real problem is the revitalization and preservation of the concrete societal order and value systems. The first two contributions in World Polity II, namely Professor William H. Roberts' "The Nature of Contemporary Conflict," and Professor William V. O'Brien's "Legitimate Military Necessity in Nuclear War" emphasize the importance of the hierarchy of values established by the deductive natural law school and call for strengthening the conceptual foundation of man and his society. Because of the "balance of terror," the present international conflict may never take the nature of a war as that term is understood in pre-atomic age international law. During this status of intermediacy the free peoples of the world are provided, maybe for the last time, the opportunity to find the real strength in their original value system.

Professors Roberts' and O'Brien's realistic and penetrating analysis of the present day total conflict certainly deserve praise.

Using a morphological method, Professor Roberts discusses the underlying sub-strata of modern international conflict. The writer argues that "the Western world has not yet completely realized the fact that the assumptions on which its policies had been based for centuries do not any more provide an adequate foundation for action intended to cope with modern problems." "In the process of struggling to adjust its principles to changed conditions," Professor Roberts observes, "the West has become lost in existential fear and anxiety." According to the writer the problem is not to be Red or dead but "the survival of man and societies as concretely existing moral entities." Rejecting the materialist creed of the Communists and material prosperity of the West as solutions to the problems of man, Professor Roberts calls for "the establishment of a trans-national societal order ensuring the continued growth and development of Western system of values."

The editor of World Polity II, Professor William V. O'Brien, in his article analyzes the dilemma of survival under the threat of nuclear weapons. He goes to the heart of this neglected subject and considers the normative regulation of nuclear weapons. A brilliant student of the late Professor Ernst Feilchenfeld and an authority in his own right on "military necessity," he argues that the "conceptual basis for a law of nuclear war is to be found . . . in the proper interpretation of the central principle of legitimate military necessity." His study is based on two assumptions: "1. Unlimited nuclear warfare is inadmissible because its predictable effects threaten the physical existence of mankind. . . . 2. But nuclear weapons in some form are an accepted integral part of modern defense establishments and their use in serious international conflicts is virtually inevitable." He would accept defeat instead of resorting to disproportionate, illegal and immoral means. Because "the subordinate place of the State in the natural law hierarchy of values clearly precludes the use of nuclear means which would result in disproportionate injury to the earth, to mankind, to the international society." However, the inevitable counter argument is: but will the Communist play ball according to the Western values of natural law? Professor O'Brien's answer: "From the efforts of decision-makers to reconcile their duty of success with the limitations of natural law there will emerge, in effect, the consensus of mankind which will shape the customary law of nuclear war." To some this may sound like the solution furnished by Suarez to the border line case known as "the plank of Carneades."

Other contributions to World Polity II include "Submarine Warfare and International Law" by Lieutenant Commander William H. Barnes II; "Rules of Land Warfare During the War of American Revolution" by Dr. Martin J. Clancy; and "The Law of War: A Bibliography, 1945-1958" by Mr. J. R. Leguey-Feilleux who is the Director of Research of the Institute of World Polity.

Commander Barnes, an expert in the field of submarines, combines his practical experience and extensive knowledge in his article. He argues that today's submarine fleet and guided missiles introduce new dimensions of naval warfare. Coupled with the failure of great powers to comply with the limitations of conventional rules with respect to submarine warfare, the atomic age and its unpredictable destructive capacity makes imperative the regulation and limitation of submarine warfare. Commander Barnes' proposals with respect to submarine warfare tie in very closely with Professor O'Brien's concept of legitimate military necessity.

The summary of the War of the American Revolution told by Dr. Clancy is a serious legal treatise exploring the practice of the Revolutionary War. The "civilized warfare" of the Eighteenth century revolutions is brought once again to the attention of responsible officials of the nuclear age. Dr. Clancy's "Rules of Land Warfare During the War of the American Revolution" is certainly a notable contribution to the efforts of revitalizing the International Law of War.

Jean-Robert Leguey-Feilleux must have spent long and arduous hours in preparing this excellent bibliography on the laws of war for the years 1945-1958. He presents a carefully organized listing of some 1,900 studies, covering systematically the entire field of the law of war. Since two of the contributions in World Polity II originally were theses, one wonders why he has left out the unpublished Masters theses and Doctoral dissertations in this field. This would be also of great service to the student, the writer and the publicist.

The reviewer is of the opinion that the essays in World Polity II are most provocative and will stimulate the mind of any reader who is very much concerned with the sub-strata of the present day total conflict and the development of the international law of war in the nuclear age.—METIN TAMKO, Middle East Technical University (Ankara).

Geschichte der Internationale. BY JULIUS BRAUNTHAL. (Hannover, West Germany: J. H. W. Dietz Nachf. GmbH, Hannover, 1961. Vol. I. Pp. 404.)

This is the first volume of what I assume will be a two-volume history of the "International." The present work covers the predecessors and beginnings of the international Socialist movement through the First and Second Internationals up to 1914. The outbreak of the First World War offers an almost self-evident divide in the history not only of the International, but of the West in general: this was really the end of the 19th century, the beginning of the great seismic shocks from which date a new epoch in human history.

The outline of the book is primarily chronological, though with one or two important exceptions. The first part, which begins with the French revolution, runs to the founding of the First International whose life takes up the second section of the book. The last part covers the period from 1889, the founding of the Second International, to July 28, 1914—the day when the Bureau of the International met for the last time before Armageddon. The author has been personally involved in the workings of the international socialist movement, partly before World War II, but primarily as Secretary of the reconstructed Socialist International after the war. The book is dedicated to Friedrich Adler who held office as General Secretary of the Labor and Socialist International in the Twenties and Thirties.

The treatment is primarily in ideological terms. Thus the history of the First International is presented as the evolution of the struggle between the Anarchists and Marx for the "right" doctrine of the international Socialist movement. The relationship among doctrine, the stage of economic development, the progress of industrialization, the political and social institutions of the area concerned is not in the center of the author's interest, although in some parts of the book such considerations are not completely neglected. Thus the rise of reformism is explained by the growth of the machine of the movement and the development of a rich variety of institutions. As an intellectual history and a reasoned report on developments in the international Socialist movement, this book is a first-rate addition to the literature.

Readers will particularly enjoy the brief but penetrating discussion of the conflict between Proudhon and Bakunin on one hand, and Marx on the other; of the remarkable ability of the First International to shift its policy when conditions changed as they did on September 4, 1870, during the Franco-Prussian war, when the French Republic was proclaimed. Contemporary problems—such as the Yugoslav experiment in local self-government—can be seen in a new focus thanks to the author's splendid analysis of the Paris Commune while the alliance of communism and nationalism and peasant rebellion—one of Lenin's strategic masterpieces—can be traced back to Marx' view of the Irish question.

The story of the Second International is told mainly in terms of the great debates in the International itself—the famous "Millerand case," the revisionist conflict, the general or mass strike debate, and those on colonialism and war. As is inevitable and probably desirable in a book of this kind, the author is not merely a distant observer but emotionally and intellectually involved. This becomes particularly clear in Brauntal's report on the revisionist debate. There can be little doubt left today that on the main issues regarding the evolution of Capitalism Bernstein was far closer to the truth than his orthodox opponents, particularly Kautsky and Bebel. The author would probably not deny this, but he seems to think that from the point of view of the life of the movement and its enthusiasm the "myth" of the great historical mission of the working class was an indispensable element. For supporters of "scientific socialism" this seems a remarkable "deviation" into the philosophy that animated Sorel.

One major omission in this excellent book relates to trade unionism. The somewhat peculiar relationship between the trade unions and the Socialists on the international scene would deserve detailed treatment, particularly as this helps understand the delayed development of a separate trade union international. The Menshevik-Bolshevik split is, I assume, to be treated in the next volume even though chronologically it would belong in the present book.

Some minor requests may be in order in view of a possible English translation of the book, which I hope will soon be forthcoming. Some data on membership figures of the organizations affiliated with the Socialist International at various dates would be enlightening, as would be the more liberal use of dates in the text. A few misprints should be eliminated. American readers would enjoy learning more about the—sometimes surprisingly intimate—relations between events in this country and the evolution of the Socialist International.

Many illustrations and an excellent index add to the usefulness of the book for the student. In view of the high quality of this first volume, we shall be looking forward eagerly to its sequel.—ADOLF STURMTHAL, University of Illinois.

The Position of the Individual in International Law according to Grotius and Vattel. BY PETER P. REMEC. PREFACE BY QUINCY WRIGHT. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1960. Pp. xii, 260. $4.70.)

This scholarly study contains more than a mere discussion of the question of the position of the individual in international law according to Grotius and Vattel. After a 40 page survey of the current doctrine on the question the author gives his reasons for the reexamination of just these two classical writers. However, even if the magna opera under discussion had not had, in recent years, their bicentennial and tercentenary, respectively (which occasions would be reason enough for considering them, especially from such an important angle as that of the position of the individual) no apology for this reexamination is necessary if the study is interesting in itself; and if it is not, good reasons for undertaking it do not enhance its significance.

The two main chapters of the book deal primarily and interestingly with the general theory of international law of Grotius and Vattel, in particular with the relationship between natural and positive law, while the specific question of the position of the individual occupies only a relatively minor part of the discussion. Dr. Remec then takes up the question: "How would Grotius or Vattel solve certain problems which, according to the present exigencies of international life, involve the individual as such?", limiting the comparison of the two authors "to the possibility of international protection of the rights of the individual against oppression by his own state." His answer is that "both authors admit the possibility of an individual appeal beyond the municipal law to the law of nature. Both admit the possibility of violent resistance in extreme cases . . . on the ground of the law of nature". In general, however, "Grotius recognizes but Vattel denies the possibility of international protection of human rights against one's own state," the former permitting "just humanitarian intervention," the latter holding for nonintervention.

One of the main purposes of the study is to establish whether, in view of "the modern trend of international law doctrine . . . to abandon the purely positivistic conceptions" and of the " manifold return to natural law principles," "the fundamental principles of the law of nature and of nations held by either of the two classic authors are suitable, at least in part, for a modern reapplication." Those of Vattel would not seem to be suitable while those of Grotius would have to be qualified in terms of collective intervention, intervention by international organization, in order to avoid the dangers of unilateral intervention. It is submitted that such results can be and have been obtained without recourse to natural law principles. Natural law can be used both to justify and to attack an existing status quo. "Positivists,"<sup>1</sup> on the other hand, do not necessarily agree with the lex lata; only they do not claim that their proposed lex ferenda is the only admissible one. It would be difficult to argue, as the learned author seems to imply, that the extension of the Rechts- und Handlungsfähigkeit of the individual in international law, which has taken place in particular since the First World War, is due only to natural law concepts. On the other hand, all the natural law of the world has not saved the victims of Hitler or Stalin.—SALO ENGEL, The University of Tennessee.

<sup>1</sup> If one is to continue the use of these labels, see e.g. Kunz in 55, The American Journal of International Law 951 (1961), and Rubin in 56 ibid., 514 (1962).

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- AMERICAN ASSEMBLY, The United States and the Far East. (Second edition edited by Willard L. Thorp) (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. 188. $1.95, Paper. $3.95, Cloth.)
- APPLEBY, PAUL H., Citizens as Sovereigns. (Syracuse: University Press. 1962. Pp. xxiv, 200. $5.50.)
- ARMSTRONG, ANNE, Unconditional Surrender: Impact of Casablanca Policy upon World War II. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 1961. Pp. xiv, 304. $6.50.)
- ASBELL, BERNARD, When F. D. R. Died. (New York: The New American Library. 1962. Pp. xi, 191. $0.75, Paper.)
- BALES, JAMES D., Communism: Its Faith and Fallacies. (Grand Rapids: Baker Book House. 1962. Pp. 214. $3.95.)
- BARBASH, JACK, Labor's Grass Roots. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1961. Pp. viii, 250. $4.95.)
- BARR, STRINGFELLOW, The Pilgrimage of Western Man: A History of Europe 1500-1961. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, Co. 1962. Pp. xiii, 369. $1.95, Paper. $5.95, Cloth.)
- BELL, JACK, Mr. Conservative: Barry Goldwater. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1961. Pp. 312. $4.50.)
- BENEDICT, BUELL, AND ELLISON, Comparing Career Service Systems: A Preliminary Study. (Chicago: Public Personnel Association. 1962. Pp. 20. $2.50, Paper.)
- BENGTSON, JOHN ROBERT, Nazi War Aims. (Rock Island, Illinois: Augustana College Library. 1962. Pp. xi, 155. $3.95.)
- BENNETT, JOHN C., Editor, Nuclear Weapons and the Conflict of Conscience. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1962. Pp. 188, $3.95.)
- BENNIS, W. G., BENNE, K. D., CHIN, ROBERT, Editors, The Planning of Change: Readings in the Applied Behavioral Sciences. (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiii, 781. $8.50.)
- BENTON, WILLIAM, The Voice of Latin America. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1961. Pp. xix, 204. $3.95.)
- BERNSTEIN, PETER L., The Price of Prosperity. (New York: Doubleday and Company. 1962. Pp. xii, 273. $4.50.)
- BETH, LOREN P., Politics, The Constitution, and the Supreme Court. (Evanston: Row, Peterson & Co. Pp. x, 166. $2.25, Paper.)
- BLIJ, HARM J. DE, Africa South. (Evanston: Northwestern University Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 399. $5.95.)
- BODIN, JEAN, Edited by Kenneth Douglas McRae. The Six Books of a Commonweale. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1962.)
- BOSWORTH, WILLIAM, Catholicism and Crisis in Modern France. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. xv, 407. $8.50.)
- BOURNE, EDWARD GAYLORD, Spain in America 1450-1580. (New York: Barnes & Noble, Inc. 1962. Pp. xi, 366. $2.25, Paper. $5.00, Cloth.)
- BOYD, ANDREW AND VAN RENSBURG, PATRICK, An Atlas of African Affairs. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. 133. $3.50, Cloth. $1.75, Paper.)
- BOYKIN, JAMES H., North Carolina in 1861. (New York: Bookman Associates. 1962. Pp. 237. $5.00.)
- BRADFORD, SAX, Spain in the World. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. v, 121. $1.45, Paper.)

- BRAILSFORD, H. N., The Levellers and the English Revolution. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1961. Pp. 715. $10.00.)
- BRECHER, MICHAEL, Nekru: A Political Biography. (Boston: Beacon Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 267. $1.95, Paper.)
- BRONFENBRENNER, MARTIN, Academic Encounter. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe. 1962. Pp. ix, 259, $6.00.)
- BRUMBERG, ABRAHAM, Editor, Russia under Khrushchev: An Anthology from Problems of Communism. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. vii, 660. $8.75, Cloth. $2.50, Paper.)
- BURGESS, M. ELAINE, Negro Leadership in a Southern City. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 231. $6.00.)
- BURTNESS, P. E. AND OBER, WARREN U., Editors, The Puzzle of Pearl Harbor. (Evanston: Row, Peterson & Co. Pp. ix, 244. $2.25, Paper.)
- CAPERS, GERALD M., John C. Calhoun, Opportunist. (Gainesville: University of Florida Press. 1960. Pp. 269. $6.75.)
- CHESTER, EDWARD W., Europe Views America. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1962. Pp. 182. $4.50.)
- CHRISTENSON, REO M. AND MCWILLIAMS, ROBERT O., Voice of the People: Readings in Public Opinion and Propaganda. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. ix, 485. $4.95, Paper.)
- CLANCY, HERBERT J., The Democratic Party: Jefferson to Jackson. (New York: Fordham University Press. 1962. Pp. 240. $5.00.)
- CLARKE, CHARLES WALTER, Taboo: The Story of the Pioneers of Social Hygiene. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1962. Pp. vii, 109. $3.25.)
- CLARKE, JACQUELYNE J., These Rights They Seek. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1962. Pp. vii, 85. $3.25.)
- CLERICETTI, DARIO, L'Affaire Ambatielos. (Geneva: E. Dorz. 1962. Pp. 184. 15 Sw. Fr., Paper.)
- CONTEMPORARY CIVILIZATION STAFF, Editors, Chapters in Western Civilization Vol. II. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1962. Pp. 477. $6.00.)
- COX, OLIVER C., Capitalism and American Leadership. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1962. $6.00.)
- CRESSEY, GEORGE B., Soviet Potentials: A Geographic Appraisal. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1962. Pp. xvii, 232. $5.75.)
- DAVIS, J. WILLIAM, AND ODEN, WILLIAM E., Municipal and County Government (Texas). (Dallas: The Arnold Foundation. 1961. Pp. vi, 130. $1.00, Paper.)
- DESMONDE, WILLIAM, Magic, Myth and Money. (New York: The Free Press. 1962. Pp. xv, 208. $5.00.)
- DIA, MAMADOU, The African Nations and World Solidarity. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xii, 145. $4.85, Cloth. $1.85, Paper.)
- DIESING, PAUL, Reason in Society. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1962. Pp. 262. $5.75.)
- DIVINE, ROBERT A., The Illusion of Neutrality: The Struggle over the Arms-embargo Issue in the Years of the New Deal. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1962. Pp. ix, 370. $6.50.)
- DORSEY, GEORGE, Christopher of San Francisco. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1962. Pp. 238. $5.00.)
- DOUGLAS, WILLIAM O., Democracy's Manifesto. (New York: Doubleday and Co. 1962. Pp. 48. $2.00.)
- DRAPER, THEODORE, Castro's Revolution. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1962. Pp. vi, 211. $4.50.)
- DUGGAR, GEORGE D., Federalism and Self-Government in the U. S.: Urban Renewal as an Example. (Berkeley: University of California Bureau of Public Administration. Pp. 13. Paper.)
- DUGGAR, GEORGE S., The New Renewal: The Next Big Tasks in Urban Renewal. (Berkeley: Bureau of Public Administration, University of California. 1961. Pp. xix, 158. $3.75, Paper.)
- DYKEMAN, WILMA, AND STOKELY, JAMES, Seeds of Southern Change: The Life of Will Alexander. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1962. Pp. xvi, 343. $5.95.)
- ECKSTEIN, ALEXANDER, The National Income of Communist China. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe. 1962. Pp. 215. $6.75.)
- ENGLEMAN, FRED L., The Peace of Christmas Eve. (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc. 1962. Pp. xii, 333. $6.95.)
- ESSIEN-UDOM, E. U., Black Nationalism: A Search for an Identity in America. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1962. Pp. xi, 367. $6.95.)
- FEHRENBACHER, DON E., Prelude to Greatness: Lincoln in the 1850's. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1960. Pp. 205. $4.75.)
- FERGUSON, J. H. AND MCHENRY, D. E., Elements of American Government. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1962. Pp. ix, 489. $6.95.)
- FONER, PHILIP S., A History of Cuba and its Relations with the United States. Vol. I. (New York: International Publishers. 1962. Pp. 256. $3.75.)
- FOOT, M. R. D., Men in Uniform. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 161. $3.50.)
- FREMANTLE, ANNE, Editor, Mao Tse-Tung: Anthology of his Writings. (New York: The

- New American Library. 1962. Pp. xlviii, 300. $0.75, Paper.)
- FROMM, ERICH, May Man Prevail? (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1961. Pp. xi, 252. $4.50, Cloth. $0.95, Paper.)
- FRYKLUND, RICHARD, 100 Million Lives: Maximum Survival in a Nuclear War. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1962. Pp. xii, 175. $3.95.)
- FULLER, EDMUND, Editor, Schools and Scholarship: The Christian Idea of Education Part II. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 345. $6.50.)
- GLAZER, SIDNEY, A Study of Progress: The Middle West. (New York: Bookman Associates. 1962. Pp. 135. $3.50.)
- GALBRAITH, JOHN KENNETH, Economic Development in Perspective. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1962. Pp. vi, 76. $2.50.)
- GARBARINO, JOSEPH W., Wage Policy and Long-Term Contracts. (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1962. Pp. 145. $2.00, Paper. $3.00, Cloth.)
- GERBER, ROSALIE B., The Responsibilities of Man. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. Pp. vi, 147. $3.25.)
- GHIBAUDI, SILVIA ROTA, La Fortuna Di Rousseau in Italia (1750-1815). (Torino: Istituto di Scienze Politiche, Dell' Università. 1961. Pp. 373. L. 2.800, Paper.)
- GOEN, C. C., Revivalism and Separatism in New England, 1740-1800. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 370. $7.50.)
- GOLDBERG HARVEY, The Life of Jean Jaurès. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 1961. Pp. 590. $12.00.)
- GOLDRICH, DANIEL, Radical Nationalism: The Political Orientations of Panamanian Law Students. (East Lansing: Michigan State University. 1962. Pp. 44. Paper.)
- GOULD, JAMES W., Americans in Sumatra. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff. 1961. Pp. vii, 185. 14.25 guilders.)
- GOURE, LEON, The Siege of Leningrad. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1962. Pp. xii, 363. $6.95.)
- GRAY, ROBERT KEITH, Eighteen Acres Under Glass. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1962. Pp. 372. $4.95.)
- GREEN, CONSTANCE McLAUGHLIN, Washington: Village and Capital, 1800-1878. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. xix, 445. $8.50.)
- GREENBERGER, MARTIN, Editor, Management and the Computer of the Future. (Cambridge: The Massachusetts Institute of Technology Press. 1962. Pp. xxvi, 340. $6.00.)
- GREENE, FELIX, Awakened China. (New York: Doubleday & Company. 1961. Pp. 425. $5.95.)
- GYORGY, ANDREW, AND GIBBS, HUBERT S., Editors, Problems in International Relations. Second edition. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. xii, 386. $5.25, Paper.)
- HAIM, SYLVIA G., Editor, Arab Nationalism: An Anthology. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1962. Pp. 255. $6.00.)
- HAIRE, MASON, Editor, Organization Theory in Industrial Practice. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 1962. Pp. x, 173. $5.75.)
- HAMLIN, D. L. B., Diplomacy in Evolution. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 128. $2.00, Paper.)
- HANSARD, Parliamentary Debates (24th Parliament, February, March 1962) (Canberra: Commonwealth of Australia.)
- HARGREAVES, REGINALD, Red Sun Rising: The Siege of Port Arthur. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. 1962. Pp. xi, 210. $3.95.)
- HARRIS, C. LOWELL, Selected Readings in Economics (Second edition). (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. xv, 557. Paper.)
- HARTMANN, FREDERICK H., World in Crisis: Readings in International Relations. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1962. Pp. xvi, 398. $3.25, Paper.)
- HAYRAN, MARTIN J., The Catholics in Caroline England. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1962. Pp. ix, 208. $4.75.)
- HEARD, ALEXANDER, The Costs of Democracy. Financing American Political Campaigns. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1962. Pp. 446. $1.95, Paper.)
- HEILBRUNN, OTTO, Partisan Warfare. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1962. Pp. 199.)
- HENKIN, LOUIS, Editor, Arms Controls. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. 207. $3.50.)
- HIBBERT, CHRISTOPHER, Il Duce: The Life of Benito Mussolini. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1962. Pp. xii, 368. $6.00.)
- HIGH, JAMES, Teaching Secondary School Social Studies. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 1962. Pp. xii, 481. $6.95.)
- HIGHAM, ROBIN, The British Rigid Airship. 1908-1931. (Hamden: The Shoe String Press, Inc. 1962. Pp. xvi, 426. $9.00.)
- HIRSCHFIELD, ROBERT S., The Constitution and the Court. (New York: Random House, Inc. 1962. Pp. 257. $1.95, Paper.)
- HOPTNER, J. B., Yugoslavia in Crisis, 1934-1941. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1962. Pp. xv, 328. $6.50.)
- HOUN, FRANKLIN W., To Change a Nation. (New York: The Free Press. 1961. Pp. x, 250.)
- HSIAO, TSO-LIANG, Power Relations within the Chinese Communist Movement, 1930-1934: A Study of Documents. (Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 404. $7.50.)
- HSÜEH, CHÜN-TU, Huang Hsing and the Chinese

- Revolution*. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1961. Pp. xi, 260. $5.75.)
- HUTCHINSON AND RACHEL. Editors. The Papers of James Madison. Vol. I: 1751-1779. Vol. II: 1780-1781. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1962. Pp. Vol. I: xlii, 344. $10.00. Vol. II: xix, 344. $10.00.)
- HUTTENBACK, ROBERT A., British Relations with Sind. 1799-1843: An Anatomy of Imperialism. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1962. Pp. ix, 161. $4.00.)
- INSTITUT UNIVERSITAIRE DE HAUTES ÉTUDES INTERNATIONALES, La Première Internationale: Recueil de documents. (Geneva: Librairie E. Droz. 1962. Pp. Vol. I: xxxiii, 454. Vol. II: 499.)
- INSTITUTE OF RACE RELATIONS, Angola, A Symposium: Views of a Revolt. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. 160. $2.25. Paper.)
- JACKSON, W. A. DOUGLAS, Russo-Chinese Borderlands. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. vii, 126. $1.45, Paper.)
- JACOBS, DAN N., Editor, The New Communist Manifesto. Second edition. (Evanston: Row, Peterson & Co. Pp. 250. $1.45, Paper.)
- JASNY, NAUM, Essays on the Soviet Economy. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1962. Pp. xiv, 297. $6.00.)
- KENNEDY, JOHN F., Public Papers of the Presidents: John F. Kennedy 1961. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1962. Pp. 908. $6.00.)
- KENT, RAYMOND K., From Madagascar to the Malagasy Republic. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. ix, 182. $4.85.)
- KOLKO, GABRIEL, Wealth and Power in America. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. xii, 178. $4.85.)
- KRUPP, SHERMAN, Pattern in Organization Analysis. (Philadelphia: Chilton Co. 1961. Pp. 201. $5.00.)
- KULKARNI, V. B., British Statesmen in India. (Bombay: Orient Longmans, Ltd. 1962. Pp. ix, 550. RS. 20/—)
- LAWRENCE, JOHN, A History of Russia. (New York: The New American Library. 1962. Pp. vii, 230. $0.75, Paper.)
- LEFEVER, ERNEST W., Editor, Arms and Arms Control. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. xvii, 334. $6.75, Cloth. $1.95, Paper.)
- LEGUM, COLIN, Africa: A Handbook to the Continent. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiv, 553. $15.00.)
- LEIFER, MICHAEL, Cambodia and Neutrality. (Canberra: Australian National University. Pp. 51. 5/—, Paper.)
- LETWIN, WILLIAM, Editor, A Documentary History of American Economic Policy since 1789. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. xxx, 406. $7.50.)
- LIPSET, TROW, AND COLEMAN, Union Democracy. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1962. Pp. xxvi, 512. $1.95, Paper.)
- LOVELL, COLIN R., English Constitution History. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. xii, 589. $8.00.)
- MACARTNEY, C. A., AND PALMER, A. W., Independent Eastern Europe: A History. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1962. Pp. vi, 499. $12.00.)
- MADARIAGA, ISABEL DE, Britain, Russia, and the Armed Neutrality of 1780. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1962. Pp. xiv, 496. $8.75.)
- MANUEL, FRANK E., The Prophets of Paris. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 349. $7.50.)
- MARDIN, SERIF, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideas. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 456. $10.00.)
- MCCLAINE, JACKSON M. AND HIGHSAW, ROBERT B., Dixie City Acts: A Study in Decision Making. (University: Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1962. Pp. vii, 53. Paper.)
- MCCUTCHEN, FERSH, AND CLARK, Goals of Democracy: A Problems Approach. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1962. Pp. viii, 664.)
- MCNICKLE, D'ARCY, The Indian Tribes of the U. S.: Ethnic and Cultural Survival. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. 79. $1.75, Paper.)
- MEHNERT, KLAUS, Soviet Man and His World. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. vii, 310.)
- MEYER, LOUIS S., Federal Aid to Education: Its Impact on Arizona. (Tempe: Arizona State University. 1962. Pp. v, 36. $1.00, Paper.)
- MILLER, J. P., Editor, Competition, Cartels and their Regulation. (Amsterdam: North Holland Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. 428. $9.80.)
- MITCHELL, BROADUS, Alexander Hamilton Vol. II. (New York: The MacMillan Co. 1962. Pp. viii, 805. $12.50.)
- MOBERG, DAVID O., The Church as a Social Institution. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. vi, 569. $7.50.)
- MOON, PENDEREL, Divide and Quit (Ending of British Rule in India). (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1962. Pp. 302. $5.50.)
- NATIONAL BUREAU OF ECONOMIC RESEARCH, The Rate and Direction of Inventive Activity: Economic and Social Factors. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 635. $12.50.)
- NOLLAU, GÜNTHER, International Communism and World Revolution. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xv, 357. $7.50.)
- NUTTER, G. WARREN, The Growth of Industrial

- Production in the Soviet Union.* (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. xxvii, 706. $15.00.)
- OBERNDÖRFER, DIETER, Editor, Wissenschaftliche Politik: Eine Einführung in Grundfragen Ihrer Tradition und Theorie. (Freiburg um Breisgau: Rombach. 1962. Pp. 428. 45 DM.)
- OKUMA, THOMAS, Angola in Ferment. (Boston: Beacon Press. 1962. Pp. xviii, 137. $3.50.)
- ONODY, OLIVER, A Inflação Brasileira (1820-1958). (Rio de Janeiro. 1960. Pp. 419. Paper.)
- PADOVER, SAUL K., To Secure These Blessings: The Great Debates of 1787. (New York: Washington Square and Ridge Press. 1962. Pp. 464. $7.50.)
- PANIKKAR, K. MADHU, Revolution in Africa. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. 202. $6.50.)
- PECK, M. J. AND SCHERER, F. M., The Weapons Acquisition Process: An Economic Analysis. (Cambridge: Harvard Business School. 1962. Pp. xxxii, 736. $10.00.)
- PELTASON, J. W., AND BURNS, JAMES M., Editors, Functions and Policies of American Government (second edition). (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiv, 450. $5.95.)
- PHILLIPS, N. C., Yorkshire and English National Politics, 1788-1784. (Christchurch: University of Canterbury. 1961. Pp. 60. 6/6d., Paper.)
- POLDERVAART, ARIE, New Mexico Probate Manual. (Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press. 1962. Pp. 193. $3.50, Paper.)
- POMFRET, JOHN E., The Province of East New Jersey, 1609-1702: The Rebellious Proprietary. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. x, 407. $10.00.)
- POUNDS, NORMAN J. G., Divided Germany and Berlin. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. v, 128. $1.45.)
- RAY, DONALD P., Editor, Trends in Social Science. (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc. 1961. Pp. 169. $4.75.)
- READ, JAMES M., The United Nations and Refugees: Changing Concepts. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1962. Pp. 60. $.35, Paper.)
- RICH, CLIFFORD A. L., Editor, European Politics and Government. (New York: The Ronald Press. 1962. Pp. vii, 780. $8.00.)
- RIPKA, HUBERT, Eastern Europe in the Post War World. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xv, 266. $5.95.)
- RIVERO, NICOLAS, Castro's Cuba: An American Dilemma. (Washington: Robert B. Luce, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiii, 239. $4.50.)
- ROSENOW, BEVERLY PAULIK, Editor, Journal of the Washington State Constitutional Convention, 1889. (Seattle: Book Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. xv, 930. $18.00.)
- ROTHBARD, MURRAY N., The Panic of 1819. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1962. Pp. vi, 261. $6.00.)
- SCHLEICHER, CHARLES P., International Relations: Cooperation and Conflict. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiii, 651. $8.75.)
- SCHMANDT, STEINBICKER, AND WENDEL, Metropolitan Reform in St. Louis: A Case Study. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 1961. Pp. xi, 73. Paper.)
- SCHWARTZ, HARRY, The Many Faces of Communism. (New York: Berkeley Publishing Corporation. 1962. Pp. 254. $.50, Paper.)
- SCIGLIANO, ROBERT, The Courts: A Reader in the Judicial Process. (Boston: Little, Brown and Co. 1962. Pp. viii, 405. Paper.)
- SHAW, TODD, AND VIEDERMAN, Editors, The American Bibliography of Russian and East European Studies for 1960. (Bloomington: University of Indiana Press. 1962. Pp. xvi, 124. Paper.)
- SHIPMAN, LAMPMAN, AND MIYAMOTO, Medical Service Corporations in the State of Washington. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1962. Pp. xi, 215. $6.50.)
- SINCLAIR, T. C., AND GRUNBAUM, WERNER F., Personal Rights and Liberties (Texas). (Dallas: The Arnold Foundation. 1960. Pp. vi, 95. $1.00, Paper.)
- SMITH, A. ROBERT, The Tiger in the Senate: A Biography of Senator Wayne Morse. (New York: Doubleday and Company. 1962. Pp. 455. $4.95.)
- SOULE, LEON CYPRIAN, The Know-Nothing Party in New Orleans. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana Historical Association. 1962. Pp. 128. $5.00.)
- SOWLE, CLAUDE R., Editor, Police Power and Individual Freedom. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Co. 1962. Pp. 287. $7.50.)
- SPARKS, GEORGE F., Editor, A Many-Colored Toga: The Diary of Henry Fountain Ashhurst. (Tucson: The University of Arizona Press. 1962. Pp. xvi, 416. $7.50.)
- SPECTOR, IVAR, The First Russian Revolution: Its Impact on Asia. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1962. Pp. viii, 180. $1.95, Paper. $3.95, Cloth.)
- SPIER, HANS, Divided Berlin. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 201. $4.95.)
- SPENCER, FRANK, Editor, The Fourth Earl of Sandwich: Diplomatic Correspondence 1763-1765. (New York: Barnes and Noble, Inc. 1962. Pp. vii, 334. $9.00.)
- STARR, JOSEPH R., Manuel Para La Preparacion de Tesis Con Referencia Especial a La Administracion Publica. (Panama: University of Panama. 1962. Pp. 115. Paper.)
- STYPULKOWSKI, ZBIGNIEW, Invitation to Moscow. (New York: Walker & Co. 1962. Pp. xvi, 360. $5.95.)

- EDITORS OF "SURVEY," Hungary Today. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1962. Pp. 104. $3.85.)
- TAURAS, K. V., Guerilla Warfare on the Amber Coast. (New York: Voyages Press. 1962. Pp. xi, 110. $3.00. Paper.)
- TELLER, EDWARD, WITH BROWN, ALLEN, The Legacy of Hiroshima. (New York: Doubleday and Company. 1962. Pp. ix, 325. $4.95.)
- TEMPEL, B. VAN DEN, The Evolution of Social Systems in Europe. (London: Robert Hale, Ltd. 1962. Pp. 128. 15/—.)
- TURNBULL, WILLIAMS, AND CHEIT, Economic and Social Security (second edition). (New York: The Ronald Press Co. 1962. Pp. v, 552. $8.00.)
- TUSSMAN, JOSEPH, Editor, The Supreme Court on Church and State. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1962. Pp. xxiv, 305. Paper.)
- TWITTY, W. BRADLEY, Y'All Come: "Big Jim" Folsom. (Nashville: Hermitage Press. 1962. Pp. 169. $5.00.)
- TYLER, GUS, Organized Crime in America. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press. 1962. Pp. xvi, 421. $7.50.)
- U.S.S.R. The Soviet Stand on Disarmament (Documents). (New York: Cross-currents Press, Inc. 1962. $1.00, Paper.)
- ULLMAN, RICHARD A., Intervention and The War. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. 360. $7.50.)
- UNITED NATIONS, Economic and Social Consequences of Disarmament. (New York: United Nations. 1962. Pp. 66. $.75, Paper.)
- U. S. DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, Communist China: Ruthless Enemy or Paper Tiger: Bibliographic Survey. (Washington: Headquarters Department of the Army. 1962. Pp. vi, 137.)
- U. S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Foreign Relations of the U. S.: 1943, China. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1957. Pp. vi, 908. $4.00.)
- U. S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Foreign Relations of the United States: 1941. Vol. V. The Far East. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1956. Pp. 938. $4.00.)
- URS, D. V., Editor, for the University of Mysore, India, Kautilya: A Review of International Affairs Vol. 2 No. 1. (Bangalore: Hosali Press. 1962. Pp. ix, 140. $3.00, Paper.) Bi-Annual.
- VAKAR, NICHOLAS P., The Taproot of Soviet Society: The Impact of Russia's Peasant Culture Upon the Soviet State. (New York: Harper and Brothers. 1962. Pp. xiii, 203. $4.75.)
- VARMA, V. P., Political Philosophy of Sri Aurobindo. (New York: Asia Publishing House. 1961. Pp. xxii, 471. $6.50.)
- WADDELL, D. A. G., British Honduras. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. 151. $2.90.)
- WAGNER, PHILIP L., AND MIKESELL, MARVIN, Editors, Readings in Cultural Geography. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1962. Pp. xii, 589. $8.50.)
- WALLAS, GRAHAM, Human Nature in Politics. (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 1962. Pp. 313. $1.40, Paper.)
- WANDYCZ, PIOTR S., France and Her Eastern Allies 1919-1925. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1962. Pp. ix, 454. $8.50.)
- WARNER, DENIS, Hurricane from China. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1961. Pp. ix, 210. $3.95.)
- WASKOW, ARTHUR I., The Limits of Defense. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1962. Pp. 119. $2.95.)
- WIENS, HAROLD J., Pacific Island Bastions of the U. S. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. 1962. Pp. iv, 127. $1.45, Paper.)
- WILLIAMS, ERNEST W., JR., Freight Transportation in the Soviet Union. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. Pp. xxi, 221. $4.50.)
- WILLIAMSON, A. A., Biological Forces in World Affairs. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. iv, 58. $1.00, Paper.)
- WILLIS, F. ROY, The French in Germany 1945-1949. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 308. $6.00.)
- WILLMOTT, DONALD E., The National Status of the Chinese in Indonesia. (Ithaca: Cornell University Southeast Asia Program. 1961. Pp. xi, 139. $3.00, Paper.)
- WOELFEL, NORMAN, Educational Goals for America. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1962. Pp. vi, 167. $3.75.)
- WOLPERT, STANLEY A., Tilak and Gokhale: Revolution and Reform in the Making of Modern India. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1962. Pp. xv, 370. $7.50.)
- WOODCOCK, GEORGE, Anarchism: A History of Libertarian Ideas and Movements. (New York: Meridian Books. 1962. Pp. 504. $1.95, Paper.)
- WOOSTER, RALPH A., The Secession Conventions of the South. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 294. $6.50.)
- WRAGE, E. J. AND BASKERVILLE, BARNET, Contemporary Forum: American Speeches on Twentieth Century Issues. (New York: Harper and Brothers. 1962. Pp. x, 376. $7.50.)
- YOUNG, WILLIAM H., Editor Ogg and Ray's Introduction to American Government, The National Government (12th edition). (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiii, 748. $7.50.)
- YOUNG, WILLIAM H., Editor, Ogg and Ray's Introduction to American Government (12th edition). (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1962. Pp. xiii, 957. $8.00.)
- ZIEGLER, BENJAMIN M., The Supreme Court and Economic Life. (Evanston: Row, Peterson and Co. 1962. Pp. xi, 273. $2.40, Paper.)

DOCTORAL DISSERTATIONS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

IN UNIVERSITIES OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA*

COMPILED BY WILLIAM C. SEYLER

Deputy Secretary, Department of Internal Affairs, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania

I. DISSERTATIONS IN PREPARATION

ADDITIONS, CHANGES, AND DELETIONS SINCE THE 1961 LISTING

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY, THEORY AND METHODOLOGY

Additions

- H. Angell*, The Regulation, Limitation and Subsidization of Election Campaign Funds. McGill.
- Hoyt B. Ballard*, Some Contemporary Views on the Nature and Function of Political Philosophy. Texas.
- George D. Beam*, The Use of Logical Models in Political Science. Michigan.
- Pushpa Bhana*, The Concept of "Class" in Utilitarian Thought. Toronto.
- Franklyn G. Bonn*, The Idea of Political Party in Early Jeffersonian Thought. Minnesota.
- A. Bromke*, Poland's Own Road to Socialism. McGill.
- Ian Budge*, Political Decision. Yale.
- Harold M. Cady*, James Madison's Theories of Federalism and Their Impact on the American Constitutional System. Claremont.
- Ann Cagan*, Political Thought of Contemporary Scientists. Harvard.
- Vilma A. Cavallaro*, Jose Ortega y Gasset: His Philosophy of Politics and History. New York University.

Philip C. Chapman, The Image of the Mass. California (Berkeley).

N. T. Cieplak, Sorel's Theory of Syndicalism. McGill.

John R. Crutcher, Sanctions of African Rule in Tanganyika: The Transformation of Religio-Political Symbolism. Notre Dame.

Theodore Denno, Evolution of the Marxian Utopia. Maryland.

Spynos Dialismas, The Origins and Development of Athenian Democracy. American.

Sharron E. Doerner, The Political Community: A Critique of Select Thinkers. Indiana.

Paul Eidelsberg, The Political Philosophy of the American Constitution: A Reinterpretation of the Intention of the Founding Fathers. Chicago.

John Ellsworth, Individualism and Community in the 17th Century. Claremont.

Gerald Friedberg, Socialism in America, A Case Study: The Life and Times of John Spargo. Harvard.

Gerard A. Gibbons, Reason of State and the Right of Resistance. New York University.

Arthur S. Goldberg, Consensus-Cleavage and Political Stability. Yale.

H. P. Habib, A Case Study of Egyptian Conservatism: Ismail Sidqi. McGill.

George Heiman, A Comparative Study of the German and English Idea of Freedom in the 19th Century. Toronto.

Joseph A. Hennessy, The Political Philosophy of Maurice Barres: A Critical Analysis. Notre Dame.

Morton Horwitz, Rise of the Doctrine of Tyranny of the Majority. Harvard.

W. Marvin Kendrick, Xenophon's Political Philosophy. Chicago.

Frederick E. Kidder, The Political Philosophy of Luis Munoz Rivera (1859-1916) of Puerto Rico. Florida.

F. A. F. Kunz, The Senate of Canada, 1925-1961. McGill.

George Mace, The Comparative Influence of * Similar lists have been printed in the Review annually since 1911, except for 1915-19, 1921 and 1923-24; full citations are given in the 1955 list, XLIX 792.

Items which appeared in the September, 1961, list and which are still in preparation without change are not repeated in this listing. The present listing contains only additions, changes, and deletions. Additions are those items which were reported in preparation for the first time; changes are those items which have had a change in name, title, or classification; and deletions are those items which are no longer in preparation.

The lists printed in the Review are based on information from departments giving graduate instruction in political science; to avoid misunderstandings, entries are not accepted from individual candidates for degrees. The subject matter classification of an entry by the department concerned, if given, is followed. Each entry is listed under one classification only.

For a fuller note about coverage and subject matter classification, and for references to dissertation lists in cognate fields, see the 1960 list, LIV, 816.

For a chart which classifies, by subject category, the numbers of dissertations completed and in progress, 1951 through 1957, see this Review, LII, 916.

Abstracts of some of the theses listed as completed may be found in "Dissertation Abstracts," published bi-monthly by University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

Hobbes and Locke on The Federalist Papers. Claremont.

H. H. Macquarrie, Sir Robert Borden and the Conservative Party of Canada. McGill.

Frank B. Mallonee, Jr., An Exposition of the Political Ideas of Jefferson Davis. Emory.

Louis C. Midgley, Politics, Power and Ultimate Concern: The Political Philosophy of Paul Tillich. Brown.

Larry D. Nachman, The Liberal Politics of John Stuart Mill. Columbia.

P. C. Noble, Regionalism in International Organization: Theory and Practice. McGill.

Alan Ritter, Political Thought of Proudhon. Harvard.

James W. Roberts, Lenin's Theory of Imperialism: Evolution and Present Meaning. North Carolina.

Esther E. Rowland, Ernest Jones, Chartist. Columbia.

Peter Sampo, Mazzini and the Church: A Study in Political Symbolism. Notre Dame.

Elizabeth B. Sass, The Contribution of American Political Science to Political Theory. California (Berkeley).

Marvin Schick, The United States Court of Appeals: A Study in Judicial Behavior. New York University.

Thomas Schrock, The Political Thought of Daniel Defoe. Chicago.

Barbara Silberdick, The Political Thought of Oliver Cromwell: The Search for a Stable Constitutional Order. Yale.

James A. Steintrager, Human Nature and Political Society: An Examination of the Ethical Basis of J. S. Mill's Political Thought. Chicago.

Rolf H. Theen, The Political Thought of Peter Nikitich Tkachev. Indiana.

Jean P. Tournon, The Nature and Role of the Political Group. California (Berkeley).

Hihun Pak, Logical Positivism and Political Theory. Minnesota.

Rev. Joseph Pittau, Political Theory in Early Meiji Japan: The Making of the Major Constitution. Harvard.

Ernest J. Walters, Social Science and Democracy: A Study of Graham Wallis. Chicago.

Richard S. Wells, Political Ideology and the Legal Profession: The Case of the Carr Law Firm of Manchester, Iowa. Iowa.

Burton Zwiebach, The Political Thought of R. H. Tawney. Columbia.

Changes

Jerome I. Cooperman, The Philosophical Foundations of Modern Political Thought: Leo Strauss, T. O. Weldon, J. P. Sartre. Kulgers.

Gordon J. Schochet, Robert Filmer and His Critics: A Study in Conflicting Theories of Obligation in Seventeenth Century English Political Thought. Minnesota.

Deletions

Jason M. Aronson, Shaftesbury's Political Thought and Its Philosophical Foundations. Chicago.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES

Additions

Marjorie E. Aghassi, Attitudes toward Channeling of U. S. Foreign Aid through the United Nations: A Case Study of Interest Groups before Congress. Columbia.

Samuel B. Bloom, Federal Aid to Higher Education and the Doctrine of Separation of Church and State in Education. California (Berkeley).

Ruth E. Cowart, The Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960: A Study of the Legislative Process. American.

William J. Crotty, Jr., The Democratic Advisory Council: An Analysis. North Carolina.

John E. Crow, Lawyers and Politics: A Behavioral View. Washington (Seattle).

J. Clarence Davies, 3d, Target Groups and Urban Renewal. Columbia.

Donald M. Freeman, Religion and Southern Politics: A Study of the Political Behavior of Southern White Protestants. North Carolina.

Louis C. Gawthrop, Congressional Control of Foreign Aid Agencies, 1948-1960. Johns Hopkins.

Jackson A. Giddens, The United States Information Agency: Its Organization and Operation. Fletcher School.

John Grupenhoff, A Study of the Politics of Cincinnati, Ohio and of Hamilton County, since 1924. Texas.

John E. Harr, Specialization and the Senior Officer in the Conduct of U. S. Foreign Affairs. California (Berkeley).

Richard Hofferbert, Out-Party Power Consolidation: A Case Study of Routine Political Career Building. Indiana.

Joseph P. Kelly, An Analysis of a Montana Democratic Congressional Candidate's Primary and General Campaigns in the 1960 Election. Washington (St. Louis).

Helenan Lewis, The Teenage Joiner and His Orientations Toward Public Affairs: A Test of Two Hypotheses about Multiple Group Membership. Michigan State.

Diane Monson, Interests and Tariff Policy: A Case Study of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962. New York University.

Richard E. Morgan, The Religious Interest Group in American Politics: A Case Study of the Protestants and other Americans United for the Separation of Church and State. Columbia.

Edwin E. Olson, Congressional Attitudes toward the Federal Public Service. American.

Milton Pabon, Study of Political Legitimacy in Puerto Rico. Chicago.

Robert L. Piper, The Attempt to Draft Adlai Stevenson for the 1960 Presidential Nomination. Syracuse.

Quentin L. Quade, Harry S. Truman and the Conduct of Foreign Policy: A Case Study in Presidential Leadership. Notre Dame.

Mark Reader, The Political Criticism of George Orwell. Michigan.

Michael P. Rogin, McCarthyism and Agrarian Radicalism. Chicago.

Bernard Samoff, Influence of NLRB Decisions: Statutory Protection of Job Rights from Union-Caused Discrimination. Pennsylvania.

Alan H. Schechter, The Businessman as Statesman: A Study of the Influence of Government Service on Attitudes and Perceptions of Business Executives. Columbia.

Edward Schneider, The House Committee on Un-American Activities and Its Client Groups. Claremont.

Captain John Seigle, Internal War: The United States Response. Harvard.

Wayne W. Shannon, The House Conservative Coalition: The Case of the 86th Congress. Cornell.

David A. Smeltzer, The Problem of Alternatives: The Role of Congressional Committee Hearings. Michigan.

Changes

Allen B. Davis, The Excess Land Law in the Central Valley of California. California (Berkeley).

Robert S. Getz, Congressional Conflict of Interest: A Study in Legislative Policy. Rutgers.

James R. Kerr, Congressmen as Overseers: Congressional Surveillance of the Civilian Space Program. Stanford.

David M. Olson, The Government Relations Programs of the American Petroleum Institute and the Independent Petroleum Association of America: A Comparative Study. California (Berkeley).

Herbert C. Phillips, Depressed Areas Legislation and West Virginia Politics. Pittsburgh.

Deletions

Joseph D. Lubin, The Item Veto and the Presidency. California (Berkeley).

Robert L. Skinner, Principles, Policy and Pressure. A Study of the Americans for Democratic Action. Johns Hopkins.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES

Additions

Brother Norbert Brockman, Constitutional Theories of the American Bar Association. Catholic University.

Ida M. Chiaraviglio, The Contribution of the State of Georgia to the Development of the Concept of Federalism. Emory.

Marcus H. Evans, Jr., The Negro, the Courts and Equal Protection of the Laws. Duke.

Robert K. Faulkner, The Constitutional Understanding of John Marshall. Chicago.

Lawrence E. Green, The Development of Military Due Process by the U. S. Court of Military Appeals. Stanford.

Richard C. C. Kim, Jehovah's Witnesses and the Supreme Court. Oklahoma.

George R. LaNoue, Church and State Compromises in Contemporary Education. Yale.

Brother E. Adrian Leonard, Mr. Justice Roberts and the Constitutional Revolution of 1947. Notre Dame.

Orma Linford, The Mormons and the Law. Wisconsin.

Clifford M. Lytle, The Warren Court and Its Critics. Pittsburgh.

Leonard G. Miller, Double Jeopardy in the Federal System. Chicago.

Robert Mollan, The Federal Loyalty-Security Program—The Eisenhower Years. Minnesota.

John A. Morgan, Jr., The Concept of Congressional Intent in Decisions of the Warren Court. Duke.

Lawrence Parkus, Franklin D. Roosevelt's Appointments to the District and Circuit Courts. Cornell.

Denny E. Pilant, No Preferred Status: An Examination of the Supreme Court's "No Preference" Interpretation of the First Amendment. Duke.

Leon I. Salomon, The Solicitor General of the United States. Columbia.

Michael D. Shmidman, Judicial Definition and Determination of "Religion" and "Religious Activity"—A Case Study of Selected State Court Decisions, in the Past Decade. Columbia.

Donald F. Vance, The Supreme Court and Religious Liberty: The Development of a Judicial Definition of Religion by the Supreme Court of the United States. Indiana.

Changes

John Quincy Adams, The Protection of Civil Rights in Texas. Texas.

Harry M. Clor, Justice Frankfurter and the Nature of Constitutional Government. Chicago.

Maria J. Falco, Accusatorial versus Inquisitorial

- Methods of Judicial Procedure. Bryn Mawr.
 Robert E. Newton, Conceptions of Judicial Self-Restraint in the Opinions of Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter. Catholic University.
 Eugene C. Price, Administrative Practices of the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission. California (Berkeley).
 Otis H. Stephens, The Fourteenth Amendment and Confessions of Guilt: Role of the Supreme Court. Johns Hopkins.

AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Additions

- James M. Banovetz, Governmental Cost Burdens and Service Benefits in Metropolitan Areas. Minnesota.
 John Buechner, The Michigan Constitutional Convention of 1961-62 and Local Government: A Case Study. Michigan.
 Carl P. Chelf, Politics and Education: A Case Study of Western Kentucky State College and Its First President. Nebraska.
 Mary M. Conway, Constituency Influences and Legislative Voting Behavior in the Indiana General Assembly. Indiana.
 Beverly B. Cook, Political Organization and Ideology in a Non-Partisan City: A Case Study of Claremont, California. Claremont.
 Robert E. Doubleday, The Politics of the 1947 Constitutional Revision in New Jersey. New York University.
 Alvin Dozeman, The Modern Role of the North Carolina Republican Party. Duke.
 Donald C. Flesche, The Illinois School Problems Commission: Its Role in the State Decision Making Processes. Washington (St. Louis).
 Arthur Galub, The Politics of Court Reform in New York State. Columbia.
 Millard L. Gieske, The Politics of Knute Nelson, 1912-1920. Minnesota.
 Leonard E. Goodall, The Response of Municipalities to State Regulation of Local Indebtedness: A Study in the Avoidance of State Law. Illinois.
 Joah Gotwals, Study of the Decisions of the Urban Traffic and Transportation Board, 1953-55. Pennsylvania.
 J. David Greenstone, Working Class Politics: The Organization, Tactics and Ideology of Labor's Committee on Political Education. Chicago.
 George C. Little, The Role of an Interim Committee in The State Legislative System: The New York Wiretap Committee. New York University.
 Judson L. James, The Politics of Party Leadership: The Inter-relationships of Democratic State and County Party Organizations in New York State, 1955-1958. Columbia.

- David T. Livingston, Factors Associated with Expenditure Patterns among Suburban Governments. Pennsylvania.
 David W. McCoy, The Conflict in Purpose of Political Patronage. Chicago.
 Donald J. McWherter, The Politics of Education: A Case Study, Columbia, Missouri. Missouri.
 Charles G. Mayo, The 1961 Mayoralty Election in Los Angeles: The Political Party in a Non-partisan Election. Southern California.
 Alexander V. Prisley, A Study of the 1961-62 Rhode Island General Assembly. Brown.
 Morley Segal, The Political Career of James Rolph, Jr., 1912-1933. Claremont.
 Clarence Stone, Community Power Elite and the Role of the City Manager. Duke.
 Tandy Tollerson III, Absentee Voting in Missouri, Missouri.
 Joseph B. Tucker, A Functional Analysis of Political Patronage in Nine Illinois Counties. Illinois.
 Thomas M. Watts, Indiana Primary Elections: The Selection of County Candidates and the Distribution of Power. Indiana.
 T. Phillip Wolf, Comparative Party Organization: California 1962. Stanford.
 Michael J. Zavacky, A Comparative Study of Structure and Process in the Juvenile Court System of Pennsylvania. Pittsburgh.

Changes

- Ronald C. Cease, The Alaska Borough System: Plan and Promise. Claremont.
 Shirley Chapman, The Dynamics of Federalism: Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Reflected in Metropolitan Atlanta 1945-1960. Emory.
 James B. Hobbs, The Impact of Selected Supreme Court Decisions in Kansas City, Missouri. Missouri.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Additions

- David E. Haight, "Sharing of Functions" in Canadian Federalism. Chicago.
 Gad Horowitz, Labour in Politics: The Case of Canada. Harvard.
 Allan Kornberg, Some Differences in Role Perceptions between Ontario and Quebec Provincial Legislators. Michigan.
 Walter L. White, The Treasury Board in Canada. Michigan.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Additions

- Maurice Apstein, The Role of the Government Laboratory in Defense. American.
 John F. Aronne, Managing the Airspace: A Study

- of Air Traffic Control. New York University.
- Aljit M. Banerjee*, Recruitment and Training of All-India Central Service Personnel. New York University.
- Ali-Reza Besharat*, Political and Administrative Decentralization. Southern California.
- Edward C. Bishop*, Efficient Administration Through Delegation of Authority in a Federal Field Office. New York University.
- William B. Boise*, The Use of Formal Negative Sanctions in Securing Employee Conformity in a Public Bureaucracy. Pennsylvania.
- Herbert S. Duncombe*, Administrative Discretion in the Administration of Public Assistance. Washington (Seattle).
- John P. Eberle*, Scheduling, Control, and Reporting for Processing a Major Census. American.
- Margaret Feiler*, The Austrian Civil Service from 1933-1945: The Influence of Political and Constitutional Changes on the Structure of Bureaucracy. New York University.
- Max B. Franc*, The Critical Incident Technique and Follow-up Study of Public Administration Students. New York University.
- Abram F. Goldman*, The County Board of Equalization in California: An Administrative Study of its Action. Southern California.
- Charles J. Green*, The Federal Older Worker Program. American.
- Chester G. Hall, Jr.*, The United States Civil Service Commission: An Arm of the President or of Congress? American.
- W. Joseph Heffernan, Jr.*, Public Assistance as a Government Function: A Case Study of Professional and Official Attitudes. North Carolina.
- Mel Huden*, Factors Affecting the Mobility of Public Employees. Southern California.
- Allen A. Hyman*, Significant Aspects of the Growth and Potential of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO. Pennsylvania.
- Walter Langway*, Employment Security in Sweden. New York University.
- Edward F. Marek*, The Office of the Comptroller of the City of New York. New York University.
- Alexandre M. Mattos*, Standards and Patterns of Administrative Reorganization in the U. S. 1945-55. Southern California.
- Joseph Mehr*, The Implications of Quantitative Analysis to Administration and Management. New York University.
- A. Warren Meixner*, The Public Authority as a Governmental Technique in New Jersey: A Case Study of the Development and Operation of the N. J. Turnpike Authority and the N. J. Highway Authority. New York University.
- Mohammad A. Niaz*, Strategy of Change. Southern California.
- Modestus W. Notoatmodjo*, The Concept of Gotong Rojong in Modern Indonesia. Indiana.
- Margaret Oslund*, Elements of Organized Behavior: A Study of Delegation. Southern California.
- Donovan Perkins*, Determination of Physicians' Attitudes Pertaining to Home Care Programs. Southern California.
- George M. Platt*, Agriculture and Administration in Mexico and Pakistan. Syracuse.
- John W. Ramsey*, Impact of the Bureau of the Budget on Policy Formation, 1946-49. Missouri.
- Chung-Hyun Ro*, A Comparative Analysis of Manpower Administration in Developing Countries. New York University.
- Robert L. Rosholt*, Organizing the United States Civilian Space Effort: A Study of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, with Special Emphasis on Structural Change and Program Coordination. Minnesota.
- William Sachau*, Samuel Leask, Jr.: A Study in Administrative Behavior. Southern California.
- Eleanor A. Schwab*, Transportation in the Metropolitan Area: A Case Study of the Illinois-Missouri Bi-State Development Agency. New York University.
- Elinor A. Scott*, The Administrative State Revisited. California (Los Angeles).
- Robert H. Simmons*, Washington State Government: The Plural Executive. Washington (Seattle).
- Abraham A. Stern*, Supervisory Concepts and Practices in Representative Voluntary and Public School Welfare Agencies in New York City. New York University.
- Isadore S. Sussna*, Land Use and Zoning in Staten Island. New York University.
- Leland Swanson*, Real Time System for Law Enforcement in Los Angeles County. Southern California.
- Donald T. Wells*, The Administration of Small Watersheds: The Tributary Development Program of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Alabama.
- Marvin M. Wofsey*, Management of Automatic Data Processing Systems. American.
- Buchari Zainun*, Toward the Achievement of Administrative Efficiency through the Development Program of Bureaucratic Machinery of Indonesian Government. Indiana.

Changes

- Todd R. La Porte*, Research Management: Objectives, Roles, and Administration in an Industrial Research Organization. Stanford.
- Iskandar B. Shalhoub*, The Administration of Public Administration Technical Assistance in Lebanon. Syracuse.
- Gilbert B. Siegal*, The Central Executive Staff

Agency in the Federal Republic of Brazil: A Study of the Administrative and Political Significance of the Development of the Departamento Administrativo do Serviço Público. Pittsburgh.

Deletions

Daniel D. Daniels, Promotion of Officers in the United States Navy from 1947 to Present. American.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Additions

Ali Ahmed AbdelKader, A Secular Definition of Arab Nationalism. Indiana.

Fuad S. Abu-Zayyad, The United Arab Republic—A Case Study in Arab Unity. Fletcher School.

Will Adams, Capital Punishment as an Instrument of Soviet Social Control. Columbia.

Reginald Bartholomew, The Politics of the Notable: The French Modérés since the War. Chicago.

Sergio Barzanti, The Economic Impact of European Integration and Particularly of the European Economic Community, upon Certain Underdeveloped Areas in Italy, Southwest France and Other Members of the Community. New York University.

Edward Baum, Foundations and Formulation of United States Foreign Policy towards Africa since World War II. California (Los Angeles).

Herbert M. Berk, Persia and the European State System: From Unilateralism to Reciprocity in Persian Diplomacy in the Nineteenth Century. Columbia.

Edwin R. Black, Canadian Concepts of Federalism. Duke.

Paul Brass, Party Politics in Uttar Pradesh. Chicago.

Charles P. Butler, Political Controls in the Military Forces of the USSR. Johns Hopkins.

John R. Cartwright, Canadian Pressure Groups. Toronto.

Edwin T. Chapman, The Problem of Housing in Latin America. Harvard.

Soo Bock Choi, A Critical Inquiry into the Political Power System of Korea, 1876-1905. Maryland.

William Y. Chuko, Concepts of Regionalism in Southeast Asia. New York University.

Ernest J. Goodman, The Role of the Military in Israeli Politics. Nebraska.

Norma L. Corigliano, Peaceful Coexistence and Panch Sheel: The Dynamics of Soviet-Indian Relations 1956-1961. Indiana.

Rebecca Grajower, Revolutions in Underdeveloped Areas. Yale.

Donald Cregier, Lloyd George and the Decline of the British Liberal Party. Clark.

Joseph A. Curtis, The New Crime of "Social Dis-solution." Utah.

John DeLuca, Political Biography of Palmiro Togliatti. California (Los Angeles).

Roderick B. Dugliss, The Church of England as a Pressure Group in Contemporary Politics: the Effectiveness of Establishment. Duke.

Robert L. Eckelberry, Proportional Representation and Swedish Government and Politics. Nebraska.

Edgar S. Efrat, The Adaptation of Federalism to West and Central Africa. Texas.

Ahmed H. El-Afandi, The Role of Parliamentary Groups in the French Fourth Republic. Missouri.

Francine Frankel, Second Level Leadership of the Indian National Congress. Chicago.

Anthony Fusaro, The Australian Senate: Politics in a Federal Second Chamber. Penn State.

George H. Gadbois, Jr., Judicial Review and the Supreme Court of India: 1950-1962. Duke.

Charles G. Gati, Laszlo Nemeth and the Ideology of Hungarian Populism. Indiana.

Jerome M. Gilson, The Bolshevik Image of the Future Communist Society, 1902-1962. Columbia.

Philip Gillette, Political Study of Agricultural Procurement in USSR, 1930-1962. Harvard.

R. William Gilmore, The Decline of Continental Socialism: A Study of the Social Democratic Party of Germany in the Post World War II Period. Pittsburgh.

James Gould, Freie Deutsche Jugend: A Study of a Soviet-Type Youth Organization. Indiana.

Thomas H. Green, Contemporary French Communist Party. Cornell.

H. Gaylon Greenhill, The Norwegian Agrarian Party: A Case Study of a Single Interest Party. Illinois.

Philip N. Hablutzel, The Nuremberg Trial and Its Effect on Law in the Federal Republic of Germany. Chicago.

John P. Haithcox, M. N. Roy and the Radical Democratic Party in India. California (Berkeley).

Soeleiman Amir Hamzah, An Analysis of the Managerial Problems Facing the Central Government in Implementing the Principles of Pantjasila in Indonesia. Indiana.

Frederick A. Hargadon, Soviet Political Thought, 1953-1961: The Theory of the Party. Cornell.

Mikio Higa, The Role of Bureaucracy in Contemporary Japanese Politics. California (Berkeley).

Joseph Jiang, Political Change and Pariah Entrepreneurship. Indiana.

Robert E. Johnston, Interest Articulation in a

- Developing Country: Case Study of Agricultural Policy Making in Sierra Leone. California (Los Angeles).
- Robert L. Johnston, The Prime Ministership of Sir Anthony Eden (April 1955 to January 1957): A Study of the Man and the Office. California (Berkeley).
- Stanley A. Kochanek, The Organization of Power in the Indian National Congress: A Non-Western Experience. Pennsylvania.
- Roman Kolkowicz, The Political Role of the Military Establishment in the Soviet Union. Chicago.
- Louis Kushnick, Secularization of the British Labor Party. Yale.
- Arend Lijphart, West New Guinea as an Issue in Dutch Domestic Politics. Yale.
- Michael F. Lofchie, Pluralism and Political Conflict in the Tanganyika African National Union. California (Berkeley).
- Irving L. Markovitz, Ideology, Opposition, and Consensus Formation in Developing Areas. California (Berkeley).
- Marvin Markowitz, The Political Role of Catholic and Protestant Missions in the Belgian Congo (1908-1960). Columbia.
- John D. Martz, III, Acción Democrática and an Emergent People. North Carolina.
- Orville D. Menard, The Role of the Military in French Politics. Nebraska.
- Norman N. Miller, Second and Third Generation Political Elites in East Africa. Indiana.
- Andrew J. Milnor, Saskatchewan Politics, 1929-1948. Duke.
- Thawatt Mokarapong, The June Revolution of 1932 in Thailand: A Study in Political Behavior. Indiana.
- William J. Moore, Ideology and Economic Development in China and Japan. Claremont.
- Frank J. Moreno, Elements of Political Power in Post-Peron Argentina. New York University.
- Frank Myers, The "Ban-the-Bomb" Campaign in Britain: Its History and Political Impact. Columbia.
- Baldev Raj Nayar, Contemporary Political Leadership in the Punjab. Chicago.
- Wilbur Nelson, Relations of Private Schools to National Objectives in the Republic of China. Claremont.
- Joseph Nye, Political and Economic Integration in East Africa. Harvard.
- Harold Pashkofsky, The Nationalities Problem of Yugoslavia. New School.
- René Peritz, The Evolving Politics of Singapore—A Study of Contemporary Trends and Issues. Pennsylvania.
- Thomas Porter, Political Role of the Mexican Labor Unions. Harvard.
- Thomas Remeikis, An Analysis of the Communist Party in Lithuania. Illinois.
- Randall B. Ripley, The Politics of Focus: The Roles and Relation of Congress, the Executive, the Universities and the Foundation in American Aid to India. Harvard.
- Ramashray Roy, A Case Study of the Bihar Pradesh Congress Committee, Bihar, India. California (Berkeley).
- William Safran, The "Krankerkasse" in the German Federal Republic. Columbia.
- John S. Saloma, British Conservatism and the Welfare State: An Analysis of the Policy-Process in the British Conservative Party. Harvard.
- Lawrence Scheinman, The Formulation and Administration of French Atomic Energy Policy. Michigan.
- Frederick F. Schindeler, The United Farmers of Ontario. Toronto.
- George Schwab, Recent Referenda in Switzerland on Armament Issues. Columbia.
- Robert S. Sharlet, E. B. Pashukanis and the Politics of Soviet Law, 1918-1937. Indiana.
- John Shenis, Provincial and Local Administration in Cyprus in Comparative and Historical Perspective. New York University.
- Kasem Sirisumpundh, Emergence of the Modern National State in Burma and Thailand. Wisconsin.
- Ilie Smultea, Romania between Two World Wars—Politically, Economically, and Socially. California (Berkeley).
- Peter G. Snow, The Radical Parties of Argentina and Chile: A Comparison. Virginia.
- Margaret Sodarberg, The Politics of Catholic Youth: A Comparative Study. Washington (St. Louis).
- Samuel Speck, Political Development of an Urban African Community. Harvard.
- Hugh W. Stephens, Social Mobilization and Political Development in Tanganyika. Yale.
- Philip D. Stewart, Oblast Government under Khrushchev. Indiana.
- Walter E. Stewart, The Evolution of the British Guiana Constitution. Columbia.
- Richard R. Strout, The Recruitment of Parliamentary Candidates by the Liberal Party in Contemporary Britain: A Study of the Selection Process and the Social Background of Liberal Candidates. North Carolina.
- Newell M. Stultz, The Growth of the National Party in the South African Electorate, 1938-1948. Boston University.
- James D. Thomas, Role of the Courts in India in Natural Resources Planning. Claremont.
- Soji Tomikawa, The Japanese Procurement Agency. Syracuse.
- Arpad J. von Lazar, Decompression in Total-

- itarian Control: Limits and Problems. North Carolina.
- Howard K. Walker, The Great Debate in the Gold Coast—1954–57: A Study of the Range of Political Consensus on Selected Issues between the National Liberation Movement and the Convention Peoples Party. Boston University.
- Harold D. Weaver, Soviet Cultural and Academic Relations with Africa. New York University.
- James Wolfe, German Reunification. Maryland.
- Brian Weinstein, Building the Gabonese Nation: The Search for a New Order and the Importance of the Fang Tribe in This Process. Harvard.
- Donna C. Wonnacott, Steeling the Cadres of the Chinese Communist Party—A Study of the "Movement to Transfer Cadres Downward." Columbia.
- Michael D. Wormser, Political Parties and Representation in the European Parliamentary Assembly of the European Economic Community. Pittsburgh.
- Freeman J. Wright, The Chilean Experiment with Parliamentary Government. Johns Hopkins.

Changes

- Wilfried Braje, The Foreign Policy of the German Social Democratic Party, 1949–57. Clark University.
- John C. Donnell, Conflicting Conceptions of Political Authority and Citizenship in the Republic of Vietnam. California (Berkeley).
- Gantcho G. Gavrilloff, The British Prime Minister as Leader in Parliament, 1930–1950. Missouri.
- Charles H. Kunsman, Jr., The Origins and Development of Political Parties in the British West Indies. California (Berkeley).
- John D. May, Party Prowess: The Case of Bolshevism. California (Berkeley).
- Tran H. Phat, Development of Vietnamese Nationalism up to 1954. Harvard.
- Phyllis J. Rolnick, The Relationship of Political Ideology to Social Structure in India. Cornell.
- Thomas L. Alexander, The Projection and Impact of the American Cultural Image by the Information Center Service (United States Information Agency) on West German Public Opinion. American.
- Yonah Alexander, The Recruitment, Conditions of Service and Activities of the United Nations Technical Assistance Expert. Columbia.
- Hayward R. Alker, Jr., Dimensions of Voting in the United Nations. Yale.
- Tai Sung An, Communist China and Peaceful Co-existence: An Analysis of Communist China's Foreign Policy. Pennsylvania.
- Salvatore Arcilesti, United States Policy in Iran, 1954–1960. Virginia.
- Michael Armacost, Long-Range Missiles: A Study of Weapons Innovation in the Cold War. Columbia.
- Joseph Barrat, The Relations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to the United Nations. New York University.
- Goberdhan Bhagat, America's Early Relations with India. Yale.
- Joseph B. Board, The State and Travel: A Study in the Development of Travel as an Instrument of State Policy. Indiana.
- George Brown, The Role of the Military Elite in Foreign Policy Decision-Making. Claremont.
- Janet W. Brown, Burmese Foreign Policy as Revealed through the United Nations. American.
- Seyom Brown, A Supranational Nuclear Deterrent System. Chicago.
- Bernard Browne, The Democratic Party and Foreign Policy 1953–58. Notre Dame.
- Duncan H. Cameron, The Importance to the United States of Its Control of the Panama Canal. Columbia.
- David E. Carmack, Law in French Diplomacy from the Treaty of Westphalia to the French Revolution (1648–1789). Virginia.
- M. E. Chacko, The Charter of the United Nations and the Concept of the Big Powers. New York University.
- Stephen Chin-Shan Chen, America's Non-Recognition Policy toward Chinese Governments: A Historical-Political Analysis, Applied to the Peiping Regime. Southern Illinois.
- Li Tze Chung, International Criminal Jurisdiction. New School.
- Carl Clement, The Atomic Weapons Debate in Sweden. Minnesota.
- Hashim Ahmed Dabbas, The Problems and Prospects of Arab Unity since 1945. Missouri.
- Norma DeCandido, Technical Assistance in Public Administration in Latin America. Columbia.
- Naginder Singh Dhillon, India's Views on the Right of Self-Determination. New York University.
- James E. Dornan, Jr., The Origins of the Na-

- Changes
- Deletions
- Peter Alevra, Sir Winston Churchill and the British Constitution. Texas.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION POLITICS AND LAW

Additions

- Yasushi Akashi, The Formation of Japanese Policy toward the United Nations. Columbia.
- Kwaku Mensa Akude, The United Nations Public Administration Training Program in Africa, South of the Sahara. New York University.
- Manuel S. Aldana, International Responsibility of States—New Trends. Minnesota.

- tional Interest: The Founding Fathers and the Security-Dilemma in Early American Foreign Policy. Johns Hopkins.
- Patrick T. Dougherty, Catholic Opinion and United States Recognition Policy. Missouri.
- Raga S. Elim, Theory and Practice of Neutralism. American.
- Carl P. Epstein, United States Policy of Nuclear Control 1953-1960. American.
- Alvin R. Field, Anglo-Nepalese Relations 1767-1804. American.
- Michael P. Gehlen, The Ideological Determinants of Foreign Policy under Khrushchev. Texas.
- Theodore B. Giuttari, The Effect of Executive Determinations in the American Courts in Cases Involving Issues of International Law. Columbia.
- Leo N. Goche, Moscow and the Austrian Communist Party during the Allied Occupation, 1945-1955. American.
- Necdet Goze, Modernism and Traditionalism in the Ottoman Empire 1790-1918. American.
- Michael Haas, Some Societal Correlates of International Political Behavior. Stanford.
- Jamal Haddad, Diplomatic Relations of the United States and Persia: 1856-1906. New York University.
- Paul A. Hamori, Soviet Influences on the Establishment and Maintenance of the Hungarian Government, 1945-56. Michigan.
- John H. Hedley, Public and Elite Attitudes and Performance in the Formulation of American China Policy during 1948. Missouri.
- Donald L. Herman, The Comintern in Mexico, 1919-43. Michigan.
- Kenneth L. Hill, India's Foreign Policy in Relation to Tension Areas: A Study in Non-Alignment. New York University.
- Choong-Shick Hong, Politics of Economic Regionalism: A Comparative Study of United Nations Regional Economic Commissions. New York University.
- Richard Hughes, Soviet Foreign Policy and Germany, 1945-1948. Claremont.
- Lloyd Jensen, The Disarmament Negotiations: A Study in American-Soviet Behavior. Michigan.
- Harold S. Johnson, The Plebiscite as an Internationally Recognized Means for Self-Determination. Michigan.
- Wynfred Joshua, French Attitudes towards NATO. Pittsburgh.
- Ernest Katin, The Continental Shelf, with Special Reference to Action Taken by the United Nations Conferences on the Law of the Sea. Minnesota.
- Young Whan Kihl, A Study of Functionalism in International Organization: With Special Reference to the Formation of Supranational Political Communities. New York University.
- Benedict S. Kim, The United States and SEATO. Yale.
- Kyung-Won Kim, Wars of the French Revolution and Napoleon: A Study in the Political Dynamics on Modern War. Harvard.
- Ray B. Knapp, The Communicative Aspects of Strategic Diplomacy in the Nuclear Age. Southern California.
- Youngnok Koo, The Dissenters and the United Nations: The Political Meaning of the Bricker Amendment. Michigan.
- Soon-won Lee, The Korean-Japanese Discord, 1945-1961: A Case Study of International Conflict. Rutgers.
- Howard M. Lentner, The Political Role of the United Nations Secretariat. Syracuse.
- Joseph P. Lia, Britain and European Integration since the Messina Conference. California (Berkeley).
- John P. Lovell, The Professional Socialization of the West Pointer. Wisconsin.
- Donald L. McQueen, Nationalism in Uzbekistan. American.
- Ahmed A. Majid, Development of International Law by the General Assembly. New York University.
- Ismail Makled, Comparative International Behavior in the Suez Crisis. Pittsburgh.
- Gerhard Mally, Austria and Europe: The Foreign Policy of the Second Republic and European Integration (1955-1962). Pennsylvania.
- Pritam T. Merani, International Law Concerning Territorial Disputes with Emphasis on Post World War II Period. Johns Hopkins.
- Kusma Lata Mittal, India's Attitude and Policy Towards the Problem of Human Rights in the United Nations. Toronto.
- Yasin T. Mughir, The Arab States, The Arab League, and the United Nations. Yale.
- Mumulla V. R. Naidu, The United Nations (Collective) Force and the Role of the Non-permanent Members with Special Reference to the Role of India. Minnesota.
- Henry T. Nash, United States Government Attitudes Towards Disarmament: A Case Study of Group Conflict in Government. New York University.
- Stephanie Neuman, Patterns of Elite Development in Indonesia. New York University.
- Robert L. Pfaltzgraff, Jr., Great Britain and the European Economic Community: A Study of British Expectations and Transactions. Pennsylvania.
- Ronald S. Pugsley, Congressional Critics of Foreign Aid: An Analysis of the Congressional Opposition to Foreign Economic Assistance, 1947-60. Michigan.
- Mohy I. Quandhour, A Diplomatic Political History of the Caucasus, 1830-1864. Claremont.

- Amir Rafat*, Nationalization of the Private Property of Aliens in Recent International Law (Iran, Indonesia, Egypt, Cuba). Minneapolis.
- Andrew C. Remson*, The Restoration of Relations with Soviet Russia, 1918-1922. Columbia.
- Arthur H. Rice*, The United States Cooperation with EURATCM. American.
- C. N. Satyapalan*, Sino-Indian Relations 1954 to Present. Pennsylvania.
- Seymour Scheinberg*, The Role of Bhutan in Sino-Indian Relations. Claremont.
- Brent Scowcroft*, Ideology and Foreign Aid: An Analysis of Congressional Reaction to the Foreign Aid Programs to Spain and Yugoslavia. Columbia.
- Valerie H. Shinavar*, The Neutralist Bloc in the United Nations. Iowa.
- Maung Hla Shwe*, The Participation of the United States in the 1932-1934 Geneva Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Arms. American.
- Sheldon Simon*, Foreign Policies and International Organization: An Interlevel Analysis Focusing on Reciprocal Influences and Typologies of Political Maturation. Minnesota.
- William Spencer*, The Mosul Question in International Relations. American.
- Stanley Stein*, German-Polish Diplomatic Relations between Munich Conference and the Fourth Partition of Poland. American.
- Il Ro Suh*, National Judges in International Tribunals. Nebraska.
- David Surralgar*, The Law Governing Economic Development Agreements. Columbia.
- Keyvan Tabari*, Iranian-American Relations as Viewed from Iran, 1940-1960. Columbia.
- Cedric W. Tarr*, Graduated Deterrence: The Use of Nuclear Weapons in Limited War. Southern California.
- A. Paul Theil*, The Singhalese-Tamil Culture Contact: The British Period. Claremont.
- William B. Thomas*, Antecedents of the Security Council as Factors in Its Development in the United Nations. New York University.
- Robert J. Weber*, United States Non-Governmental Organizations in the Political Action Field: Their Purpose since World War II to Increase the Sources, Scope and/or Institutions of Public International Law. American.
- Larman C. Wilson*, The Principle of Non-Intervention in Inter-American Relations. Maryland.
- William Zimmerman, IV*, Contemporary Soviet Perspectives on International Relations Theory. Columbia.

Changes

- Franklin C. Balch*, Diplomatic Relations and Assistance to Spain after the Second World War. Fletcher School.
- Martin T. Kyre*, United States Army Civil Affairs Policy: An Attempt to Discover Its Predictable Ingredients. Washington (Seattle).
- Janet E. Ragatz*, Motivations Behind Australian, Japanese and American Assistance to Southeast Asia. Ohio State.
- James P. Sewell*, An Evaluation of the Functional Approach to International Organization, with Emphasis on United Nations Programs Financing Economic Development.
- Saul N. Silverman*, Bolshevik Theories of International Relations before 1917. Yale.
- Ernest Stern*, The Economic Development of Turkey: 1948-60. Fletcher School.
- Barbara B. Stevens*, Quasi-Military Groups and International Relations. Yale.
- Frank E. Trout*, The Moroccan Frontier in the Sahara: A Study in Political Geography. Yale.

Deletions

- Brent Allinson*, The Teaching of History for International Understanding. Chicago.
- Jay V. Groves*, American Consular Representation in Southeast Arabia, 1880-1924. Michigan.
- Bonifacio Salamanca*, The Beginnings of Philippine-American Affinity. Yale.

II. DISSERTATIONS COMPLETED SINCE THE LAST LISTING

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY, THEORY AND METHODOLOGY

- Tatsuo Arima*; B.A., Harvard, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Failure of Freedom: An Intellectual Portrait of Taisho Japan. Harvard.
- Eldon G. Bowman*; A.B., Claremont, 1954; M.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Patrick Henry's Political Philosophy. Claremont.
- George Carey*; A.B., Northwestern, 1955; M.A., Illinois, 1958; Ph.D., Indiana, 1961. The Principle of Political Equality in Theories of Democratic Government. Indiana.
- D. Raymond Cloutier*; A.B., Bates College, 1949; M.P.A., Michigan, 1951; Ph.D., Alabama, 1961. The Political Philosophy of Sir Ernest Barker. Alabama.
- Miriam B. Conant*; A.B., Bryn Mawr, 1951; M.I.A., Columbia, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Political and Social Ideas of Morelly, with Emphasis on Early Imitators and Recent Critics. Columbia.
- JeDon A. Emenhiser*; B.A., University of Red-

- lands, 1955; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1962. Armed Politics: An Analysis and Comparison of Six Cases. Minnesota.
- Wayne Francis; A.B., Wabash, 1957; M.A., Indiana, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Interaction and Influence in the Indiana General Assembly. Indiana.
- William L. Hathaway; B.A., University of Kansas City, 1941; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1962. Interest in Politics: Measured by Readership of News About Politics in a Metropolitan Daily Newspaper, 1950-1959. Minnesota.
- Charles Jacob; A.B., Michigan, 1953; M.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., Cornell, 1961. The Political Ideas of Elihu Root. Cornell.
- Kenneth Janda; A.B., Illinois State Normal, 1957; M.A., Indiana, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Representative-Constituency Relationships: Constructing and Empirically Verifying a Behavioral Theory. Indiana.
- Hwa Yol Jung; A.B., Emory, 1957; A.M., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., Florida, 1962. God, Man and Politics: The Political Philosophy of Jacques Maritain. Florida.
- Edward N. MacConomy; B.A., William and Mary, 1938; M.A., Maryland, 1943; A.M.L.S., Michigan, 1951. Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Political Thought of William Temple, Archbishop of York, 1929-1942, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1942-1944. Michigan.
- Roger D. Masters; A.B., Harvard, 1955; A.M., Chicago, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Political Right and the Art of Politics in Rousseau's Thought. Chicago.
- Mary S. Power; A.B., Wells College, 1957; M.S., Stanford, 1960; Ph.D., Illinois, 1961. Vernon Louis Parrington and J. Allen Smith: An American Political Tradition. Illinois.
- Wilfrid E. Rumble, Jr.; B.A., Minnesota, 1953; M.A., ibid., 1956; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1961. The Foundations of American Legal Realism. Johns Hopkins.
- Charles E. Schutz; A.M., Chicago, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Development and Significance of the Political Thought of Walter Lippmann. Chicago.
- George A. Shanker; B.A., Northeastern, 1941; M.A., Colorado, 1947; Ph.D., New School, 1962. The Political Thought of Daniel Webster. New School.
- John E. Tashjean; A.B., College of St. Thomas, 1951; M.A., Georgetown, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Franz Borkenau: A Study of His Social and Political Ideas. Georgetown.
- Michael Walzer; B.A., Brandeis, 1956; Ph.D., Harvard, 1961. The Revolution of the Saints. Harvard.
- Edward R. Wright, Jr.; B.A., Emory, 1952; M.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., Duke, 1961. The Social and Political Thought of William Temple. Duke.
- Victor Zitta; B.A., Western Ontario, 1953; M.A., Michigan, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. George Lukacs: A Study in the Genesis and the Nature of His Marxist Outlook and Communist Involvement. Michigan.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES

- James E. Anderson; B.S., Southwest Texas State College, 1955; Ph.D., Texas, 1960. The Emergence of the Modern Regulatory State: A Study of American Ideas on the Regulation of Economic Enterprise, 1885-1917. Texas.
- Douglas L. Bailey; A.B., Colgate, 1954; A.M., Fletcher School, 1957; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Federalism and United States Foreign Affairs. Fletcher School.
- John P. Bradley; B.A., Wesleyan, 1950; M.A., Washington, Seattle, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Party Platforms and Party Performance: Social Security, 1920-1960. Washington (Seattle).
- Rulon L. Bradley; A.B., Brigham Young, 1947; M.S., Utah, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Use of the Mass Media in the 1960 Election. Utah.
- Demetrios Caraley; A.B., Columbia, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Politics of Military Unification, 1943-1947. A Study in Political Conflict. Columbia.
- Walker F. Connor; A.B., University of Massachusetts, 1951; M.A., Georgetown, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Foreign Aid and the National Interest: The Objectives of America's Program of Aid to Underdeveloped Countries. Georgetown.
- James W. Davis; B.A., Valley City State Teachers College, 1941; M.A., Minnesota, 1945; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Presidential Primary, 1928-1960. Minnesota.
- Martha Derthick; B.A. Hiram, 1954; M.A., Radcliffe, 1956; Ph.D., Harvard, 1962. Citizen Soldier on Capital Hill: The Political Life of the National Guard. Harvard.
- Harry S. Hall; A.B., Harvard, 1943; A.M., Chicago, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Congressional Attitudes toward Science and Scientists: A Study of Legislative Reactions to Atomic Energy and the Political Participation of Scientists. Chicago.
- Herbert Hamilton; A.B., Ball State, 1930; M.A., ibid., 1934; J.D., Indiana, 1947; LL.M., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. A Study of Land Use Regulations by Municipal Corporations for Aesthetic Purposes. Indiana.
- Edward Handler; B.A., Harvard, 1942; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Two Worlds of John Adams. Harvard.

- Howard K. Hyde; A.M., Chicago, 1935; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Business Management in Defense. Chicago.
- Erwin A. Jaffe; B.A., Rutgers, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Passage of the McCarran-Walter Act: The Reiteration of American Immigration Policy. Rutgers.
- Robert L. Keighton; B.A., Swarthmore, 1953; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Executive Privilege and the Congressional Right to Know: A Study of the Investigatory Powers of Congressional Committees. Pennsylvania.
- Frank J. Kendrick; A.B., Grinnell College, 1950; A.M., Chicago, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. McCarthy and the Senate. Chicago.
- Martin Lease; A.B., Indiana, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. William Howard Taft and the Powers of the President. Indiana.
- Kenneth Marcus; A.B., Michigan, 1952; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., Illinois, 1962. The National Government and the Natural Gas Industry 1946-56: A Study in the Making of a National Policy. Illinois.
- John K. Moriarty; A.B., Birmingham-Southern College, 1941; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1962. Democracy and American Military Strategy: A Biography of the American Society and its Approach to the Making of War. Georgetown.
- Allan D. Nelson; A.B., Chicago, 1952; A.M., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Political Implications of Modern Public Opinion Research. Chicago.
- Charles A. Raith; A.B., Pennsylvania, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Anti-UN Coalition before the Senate and House Foreign Affairs Committees during the Years 1945-1955. Pennsylvania.
- Joseph K. Roberts, Jr.; A.B., Princeton, 1953; Ph.D., Columbia, 1961. The Politics of Emergency: The Oil Lift, 1956-57. Columbia.
- Robert F. Sasseen; A.B., Notre Dame, 1957; A.M., Chicago, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Political Science and the Problem of Party Reform: A Critical Analysis of Contemporary Political Science. Chicago.
- Jack M. Schick; A.B., Augustana College, 1957; A.M., Chicago, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Limits of War: A Study of Politics and the Polaris. Chicago.
- Bradbury Seasholes; A.B., Oberlin, 1955; M.A., North Carolina, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Negro Political Participation in Two North Carolina Cities. North Carolina.
- Donald A. Strickland; A.B., Reed College, 1956; A.M., Chicago, 1957; J.D., ibid., 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Governmental Interaction with Four Marginal Political Groups. Chicago.
- Henry Teune; A.B., Central, 1957; M.A., Illinois, 1958; Ph.D., Indiana, 1961. Indiana Legislative Candidates' Attitudes towards Interest Groups. Indiana.
- CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES
- Duncan Baird; B.A., Yale, 1939; LL.B., Michigan, 1942; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1962. Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Minnesota: Analysis and Reform Proposals. Minnesota.
- James Bolner; B.S., Louisiana State, 1958; M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Virginia, 1962. Chief Justice Vinson: A Study of His Politics and His Constitutional Law. Virginia.
- Ruth McVey Bosma; A.B., Bryn Mawr, 1952; M.A., Radcliffe, 1954; Ph.D., Cornell, 1961. International Communist Colonial Policy and the Development of Indonesian Communism. Cornell.
- Walter D. Burnham; B.A., Johns Hopkins, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Harvard, 1961. Activism, Self-Restraint and the Warren Court: A Judicial Dilemma of Means and Ends. Harvard.
- Richard C. Cortner; B.A., Oklahoma, 1956; M.A., Johns Hopkins, 1958; Ph.D., Wisconsin, 1961. The Wagner Act Cases. Wisconsin.
- C. Peter Magrath; A.B., University of New Hampshire, 1955; Ph.D., Cornell, 1961. The Supreme Court under Morrison R. Waite. Cornell.
- Joseph R. Morice; A.B., LaSalle, 1947; M. Litt., Pittsburgh, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Justice Stephen J. Field and the Fourteenth Amendment: A Re-Evaluation. Pittsburgh.
- Jay A. Sigler; B.A., Rutgers (Newark), 1954; LL.B., ibid., 1957; M.A., Rutgers, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Double Jeopardy: The Development of a Legal and Social Policy. Rutgers.
- Israel Stolper; Adj. A., Harvard, 1945; M.A., Boston University, 1947; LL.B., Northeastern, 1955; Ph.D., Harvard, 1962. First Amendment Freedoms (1812-1962) Applicable As a Restriction upon the States by Way of the Fourteenth Amendment.
- AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS
- Gelachen Abdi; B.A., University College of Addis Ababa, 1957; M.P.A. Syracuse, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. African Nationalism: The Role of Political Parties in African Nationalism with Special Reference to Its Implications in Ghana. Syracuse.
- Curtis B. Akenson; B.Sc., Minnesota, 1942; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Selected Facets of Community Influence on Political Power in the Redevelopment of the Minneapolis Lower Loop. Minnesota.
- Dee A. Akers; A.B., Kentucky, 1948; LL.B., ibid.,

- 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Administrative Rule-making Authority in Kentucky. Kentucky.
- Raymond V. Anderson; B.S., Moorhead State College, 1946; M.A., Minnesota, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Operation of the Initiative, Referendum and Recall in North Dakota. Minnesota.
- Alexander Cloner; A.B., California (Berkeley) 1942; M.S., Southern California, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Legislative Compensation in California: An Appraisal of Alternative Salary Criteria. Southern California.
- Bernice M. Deutrich; A.B., George Washington, 1951; M.A., American, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Southeastern Wisconsin's Four Largest Cities—Their Budget and Related Financial Practices. American.
- Carl DeVane; A.B., Shaw, 1936; M.A., Atlanta, 1937; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1962. Government Budget Administration: A Problem Study with Special Reference to the City of Philadelphia. Pennsylvania.
- Alfred E. Diamond; B.S., U. S. Military Academy, 1937; M.A., Ohio State, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Establishment of a State Governmental Structure for Civil Defense: A Problem in Intergovernmental Relations. Ohio State.
- Rowland E. Dietz; A.B., Swarthmore, 1942; M.A., Columbia, 1946; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Amateurs in Politics. Columbia.
- Robert Drake; A.B., Ohio Wesleyan, 1953; M.A., Indiana, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Role of the Council in a Strong-Mayor Council. Indiana.
- Thomas R. Dye; A.B., Pennsylvania State, 1957; M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1962. Certain Political Correlates of the Areal Differentiation and Stratification of Sub-population in a Metropolitan Area. Pennsylvania.
- Robbins L. Gates; A.B., Washington & Lee, 1948; M.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Making of Massive Resistance: Virginia's Politics of Public School Desegregation, 1954-56. Columbia.
- Kan Ori; A.B., Taylor, 1956; M.A., Indiana, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Basic Ideas in Federal-State Relations: The Indiana "Revolt" of 1951. Indiana.
- Myles M. Platt; Ph.B., Detroit, 1949; A.M., Wayne State, 1952; Ph.D., Michigan, 1962. The Detroit Metropolitan Airport: A Case Study in Bureaucratic Power, Leadership, and Frustration. Michigan.
- Henry J. Pratt; A.B., Dartmouth, 1956; M.P.A., Michigan, 1958; Ph.D., Columbia, 1962. The Protestant Council of the City of New York as a Political Interest Group. Columbia.
- George Roberts; B.S., Purdue, 1953; M.A., Indiana, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Democratic Party of Indiana, 1952-58. Indiana.
- William C. Thomas, Jr.; B.S., Utah, 1942; M.S., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., Columbia, 1962. The Politics of Bureaucracy: Ninety-one New York City Bureau Chiefs. Columbia.
- Lewis P. Welch; B.A., Bowdoin, 1954; M.P.A., Syracuse, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. County Reorganization in Upstate New York. Syracuse.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- James K. Spicer; B.A., Toronto, 1956; Diplôme de l'Institut d'Études Politiques, 1958; Ph.D., Toronto, 1962. External Aid in Canadian Foreign Policy. Toronto.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

- Amin Alimard; B.A., American University, Beirut, 1956; M.A., ibid., 1957; D.P.A., California (Los Angeles), 1961. A Study of the University Bureaus of Public Administration. Southern California.
- Dong Suh Bark; LL.B., Seoul National University, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1956; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1962. Public Personnel Administration in Korea: A Mixed Heritage in Contemporary Practice. Minnesota.
- Karim L. Darwish; M.P.A., New York University, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Bureaucracy and Social Change in Modern Egypt. New York University.
- Warren Donnelly; B.S., Queens College, 1942; M.P.A., New York University, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Government Operations for Nuclear Energy in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. New York University.
- James J. Finley; B.S., American, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Postage Stamp Program of the United States Government: Administrative Aspects. American.
- Gerald D. Fitzgerald; B.A., Brooklyn College, 1945; M.P.A., City College of New York, 1956; Ph.D., New York University, 1961. Wage and Position Classification Administration in Selected American Jurisdictions. New York University.
- Robert French; B.A., New York State College (Teachers), 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; M.P.A., New York University, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Organization and Administration of a Public Employee Training Program. New York University.
- Allen Z. Gammage; B.A., Texas, 1938; M.A., ibid., 1945; Ph.D., ibid., 1959. The California Highway Patrol: A Study in Administration. Texas.
- Theodore F. Gaultschi; B.S., California, 1944; M.S., Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1957; D.P.A., Southern California, 1961. An Investi-

- gation of the Management of Research and Development Projects. Southern California.
- Harry A. Green; B.S., Middle Tennessee State College, 1957; M.S., Florida State University, 1958; Ph.D., Colorado, 1962. A Study of National Housing Organization. Colorado.
- Howard B. Gundy; B.A., Syracuse, 1939; M.S.S., Buffalo, 1948; D.P.A., Syracuse, 1961. Grants-in-Aid for Public Assistance and New York State-Federal Relationships. Syracuse.
- James J. Heaphey; A.B., Western Reserve, 1957; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Theoretical Aspects of CAPAC and ICP Case Studies. California (Berkeley).
- Nguyen Thi Hue; B.S., Columbia, 1958; M.P.A., Michigan, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Training for Community Development: A Comparative Study of National Programs in Ghana, India, and the Philippines. Michigan.
- Sun Kil Kim; A.B., Stetson, 1958; M.A., American, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Congressional Authorization of Public Debt Transaction as a Means of Backdoor Financing. American.
- Avelino Lim; B.A., University of the Philippines, 1953; L.L.B., ibid., 1955; M.P.S., ibid., 1955; D.P.A., Syracuse, 1961. The Setting of Philippine Fiscal Administration. Syracuse.
- Leonard Lund; B.S., E. Stroudsburg Teachers College, 1951; M.A., New York University, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Forty Years of Failure: The Commuter Problems in the New York Area. New York University.
- Conrad L. McBride; B.S., Utah State Agricultural College, 1947; M.A., Vanderbilt, 1949; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1962. Federal-State Relations in the Development of the Water Resources of the Colorado River Basin. California (Los Angeles).
- Omega R. McQuown; A.B., Kentucky, 1942; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Florida, 1961. From National Agency to Regional Institution: A Study of TVA in the Political Process. Florida.
- Murray Nesbitt; B.A., New York University, 1948; LL.B., ibid., 1950; M.P.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Civil Service Merit System and Collective Bargaining. New York University.
- Chung H. Oh; B.S., Florida Southern College, 1955; M.A., Southern Illinois University, 1956; Ph.D., New York University, 1961. The Civil Service of the Republic of Korea. New York University.
- Chong Mo Pak; B.A., Huron College, 1953; M.A., Wisconsin, 1955; D.P.A., Southern California, 1961. The Dynamics of Governmental Reorganization. Southern California.
- Vishwambher A. Pai Panandiker; A.B., Poona, 1955; M.A., Bombay, 1957; LL.B., ibid., 1958; M.P.A., Michigan, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Personnel Administration in the Union Government of India. Michigan.
- Harold Pellish; B.A., Brooklyn College, 1941; Ph.D., New York University, 1962. Regulation of Insurance by the State of New York. New York University.
- Ben Posner; B.S., Arizona; M.A., George Washington; Ph.D., American, 1962. Major Budgetary and Programming Problems of the United States Information Agency in its Operation of Overseas Missions. American.
- Raymond L. Randall; A.B., George Washington, 1941; M.S., Syracuse, 1947; Ph.D., American, 1962. An Analysis of Intensive Short-term Executive Development Programs for Government Officials. American.
- John C. Ries; B.A., Santa Clara University, 1951; M.A., Detroit, 1953; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1962. Unification of the Armed Services: An Administrative Analysis of Recent Trends in United States Defense Organization. California (Los Angeles).
- Chung-Hyun Ro; LL.B., Korea University, 1955; M.P.A., New York University, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. A Comparative Analysis of Manpower Administration in Developing Countries. New York University.
- Winslow Rouse; A. B., California (Los Angeles), 1947; M.S.W., ibid., (Berkeley), 1949; Ph.D., Claremont, 1961. The Problem of Adult Correction: A Case Study of Penal Administration in California. Claremont.
- Harry R. Seymour; A.B., Hamilton, 1950; M.A., Syracuse, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. National-State Employment Security Programs in the United States: Issues in Policy and Administration. Syracuse.
- John Sullivan; B.S., Southern California, 1956; D.P.A., ibid., 1961. The Electric Computer: A Challenge to Organization in Public Administration. Southern California.
- Kasim Suwangul; B.A., Chulalongkorn University (Thailand), 1952; M.P.A., New York University, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Civil Service of Thailand. New York University.
- Liela I. Takla; LL.B., Cairo University (Egypt), 1949; M.S. W., Southern California, 1954; Ph.D., New York University, 1962. A Study of the Aid to Dependent Children Program and Delinquency Among its Recipients. New York University.
- Clarence E. Thurber; A.B., Stanford, 1943; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Problems of Training Americans for Service Abroad in United States Government Technical Cooperation Programs. Stanford.
- Leandro Viloria; A.B., Far Eastern University 1951; M.P.A., University of the Philippines, 1955; D.P.A., Syracuse, 1962. U. S. Technical Assistance in Public Administration in the Philippines: Establishing a Management Program. Syracuse.

Eugene Walton; B.A., Washington, 1952; M.S., Boston, 1957; D.P.A., Southern California, 1962. A Magnetic Theory of Organizational Communication. Southern California.

Andrew J. Wann; A.B., Drury (Springfield, Missouri), 1940; Ph.D., Missouri, 1961. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Administrative Organization of the Executive Branch. Missouri.

David Welborn; B.A., Texas, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Certification of Motor Common Carriers of Property: A Study in National Regulatory Administration. Texas.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

John H. Badgley; A.B., Montana, 1952; M.A., Johns Hopkins, 1957; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1962. Progress and Polity in Burma. California (Berkeley).

Allen B. Ballard, Jr.; B.A., Kenyon, 1955; M.A., Reg. Studies, Harvard, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The State Farm System of the USSR. Harvard.

Arifin Bey; Diploma, Tokyo International Institute, 1945; M.A., New School, 1957; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1962. A Dialogue in Search of Consensus: The Roots of the Indonesian Political Conduct, 1949-1959. Georgetown.

Father George L. Bissonnette; A.B., Assumption College, 1944; M.A., Fordham, 1952; Ph.D., Columbia, 1962. Pufendorf and the Church Reforms of Peter the Great. Columbia.

Peter J. Boyce; B.A., Western Australia, 1957; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., Duke, 1962. Australian Relations with the Federation of Malaya and the State of Singapore, 1941-1961. Duke.

James M. Clark; B.A., Michigan, 1952; M.A., University of the Philippines, 1955; Ph.D., Michigan, 1962. Teachers and Politics: A Pressure Group Study of the Federation de l'Education Nationale. Michigan.

Alfred B. Clubok; B.A., Michigan, 1953; M.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Political Party Organization and Activities in Rural Japan. Michigan.

Robert H. Dix; B.A., Harvard, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Colombia: A Two-Party System in Crisis. Harvard.

Herbert Feith; A.B., Melbourne University, 1951; M.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., Cornell, 1961. Indonesian Politics 1949-1957: The Decline of Representative Government. Cornell.

Charles C. Frost; A.B., Tufts, 1951; A.M., Fletcher School, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Economic Development of Communist China's Machine-Building Industry: A Case Study in the Application of Soviet Development Doctrine to a Labor-Surplus Economy. Fletcher School.

William J. Hanna; B.A., California (Los Angeles), 1957; M.A., ibid., 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Operational Code of the Soviet Political Elite in the United Nations Security Council. California (Los Angeles).

Eli Kaminsky; B.A., Harvard, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. An Anti-Subversive Program in the French Public Service: The Epuration Administrative of 1944-1953. Harvard.

Wilbert A. Klerruu; B.A., London, 1958; M.A., California (Los Angeles), 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Nile Waters Question: Political Aspects of the Utilization of the Nile Waters. California (Los Angeles).

John P. LeDonne; B.S., Columbia, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. From Gubernia to Oblast: Soviet Territorial-Administrative Reform, 1917-1923. Columbia.

Chong-Sik Lee; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1956; M.A., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1961. The Korean Nationalist Movement, 1904-1945. California (Berkeley).

Oliver M. Lee; B.A., Harvard, 1951; M.A., Chicago, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. An Analysis of Communist China's Diplomacy towards the Non-Communist World, 1949-1956. Chicago.

Victor T. LeVine; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1953; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Cameroons from Mandate to Independence. California (Los Angeles).

John W. Lewis; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1953; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Leadership Techniques in the Chinese Communist Party. California (Los Angeles).

Arsa Meksawan; LL.B., Thammasat, 1950; M.A., Indiana, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Role of the Provincial Governor in Thailand. Indiana.

Leila Meo; A.B., American University, Cairo, 1947; M.A., Syracuse, 1949; Ph.D., Indiana, 1961. The Separation of Lebanon from Greater Syria: A Case Study in Lebanese Politics. Indiana.

Frank O. Miller; A.B., Ohio State, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1943; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1961. Minobe Tatsukichi: Interpreter of Constitutionalism in Japan. California (Berkeley).

Henry W. Mott; A.B., Colgate, 1955; M.A., Columbia, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Cabinet Promotion—An Analysis of the Social and Political Backgrounds of British Cabinet Members, 1924-1961. Columbia.

Belden H. Paulson; A.B., Oberlin, 1950; A.M., Chicago, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Revolution in the Villages of South Italy. Chicago.

Robert L. Peterson; B.A., Iowa State, 1958; M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Pennsylvania State, 1962.

- Social Structure and the Political Process in Central America. Pennsylvania State.
- George L. Rueckert; B.A., Wisconsin, 1955; M.A., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Parliamentary Party Cohesion in the West German Bundestag. Wisconsin.
- Joseph I. Salameh; A.B., American University, Beirut, 1947; M.A., Chicago, 1950; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1962. Lebanon at the United Nations: A Case Study. Georgetown.
- Josef Silverstein; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1952; Ph.D., Cornell, 1960. The Union of Burma's Struggle for National Unity. Cornell.
- Baljit Singh; A.B., Agra University, 1950; M.A., Aligarh University, 1953; Ph.D., Maryland, 1961. The Political Process and National Politics in India. Maryland.
- Emil Starr; B.A., Tufts, 1946; Ph.D., Chicago, 1962. The British Labour Party and the Soviet Union, 1939-1949. Chicago.
- David L. Sudhalter; A.B., Massachusetts, 1949; M.A., Boston University, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Political and Psychological Indoctrination of School Children in the U.S.S.R. Boston University.
- Thomas P. Trombetas; Diploma, Athens (School of Law), 1950; M.P.A., Washington (Seattle), 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Problem of Political Change in Greece and Turkey, 1945-1960. Washington (Seattle).
- Donald W. Urquidi; A.B., California, 1950; A.M., Columbia, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Origins of the Italian Communist Party, 1918-1921. Columbia.
- Frederic Wurzburg; B.S., Columbia, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Politics of the Bloc National. Columbia.
- George T. Yu; A.B., California (Berkeley), 1951; M.A., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Party Movement in Republican China: The Kuomintang 1912-1924. California (Berkeley).
- Lawrence Ziring; B.S., Columbia, 1955; M.I.A., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Failure of Democracy in Pakistan: East Pakistan and the Central Government, 1947-1958. Columbia.
- Aristide R. Zolberg; A.B., Columbia, 1953; A.M., Boston University, 1956; Ph.D., Chicago, 1961. One-Party Government in the Ivory Coast. Chicago.
- INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION
POLITICS AND LAW
- Stanley V. Anderson; A.B., California (Berkeley), 1949; LL.B., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Nordic Council: An Institutional Analysis. California (Berkeley).
- Anne Armstrong; A.B., New Jersey State Teachers College, 1944; M.A., Columbia, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Unconditional Surrender. Columbia.
- Norman A. Bailey; A.B., Oberlin, 1953; M.I.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Inter-American Peace and Security System for Dealing with Threats to the Peace and Breaches of the Peace, 1948-1959. Columbia.
- Sylvan M. Berman; A.B., Michigan, 1947; M.A., American, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Hitler: A Study of Ideology and "Real Politik" in German-Soviet Relations, 1938-1941. American.
- Krishnaprasad G. Bhansali; Diploma, Visva-Bharati University, 1950; Ph.D., American, 1962. India's Role in the Settlement of the Ind-China Conflict, 1947-1958. American.
- Gertrude C. Boland; B.A., Mt. St. Mary's College, Los Angeles, 1936; B.S., Georgetown, 1949; M.A., Catholic University, 1950; Ph.D., Claremont, 1961. India and the United Nations: India's Role in the General Assembly, 1947-1957. Claremont.
- David Brook; A.B., Johns Hopkins, 1954; M.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The United Nations and Arab-Israel Armistice System, 1949-1959. Columbia.
- Tao Cheng; M.A., Temple, 1951; Ph.D., Columbia, 1961. The Treatment of Aliens and British Commercial Treaties. Columbia.
- Suchati Chuthasmit; B.L., Thammasat, 1951; M. Econ. Hons., ibid., 1954; A.M., Syracuse, 1958; A.M., Fletcher School, 1959; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Experience of the United States and Its Allies in Controlling Trade with the Red Bloc. Fletcher School.
- Walter C. Clemens, Jr.; A.B., Notre Dame, 1955; M.A., Columbia, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Origins of the Soviet Campaign for Disarmament: The Soviet Position on Peace, Security, and Revolution at the Genoa, Moscow and Lausanne Conferences, 1922-23. Columbia.
- Herbert Corkran; A.B., Johns Hopkins, 1945; M.A., ibid., 1946; Ph.D., Indiana, 1961. Changing Patterns of International Organization in the Caribbean. Indiana.
- William M. David, Jr.; A.B., Dartmouth, 1941; M.A., Columbia, 1942; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Development of United States Policy toward the Baltic States, 1917-1922. Columbia.
- Mohamed M. El-Behairy; B. Com., Cairo University, 1953; M.A., Minnesota, 1955; Ph.D., Ohio State, 1961. The Suez Canal in World Politics, 1945-1961. Ohio State.
- Oli Y. El-Khalil; A.B., American (Beirut), 1955; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., American, 1962. The Socialist Parties in Syria and Lebanon. American.
- Oleh S. Fedyshyn; A.B., Brooklyn, 1953; M.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. German Plans and Policies in the Ukraine and Crimea, 1917-1918. Columbia.

- Robert L. Friedheim*; A.B., Columbia, 1955; M.A., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., Washington (Seattle), 1962. The Politics of the Sea: A Study of Law-Making by Conference. Washington, (Seattle).
- William W. Fry*; A.B., Minnesota, 1941; M.A., California, 1946; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1962. Communist United Front Strategy and Tactics: Origins and Some Recent Applications. Georgetown.
- Mohamed Hosny Gaber*; Certificate of License of Teaching Al-Azhor University, Egypt, 1948; M.A., Maryland, 1958; Ph.D., American 1962. The Early Islamic State with Special Reference to the Evolution of the Principles of Islamic International Law, 632-750 A.D. American.
- Arthur N. Gilbert*; A.B., Rhode Island, 1958; A.M., Fletcher School, 1959; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1960. Ph.D., Fletcher School, 1962. International Cooperation and the Election of 1924. Fletcher School.
- Walter Goldstein*; B. Sc., University of London, 1955; A.M., Northwestern, 1956; Ph.D., Chicago, 1961. The Labour Party and the Middle East Crisis, 1956. Chicago.
- Robert W. Hattery*; Ph.B., Chicago, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Impact of Racial and Ethnic Discrimination on American Foreign Relations. Chicago.
- Kalevi J. Holsti*; A.B., Stanford, 1956; A.M., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Origins of Finnish Foreign Policy, from 1918-22. Rudolf Holsti's Role in the Formulation of Policy. Stanford.
- Gordon Joiner*; A.B., Howard College, 1954; Ph.D., Indiana, 1961. The World Court and the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes. Indiana.
- Amos A. Jordan, Jr.*; B.S., U. S. Military Academy, 1946; M.A., University of Oxford, 1955; Ph.D., Columbia, 1961. Foreign Aid and Defense: U. S. Military and Related Economic Assistance to Southeast Asia. Columbia.
- Sungjook Jun*; B.A., Korea University, 1953; M.A., Tennessee, 1957; Ph.D., Illinois, 1961. Politics of the Veto in the Security Council of the United Nations. Illinois.
- Tae Jing Kahng*; A.B., Kent State, 1955; M.A., Columbia, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Handling by the Security Council of Legal Questions Involved in International Disputes and Situations. Columbia.
- Niazul Hag Khan*; B.A., University of Allahabad, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1950; L.L.B., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Virginia, 1962. The Alabama Arbitration. Virginia.
- Habeeb A. Khayat*; B.S., Xavier University, 1954; Ph.D., American, 1961. Waqf in Israel. American.
- George B. Lane, Jr.*; B.A., Trinity, 1951; Ph.D., American, 1962. The Role of John Barrett in the Development of the Pan American Union. American.
- Ernest D. Lehman*; B.A., Notre Dame, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., Chicago, 1961. The Attitudes of Selected Business Groups toward American Foreign Economic Policy, 1945-1955. Chicago.
- Robert W. Macdonald*; A.B., Clark University, 1948; M.A., Brown University, 1951; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1962. The League of Arab States, 1945-1960. A Case Study in the Dynamics of Regional Organization. Georgetown.
- Seigen Miyasato*; B.A., Muskingum College, 1955; M.A., Western Reserve, 1958; Ph.D., Ohio State, 1961. American Foreign Policy toward South Asian Neutralism, 1947-1957. Ohio State.
- Raymond A. Moore, Jr.*; A.B., New School for Social Research, 1951; M.A., Columbia, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Foreign Policy Image of Aneurin Bevan. Columbia.
- William T. Nichols*; B.A., Virginia, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Development of Foreign Investment Protection in the League of Nations and the United Nations. Virginia.
- Harry J. Psomiades*; A.B., Boston University, 1953; M.I.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Greek-Turkish Relations, 1923-30: A Study in the Politics of Rapprochement. Columbia.
- Robert H. Puckett*; A.B., DePauw University, 1957; A.M., Chicago, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. International Control and Limitation of Space Activities: The American National Interest. Chicago.
- Young J. Rew*; B.A., State College, Washington, 1956; M.A., George Washington, 1959; Ph.D., American, 1962. A Study of the Governor-General of Korea: 1919-1937. American.
- George W. Rice*; B.A., Ohio Wesleyan, 1951; M.A., Ohio State, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Soviet Position on Dependent Territories in the United Nations. Ohio State.
- Raymond S. Rodgers*; A.B., Sir Williams College, 1957; M.I.A., Columbia, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Facilitation Problems of International Associations. Columbia.
- Gabriella E. Rosner*; A.B., Vassar 1954; M.I.A., Columbia, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The United Nations Emergency Fund. Columbia.
- John C. Satra*; Jur. D., Charles University (Prague), 1948; Ph.D., Florida, 1961. The Fate of Jean Monnet's Concept of European Integration in the Light of Cross Pressures on the European Coal and Steel Community. Florida.

- George Stambuk*; University of Zagreb; M.A., Indiana, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. American Military Forces Abroad: A Postwar Pattern in International Relations. Indiana.
- Leonard S. Stein*; A.M., Chicago, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. Consistency of Public Opinion on Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- Edward S. Su*; LL.B., National Anwei University, 1944; B.A., Fresno State, 1950; M.A., Illinois, 1951; M.S., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., Fordham, 1962. Sino-Russian Relations in Sinkiang: A Comparison of International Relationships Outside and Inside the Communist System. Fordham.
- Usha Roy Sud*; A.B., University of Allahabad, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Michigan, 1962. The General Assembly and Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter: A Study in Constitutional Interpretation, 1943-59. Michigan.
- Hung Chao Tai*; B.A., National Taiwan University, 1954; M.A., Illinois, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. United Nations Membership Problems. Illinois.
- Brady Tyson*; B.A., Rice Institute, 1949; B.D., Perkins School of Theology, 1949-1952; Ph.D., American, 1962. Herbert Butterfield's Concept of International Relations: An Analysis and Comparison of a Christian Approach. American.
- William R. Vizzard, Jr.*; B.S., San Francisco, 1949; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Prisoner of War Policy in Relation to Changing Concepts of War. California (Berkeley).
- Miner L. Weems*; A.B., Washington, 1954; M.A., Georgetown, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1962. The Propaganda Struggle in the Middle East 1955-1958: A Comparative Study of the Role of Propaganda as a Legitimate Tool of Government in the Cold War. Georgetown.
- Gordon L. Weil*; A.B., Bowdoin, 1958; Ph.D., Columbia, 1962. The European Convention on Human Rights: Background, Development and Prospects. Columbia.
- Ann R. Willner*; B.A., Hunter College, 1945; M.A., Yale, 1946; Ph.D., Chicago, 1961. From Rice-Field to Factory: The Industrialization of a Rural Labor Force in Java. Chicago.
- Andrez J. Wojcik*; A.B., Georgetown, 1953; M.A., Columbia, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. Attitudes of Certain Western Public Communication Media toward the Polish Frontier Issues, 1939-40. Columbia.
- Gregory B. Wolfe*; A.B., Reed, 1943; A.M., Fletcher School, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. The Montevideo Conference of 1933; Reactions of the North and South American Press to the Foreign Policy of the U. S. Fletcher School.
- Manaspas Xuto*; B.A., Hons., Chulalongkorn, 1956; A.M., Fletcher School, 1957; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1961. United States Policy toward Formosa, 1850-1955. Fletcher School.

NEWS AND NOTES

With this number, Victor T. Le Vine of Washington University (St. Louis) becomes Acting Book Review Editor, vice Thomas H. Eliot, who resigned upon becoming Chancellor of Washington University. Professor Le Vine will act until Professor Austin Ranney is able to assume the post, in the spring of 1963.—MAN. ED.

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The New York State Political Science Association held its sixteenth annual meeting April 13-14 on the campus of Union College, Schenectady, New York. The general theme of the conference was "The Political Implications of Nuclear Energy." Lt. Gen. F. W. Farrell, Director, New York State Civil Defense Commission, discussed "Civil Defense Problems" and Samuel S. Stratton, Representative from the 32d District, New York, spoke on "Our Nuclear Defense Policy." In addition, there were panel discussions on "Civil or Uncivil Defense" and "Arms Control—The International Issues."

President William R. Willoughby chaired the business meeting of the conference, which elected the following new officers: Channing B. Richardson, Hamilton, president; Herbert Rosenbaum, Hofstra, vice-president; James A. Riedel, Union College, secretary-treasurer; and members of the executive council, Sterling Spero, New York University; Carolyn Landau, Dutchess Community College; Seldon Kruger, Agricultural and Technical Institute, Delhi, State University of New York.

The 1962 annual meeting of the Iowa Conference of political scientists was held at Grinnell College, Grinnell, Iowa, on April 7, 1962. The sessions were directed mainly at the study of Iowa political parties and elections. The principal address was given by Louis Harris, president of Louis Harris and Associates, Inc., New York City, who spoke on: "Some Observations on the Contribution of Political Party Organization in American Politics." John R. Schmidhauser, associate professor of political science at the State University of Iowa, was elected president of the conference for 1962-63.

The Northern California political science association held its fourteenth annual meeting at the University of San Francisco on April 28. Panels discussed "The Role of the Electorate in Governmental Policy-Making" and "Approaches to Foreign Policy." Dean Leo A. Huard, University of Santa Clara Law School, addressed the meeting on the topic "Law and Order on the Space Frontier." The Presidential Citation Award for teaching, service to the profession, community service and research was given to Dean R. Cresap of San Jose State College. Officers elected for 1962-63 were: president, John H. Bunzel, Stanford University; vice-president, Paul R. Murray, Sacramento State College; secretary-treasurer, John M. Selig, City College of San Francisco. The following were elected to the council: Paul F. Ashby, San Francisco State College; Donald W. Brandon, University of San Francisco; Benjamin G. Franklin, Chico State College; Jack F. Leach, Monterey Peninsula College; Eugene C. Lee, University of California; Cheryl J. Petersen, Sonoma State College; and William W. Young, Fresno State College.

The new officers of the New England Political Science Association are: Sigmund Neumann, Wesleyan, president; Merle Fainsod, Harvard, vice-president; together with Ruth Schachter Morgenthau (BU African Studies), Elmer Cornwell (Brown) and Robert Dishman (New Hampshire) as members of the executive committee.

The Midwest conference of political scientists held its twentieth annual meeting April 26 to 28 at the University of Notre Dame. General sessions of the conference were addressed by Professor Leo Strauss on the functions of political theory and by president Charles S. Hyneman of the American Political Science Association on "Policing the Democratic Process."

Panel sessions featured papers and discussions on the following topics: "The Scope of Comparative Analysis," "The Role of the Suburbs in the Metropolis," "The Political Act as an Act of Will," "Foreign Policy and the Stationing of Military Forces Abroad," "Interparty Competition, Economic Variables, and Welfare Policies in the American States," "Mass Parties and National Integration in Africa," "Measuring Legislative Malapportionment," "The 'Unconscious' Political Implications of Institutional Procedures in Administration," "Judicial Attitudes in the Labor Relations Decisions of the Warren Court," "Albert Camus as a Political Philosopher," "Social Change and Election Politics in Israel," "The Role of the Judiciary in State Political Systems," "Foreign-Aid Programs and Parties: Problems for 1962," and "Constituency Influence in Congress."

President Richard C. Spencer chaired the business meeting of the conference, which elected the following new officers: E. Allen Helms, Ohio State University, president; Richard G. Browne, Illinois State Normal University, vice-president, and as members of the executive council, Louis C. Kesselman, University of Louisville and G. Theodore Mitau, Macalester College. Phillip Monypenny of the University of Illinois will be the new editor of the Midwest Journal of Political Science. Harry R. Davis of Beloit College was re-elected as secretary-treasurer.

The 1963 meeting will be held at the University of Chicago on April 25 to 27. The program chairman is Leon Epstein, University of Wisconsin.

The next annual meeting of the Conference on the History of Western America will be held at the Albany Hotel, Denver, Colorado, October 11-13, 1962, with the University of Denver as the host institution. Robert G. Athearn of the University of Colorado, is the program chairman and Allen D. Breck, of the University of Denver, is in charge of local arrangements. Papers will represent disciplines in social sciences, the humanities, and the sciences. A preliminary program will be available.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The Social Science Research Council's annual announcement describing fellowships and grants to be awarded in 1962-63 will be ready for distribution in early September. It will list the following programs which are to be continued without major changes: Research Training Fellowships, predoctoral and postdoctoral; Faculty Research Fellowships; Grants-in-Aid of Research; Fellowships in Political Theory and Legal Philosophy; Grants for Research on American Governmental and Legal Processes.

International Conference Travel Grants will again be offered to American social scientists for travel to certain meetings outside North America.

Under joint sponsorship with the American Council of Learned Societies, grants will be offered to mature scholars for research in the social sciences and humanities on certain foreign areas. Grants for research on Africa South of the Sahara, on Latin America, and on the Near and Middle East (including North Africa) will be administered by the Social Science Research Council; while those for Asian Studies and for Slavic and East European Studies will be administered by the American Council of Learned Societies, to which correspondence relating to the latter programs should be directed.

Inquiries and requests for the detailed announcement when issued may be addressed to the Social Science Research Council, Fellowships and Grants, 230 Park Avenue, New York 17, New York.

Applications for some categories of awards will be due not later than November 1.

An Inter-university Consortium for Political Research has been created by a group of cooperating universities and the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan to promote graduate research training and to facilitate basic research on politics. The Consortium was formally established during a two-day conference at Ann Arbor, Michigan, June 1 and 2. Representatives from some twenty departments of political science met with members of the staff of the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan and agreed upon a tentative mode of organization and a set of operating principles to guide the new organization during its first years of operation.

The Consortium represents an innovation in academic organization in the social sciences. Although it was not modelled on existing natural science counterparts, it shares with them the feature of being an association of institutions organized for cooperation around the more or less unique facilities of a research organization. The ultimate objective of the ICPR is to stimulate basic research on problems of politics and government. Advanced training in social science research methodology and in the methods and techniques of political analysis will be formally organized for faculty members as well as advanced graduate students from the participating schools. Research conferences devoted to the consideration of new problems in theory construction and data collection and interpretation in such areas as legislative behavior, judicial behavior and the historical analysis of aggregative data will be developed for participating faculty members.

Both the research and the training aspects of ICPR activity will be developed initially around the facilities of the University of Michigan Survey Research Center. One of the important goals of the organization is to increase access to the archival and instructional facilities of the Center and to enable the profession to make more efficient use of the data repository created at SRC through its research program in political behavior. The research materials already collected by SRC, including not only the data from six national election surveys but also election statistics, census materials and congressional roll call records, will be augmented by new data collections undertaken by Consortium participants and by the addition of other collections of data already in existence elsewhere.

The ICPR staff will also undertake to provide a clearing house facility for the individual participants. Communications among American researchers sharing common research interests and with foreign research scholars and their institutions abroad will be improved through a newsletter and other forms of current research reports. As with the research conferences, the clearing house activities will attempt to speed up the dissemination of new ideas and information among interested scholars, reduce inadvertent duplication of efforts and facilitate the pooling of intellectual resources committed to research in political science.

Each of the participating schools will be represented at an annual meeting of the Committee of Representatives. A five-man Council will be responsible for overseeing Consortium activities throughout the year. At the June meeting the Committee of Representatives elected James Prothro, University of North Carolina, as its chairman; the other four Council members, elected at the same time, are: David Easton, University of Chicago; Robert Lane, Yale University; Austin Ranney, University of Illinois; and William Riker, University of Rochester. The Consortium staff is headed by Warren E. Miller, Survey Research Center, as Executive Director and includes two other SRC staff members, Donald Stokes and Philip Converse, as Associate Directors. Membership in the ICPR is limited to the institutional participation of institutions of higher education; special provision for participation by persons not affiliated with a member institution may be made by the Council upon request by the individual. The current list of member institutions is Cornell University, The University of Chicago, University of Florida, Georgetown University, University of Illinois, State University of Iowa, The University of Kansas, The University of Michigan, Michigan State University, University of Minnesota, The University of North Carolina, Northwestern University, University of Oregon, Princeton University, The University of Rochester, University of California at Los Angeles, Vanderbilt University, Washington University, Wayne State University, The University of Wisconsin, and Yale University. Inquiries concerning membership or individual participation should be addressed to Warren E. Miller, Executive Director, ICPR, Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The United States Department of State and the Hoover Institution at Stanford University are publishing jointly A Catalog of Files and Microfilms of the German Foreign Ministry Archives, 1920-1945.

This Catalog, consisting of three volumes, will list for the period 1920 to 1945 all files from the political archives of the German Foreign Ministry that were seized by the American and British armies at the end of World War II. It will continue and complete the work of the Catalog of German Foreign Ministry Files and Microfilms, 1867-1920 which was published by the American Historical Association in 1959.

The Catalog will include the title, number, and date of all files contained in the archives, and the corresponding serial and frame numbers of those files that were microfilmed. It was compiled and prepared for printing by Dr. George O. Kent of the Historical Office of the Department of State, and its publication and distribution will be financed by the Hoover Institution. Volume I is scheduled to be published in the summer of 1962. The remaining volumes are scheduled to appear, respectively, late in 1962 and in 1963.

A major accomplishment in the flow of foreign scholarly and cultural publications to American libraries was hailed in the Library of Congress last May 23, with an informal meeting signaling the first receipt of some 200,000 items that have been purchased since January in India, Pakistan and the United Arab Republic, with the U. S.-owned foreign currencies under the new Library of Congress Public Law 480 program. Congressman John D. Dingell of Michigan sponsored the amendment, P. L. 85-931, that authorized this trade of food for thought, in aid of the acquisition of foreign publications for selected American research centers.

The Max Weber Centennial Commission has been established in order to mark the year 1964 as the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of the German social scientist by focusing attention on Weber's impact on the social sciences.

The Commission is designed to coordinate the efforts of cooperating institutions of higher learning and academic organizations by arranging visiting professorships, exchange lectureships, seminars, and institutes. It is intended that special attention will be given to social science problems in the areas of Weber's interests. The activities of the Commission will culminate in a symposium scheduled for April, 1964, in Kansas City.

Preliminary planning has been made possible by a grant from the Kansas City Association of Trusts and Foundations. Members of the steering committee are Jephtha Carrell, Community Studies, Inc.; Robert W. Habenstein, University of Missouri; Jerzy Hauptmann, Park College; Francis Heller, University of Kansas; Berndt Kolker, University of Kansas City; Warren A. Peterson, Community Studies, Inc.; Wayne Wheeler, University of Chicago. Hauptmann and Wheeler serve as co-chairmen. The Commission's headquarters are located at 716 Railway Exchange Building, 706 Grand Avenue, Kansas City 6, Missouri.

CHARLES S. ASCHER of Brooklyn College, during a summer of international meetings, chaired sessions of the conference of non-governmental organizations, of which he is president, in Geneva; of the section on administrative law of the congress of comparative law in Hamburg; and of the section on legal and economic problems at the international congress on housing and planning in Paris.

DOUGLAS E. ASHFORD will be visiting at the school for advanced international studies, Johns Hopkins University (Washington, D. C.), for the academic year 1962-63.

JOHN W. BAKER, chairman and professor, department of political science, College of Wooster, is on research leave for the 1962-63 school year. He will be a research associate at the University of California, Berkeley and will spend part of the spring semester in Nigeria and Ghana.

During 1962-63, ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI will be on research leave from Columbia, having received a Guggenheim grant.

VIOLET BUTLER has been appointed part-time temporary instructor for the academic year 1962-63 at Kent State University.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN has been elected as Miembro de Honor, Instituto de Estudios Políticos, Spain.

CARL Q. CHRISTOL, chairman of the department of political science at the University of Southern California, has been granted a year's leave of absence for the academic year 1962-63. During the year he will hold the Chair of International Law at the Naval War College, Newport, Rhode Island.

JAMES B. CHRISTOPH, Ohio State University, is in Britain for the 1962-63 academic year to study British politics on a grant from the Social Science Research Council.

ARCH T. DOTSON, associate professor of government at Cornell University, has been given a leave of absence to serve as director of the Ford Foundation Project to develop a city plan for Calcutta.

ELEANOR DULLES is joining the department of political science, Duke University, as a visiting professor for the fall semester, 1962.

RAYMOND ENGLISH, professor and chairman of the political science department, Kenyon College, will be on sabbatical leave, 1962-63. He has received a Lilly Fellowship from the Hazen foundation for research during his leave of absence.

WILLIAM T. R. FOX will be on research leave from Columbia during 1962-63.

WILLIAM R. GABLE of the institute of public administration and the department of political science of the University of Michigan is chief of party of an American contract team to assist in the establishment of an institute of public and business administration in Taiwan. The institute is being established by the Chinese government under contract with AID and the University of Michigan. Professor Gable will be in Taiwan for 18 months.

ELLIOT R. GOODMAN, associate professor, Brown University, has received a Guggenheim fellowship and a NATO research fellowship, and will be on a year's leave in Paris. Mr. Goodman's replacement for this coming academic year will be visiting associate professor LEONARD ROWE, who comes from Harvard.

JOHN GROOM, assistant professor of political science, will serve on the staff of the University of Redlands in Europe at Salzburg, Austria, for the year 1962-63.

BERTRAM M. GROSS has been on leave during 1961-62 at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences from the Maxwell School at Syracuse University. His leave has been extended to allow him to accept an appointment for the remainder of 1962 as Leatherbee lecturer on management at the Harvard graduate school of business administration.

JOHN H. HERZ, of the College of the City of New York, will serve as Visiting Lecturer on International Politics at the Fletcher School during the fall term of 1962-63.

ROBERT H. HUCKSHORN, assistant professor at the University of Idaho, is on leave as the 1962-63 Republican national committee faculty fellow. This award is co-sponsored by the National Center for Education in Politics.

SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON, of Columbia University, will be on research leave during 1962-63, occupying the Ford research professorship during the autumn term and serving as research associate in the institute of war and peace studies during the spring.

EDWARD G. JANOSIK, University of Pennsylvania, has received grant-in-aid from the Social Science Research Council for a study of factionalism in the relationships between constituency Labour parties and national Labor Party organs. He will be on sabbatical leave 1962-63.

PAUL KECSKEMETI has been appointed a Senior Fellow of the research institute on Communist affairs of Columbia University for the academic year 1962-63. He will also serve as a visiting professor in the department of public law and government of Columbia University.

WILLMOORE KENDALL has been appointed visiting professor of government at Los Angeles State College for the 1962-63 academic year.

HANS KOHN has joined the University of Denver faculty in September as a visiting professor of international relations.

MORTON KROLL of the University of Washington will be on leave next year to serve under a Smith-Mundt award as visiting professor of political science at the University College of the University of British West Indies.

WERNER LEVI, professor of political science at the University of Minnesota, will serve as visiting professor during 1962-63 at the University of Hawaii, where he will assist in the development of an international relations center.

WARNER E. MILLS, JR., associate professor of government at Beloit College, is on sabbatical leave during 1962-63 for study and research into political behavior in small cities.

O. WILLIAM PERLMUTTER, American Academic adviser of the institute of European studies, will serve as visiting professor of political science during 1962-63 at the University of Minnesota.

FRED W. RIGGS, professor of government at Indiana University, has accepted a scholarship in the institute of advanced projects at the East-West Center in the University of Hawaii for the academic year 1962-63, where he will work with several Asian scholars from southeast Asia on comparative studies of public administration in developing countries.

JOHN P. ROCHE, Morris Hillquit professor of labor and social thought, Brandeis University, will spend the year 1962-63 as visiting professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

CHARLES P. SCHLEICHER of the University of Oregon has received a Fulbright grant for 1962-63, and will do research and teach at Delhi University, India.

DEAN CATHERYN SECKLER-HUDSON of the school of government and public administration of the American University received the honorary degree of LHD from Ohio Wesleyan University on June 3, 1962. June of 1960, she received an LLD from Gettysburg College.

MULFORD Q. SIBLEY, professor of political science at the University of Minnesota, will serve as visiting professor during 1962-63 at Cornell University.

JOHN SPANIER was visiting professor of government at the University of Texas during the 1962-spring semester. He will be visiting professor of political science at Haverford College for the 1962-63 academic year.

JOHN G. STOEßINGER of Hunter College will serve again in 1962-63 as visiting associate professor of international relations at Columbia.

HIRAM M. STOUT of Duke University served as visiting professor in the department of political science for the spring semester, 1962.

WILLIAM L. STRAUSS, associate professor of political science, Arizona State College, has been appointed as a Fulbright lecturer at Seoul National University in Seoul, Korea for the academic year 1962-63.

HOWARD J. TAUBERFELD has received the appointment of Carnegie visiting research scholar for 1962-63 and will be on leave from the school of law, Southern Methodist University for that full year. His office will be at the Carnegie Endowment, U.N. Plaza at 46th Street, New York City.

THOMAS L. THORSON, assistant professor, has received the Kiekhof award for outstanding teaching at the University of Wisconsin. He will be on leave 1962-63 on a Guggenheim fellowship.

HANS B. THORELLI, University of Chicago, will be a visiting professor of business administration, international center for the advancement of management education, Stanford University, fall, 1962.

DAVID B. TRUMAN will be abroad on sabbatical leave during the winter term of 1962-63. Herbert A. Deane will serve as acting chairman of the department of public law and government, Columbia University.

PIO ULIASI has been appointed a senior fellow of the research institute on Communist affairs of Columbia University for the academic year 1962-63.

H. ODELL WALDBY, professor of government at Florida State University, is technical advisor to an American contract team to assist in the establishment of an Institute of Public and Business Administration in Taiwan.

CLINTON IVAN WINSLOW of the department of political science at Goucher College has been named professor emeritus as of September, 1962. Dr. Winslow has served in the department since 1923, and as its chairman for 32 years.

PAMELA WRINCH, who has been working on a research project at the Russian Research Center, Harvard University, has accepted the position of visiting assistant professor in the political science department, West Virginia University, 1962-63.

I. WILLIAM ZARTMAN of the department of international studies at the University of South Carolina has been granted a leave of absence for the year 1962-63 to accept a Rockefeller Foundation research grant for travel and research in West Africa.

ARISTIDE R. ZOLBERG, assistant professor at the University of Wisconsin, is directing the training program for Peace Corps members going to the Ivory Coast.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

HENRY J. ABRAHAM has been promoted to the rank of full professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

ALAN ALTSHULER, formerly of the University of Chicago, has been appointed an assistant professor of government at Cornell University.

JVAN AVAKUMOVIC has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science and international relations at the University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Canada.

HANS H. BAERWALD, formerly of Miami University, Ohio, has been appointed lecturer in political science at the University of California, Los Angeles.

RICHARD C. BAKER of Southern Illinois University, Alton Center, has been appointed as chairman of the department of political science of Rockford College, effective September, 1962.

SIDNEY BALDWIN, assistant director of the Inter-University Case Program, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the Baruch School of Business and Public Administration of the City College of the City University of New York.

CARL BECK has been promoted to the rank of associate professor, department of political science, University of Pittsburgh.

DANIEL M. BERMAN, formerly of Washington College, has been appointed associate professor in the faculty of the school of government and public administration of the American University.

JOSEPH L. BERND has been promoted to associate professor at Southern Methodist University.

JEROME J. BOLNER, who obtained his Ph.D. in June, 1962 at University of Virginia, has been appointed assistant professor of political science, University of Alabama.

FRANKLYN G. BONN, JR., receiving his Ph.D. at the University of Minnesota, has been appointed an assistant professor at University of Wisconsin for 1962-63.

BERNARD C. BORNING, chairman of political science at the University of Idaho, has been promoted to professor.

ELDON BOWMAN has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at the College of Wooster.

DONALD BRANDON has been promoted to associate professor in the department of political science at the University of San Francisco.

EDWARD H. BUEHRIG, chairman of the Ford Foundation Grant Committee, has been promoted to university professor at Indiana University, department of government.

RONALD F. BUNN, Texas, has been appointed lecturer at Indiana University, department of government.

FREDERIC S. BURIN, II, formerly of the Department of State, has been appointed associate professor in the faculty of the school of government and public administration of the American University.

LAWRENCE H. CHAMBERLAIN assumed the duties of vice president of Columbia University on April 1, 1962.

WARNER O. CHAPMAN, director of departmental undergraduate program, has been promoted to associate professor at Indiana University, department of government.

PATRICK J. CONKLIN, of the University of Tulsa, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Missouri.

JEROME I. COOPERMAN, formerly of Rutgers University, has been appointed an instructor in the department of political science at Goucher College.

RICHARD W. COTTAM, department of political science, University of Pittsburgh, has been promoted to the rank of associate professor.

RALPH CROW, American University of Beirut, has been appointed visiting associate professor at Indiana University, department of government.

ALEXANDER DALLIN has been named director of the Russian institute at Columbia.

JOHN A. DAVIS has been promoted to professor of political science at the City College of the City University of New York.

VERA MICHELES DEAN has been named professor of international development at New York University's Graduate School of Public Administration.

GUY H. DODGE is retiring from the chairmanship of the department of political science, Brown University, after having served for twelve years. He will continue in the department as a professor of political science. His successor, as of July 1, will be ELMER E. CORNWELL.

H. SYDNEY DUNCOMBE has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Idaho.

CHESTER B. EARLE has been promoted to the rank of professor in the faculty of the school of government and public administration of the American University.

WILLIAM EBENSTEIN, from Princeton has resigned to accept a position as professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara.

JACK D. EDWARDS, formerly of the University of Nevada, has been appointed assistant professor at the College of William and Mary.

ROWLAND A. EGGER, chairman of the departments of political science and foreign affairs, has been named Edward R. Stettinius professor of foreign affairs, University of Virginia.

E. U. ESSIEN-UDOM, who will teach the African course—Contemporary Africa and Its Background—at Brown University, comes from Harvard.

BLAIR EWING of the University of Chicago has become instructor in political science at Harpur College.

JAMES FARGANIS, presently a graduate student at Cornell University, has been appointed instructor in political science at Harpur College.

LEONARD J. FEIN, who completed his doctoral work this year at Michigan State University, has been appointed assistant professor in political science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

WERNER J. FELD has resigned from North Georgia College to become assistant professor of political science at Moorhead State College, Moorhead, Minn.

ALFRED P. FERNBACH has been promoted to professor of foreign affairs at the University of Virginia. During 1961-62, Mr. Fernbach has held a Fulbright appointment in India.

WALTER O. FILLEY has been promoted to the rank of professor at Harpur College.

DONALD C. FLESCHÉ of Washington University has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Kalamazoo College, Michigan.

HARRY J. FRIEDMAN has been appointed associate professor in the department of government and the East-West Center, University of Hawaii.

MURRAY FROST, formerly of Michigan State University, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Los Angeles State College.

GEORGE B. GALLOWAY, senior specialist in American Government at the Library of Congress, has been appointed executive secretary of the United States Group of the Interparliamentary Union. In this capacity he attended the spring meeting of the IPU in Rome, Italy, April 23-29.

CHARLES E. GILBERT has been promoted to the rank of associate professor at Swarthmore College.

RALPH M. GOLDMAN has accepted appointment as professor of government at San Francisco State College.

CHARLES H. GOODMAN, professor of the school of government and public administration at the American University, has been appointed assistant dean of the school.

CULLEN B. GOSNELL retired as a professor of political science at Emory University at the end of the spring quarter after thirty-seven years of teaching at the University. He was the first chairman of the department and one of the original organizers of the Southern Political Science Association.

CHARLES J. GRAHAM, professor of political science, Wisconsin State College (River Falls), has been named chairman of the department of social sciences. He was on leave a year and a half while serving as legislative assistant to Senator William Proxmire in Washington.

SVEN GROENINGS, Stanford, has been appointed lecturer at Indiana University, department of government.

J. V. GROVES has been appointed associate professor at West Virginia Wesleyan College.

WILLIAM ROBERT GUMP has been appointed instructor in government at Miami University, Ohio.

LOUIS K. HARRIS has been promoted to full professor, Kent State University.

HORACE V. HARRISON, associate professor, has been appointed director of graduate studies of the department of government and politics, University of Maryland. He is on sabbatical leave in the fall, 1962, to prepare a study on "United States-Latin American Relations."

LAWRENCE J. R. HERSON has been appointed professor and chairman of the department of political science at The Ohio State University.

LOUIS HENKIN of the Pennsylvania Law School will join Columbia in 1962-63 with a joint assignment as professor of law and professor of international law and diplomacy.

DUANE W. HILL, Montana State College, has been appointed associate professor of political science at University of Wyoming.

DONALD HINDLEY, previously at the school of international affairs, Australian National University, Canberra, has been appointed assistant professor of politics at Brandeis University.

WILLIAM H. HUNT has been appointed instructor of political science at Wabash College for 1962-63.

J. WOODFORD HOWARD is joining the department of political science, Duke University, as assistant professor. He was formerly at Lafayette College and last year was a fellow at the Harvard Law School.

CARROLL P. HURD, University of Wyoming, has resigned in order to become president of Sheridan Community College, September, 1962.

WILLIAM P. IRWIN has been appointed professor and chairman of the department of political science at Western Reserve University. He was with NCEP and earlier, associate professor of political science at Colorado State University.

HERBERT JACOB of Tulane University has been appointed an assistant professor at the University of Wisconsin for 1962-63.

DAN N. JACOBS has been promoted to associate professor of government at Miami University, Ohio.

WALTER D. JACOBS has been appointed assistant professor in government and politics at the University of Maryland; he formerly held an appointment in the University of Maryland overseas program.

ROBERT BENESON JANES, who has been a graduate student in department of foreign affairs at the University of Virginia, has been appointed instructor in political science at Birmingham-Southern College.

CECIL E. JOHNSON of Southern Methodist University has been promoted to associate professor.

RAYMOND H. KAARET, chairman of the department of political science at Rockford College, has resigned to accept an appointment as chairman of the department of political science at Ithaca College, Ithaca, New York.

HAROLD KAPLAN, who served as lecturer in government at Columbia during the past year has accepted a post at York University, Toronto, Canada.

BERNARD W. KLEIN was appointed supervisor of the Lansing Office of the Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan.

EDWARD A. KOLODZIEJ of the legislative reference staff at the Library of Congress has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Virginia.

RICHARD J. KOZICKI has accepted an assistant professorship in the department of political science at Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

FRED KRINSKY, formerly of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs at Syracuse University, has accepted a position as an associate professor in the department of political science at the University of Southern California.

LOUIS E. LAMBERT, assistant chairman of government, has been promoted to associate professor, Indiana University.

OLIVER M. LEE resigned his instructorship in the department of government and politics at the University of Maryland to accept an appointment with the Library of Congress.

J. GUS LIEBENOW, associate professor, has been named chairman of the African studies program at Indiana University, department of government.

JOHN W. LEWIS has been appointed assistant professor of government at Cornell University.

ORMA LINFORD of the University of Wisconsin has been appointed instructor in government at Beloit College.

ROBERT D. LOEY, formerly of the Johns Hopkins University, has been appointed an instructor in the department of political science and associate director of the Field Politics Center at Goucher College.

JOHN LOVELL, Wisconsin, has been appointed lecturer at Indiana University, department of government.

C. PETER MAGRATH, instructor, has been promoted to an assistant professor at Brown University.

CHARLES E. MARTIN of the University of Washington retired in June, 1962 after having served the department since 1924. He has accepted appointment as professor of American studies at the University of the Philippines.

CHARLES MCCALL, Yale, has been appointed lecturer at Indiana University, department of government.

CARL A. MCCANDLESS, professor of political science, Washington University, St. Louis, has been appointed chairman of the department.

THEODORE MCNELLY has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of government and politics at the University of Maryland.

MARTIN MEADOWS, formerly of the University of Maryland, has been appointed assistant professor in the faculty of the school of government and public administration of the American University.

EDWARD N. MEGAY, formerly of the College of St. Thomas, St. Paul, Minnesota, has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Nebraska.

WILLIAM E. MELVIN has been appointed public administration advisor (personnel) by the Agency for International Development, Quito, Ecuador. His former position was in the Office of Personnel, AID, Washington, D. C.

CHARLES A. MICAUD, who has been professor of foreign affairs at the University of Virginia, has been appointed professor of international relations at the University of Denver.

FRANK MILLER, formerly an instructor at Ohio State University, has been appointed as assistant professor of political science at the College of Wooster.

ARTHUR J. MISNER has been promoted to professor of government, Los Angeles State College.

EMMET V. MITTLEBEELEER has been promoted to the rank of professor in the faculty of the school of government and public administration of the American University. He has received a Fulbright award to lecture in political science at the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland for the academic year 1962-63.

JOHN A. MORGAN is joining the department of political science, Duke University, as instructor for the 1962-63 academic year. He is formerly of Southwestern Louisiana University.

STEVEN MULLER has been promoted to associate professor of government and appointed director of Cornell's center for international studies.

DONALD C. MUNDINGER has been appointed assistant dean of the college of arts and sciences of Valparaiso University, Indiana.

JOSEPH S. MURPHY has been promoted to assistant professor of politics at Brandeis University.

WILLIAM T. NICHOLS, who obtained his Ph.D. in foreign affairs in June, 1962 at the University of Virginia has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Georgia.

LAWRENCE E. NOBLE, JR., of Centre College has been appointed to an associate professorship in political science at the University of Mississippi.

DALE W. OLSEN has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Minnesota, Duluth, as of March 15, 1962.

EDWIN E. OLSON, a Ph.D. candidate at American University, has accepted a position as instructor in the department of political science at the University of Southern California.

ROBERT OSBORN, Columbia, has been appointed lecturer at Indiana University, department of government.

ARTHUR M. OSTEEN, previously in Pakistan at the Academy for Village Development on a Fellowship from Syracuse University's Afro-Asian Program, has accepted an assistant professorship in the department of international studies at the University of South Carolina.

CHARLES EDWIN PATTERSON, JR., who completed his Ph.D. work at the University of Illinois in August, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Lehigh University.

GEORGE A. PEEK, JR. of the department of political science at the University of Michigan has been promoted to the rank of professor.

J. ROLAND PENNOCK has been appointed to the newly created Richter professorship of political science at Swarthmore College. He will be on leave during the first semester of 1962-63.

DWYNAL B. PETTENGILL has been appointed assistant professor at the College of William and Mary.

JOHN N. PLANK, assistant professor of government at Harvard, has been appointed to a new post of Latin American Affairs at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy.

NATHANIEL S. PRESTON, formerly of Trinity College, has been appointed assistant professor in the faculty of the school of government and public administration of the American University. He will serve as coordinator of the school's Washington Semester Program.

HUGH DOUGLAS PRICE will leave Columbia to become associate professor at Syracuse University.

JEFFREY L. RADELL, recently appointed associate professor in the department of political science at Niagara University, has been named director of its Soviet and East European Institute.

AUSTIN RANNEY has accepted an appointment as a professor at the University of Wisconsin, effective February, 1963.

DAVID O. RANKIN, completing his doctoral studies at the University of Idaho, has been appointed instructor of political science at Cornell College, Iowa.

A. M. RICH, completing his doctoral studies at the University of Idaho, has accepted the position of assistant director, bureau of municipal research and service, Portland, Oregon.

BENJAMIN RIVLIN has been promoted to full professor at Brooklyn College.

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS, the Catholic University of America, has been appointed director of editorial planning and a member of the executive staff of the New Catholic Encyclopedia.

CYRIL B. ROSEMAN has been appointed instructor in political science at Swarthmore College, 1962-63.

JOSEPH A. ROTHSCHILD has been promoted to associate professor at Columbia University.

THOMAS A. RUSCH has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of government at Los Angeles State College.

JOHN S. SALOMA III, Harvard University and Congressional Fellow (1961-62), has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

LEON I. SALOMON, a doctoral candidate at Columbia and lately a lecturer at Brooklyn College, has been appointed instructor in government in Trinity College, Hartford.

ALLAN F. SAUNDERS, dean of the college of arts and sciences, has been designated senior professor of government at the University of Hawaii.

HOWARD A. SCARROW has been appointed associate professor of political science at the State University of New York, Long Island Center.

LAWRENCE SCHEINMAN was appointed instructor in the department of political science at the University of Michigan.

WARNER R. SCHILLING has been promoted to associate professor at Columbia University.

THOMAS M. SCOTT of Northwestern University has been appointed instructor in the department of political science of the University of Minnesota, in the field of metropolitan government.

OTIS H. SHAO of Moravian College has been appointed associate professor of political science at Florida Presbyterian College.

MARSHALL D. SHULMAN, associate director of the Russian Research Center, Harvard University, and formerly Special Assistant to Secretary of State Dean Acheson, has been appointed professor of international politics at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, offering courses in the fields of international politics and Soviet diplomacy.

ROBERT H. SIMMONS, formerly of New Mexico Highlands University, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Los Angeles State College.

ROBERT SITTIG has been appointed instructor of political science at the University of Nebraska.

DAVID A. SMELTZER was appointed instructor in the department of political science at the University of Michigan.

DAVID G. SMITH has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Swarthmore College.

RICHARD G. SMOLKA has been appointed assistant professor in the school of government and public administration of the American University.

PETER G. SNOW, Thomas Jefferson Foundation Fellow in political science at the University of Virginia, has been appointed to the staff of the department of political science at the University of Iowa.

MARGARET SODERBERG of Washington University has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Eastern Illinois University, Charleston, Illinois.

RICHARD F. STAAR was promoted from an associate professor to a full professor to begin with the fall quarter, 1962.

ALBERT L. STURM, formerly of West Virginia University, was a visiting member of the Institute of public administration at the University of Michigan during the second semester. He has become director of the institute of governmental research and professor of government at Florida State University.

JOSEPH L. SUTTON, chairman of the Asian studies committee, has been promoted to professor at Indiana University, department of government.

E. HAROLD SWAYZE of the department of political science at the University of Michigan has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor.

NORMAN C. THOMAS of the department of political science at the University of Michigan has been promoted to assistant professor.

SAMUEL F. THOMAS has been promoted to professor of political science at the Baruch School of business and public administration of the City College of the City University of New York.

R. J. TRESOLINI professor of political science at Lehigh University has been named head of a newly created department of government.

GORDON TULLOCK, formerly of the department of international studies of the University of South Carolina, has accepted an associate professorship in the department of economics at the University of Virginia. He remains a research associate of the institute of international studies at the University of South Carolina.

WAYNE UNTEREINER has been appointed associate professor at Indiana University, department of government.

DONALD URQUIDI, formerly of Michigan State University, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Los Angeles State College.

HERBERT WALTZER has been promoted to associate professor of government at Miami University, Ohio.

MORRIS WATNICK has been appointed associate professor of politics at Brandeis University.

THOMAS WATTS, Indiana University, has been appointed lecturer at Indiana University, department of government.

RICHARD S. WHEELER, assistant professor of political science at Duke University, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Michigan.

GARY WILHELM, Ph.D. candidate at the University of Illinois, has been appointed instructor in the department of political science at the Ohio State University.

LARMAN C. WILSON has been appointed instructor in government and politics at the University of Maryland in the fall, 1962.

JOHN P. WHITE of the department of political science at the University of Michigan has been promoted to the rank of associate professor.

JAMES H. WOLFE of the University of Maryland has accepted a position as assistant professor in the department of international studies at the University of South Carolina.

DAVID O. WURFEL, of International Christian University in Tokyo, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Missouri effective September, 1962.

W. ROSS YATES, associate professor of political science at Lehigh University, has been named associate dean of the college of arts and sciences.

IN MEMORIAM

MORRIS BRYAN LAMBIE, who was professor of government and director of the bureau of municipal administration at Harvard University, 1935-54, and professor of political science, director of the Municipal Reference Bureau, and executive secretary of the League of Minnesota Municipalities, at the University of Minnesota, 1921-35, died on March 23, 1962, in Jordan, where he was teaching public administration at Bir Zeit University under a combined Department of State and Ford Foundation grant. After his retirement from the faculty of Harvard University, Professor Lambie had taught at Tufts University, Boston University, and Boston College. Among many public activities, he served as chairman of the advisory council of the Massachusetts Division of Employment Security and consultant to the Greater Boston Economic Study Commission.

HAROLD ZINK, professor of political science at Ohio State University, died June 19, 1962, of a heart failure after several weeks of trying illness.

Prior to joining the faculty at Ohio State, Professor Zink was chairman of the department at DePauw University. He lectured at European and Asian universities and frequently contributed to the academic journals. He was the author of more than a dozen books, including American Military Government (1947), and The United States and Germany (1957).

During World War II, he was assigned to SHAEF, first in London and then in France, as a staff officer. He was American editor of the Handbook for Military Government in Germany and a consultant to the Allied Control Council on the reorganization of the German Government.

Professor Zink made many contributions to the literature of political science; and his book on city bosses is widely regarded as a classic in its field. During his later years he devoted himself to the study of comparative government, especially of British institutions in their domestic and overseas settings. He brought to that subject a keen concern for governmental changes and evolution: a concern that made him a "field researcher" and constant world traveller, bringing to his classroom and his books the most up-to-date knowledge of the world's governments. He also directed a research project on local government in Sweden, Italy and India, sponsored by UNESCO, from 1954 through 1957.

He was active in the formation of the Midwest Conference, and a regular participant in the programs of the American and the International Political Science Associations.—LAWRENCE J. R. HERSON

WOODROW WILSON FELLOWSHIP COMPETITION
For 1963-1964

Nominations from faculty members to Regional Chairman due:
October 31, 1962.
Information form from candidates due:
Immediately after receipt.
Credentials of Nominees due:
November 20, 1962.

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN
Indiana University

President-Elect

CARL J. FRIEDRICH
Harvard University

Vice Presidents

GABRIEL A. ALMOND
Yale University

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago

DWIGHT WALDO
University of California

Secretary

MARIAN IRISH
Florida State University

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Assistant Director

DONALD G. TACHERON

Managing Editor, APSR

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

LAWRENCE DURISCH
Tennessee Valley Authority
WILLIAM O. FARBER
University of South Dakota
IVAN H. HINDERAKER
University of California, Los Angeles
JOHN T. HOLDEN
University of New Hampshire
GLADYS M. KAMMERER
University of Florida
RICHARD C. SNYDER
Northwestern University
KENNETH W. THOMPSON
Rockefeller Foundation
JOHN D. WILLIAMS
University of Utah

ALFRED DEGRAZIA
New York University
JOHN HALLOWELL
Duke University
SIGMUND NEUMANN
Wesleyan University
LEO C. RIETHMAYER
University of Colorado
LESTER G. SELIGMAN
University of Oregon
VERNON VAN DYKE
State University of Iowa
ROBERT E. WARD
University of Michigan
BRYCE WOOD
Social Science Research Council

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW
ALBERT SHAW
FREDERIC N. JUDSON
JAMES BRYCE
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL
WOODROW WILSON
SIMEON E. BALDWIN
ALBERT BUSHNELL HART
W. W. WILLOUGHBY
JOHN BASSETT MOORE
ERNST FREUND
JESSE MACY
MUNROE SMITH
HENRY JONES FORD
PAUL S. REINSCH
LEO S. ROWE
WILLIAM A. DUNNING
HARRY A. GARFIELD
JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM
CHARLES A. BEARD
WILLIAM B. MUNRO
JESSE S. REEVES
JOHN A. FAIRLIE
BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH
EDWARD S. CORWIN
WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY
ISIDOR LOEB
WALTER J. SHEPARD
FRANCIS W. COKER
ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE
THOMAS REED POWELL
CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA
CHARLES GROVE HAINES
ROBERT C. BROOKS
FREDERIC A. OGG
WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
LEONARD D. WHITE
JOHN M. GAUS
WALTER F. DODD
ARTHUR W. MACMAHON
HENRY R. SPENCER
QUINCY WRIGHT
JAMES POLLOCK
PETER H. ODEGARD
LUTHER H. GULICK
PENDLETON HERRING
RALPH J. BUNCHE
CHARLES MCKINLEY
HAROLD D. LASSWELL
E. E. SCHATTSCNEIDER
V. O. KEY, JR.
R. TAYLOR COLE
CARL B. SWISHER
EMMETTE S. REDFORD

APSA 1963 WORLD TOUR-SEMINAR

12 Countries—41 Days

The American Political Science Association announces the opportunity for APSA members to explore the political life of 12 critically important nations in Asia, the Middle East, and Southern Europe through direct conversations with their respective political and diplomatic leaders. In conjunction with these high-level sessions, participants will also engage in numerous briefings and informal gatherings with faculties of local universities, U.S. Foreign Service personnel, foreign press representatives, etc. Opportunity will be provided for a limited amount of personal research and sightseeing. The entire trip is being planned with the cooperation and support of the U.S. Department of State and the U.S. Information Service.

Itinerary

The World Tour-Seminar will depart from San Francisco on August 1, 1963 and arrive in New York on September 10, 1963. The following intermediate stops are scheduled: Honolulu, Tokyo, Taipei (Quemoy), Hong Kong, Bangkok, New Delhi, Cairo, Istanbul, Athens, Belgrade, Madrid, and Lisbon.

Transportation

The participants will travel around-the-world on a chartered Lockheed Super-H Constellation. The plane and flight crew will remain with the trip thereby avoiding the inconveniences and delays frequently encountered due to changing planes and airlines. Personal belongings and baggage can be stored on the plane during stopovers.

Expenses

The cost of the APSA World Tour-Seminar will be under $1550.00 per person. This price will include around-the-world charter air fare (including first-class meal and complimentary beverage service aloft), first-class hotel accommodations, numerous meal functions, baggage handling, airport transfers, entire schedule of meetings, interviews, and briefings, and appropriate sightseeing activities.

On the basis of past experience, participants can expect that the cost of this educational activity will be accepted as a deductible expense on Federal income tax returns.

For further information concerning this unique educational, research, and travel opportunity, write immediately to: APSA 1963 World Tour-Seminar, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. A brochure giving full details and reservation information will be mailed to you.

European Politics and Government

A Comparative Approach

Clifford A. L. Rich, Oklahoma State University; Robert O. Gibbon, Wisconsin State College, Eau Claire; Lowell G. Noonan, San Fernando Valley State College; Helmut Bader, El Camino College; and Karel Hulicka, University of Buffalo. Edited by Clifford A. L. Rich

This new textbook is designed for the first course in comparative government. It presents a detailed, balanced, and comprehensive account of the politics and government of five major European powers: Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and the U.S.S.R. Specialists on each country analyze the causal determinants of political action, providing students with a sound basis for drawing comparative conclusions. The governing process is systematically dealt with in order to impart a clear understanding of how the major European systems compare with that of the United States. The final chapter summarizes the politics and institutions of European union. 1962. 780 pp., illus. $8.00

Public Finance

Earl R. Rolph and George F. Break
—both University of California, Berkeley

Thoroughly class tested, this textbook sets forth the theoretical and technical issues in public finance involved at all levels of government. It effectively demonstrates how economic intelligence can be applied to illuminate the problems of public finance; provides a descriptive-historical analysis of government finance today and its role in the economy. The various tax resources available to the government are presented in detail. Book draws mainly on American experience in fiscal affairs, but evidence from other countries is incorporated where applicable. Current social security programs, the problems arising from the rapid growth of metropolitan areas, and fiscal theory and policy are examined in detail. 1961. 586 pp., illus. $7.50

Public Administration

John M. Pfiffner, University of Southern California; and Robert V. Presthus, Cornell University

Standard textbook provides a comprehensive account of public administration today. It integrates the descriptive-institutional material of administrative science and the behavioral analyses of administration in action. Book analyzes the nature of public bureaucracy as well as the political environment and its attendant pressures on the public administrator; incorporates material on decision-making and data processing in fact-finding and planning; reflects recent research in group behavior, individual motivation, leadership dynamics, etc. 4th Ed., 1960. 570 pp. $7.50

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

15 East 26th Street, New York 10, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Praeger

PAPERBACKS

IDEOLOGY, POLITICS, AND GOVERNMENT IN THE SOVIET UNION

John A. Armstrong $1.65

THE CHALLENGE OF AFRICA

K. A. Busia $1.75

POLYCENTRISM The New Factor in International Communism

Walter Laqueur and Leopold Labedz, Eds. $1.75

INTERNATIONAL REGIONAL ORGANIZATIONS Constitutional Foundations

Ruth C. Lawson, Ed. $2.50

THE KREMLIN SINCE STALIN

Wolfgang Leonhard $2.95

MARXISM An Historical and Critical Study

George Lichtheim $2.50

NEUTRALISM AND NONALIGNMENT The New States in World Affairs

Laurence W. Martin, Ed. $2.25

THE POLITICS OF FOREIGN AID American Experience in Southeast Asia

John D. Montgomery $2.25

THE CHANGING PATTERNS OF THE MIDDLE EAST (Revised Ed.)

Pierre Rondot $1.95

THE IDEOLOGIES OF THE DEVELOPING NATIONS

Paul E. Sigmund, Jr. $2.50

THE POLITICS OF DISARMAMENT A Study in Soviet-American Gamesmanship

John W. Spanier and
Joseph L. Noguee $1.95

COMMUNIST CHINA IN PERSPECTIVE

A. Doak Barnett $1.35

COMMUNIST CHINA'S FOREIGN POLICY

R. G. Boyd $1.75

RUSSIA UNDER KHRUSHCHEV

An Anthology from Problems of Communism
Abraham Brumberg, Ed. $2.50

SOUTHEAST ASIA TODAY—AND TOMORROW A Political Analysis

Richard Butwell $1.75

THE SOVIET UNION AT THE UNITED NATIONS An Inquiry into Soviet Motives and Objectives

Alexander Dallin $1.95

CASTRO'S REVOLUTION Myths and Realities

Theodore Draper $1.75

SOVIET STRATEGY IN THE NUCLEAR AGE (Revised Ed.)

Raymond L. Garthoff $2.25

PAN-AFRICANISM A Short Political Guide

Colin Legum $1.95

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS IN JAPAN

The Road to Democracy
John M. Maki $1.95

THE POLITICS OF AFRICAN NATIONALISM Challenge to American Policy

George W. Shepherd, Jr. $1.95

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II (Revised Ed.)

John W. Spanier $1.95

THE SOVIET UNION TODAY A Concise Handbook

Kenneth R. Whiting $2.25

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER

PUBLISHER

64 University Place, New York 3, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

APSA CHARTER FLIGHTS TO EUROPE

FLIGHT A—Approximately June 15 to September 1, 1963

FLIGHT B—Approximately August 1 to 31, 1963

For the fourth successive summer, the Association will provide chartered air service to Europe for its members.

Both flights will originate at New York International Airport and arrive on the continent of Europe. The cost per seat will be under $275.00.

A deposit of $100.00 per seat is required. Deadline for deposits for charter flights A and B are March 1 and April 1 respectively.

For further information write to:

*Miss Patricia Pearson
American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.*

GOVERNOR NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER

sums up his convictions on

THE FUTURE OF FEDERALISM

based on his 1962 Godkin Lectures at Harvard University and THE PRESS comments:

JUSTICE WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS in THE WASHINGTON POST — "He does the Nation great service when he propounds the theme of this book . . . it is bold in its conception and sets America's sights high."

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE editorial, What States Owe to Federalism—"Mr. Rockefeller preached at Harvard what he has practiced as Governor — and the Federal system would be stronger if more Governors did likewise."

TIME MAGAZINE cover story, June 15, 1962 — "A revealing record of his philosophy of government and politics."

$2.75 at your bookstore

HARVARD
UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge 38, Massachusetts

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

New and recent OXFORD texts

.....

THE JUDICIAL PROCESS: An Introductory Analysis of the Courts of the United States, England, and France

by Henry J. Abraham, University of Pennsylvania

1962 384 pp. paperbound $2.25

THE SUPREME COURT ON CHURCH AND STATE

edited by Joseph Tussman, Wesleyan University

1962 329 pp. paperbound $1.95

READINGS IN ECONOMICS

edited by H. C. Harlan

1961 704 pp. paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN WORLD POLITICS

edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Ralph Lerner and Gerald Stourzh

1959 590 pp. paperbound $2.25

READINGS IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Ralph Lerner and Gerald Stourzh

1959 712 pp. paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

edited by Gerald Stourzh and Ralph Lerner

1959 496 pp. paperbound $2.25

READINGS IN RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY

edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Gerald Stourzh and Marvin Zetterbaum

1959 792 pp. paperbound $2.75

OBLIGATION AND THE BODY POLITIC

by Joseph Tussman, Wesleyan University

1961 152 pp. paperbound $2.25

Announcing

MATERIALS ON AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT,

Revised Edition

edited by John M. Swarthout, Portland State College, and Ernest R. Bartley, University of Florida

Fall 1962 608 pp. paperbound prob. $4.50

THE SUPREME COURT ON RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

edited by Joseph Tussman, Wesleyan University

Spring 1963 416 pp. paperbound prob. $1.95

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 417 Fifth Ave., New York 16

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

New and Recent Texts

12th EDITION      OGG AND RAY'S

INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

By William H. Young, University of Wisconsin

The 12th edition of this well-known best seller includes rewritten and expanded chapters on civil rights, elections, foreign affairs, and national defense. A new chapter has been added on government in metropolitan areas. The book is fully up-to-date, including the major new programs, policies and events of 1961.

957 pages, illus., $8.00

Also available, the 12th edition of INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, The National Government. 748 pages, illus., $7.50

4th EDITION      BISHOP AND HENDEL

BASIC ISSUES OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

By Hillman M. Bishop and Samuel Hendel,
both New York University

Revised to keep abreast of present-day issues, the Fourth Edition of this collection of stimulating readings on American democracy contains 21 new selections. Retaining the basic premises of earlier editions, the editors have selected persuasively reasoned and authoritative statements dealing with the fundamental values and persistent issues of our democracy. They have expanded their treatment in this edition, however, to include such current topics as the lawfulness of the desegregation decisions, the fundamental premises and applications of the Loyalty-Security Program, the demand for a more responsible two-party system, the political implications of the development of atomic weapons, and the question of co-existence.

528 pages, paperbound, $2.95

APPLETON - CENTURY - CROFTS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from Appleton-Century-Crofts

FRENCH POLITICS AND ALGERIA

By William G. Andrews, Tufts University

This book provides a comparative case study in the functioning of French governmental systems. From a wealth of documentary material and statistical data, the writer has woven a lucid account of policy in the making. His study demonstrates how the governmental and political institutions of the Fourth and Fifth French republics have functioned in dealing with the rebellion in Algeria from 1954 to 1962. To be published this month.

About 224 pages, paper, $1.95 (tent.)

THE REVIVAL OF DEMOCRATIC THEORY

By Neal Riemer, University of Pennsylvania

In this original work of scholarship, the author analyzes the decline of democratic theory and presents a strong case for its revival. After giving the reasons for the decline, he outlines a scheme for American democracy and provides a framework within which it may operate. Throughout, the underlying definition of political theory is that of the critical study concerned with harmoniously relating the normative, empirical, and prudential components of political science.

190 pages, paper, $1.95

2nd EDITION      JACOBSON'S DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN POLITICAL THOUGHT

By Thornton Anderson, University of Maryland

A survey history of American political ideas which combines analysis and exposition with readings from primary sources. Selections from documents illustrate the diversity of political thinking, and essays explain the geographical, social and cultural forces that influenced it. While retaining many of the original highly praised essays, Dr. Anderson has revised and brought this time-honored text up-to-date.

672 pages, $7.50

34 West 33rd Street, New York 1, New York
Division of Meredith Publishing Company

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

NEW FALL BOOKS FROM COLUMBIA

SPAIN AND THE GREAT POWERS, 1936-1941

By Dante A. Puzzo

Analyzing the complex of men, forces and circumstances that attended the violent overthrow of the Spanish Republic and the emergence of Falangist Spain as an Axis satellite, Professor Puzzo traces the course of events in Republican Spain which led to the conflict and describes political pressures which the Great Powers exercised on Loyalist parties and rebel forces. Finding the essence of the Spanish story in the policy of appeasement that characterized much of the diplomacy of the 1930's, the author presents a fully documented account of its formulation and implementation with respect to Spain as well as evidence substantiating the claim that the Spanish Republic suffered defeat on the battlefield only after, and because, it had been abandoned in the chancelleries of the Western democracies.

336 pages

$7.50

STRATEGY, POLITICS, AND DEFENSE BUDGETS

By Warner R. Schilling, Paul Y. Hammond and Glenn H. Snyder

These three challenging studies of U. S. national security policy and defense budgets of the period of 1948-1955 scrutinize the interaction of international politics, domestic politics and attitudes, strategic theories, and governmental organization as these factors focus on the formulation of defense budgets. Discussed are the fiscal 1950 budget; the NSC-68, a document prepared in the spring of 1950 by the National Security Council dealing with the problem of meeting unlimited challenge in a limited time with great but not infinite resources; the "New Look" military policy of the Eisenhower administration—a preparedness policy which was to rely on strategic nuclear power and to de-emphasize use of "conventional" land, naval and air forces.

541 pages

$10.00

FORRESTAL AND THE NAVY

By Robert Greenhalgh Albion and Robert Howe Connery with the collaboration of Jennie Barnes Pope

A skillful and authoritative examination of James V. Forrestal's career in the United States Navy Department from his position as Under Secretary in 1940, through his Secretaryship, to the newly created office of Secretary of Defense in 1947.

370 pages

$6.95

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

2960 Broadway, New York 27, N. Y.

Write for free Fall 1962 Paperback Catalog

Capitalism and Freedom

By Milton Friedman. The author of A Program for Monetary Stability expounds his view of the proper role of competitive capitalism as simultaneously a device for achieving economic freedom and a necessary condition for political freedom. 320 pages. $3.95

The American Partnership

INTERGOVERNMENTAL CO-OPERATION IN THE NINETEENTH-CENTURY UNITED STATES

By Daniel J. Elazar. A strong argument that the American system of combining national programs with effective state government is not a twentieth-century innovation but an evolutionary development already used in the last century. $6.50

In Defense of Politics

By Bernard Crick. This polished and witty essay describes "the minimum benefits of politics as a civilized activity," and defends the tendency toward haggling and compromise as the hallmark of democratic liberal society—a virtue, rather than a defect. $3.75

Landmarks in Political Economy

Earl J. Hamilton, Albert Rees, and Harry G. Johnson, editors. This distinguished collection from 70 years of the Journal of Political Economy includes key works by Veblen, Pareto, Viner, Schumpeter, Paul H. Douglas and Milton Friedman, to name but a few. 544 pages. $10.00

through your bookseller, or

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Chicago 37, Illinois

IN CANADA: The University of Toronto Press

NEW VIEWS OF POLITICAL ACTION IN AMERICA...

THE WOUND IN THE HEART: America and the Spanish Civil War

By Allen Guttman, Amherst College

Probes the special impact of the Spanish Civil War on American intellectual and social history.

Allen Guttman provides the first full-fledged analysis of how Americans saw the conflict and why the fate of the Spanish republic moved them to such deep and lasting partisanship.

Books, pamphlets, magazines, drawings, cartoons, propaganda releases, letters, films, paintings, speeches, radio broadcasts — the author has combed all these contemporary materials in his search for the sources of the nation's responses.

His analysis covers the American political spectrum from right to left, beginning with "pre-liberal" irrational responses and moving through conservative, liberal, and radical interpretations to "post-liberal" responses. He also delves into such controversial matters as the dilemma of an authoritarian church or a radical party in American society, with its predominantly liberal political tradition.

Just published, $5.95

CLASS AND PARTY IN THE EISENHOWER YEARS

By Heinz Eulau, Stanford University

Professor Eulau has written a careful study of political behavior during the 1952 and 1956 presidential elections. Based on interviews with national samples of the electorate, it scrutinizes classes and parties as influential sources of political loyalty and dissent. It also explores the interplay of class and party in political attitudes, preferences, perceptions, and actions.

Just published, $4.50

POLITICAL IDEOLOGY

Why the American Common Man Believes What He Does

By Robert E. Lane, Yale University

This important addition to the empirical literature of political behavior interprets the personal, often unconscious, meanings of political ideas to the American common man. Using depth interviewing techniques on a sample of working and lower middle class men, the author traces the social and cultural sources of political beliefs — and their consequences for the American political system as a whole.

Just published, $10.00

THE FREE PRESS OF GLENCOE

A Division of The Macmillan Company, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Sovereign Prerogative The Supreme Court and the Quest for Law

by Eugene V. Rostow

This group of essays by the Dean of the Yale Law School states a theory of law and a policy for judicial action, and applies them to the work of the Supreme Court, criticizing some of its decisions, upholding others. Strongly defending the democratic character of judicial review, the book presents and illustrates a policy through which the Supreme Court could wisely and affirmatively use the great powers entrusted to it by history in enforcing the commands of the constitutional tradition to help improve the democratic quality of American life. "With grace and power, and from high ground, Dean Rostow illuminates the role of the judiciary in maintaining a constitutional democracy. The book brings a much-needed philosophic perspective to the current and recurring controversies over the performance of our Supreme Court."—Paul A. Freund. $6.00

The Public Order of the Oceans A Contemporary International Law of the Sea

by Myres S. McDougal and William T. Burke

Following a tradition which antedates Grotius, the authors offer a comprehensive survey of the process of decision by which the general world community allocates access to, and authority over, the oceans during times of relative peace. Previously published companion books in a series increasingly influential: Studies in World Public Order, by Myres S. McDougal and Associates, which was the recipient of the Certificate of Merit of the American Society of International Law for 1962; and Law and Minimum World Public Order, by Myres S. McDougal and Florentino P. Feliciano. $15.00

Russian Foreign Policy Essays in Historical Perspective

edited by Ivo J. Lederer

This pioneer effort by leading American specialists is the first major attempt to deal with the interrelation of Tsarist and Soviet foreign policy. Individual essays interpret Russian national interest and objectives; Russian attitudes toward the West; the effect of internal politics on foreign policy; the role of personalities, the foreign ministry, and economics; and such instruments of diplomacy as the military apparatus, propaganda, international movements, and negotiation. Contributors include George Vernadsky, Cyril E. Black, Frederick C. Barghoorn, Hajo Holborn, and George F. Kennan. $10.00

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Haven and London

APSA PERSONNEL SERVICE

Recently reorganized, the Personnel Service lists the largest number of teaching and research positions in the country.

MEMBERSHIP—available to every member of the Association for $5.00 yearly.

NEWSLETTER—issued every 4-6 weeks. Contains a listing of current teaching and research vacancies. Upon request, the Association forwards biographical information forms directly to employers.

For further information write to:

Miss Cora Prifold, Director Personnel Service
American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

TO RESTORE AND IMPROVE

the standards of higher education in America

THE UNIVERSITY BOOKMAN

A Quarterly Review edited by

RUSSELL KIRK

- ★ REVIEWS . . . of university and college textbooks
- ★ ESSAYS . . . on educational theory and practice
- ★ CONTRIBUTORS . . . include such sound scholars and competent writers as Gerhart Niemeyer, Thomas Molnar, Ernest Van Den Haag, Felix Wittmer, John Abbot Clark, John A. Lukacs, George C. S. Benson, Arther S. Trace Jr.
- ★ IT COSTS $2.00 (4 issues)

The University Bookman should be read by everyone interested in significant criticism and evaluation of American education.

SUBSCRIBE NOW! Write today to:

---

THE UNIVERSITY BOOKMAN

---

Box 3070
Grand Central Station
New York, N. Y.

Dept. 9,

---

ANNOUNCING

A New Series
from Prentice-Hall

FOUNDATIONS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE

Edited by ROBERT A. DAHL, Eugene Meyer Professor of Political Science,
Yale University

Here, in the Foundations of Political Science, is a series of books that provides a scientific, analytical approach to the complete introductory course in political science or American government—and that integrates the major aspects of modern political science. Guided by the highest standards of contemporary scholarship and a concern for the major historic problems of politics, the series will make available to the beginning student the fruits of the most recent empirical and theoretical studies in political science.

These comprehensive, yet short volumes, offer the instructor a thoroughly flexible teaching tool. They can be used individually as collateral readings, in groups as core volumes for a course, or combined as basic text material. Thus, the series is intended to shorten, by a decade or more, the process of converting the best knowledge of modern political science into integrated and highly readable texts.

The books will be attractively designed in a 6" × 9" format, and moderately priced at $1.50 paperback, and $2.95 clothbound.

Coming in Spring '63

Modern Political Analysis

by Robert A. Dahl, Eugene Meyer, Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Governing States and Localities in America

by Herbert Kaufman, Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Constitutional Law

by Charles L. Black, Jr. Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Political Parties and Political Behavior

by Fred I. Greenstein, Assistant Professor of Political Science, Wesleyan University

Public Opinion and Ideology

by Robert E. Lane, Professor of Political Science, Yale University, and David Sears, Assistant Professor of Psychology, University of California, Los Angeles

Forthcoming

Public Administration

by James W. Fesler, Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Political Theory

by Frederick M. Watkins, Professor of Political Science, Yale University

International Relations

by Karl W. Deutsch, Professor of Political Science, Yale University

Comparative Government

by Dankwart A. Rustow, Associate Professor of Government, Columbia University

The Congress and the Presidency

by Nelson W. Polsby, Assistant Professor of Political Science, Wesleyan University

Readings in American Political Behavior

by Raymond E. Wolfinger, Assistant Professor of Political Science, Stanford University

For further information, write: BOX 903

PRENTICE-HALL, Inc.
Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from RANDOM

---

State and Local Government and Politics

REVISED EDITION

by ROBERT S. BABCOCK, University of Vermont

Lucid, well-organized, and highly informative this text is infused with the sense of excitement and practical wisdom derived from the author's own successful participation in grass roots politics. The book is now thoroughly updated and revised.

Fall 1962; 500 pages; $5.75 text

Patterns of Government

THE MAJOR POLITICAL SYSTEMS OF EUROPE

REVISED EDITION

by SAMUEL H. BEER, ADAM B. ULAM, and NICHOLAS WAHL
all of Harvard University

HARRY ECKSTEIN, Princeton University HERBERT J. SPIRO, Amherst College

This distinguished text, widely used in comparative government courses since it was first published in 1958, examines the governments and politics of four major world powers—Britain, France, Germany, and the Soviet Union—against the general background of their respective political cultures. The authors, each a well-known authority in his field, have incorporated the latest significant developments in this newly revised and expanded edition.

Fall 1962; 832 pages; $7.95 text

The Might of Nations

WORLD POLITICS IN OUR TIME

by JOHN G. STOEßINGER, Hunter College

It is a pleasure to read this well-written text and to have the use of its unusually thorough chapter bibliographies. The organization is sound and reflects a judicious and relevant selection of issues and events. The final chapter contributes effectively to the conceptualization of international relations.

—Daniel S. Cheever, University of Pittsburgh

468 pages; $6.25 text

---

RANDOM HOUSE · The College Department

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

HOUSE

---

Government by Constitution

by HERBERT J. SPIRO, Amherst College

. . . A provocative and thoughtful book which stimulates and challenges the reader . . . its approach is fresh and mature without being verbose or jargonistic.

—Josef Silverstein, Wesleyan University

496 pages; $6.75 text

Communism, Fascism, and Democracy

THE THEORETICAL FOUNDATIONS

by CARL COHEN, University of Michigan

An excellent collection of theoretical essays about the main ISMS agitating the contemporary world. The selections were chosen with unusual cogency, and the editorial organization could scarcely be better

—Francis Wilhoit, Drake University

704 pages; $3.95 paperbound text

To be Published Winter 1962

Power and International Relations

by INIS L. CLAUDE, JR., University of Michigan

320 pages; $4.50 text

Send for a list of Random House Studies in Political Science, a series of original works attractively bound in paper covers. The newest book in this series is CONTEMPORARY SOUTHEAST ASIA, by Robert C. Bone, Jr. Priced from 95 cents.

---

501 Madison Avenue · New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

current

A monthly magazine for the concerned citizen bringing together in one place the significant new material from all sources on the frontier problems of today.

John W. Gardner, President
Carnegie Corporation of New York

"Current is one of the most interesting and useful journals that cross my desk. It is unique in its coverage of contemporary ideas and issues."

current 905 Madison Avenue, New York 21, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to Current at the special rate for students and faculty of $5. (Regular subscription $8.) I shall receive a full year of Current (12 issues). My payment ($5.) is enclosed.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

School Affiliation _____

I am not eligible for the Educational Rate; please enter my subscription at the Introductory Rate of $7. for one year _____ (Regular Rate $8.) My payment is enclosed.

P-1

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Two Faces of Tass

by THEODORE E. KRUGLAK. Traces the development of the Soviet news agency and analyzes its present-day operations. Harrison Salisbury, former Moscow correspondent of the New York Times, says: "This is an extremely useful study of the TASS agency—an evaluation that is most timely in a field that has been sorely neglected."

$5.00

China's Politics in Prospective

by HAROLD S. QUIGLEY. A concise, realistic view of the Chinese situation today, seen in the perspective of social, economic, and political developments. Allen S. Whiting of the Rand Corporation commented: "This is a fine study, neither simplistic in its treatment nor unnecessarily cluttered with details."

$4.50

British Broadcasting in Transition

by BURTON PAULU. An analysis of British television and radio broadcasting since the introduction of commercial television. "A superb book on one of Britain's most important contributions to the world of communications—broadcasting." World Affairs.

$5.00

France and Her Eastern Allies, 1919-1925

by PIOTR S. WANDYCZ. A study of the intricate relations between France, Poland, and Czechoslovakia from the time of the Paris peace conference to the Locarno pact.

$8.50

Man Takes Control:

(CULTURAL DEVELOPMENT AND AMERICAN AID)

by CHARLES J. ERASMUS. An investigation of the causes of cultural change, with a case study of a technical assistance program in Mexico. "May well become a standard reference for all students of cultural change." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.

$6.50

To be published soon:

SENATOR GERALD P. NYE AND AMERICAN FOREIGN RELATIONS

by WAYNE S. COLE

$5.75

Order from your bookseller or from

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA PRESS

2037 University Avenue Southeast, Minneapolis 14, Minnesota

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

American Political Parties

Their Natural History

by WILFRED E. BINKLEY, Ohio Northern University

This is a revised and updated edition of a book which penetrates into the political mores of the American people and presents a strikingly fresh interpretation of the development of parties and statesmen. Among the many subjects examined in this original and stimulating text, Dr. Binkley discusses the way new parties germinate and grow and the climate of opinion in which some flourish and others die. An entirely new chapter has been added which brings the history of American political parties down to the present day.

Fall 1962; 520 pages; $5.00 text

Peace Theory

Preconditions of Disarmament

by JOHN W. BURTON, Australian National University
Canberra, Australia

In this exciting new book the former Secretary of the Australian Department of External Affairs makes an important contribution to the study of international relations. Accepting the principle of conflict as an inevitable component in world politics, he proceeds in behaviorist terms to analyze the S/R relationship and to delineate those policies by which peace can be maintained. Illustrating his argument from the rich background of his own career as practical diplomat and statesman, he has given us an excellent text for advanced courses in international politics.

1962; 225 pages; $4.00 text

ALFRED A. KNOPF, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Public Opinion and American Democracy

by V. O. KEY, JR., Harvard University, 602 pages; $7.50 text

The Organizational Society

by ROBERT PRESTHUS, Cornell University, 1962; 340 pages; $4.50 text

Modern Organization

by VICTOR A. THOMPSON, Illinois Institute of Technology, 192 pages; $3.75 text

Politics Among Nations

by HANS J. MORGENTHAU, University of Chicago, 660 pages; $7.50 text

Introduction to Government

Third Edition

by ROBERT RIENOW, State University of New York, by Spring 1963

Paperbacks

VINTAGE BOOKS

Paperbacks

Caravelle Editions

SOUTHERN POLITICS, by V. O. Key, Jr. $2.95

THE PRESIDENT'S CABINET, by Richard F. Fenno, Jr. $1.95

U. S. SENATORS AND THEIR WORLD, by Donald R. Matthews $1.95

ESSAYS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, by Robert G. McCloskey $1.95

THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY, by Robert H. Jackson $1.95

DESEGREGATION AND THE LAW, by Albert P. Blaustein and Clarence

Clyde Ferguson, Jr. $1.95

A Complete list of Vintage books available upon request

ALFRED A. KNOPF, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Re: COMMUNISM

four new DUTTON PAPERBACKS observe the Party, the national character, and the outlook

A PRIMER ON COMMUNISM, Revised Edition by George W. Cronyn. Edited by Howard Oiseth.

Two trained analysts of Russian affairs give answers-in-depth to 200 questions representing a wide cross section of public curiosity about every aspect of communism. The collection—ranging from family life, taxes, law, labor, production patterns, education and delinquency, to Berlin, Cuba, and the Sino-Soviet conflict—“deserves the highest praise and widespread use” says Evron Kirkpatrick of the American Political Science Association. $1.15

RUSSIANS AS PEOPLE by Wright Miller. Preface by Alexander Dallin.

An extraordinary first-hand portrait of Russians as individuals, and how they behave in such spheres as manners, morals, politics and family. The N. Y. Times Book Review assessed it as “One of the most impressive of all contemporary reports on Russia.” Illustrated $1.35

THE COMMUNIST BLUEPRINT FOR THE FUTURE: Complete Texts of all Four Communist Manifestos 1848-1961 With an Introduction by Thomas P. Whitney, formerly chief of the American Embassy Economic Section and Moscow correspondent for the Associated Press

This book is the only single source for all the major communist documents! It includes: all the central statements of the Soviet Communist party on domestic and foreign policy; the Party's 1961 Draft Program, the original Manifesto of 1848; the Critique of the Gotha Program (1875); the Programs of the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party (1903) and of the Bolsheviks (1919). Absolutely invaluable as a reference and key to the future. $1.75

A SHORT HISTORY OF RUSSIA by R. D. Charques

A chronological narrative—relating the present to the past. “The most readable and illuminating one-volume treatment in either English or Russian . . .” Maurice Hindus, SATURDAY REVIEW. Maps. $1.35

Write for free catalog of other interesting DUTTON PAPERBACKS to

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY 201 Park Avenue South, New York 3, N. Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

NEW from Prentice-Hall

Quality paperbacks in the Spectrum  Series

S-41 GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS IN THE MIDDLE EAST

by Maurice Harari, Ford Foundation

A concise analysis on a country-by-country basis of political institutions in major countries of a tumultuous region. Dr. Harari documents regional struggles and examines political institutions, international relations in the Middle East and their effect on the cold war. 192 pp. (orig.), December 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $3.95

S-45 DISCRIMINATION

by Wallace Mendelson, University of Texas

Based on the Report of the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights—the facts of racial discrimination in America today. Openly discusses the scope and effect of racial discrimination in major aspects of American life—and the extent of government involvement. 192 pp. (orig.), October 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $4.25.

S-AA-7 AUTOMATION AND TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE

An American Assembly Book edited by John T. Dunlop, Harvard University

Nine leading authorities consider the possibilities of advancing industrial technology: if oriented toward human values, it could mean a better age for mankind—or it could impose a mechanical jig on its creators. 184 pp. (orig.), 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $3.95.

S-38 SOCIAL JUSTICE

edited by R. B. Brandt, Swarthmore College

The concept of justice—as seen by the political theorist, philosopher, economist, and lawyer. This is the first book-length treatment of social justice for several decades—the first to use modern analytic concepts drawn from philosophy. 192 pp. (orig.) October 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $3.95.

S-25 SCIENCE AND THE NATION Policy and Politics by T. Stefan Dupré and

Sanford A. Lakoff, both of Harvard University. 181 pp. (orig.), 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $3.95.

S-28 MASTERY OF THE METROPOLIS by Webb Fiser, Syracuse University.

168 pp. (orig.), 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $3.95.

S-AA-6 THE UNITED STATES AND THE FAR EAST 2nd Edition, 1962. An American Assembly Book edited by Willard L. Thorpe, The Merrill Center for Economics. 188 pp., 1962, paperbound $1.95, clothbound $3.95.

S-32 COMMUNIST CHINA'S STRATEGY IN THE NUCLEAR ERA A Rand

Corporation Study by Alice Langley Hsieh. 204 pp. (orig.), 1962, paperbound $2.25, clothbound $4.50.

For a complete Spectrum Catalog, Write Dept. CAC

SPECTRUM  BOOKS: SYMBOL OF GOOD READING

Available at your Bookstore

PRENTICE-HALL, INC. Englewood Cliffs, N. J.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Political and Social Thought of Charles A. Beard

BY BERNARD C. BORNING. Evolution of Beard's philosophy in relation to American social thought during the first half of the twentieth century. Shows important relationships between political reality and theoretical concepts of the time and includes a complete bibliography of Beard's published writings. 1962. 344 pages. $6.75

The Better Part of Valor

MORE, ERASMUS, COLET, AND VIVES ON HUMANISM, WAR, AND PEACE, 1496-1535. BY ROBERT P. ADAMS. A complete study of the ideas on peace and a good society—in contrast to war and tyranny—expressed by the four greatest humanists in Henry VIII's England. "A book of very substantial value . . . brings in much fresh or unfamiliar documentation in support of its theme." —Douglas Bush, Harvard University. 1962. 368 pages. $7.00

Chinese in American Life

SOME ASPECTS OF THEIR HISTORY, STATUS, PROBLEMS, AND CONTRIBUTIONS. BY S. W. KUNG. Chinese in the United States as significant contributors to science, education, business, industry, and the arts. Describes also the history of their exclusion and immigration here and in other countries. 1962. 368 pages. $7.50

Boss Cermak of Chicago

A STUDY OF POLITICAL LEADERSHIP. BY ALEX GOTTFRIED. "A definitive, well-researched, and thoroughly documented biography of one of the most unusual political leaders in recent American history."—Chicago Daily News. 1962. 472 pages. $6.50

The Politics of Freedom

AN ANALYSIS OF THE MODERN DEMOCRATIC STATE. BY C. W. CASSINELLI. Competitive elections, freedom of speech and the press, a complex constitution, a high standard of living, and responsibility of government to the people observed and analyzed as essential and interdependent elements of all modern western democracies. 1961. 224 pages. $4.75

Politics and Grass

THE ADMINISTRATION OF GRAZING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN. BY PHILLIP O. FOSS. "This scholarly study by a mature political scientist who has lived many years with his subject brings much light into one corner of our domestic politics."—American Political Science Review. 1960. 246 pages. $4.50

Washington State Government

ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANIZATION AND FUNCTIONS. BY DONALD H. WEBSTER, ERNEST H. CAMPBELL, AND GEORGE D. SMITH. A comprehensive description of the state's legislative, executive, and judicial branches. 1948, revised 1962 by DAVID W. STEVENS. 270 pages. $5.00

from your bookseller or university of washington press · seattle 5

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

Systematic Politics:

ELEMENTA POLITICA ET SOCIOLOGICA

by George E. Gordon Catlin

"Not since the eighteenth century—or, more exactly, perhaps, not since Spinoza in the seventeenth century—has there appeared a study of politics so comprehensive in scope and so vigorous in analysis as Catlin's Systematic Politics." Francis D. Wormuth

440 pages      $7.50

The British Cabinet

by John P. Mackintosh

"A book . . . which supersedes all those so far written on the subject. It is a penetrating, stringent, well organised account. Mr. Mackintosh is clearly a historian of distinction . . . a highly acute observer of the contemporary scene." Manchester Guardian

560 pages      $8.25

And being published soon . . .

The Canadian General Election of 1957

by John Meisel

Twenty years of Liberal government ended dramatically in Spring, 1957. Why? An objective and perceptive study of issues, policies, campaigns, leadership, and public opinion.

376 pages, maps      Approx. $7.50

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO PRESS

Toronto 5, Canada

Books shipped in the United States from our Brooklyn warehouse

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

From the Macmillan political science list

A BILL BECOMES A LAW: THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1960

Daniel Berman, The American University

How Congressional procedures play decisive roles in shaping legislation—a step-by-step analysis of the legislative history of one particular bill. Among the unusual procedural devices illustrated are: teller vote, discharge petition, quorum call, and cloture attempt.

1962, 143 pages, paper, $1.75

THE DYNAMICS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and George A. Lincoln, United States Military Academy

Provides a method of systematic analysis applicable to the world order at any time in history. Contemporary issues receive special attention — population explosion, the impact of technology on weapons and communications, problems of economic assistance, and the security problem.

1962, 719 pages, $7.50

THE RELATIONS OF NATIONS, Second Edition

Frederick H. Hartmann, University of Florida

Offers fresh material on Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America, plus a substantial increase in the number of maps. National interests common to all states are examined and the approaches of various states compared.

1962, 710 pages, $7.50

WORLD IN CRISIS: READINGS IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS, 2nd Edition

Frederick H. Hartmann

Forty-six thought-provoking readings, many of them classics in the field. A variety of contrasting opinions appear, as well as approaches of different eras juxtaposed to illustrate the evolution of opinion. The analyses are primarily contemporary.

1962, 398 pages, paper, $3.25

POLITICS U.S.A.: CASES IN THE AMERICAN DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

Andrew M. Scott and Earle Wallace, both of the University of North Carolina

An anthology of case histories illustrating important phases of politics and government. Emphasis is on events within the memory of today's students. Selections are drawn from a wide range of authoritative sources.

1961, 571 pages, paper, $3.50

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, N.Y.

From the Free Press political science list

The first three volumes of The International Yearbook of Political Behavior Research, under the General Editorship of Heinz Eulau:

COMMUNITY POLITICAL SYSTEMS

Edited by Morris Janowitz, University of Chicago

"The selections are...excellent. As case studies of unique and particular community political structures, they provide stimulation and insight for the reader."—Public Administration Review

"Valuable contributions to the theory and methodology of community power studies."
—The Journal of Politics 259 pages, $7.50

POLITICAL DECISION-MAKERS

Edited by Dwaine Marvick, University of California (Los Angeles)

"The papers...are of...high interest and quality.... They illustrate the richness and diversity of the possible approaches to the study of political elites—and political behavior in general.... Such systematic study...involve[s] commitment to more general standards of evidence, inference, and analysis. Such standards are exhibited in this volume."—The American Political Science Review 347 pages, $7.50

CHANGING PATTERNS OF MILITARY POLITICS

Edited by Samuel P. Huntington, Columbia University

"This book is a useful...addition to the growing literature of military politics... providing something of interest to almost any student of politics—from the historian of political ideas to the investigator of small group behavior."—Midwest Journal of Political Science

"Not least among the contributions... is the thirty-page critical bibliography of military writing, the best this reviewer has seen to date."—Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists 272 pages, $7.50

---

FOREIGN POLICY DECISION MAKING

An Approach to the Study of International Politics

Edited by Richard C. Snyder, Northwestern University, H. W. Bruck, Penn-Jersey Transportation Study, and Burton Sapin, U. S. Department of State

This book examines the intellectual foundations and strategies necessary for a science of international politics—and the applications of these strategies to demanding situations. The result is a thorough study of the decision-making process that draws upon techniques from other fields and shows how they may be used in international politics.
Just published, $5.00

THE FREE PRESS OF GLENCOE A Division of The Macmillan Company

PUBLICATIONS OF THE INDIAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

PERIODICALS

	Single Copy	Annual Subscription
Indian Journal of Public Administration (Quarterly) .....	$1.00	$4.00

PUBLICATIONS

The Communal System of Yugoslavia by B. Mukerji .....	$0.60
The Development and Impact of British Administration in India—A Bibliographic Essay by Bernard S. Cohn .....	$1.00
Training for Social Welfare Work: Courses and Institutions (Mimeographed) .....	$0.50

REPORTS OF SEMINARS & CONFERENCES (Mimeographed)

The Pattern of Rural Government (1958) .....	$0.60
Improving City Government (1958) .....	$1.00
Morale in the Public Services (1959) .....	$0.75
Budgeting in India .....	$0.50

(Postage extra)

For fuller information, please write to: The Administration Officer, Indian Institute of Public Administration, Indraprastha Estate, Ring Road, New Delhi-1.

ESPECIALLY RECOMMENDED

PUBLIC POWER IN NEBRASKA

A Report on State Ownership

By Robert E. Firth

Although Nebraska became the only "all public power" state in the nation three decades ago, this is the first definitive account of its history and development. Dr. Firth also provides a forthright discussion of current policy questions besetting the system. 402 pp. $6.00

THE YEAR WE HAD NO PRESIDENT

By Richard H. Hansen

Foreword by Senator Estes Kefauver

A study of the power vacuum problems created by the temporary inability of the President. The author suggests proposals for insuring continuity of leadership. 182 pp. $3.50 (Paper, $1.60)

HUMAN NATURE IN POLITICS

By Graham Wallas

Introduction by A. L. Rowse

"The work stands alone and has a large value for the students of politics." (American Library Association Bulletin). An indispensable collateral reading text. $1.40

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Alliance For Progress

Problems and Perspectives

Commentaries by Milton S. Eisenhower,
José Figueres, Raúl Prebisch, Teodoro Moscoso, and Dean Rusk

Edited by JOHN C. DREIER. Marking the first anniversary of the historic Alliance between the U.S. and Latin America, these essays cover its origin, achievement, and outlook. 146 pages. $3.95

MODERN LIBYA

A Study in Political Development

By MAJID KHADDURI. First full-scale political study of Libya in the postwar era—an account of her formation as an independent nation, her economic, legal and constitutional problems, and her foreign policy. 452 pages. $7.50

BRITAIN AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA

By SAUL ROSE. Chronicle of British dominion in Burma, Thailand, Malaya, Borneo, Singapore, and other areas of south-east Asia—beginning with the first trade outposts of the East India Company, and carrying through the troublesome years after World War II. 256 pages. $5.00

THE FUTURE OF ALASKA

Economic Consequences of Statehood

By GEORGE W. ROGERS. Study of Alaska's political environment, and forecast of the long-range political and economic effects of statehood. By the author of Alaska in Transition. 320 pages. $6.50

At your bookseller's . . . or order from

THE Johns Hopkins
PRESS

Baltimore 18, Maryland

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

5 important books . . . from McGraw-Hill

• AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES

By C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, The University of Chicago. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 480 pages, $4.50 (paper), $5.95 (cloth).

Approximately 50 Supreme Court decisions needed for an understanding of basic American constitutional issues are presented in this case book for American constitutional law and American government courses. The author provides for each constitutional issue a succinct analysis of the historical developments and previous judicial holdings as background for a thorough understanding of the cases selected for this book. The organization is based on issues with about 40 issues included. Dissenting opinions are reprinted as fully as majority views; so that students will have full benefit of the conflict of opinion. Increased emphasis placed on newer issues of civil liberty.

• INCOME AND WELFARE IN THE UNITED STATES

By JAMES N. MORGAN, HARVEY E. BRAZER, WILBUR J. COHEN, all of the University of Michigan; and MARTIN H. DAVID, The University of Wisconsin. 544 pages, $7.95.

A national personal-interview survey is employed to study the distribution and redistribution of income, what determines peoples' incomes, and the intergenerational transmission pattern. The analysis of this survey combines demographic, economic, and social-psychological measurements on each family studied to give a detailed explanation of what determines the economic position of that family.

• TOWARD WORLD ORDER

By AMRY VANDENBOSCH, University of Kentucky, and WILLARD N. HOGAN, State University College, New Paltz, New York. Available January, 1963.

This complete revision of THE UNITED NATIONS provides an explanation of international organization in the context of the modern world political system. A synthesis of descriptive and analytical approaches, book presents both factual information and a critical analysis of problems and issues. It was written for introductory college courses, but is highly recommended for anyone interested in a serious study of the United Nations and other contemporary international organizations.

• POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY

By NORMAN J. G. POUNDS, Indiana University. McGraw-Hill Series in Geography. Available November.

An analysis and explanation of how and why the earth's surface is divided politically. Using a functional approach, this advanced text examines the state and its function and discusses the bases of political power, internal and external. The last chapter discusses the alleged geographical control on political events. Contains a unique discussion on international rivers, transit rights, straits and sea canals of international significance.

• CASES IN PRACTICAL POLITICS

By THE EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey. $0.50 each, available only in multiples of 5 at $2.50 per package.

Utilizing the case method, already applied successfully to business and public administration curricula, the Eagleton Cases are designed to increase understanding of the vital contribution to American democracy of partisan political activity. The cases provide an inside look at practical politics . . . help improve student interest and performance in introductory through graduate courses. The program is a continuous one which will provide constant replenishment of cases and casebooks to assure comprehensive coverage of current political realities, student interests, and teaching needs.

send for your approval copies now

McGRAW-HILL BOOK COMPANY

330 West 42nd Street

New York 36, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

BOOKS

The Revolution in World Politics

Edited by MORTON A. KAPLAN, The University of Chicago. This book offers a collection of essays by well-known experts in political science and international affairs on salient problems and crises in current world politics. Problem areas covered include the challenge of Communist expansion, protest movements in developed and underdeveloped areas, the arms race, and the maintenance of an international legal and political order. Contributors include such figures as Norman Birnbaum, Leonard Binder, Richard A. Falk, Malcolm W. Hoag, and Herman Kahn. 1962. Approx. 528 pages. Prob. $7.95.

Governing the Metropolis

By SCOTT GREER, Northwestern University. A penetrating analysis of the factors that produce large metropolitan agglomerations and the effects of these agglomerations upon the community power structure and governmental system. 1962. 153 pages. Cloth: $4.50. Paper: $2.45.

Intergroup Relations and Leadership

Approaches and Research in Industrial, Ethnic, Cultural, and Political Areas

Edited by MUZAFER SHERIF, University of Oklahoma. Presents a series of detailed studies by leading social scientists which explore problems of inter- and intragroup relations within the contexts of industrial, labor-management, ethnic, community, and international relations. 1962. 284 pages. $5.95.

Organization Theory in Industrial Practice

A Symposium of the Foundation for Research on Human Behavior

Edited by MASON HAIRE, University of California, Berkeley. A collection of contemporary approaches to industrial organization written by successful executives in successful companies. The material covers a wide range of problems, including decentralization, staff, role, change, and authority. 1962. 173 pages. $5.75.

The Political Writings of Jean

Jacques Rousseau — in Two Volumes

With notes and introduction by C. E. VAUGHN. First published in 1915 and out of print for many years, this edition has long been regarded as the definitive edition of Rousseau's political writings. 1962. In press.

Send for examination copies.

John Wiley & Sons, Inc.

440 Park Avenue South, New York 16, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Eyck, Caves, Sylos-Labini, Schmidt

A History of the Weimar Republic

VOLUME I: FROM THE COLLAPSE OF THE EMPIRE TO HINDENBURG'S ELECTION

By Erich Eyck. This is the first English translation of Eyck's famous history of the Weimar Republic. Men who supported the Republic—Ebert, Rathenau, Stresemann—and their opponents, advocates of nationalistic totalitarianism—Papen, Hugenberg, Schleicher, Hindenburg, Hitler—are discussed and evaluated. German history in domestic and international contexts is analyzed—to the death of President Ebert, with which the first volume ends.

$10.00

Air Transporters and Its Regulators

AN INDUSTRY STUDY

By Richard E. Caves. Mr. Caves analyzes the market structure, conduct and performance of the United States domestic passenger lines and shows that the airline industry has structural characteristics that would ensure market results of reasonable quality with less extensive economic regulations.

$10.00

The Law of Labour Relations in Sweden

By Folke Schmidt. Sweden's "middle way" in labor relations has meant a balance between employer and union in a context of free enterprise. Mr. Schmidt examines the history of the Swedish development and analyzes its basic implementation—as in the role of the Labour Court.

$4.25

o

Oligopoly and Technical Progress

By Paolo Sylos-Labini. The author believes that mainly as a consequence of industrial concentration the modern structure of production in advanced countries differs significantly from that of the past century. In industrial markets concentrated and differentiated oligopoly has taken the place of quasi-competitive conditions. Harvard Economic Studies.

$4.75

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Pearl Harbor: Warning and Decision

ROBERTA WOHLSTETTER

Foreword by Thomas C. Schelling. This carefully documented work has been called by Samuel Eliot Morison "The best book by far on the question of why we were surprised at Pearl Harbor. . . . It ought finally to dispose of some of the nonsense about Pearl Harbor that has been written." By reconstructing in detail the intelligence picture as it looked to the participants before the Pearl Harbor attack, the author illuminates controversies that have raged for over twenty years. $7.50

Peasant Nationalism and Communist Power

The Emergence of Revolutionary China, 1937-1945

CHALMERS A. JOHNSON

This book offers a radically new and altogether convincing interpretation of the Chinese Communists' rise to power. After establishing a tentative definition of mass nationalism, the author tests this definition against a detailed history of the Chinese resistance movement during the Japanese occupation, using as a control the rise of the Yugoslav Partisan movement.

November. $5.75

Soviet Administrative Legality

The Role of the Attorney General's Office

GLENN G. MORGAN

A study of the function of the Soviet Procuracy (Attorney General's Office): ascertaining the conformity of enactments issued by lower authorities with laws and decrees promulgated by higher governmental agencies, and checking on the "strict execution of the laws" by various offices and officials. The history of this dual function under the Soviets and its uses as a tool in implementing the policies of the regime is examined. September. $6.00

Order from your bookstore, please

STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD BOOKS

OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

---

STRATEGY AND TACTICS OF SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

By J. M. MACKINTOSH. This book examines the major policy decisions of the U.S.S.R. made since 1944, the year which saw the beginnings of the Soviet bloc as we know it today. The author shows which types of decision are likely to be abandoned as unfruitful, and which are fundamental to Soviet policy and of both immediate and long-range concern to the Western world.
$8.00

MEXICO

Revolution to Evolution, 1940-1960

By HOWARD F. CLINE. The Director of the Hispanic Foundation, Library of Congress, presents the history of the two eventful decades since the exciting days of General Cardenas. He discusses the booming Mexican economy; Mexican political stability, and the famous single-party democracy; agrarian reform; labor movements; education; and international affairs. 19 statistical appendices; annotated select bibliography; 25 maps; 5 diagrams. (Royal Institute of International Affairs)
$6.75

DEMOCRACY AND THE COST OF POLITICS IN BRITAIN

By W. B. GWYN. This volume shows the relationship between the 19th-century transition to political democracy and the cost of a parliamentary career in Britain, concentrating on the years 1832-1918. An epilogue delineates election expenditures from 1918-1959.
$5.60

DOCUMENTS ON CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY, 1917-1939

Edited by WALTER A. RIDDELL. This first collection of documents on Canadian foreign policy ever to be published gives a clear picture of Canada's external policies during the vital period when the country attained full independence. Professor Riddell's introduction summarizes events up to 1917, and synthesizes his subject groupings of the documents by giving a connected account of the conduct of external relations.
$13.50

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York 16

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

OXFORD BOOKS

OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

---

NOMADS AND COMMISSARS

Mongolia Revisited

By OWEN LATTIMORE. A lively picture of Mongolia today, by the only American who has traveled in all the major regions of the China-Russia frontier and also speaks and reads the three most important languages of that frontier. Beginning with a geographical and historical survey, the author goes on to explain how Marxism succeeded in a country of nomads, and how Mongolia keeps its balance between the two giants of Communism. 8 pages of halftones. $5.75

MITRE AND SCEPTRE

Transatlantic Faiths, Ideas, Personalities, and Politics 1689-1775

By CARL BRIDENBAUGH. "A most excellent study. It documents fully from both English and Colonial sources the manner in which the drive for an established Anglican Church in the Colonies fostered the rise of revolutionary demands for complete civil and religious liberty . . . A fascinating account . . . It definitely will supersede all the older accounts." L. J. TRINTERUD, McCormick Theological Seminary. 3 halftones. $7.50

LINCOLN AND THE NEGRO

By BENJAMIN QUARLES. A leading scholar of American Negro history traces, for the first time in detail, the important changes in Lincoln's attitude toward the Negro—and the equally important changes in the Negro's attitude that were vital in giving Lincoln his unique place in American history. "Professor Quarles handles his ambiguous theme with candor, realism, and excellent balance."—N.Y. Herald Tribune. 4 pages of halftones. $6.50

PATRIOTIC GORE

Studies in the Literature of the American Civil War

By EDMUND WILSON. "A monumental achievement."—WILLIAM BARRETT, Atlantic Monthly. "Really a great book . . . it makes the passion that went into the war, and the disillusionment that followed it, more affecting than has any book in recent memory."—ALFRED KAZIN, The Reporter. Over 850 pages. $8.50

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York 16

---

The Galleon Series in Economics, History, Philosophy and Political Science

---

Just Out

CANADA VOTES: Howard A. Scarrow

A handbook of Federal and Provincial Election data.

$12.00

LC 62-14822

THE CONFLICT SOCIETY: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America

By KALMAN H. SILVERT, Tulane University

The Conflict Society attempts to breathe order into the complex events of social change in today's Latin America.

$7.50

LC 61-12686

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS, A British View:

The Journal of Major C. R. FORREST

Hugh F. Rankin, Editor

$2.00

LC 61-13685

Recent Publications

EXTRADITION TO AND FROM CANADA, By G. V. LA FOREST

A comprehensive treatment of Canadian law and practice in international and inter-Commonwealth extradition.

$6.50

LC 61-7029

THE CATHOLIC VOTE, By JOHN H. FENTON

"This competent study is written without bias, and constitutes a reliable exposition of a problem of great topicality at the present time."

The Book Exchange (London)

$4.75

LC 60-12512

U. S. COMMERCIAL TREATIES AND
INTERNATIONAL LAW, By ROBERT R. WILSON

". . . an authoritative contribution to the literature on treaty law . . ."

American Political Science Review

$6.50

LC 60-11021

CONTEMPT OF CONGRESS, By CARL BECK

"A masterful organization of material . . . essential for any law library with pretention to adequacy." Law Library Journal

$4.50

LC 59-15941

Wartime Origins of the East-West

DILEMMA OVER GERMANY, By JOHN L. SNELL

"His account of the development of United States policy is the fullest and most painstaking currently available." Journal of Politics

$7.00

LC 59-12404

POLITICS IN THE BORDER STATES, By JOHN H. FENTON

". . . excellent example of the combination of historical, statistical, and interviewing techniques in the study of state politics." Public Administration Review

$5.50

LC 58-16327

Once Again Available

A Distinguished Text

AN INTRODUCTION TO

PEIRCE'S PHILOSOPHY, By JAMES K. FEIBLEMAN

$7.00

THE HAUSER PRESS

720 POYDRAS ST.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

new!

FOUNDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

by Harold G. Sprout and Margaret Sprout

—the continuing scientific and technological revolution, new dimensions of violence, shrinking space, dwindling climatic obstacles, rising consumption of natural resources, the strains and stresses of societies everywhere, spreading literacy, shifting ideological appeals, developing international institutions—

Against a background of these characteristics, and many other features of our changing world, FOUNDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS views the historic international system, its successive transformations, and its current transitions toward new patterns. The emphasis throughout is on the changes in foundations—changes which render increasingly obsolete old and accustomed ways of thinking about world affairs. This book represents a fresh effort in providing the student with a frame of concepts, theories, and basic knowledge that have enduring value for understanding the rapidly changing international scene. The authors have integrated with their original writing (well over half the total) carefully chosen selections from a wide variety of sources.

740 pages

September

Text Ed. $8.75

The VAN NOSTRAND POLITICAL SCIENCE SERIES

General Editor

Dr. Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland

new!

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS: BASIC DOCUMENTS

Second Edition

By Elmer Plischke

—proven as the key to an effective study of foreign governments—
Documents, tables, structure and generic charts, series of sequential documents, facsimiles of diplomatic consular credentials, and full texts of major charters and covenants—organized by principal topical areas.

206 pages

Fall

Prob. $4.25

new!

GOVERNMENT and POLITICS in the middle east in the twentieth century

by H. B. Sharabi

6 x 9

295 pages

$8.75

new!

SEARCHLIGHT BOOKS

October

Under the general editorship of
G. ETZEL PEARCY and GEORGE W. HOFFMAN

original paperback editions $1.45

- 5 THE COMMON MARKET: THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY IN ACTION
by J. Warren Nystrom and Peter Melof
- 6 CENTRAL AMERICA—LAND OF LORDS AND LIZARDS
by Thorsten V. Kalijarvi
- 7 PUERTO RICO—ALLY FOR PROGRESS
by Earl Parker Hanson
- 8 SPACE: FRONTIER UNLIMITED
by Harold Leland Goodwin

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC

120 ALEXANDER STREET
PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

American Scientists and Nuclear Weapons Policy

By Robert Gilpin

The author contends that the emergence of the scientist into the mainstream of American political life is one of the great events of our history. He emphasizes the growing need for effective measures for integrating scientist-advisers into national policy-making processes. This well documented book will be of lasting value to both scientists and public administrators, and it will be of vital interest to all concerned with problems of the nuclear era.

368 pages. $6.95

Order from your bookstore, or

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

Princeton, New Jersey

1963-64 CONGRESSIONAL FELLOWSHIPS

The deadline for submitting applications for the 1963-64 Congressional Fellowship Program is December 1, 1962. Applicants must be between the ages of 23 and 35.

Qualifications:

- For Political Scientists —Completion or near completion of Ph.D. in political science. Preference will be given to persons who are teaching or who intend to teach.
- For Journalists —Bachelor's degree and at least one year of professional experience in newspaper, magazine, radio or television work. Graduate students who intend to enter journalism also will be considered.
- For Law School Faculty—LL.B. degree and at least one year's teaching experience in an accredited law school.
Members

Further information and application blanks may be obtained from:

The American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

BIOGRAPHICAL DIRECTORY
of
THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

FOURTH EDITION, 1961

Edited by FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

- The latest biographical material on all individual members of the Association, including degrees, academic and non-academic careers, publications and fields of interest.
- Two listings of members—one alphabetically, one geographically.
- Members classified into fields of primary interest.
- Concise format for easy reference.
- Descriptive and background material about the Association.

Clothbound: $12.50

Paperbound: $10.00

Orders should be sent to:

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

APSA GROUP
TERM INSURANCE

On November 1, 1962 the program of Group Term Insurance sponsored by the Association will begin its third year. During the first year, more than 600 members of the Association joined the Program for a total of well over six million dollars worth of insurance in force.

In view of the unusually good actuarial experience of the Association, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company has agreed to modify the medical provisions for members of the Association who failed to take out the insurance at the inception of the Program. Members can now apply by merely filling out a short yes-or-no questionnaire supplied by the Company. New members, of course, can still join the program by merely filling out an application blank.

For additional information, members should write directly to the Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

Appleton-Century-Crofts . . . . .	810, 811	The Macmillan Company . . . . .	828
Atherton Press . . . . .	554	McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. . . . .	832
		University of Minnesota Press . . . . .	821
University of Chicago Press . . . . .	813	University of Nebraska Press . . . . .	830
Columbia University Press . . . . .	812
Cornell University Press . . . . .	Cover III	Oxford University Press . . . . .	809, 836, 837
CURRENT . . . . .	820	Frederick A. Praeger, Publisher . . . . .	807
		Prentice-Hall, Inc. . . . .	817, 825
E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. . . . .	824	Princeton University Press . . . . .	840
The Free Press of Glencoe . . . . .	814, 829	Rand McNally & Company . . . . .	Cover IV
		Random House . . . . .	818, 819
Harper & Row, Publishers . . . . .	Cover II, 551	The Ronald Press Company . . . . .	806
Harvard University Press . . . . .	808, 834
The Hauser Press . . . . .	838	Stanford University Press . . . . .	835
Holt, Rinehart & Winston . . . . .	553	University Bookman . . . . .	816
		University of Toronto Press . . . . .	827
Johns Hopkins Press . . . . .	831	D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc. . . . .	839
The INDIAN JOURNAL OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION . . . . .	830	University of Washington Press . . . . .	826
		John Wiley & Sons, Inc. . . . .	833
Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. . . . .	822, 823	Yale University Press . . . . .	815

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION'S

Personnel Service . . .

The American Political Science Association's Personnel Service operates as a "clearing house," bringing together political scientists seeking positions and prospective employers. Registration in the service is open to all members of the Association. Here are the details of its operation.

Position Openings

- A Newsletter is mailed monthly to those seeking positions through the Personnel Service.
- The Newsletter lists, by code number, position openings and job descriptions.

Referral of Applications

- Biographical data sheets and letters of reference are maintained in an individual file for all of those registered with the Personnel Service.
- These materials are mailed, on request, to prospective employers listing job openings in the Newsletter.

Employers Using the Service

- Any employer may use the Association's Personnel Service.
- Types of positions listed include teaching and research on the university level, research and administrative positions with professional organizations, research and administrative positions with federal, state and local government agencies.

Registration Fee

- An annual fee of $5.00 entitles members of the Association to register with the Personnel Service.

For further information concerning registration write to:

Miss Cora Prifold, Director, Personnel Service
The American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

APSA CHARTER FLIGHTS TO EUROPE

Summer—1963

The Association will again sponsor charter flights to Europe during the summer of 1963. Two flights are planned:

- Flight A will leave approximately June 15 and return approximately September 1.
- Flight B will leave approximately August 1 and return approximately August 31.

The round-trip price will be under $275.00 per seat. Both flights will originate at New York International Airport.

A deposit of $100.00 per seat is required. Deadline for deposits for charter flights A and B are March 1 and April 1 respectively.

For further information write to:

Miss Patricia Pearson
American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

- HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University
SAMUEL H. BEER, Associate Editor, Harvard University
OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University
ANDREW HACKER, Cornell University
DWIGHT WALDO, University of California, Berkeley
HAROLD STEIN, Princeton University
JOHN D. LEWIS, Oberlin College
ROWLAND EGGER, University of Virginia

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

- VICTOR T. LE VINE, Acting Book Review Editor, Washington University
RALPH A. STRAETZ, News and Notes Editor, New York University
JULIAN FELDMAN, University of California
CECELIA M. KENYON, Smith College
FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE, University of Maryland
HIRAM M. STOUT, George Washington University
CORINNE SILVERMAN, Index and Retrieval Systems, Inc.

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR
100 University Hall, Ohio State
University, 216 N. Oval Dr.,
Columbus 10, Ohio

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

---

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy. Prices of other issues are furnished on request.

Applications for membership, orders for the REVIEW, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the REVIEW to Harvey C. Mansfield, 100 University Hall, 216 N. Oval Dr., Ohio State University, Columbus 10, Ohio; books intended for review, to Victor T. Le Vine, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.; News and Notes items, to Ralph A. Straetz, Department of Political Science, New York University, University Heights, New York 53, N.Y.; advertising correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the REVIEW before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the REVIEW, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

---

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1963, by The American Political Science Association.

---

---

explorations in political science . . .

---

SOVIET UNION: Paradox and Change

Robert T. Holt, John E. Turner, both of the University of Minnesota, et. al.

A group of experts on Soviet affairs have contributed a variety of perceptive essays to this unusual new book. Their comments throw valuable light on seven key areas of contemporary life in the USSR: city growth; economic changes; agricultural production; science and technology; education; youth; radio and television. (1962; 256 pp.; $2.50 paper; $4.50 cloth)

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL DICTIONARY

Jack C. Plano and Milton Greenberg, both of Western Michigan University

Over 1,100 political terms are defined and placed in their proper context by political science professors Plano and Greenberg. The important "working vocabulary" essential to the political scientist or informed citizen is concisely presented in relation to the problems, practices, institutions, and organizations within our democratic government. (1962; 395 pp.; $3.95 paper; $5.95 case bound)

THE LOGIC OF DEMOCRACY

Thomas Landon Thorson, University of Wisconsin

This courageous, scholarly and perceptive evaluation of democracy utilizes the technique of modern logical analysis. The central ideologies of political democracy are critically defined in a uniquely objective discussion that is sure to provoke constructive discussion on crucial contemporary issues. (1962; 172 pp.; $2.25 paper)

ESSAYS ON THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF POLITICS

Herbert J. Storing (editor), University of Chicago; Walter Berns, Cornell University; Robert Horwitz, Michigan State University; Leo Strauss, University of Chicago; Leo Weinstein, Smith College

Frankly critical essays examine a controversial mode of political conduct. The five eminently qualified contributors discuss such questions as the use of modern political science for propaganda; the scientific approach as a guide to decision making; the credibility of a totally objective science of politics. (1962; 340 pp.; $5.50)

HOLT, RINEHART AND WINSTON, INC.

383 Madison Avenue, New York 17

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS FROM ATHERTON PRESS

Just published

THE POLITICS OF REAPPORTIONMENT

Malcolm E. Jewell, University of Kentucky, Editor

Legislative and Congressional apportionment has long been a matter of concern to political scientists and politicians who recognize the startling inequalities in representation existing in many states. Since the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr, reapportionment has also come to the forefront of public interest. This timely book—the only one in print dealing in detail with the problem on a state-by-state level—examines in eighteen original essays the causes and cures of a situation which threatens the very existence of representative democracy. In his introductory chapter Malcolm Jewell reviews some of the unanswered questions raised by the court's decision. In the remaining chapters, the problems and prospects of reapportionment are discussed for Ohio, Illinois, Pennsylvania, California, New York, North Carolina, West Virginia, Tennessee, Maryland, Michigan, Florida, Colorado, Kentucky, and Texas. *November 1962. Pp. xii + 334. $6.75 net.**

CONTEMPORARY APPROACHES TO CREATIVE THINKING

Edited by H. Gruber, G. Terrell, M. Wertheimer, with original essays by Jerome Bruner, The Conditions of Creativity; Mary Henle, The Birth and Death of Ideas; Allen Newell, J. C. Shaw, and Herbert A. Simon, The Processes of Creative Thinking; Richard Crutchfield, Conformity and Creative Thinking; David McClelland, On the Psychodynamics of Creative Physical Scientists; and Robert MacLeod, Retrospect and Prospect.

The breadth of scholarship represented in these six essays brings to bear on the vital problem of human creativity the experience of centuries and many disciplines. This book reflects the thinking of some of the best minds in behavioral science and sketches the direction in which the future study of creativity might go. *October 1962. Pp. xv + 223. $6.50 net.**

March 1963 publication

COURT ON TRIAL

Charles S. Hyneman, Indiana University

AMERICAN BUSINESS AND PUBLIC POLICY:

The Issue of Foreign Trade

Raymond A. Bauer, Harvard University; Ithiel de Sola Pool, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; and Lewis A. Dexter

GOVERNMENT OF THE ATOM:

The Integration of Powers

Harold P. Green, Attorney, Washington, D.C.; and Alan Rosenthal, Hunter College

* Please order all books directly from the publisher.

---

ATHERTON PRESS

---

70 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 11, NEW YORK

---

A DIVISION OF PRENTICE-HALL, INCORPORATED

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LVI

DECEMBER, 1962

NO. 4

FREE SPEECH: AT WHAT PRICE?*

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN
Indiana University

It is now 30 years since Mr. Felix Frankfurter, then law teacher, called upon the political scientists for help. I propose to consider in what manner we might respond to his appeal.

In a review of the first book by one of our now distinguished colleagues, Mr. Frankfurter urged political scientists and economists to quit trying to be lawyers and to act more like specialists in the study of human relationships. "What we have a right to expect from economists and political scientists," he said, "is an analysis of what true governmental problems are, in the light of what actually goes on in the world and wholly apart from the technicalities of American constitutional law. . . . Until the economists and political scientists attend to their special tasks and we lawyers to ours and each has awareness of the other's problems, we shall continue to have . . . cross-sterilization of the social disciplines."<sup>1</sup>

Last week Mr. Frankfurter terminated a quarter century of service on the nation's highest tribunal. From that tribunal come oracular pronouncements of profound significance, fixing bounds to the power of law-making assemblies. I have read many of these pronouncements with considerable care, and I am convinced that the men who utter them need a kind of assistance which the political scientists can supply. I propose, therefore, to give you my judgment as to how this profession may render a service which one of the nation's most eminent jurists called for 30 years ago.

I shall speak about the problem of putting meaning into the Constitution's declaration that Congress—and by extension the 50 state legislatures—shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press. And my objectives will be to identify certain aspects of that problem most likely to be illuminated by the political scientist's kind of attack and, having found the site for our effort, to say enough about what we might do to convince you that we ought to move in with our tools.

The Supreme Court has not yet come to agreement on the basic presumptions which will underlie the decision of nicer issues of legislative authority relating to speech and press. At least two present members of the Court, Justices Black and Douglas, have declared their commitment to a presumption that the prohibitions of the First Amendment are absolute—that the prohibitions of laws which abridge the freedom of speech or press are absolute denials of power to impose restraints on speech and press. It will come out in a moment, however, that they favor a qualified absoluteness.

Opposed to the idea of absolute prohibition is the so-called balancing doctrine—the contention that the nation's interest in freedom of speech and press is in competition with its interests in some other valued things that sometimes are endangered by unrestrained expression, that the competing interests ought to be evaluated and balanced out, and therefore that a test of reasonableness ought to be applied in litigation where abridgment of speech or press is charged.

A third point of view about the fundamental character of the free speech guarantee has been pressed with great persistence by Professor Alexander Meikeljohn of the University of Chicago. The First Amendment, according to him, protects political communication only. It is designed to keep government from restraining what people say in their efforts to instruct, criticize, and control their government. As respects political speech, the prohibition is absolute. As respects all other expression, Professor Meikeljohn argues, government may abridge freedom of speech and press so long as it does not violate any of the constitutional limitations found elsewhere in the Constitution. When a restraint of non-political speech is challenged on due process grounds, for instance, a court should evaluate the gains and losses which can be credited to the act, and determine its validity by application of tests of reasonableness.

* Presidential address, American Political Science Association, Washington, D. C., September 5, 1962.

<sup>1</sup> Harvard Law Review, Vol. 45 (1932), p. 764.

No matter which of these three basic presumptions controls judicial thinking about laws that have an impact on self-expression and communication, critical decisions will turn on tests of reasonableness. This is admittedly so, and obviously so, in the case of the balancing doctrine; reason inevitably must rule when choice is made among competing values. Reason, therefore, must rule under the Meikeljohn formula when the restraining act is found to encumber non-political speech.

It has been argued that the concept of absolute prohibition excludes a concept of reasonableness. Justice Douglas has stated emphatically and repeatedly that inquiry into what is reasonable is wholly inappropriate when a court is convinced that speech or press has in fact been restrained. Indeed, I think it likely that Justices Douglas and Black, and Professor Meikeljohn when he contemplates utterances that have political significance, endorse the idea of absolute prohibition because they expect it to remove controversy about what is reasonable from the judicial forum.

In my judgment this is a vain hope. The absolute prohibition doctrine runs squarely into issues of reasonableness at three points. When you examine what Justices Black and Douglas have said from the bench and in addresses delivered at other places, you learn that one of them or both of them has asserted: first, that the First Amendment does not protect all kinds of verbal expression; second, that expression which the First Amendment does protect sometimes loses protection because it is inextricably mixed up with other action; and third, that statements which ordinarily are immune from restraint by government may be forbidden if the words can be said to be the efficient cause of certain punishable actions.

Consider these statements by the two men who have, more than once, said that the prohibitions imposed by the First Amendment are absolute:

Justice Black in a public address, two years ago: "There is a question as to whether the

First Amendment was intended to protect speech that courts find 'obscene'.<sup>2</sup>

Justice Douglas, speaking also for Justice Black and Chief Justice Warren in 1957: "Of course, we have always recognized that picketing has aspects which make it more than speech. . . . I would adhere to the principle . . . that this form of expression can be regulated or prohibited only to the extent that it forms an essential part of a course of conduct which the State can regulate or prohibit."<sup>3</sup>

Justice Douglas, speaking only for himself, in the Dennis case in 1951: "The freedom to speak is not absolute; the teaching of methods of terror and other seditious conduct should be beyond the pale along with obscenity and immorality."

The bounds of legislative power to abridge speech and press on each of these three frontiers, can be fixed only after the judge has decided where a reasonable man would draw the line. I have not time to trace the reasoning which leads to this conclusion. Call to mind the consequences of John Marshall's effort to skirt around the morass of reasonableness inherent in the necessary and proper clause. Find out, he said, whether the act of Congress falls within the commerce power; if the act is an exercise of the commerce power we need not inquire whether it is necessary and proper for the regulation of commerce, for the power to regulate commerce is plenary, whole, complete. By this strategy the judges slipped away from questions of reasonableness at one point, only to walk straight into them at another—when does commerce begin and end?—what is a direct and what is an indirect impact on goods in movement?—and so on. I trust you have not forgotten the E. C. Knight case, Hammer v. Dagenhart, Carter v. Carter Coal Company.

Believing, as I do, that a rule of reason will control the decisions that mark the front of a developing constitutional law of free speech and press, I can tell the political scientist where he should stake out his claim and assemble his tools. The scholarly study which helps lawmakers and judges decide what government may reasonably do to regulate the speech and other expression of the nation—this is what God had in mind for them to do when he created political scientists.

This is a worthy and urgent mission. How shall we go about the job? I shall comment briefly on each of three gateways into this jungle of human relationships.

<sup>2</sup> "Bill of Rights," New York University Law Review, Vol. 35, p. 865, at p. 867.

<sup>3</sup> International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. Vogt, 354 U. S. 284, at 297 (1957).

One. There is need for a fuller and more careful ordering of communication and non-communicative expression, and their relationships to the values, beliefs, expectations, and behavior of men and women.

Two. It is obvious on a reading of judicial opinions and scholarly literature, that our best thought would profit from a few alternative analytic designs—models of analysis designed to identify and relate to one another the components of an issue of unrestrained speech versus restricted speech.

Three. There is need for a fresh look, and a hard look, at the intellectual supports for the grand presumption in favor of unrestrained verbal expression which underlies virtually every bit of our serious literature.

An equal attention to all three of these points would allow very little time for any of them. I prefer to expand my remarks on the first two. The scrutiny of intellectual foundations, which any of you, or Justice Frankfurter, might think the Number 1 assignment for political scientists will be disposed of right now in the few sentences I can allow.

A hard look at the intellectual foundations might reveal that the case for free speech, as it is made in contemporary American literature, rests mainly on a distrust of government rather than on a high esteem for a free flow of information and a lively combat among the ideas that compete to control action. Note the lack of acknowledgment in this literature that legal regulation of a communication problem, in many instances, may have as its result a freeing rather than a trammeling of communication—this result because enactment of a law on the subject gives the moderates in the community a talking point which restrains the more passionate part of the population from a do-it-ourselves job of policing. The hard look might help us put together more intelligently our supposition that the pen is mightier than the sword and our wish to secure and preserve certain cultural gains. Can anyone doubt that the communication of man to man facilitates the step backward as well as the step forward? Are we so committed to an idea of progress that we must believe that all social change is for the better—therefore that all argument and agitation for change must inevitably result in cultural advance? Contemplating the history of pogroms and genocide in our own time, I am unable to understand why there is so little support, if indeed there is any support in our literature, for governmental action designed to lessen or prevent the indoctrination of children which produces adults who seek relief in persecution. Do we believe that impregnation with hate ought to be tolerated so that all of us may be enlightened and ennobled by the debate it excites? Or are we simply overpowered by uncertainties, not trusting our elected officials to select for extirpation at the stage of character formation the evil which we will later demand that they destroy on the battlefield?

You will see why I believe we need a speculative attack on the free speech problem by a mind as disciplined as that of John Stuart Mill, and as free from compulsion by previous writing as Mill appears to have been. You may see, also, why I am reluctant to foreguess what I will be told when one of you writes that book.

I speak with more confidence about the other two enterprises I recommend—the careful ordering of situations in which issues of free speech versus restraint arise, and the development of models for analysis of such issues.

On the first of these assignments, the general survey which reveals where the problems lie, let us start with the forum. Most of our writing is about communication from man to man out in the open. If this be the ordinary situation, then there are special situations that ought to be brought into fuller cognition and recognition.

Citizen to His Government. Possibly this is where speech and press ought to be most unrestrained. But there must be limits as to when and where the citizen can speak to his servant. The judge must be immune from the helpful coaching which interested spectators can supply throughout the trial. And the Senators have a point when they say they hear enough if they listen only to one another when they sit in formal session. If we thought more about it, we might conclude that we ought to impose some further conditions on the forum when the individual competes with the great organization in pressing his interests on elected officials or administrative agents. I think this is a hard surface on which we should sharpen our ideas about equality.

Government to Citizen. When the President was elected, I stood firmly planted in a state of nature, determined to scrutinize the deeds of my servant and help remove him from office if he did not meet my expectations. By the time his first term was up I had been made over. When I voted to give him a second term, and a third term, and a fourth term, did my vote testify to a conviction that a public servant had fulfilled my expectations? Or did my voting merely prove that I had been sweet-talked into accepting anything he chose to give? If you think this is a dilemma only for fuzzy thinkers, ponder the uses of the bureaucracy. The Congressmen may not enact a law which forbids the individual or a group to conduct a propaganda campaign designed to terminate a social practice or uproot a moral commitment of the population. May the Congressmen set a bureaucratic force on a counter propaganda campaign intended to smother the reformers and make ineffective the communication which they are guaranteed a right to advance—and pay for the governmentally based campaign with money exacted from you, me, and the man who got buried?

Communication within Government. A few days ago Senator Hubert Humphrey, the majority party's whip in the Senate, introduced me to some of his friends from Minnesota—introduced me as one of his teachers. I told the Senator's friends that there was one thing I had failed to teach the Senator—that is, that a leader of the Democratic party can never be sure who is going to filibuster. I am sorry the Senator is not here tonight, for I would have reminded him that, throughout the decade before he was born, United States Senators who called themselves liberals, were chafing at gag rule. Abuses of speech and restrictions of speech within government are not likely to be litigated under the First Amendment. But they lie in that universe of expression and communication to which the nation must bring order, and in respect to which the political scientists must bring counsel.

Communication within Non-Governmental Organizations. I think Justice Holmes did us a disservice with his reference to yelling "Fire!" in a theatre. Speaking from the floor while the play is in progress on the stage ought not be governed by the rules which govern communication on the street corner. We have supposed that the presiding officer properly determines the order of speakers where all have an invitation to speak. Would anyone argue that the Constitution forbids lawmakers to empower presiding officers, school teachers, and football referees to impose silence on the many while one person makes himself heard?

The Carriers of Messages. Does the guarantee of free press deny government the power to impose an obligation to carry messages? Is the right of an editor to print his own crazy ideas a right to keep out of his publication the ideas of all other men he thinks to be crazy—or the ideas he thinks worthy but unsuitable for immature readers? Consider the public need for news in a one-newspaper town; the stranglehold on the flow of information and ideas that lies within the power of the great newsgathering organizations like Associated Press.

Finally, that special forum, The Schoolroom. What is the right of government to intervene in the development of character and the equipment of a child for a man's understanding? Does the wish of the constitution-makers and our own confirming determination to have a system of free speech deny us the right to use government to impose educational goals on unwilling parents? Silly question? Consider this confident statement by a man of considerable distinction in the literature of constitutional law as it relates to civil rights. Professor Milton R. Konvitz speaking:

The state may compel parents to send their child to a public or private school where he would acquire the basic means with which to search for the truth in his own way . . . it would follow that the state may prescribe only the minimum number of subjects, study of which would be compulsory, such as English, spelling, arithmetic, American history and geography, and hygiene. . . . The state should not make secondary education compulsory as against the claims of religious objectors; for I do not see that a free, pluralistic society stands to lose in the long run if some people know their holy books thoroughly but are ignorant of Faulkner and Hemingway or even of Shakespeare, as long as they have acquired the basic tools for the pursuit of secular knowledge and there is a public library in their community to which they can go for books.<sup>4</sup>

I trust I have said enough to make clear what kind of assignment I recommend for political scientists when I urge them to provide an orderly array of the significant relationships between our verbal expression and our other interests and activities. My brief remarks do not disclose the magnitude of that assignment. A scholar's report of the significant relationships will attend to the content of expression and the ear that hears the message, as well as the forum in which the word is delivered. If tests of reasonableness are to determine whether government may impede or inhibit a particular expression, the judge will have to satisfy himself as to the importance of the message to the individual who utters it, to the individual who receives, and to the society which may profit or lose if such messages move freely among the population. When you put the values which support the application of restraint on the scales with the personal and social evaluation of the message, the outcome will vary according to whether the utterance is a groan or a grunt, a foul expletive, a blasphemous assertion of conviction, the idle chatter of a rattle brain, and on through a succession of categories up to the vital message that answers the question: What shall I do to be saved?

<sup>4</sup> Fundamental Liberties of a Free People (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1957), p. 122.

Intermixed with the importance of the message—perhaps inseparably blended—is the character of the audience. You would not allow adults to go about the playgrounds advising white children to beat up their Negro playmates; you might be reluctant to forbid the publication of a book which urged the same course of action on adults. The textbook intended for students in medical school may appropriately carry instructions which you would not permit in a book advertised as a do-it-yourself handbook of abortion. (Credit Mr. Malcolm Cowley for the illustration.<sup>5</sup>) The remark which is thought highly appropriate if whispered to an attractive companion may fall before the test of reasonableness if addressed to a group of old ladies.

I am confident that Justice Frankfurter will endorse the surveying job which I have described as eminently suited to the special competence of political scientists. He might insist that lawyers are better equipped than political scientists for the next assignment which I present for your consideration. I referred to it earlier as the development of models of analysis which have as their purpose to identify and relate to one another the components of a free speech case. How do you evaluate an act of government—legislative, administrative, or judicial—which imposes a restraint upon speech or press? This is what the judge must do in any litigation where the validity of the restraint stands or falls on tests of reasonableness. I am convinced that none of the judges to date—and this goes for Justice Black, Justice Douglas, Justice Frankfurter, and Judge Learned Hand—I am convinced that none of the judges has so far produced an opinion that stands as proof that his decision rests on a comprehensive, sharply discriminating, and systematic scrutiny of the known and probable social consequences of the act under consideration. I think that the interests and the training which mark the thoughtful and competent political scientist make our discipline a prime hope for fulfillment of this need.

We must presume that there is more than one rewarding way of going about the evaluation of a public policy. I would not venture even to guess what alternative approaches and procedures may be turned up in a generation of assiduous scholarly study. In order to make sure that you understand what kind of enterprise I have in mind, I will give you the outlines of my personal attack on this problem.

The structure which I have adopted to guide my own analysis rests on three foundations: value position; suppositions and beliefs about effectiveness of means to ends; and attitudes toward uncertainty.

I can handle value position when I view a thing, a matter, as instrumental; I can do nothing with value viewed as ultimate, self-fulfilling, esthetic. If you tell me that nothing, absolutely nothing, gives you more satisfaction than popping your knuckles, about all I can do to straighten you out is to call your attention to other things you might value more highly if you gave them a trial. But if you say you pop your knuckles because that is the best way you have found to attract attention and cause people to seek your company, I can make a display of evidence glued together by reasoning which may convince you that you had better look for another way of making friends and influencing people. Value, to be a useful concept in analysis, must be instrumental value.

You can fix a value for free speech and press by generalizing the utility of expression—by a conception that free expression is essential to an open society, or to maintenance of democratic government, or to some other end equally sweeping and inclusive. The generalized approach, in which the instrumental value of expression is seen as diffused rather than identified with particular goals, is helpful in fixing foundation presumptions concerning public policy. As I see it, the usefulness of the generalized approach ends with the fixing of presumption. I regret that the limits you fix for listening prevent an explanation of why I believe this.

The identification, differentiation, and evaluation of means to an end is extremely difficult in any social situation that we conceive to be a significant problem. It is especially so where the problem is the rightfulness of an act of government which impedes or inhibits verbal expression. Consider the simple case of courtship and the hospital. Value 1—Romance. Value 2—Quiet for hospital patients. Means to romance—the serenade from the sidewalk and the call to trysting place when the nurse sticks her head out of the window. Means to quiet for patients—a city ordinance which, admittedly abridging the freedom of communication, makes it a penal offense to play a banjo, sing joyfully or plaintively, or call out in a loud voice on side walk or street adjacent to hospital grounds.

<sup>5</sup> In Saturday Review for July 7, 1962.

Two central points then, in the evaluation of means to valued ends. First courtship. Maybe the nurse will ordinarily or always not hear the call to romance. If she does hear, the public exposure of her availability may excite a disposition to mayhem which thwarts the swain's visions of fond embrace. Countless are the obstacles which obstruct the path of true love.

This is only one side of the end-means equation. Consider means for achieving Value 2—the quiet which promises rest for patients in hospitals. Maybe patients never hear serenades and yelling from the sidewalk because doctors and nurses make too big a racket. If heard maybe the sound is a reassuring connection with the outside world. Indeed, the behavior which the city fathers sought to frustrate may have therapeutic effects worthy of an appropriation for periodic serenades.

I choose this simple illustration because it presents the elements of decision which confront us in all cases of actual or proposed restraint of speech or press. Always, I am sure, there are differences of belief about what the particular speech or publication is good for—what valued end the speech or publication advances and how surely it advances that end. Always, I am sure, there are differences of belief about what the proposed restraint is good for. Will the law which forbids the address actually keep the message from being broadcast? Will the restraints which are imposed neatly excise the evil they are intended to combat, or will they spread their effects to consequences we are unwilling to incur? And so on.

This is only the start of analysis. Are there not other means by which the valued end could be achieved? The swain can make a call on the telephone or send a letter—with flowers. The hospital can be insulated against outside noises. We remove the jury temporarily from society so as to allow communication to proceed unconfined. Perhaps we should adopt the same policy for patients who need hospital care.

Beyond all this lies a complex of questions about what might happen if public officials do not attempt to regulate the speech or press that some people find offensive. Individuals or non-governmental groups may put their own regulations into effect and do greater damage to self-expression and public communication than a thoughtfully drafted legislative act could conceivably do.

Running throughout these imagined events and relationships is a disturbing uncertainty. Not always is the one who evaluates an abridgment of speech or press firmly set in his value position. Rarely, indeed, can he be certain that he estimates accurately the effectiveness of a means to an intended end. Perhaps never can he be wholly confident that he foresees the unintended consequences of an act. Faced with such uncertainties, one man may be loyal to his intellectual processes and do what his analysis recommends; another man, less willing to assume risk, may rush back to the cover of a basic presumption.

It may be that I should have knocked out a few paragraphs of what I have already said, to make room for some comment on the practical use of the analytic scheme I have described. I will say only that it has put in place, for me, some of the formulae which have dominated judicial opinions—clear and present danger, dangerous tendency, gravity of the evil discounted by its improbability. When you spread out in your conception the values which compete for aggrandizement, the complicated pattern of relationships between chosen means and other available means to valued ends, the uncertainties which beset every aspect of your problem—when you spread out all of this in your mind you see better what the familiar judicial formulae are good for and you are alerted to sectors of the social problem which they do not comprehend and put in place. This has been my experience with the particular analytic design which I have inadequately developed for my own use.

You have, in these remarks, one response to Professor Frankfurter's challenge. I have indicated the character of three inquiries which I believe political scientists eminently qualified to undertake. I do not see a more urgent call for our service. A social environment, cordial to self expression and hospitable to sure and easy communication, is essential to the free life we have fixed as our highest goal. But uninhibited self expression and unrestricted communication are not free gifts of nature; they come at a price. I see no more worthy task for this profession than the instruction of lay citizens, judges, and statesmen who must calculate the price and decide how much free speech and free press are worth—when, where, and for whom.

CONSTITUTIONALISM: A PRELIMINARY DISCUSSION*

GIOVANNI SARTORI
University of Florence

In the 19th century what was meant by the term "constitution" was reasonably definite and clear. Paradoxically enough, if the word retained some ambiguity, this was because of the British constitution; that is, because the mother country of modern constitutionalism appeared to have an obscure constitution, or even—according to some of the standards that seemed very important elsewhere—no constitution at all.

I

Yet the very term "constitution" has acquired its modern meaning in English, in the course of the evolution of the English legal terminology. The Latin term constitutio meant the very opposite of what is now understood by "constitution." A constitutio was an enactment; later, after the 2d century, the plural form constitutiones came to mean a collection of laws enacted by the Sovereign; and subsequently the Church, too, adopted the term for canonical law. The terms constitutio and constitutiones were not frequently used, however, by the English medieval glossators (while frequently used, as a synonym for lex and edictum, by the Italian ones). This explains why, in the course of time, the word constitution became a "vacant term"—i.e., a term available for a new employment—in English (this does not necessarily mean in England), and not in those languages which had retained the Roman legal terminology.

For terminological reasons also, then, we have to refer to an English meaning of the word constitution,<sup>1</sup> although the United Kingdom has a difficult and sui generis constitution, deriving from a tortuous sedimentation of common law, acts and conventional usage, partly legal and partly extra-legal, and despite the fact that, when one reads the British constitutional lawyers, one is often reminded of what was said in a review of Stirling's book, The Secret of Hegel: "never has a secret been better kept."

For one thing, English constitutional lawyers appear to take a particular pleasure in pointing out to foreign jurists and political thinkers (beginning with Montesquieu) that their understanding of the English system is quite wrong. To be sure, this has been and still is very often the case. But one remains with a feeling that the British find a special gratification in confounding alien scholars: there is an element of polemic coquetry in the emphasis they lay on the principle of the supremacy of Parliament (exhibited as being unlimited, arbitrary, omnipotent, supra and contra legem, etc.); in the somewhat provocative and bold statement that, according to the American and French meaning of the term, the United Kingdom does not have a constitution,<sup>2</sup> in the point that the British system is based not on the "division" but on the "fusion" of powers;<sup>3</sup> or in the way in which Sir Ivor Jennings puts forward that, "Since Great Britain has no written constitution, there is no special protection for 'fundamental rights'."<sup>4</sup> And one could quote at length.

All these statements are, to be sure, true. But they are "literally true," and one is brought to wonder why the emphasis is laid on the letter so much more than on the spirit of the law of the constitution. After all, constitutionalism has a prescriptive purpose; whereas English scholars appear more inclined to address themselves to an MP by saying "you could" rather than "you cannot."

Let us take, for instance, the principle of the supremacy of Parliament. Would it be far from the mark to say that if the principle is related to the historical circumstances of its establishment, it hardly carries with it the dangerous implications that British scholars somewhat proudly expound?<sup>5</sup> Parliament, in the English terminology, means the King, the Lords and

* A paper presented at the Freudenstadt Round Table meeting of the International Political Science Association, September 1962.

<sup>1</sup> Despite Jellinek's contrary opinion. According to Jellinek, "constitution" derives from the Latin phrase rem publicam constituere. Cf. Allgemeine Staatslehre (Berlin, 1914, 3d ed.), vol. III, ch. iv. However, no historical continuity appears to exist between constituere and "constitution" (see infra notes 21, 25), and this derivation is bound to give us a misleading start.

<sup>2</sup> Cf., e.g., K. C. Wheare, Modern Constitutions (London, Oxford University Press, 1960), p. 21.

<sup>3</sup> Cf., e.g., W. Bagehot, The English Constitution, ch. ii.

<sup>4</sup> The Law and the Constitution, 5th ed. (London, University of London Press, 1959), p. 40.

<sup>5</sup> Bagehot is no exception when he asserts that "a new House of Commons can despotically . . . resolve" [my italics]. Op. cit., ch. vii.

the Commons acting together as the supreme governing body of the realm. Thus, if the principle of the supremacy of Parliament is translated into continental terminology, it amounts to what is otherwise called the "sovereignty of the State." Historically speaking, moreover, the principle of the supremacy of Parliament is the counterpart of the principle of the supremacy of the Crown, and what it really meant when it was affirmed was that the King had no power outside of Parliament, that his prerogatives could only be exercised according to the formula of the King in Parliament. If this be so, would it be very wrong to conclude, despite the contrary opinion of British scholars, that parliamentary sovereignty in England actually contradicts the idea of a "higher law" no more than any flexible constitution does, and that the conventions of the constitution hardly allow a parliamentary majority to pass any law whatever?<sup>6</sup> (The point being the "any." Let us remember that the difference between accepted political behavior and wicked Machiavellian politics is rendered by the difference between the sentence, "The end justifies the means," and "The end justifies any mean.")

Probably I shall be told that I am wrong. However, as I was trying recently to sort out the juridical features of present-day dictatorial systems, it occurred to me that some English constitutional textbooks would be of great help. "No higher law and limitless legislative power," "fusion of powers," "no special protection for fundamental rights," etc.—all these principles applied very nicely to dictatorships. What is more, the very definition given in Wheare's textbook, "The British constitution is the collection of legal rules and nonlegal rules which govern the government in Britain,"<sup>7</sup> appeared to be—but for the terms, "British" and "Britain"—the most fitted to describe dictatorial constitutions. (For "rules" applies to any kind of rule—including the rule of rulership—and the specification "non-legal rules" just gives the final touch of perfection to the concept of unchecked, uncontrolled and absolute exercise of power.) I have not made the experiment the other way around, that is, using the apologetic writings on dictatorial constitutions in order to get highlights on the virtues of the English one: but my guess is that, again changing but one word (the geographic referent), the English constitution would come out in brighter colors following this procedure than it appears, e.g., to the reader of Jennings' The Law and the Constitution.<sup>8</sup>

So, I may well be wrong. But something must be wrong too in the way in which many English scholars understate their constitution, seem to make a particular point of not being helpful, and leave the alien reader with the feeling that the British constitution really amounts to the fact that, in the final analysis, the British people are clever and fine people who know how to go about in politics. I am personally convinced of this. But allow me to repeat that this conclusion is not very helpful.

I have drawn attention to the British habit (and perhaps coquetry) of understatement, for unless this element is taken into account, one is likely to miss some important points. To begin with, this point: that, despite the English "mystery," in the 19th century, all over Europe as well as in the United States, a general agreement prevailed as to the basic meaning of the term "constitution." In 1830, and especially during the 1848 revolutions, it was very clear on both sides of the Channel what the people were asking for when they claimed a constitution.<sup>9</sup> If, in England, "constitution" meant the system of British liberties, mutatis mutandis the Europeans wanted exactly the same thing: a system of protected freedom for the individual, which—according to the American usage of the English vocabulary—they called a "constitutional system." Having to start from naught, people on the Continent (as was first achieved by the Americans) wanted a written document, a charter, which would firmly establish the overall supreme law of the land. The British too, however, <sup>8</sup> A comparison between Jennings' classic text and Vishinsky's The Law of the Soviet State (New York, 1951), would be to the point. According to Vishinsky, Stalin's Constitution draws "ever broader masses of the people into the government of the State," constantly strengthens "the bonds between the apparatus of authority and the people"; and Soviet constitutions in general "confirm genuinely democratic rights and freedoms," "establish and emphasize material guarantees," etc. (pp. 88-89).

<sup>9</sup> In 1860, the formula for the Italian plebiscites said only: "Do you want to enter the constitutional monarchy of King Victor Emanuel II?" Evidently, the mere adjective "constitutional" was assumed to be understood as implying all the difference.

<sup>6</sup> This is to deny that there is a substantial difference between the British and the Continental principle of parliamentary sovereignty. If the term of reference is the American Congress then, of course, there is a good deal of difference.

<sup>7</sup> Op. cit., p. 2.

had, from time to time, relied on particularly solemn written documents: the Magna Charta, the Confirmation Acts, the 1610-1628 Petition of Rights, the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, the Bill of Rights, the Act of Settlement, etc. The circumstance that these British "supreme laws" are not collected in a single document does not really mean that England has an unwritten constitution. I would rather say that the English do not have a codified constitution, i.e., that Britain has a constitution which is written only in part (or, even better, unwritten to a much greater extent than "written" constitutions are), in a piecemeal fashion, and scattered in a variety of sources.

However that may be, and if it pleases the British to emphasize the fact that they have a constitution which is not written, this question is of secondary importance. I mean that the written, complete document is only a means. What really matters is the end, the telos. And the purpose, the telos, of English, American and European constitutionalism was, from the outset, identical. If the English vocabulary had not to this day refused to import the word (another paradox!), this common purpose could be expressed and synthesized by just one word: the French (and Italian) term garantisme.<sup>10</sup> In other terms, all over the Western area people requested, or cherished, "the constitution," because this term meant to them a fundamental law, or a fundamental set of principles, and a correlative institutional arrangement, which would restrict arbitrary power and ensure a "limited government." And during the whole of the 19th century and until World War I, "constitutions" remained, in the United States, in England, and in Europe, different means (technically speaking) which had nevertheless the same common purpose in view. That is, for almost 150 years "constitution" has been—on the whole—an unambiguous term.

II

In the 20th century, in the few decades following the first World War, this situation of over-all basic agreement has come to an end rapidly and radically. So rapidly and so radically that one must wonder why. The main reason (or, we might say, the specific agent of change) has been, I believe, the following: that legal terminology—to the extent that it affects what Rousseau would have called droit politique, political right—shares the same destiny as political terminology in general: that is, it tends to be abused and corrupted. And this is all the more the case in a time in which politicians have become ever more conscious of the "power of words."

<sup>10</sup> Of course the query, "What do the guarantees include?" (e.g., a certain technique of allocation of power, a bill of rights, the rule of law, judicial review, etc.) receives different, complex and changing answers. This is all the more reason for adopting a general term, reminding us both of the goal, and particularly of the fact that unless we think that somebody needs protection against somebody else, there is no point in being concerned with constitutionalism.

In our minds, constitution is a "good word." It has favorable emotive properties, like freedom, justice or democracy. Therefore, the word is retained, or adopted, even when the association between the utterance "constitution" and the behavioral response that it elicits (e.g., "The constitution must be praised, for it protects my liberties") becomes entirely baseless. More precisely, the political exploitation and manipulation of language takes advantage of the fact that the emotive properties of a word survive—at times for a surprisingly long time—despite the fact that what the word denotes, i.e., the "thing," comes to be a completely different thing.<sup>11</sup>

To be sure, the agent of change has not only been insincerity and the political debasement of language. For technical reasons of their own, jurists too have been gradually covering up the garantiste feature of "constitution." This technicojuridical explanation cannot be pushed too far, however. It is quite true that Continental constitutional lawyers have never been at ease when confronted with the problem of putting forward the "strictly juridical" point of view. On the other hand, the fact remains that, more or less until the 1920's, they managed to combine the requirements of "pure law" with the telos of constitutionalism. If one reads, for instance, the Leçons of a representative figure of the pre-1848 period, Pellegrino Rossi,<sup>12</sup> one finds both the statement that "every State has a constitution" (ex hypothesis), and the statement that "a constitution is the law of the free countries." Let us face it: the two statements are not consistent. Nevertheless they introduce and represent an approach which received wide acceptance in the European juridical literature for almost a century. It is interesting to realize, therefore, why the Continental constitutional lawyers took this approach, and how they found a way of giving consistency to an inconsistency.

<sup>11</sup> The extent to which political terminology is subject to this kind of abuse can be exemplified by the very term "politics." In the Middle Ages the expression dominium politicum meant (in contrast to dominium regale) government deriving from, or given consent by, the people (i.e., by the polites, the inhabitant of the polis). That is to say that politicum, or police (in French), was coined—having reference to the Greek root—as a good word. Nowadays this originally pleasant word denotes the most unpleasant reality of politics: those who are entitled to arrest us. Let us hope that "constitution" may not have a similar destiny.

<sup>12</sup> Pellegrino Rossi (1787-1848) was professor of law in Bologna in 1814, the framer of the

Descriptively speaking, and having reference, e.g., to the terminology of the Constitution of Pennsylvania of September 28, 1776, a constitution contains two basic elements: a "plan (or frame) of government," and a "bill of rights." For the framers of the 18th century charters it was self-evident that the two component parts could not be separated: both were needed for a constitution to be a constitution. They did not mean in the least that any plan of government amounted to a constitution: they meant that this was the case only when a frame of government provided for a bill of rights and the institutional devices that would secure its observance. Continental jurists, however, were anxious to put their rationalistically trained juridical consciences at ease by finding a "universal" definition of constitution. And for this purpose they found it expedient to separate the universal trait (the "plan of government" meaning) from the garantiste component. Therefore, often enough, they did come to say—qua pure jurists—that any "frame of government" amounted to a constitution. They said it, but—let me stress this point—they immediately denied it. For they went on to say that "it had become customary"<sup>13</sup> to use the term constitution in a more specific garantiste sense; and therefore that, according to this practice, it was improper to hold that every state was a constitutional state. Every state had a "constitution," but only some states were "constitutional."

Unquestionably, the distinction is very thin; and moreover it is hard to explain why the phrase, "It has become customary," should have been accepted by jurists as a juridical argument. The interesting fact is therefore that they did accept it. And they accepted it—among other reasons—because they fully realized that their "universal" definition had no denotative value: it indicated everything, not something. Thus, generation after generation, European public law went ahead riding simultaneously two horses: the constitution as any "State order," and constitutionalism as a specific "content" of guarantees.

It was an uneasy equilibrium, I grant. It made them vulnerable, exposed. But one can have an Achilles heel and nevertheless survive. So, despite this weakness, I believe my former assertions still hold good, namely: (i) that for almost 150 years "constitution" has been associated with garantisme; and (ii) that the primary agent of change cannot be located in the inner logic of development of the European juristic tradition. Continental constitutional lawyers were hardly in a position to resist change; but they did not start the change. What started the new trend was the impact of the political atmosphere of the 1920's. For a new look about politics was taking shape in those years. "Feeble politics," so to speak, was giving way to "intense politics"; that is, the peaceful-legalitarian approach to political relationships was giving way to a warlike view of politics.

I have said "political atmosphere." It is fair to add that in some countries it was not only a question of atmosphere. In Italy, and in the 1930's in Germany, jurists were somehow compelled to adopt a merely formal, "organizational," neutral definition of constitution. This is not surprising, and Italian and German constitutional lawyers can hardly be blamed for this. What is surprising is that in the meantime the British, too, had come to adopt very much the same position.

Let me refer again to Wheare's definition, according to which the English constitution is "the collection of legal rules and non-legal rules which govern the government in Britain." Or allow me to quote, as another instance, Jennings' definition, according to which a constitution is "the document in which are set out the rules governing the composition, powers and methods of operation of the main institutions of government."<sup>14</sup> The peculiar feature of these definitions is not only the unspecified use of the term rule (even games have "rules": are they the same kind of rules?), but the silence which covers the telos of constitutionalism. Actually they are purely "formal" definitions, in the sense that they can be filled with any content whatever. We are thus faced, 1832 project of reform of the Swiss constitution, and subsequently a celebrated professor of constitutional law at the Collège de France in Paris.

<sup>13</sup> The wording varies, but this was, in substance, the invariable gist of their argument.

<sup>14</sup> Or, where no such document exists, simply "the rules determining the creation and operation of governmental institutions." The Law and the Constitution, pp. 33, 36.

nowadays, with this puzzling situation: that the very inventors of the constitutional solution provide us with a definition which amounts to saying that any instrument of government, any "traffic rule," is a constitution. And this according to the most authoritative yardstick. It is not astonishing, therefore, if the Continental theory of constitutionalism has shown, since World War II, very little evidence of recovery. For whenever somebody claims that "constitutional dictatorships" have proved that garantisme remains the core of constitutionalism, one is likely to be confronted with this reply: why should we be concerned with this problem more than the English?

My reply is—and this is the second point that I wish to stress, having reference to the English habit of understatement—that one must be very careful about importing the British constitutional textbooks. They have not been written for export. They have been written for a happy people whose constitutional system is liable to work nicely anyhow. If the alien scholar does not make explicit what often remains implicit, and does not say what is often left unsaid, the British case easily lends itself to bearing false witness.<sup>15</sup> Of course, English liberties remain protected even if English constitutionalists forget to mention that this is why Britain has a constitution. But the case might be very different elsewhere.

III

The foregoing mise au point has a bearing on what will follow, but it certainly does not alter the fact that nowadays "constitution" has become an ambiguous term, covering two very different meanings: a strict, substantive meaning (the garantiste meaning), and a formal, cosmic meaning. It follows from this that whereas in the 19th century a question such as, "What is the role of a constitution in a political system?", could be answered without asking first, "What is a constitution?", this is no longer the case.

It is equally clear—at least to me—that if a constitution is defined as "any way of giving form to any State whatever," then the question

"What is the role of a constitution in a political system?" either cannot be answered, or can be answered only country by country, and even then in a very uninteresting and banal way. For in this case the answer is that the constitution plays no role, properly speaking: It is only a shorthand report which may describe—assuming that the constitution in question is applied—the formalization of the power structure of the given country. (This is not to deny that the conclusion, "The constitution plays no role," may not be reached also after applying the standards of the garantiste type of constitution. I am simply pointing out that the query is relevant only if we consider the constitutions which are supposed to play a role.)

On both accounts, then, we have to make up our minds and to look for a convincing answer to the question, "What is a constitution?"

In the first place, we may say: "This is what I understand when I use this term." This kind of answer, however, leaves untouched a very basic point, namely: What is the truth-value of this definition? Is it only a "stipulative definition"?

Therefore, and in the second place, we may also find it necessary to say: "The term constitution ought to be used in this way."

In the third place, we may have recourse to a classification. We may say: given the fact that we are now using the term constitution in very different meanings and to cover altogether different referents, then let us speak specifically of this and that type of constitution.

These three lines of approach are not mutually exclusive. The contrary is true. But in most cases political scientists either follow solution number one, or solution number three, or both. At any rate, they usually bypass step number two, that is, they usually refrain from saying that the term constitution ought to mean this and not that. I wonder, however, whether the "ought" can really be avoided.

When general agreement prevails—as was the case with "constitution" in the 19th century—"ought-propositions" (if I may call them so) are superfluous. In this case one need not discuss whether a definition of "constitution" is merely a private convention of the stipulator (i.e., a stipulative definition), or a lexical kind of definition,<sup>16</sup> or something more, i.e., a definition having warranted truth-value. Agreement automatically settles all these problems. But we live in a world—let me stress—of terminological cleavage in which the "war of words" plays a very important role. Our first reaction has therefore been to make some fine distinctions (e.g., the one between stipulative and lexicographic definitions), and to have recourse to a classification of the various meanings and referents of the word constitution.

<sup>15</sup> Or else to bear no witness. Thus in F. A. Hayek's The Constitution of Liberty (London, Routledge, 1960), the 12th chapter bears the title: "The American Contribution: Constitutionalism." To be sure, Americans have made an outstanding contribution to constitutionalism. But to say more than this is saying too much, even though Hayek's conclusion is hardly surprising if one is not cautioned against the British mood of understatement.

<sup>16</sup> See R. Robinson, Definition (Oxford, 1954), pp. 35–92. For an application of these criteria, see M. Cranston, Freedom—A New Analysis (London, 1953).

On second thought, however, one is bound to discover that the stipulative approach is only a fire escape (and an unsafe one at that) which actually helps the fire to grow, and that classifications cannot, per se, solve our problems either. Classifications are only prima facie a neutral device. Classifications have a purpose in view, and differ according to their purpose. Therefore, classifications cannot replace definitions. They follow a definition of constitution, and imply that we have previously taken a stand vis-à-vis its nuclear meaning, so to speak. And this stand cannot be provided by the stipulative approach.

According to this approach, the speaker says: I propose to use the term constitution in this sense, and this is my definition of it. The emphasis is laid on the "my," for stipulations are an arbitrary choice. As Richard Robinson asserts in his valuable book "In stipulation we freely make any word mean anything we choose."<sup>17</sup> This is hardly a way out, however. Let us assume, for instance, that one meets with the following definition: a constitution is the will of the sovereign. In some cases one could hardly object that this definition is factually false. According both to the Führerprinzip and to actual practice, it would be quite realistic to say that during Hitler's decade the German constitution amounted to the will of the Führer. And Stalin's constitution can well be resumed in similar terms. As these extreme but very relevant examples go to show, if one wishes to retort that Hitler's or Stalin's regime was not a constitutional regime, this cannot be done on the ground that the sentence, "The Soviet constitution was the arbitrary will of Stalin," is factually false, but on the ground that one does not accept the meaning "will of the sovereign" as a permissible meaning of constitution: i.e., because one refuses the definition.

Yet, if definitions are just arbitrary and private stipulations of each speaker, on what grounds may one discuss the definitions of constitution which differ from his own stipulation? Clearly, one can write a book of 500 pages to show that Hitler's or Stalin's so-called constitution amounted to a non-constitutional system; anybody can simply dismiss it by saying: This is your stipulation, but I have mine, and that is that. How easy, and how convenient!

I cannot develop here the criticism of the conventional approach.<sup>18</sup> In my view definitions are not private conventions of each speaker, but (whenever they have a historical referent) storehouses of past experience shaped by former practice. We bring them up to date, but their ultimate truth-value lies in the fact that they tell us how to behave as experienced people in matters regarding which each generation starts by having no experience. And this is precisely the reason why we are not condemned to a solipsistic conventionalism, and why we are entitled to discuss and to look for a "true definition" (touching on a basic meaning, of course) of equality, of liberty, of law, of constitution, etc. In particular, the definition of constitution which has objective worth is the one that appears to be the outcome of a long and painstaking process of trial-and-error concerned with the question: How can we be governed without being oppressed?

Implicitly I have already indicated why I attach a great importance to whether the sentence "This is the meaning of the term constitution" has a normative undertone or not. For if the speaker takes the view that his definition cannot be phrased as a normative proposition—i.e., in the form, "This is also what 'constitution' ought to mean"—then, no matter how unwittingly, he is surrendering to the stipulative and conventionalistic approach.

To be sure, one may not be concerned with long-range consequences of this kind. Nevertheless, we must decide here and now the test, or the criteria, according to which we declare: This is the meaning given in this text to the word constitution. Now, are we going to ascertain what "constitution" means in the 20th century by asking the Russians, the Chinese, the Egyptians, and so forth, or by inquiring what the Italians and the Germans were taught to believe a constitutional system to be under Mussolini and Hitler? If so, then I grant that there is no "ought" about it. But otherwise (that is, if we do not believe that knowledge follows a majority principle), then the "ought" is inevitably there—no matter whether openly or not—for surely we are not speaking of what "constitution" actually means to all the people of the world in the 20th century, but of a correct meaning which we find advisable to propose for future observance.

<sup>17</sup> Op. cit., p. 65.

<sup>18</sup> For my views on the truth-value of definitions, see G. Sartori, Democratic Theory (Detroit, Wayne Univ. Press, 1962), ch. 10.

I am acquainted with the sophisticated methodological reasons that are being brought forward to explain why the form "ought" should be expelled from the realm of science, and in particular of political science. Yet, my guess is that future historians will find a much simpler explanation for our "ought complexes." They will say that we have been unable to meet the challenge of the environment; and rightly so, I believe. For since the beginning of time the people entrusted with the development of learning have followed this very simple rule: to use the form "is" when they agreed with general usage, and the form "ought" when they did not. Yet now we refrain from saying "This is what the term constitution ought to mean," even though we are well aware of the fact that "constitution" no longer bears a common acceptance and even though we are in a good position to realize that a situation of ambiguity and confusion is being deliberately fostered by political double-talk and insincerity, with the precise purpose of deceiving the audience.

Let there be no misunderstanding. I am not advocating a behavioral "ought," but a terminological and logical "ought."<sup>19</sup> The meaning of "constitution" is neither an arbitrary stipulation, nor something to be discovered in the "popular mind" of semi-literate majorities. At least, if we believe that rational discourse and an intelligible vocabulary are to be maintained, then the meaning of "constitution" has been decided by historical testing, and has to be ascertained by adequate information and sound thinking. And if these criteria bring us to a definition which no longer receives common acceptance, then it is not only right but necessary to say: This is what the term constitution ought to mean (for otherwise it is meaningless, or superfluous, or deceiving, or whatever). This does not imply that people are being requested to respond favorably to a certain pattern of constitution defined as the "true constitution." I am only saying that terminological clarity is a basic requirement for any science, and that political scientists in particular have to take stock of the fact that the vocabulary of politics tends to be used for the purpose of beguiling the listener. I am not advocating, therefore, the preferability of one type of constitutional telos in relation to another. I am simply saying that it is a scientific requirement to discuss whether it is proper to use "constitution" where, in order that the public (and even, at times, the expert) be not deceived, we should not use this term.

IV

The objection will be that even if we reject the stipulative approach, even then "constitution" is, by its own constitution, an ambiguous term.<sup>20</sup> That is, even if one agrees that constitutions have been shaped by historical experience in order to protect the freedom and the rights of the power addressees, the fact nonetheless remains that constitution has always been a Janus-faced concept, hovering as it were between the idea of "political order" on the one hand and of "limit" on the other. I would however disagree with this statement.

The history of the word in its modern meaning only begins in the 18th century.<sup>21</sup> Let us not confuse the noun with the concept, or, we might say, the Latin constitutio with our "constitution," a homonymy with a homology. In its present-day conceptualization, "constitution" only emerges, perhaps, with Bolingbroke,<sup>22</sup> and the term really gained ground and acquired a definite connotation only in America during the years 1776-1787. (The French did not receive it directly from England, but from the Philadelphia Convention. This is not surprising for it was Paine, not Burke and the English writers in general, who gave the first explicit, complete account of the modern concept.<sup>23</sup>)

<sup>20</sup> I am no longer referring to the strictly juridical approach mentioned previously, but to the overall issue of constitutionalism as discussed in the history of political thought and in philosophy of law.

<sup>21</sup> Cicero's use, in De Republica, I, 45, 69, was quite casual, and left no trace in the following literature. Actually, this much-quoted Roman precedent cannot claim precedent status. This is so true that the 15th and 16th century commentators rendered Cicero's constitutio with the terms status publicus (Jean de Terre Rouge), status Reipublicae (Bodin), or politicum (Fortescue), police (Seyssell).

<sup>22</sup> I say "perhaps" on account of McIlwain's reservation: "Bolingbroke in fact is only restating views as old as the Politicus of Plato. . . ." Constitutionalism: Ancient and Modern (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1947), p. 3.

<sup>23</sup> On Paine see esp. C. H. McIlwain, op. cit., pp. 8-10. In Burke "constitution" was used much more loosely as a synonym for "commonwealth" (Thoughts on the Cause of Present Discontents), for "engagement and pact of society" (Reflections), for "frame" and "pattern" (Speech on Reform); all in all, it meant the substantive principles deriving from the British political tradition

<sup>19</sup> The form "ought" is not necessarily related to ethical imperatives.

Now, it is undeniable that the whole of the American tradition has understood "constitution" as a means for "limited government." The same is true, from the outset, for French constitutionalism (should one be reminded of article 16 of the Declaration of Rights of 1789? Or, for the following period, of Benjamin Constant?). And I have previously explained at length why I firmly hold—despite the possibility of exhibiting numberless quotations to the contrary effect—that English constitutionalism belongs entirely to the same tradition: the British advocate, and have advocated from the time of Glanville and Bracton, an "unlimited government" just as much, or, rather, just as little as the Americans.<sup>24</sup>

It is not unsafe to conclude, therefore, that, with the decline of the age of Absolutism, people began to cast about for a word which would denote the techniques to be used for controlling the exercise of State power. This term turned out to be (Americans decided this issue) "constitution."<sup>25</sup> And "constitution" was in no way born as a Janus-faced concept. The term was re-conceived, adopted and cherished not because it merely meant "political order," but because it meant much more, because it meant "political freedom." We may put it thus: because it denoted the distinctive political order which would protect their liberties; or—to paraphrase Friedrich's felicitous wording—because it not only "gave form" but also because it "limited" governmental action.<sup>26</sup> and to be inferred from the working of the institutions.

<sup>24</sup> Cf., e.g., Burke: "In [our] Constitution . . . I feel both that I am free, and that I am not free dangerously to myself and to others. I know that no power on earth, acting as I ought to do, can touch my life, my liberty, my own property" (Speech on Reform of Representation.) Let it be noted that, according to the letter of the constitution, in 1782 the doctrine of the omnipotence of Parliament was already established. Was Burke wrong, then? Or should we not question, instead, the validity—for a constitution largely based on conventions—of the "literal" approach?

<sup>25</sup> In this connection, recall that in the years of the Commonwealth and the Protectorate (1649–1660) the English made several attempts to establish a written constitution. However, they never called these documents "constitution": they made recourse to terms such as covenant, instrument, agreement, model, paramount or fundamental law.

<sup>26</sup> Carl J. Friedrich, The Philosophy of Law in Historical Perspective (University of Chicago Press, 1958), p. 220.

The idea that this specific, garantiste, meaning derives from a pre-existing wide, unspecified meaning, is an optical illusion, which has been suggested—I believe—by the commentators and translators of Aristotle. As is well known, Aristotle's term was politeia, and, surely, politeia is difficult to translate. So occasionally, the authors having Plato's and especially Aristotle's writings in mind, found it expedient to render it by the term constitution. This, however, happened only occasionally (the relevant example is Montesquieu)<sup>27</sup> until the time when "constitution" acquired a specific meaning. It was only at this stage that "constitution" came to be used consistently as the proper equivalent of politeia. Wrongly, to be sure. For politeia only conveys the idea of the way in which a polity is patterned. And if Aristotle meant by politeia the ethico-political system as a whole, we cannot infer from this that "constitution" has in Aristotle a loose meaning. The only correct conclusion is that Aristotle has been mistranslated. For to us "constitution" means—a frame of political society, organized through and by the law, for the purpose of restraining arbitrary power. And surely nothing resembling this concept was in the mind of Aristotle.<sup>28</sup>

V

Having established the frame of reference (the historically valid "nuclear meaning" of constitution), we may now turn to the problem of how we should go about classifying the variety of present-day so-called constitutions. I shall deal swiftly with this problem, for I <sup>27</sup> In the famous ch. 6, Book XI of the Esprit des Lois the term constitution appears only in the title.

<sup>28</sup> I grant that there are a few passages in Aristotle's Politics in which the term politeia specifically refers to the way in which the polis magistracies are ordained. Cf., e.g., 1278 b. However, this meaning appears in passing, and it cannot be denied, I believe, that (i) the ethico-political all-embracing meaning of politeia is by far the prevalent one, and, on the other hand, (ii) the term never appears in Aristotle in our juridical meaning, that is, in the sense of being an institutionalized way of controlling the dynamics of political freedom. Actually, I find it quite absurd to speak of a Greek "constitutionalism." Only the Romans indirectly tackled the problem, and only from the "rule of law" angle (as Jhering and Bryce have remarked), that is, very much in the same way in which—according to Dicey—the principles of the English constitution are inductions and generalizations resulting from judicial decisions determining the rights of private persons.

agree very much (in substance, even though not in terminology) with the threefold classification suggested by Loewenstein.<sup>29</sup>

Basically we are confronted with three possibilities: (i) garantiste constitution (constitution, proper); (ii) nominal constitution; (iii) façade constitution (or fake constitution).

I call "nominal" the constitutions that Loewenstein labels "semantic" (a difficult, and perhaps not quite appropriate labelling). Apart from this semantic divergency, I entirely underwrite his description of the specimen: "The constitution is fully applied and activated, but its ontological reality is nothing but the formalization of the existing location of political power for the exclusive benefit of the actual power holders" (p. 149). Nominal constitutions are therefore "nominal" in the very simple sense that they bear the "name" constitution. This amounts to saying that nominal constitutions are merely organizational constitutions, i.e., the collection of rules which organize but do not restrain the exercise of political power in a given polity.<sup>30</sup> Actually, nominal constitutions do not really pretend to be "real constitutions." They frankly describe a system of limitless, unchecked power. They are not a dead letter. It is only that this letter is irrelevant to the telos of constitutionalism.

The façade constitutions are different from the nominal ones in that they take the appearance of "true constitutions." What makes them untrue is that they are disregarded (at least in their essential garantiste features). Actually they are "trap-constitutions." As far as the techniques of liberty and the rights of the power addressees are concerned, they are a dead letter.

I suppose that the labeling "façade constitution" will be criticized on the ground that it implicitly rules out the possibility of an educational purpose. But I do not think that a fake constitution has an educational purpose. It may turn out that it has an educational effect. But this is a very different matter. We are not historians dealing with past events and looking for their a posteriori justification. We are concerned with actual will and actual doings. And to credit with an "educational role" the instances that make forecasts all the more dubious (as in the case when we are confronted with discretionary power) is very much like toying with wishful thinking. Moreover, and in point of principle, education is not the purpose of constitutions. I mean, this is not a sufficient (or sufficiently pertinent) criterion for singling out a special class of "educational constitutions."<sup>31</sup> A constitution may contain, to be sure, statements of "aspiration," and thereby provide "incentives," even pedagogic incentives. However, this occurrence does not indicate an essential constitutional feature; it merely indicates a possible content of any type of constitution.

There is often a considerable overlapping between nominal and façade constitutions. The distinction is nevertheless basic, for the two cases are indeed very different. Nominal constitutions actually describe the working of the political system (they do not abide by the telos of constitutionalism, but they are sincere reports), while the façade constitutions give us no reliable information about the real governmental process. In most cases one can clearly perceive, despite the overlaps, which is the prevalent aspect: I mean, whether a constitution is basically nominal or basically a disguise. At any rate, or otherwise, the distinction is serviceable for analytical purposes, that is, for dissecting the component parts of a "mixed type" (partly nominal and partly fake) of pseudo-constitution.

The distinction is serviceable from another point of view as well, for it goes to show that if we refuse the garantiste qualification, then no line can be drawn between "constitution" and "constitutional government." To be sure, if a constitution is not applied, this is an instance of constitution without constitutional government. But this argument applies only to the façade constitutions. What about the other possibility? In the case of nominal constitutions we no longer have a "prerogative state" that replaces de facto the "legal state"; we have instead a prerogative state legitimized by the constitution. In this latter case, then, we are confronted with a government which, by definition, will always govern according to the constitution. On what grounds may we maintain that this is not a "constitutional government"? Certainly not on the grounds of logical syntax. Therefore, either we adhere to garantisme, or the distinction between constitution and constitutional government really becomes meaningless.

<sup>31</sup> Car accidents may serve the purpose of improving our driving. Would this be a reason for creating the category "educational accidents"?

<sup>29</sup> Cf. Karl Loewenstein, Political Power and the Governmental Process (University of Chicago Press, 1957), esp. pp. 147 ff.

<sup>30</sup> It is often held that the mere ordering, the mere existence of a definite and stable "form," is in itself a "limit." This may well be—but not a garantiste kind of limit. Armies are usually well ordered, but this fact does not necessarily protect subordinates vis-à-vis their superiors.

Some troublesome problems arise when one focusses further attention on: (i) the décalage between the written and the living constitution, and on (ii) the frequent disregard of some of the constitutional provisions. In this connection the point can be made that a clear-cut distinction between real constitutions and façade constitutions is hardly realistic, since the real ones too come to differ widely, in practice, from their original formalization, or may not be fully activated (the former being usually the case with old constitutions, and the latter with recent ones).

Personally I am not dismayed by the first indictment. If a constitution is written, then, with the passing of time, the formal document and the living constitution inevitably come to be related much as the past is related to the present. (In this sense, then, written constitutions too become, in part, non-written.) However, as long as the spirit and the telos of the original document are maintained in the new circumstances, the décalage only affects the myth of a "fixed constitution"; and the American experience goes to show, if anything, that written constitutions can endure despite the anti-historical assumption upon which they have been conceived.

On the other hand, the remedy for this could hardly be found in a non-written constitution. The drawbacks and the dangers of this solution are so serious, that only the British can afford the luxury of not formalizing their constitution. And it remains questionable whether it is really true that the British constitution is unwritten. (I would be tempted to say that it is "written differently.")

The thorny point is instead the non-fulfillment of constitutional provisions not because of the time factor, because they have gradually become outdated, but with reference to norms that have never been activated owing to the unwillingness of the executive or of the legislative body to give them life. This problem cannot be dismissed lightly, if we consider that "delinquencies in the application" of the constitution (as Loewenstein calls them) are rather frequent in most countries. It is safe to ask: "Why?". Is it because the constitutional spirit (as well as the corresponding type of the constitutional gentleman) is withering away? Or is it because of other reasons?

It is well to remind ourselves that most countries have a recent constitution, either because they have re-written their previous charters, or because they have started anew. And contemporary constitutions are, as a rule, bad constitutions—technically speaking.<sup>32</sup> They have come to include unrealistic promises and glamorous professions of faith on the one hand, and numberless frivolous details on the other. Some of them are by now so "democratic" that either they are no longer constitutions (for a constitution limits the "will of the people" concept of democracy just as much as it limits the will of the power holders),<sup>33</sup> or they make the working of the machinery of government too cumbersome for government to work, or both. Under these conditions, non-application may well be a remedy for inapplicability. I mean by this that it may also serve the purpose of saving the constitutional system as a working system.

So we should not react dramatically in all cases, but only in those in which the disregard actually has a direct bearing on the withering away of the constitutional telos. This implies that we can no longer partake, in all instances, of the strict juristic view that "all the Constitution must be applied at whatever cost." Personally speaking at least, I take the view that we should always ascertain whether the non-application affects the machinery of government in its garantiste aspect and the basic purposes of constitutionalism, or not. In the former case it is proper to speak of "delinquencies"; in the latter I confess that I remain quite indifferent. And if we follow this rule of thumb the difference between "real constitutions" and "façade constitutions" remains very firm despite the fact that even in the context of the real constitutions a number of provisions may not be activated.

VI

Summing up my line of argument, I have tentatively submitted the following theses:

(1) That the word constitution has been re-conceptualized, if I may say so, for a specific purpose, and more precisely to denote a distinctive and unprecedented "technique of liberty" (as Mirkine-Guetzévitch would have said), the <sup>32</sup> Contemporary constitutions are being said to improve on the former ones in that they are no longer "negative" but "positive." If positive means that they are also an instrument for social and economic policy then let us be happy with this positive development. Under one condition however: that the follow-up, i.e., the "economic tail, should not eat the "political" head.

<sup>33</sup> Among other reasons, because a constitution cannot effectively limit the will of the power holders if they can outflank constitutional impediments by making direct appeals to the will of the people.

features of which had already materialized clearly enough when, for instance, Montesquieu was visiting England in 1730.

(2) That this purpose has often been obscured by the complexity of the original model (the English constitution) on the one hand, and by a somewhat polemic isolationism of the British scholars on the other hand. Despite these unfortunate circumstances, however, the fact remains that the idea of limit is basic to the English prototype just as much as to the American and the French subsequent models.

(3) That the view that the garantiste meaning of "constitution" was preceded by a loose, formal meaning lacks historical proof, for this view actually goes back to a mistranslation, or to a casual way of referring to Aristotle's term politeia.

(4) That the equivalence "constitution = any state form" is therefore not the older but indeed a recent loosening up of the concept, reflecting either the juridic illusion of attaining a "purified," universal depoliticized right, or reflecting the purpose of exploiting the word constitution as a trap word.

(5) That on both accounts it should be pointed out that either the term is used in its specific garantiste meaning, or it is a meaningless (and deceiving) duplicate of terms such as organization, structure, form, pattern, political system, and the like.

(6) That, according to this view, the variety of so-called "constitutions" of our time may be classified in three categories: real, nominal and facade.

(7) That the existence of nominal constitutions implies that either we abide by garantisme, or we can no longer draw a line between "constitution" and "constitutional government."

(8) That the political scientist, in particular, is responsible for ruling out insincere language, for two reasons: the general reason being that the language of the observer is required to improve (whenever necessary) the language of the observed; while the specific reason is that terminological housecleaning is all the more necessary whenever the political scientist is confronted with terminological distortions that are deliberately fostered with a view to deceiving the audience.

Speaking of political scientists, a final question should perhaps be raised, namely: why should we, qua political scientists, be concerned with the constitutional problem?

Actually, constitutionalism is not a traditional subject matter of political science. To the extent that political scientists have been concerned with it, they have either leaned on a previous legal training of the individual scholar, or they have shown a tendency to underplay the role and importance of constitutional checks as compared with social and political pluralistic checks.<sup>34</sup> In the first case it could be said that their treatment of the topic constitutionalism belongs to the "old" political science. In the second case it can be shown, I believe, that the "new" political science is hardly equipped to discuss the problem at all. For one thing, political science is keen about informal processes, not about formal structures. In particular, the new generation of political scientists distrusts concepts having a high degree of abstraction (such as State), concentrates very much on elementary grass roots units (such as groups), and has developed a keen feeling for dynamics, for change, for "something doing," to use Bentley's telling expression. Now, clearly, from this platform constitutions appear to be: (i) the juridical counterpart and support of the abstract entity, "the State"; (ii) certainly not the "raw material" of politics; and (iii) the expression par excellence of a typically static view of the political process. (The foregoing are, of course, very broad and very rough generalizations.)

If these underlying premises are duly weighed, the present-day mood of skepticism toward the efficacy of constitutional devices and mechanisms was only to be expected. However, where is the error? In the purview of the observer, or in the constitutional solution? All in all, my feeling is that contemporary political science has not found, as yet, the strategic juncture in which and from which it can make a positive contribution to the understanding of constitutionalism. My own tentative suggestion is that, perhaps, this strategic point is to be found in the "role theory" approach,<sup>35</sup> that is, by examining the constitutional solution as a pre-

<sup>34</sup> This is not to deny that pluralism is a requisite condition for the proper working of constitutional systems. My own view, however, is that the relationship between societal pluralism and constitutional patterns of behavior is a two-way relationship, at least in the sense that it is very important, for pluralism, to have the constitution on its side.

<sup>35</sup> I have in mind, e.g., the approach devised by Heinz Eulau and associates in a related subject. Cf. Wahlke, Eulau, Buchanan, Ferguson, The Legislative System—Explorations in Legislative Behavior (New York, 1962).

ordained, binding technique of role-enforcement (in its difference from a spontaneous role-taking.)

Within the limits of a preliminary perusal, I cannot push the argument further. I leave it as an open suggestion for discussion that the query, "What is the role of a constitution in the political system?" could perhaps be fruitfully approached from the following angle: what is the impact, or the role, of a constitution vis-à-vis the role-taking of the power holders? That is, does it help to enforce, and if so to what extent, a desired "role performance" upon the persons in office?

Whatever the merit of this suggestion, I do feel that political scientists should go back with a fresh look to the vital issues that constitutional lawyers have been neglecting. For the experience of the last 30-40 years has shown, particularly in Italy and in Germany, that when a political problem—and constitutionalism is, inescapably, a juridical solution of a political problem—is depoliticized, the real consequences of taking the juridical "neutral" attitude are (no matter how unwittingly) political. I mean that when the time of trial comes, one discovers that what the "pure" jurists have really been doing—under the shield of their juridical indifference to meta-juridical matters—was to pave the way for allowing unscrupulous politicians to make a discretionary use of power under the camouflage of a good word. Politics cannot be taken out of politics, so to speak.

THE THREAT OF VIOLENCE AND SOCIAL CHANGE

H. L. NIEBURG

Case Institute of Technology

The threat of violence, and the occasional outbreak of real violence—which gives the threat credibility—are essential elements in peaceful social change not only in international, but also in national communities.<sup>1</sup> Individuals and groups, no less than nations, exploit the threat as an everyday matter. This induces flexibility and stability in democratic institutions.

I refer not only to the police power of the state and the recognized right of self-defense, but also to private individual or group violence, whether purposive or futile, deliberate or desperate. Violence and the threat of violence, far from being meaningful only in international politics, are underlying, tacit, recognized, and omnipresent facts of domestic life, in the shadow of which democratic politics are carried on. They instill dynamism into the structure and growth of the law, the settlement of disputes, the processes of accommodating interests, and they induce general respect for the verdict of the polls.

An effort by the state to obtain an absolute monopoly over violence, threatened or used in behalf of private interests, leads inexorably—as in a prison—to complete totalitarian repression of all activities and associations which may, however remotely, create a basis of anti-state action. A democratic system preserves the right of organized action by private groups, risking their implicit capability of violence. By intervening at the earliest possible point in private activities, the totalitarian state increases the likelihood that potential violence will have to be demonstrated before it is socially effective. On the other hand, by permitting a pluralistic basis for action, the democratic state permits potential violence to have a social effect with only a token demonstration, thus assuring greater opportunities for peaceful political and social change. A democratic system has greater viability and stability; it is not forced, like the totalitarian, to create an infinite deterrent to all non-state (and thus potentially anti-state) activities. The early Jeffersonians recognized this essential element of social change when they guaranteed the private right to keep and bear arms, in the Second Amendment. The possibility of a violent revolution once each generation is a powerful solvent of political rigidity, making such revolutions unnecessary.

<sup>1</sup> "Violence" is defined as direct or indirect action applied to restrain, injure, or destroy persons or property.

The argument of this essay is that the risk of violence is necessary and useful in preserving national societies.<sup>2</sup> This specifically includes sporadic, uncontrolled, "irrational" violence in all its forms. It is true that domestic violence, no less than international violence, may become a self-generating vortex which destroys all values, inducing anarchy and chaos. Efforts to prevent this by extreme measures, however, only succeed in making totalitarian societies that are more liable to such collapses. Democracies assume the risk of such catastrophes, and thereby make them less likely.

Violence has two inextricable aspects: its actual use (political demonstrations, self-immolation, suicide, crimes of passion, property, or politics, etc.), and its potential (threatened) use. The actual outbreak or demonstration of violence must occur from time to time in order to give plausibility to its threatened outbreak, and thereby to gain efficacy for the threat as an instrument of social and political change. The two aspects, demonstration and threat, therefore cannot be separated. If the capability of actual demonstration is not present, the threat will have little effect in inducing a willingness to bargain politically. In fact, such a threat may instead provoke "pre-emptive" counter-violence.

The "rational" goal of the threat of violence is an accommodation of interests, not the provocation of actual violence. Similarly, the "rational" goal of actual violence is demonstration of the will and capability of action, establishing a measure of the credibility of future threats, not the exhaustion of that capability in unlimited conflict.<sup>3</sup> An investigation of the function of violence begins with an outline of concepts.

<sup>2</sup> The role of violence in political organizations is vividly demonstrated by a recent event among a group of elk at the Bronx Zoo. A 4-year old bull elk, Teddy, had his magnificent antlers sawed off to one-inch stumps. He had reigned as undisputed boss of a herd of six cow elk and one younger bull. But the breeding season was on, and he was becoming "a bit of a martinet." With his antlers off, he gets a new perspective on his authority and becomes a tolerable leader. A younger bull may try to take over as paramount leader of the herd, but if he does, the veterinarian will saw off his antlers, too. New York Times, September 26, 1962, p. 35.

I. POLITICAL SYSTEMS AND CONSENSUS.

We assume that all human relationships, both individual and institutional, are involved in a dynamic process of consensus and competition. These are opposites only as conceptual poles of a continuum. In real relationships, it is often difficult to distinguish objectively between the two. The distinction is sharp only subjectively, for the participant, and his perception of consensus or competition may change from moment to moment, depending on his political role and the objective circumstances.<sup>4</sup> A political role is defined in terms of the many political systems in which the individual objectively or subjectively (by identification of interests) plays a part. A political system contains a hierarchy of authority and values. Each system has a complex structure of leadership and influence but, because of the nature of its task (maximizing and allocating certain values), policy and decision-making power is usually vested in one or a few roles at the top of the pyramid of authority (the elite). Formal and informal political systems exist at all levels of group life (children's play groups, families, lodges, gangs, work groups, nation-states, international alignments, etc.), interpenetrating each other among and between levels. Each isolated system has an interdependent structure of roles, involving loyalty to certain values, symbols, leaders, and patterns of behavior according to system norms. The discrete individual, part of many different systems, must structure his own hierarchy of commitment to meet the simultaneous demands made upon him by many different roles.

Within the individual, the conflicting demands of these roles create tension. Similarly, within each system conflicting values between members are constantly adjusted as roles change, maintaining a state of tension. And political systems as wholes have an objective, dynamic interrelationship, structured into the hierarchy of macro-systems. Within the latter, each sub-system has a role much like that of the individual in smaller constellations. Each sub-system may be part of several macro-systems, imposing conflicting demands upon it. Consequently, within macro-systems there is maintained a state of constant tension between sub-systems.

This objective tension, existing on all levels, is perceived subjectively in terms both of competition and consensus, depending on the comparative degrees of collaboration and conflict which exist in the situation at any given moment.

So any two or more systems may appear as hostile at any given time. From the viewpoint of the participants, the conceptual framework of competition overrides underlying consensus. Decisions and policies of the rival elites there are rationalized in terms of hostility to the values and leaders of the other system. However, if events transpire to place a higher value on a hostile tactical situation involving the macro-system of which both smaller systems are a part, their relationship will be transformed quickly to a conceptual framework of consensus which will override and mute the unresolved competitive elements. Such an event may also bring about internal leadership changes in both sub-systems, if their elites were too firmly wedded to the requirements of the now-irrelevant competitive situation.

Objectively, tension is always present among all roles and systems; that is, elements of both competition and consensus go together. The subjective emphasis which each pole of the continuum receives depends on the value which the tactical situation places on acts and attitudes of hostility or collaboration among the various systems at various times. Degrees of hostility and collaboration are structured by a hierarchy of values within and among all roles and systems all the time. All are involved in a dynamic process.

Conflict, in functional terms, is the means of discovering or reaching consensus, of creating agreed terms of collaboration. Because of our personal roles in the macro-system of nation-states, we tend to view the Cold War in terms of competition. Similarly, because of our role in the sub-system of the family group, we tend to view family problems in terms of consensus (until the system breaks down completely).

One can reverse these conceptual fields. The Cold War can be viewed in terms of the large areas of consensus that exist between the two power-blocs. For example, the wish to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to each other's allies; the wish to avoid giving each other's allies the power of precipitating general war between the main antagonists; the common interest in reducing accidental provocations; the common interest in establishing some norms of predictability in each other's behavior; etc. Conflict can therefore be considered merely as the means of perfecting these areas of consensus. In the same way, one can view the family situation negatively in terms of competition and hostility. As in an O'Neill drama, one would dwell on all the things that divide the family members and interpret all actions in terms of maneuvers to subdue each other's will. Consensus then becomes a residual category hors de combat, and therefore of no importance. One might dwell upon the collaborative aspects of international affairs or the disruptive aspects of family affairs. A policy-maker should do both in the former area, just as a psychiatrist does both in the latter. The collaborative view of the Cold War should not, however, induce euphoria about the nature of the relationship (as it unfortunately does for some), since so many crimes of violence occur in families, and so many murders involve lovers or ex-lovers.<sup>5</sup> In performing this exercise, the relativistic nature of the concepts of consensus and competition becomes evident. It is impossible to reach any consensus without competition and every consensus, no matter how stable, is still only provisional, since it represents for all its members a submerging of other values. All collaborating individuals, groups, or nations constantly try to exploit favorable opportunities to improve their roles or to impose a larger part of their own value structures upon a larger political system. In an important sense, all individuals, groups, or nations desire to "rule the world," but are constrained to collaborate with others on less desirable terms because of the objective limits of their own power or the cost of the exertion required.

<sup>3</sup> By "rational" here is meant: having a conceptual link to a given end, a logical or symbolic means-ends relationship which can be demonstrated to others or, if not demonstrable, is accepted by others (but not necessarily all) as proven.

<sup>4</sup> Essentially, the perception by an individual of his relationship to others within a framework of hostility or cooperation is the subjective basis of "ideology," using the term as Karl Mannheim does in "Sociology of Knowledge," Ideology and Utopia (New York, 1957), pp. 265-66.

The commitment required to produce a credible threat of violence, sufficient to induce peaceable accommodation, is one of a very high order. Not all individuals nor all political systems are capable of credibly using the threat of violence in order to induce greater deference by others to their values. People generally recognize the kinds of values which can and cannot elicit the high degree of commitment required to make the threat credible.

<sup>5</sup> See E. Frankel, "One Thousand Murderers," Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, Vol. 29 (1938-39), pp. 687-88, cited in Marshall B. Clinard, Sociology of Deviant Behavior (New York, 1957), p. 216.

By and large, all violence has a rational aspect, for somebody, if not for the perpetrator. Acts of violence can consequently be rationalized (i.e., put to rational use), whether they are directed against others or against oneself. This is true because people who may be anxious to apply the threat of violence to achieve a social or political bargaining position are nevertheless usually reluctant also to pay the costs or take the risks of an actual demonstration of that threat. Incoherent acts of violence can be exploited by elites as a means of improving their roles or imposing a larger part of their values upon a greater political system. The more obvious the logical connection between such an act and the ends sought by the elite, the easier it is to assimilate the act and claim it as a demonstration of the potential violence available to the elite if its demands are ignored. The rapidity with which insurgent movements create martyrs from the demise of hapless bystanders, and the reluctance of governments to give martyrs to the opposition, are evidence of this.

II. NATIONS, LAWS, AND BALLOTS

The nation is a highly organized, formal political system, whose structure is well defined by law and custom, reinforced by sanctions legally imposed by the near-monopoly violence (police power) of the state. The central problem of lawful societies is to develop principles, procedures, institutions and expectations that create conditions of continuity and predictability in the lives of its members. The legal system is an abstract model of the society, designed to crystallize relationships of the status quo, maintain their continuity in the midst of political and social change, and provide lawful methods of resisting or accommodating change. Law itself tends to maintain the status quo and, with the instruments of state power, to resist change. But relationships in organized societies change anyway. The process for codifying changed conditions and relationships is called "politics." Political systems legitimize certain kinds of potential violence within controlled limits; it then becomes force.<sup>6</sup> However, law almost never serves the interests of all equally. Rather, it protects some against others or gives advantages to some over others. By placing the force of the state behind the interests of some, law serves to neutralize the potential violence behind the demands of others. In a sense, it thus raises the threshold of violence required to make social protests against the law efficacious. This guarantees that the law cannot be changed easily or quickly by any group, thus giving it greater permanence and stability.

<sup>6</sup> The distinction between "violence" and "force" (one uncontrolled, the other controlled), was common in pre-Lasswellian literature. They are often difficult to distinguish objectively. Assessments of controllability may be almost entirely ideological. I prefer to use "force" to designate the objective capabilities, i.e., the concrete means or instruments for violence.

Pressures for political and social change must therefore be substantial before the threat of violence and the fear of the breakdown of law and order rise above the threshold set by the force held by the state. While the threat and fear remain below the threshold, the status quo often responds to challenges against the law by more severe enforcement, augmented police and enlarged prisons. But when the threat and fear come near or cross the threshold, a general tendency toward non-enforcement of the law sets in. The status quo interests begin to share with the disaffected groups a desire to evade and to change the law.

Private demonstrations of force are illegal in all domestic societies. Toleration is accorded to threats of potential violence, however, to the extent that the laws and institutions are democratic. In all systems, the state, to deserve its name, must apply adequate force to control outbreaks of actual violence by private sources—or tolerate some more or less recognised “off-limits” areas for outlawry.<sup>7</sup> If the instrumentalities of state power are not equal to broad private threats, indeed, the government in power ceases to rule. Vigilantism or the private threat of violence has then in fact become the last resort of authority in the system. Why do governments sometimes fall when there is a general strike, or a street demonstration? Why don’t they ignore outbreaks with which they cannot cope? And say: “All right, go ahead and strike, fight each other for control of the streets, snake-dance down the avenue. We will sit here in our offices anyway making decisions!” Governments fall when their capabilities for dealing with threatened violence fail. The emerging political system which proves itself capable of raising a higher threshold of violence (than the established government can or will surmount with its force) becomes de facto the highest authority, and de jure the new government.

Laws are not merely the rules of a game of economic and political competition. They are also a means of winning the game, if some of the players can, as in fact they do, write the laws. The ideal system may be one in which the rules are written with perfect dispassion, so that they accord no special advantages to anyone. This ideal is never realized. The process of politics which underlies the making and unmaking of laws is not dispassionate. Indeed, it is one of the most passionate of human affairs. No matter how scrupulously fair may be the original constitution and the representation of governing institutions, the tensions of political systems soon intrude historical hierarchies of advantage. Whoever enjoys early advantages in the game soon enjoys that and more by law, with the heightened threshold of the force available at the beckoning of the state to vouchsafe them. In this manner the law tends always to become to some extent the instrument of the status quo, resisting change.

In democratic societies, however, the law also guarantees the right of voluntary association, among other political liberties, and restrains (by a constitutional distribution of authority) arbitrary use of the police power. These permit opponents of the status quo to establish and maintain a base of political action that may become formidable. It may then be difficult for the regime to find legal pretexts for controlling this base while its potential for anti-state violence is still within the state’s control capability. Once its potential equals or grows greater than that of the state, repression is no longer a realistic policy. Changing the law, or treating it as a dead letter, gains precedence over enforcing it, even for status quo leaders who wish to preserve what control remains over informal political systems in which they are the elite. Once this process of peaceful political change has been successfully set in motion, both the emerging and the declining political elites have a high interest in maintaining a general freedom to threaten violence without initiating or provoking it, either on the part of the state or by other groups. For the status quo elites, there is more to be gained in preserving the continuity of the laws than in initiating and provoking the demonstration of violence at an unpredictable level. For the insurgent elites, <sup>7</sup> There are many areas outside the effective—if not the nominal—jurisdiction of formal governmental authority, as, for example, “off-limit” slum areas where police seldom penetrate, or the Mafia areas of Sicily. Such areas represent political sub-systems which possess a high degree of sovereignty, tolerated, for one reason or another, by the general government. Within such areas, the de facto authority is often the elite able to maintain the highest threshold of potential violence, not the formal government. In such areas, an unwritten law usually makes it a severely punished offense to call upon the authority of the general government.

there is usually more to be gained in preserving the continuity of the laws than in appealing to the uncertain results of violence.

In democratic systems, the ballot becomes the non-provocative symbol by which the elites may measure their capabilities for threatening direct action. In a real sense, voting is an approximation of picking sides before a street fight. Once the sides are picked, the leaders are able to gauge their bargaining strengths and make the best possible deal for themselves and their cohorts. The appeal to actual battle not only is unnecessary, but also, for the weaker side (the only side with an interest in challenging the results of the count), it does not promise to change the results, and may in fact undermine the authority of the polls as a method for reversing one's future position.

The threat of violence implicit in counting heads is an ambiguous measure of the power available to the political systems into which people group themselves at election time. The extent of voter commitment in these systems is uncertain and probably, in most cases, unequal to demands for supporting action. There are very few national elections in the United States—although many elsewhere—in which the results prefigure a plausible threat of civil war as the means by which the defeated candidates can gain concessions and appointments from the winning side. In general, democratic political leaders share a common interest in resolving disputes without invoking real violence. Neither side can be confident that the loyalty of its voters will stand the test of a demonstration of strength. Voting is a very imperfect register of loyalty, but rather conveys a miscellany of emotions, difficult to penetrate or to order rationally. Strenuous efforts are made by defeated candidates to restrain a show of violence by their own followers. Public concessions of defeat, homiletic congratulations, and avowals of support for the winner, are designed to communicate to their backers the finality of the verdict at the polls, which is subject to revision, not by a demonstration of violence, but by renewed peaceful efforts in the next election.

In 1960, after the close result of the Kennedy-Nixon election, what dangers could have been unleashed if Nixon had publicly repudiated the poll and openly supported minority efforts to hold recounts in California and Illinois? In a situation of this kind, it is clear how close to the surface lies the threat of violence implicit in the voting process.

III. THE INTERNATIONAL PROCESS

Many people blithely argue for law as a substitute for violence, as though there was a choice between the two. They call for international law and world government to eliminate war. This point of view reveals a blissful ignorance of the functions of violence in domestic legal systems. A viable system based on law protects the conditions of group action which make threats of violence tolerable. Law always rests on force, a legitimate monopoly in the hands of the state, and it can be changed by the threat of private violence. The threat of violence and the fear of the breakdown of law and order cast their shadows ahead; they operate to moderate demands and positions, thereby setting into peaceful motion the informal political processes of negotiation, concession, compromise, and agreement. Although there is no centralized monopoly of force in the international forum, the processes of mediation and negotiation function in much the same way. The credible threat of violence in the hands of nations has a similarly stabilizing effect, providing statesmen are attentive to the maintenance of their national capability for demonstrating violence, and providing their ambitions are commensurate to the bargaining position which their armaments achieve. More comprehensive legal codes and a world government may not improve the stability of the world community in any case, since the possibility of civil conflict exists in all political systems. Civil wars are frequently bloodier and more unforgiving than wars between sovereign nations.

In international politics also, the threat of violence tends to create stability and maintain peace. Here the threat is more directly responsive to policy controls. The nation-state has greater continuity than the informal political systems that coalesce and dissolve in the course of domestic social change. The threat of force can be asserted much more deliberately and can be demonstrated under full control, as in "good will" Navy visits, army maneuvers near a sensitive border, partial mobilization, etc. Because of the greater continuity of these macro-systems, the national leaders must strive to maintain the prestige of a nation's might and will. If the reputation of a nation's military power is allowed to tarnish, future bargaining power will be weakened. The country may feel obliged to re-establish that prestige by invoking a test of arms, as a means of inducing greater respect for its position from other nations. Strong nations prefer to demonstrate their military power peaceably in order that their prestige will afford them the bargaining power they deserve without a test of arms.

Because the threat of international violence is a conscious instrument of national policy, it generally lacks the random character of domestic violence. This means that if the armaments of nations fall out of balance, if the prestige of nations is no longer commensurate with their ambitions, if the will to take the risks of limited military conflicts is lacking, if domestic political considerations distort the national response to external threat, then the time becomes ripe for the outbreak of violence that may escalate out of control.

In general, the dangers of escalating international conflict induce greater, not lesser, restraint on the part of national leaders in their relations with each other. Attempts to achieve infinite security—and consequent irresponsibility—for the nation are as self-defeating as similar attempts for a domestic regime.

The functioning of consensus and competition between nations is not fundamentally different from that of domestic politics. The most striking difference is that in domestic politics the level of centralized force available to the state creates a high threshold of stability against the threats brought to bear within the system by private groups. In the international forum, the closest approximation to such a threshold is the array of decentralized forces available to the great powers. An aggressive power interested in modifying the status quo must cross the threshold of its own threat of force in order to induce other powers to choose between concessions to its demands or the costs and risks of an arms race. To the extent that the status quo powers are able and willing to pay the costs and take the risks, their own threshold can be raised, depriving the challenger of any political advantages from his investment. When all of the great powers are attentive to the equations of potential violence, no nation can hope to gain conclusive political advantages from an arms race. This situation makes possible international agreements or a tacit consensus for stabilizing arms and bringing about political settlements. Diplomatic ceremonies, like the ceremonies of personal relations which we call "manners," serve to minimize the dangers of provocation and threat in the day-to-day relations between nations.

IV. THE DOMESTIC PROCESS

Underneath the norms of legal and institutional behavior in national societies lies the great beast, the people's capability for outraged, uncontrolled, bitter and bloody violence. This is common to totalitarian as well as democratic societies, and is a major restraint against completely arbitrary government. Even totalitarian regimes can hope for stability only if they reflect in some degree the changing currents of political interest of the people and if they are willing to recruit members of the elites from the potentially disaffected group which they rule. Even a totalitarian state must purvey some concept of fairness and flexibility; an ability to change in response to the changing internal and external demands put upon it. Indeed, to the extent that a totalitarian regime permits the threat of violence to be raised against it in the form of political pressure, it loses some of its totalitarian quality. The dynamics of totalitarianism, however, generally make this kind of evolution difficult, if not impossible. Dictatorships of one or a few raise the level of official terror to offset or deter the threat of violence from below. Terror and counter-terror may escalate until the whole system collapses in an orgy of violence. The prospects for raising anything but another such dictatorship out of such wreckage would seem remote, except that people tire of violence and presently respond to it with passivity. Dictators are sometimes suspected of seeking a escape from this iron logic by provoking international wars which unite the country behind the leader, postponing issues of internal dissension.

The threat to carry political dissent outside peaceable channels can distract the government from the pursuit of other values, can impose upon it as its first and major responsibility the re-establishment of domestic peace and order and can lure it into shortsighted measures to suppress violence, measures that may instead widen the base of opposition and increase the occasions for anti-government protests.

The mere threat of private violence directed against the government has a very great influence upon government actions. By causing reallocations of the resources of the society into the essentially negative goals of internal security, the opposition may succeed in defeating or crippling the positive goals whose accomplishment might legitimize and strengthen government authority. To avoid this predicament even totalitarian governments occasionally go out of their way to appease their critics. The alternative to reform is ruthless suppression not only of the sources of the threat, but also of every symptom of united social action. Bowling clubs, assemblies of three or more people on street corners—there is no rational way to identify the first links of the chain which lead to social action. All must be broken up. The hopeless search for infinite security begins in this way; its logical end is the downfall of the regime. With this choice before it, it is easy to see why even a dictatorial regime may prefer social and political reform to the threat of violence. This is why so many kings and tsars rather than destroying their rivals and opponents, often sent them instead on enforced vacations and educational tours abroad.

In democratic societies this sharp dilemma is avoided far short of infinite deterrence. The institutional distribution of authority—constitutionalism—precludes unilateral attempts to centralize all the police powers in the hands of one agent. Also the law proscribes the overt threat of private violence and the existence of para-military forces, although it tolerates and protects the implied threat of violent outbreaks if political accommodation fails. Violence is demonstrated, not in organized forms, but rather in sporadic outbursts. Disgruntled elites who possess a clear capability for causing a planned demonstration—who have, that is, organized groups with a deep sense of moral outrage and injustice—avoid incriminating themselves and provoking counter-action against themselves. Instead they carry out “peaceable demonstrations” designed to reveal their numbers and the intensity of their commitment. These may have the bonus effects of provoking violent action against them, causing government intervention, or causing their more inflammable followers to ignite into unplanned outbursts of violence. Such potentials are implicit in the situation.

The leaders of the agitators then are placed in a position of minimum risk and maximum effectiveness, that of playing the role of “responsible leader.” They can bargain with formal authorities and with all the other members of the society in this way: “You must accept our just complaints and you must deal with us; otherwise, we will not be able to control our people. Unspeakable things may happen. We do not desire this to happen, but it is up to you to help us prevent it.” While playing this role, the reformist leaders may not be unhappy to have their prophecies partially fulfilled by sporadic outbreaks. Events which demonstrate violence (and thus induce other elites to make concessions) do not have to be planned. Once the emotions of a real social movement are churned up, the problem is to keep the events from happening.

The irresponsible elements may be disowned, but the bargaining power of the responsible leaders is enhanced. In the bargaining process, the moderate leaders often accept concessions which fall short of those demanded by some of their more extremist followers. Opportunists or “realists” often inherit the benefits wrought by the blood of martyrs. This is a healthy mode of exploiting the demonstration of violence without condoning it, enabling compromises to be reached which isolate the extremists and render them less dangerous to the body politic. Most followers in social movements will follow responsible leadership through the gives-and-takes of compromise, because they share the general fear of unlimited violence and counter-violence, with its unpredictable results and the defeat of all rational goals. Accommodations can be reached, even if only provisionally, which preserve the general consensus in maintaining the form and continuity of society and law.

V. SOME CONCRETE EXAMPLES

Let us turn to some concrete examples of how violence works its effects in practice.

A classical case of its actual demonstration against the legality of existing authority is the founding of the state of Israel in 1949. The Irgun, an underground terror organization, created conditions in Palestine which made further British occupation impractical. There is some doubt whether the British government would have honored their commitment to the Jewish Agency or honored it when they did, had it not been for the Irgun's role. Yet the Jewish Agency, the responsible and moderate leadership, negotiated the partition of Palestine and played the major role in the founding of the new state, all the while disavowing the terrorist acts and methods of the Irgun. Before the launching of Irgunist terror, the British government stalled the Jewish Agency and accorded it little respect.

More instructive are cases of domestic violence where the actual demonstration is minimal and where the implicit threat is all, as in the current campaign for Negro rights. Until the last decade, little sustained pressure was exerted to improve the Southern Negro's position by governmental action. Even with the growth of Negro voting power in the big cities of the North, Washington authorities have generally shown great respect for the implicit capabilities of violence of well-organized white supremacists. Partly because of the power of the White South in the Congress, in Democratic National Conventions, and in the Electoral College, presidents have acted with restraint in protecting the rights of Southern Negroes. So long as the possibility of violence was asymmetrical, the Whites well-organized and armed, the Negroes apathetic, intimidated, and disorganized, Negro attempts to register to vote, to protest lynchings and other injustices, could easily be tranquillized by the County Sheriffs, the local police, and the KKK. In the last decade, Negroes have been in the throes of a new self-consciousness, confidence, organization, and leadership. The Black Muslims, the Committee on Racial Equality, the NAACP, etc. have now demonstrated that the Southern Negro is capable of social action and of organized demonstrations of strength. As the capability grows for effective counter-violence against White Citizen Council activities—or, what is more significant, non-violent demonstrations which invoke violence by the extremist Whites—the Negro will gain increasing consideration for his demands, increasing support from “moderate” white leaders, and increasing attention and support from the federal authorities. Just as the existence of the White Citizens Councils strengthened the hand of southern moderates in trying to restrain civil rights action from Washington, so the existence of the Black Muslims and CORE now strengthens the position of the NAACP in seeking concessions from Southern Whites and action by the Justice Department. The threat of uncontrolled violent outbursts, hovering just beneath the surface, acts as a moderating influence, maintaining the institutions of peaceful process, inducing status quo groups to a greater readiness to yield some privileges, and restraining the responsible leaders of the insurgent Negroes from extremist demands.<sup>8</sup>

The strategy of non-violent social action (passive resistance or pacifism) does not abandon the threat of force as an instrument of social change. Rather, the threat operates within a civilized society by its provocative effects. By provoking the use of force by others, it forces the government to intervene on the behalf of the non-violent demonstrators, while evoking the sympathies of those less intensely involved. But as an international ideology, pacifism or unilateral non-violence may fail to achieve its objectives. Unless those who pursue it succeed in invoking some force in their behalf, they will be destroyed with impunity by their enemies.

The Dukhobor Sons of Freedom (of Vancouver, British Columbia) have adopted a novel tactic of demonstrating violence as they conduct their immemorial campaign against compulsory public education. They set fire to their own homes and barns, standing by and watching the blaze. They also parade naked down the center of city streets. The significance of these demonstrations is plain. Their religion forbids them to threaten or use violence against others. Instead, they symbolically demonstrate their discipline and passionate commitment to their own way of life by inflicting violence upon their own property. The naked marches provoke arrests and imprisonment and the house-burnings force the welfare agencies to provide temporary shelter. Both actions impose on the government responsibilities it is ill disposed to carry out, especially if such demonstrations are to continue indefinitely and involve the entire Dukhobor settlement. In addition, the demonstrations invoke public attention and sympathy for the believers. All of this may well give the local authorities an incentive to ignore Dukhobor defiance of school attendance laws. In fact, this is what has happened during the last 50 years. Efforts to enforce the law have been spasmodic and half-hearted, while the law has been generally evaded.

The relations of suicide and crime to social change form too large a topic for treatment here.<sup>9</sup> Durkheim studied these phenomena as an indicator or measure of social disorganization. They might also be studied in terms of demonstrating violence as an instrument of political and social change. When teenagers commit crimes, their legitimate grievances get more attention. When someone commits suicide, those who sense the circumstances that drove him to it are led to re-examine their own lives, and may be strengthened in convictions concerning the society in which they live. A suicide by an over-extended installment buyer in Chicago led to efforts to reform state and national laws governing loan-shark interest rates and collection of unpaid installment debts. A suicide, apart from its real motives, may be quickly exploited by those with a social cause. In effect, a suicide resembles a resignation from a government: it challenges values and institutions, evoking from all survivors a sense of the unresolved tensions which surround them, threatening the prospects for their own survival.<sup>10</sup> Suicides and crimes, however obscure <sup>8</sup> The recent violence at Oxford, Mississippi, involving the registration of Negro James Meredith at the State University, is likely to expedite Negro integration throughout the South. By precipitating violence (which resulted in two deaths), the White Extremists may have strengthened the ranks of the Moderates. Fearing a recurrence, white leadership in future situations may be more concerned with controlling the firebrands than in using them to force concessions from the Justice Department. Gunnar Myrdal put his finger on this when he referred to the “positive” aspect of the riots. “The riots make people think,” he declared. New York Times, October 4, 1962, p. 10.

<sup>9</sup> See summary of some pertinent research: Andrew F. Henry and James F. Short, Jr., Suicide and Homicide (Glencoe, Illinois, 1954), pp. 69–81.

<sup>10</sup> According to numerous press reports, the suicide of Marilyn Monroe led within a few days to a flurry of suicides by women. In the same manner, it may also have led to many decisions to live, which were not recorded.

and ambiguous, threaten the world and thus change it.

VI. SOME CONCLUDING REMARKS

Several points may be made in conclusion. Demonstrations of domestic violence serve to establish the intensity of commitment of members of the political system. The more intense the commitment, the greater the risks the system will take in challenging the status quo. Accordingly, the greater will be the bargaining efficacy of future threats. Social change often occurs legalistically. Rationalization in terms of the continuity of abstract legal models is a useful means of stressing consensus over competition, adding to the stability of the whole society. However, it is obvious that a legal or ideological syllogism is meaningless except in terms of the emotional force which members of the society attach to the first principle. The infinite regress of syllogistic reasoning ends somewhere with a commitment of self. Such commitments cannot be explained or understood by reasoning alone. Efforts to adduce rational principles for explaining social and political change are futile unless one grapples with the often irrational and illogical intensity of self-commitment which marks social movements.

No system can hope to survive unless it can live with and adjust itself to the multitudinous threats of violence which are the basis of social change. Democracies have shown a greater ability to do this. Yet democratic forms can be subverted to become totalitarian in substance, if the search for infinite security in the international forum is reflected internally in a search for infinite deterrence of threats against the social and political status quo. Major social changes have major social causes; they are not the result of isolated conspiracies and plots. They cannot be arrested by an effort to stamp out all conspiracies and plots. In healthy democracies, all political leaders and would-be leaders are, in effect, conspirators and plotters. They must be. This kind of activity is the heart of political democracy.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR: NEW ORTHODOXY FOR OLD LIBERALISM

WILSON CAREY McWILLIAMS
Oberlin College

Reinhold Niebuhr has profoundly affected American thought in theology, on society, and about politics.<sup>1</sup> He has puzzled more than one of his many critics and commentators, especially by the veritable panorama of doctrines which, at one time or another, he has appeared to advocate: several varieties of socialism, liberalism, and what seems to be a sort of mellow conservatism. The confusion engendered by this ideological medley has not been alleviated either by the voluminous extent of his writings, or by his teutonic, yet highly personal style.<sup>2</sup> But Niebuhr's policy suggestions have been shaped in response to changing conditions in the political world. Deeper analysis reveals a remarkably consistent teaching, present in all essential respects at least as early as his Moral Man and Immoral Society, which if not philosophy, is at least a theology of politics. The scope of this paper prevents any examination of the entire intellectual pilgrimage of Reinhold Niebuhr; I shall confine my attention to the main lines of his political teaching.<sup>3</sup>

Most critics and analysts would agree that whatever else he may have been, Niebuhr has been a critic of liberalism, modernity, and American culture. Yet, as so often is the case with Niebuhr, appearances can be misleading. It is true that his characteristic bêtes noires have been such comparatively modern thinkers as John Dewey. But this paper will endeavor to demonstrate that Niebuhr's basic political ideas are essentially the same as those of the liberals he seeks to criticize. His criticism is often devastating; but beginning as a critic, it ends with concepts and convictions drawn from the core of the liberal tradition. In this he is not unique. Niebuhr shares the intellectual tendencies of the generation of which he is a part, which, both attracted and disillusioned by the rhetoric of Woodrow Wilson and the crusade of 1917-1918, was and remains affected by anti-rationalism, doubtful of human nature and suspicious of enthusiasms in politics. Yet Louis Hartz has indicated that the most scathing critics of post-Wilson America were unable to escape the "irrational Lockeanism" of the American liberal tradition, and came to terms with it after a period of voluntary expatriation. At the approach of World War II the critics <sup>1</sup> In referring to Niebuhr's major works, I have adopted a system of abbreviations, as listed below. Unless otherwise noted, the publisher is Scribner's, New York.

- BT Beyond Tragedy, 1938
- CPP Christianity and Power Politics, 1940
- CRPP Christian Realism and Political Problems, 1953
- DCR Does Civilization Need Religion? (Macmillan, 1944; orig. 1927)
- SOT Discerning the Signs of the Times, 1946
- FH Faith and History, 1949
- ICE An Interpretation of Christian Ethics (Harper, 1935)
- MMIS Moral Man and Immoral Society, 1932
- REE Reflections on the End of an Era, 1934
- CLCD The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness, 1944
- IAH The Irony of American History, 1954
- HN The Nature and Destiny of Man (vol. I), 1951
- HD The Nature and Destiny of Man (vol. II), 1951
- SDH The Self and the Dramas of History, 1955
- SNE The Structure of Nations and Empires, 1959
- WCAR The World Crisis and American Responsibility, E. Lefever, ed., (Associated Press, New York, 1958)

<sup>2</sup> Paul Tillich has suggested that Niebuhr's major stylistic fault is an "overpredilection for paradox"; "Niebuhr's Theory of Knowledge" in C. Kegley and R. Bretall, eds., Reinhold Niebuhr: His Religious, Social, and Political Thought (New York, 1956).

<sup>3</sup> Critical writings about Niebuhr are almost as numerous as his own writings. Among the most useful are: Kegley and Bretall, op. cit.; Kenneth W. Thompson, "Beyond the National Interest," Review of Politics, Vol. 17 (April 1955), pp. 167-188 and "Toward a Theory of International Relations," this Review, Vol. 49 (September 1955) pp. 733-746; Levi Olan, "Reinhold Niebuhr and the Hebraic Spirit," Judaism, Vol. 5 (Spring 1956), pp. 1-15; N. P. Jacobson, "Reinhold Niebuhr's Philosophy of History," Harvard Theological Review, Vol. 37 (October 1944), pp. 237-266; also the sections on Niebuhr in Morton White, Social Thought in America: The Revolt Against Formalism (Boston, 1956) and Charles Frankel, The Case for Modern Man (New York, 1956).

the 1920s became horrified at the destructive effects of their criticism on the national myth and advocated "responsibility."<sup>4</sup> This pattern is quite descriptive of Reinhold Niebuhr's intellectual history.

But Niebuhr is far too subtle and profound a thinker to be disposed of within the confines of a "generation." Any such effort would do violence to the real character of his contribution to that generation which has so frequently, and frantically, urged America to "come of age." The refurbishing of the liberal creed has not been an easy task. The "truths" which had been so daringly held self-evident in the 18th century had come to be the "inarticulate major premise," in Holmes' phrase, of American civilization by the early 19th century. It is difficult to tell whether the inarticulateness was due to the universal acceptance of these "truths" or to the development of doubts about their self-evident qualities.<sup>5</sup> The original theorists credited the discovery of the "self-evident truths" to reason. Yet they also believed in another, instrumental, reason which was the "servant of the passions," so in some ways they were progenitors of the anti-rationalism of our times.<sup>6</sup> The discoveries of that instrumental, scientific, and empirical reason have dealt rather roughly with the premises of the old liberal creed. The panoply of beliefs of liberal utopianism, of men "born free and equal," of men forever devoted to increasing individual liberty, and of progress and perfectibility in history, has been radically undermined on a rational level.<sup>7</sup> Niebuhr has often noted that liberalism has become a "holding action."<sup>8</sup> Indeed, his own criticism of reason has not been notably different from that of a number of critics, whether earlier, such as Hume, or more contemporary. In part, it is a criticism of the "pretension" of instrumental rationalism that Niebuhr finds in such theorists as John Dewey. But revealingly, it is not a criticism of instrumental rationalism as such; when reason is reduced to the proportions of a technique, Niebuhr favors employing it instrumentally. His criticism is an effort to reduce it to those proportions, to prevent instrumental reason from "absolutizing" its "finite" perspectives. Niebuhr's quest is for a safer basis than reason on which to rest the great liberal premises. His criticism presents the arguments of a long line of critics to establish the failure of reason to uphold the old creed. But this denial constitutes, in Niebuhr's eyes, a "negative validation" of a faith which comes to embody the articles of the liberal system, especially its central conception of freedom. His argument retains the characteristic argumentative style of early liberalism, what Max Weber called Wertrationalismus: the willingness to use means given by reason for ends discerned by "inspiration." But where the early liberals called the inspiration rational, Niebuhr calls it religious or theological. This goes a long way toward explaining the curious fact, which has baffled many critics, that Niebuhr makes a "virtue of incomprehensibility."<sup>9</sup> In fact, the title of Niebuhr's early work Does Civilization Need Religion? is incomplete. It is not "civilization" but that civilization of which Niebuhr is a part that is involved; not civilization, but liberalism, "needs religion."

In the analysis which follows I shall attempt to demonstrate that Niebuhr adheres, at least in "this-worldly" and political terms, to four central liberal doctrines: (1) the perfectibility of man, (2) the identification of freedom with the social good, (3) the contractarian conception of the state, and (4) the idea of progress in history. Since he has devoted much of his attention to international affairs, the argument will conclude with the contention that Niebuhr's view of international politics reflects these four doctrines, as well as the equally vital liberal concept of the "brotherhood of man."

I

Niebuhr has been cited as a "realist" as often as he has been called a critic of liberalism. Of course, "realist" is an appealing term to apply to oneself; every theorist likes to believe himself to be truly "realistic." Yet curiously, "realism" represents only a part of Niebuhr's reality. "Realism" is identified with the comprehension of physical nature, a world governed by an often grim necessity, if unified by an equally deterministic set of "pre-ordained harmonies." But man is more than physical, and more than "realism" is able to realize. Niebuhr's "prophetic" insight reveals to him a radical human freedom, which is "transcend-

<sup>4</sup> Louis Hartz, "The Coming of Age of America," this REVIEW, Vol. 51 (June 1957), pp. 474-483.

<sup>5</sup> Russel B. Nye, "The Search for the Individual, 1750-1850," Centennial Review, Vol. V (Winter 1961), pp. 1-20.

<sup>6</sup> Geoffrey Clive, The Romantic Enlightenment; Ambiguity and Paradox in the Western Mind, 1750-1920 (Meridian Books, New York, 1960), pp. 19-38.

<sup>7</sup> John H. Schaar, Loyalty in America (University of California Press, Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1957), pp. 116-119.

<sup>8</sup> SDH 36, 222; WCAR 11; IAH, ch. vi.

<sup>9</sup> Olan, op. cit., pp. 2, 7.

ent" and which seeks the absolute and the infinite, beyond any of the limitations imposed by time or nature.<sup>10</sup> But though these elements may be separated analytically they are never separated in Niebuhrean man. Man forever combines the two and can never escape the resultant tension and ambiguity, an ambiguity productive of anxiety which leads him to the futile effort to escape the demands of nature on one hand, or of the spirit on the other. Nature imposes self-seeking passion and egoism on the spirit, and roots the spirit in the finite; the sin of the spirit is to seek to deny that finite or temporal element in man, and hence to be guilty of pretension and pride. Moreover, the spirit breaks the "pre-ordained" harmonies of nature and makes the prudent and limited attributes of "natural man" become infinite and insatiable, leading to conflict, competition, and disorder.<sup>11</sup>

Intermediate between spirit and nature is the area of "human contrivance" or "rational freedom." Though reason is always an instrument of the natural self-seeking of man, it qualifies and restrains it by a kind of prudence and calculation. The purely harmonic world of nature is forever destroyed, yet man, a "creator" as well as a "creature" of history, is able by techniques, institutions, and science to harness nature to his purposes and increasingly to master it.<sup>12</sup> But, of course, the more that man masters nature, the more his own natural passions are freed from restraint; the more that men can obtain, the more they will want. Conflict remains eternal, contradictions perpetual.

But this world of conflict and struggle is not the world of nature; it is the product of the spirit and of reason in nature. Consequently, a purely secular "realism" which is typified for Niebuhr by Hobbes and Machiavelli understands neither the true nature of man nor of conflict in the world. "Realism," it will be seen, represents a doctrine about the world which is developed by empirical and unaided reason; it becomes identified with a curiously old-style brand of naturalism, of the conflict of passions, and of man the acquisitive animal.<sup>13</sup> Nor need "realism" necessarily be secular. St. Augustine represents the "theological realist." Aided by theology and faith, Augustine perceived the radical freedom of the human spirit but he made too sharp a separation between the spirit and nature. While it is by no means true (as Niebuhr seems to imply) that Augustine was prepared to let the world run without ethical restraints, he provided far too small a role for the idealistic element of human nature in this world to satisfy Niebuhr, who regards Augustine as "excessively realistic."<sup>14</sup> Theological realism makes too many concessions to the natural world, and regards Christianity as an essentially other-worldly ethic. Niebuhr, despite his long distrust of the "utopian" effort to apply Christian or other perfectionist teachings directly to the world, will not allow such teachings to be separated from it. He has always contended that the "impossible ethical ideal" remains "relevant."<sup>15</sup> He is not a realist on his own terms; he is better regarded as a "realistic" or moderate utopian. Niebuhr has laid stress on the limits which restrict the degree to which any utopia may be attained. But within the ultimate limits, his awareness of the problem of "less and more" has been quite intense, the intensity being especially marked in the years just preceding the outbreak of World War II.<sup>16</sup> In fact, all realists, contemporary or historical, have conceded that given the limits which attach to human endeavor man should always strive to approach the limits: to become as perfect as his imperfections allow.<sup>17</sup>

Two factors determine the content of such a teaching. The first, and perhaps crucial, question is the nature of the Good toward which human striving should aim. The second question, of importance in "realistic" or pragmatic terms, is the character and scope of the limits

<sup>13</sup> SNE 133; CPP 215; SDH 109-111, 119.

<sup>14</sup> SNE 105-107, 291; CRPP 127; REE 205-231.

<sup>15</sup> Even so friendly a critic as K. W. Thompson has found the relevance "not clear": "The Political Philosophy of Reinhold Niebuhr," in Kegley and Bretall, op. cit., p. 169 and "Beyond the National Interest," op. cit.

<sup>16</sup> CPP, passim; IAH 157; HD 191-195, 233-234; FH 27-28; SNE 28-31, 298-299; "Peace and the Liberal Illusion," The Nation, Vol. 149 (28 January 1939), pp. 117-119.

<sup>17</sup> Norman Jacobson, "Political Realism in the Age of Reason: The Anti-Rationalist Heritage in America," Review of Politics, Vol. 15 (October 1953), pp. 446-469.

<sup>10</sup> SNE 287-290, 298-299, 7; MMIS 25; HN 4, 11, 26-27, 48, 68, 125; HD 95-96, 155, 240, 284, 308; SDH 13-15, 23, 128; CLCD 6, 49, 53-55, 187.

<sup>11</sup> Christianity and Crisis, Vol. 9 (Spring 1945), pp. 7-8; IAH 156-158; NH 178-190, 249-250; BT ch. vi; SOT 68; SNE 107, 287-288.

<sup>12</sup> SNE 40-41, 105-107, 289; thus man is said to be able to "deflect" history without changing its direction. The Baconian roots of the doctrine are evident: FH 71-94; SOT 65; CLCD 154; MMIS 29; IAH 4-7, 71-77.

that are thought to restrict the attainment of the ultimate and yet impossible standard.

It is quite revealing that, in answer to this second question, Niebuhr is content with the assertion that limits exist; he is adamant in his refusal to specify them more precisely. For to claim to know the limits of human perfection is to claim Divine knowledge. If it is prideful to seek to establish goodness in the world, to escape limits altogether, then to seek to define the limits is, in his eyes, no less so. And while the first has at least the merit of overestimating man, the second runs the risk of limiting man to a level of baseness lower than necessary.<sup>18</sup> Niebuhr frequently denounces all theories of "natural law" because they compromise too readily with that nature which man may increasingly "master."<sup>19</sup> His denunciations of these, and other theories, from Catholic Rationalism to Marxist-Leninist, center on their supposed identification of a particular political order with the ultimately perfect. It is to be hoped that Niebuhr knows better than that. Almost all the "pretensions" he indicates did not constitute claims that a given state was perfect but that it represented the best attainable state in the conditions and limitations under which men operated.

Niebuhr's attack on the "absolutizing" of such "finite" perspectives has a dual nature. His attack on some theorists is actually a criticism of the good which they defined, different from that which Niebuhr holds as a standard. Others perceived the nature of the good, but set the standard at too low a level of attainment, or identified it too much with the preconceptions of an age. Thus democracy, a "perennial necessity," had to be extricated from the "bourgeois" associations of its origin.<sup>20</sup>

Niebuhr's language is apt to delude the reader. Despite his denials, his theory contains an implicit "natural law" or "natural right," that is, a conception of the best state in this world. Despite his "historical relativism" his teaching contains a number of such "perennial necessities" and "constant factors" in politics. To assert that progress is always possible leads to an emphasis on a society which is open to change, as Niebuhr's theory does. But such a state becomes a this-worldly "best state." In fact, such a state is necessary if the "fanatical" effort to establish the ultimately perfect state is to be avoided. For immediate purposes, the significance is that, although Niebuhr denies that man can ever be perfect or that progress is limitless, his theory strives to, and to a large degree does make the limitations meaningless in political terms; that is, his effort is to salvage as much of the liberal creed as is possible in an age that doubts it.

II

The content of Niebuhr's "best state" in the world is determined by the nature of the other-worldly best which it strives to imitate, just as his pragmatic opponents, in order to discern policies or states which are "better" must have a standard of the "best" by which to judge them so. Niebuhr's distinctive stance—which often obscures his meaning—is that in a period accustomed to pragmatic evasions, he begins with an ultimate and reasons down to the world. The ultimate standard gives the character to Niebuhr's political teaching as a whole.

There is little doubt as to the "human good" in Niebuhr's teaching: it is contained in the spiritual, in the element of man's nature characterized by "transcendent freedom" and the quest for the ultimate. In fact, this element constitutes the "true" nature of man; without such a teleological conception much of Niebuhr's rhetoric of pathos concerning the human condition would be pointless.<sup>21</sup>

Yet such a good is quite different from classical definitions of virtue, in that it is without content. It is an ability or a way of doing things which does not describe what is done. Niebuhr's terms, used in describing this virtue, are suggestive: man the "creator" as opposed to "creature," "transcending" his nation, class or place in history. All suggest an almost romantic individuality, or those conceptions of "creativity" or "autonomy" which have been so fashionable in recent years.<sup>22</sup> One may summarize Niebuhr's idea of the ethical rather simply. It is freedom. The more things of which man becomes free—time, space, passion, class, or nation—the better he becomes. Now it is true that Niebuhr attacks modern theorists for "exaggerating" the degree to which freedom

<sup>18</sup> FH 34, 54, 71–83, 91, 123, 174, 180, 238–239; IAH 130, 158; HD 47, 85, 95–96, 155, 232; HN 197, 281; SOT 65; CRPP 133; SNE 291, 298–299; Kegley and Bretall, op. cit., p. 435.

<sup>19</sup> FH 77, 174; HD 48, 55, 281; CRPP 3, 200–201; DCR 26, 170–175, 218–219; SDH 109, 229; ICE 41–46, 114, 188; HN 178, 281.

<sup>20</sup> SNE 59–61; HD 249; SOT 100; CLCD 48–49, 118; IAH 96–100.

<sup>21</sup> Frankel, op. cit., describes Niebuhr's ethics as "masochism, not wisdom" for much this reason, p. 115; MMIS 257; CRPP 159; CPP 215; FH 174–185; HN 16, 48, 249.

<sup>22</sup> Kenneth Keniston, "Alienation and the Decline of Utopia," American Scholar, Vol. 29 (Spring 1960), pp. 161–200.

and virtue can be identified.<sup>23</sup> But to suggest an "exaggeration" is to suggest that they can be identified to some degree. And, moreover, the reason modern theorists are said to be in error is that they fail to discern the "natural" element in man. Thus, freedom and virtue cannot be identified completely in this world, not because they are not ultimately identifiable but because total freedom is impossible and impracticable. But it remains the standard toward which man ought to strive. Love, of course, is the ultimate value beyond freedom. But love demands freedom because it cannot be commanded or coerced. And, moreover, love itself is defined in terms of "self-sacrifice" and of over-coming "egoism." Not only is it true that from another point of view this is surely "self-realization" or "fulfillment," but the very existence of "egoism" in Niebuhr's teaching is bound up with the fact that man is in nature.<sup>24</sup>

Much of Niebuhr's discussion and concept of freedom has obvious roots in Kantian idealism; so does his corollary concern that individuals be used as "ends and not means" and with the ethic of "good will."<sup>25</sup> Ultimately, Niebuhr agrees with the idealists as to the nature of virtue. Given his great stress on the inevitable corruption of freedom by egoism in the world, it follows that not only can freedom and virtue not be simply identified but that greater freedom runs the peril of greater evil as well as greater good. Niebuhr has, in fact, made a point of this. While such a fact demands a certain prudence, Niebuhr's refusal to set limits to perfectibility places him in the idealist camp. Prudential ethics concede too much to "nature." Moreover, they cannot guide men in the extreme case where "heroism" is demanded for the choice between opposite goals: freedom or slavery, tyranny or anarchy.<sup>26</sup> Prudential ethics are valid only if they assume the ultimate importance of freedom. Man's involvement in nature demands that a certain amount of self-interest be "legitimated," as must concern for self-preservation. But, not surprisingly, this merely emphasizes that the pursuit of self-interest and freedom should be "enlightened."<sup>27</sup> This enlightenment has two characteristics, the realization of the perils of "natural self-interest" in one's own freedom, and a readiness to pursue self-interest in ways compatible with the freedom of others.

Indeed, Niebuhr's "realism," said to reside in his "recognition of the effects of power," is itself part of that idealistic element of his thought we have discussed. Freedom demands power, the power to free the spirit from nature by "conquering" the natural, a belief which unites Niebuhr with modern theorists from Bacon forward. While the quest will ultimately fail, increasing increments of power will make man freer of the natural. It is for this reason in fact—that power is never sufficient to free man from nature—that for practical purposes freedom is defined as power.<sup>28</sup> Thus the quest for power (which produces conflict) and historical "progress" (which is ambiguous precisely because power may be used for good or evil) must both be judged good in a relative, "this worldly," sense. This decisively sets Niebuhr apart from a theorist like Hobbes, who regarded conflict and the quest for power as among the chief evils of man and set his goal instead at the attainment of social peace. It puts Niebuhr in the camp of the liberals, beginning with John Locke, who regarded the state of war as merely an annoyance compared with the loss of "freedom" that would be entailed by accepting the iron peace of Hobbes' Leviathan.<sup>29</sup> As Niebuhr has put it,

Self-interest may be a source of discord ultimately but it is tentatively necessary to prevent the harmony of the whole from destroying the vitality of the parts.<sup>30</sup>

Niebuhr's concept of the state follows this liberal Lockean model, and although he criti-

<sup>27</sup> SDH 30-35, 139; SOT 39; WCAR 41-42; or "pragmatic" in IAH, passim.

<sup>28</sup> HN 141; FH 94, 219; IAH 30; SOT 48, 65; MMIS 2; CLCD 154; Kegley and Bretall, op. cit. p. 432, even to the shocking and Machiavellian statement "powerless goodness ends on the cross" which is clearly indicated as a stricture, SOT 143; ICE 237. For a discussion of the concept of liberty as power, see Bertrand de Jouvenel, Sovereignty (University of Chicago Press, 1957), pp. 248-275.

<sup>29</sup> John Locke, Second Treatise on Civil Government, ch. vii, 93; HN 101; SOT 101-105; CPI 15, 42-43, 93; SDH 14-15, 229.

<sup>30</sup> "The Moral Issue in International Relations," cited in Thompson, "Toward a Theory of International Relations," op. cit., p. 742.

<sup>23</sup> SDH 38-53; HD 69, 144.

<sup>24</sup> HN 14, 178-190, 249-250, 260, 288-289; HD 78, 149-151; IAH 57, 84; SOT 17, 21; CLCD 79; SDH 30-32, 169.

<sup>25</sup> SOT 101-103, 176, 181, 195-201; FH 77; DCR 19, 22, 126; MMIS 170-175; HN 22, 30-33, 77; SDH 61; CPP 139; ICE 41, 52, 112, 194.

<sup>26</sup> CRPP 110, 132-135; CLCD 19-21, 61; FH 119, 134, 174; SDH 31, 139; ICE 21, 39, 41, 111, 206, 65; WCAR 42; DCR 152-153, 76; HN 178, 214, 281; BT 146, 292, 306.

cizes the "social contract" theory, his criticism suggests that he accepts that theory in all essential respects. Like Locke, he posits a state of "pre-ordained" harmonies as the "natural" state of man before he "fell." The condition of man after the fall was, as in liberal theory, a "state of war" which led to the establishment of the state.<sup>31</sup> By placing the "state of nature" in Eden—and outside history—Niebuhr avoids the great dilemma of liberal contractarian theory: the question of how conflict arose among pacific "natural men." Indeed, for practical purposes, Locke and his successors equated the natural state of man with the state of war and may have regarded the idea of a period of harmony as a somewhat deceptive myth.<sup>32</sup> But to both the liberals and to Niebuhr what follows is that the state is produced only to avoid the state of war; and yet, given the "natural" condition of fallen man, conflict is inevitable. Hence the state, a "human contrivance" exists to channel the conflict into relatively bloodless and law-abiding ways. Niebuhr's attack on the contract theory denies that the contract took place at any definite time; rather, it developed through "organic" and historical processes.<sup>33</sup> (Burke, of course, made the same argument, yet Burke, as we too often forget nowadays, called himself a Whig and not a Tory.<sup>34</sup>) In any case, most contractarian theorists treated the historicity of the social contract as unimportant. It represented a necessary postulate to account for man's escape from the state of war; how long such a development took—or even whether it had taken place—was of little concern.<sup>35</sup> Liberal theorists, who often sought to show that the "original" contract, even granting its existence, had been corrupted and was not yet embodied in government, were even less concerned with the event. Niebuhr's unwillingness to credit the state to an act of speculative or scientific reason is important but it does not change the concept of the state as such.

For Niebuhr, as for early liberals, the political order is not among the higher ethical achievements of man. Man is not a political animal but an animal "born free." Community is based on "animal gregariousness," and not on human freedom; the goal of harmony within the civil order is "uncivilized" or tribal.<sup>36</sup> The state, since it employs coercion to attain its ends, is perhaps even less desirable than purely natural community. The state is never more than a product of necessity, to which men "give up" freedoms in the effort to escape the state of war. Hence political society is always "ambiguous" and forever "frustrates" the higher impulses of man.<sup>37</sup>

Since the state of war is apparently produced by the action of the spirit in "transmuting" natural harmonies, it might be suggested that the spirit be directed toward the purely spiritual, toward the contemplative life. But here Niebuhr's "idealism" asserts itself strongly; he is unwilling to allow such a separation even at the cost of conflict. St. Augustine and the Medieval theorists committed this fault: that they set the standard of human attainment too low. They paid too high a "price in order" and denied sufficient scope for freedom. "Freedom" in this case is notably a freedom to act in and to change the political order, a liberal and not a notably Christian definition of liberty. Medievalism restricted "cultural vitalities" in a quest for unity. The synthesis of Medievalism was broken up, he asserts, by "creative chaos."<sup>38</sup> Though medievalism may be extreme in this quest for unity, it represents only part of a general rule: that all political orders are morally mediocre because they "exalt peace over freedom."<sup>39</sup> Given the fact that political orders are, however, necessary due to the presence of evil and the propensity to war, justice consists in that harmony which provides maximum scope for the "unique vitality and freedom of the parts."<sup>40</sup>

One of Niebuhr's "perennial necessities" is

<sup>31</sup> SNE 50-51, 40-41.

<sup>32</sup> Richard Cox, Locke on War and Peace (Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1960).

<sup>33</sup> SNE 50-51.

<sup>34</sup> I am indebted for the reminder to Harvey Mansfield, Jr., Harvard University; for further evidence see Ralph Barton Perry, Puritanism and Democracy (New York, 1944), p. 14, in which Perry identifies Burke with the "fundamental philosophy of the Declaration of Independence."

<sup>35</sup> Thus Hobbes: "It may, peradventure be thought that there never was such a time, nor condition of war as this; and I believe it was never generally so. . . . But though there had never been any time. . . ." (Leviathan, Bk. I, ch. 13).

<sup>36</sup> CRPP 91; SOT 21, 25, 180; SDH 17, 222; CPP 63, 119; HN 270; HD 79, 310; CLCD 53.

<sup>37</sup> SDH 10-11, 137, 235; SNE 33, 50, Introduction, 291; MMIS, passim; FH 77, 96-97, 196, 219; HD 79, 267-268, 310; SOT 168.

<sup>38</sup> SNE 135-139, 108-112, 4, 146-163, 44-48, 51-59, 105.

<sup>39</sup> SOT 175-181; FH 129, 219; SDH 229; CPP 104; CRPP 155-158; HD 310; HN 270.

<sup>40</sup> "The Moral Issue in International Relations," op. cit., p. 742.

the existence of a social balance of power.<sup>41</sup> This "necessity" is "perennial" in precisely the way that the "Rights of Man" were conceived to be inalienable: it is necessary to a just order. The balance prevents just that concentration of power in the hands of a few which limits the freedom of the many precisely because it concentrates the stuff of freedom, power. Hence a state should "institutionalize" conflict to keep power divided. And since "love" is the regulative principle of justice in absolute ethics, and freedom is the condition of love, the balance should be weighted in the direction of more, rather than less, freedom for the parts.<sup>42</sup> Niebuhr is not unaware that a justice whose principal virtue consists in preventing tyranny is "negative." But, he asserts, in "advanced" societies only a "rough justice" or "minimum harmony" is possible.<sup>43</sup> One might ask why such societies are considered "advanced." The answer can only be, because they make "freedom" possible. Justice, although a moral norm within the limits of human life, is less desirable than freedom. A "negative" justice which permits freedom, then, is better than a "positive" justice which does not.

Like all his sometime antagonists, whether Marxist or Liberal, Niebuhr sees "chaos" as oftentimes creative, conflict a good, and not merely a mournful necessity. If conflict is the price of freedom, then Niebuhr will accept conflict; and not only accept it, but sanctify it in the name of a higher morality. If Niebuhr chastizes "rationalists" for the belief that freedom is always compatible with order, it is not because, as a conservative might, he means that freedom must sometimes be restrained, but rather that one must be prepared to sacrifice order to maintain freedom.<sup>44</sup>

Despite his frequent criticism of that idealism which denies the limits imposed on man by nature, Niebuhr argues for the utility of even these trans-historical perspectives in the attack on political orders from a more perfectionistic stance.<sup>45</sup> Niebuhr's analysis of the limitations of medievalism on "cultural vitalities" suggests Marx's notion of "fetters on the modes of production." But Niebuhr goes beyond this to suggest not only that the "synthesis" became outdated but that it had paid too high a "price in order" from the outset. Both the idea of a trans-historical standard of criticism and the belief in the desirability of historical change suggest a theory of progress. And while Niebuhr regards history as "inconclusive" and progress as a mixture of good and evil, he nonetheless regards the movement of history as a forward one. His emphasis on the mixture of good and evil merely makes progress dialectic, rather than linear.<sup>46</sup> "Like Hegel's new logic," he once conceded, without its "premature finality."<sup>47</sup> Hegel's standard was also set too low. Niebuhr's theory resembles Kant's claim of a "cunning" in war and conflict in history, and progress as virtually limitless.<sup>48</sup> Although they differ in that Niebuhr puts the heavenly city outside of history while Kant put it inside, the concept of historical progress through conflict is the same for both. And the standard by which progress is measured, the goal of perfect peace in total freedom, is the same whichever side of the history/post-history dividing line it is placed on. Niebuhr strives valiantly to relate this idea of progress to Christian ideas of Providence. Yet orthodox Christianity saw divine providence as essentially eschatological. God's judgment at the end of history did not guarantee that events in historical time would "lead" to that judgment by a humanly discernible progression.<sup>49</sup>

<sup>45</sup> SNE 11-13, 105, 59-61, 291.

<sup>46</sup> FH 20-35, 54, 66, 69, 227; SNE 297-298; HD 47, 186, 287-292, 315, 320; SDH 52; MMIS 60-62; SOT 48, 65; thus, Niebuhr retains the conviction that "time is on our side"—or at least he did in 1956: "A Qualified Faith," New Republic, Vol. 134 (13 Feb. 1956), pp. 14-15. Equally illustrative is Niebuhr's conviction that historical "meaning" is a "necessary affirmation": HN 4, 10, 240; FH 114; BT 5, 18.

<sup>47</sup> CRPP 177; cf. FH 214-232.

<sup>48</sup> Kenneth Waltz, "Kant, Liberalism and War," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (June, 1962), pp. 331-340. Niebuhr's continuing belief in the virtue of "rising social forces" is connected to his earlier belief in the utility of catastrophe in advancing progress, and his continuing belief in the role of conflict. REE, passim; FH 227; SDH 151, 196; BT, ch. ii; CPP 198; MMIS 222; CLCD 118.

<sup>49</sup> N. P. Jacobson, op. cit., pp. 265-266, 275. See also J. D. Bury, The Idea of Progress (Dover, New York, 1955), p. 21 and the brilliant analyses

<sup>41</sup> WCAR 26; HD 253-266; SDH 198; CRPP 134-135.

<sup>42</sup> FH 34, 128-129, 133, 227; CLCD 118, 173-174; SDH 38, 51, 71, 168, 196-198; ICE 61, 88; 103-106, 117, 155-159, 189-191; REE 246-247, CRPP 31, 148-150; CPP 19, 27, 29; SOT 46, 68, 81, 134-135; IAH 2, 84-85; HD 277; MMIS 29, 257.

<sup>43</sup> BT 140; HD 252-258, 266; CPP 104, 107; ICE 60; MMIS 22; IAH 96-108; SDH 38, 178, 198, 229.

<sup>44</sup> "The Unity and Depth of Our Culture," Sewanee Review, Vol. 53 (1944), p. 193; CLCD 66; SOT 177; SDH 1; ICE 122, 171.

Yet despite these basically liberal perspectives, Niebuhr has continually asserted a difference between his position and that of liberalism. That he believes this difference to be one of practicability is indicated by his use of the term "realism." Liberals and social scientists, Niebuhr declares, have a "fundamental goal" of anarchy.<sup>50</sup> Yet although anarchy is presumably impractical, Niebuhr is not prone to deny the virtue of freedom or the evil of coercion.<sup>51</sup> His claim to a distinct position rests on the dubious proposition that the presumed anarchist aims of liberals ever constituted the actual goals of their policy, or that they believed that social harmony could be obtained "easily." But of far more significance is the fact that Niebuhr accepts the liberal goal as the valid goal of social policy. Religion, in a rather unusual role, has very little to say about ends of life and policy which liberalism does not say. It teaches prudence in attempting to achieve them and a safe basis on which to rest them. But the Heavenly City of Reinhold Niebuhr retains a distinctly modern form in which to cast its eternal perfections.

In fact, the best state in this world—as opposed to the heavenly ultimate—seems strikingly to resemble the United States. Niebuhr's best state must be an "open" and a "pluralist" society which, at the same time, must have an "organ of dominion and authority." Democracy, a perennial necessity, is also desirable in that it "obscures" the element of domination in the central organ by making it public, rather than the preserve of a ruling class.<sup>52</sup> Despite the ambiguities of technology, the state should also be technological, so as to maximize freedom over nature.<sup>53</sup> We may pass over the question of how far this picture actually represents the reality of American politics today; it is apparent that the image suggests the ideal of the most traditional American theorists and present day social scientists.

of Karl Löwith in Kegley and Bretall, op. cit., pp. 282-290, and Meaning and History (Phoenix Books, Chicago, 1950), pp. 160-173.

<sup>50</sup> CLCD 66, SDH 1; MMIS xvii; ICE 61, 122, 171; SOT 177; "The Unity and Depth of Our Culture," op. cit.

<sup>51</sup> CRPP 148-150; FH 219; SOT 81, 145; ICE 147, 164, 171, 191, 209.

<sup>52</sup> SNE 34-35, 28, 59-65, 234-238, 291-294; CRPP 91, 96, 148-150; CLCD 1, 47-49, 118-120; HD 194-195, 249, 254-258, 266-268; SDH 38, 51, 178, 196, 198, 229; SOT 100; IAH 96-100, 108; ICE 77-78.

<sup>53</sup> FH 71-94; CLCD 154; IAH 71; MMIS 9; IAH 18, 30, 95, 54-58; HN 22, 57, 68.

Niebuhr has less faith in institutional change than many liberals, and is unwilling to credit the "best state" to rational contrivance. We have "stumbled on" the "constant factors" in the human situation. Democracy is not possible for all states at all times.<sup>54</sup> Hamilton and Madison would have disagreed with little of that analysis. They certainly did believe that they had discovered a "science of politics." They were equally aware, however, that what had been "stumbled on" was the opportunity to put this science into practice, and that America represented a unique historical situation in which experiment was possible.<sup>55</sup> Niebuhr's ideal remains, in any case, the same. If his hopes for the realization of that ideal have come to rest more on historical development than on institutional change, he reflects a general tendency among 19th century liberals, once the hopes of the Enlightenment for despots who would establish their program were dissipated. Perhaps even more, he reflects the alienation from a seemingly hostile world and the sudden desperate clinging to institutions which once seemed secure that has characterized "the responsible" liberalism of his generation.

III

Niebuhr's view of man, the social good and the best state are directly connected to his conceptions of international politics. Like Kant and the liberals, Niebuhr believes, as we have noted, not only that conflict and the quest for power are inevitable, but that they are beneficial in tendency. Nations are aggregations of individuals (but without the restraints of the individual moral conscience) and must minimally leave men no less free than they were on entering the state. But since a policy based on the goal of stability is impracticable and undesirable, the state must seek to add power, to make its citizens "freer than they were before." Thus Jefferson, whose policy of "protective imperialism" sought only the power needed to preserve his country, is classified as only partially "realistic."<sup>56</sup> A genuine realist, then, must add power in order to increase national freedom. Niebuhr's criticism of the "pretension" of empires does not imply that all imperial aims are equally bad. He regards some empires, such as the British, as clearly preferable to others. The "pretension" of empires consists in the effort to deny that all efforts to add power are equally justifiable and equally good. Differences between empires arise from the effects of their rule on others. As an act of state, however, the addition of power is always morally the same and, in adding freedom to the state concerned, morally defensible. "Universal pretensions," whether religious or ideological, are undesirable because they deny the legitimacy of the freedom of others; the "nationalistic imperialisms" of the 17th-19th centuries, Niebuhr argues, avoided this fault.<sup>57</sup> Yet imperial ideologies of that period reveal a number of pretensions, not the least of these being the doctrine of Social Darwinism, the claim that imperial states obeyed a "law of nature" and of progress in subjecting the weak. Presumably, Niebuhr does not regard this as a "universalist pretension" because it allows each state an equal opportunity to subject others, although it is possible that he deems the doctrine unpretentious because he believes it to be true.

<sup>54</sup> "A Qualified Faith," op. cit.; SNE 61-65, 34-35, 294; IAH passim.

<sup>55</sup> For example, The Federalist, No. 1; see also Martin Diamond, "Democracy and the Federalist: A Reconsideration of the Framers' Intent," this Review, Vol. 53 (March 1959), pp. 52-68.

<sup>56</sup> Thus, to Niebuhr all communities are "imperialist" and oriented toward expansion. SDH 137; SNE 190-191; FH 97; CPP 18, 108; HD 89, 284-285; REE 18, 26, 36, 53, 68, 157-158.

But one need not go so far. Niebuhr's picture of international politics regards nations as fundamentally analogous to groups or individuals in the domestic political system, except that nations are somewhat less ethical. Hence, he advocates pluralism among power centers, change and openness, conflict and balance in the international, as well as the domestic, political world. He has always been aware that the balance of power alone could not prevent war.<sup>58</sup> But if the alternative to war is the empire of a single state, or even of a world state based around a single center of power, Niebuhr is quite as hostile as he would be to the rule of an elite in domestic politics. The "current" approval Niebuhr gives the balance of power arises not only from its "necessity" but from the fact that it is inherently more just, morally preferable to either of the alternatives described above.<sup>59</sup> For peace itself is not desirable unless it is compatible with the quest for freedom.<sup>60</sup> Of course, peace is a good and especially so in our day. States should therefore conduct themselves according to the dictates of "enlightened self-interest," seeking to add only so much power as is compatible with the maintenance of international order. To be exact, the policy of states should be a certain moderate variety of imperialism.<sup>61</sup>

This view of international politics is quite characteristic of "realist" theorists; fundamentally it is a kind of nostalgic appeal to the image of nineteenth-century European diplomacy.<sup>62</sup> Such diplomacy not only was permitted the luxury of a large number of centers of power, it was able to look with comparative equanimity on those conflicts which developed into open warfare, and to see such conflict as contributing to historical "progress." That Niebuhr's entire view would be shaken by the development of weapons capable of almost universal destruction is evident. Indeed, he admits that the development of these weapons has upset the traditional balance between "potential good" and "potential evil" in the increase of human power over nature; that balance, of course, is at the core of his concept of historical progress. Men, he concedes, no longer have control of the technology they have created. The power available to man has passed the point where "human contrivance" could harness it to the effort to conquer nature.<sup>63</sup> And Niebuhr is not without a Hobbesian aside to the effect that the peril of universal destruction may cause both the great empires of our time to prefer life to death.<sup>64</sup>

Yet, despite these new perceptions, Niebuhr's theory remains unchanged in its identity with older liberalism. While it is presumably desirable that both empires should prefer life, capitulation is undesirable, because it entails the loss of freedom.<sup>65</sup> And—one must presume—it is undesirable whether the United States or the U.S.S.R. were to be the state capitulating. And, he adds, by far the greater number of states, when confronted with a choice between survival and liberty, have chosen the latter. This is more than an empirical observation. It merely repeats his old argument that to make

<sup>57</sup> SNE 22-27, 146-149, 201-216.

<sup>58</sup> CLCD 173; HD 258, 266, 285.

<sup>59</sup> Christianity and Crisis, Vol. 18 (4 May 1958); SDH 202-205, 208; IAH 2, 18, 40, 77, 91, 97, 129, 133, 140-142; CLCD 161, 172, 187; CPP 125, 42, 15; CRPP 31; WCAR 85-104, 126; FH 121, 129.

<sup>60</sup> Christianity and Crisis, Vol. 10 (20 Feb. 1950); CPP, passim; SOT 194; SDH 213; CRPP 136.

<sup>62</sup> Michael Oakeshott, "Scientific Politics," Cambridge Journal, Vol. 1 (March 1948), pp. 347-358; Arnold Wolfers, "The Pole of Power and the Pole of Indifference," World Politics, Vol. 4 (October 1951), pp. 39-65.

<sup>63</sup> SNE ch. xvi, 190-191, 282-290; MMIS 2, 142, 176; REE 91, 99; IAH 10; SDH 36, 222.

<sup>64</sup> SNE 31-32.

<sup>65</sup> SNE 278-279, 25-27.

any other choice would be "morally perverse."<sup>66</sup> As so frequently in his thought, his argument that a given event must take place, given "human nature" or "history," conceals the optimistic assumption that it ought to take place, a point to which we shall return.

Niebuhr's criticism of liberal attitudes toward foreign affairs is that liberals have seen nothing between the nation-state and the "vague universalism" represented by the idea of a world community. But he is not himself without commitments to just such a "vague universalism." Classical political philosophy and much of modern utopian theory took the small state as ideal. Niebuhr rejects the small state not only because of its lack of power but because it cannot satisfy the "limitless demand" of humanity for brotherhood, a demand to the realization of which he also refuses to assign limits.<sup>67</sup> In other words, the demand for "brotherhood" is treated in precisely the same terms as is the demand for freedom. But, though the terms are fundamentally the same, he offers even less discussion of this presumed human goal. This is not at all unique. Liberal and modern discussions of "fraternity" have been few, especially in comparison to the extensive theoretical discussions of the relationship of liberty and equality.<sup>68</sup> This may not have resulted from any sense that the Brotherhood of Man was an unimportant or secondary goal, to be realized on the attainment of liberty and equality, but rather from the belief that human fraternity was the primary goal which could only be achieved when men were free and equal. It is likely that just such a concept unites the two schools of liberalism, the older school which demanded "unfraternal" conduct and competitive ethics in the interest of a "long-run" human unity, and the more sentimental and short-term ethics of modern welfare liberalism.<sup>69</sup> Nor is it accidental that Niebuhr, like most of the early liberals, sees an "irresolvable" tension between "planned justice" and "laissez-faire," yet regards both as legitimate values.<sup>70</sup>

<sup>66</sup> CPP, ch. 1, SNE ch. xvi.

<sup>67</sup> HD 245-246, 85, 95-96; CLCD 48-49, 154, 187; SOT 48, 84; WCAR 47; CRPP 16, 155-158.

<sup>68</sup> Kenneth Benne, "The Uses of Fraternity," Daedalus, Vol. 90 (Spring 1961), pp. 233-246.

<sup>69</sup> Benjamin Nelson, The Idea of Usury: From Tribal Brotherhood to Universal Otherhood (Princeton, 1949).

<sup>70</sup> IAH 108; BT ch. iii; SDH 195-200; DCR 85, 175; "Liberalism: Illusions and Realities," New Republic, Vol. 133 (4 July 1955), pp. 11-13; "Liberals and the Marxist Heresy," id., Vol. 129

The universalism of traditional liberalism sought an expression in which peace and freedom would be compatible through the medium of a world federation, as opposed to a world state or empire. Niebuhr has persistently attacked this as an "illusion."<sup>71</sup> Government, he notes, is founded on community, and men will not be frightened into forming a world regime without a sense of community throughout the world. This seeming despair would appear to make his universalism even vaguer than that of the liberals he attacks. But he does not completely give up the goal. The mistake of his opponents is to believe world government possible immediately, without waiting for "history."<sup>72</sup> Man was terrorized out of the state of war and into society and thence to larger political units only by slow historical growth and "accretions" of loyalty and community. Niebuhr is again in agreement with Kant's pre-Darwinian ethic of natural selection, "historical cunning." Implicit in Niebuhr's argument is the conviction that time will bring a world regime into being. Hence his concern with political units between the "parliament of man" and the nation state: with regionalism and with empires. These, presumably, men are sufficiently terrorized to form, given the present stage of the growth of loyalty and community.

Yet by his own showing, the forces and balances which he has relied on to control nature have broken down; his, and the traditional liberal view of history are no longer adequate. One cannot be sure that man and civilization will survive long enough for history. Niebuhr is not without hopes that a disaster can be avoided, presumably long enough for history to do its work. We may, he counsels us, hope for more democracy in the government of the U.S.S.R. This is assumed to be an "improvement" either because of a belief that democracies are peaceful or because a more democratic regime in the U.S.S.R. might be more willing to form a world regime. Yet there is little reason to believe either to be the case, within Niebuhr's theory. For the "freer" a government is, the more it will feel obliged to pursue the aim of adding power; and so the more it will come into conflict with others. Niebuhr apparently connects the hope for increased democracy in the Soviet Union with his belief that war will be best avoided if states are "less rigid and righteous" and if they "realize their involvement in a common fate."<sup>73</sup> That is, if they gave up "universalist claims" (but not universalist beliefs, such as the belief in the "freedom of all nations") states would be more inclined to accommodate the claims of others, which would be recognized as quite as legitimate as their own. Moreover, it is presumably true that if states did not make universal claims, they would be less inclined to come into conflict with others in the first place. But even if "democratic" states are more likely to lack righteous and rigid attitudes the belief that the absence of such attitudes conduces to peace, however, true, is itself a suggestive one. The absence of rigidity, the willingness to compromise, to accept the interests of others as legitimate, comprise once again the traditional liberal belief in "enlightened self-interest" and in the "natural harmony" of the interests of nations. To be sure, Niebuhr stresses the necessity of the sense of a "common fate." But that sense too was part of the liberal creed in the "vague universalism" to which we have had reference, the belief that free, equal and democratic nations would sense the "brotherhood of nations" just as individuals were to sense human fraternity, and by the same process. That Niebuhr's theory relies a good deal on this sense of community being produced by terror is no new addition. For terror and the fear of violence have long been involved in the modern hope to realize in practice the vision of human brotherhood, from the Machiavellian belief that necessity and the fear of death make men virtuous, through Rousseau's willingness to force men to be free, to Wilson's use of war in the service of universal democracy.<sup>74</sup> Reformation through violence has always been close to the center of the liberal-modernist creed, a creed which, in its Jacobin form, was described so brilliantly by Chamfort, "Sois mon frère, ou je te tue."

(12 October 1953), pp. 13-15. For the same problem in early liberalism, see E. Halevy, The Growth of Philosophic Radicalism (Boston, 1955).

<sup>71</sup> SNE 28, 66-88, 256, 266, 289; CRPP ch. 2.

<sup>72</sup> SNE 279.

IV

Niebuhr's dilemma is not his alone. It is the dilemma of modern liberalism, and of those radical ideas based on liberal premises such as orthodox Marxism. For contemporary events have made the faith in historical progress through struggle, the belief that the vital human goal is the conquest of Nature, and even that man is born with a desire to be free, seem more and more doubtful, dangerous, or irrelevant. In this light the widespread appeal of Niebuhr's work, even to those Morton White calls the "atheists for Niebuhr," can be understood.<sup>75</sup> For as a theologian Niebuhr can do what the secular liberal cannot: he can elevate the doubtful basis of liberalism to an area of "prophetic" and revealed insight where it may be safe from disconfirming experience in the world and criticism at the hands of reason. If there is a cost for the liberal, that his utopia is placed beyond the possibility of complete attainment, then that cost is small considering the added security of his cherished beliefs. For liberals have come to doubt the possibility of that utopia themselves, and Niebuhr's teaching leaves them the chance to approach ever more closely that undefined set of "limits" which he postulates. To the "vague universalism" of liberalism he has added a "vague utopianism" which is both more vague and more secure by being beyond argument in the sphere of faith. His "realism," his repeated attacks on "utopians," and his rhetoric of "metaphysical pathos" merely enable him to avoid a discussion or clarification of the goals which he believes a man or a state should pursue. Niebuhr notes that the moral issue is persistently raised because men "cannot follow their interest without claiming to do so in obedience to some general scheme of values."<sup>76</sup> But what such a comment overlooks is that men cannot know what their "interest" is without reference to some scheme of values. "Interest" is, after all, a term without intrinsic meaning. That Niebuhr, like so many American writers, can use it as though it had such a meaning merely reflects the American "liberal tradition," a connected set of beliefs regarding human nature and moral values which are not discussed at all. He approaches the issues from a curious stance because "realism" is not only a statement of what is practical; when supplemented by a knowledge of man's "free spirit" it is also a statement of what is desirable. The social good is one which "works" for him as for the liberals, because that good is power over nature, the power to "predict and control" the world. The problem of the ends toward

<sup>73</sup> SNE 280-283, 236-238, 276-277, 246-255.

<sup>74</sup> Hans J. Morgenthau, "Machiavellian Utopia," Ethics, Vol. 55 (January 1945) pp. 145-148; Allan Bloom, "Cosmopolitan Man and the Political Community: An Interpretation of Othello," this REVIEW, Vol. 54 (March 1960), pp. 130-157, or Michael Polanyi's recently published pamphlet, "Beyond Nihilism." A brilliant and closely related discussion is John F. R. Taylor's "Politics and the Human Covenant," Centennial Review, Vol. 6 (Winter 1962), pp. 1-18.

<sup>75</sup> "Religion, Politics, and the Higher Learning," Confluence, Vol. 3 (1954), pp. 402-412.

<sup>76</sup> "The Moral Issue in International Relations," op. cit., p. 740.

which control should strive may be ignored: control is itself the end. For Niebuhr the free man is in essence the good man; virtue follows automatically from freedom. Man's imperfections arise from his involvement in nature—an inevitable involvement, to be sure, but one rooted in lack of power and not of virtue in the classical sense.

Plato and Aristotle, Niebuhr argues, believed the polis to be the "final form" of the state. They believed that the small state was the best for man because they distrusted the expansionist urge and its consequent imperialism. They did not claim, as Niebuhr seems to believe, that the polis would always endure. His contention that the empires which succeeded the city state sacrificed order and community for domination would seem to support their view.<sup>77</sup> But the classic theorists were less concerned than Niebuhr with predicting history or with what form of state "works best," preferring to defer such questions until it became clear what form of state is best and forms the standard of human aspiration.

Niebuhr, the liberals, and many social scientists have excoriated "utopians." But they did not thereby avoid having a utopia. They simply avoided discussing it. And that lack of discussion conceals the fact that they identify ideality with practicality, and virtue with necessity, what works with what is right. If man in our times feels a "prisoner of forces" outside himself, it is often because he has abdicated to those forces the eternal responsibility to articulate a vision of what is best. The very bankruptcy of Niebuhr's ideas, his inability to offer a new vision even at a time when by his showing the old ideas have proved themselves false, may have a function. That bankruptcy may provide us with the courage, as we already have the opportunity, to resume from history and necessity the old quest to discover by reason the nature of the good life, of virtue, and of Utopia.

<sup>77</sup> SNE 42-43, 288.

COMMUNISM, NATIONALISM AND THE GROWTH OF THE COMMUNIST COMMUNITY OF NATIONS AFTER WORLD WAR II

PAUL SHOUP
Kenyon College

In the apocalyptic visions of Marx, the world revolution which was to destroy capitalist society was also to sweep away the entire system of nation-states, and in its place to substitute a world proletarian society, a new supra-national community ruled over by the victorious working class.

Of all the prophecies of early Marxism, none proved more ill-founded than this belief in an international socialist order. The revolution, when it came, was confined to Russia. Only after the victories of the Soviet armies in World War II did it become possible to extend Communist rule beyond the borders of the Soviet Union. After less than two decades, this new international Communist community of nations has become divided into blocs of quarrelling states, and the goal of international Communism seems still distant. The Communists, like other universalistic movements of the past, have apparently proved incapable of surmounting the limits of the nation-state system they set out to destroy. Why?

It seems immediately obvious that the Communists were themselves divided by the forces of nationalism. But this observation, while not necessarily incorrect, needs more precise formulation and further analysis. In the pages to follow, the formation and the growth of the Communist community of nations after World War II will be re-examined, to reveal more clearly the dynamics of the process. The central point, which will emerge as the discussion proceeds, is that nationalism did not lie at the root of the centrifugal pressures which appeared within the Communist bloc. Nationalism came later, and when it did, developed a variety of forms which reflected the unique conditions under which each Communist state evolved. Before we get into the details of this process, however, it will be necessary to comment briefly on two points: the meaning of nationalism, and Communist views prior to World War II on the subject of supra-national integration.

I. THE MEANING OF NATIONALISM

Definitions pose one of the most exasperating problems in all the literature dealing with nationalism. Those who have wrestled with them seem to agree on one point only: nationalism is an elusive phenomenon that defies exact description.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, definitions cannot be avoided. This is especially true when dealing with the emergence of nationalism in Communist nations. The confusion which this problem has engendered can often be traced to the lack of common agreement on the meaning of the terms employed. Rather than formulate one comprehensive definition of nationalism, we shall attempt to deal with the difficulty by suggesting several complementary situations, each of which can be said to reflect the presence of nationalism. These distinctions will be useful in analyzing the character which nationalism has assumed in Communist states.

National Pride. Many writers have suggested that nationalism is a state of mind in which the individual ascribes special virtues to the national way of life (language, culture, or national history), and so demands that the supreme loyalty of each citizen be given to the individual nation-state.<sup>2</sup> This approach is legitimate if not construed too narrowly. The idea of nationalism may develop in a revolutionary context, in which it can be inspired by ideals which transcend the framework of the nation-state. "Supreme" loyalty to the state is never unconditional: it rests on underlying assumptions of what the desirable state is. For our purposes it is sufficient to allow that nationalism, is, in one sense, the product of a fundamental attachment to the values embodied in the national culture and history of a people.

National Independence. Nationalism may also refer to the process, so often noted in discussions of international politics, by which states, unsure of each other's motives and seeking the fullest possible security, attempt to maximize their power and maintain their independence of action. Here again, there is no absolute standard for determining what is and what is not a "national" position. Cooperation between nations may be in the national interest, even to the point of giving up considerable freedom of action. On the other hand, nations which are linked through mutual understanding and compatibility of interests may still deem it wise to pursue independent paths which lead to clashes of national interest. Taking these factors into consideration, we suggest that a second form of nationalism manifests itself in the belief that there exists a fundamental need—arising from fear, lack of understanding, or the unpredictable nature of international politics—for the maintenance of a considerable degree of national independence and for giving priority, in most cases, to one's own immediate national interests.

<sup>1</sup> For a useful summary see Karl Deutsch, Nationalism and Social Communication (New York, 1953), ch. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Hans Kohn defines nationalism as "A state of mind permeating the large majority of the people and claiming to permeate all its members; it recognizes the nation-state as the source of all creative cultural energy and well-being. The supreme loyalty of man is therefore rooted in and made possible by its welfare." The Idea of Nationalism (New York, 1944), p. 16.

The Nation-State as a Vehicle of Progress. In the course of the vast social and economic revolutions of the past several centuries, the nation-state has emerged as the most effective sociopolitical mechanism by which change can be stimulated or channelled by a ruling elite or dominant class. There is no need to interpret this process—as the Marxists have done—in terms of narrow class interest. On the contrary, the mechanisms of the state, acting through a national culture or economy, may be used for an infinite variety of purposes, and today these channels of action are more and more becoming associated with the pursuit of economic progress through industrialization.

We therefore suggest that in this day and age nationalism also reveals itself in the belief that progress toward whatever new goals men aspire to comes about through the creation of the nation-state and the stimulation of its growth, strength and effectiveness, regardless of whether the final end may be narrower than the state (a class or group interest) or universal in scope.

National communism may be interpreted in a number of ways. It may mean the adoption, by a national party, of certain ideas or methods not generally approved by the rest of the Communist bloc. A recent work on the Communist bloc follows this approach in defining national communism as "the explicit assignment of priority to internal considerations even if openly challenged by those who consider themselves to be the central spokesmen of international communism."<sup>3</sup> Such a situation could of course arise even if nationalism never entered into the picture. Our own interpretation of national communism, to be given later, will suggest that the term is most appropriately used in association with the third type of nationalism just described.

II. VIEWS ON SUPRA-NATIONAL INTEGRATION PRIOR TO WORLD WAR II

Before the Second World War the Communists gave surprisingly little attention to the subject of the integration of states into a supra-national community. Early Marxist writings seldom bothered with the issue, for it was assumed that the victory of the proletariat would bring the final destruction of the nation-state system.<sup>4</sup> After the victory of communism in the Soviet Union, reference was made to a World Federation of Soviet Socialist Republics, but discussion even of this goal vanished in the 1930s.<sup>5</sup>

At the same time, the Soviet party prior to World War II developed positions on the question of nationalism and relations among Communist parties that were of central importance for any future Communist community of nations. Although these developments were complex, we can only deal briefly with them here.

First, communism came to be identified with suppressed national aspirations, a position we shall refer to as "revolutionary nationalism." Revolutionary nationalism differed from the original Marxist views insofar as it recognized the importance of national feelings and encouraged the notion that every nationality exhibits its own particular virtues (language, culture, history) and therefore enjoys the right to its own existence. The practice of appealing to revolutionary nationalism first arose during the Russian revolution and was later extended to the colonial countries. The doctrine was fully articulated in the theory of Soviet federalism, according to which each Soviet Republic was "sovereign" and free to develop national cultural forms with a socialist content.

Second, the victory of the Bolsheviks in Russia established the doctrine as well as the fact that the world Communist movement would operate on the basis of monolithic unity under the control of the Soviet party. The dogmatic insistence on the need for monolithic unity, and the ruthless fashion in which the Soviet party applied this Leninist precept, are too well known to require further elucidation.

<sup>4</sup> Marx and Engels wrote little on the national problem. For their views, see E. H. Carr, The Bolshevik Revolution, Vol. I (New York, 1951), pp. 410–28 and Richard Pipes, The Formation of the Soviet Union (Cambridge, 1957), ch. 1.

<sup>5</sup> For Communist views on the world state, see Elliot Goodman, The Soviet Design for a World State (New York, 1960), ch. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Zbigniew K. Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc: Unity and Conflict (Cambridge, 1960), p. 62.

Third, the consolidation of Stalin's power in the Soviet Union was paralleled by the growth of Soviet nationalism. The necessity of building socialism in one country encouraged a fusion of Russian nationalism and Soviet patriotism; Soviet totalitarianism, when it matured in the 1930s, proved to be a blend of both revolutionary and traditional Russian elements.<sup>6</sup> The international Communist movement, under Soviet leadership, was forced to subordinate the aim of world revolution to the national interests of the Soviet Union—often to the discomfiture of communist parties in other countries.

At first glance it might seem difficult to reconcile the doctrines of revolutionary nationalism, monolithic unity and the supremacy of Soviet national interests. For some, of course, it was more than difficult; it became impossible. But for the hard-core Communists who were later to come to power in Eastern Europe, the Communist interpretation of these problems was consistent and beyond criticism. Revolutionary nationalism, although it tolerated a certain degree of national feeling, made a sharp distinction between "Socialist patriotism" (which was acceptable) and "nationalism" (always a pejorative term). Nationalism was associated with attachment to a pre-revolutionary way of life and a refusal to give supreme loyalty to the goal of world communism. Ultimately, the toleration of national cultures would lead to their fusion in a world socialist culture; when this point was reached, concessions to revolutionary nationalism would no longer be necessary.<sup>7</sup> Dedicated Communists saw no contradiction in subordinating themselves to an international movement whose primary aim was to advance the interests of the Soviet Union; after all, the Soviet Union stood alone, encircled by capitalist foes, and the first duty of Communists everywhere was to come to her defense. Revolutionary unity, under the leadership of the Soviet party, was accepted as an absolutely necessary pre-condition for the success of the revolution in other parts of the world.

In general, the Communist approach to the problem of establishing an international socialist system was conditioned by the importance of the current struggle to defend the Soviet Union and strengthen the revolutionary movement in capitalist countries. No concrete plans seem to have been made to meet the problems which would arise if Communist states were formed outside the Soviet Union, in particular in Eastern Europe.

Nevertheless there were some hints, long prior to the war, of the eventual Soviet view on the form of a Communist community of nations. There is evidence that Stalin himself did not fully accept the position that Soviet federalism could be applied at the international level.<sup>8</sup> Another fact of importance was the introduction in the mid-1930s of the idea of "Proletarian United Front Governments."<sup>9</sup> These were to be transitional, between bour-

<sup>8</sup> At the 2d Congress of the Comintern in 1920 Stalin suggested that the future international Communist community be designated a confederation ("an alliance of independent states") out of consideration for national differences, rather than a federation, which was the appropriate form within the framework of the old Russian Empire. Lenin rejected the proposal, and the future world state was referred to as a federation. See Goodman, pp. 232-33. Earlier, in his work Marrism and the National Question, Stalin had shown a rather conservative view toward socialist internationalism by incorporating elements into his description of the nation which magnified the importance of the nation and were therefore unacceptable to Lenin at the time. See Pipes, p. 39. Stalin also made a connection between national conditions and forms of Communist rule when, in 1928, he suggested that nations in which capitalism had only begun to develop (Poland and Rumania were used as examples) could not adopt Soviet institutions immediately; rather, these were areas where "the victory of the revolution, in order to lead to a proletarian dictatorship, can and will certainly require certain intermediate stages, in the form, say, of a dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" Works, Vol. XI (Moscow, 1954), p. 162. The rationale for a transitional period is here based on socio-economic conditions, and should be distinguished from the reasons behind the proposals for "proletarian united front governments" in the 1930s (infra).

<sup>9</sup> "If . . . it will prove possible, and necessary, in the interests of the proletariat, to create a proletarian united front government, which is not yet a government of the proletarian dictatorship, but one which undertakes to put into effect decisive measures against fascism and reaction, the Communist Party must see to it that such a government is formed . . ." (italics in the original). Resolutions, Seventh Congress of the Communist International (New York, Workers Library), pp. 30-31.

<sup>6</sup> These developments are analyzed in detail in Frederick C. Barghoorn, Soviet Russian Nationalism (New York, 1956).

<sup>7</sup> For a discussion of the future world culture as interpreted by the Communists, see Goodman, ch. 7.

geois democracy and socialism, Communist-dominated, and apparently free from any machinery of supra-national control or coordination. In fact, they were the original concept from which the "Peoples' Democracies" of Eastern Europe developed after the war.

III. THE METHOD OF CONSOLIDATING COMMUNIST POWER IN EASTERN EUROPE

On the basis of this ill-digested body of doctrines concerning the world Communist state, the construction of a new Communist community of nations began after World War II. The power of the Soviet Union was such that she might conceivably have absorbed these nations directly into the Soviet federation. But a host of practical considerations weighed against this course of action. It would have needlessly antagonized the West, weakened the international Communist movement, and, at the very least, complicated enormously the tasks of occupation, if it did not, indeed, provoke the peoples of Eastern Europe to revolt against the newly established Communist regimes. National differences in Eastern Europe were simply too great to be ignored. On similar grounds Hitler in 1940 had chosen to establish the Vichy regime rather than occupy all France; and a century earlier, mutatis mutandis, the British had preferred a system of indirect rule in India and elsewhere. Purely tactical considerations were therefore sufficient to dictate a policy of Soviet caution in integrating the new states within some supra-national framework.

These differences among the peoples of Eastern Europe did not, however, exist within the national Communist parties. The party leaders in Eastern Europe were a group apart, trained and selected by Moscow in the years prior to the war. They came to power convinced of the need for monolithic unity, contemptuous of the bourgeois nationalism of the people, and eager to begin the process which would eventually lead to a new supranational Communist order. The strong national feelings of the people were not, therefore, automatically transferred to the Communists who assumed power in Eastern Europe. Nor did the obvious obstacles to immediate integration of the newly formed Communist nations imposed by the attitude of their masses rule out the formulation of a policy by which this goal might sooner or later be achieved.

A different sort of difficulty arose from the fact that Moscow now had to deal with established parties and official governments rather than with the revolutionary movements which had struggled so desperately to survive between the two world wars. Indeed, it was unwise in the altered circumstances to formalize the power of the Soviet party over the new officials in Eastern Europe in a set of rules analogous to those which existed within each party. And it would seem only natural that the national party leaders, under the influence of their lately acquired power and prestige, might interpret a too direct Soviet supervision of their actions as unwarranted control over the "domestic" affairs of the nation.

It would be wrong, however, to consider this new-found legality a decisive factor for the development of the Communist system in Eastern Europe after the war. In all likelihood the majority of national party leaders did feel that their new formal authority should be acknowledged by the Soviet Union. But the proper limits of interference by Moscow were never clearly defined, and practical necessities kept reminding them of their dependence on the Russians. More important, the Communist leaders of Eastern Europe continued to acknowledge the primacy of Moscow in all matters touching on the monolithic unity of the bloc, a position which, in the last analysis, recognized the right of the Soviet party to play a decisive role in the concerns of the national parties.

Finally, it could be argued that the Communist parties of Eastern Europe had, in coming to power, assumed the burden of protecting the national interests of their peoples, and that this was bound to create special problems which did not exist before the war by revealing the contradictions involved in equating the interests of each Communist party with the national interests of the Soviet Union.

While there is much to be said for this interpretation of the situation created by the formation of Communist governments outside the Soviet Union, it leaves too much unexplained. Although not couched exactly in these terms, the discussion in the pages to follow will be aimed at analyzing more closely just what "national interest" meant in the context of the Communists' views on the method to be pursued in constructing a totalitarian system in Eastern Europe. For the postwar developments in Eastern Europe cannot be fully understood without reference to a broader issue closely connected with the ultimate aim of supra-national integration: the method by which Communist power was to be consolidated throughout the bloc as a whole. Although means, not ultimate ends, may originally have been at stake, this was not the first occasion in the Communist experience when means became ends in themselves and profoundly influenced the course of Communist evolution.

Theoretical analyses of totalitarianism agree on its built-in bias toward unlimited expansion.<sup>10</sup> But there is also agreement that a totalitarian system may, through its own methods of operation, put obstacles in its path to world domination. The Nazi method of empire building was an obvious case in point. The Stalinist type of totalitarianism, we think, must also be analyzed from this point of view.

To understand how Soviet totalitarianism developed in ways detrimental to its own universalistic aspirations, we must re-examine the concept of building socialism in one country alone. The idea was a natural one, since world revolution did not seem imminent. But the decision to pursue such a policy was arbitrary in so far as it implied that circumstances unfavorable to the creation of a Communist utopia (the existing obstacles to the creation of an advanced economy or socialist society, such as lack of a working class) could be overcome by sheer determination and will on the part of the revolutionary party and its leadership. This underlying assumption became a mystique in the Soviet Union with the emergence of Stalinist totalitarianism in the 1930s. To its disciples, Soviet development seemed to prove that by mobilizing political power through a disciplined party one might destroy the existing society, build up an industrial base, and attain socialism through one's own efforts. The size of the country, and other material factors relevant to its potential industrial capacity, were largely overlooked.

We think these assumptions, so different from the original precepts of world revolution, were in fact a decisive influence on the development of the international Communist community. After World War II a strong bias arose toward transforming the principle of building totalitarianism ("socialism") in one country alone into a more general principle which, for want of a more appropriate term, we may call the building of Communist totalitarianism in each country separately.

Did the Soviet Union actively inculcate this notion among national party leaders in Eastern Europe after World War II? The answer to this question is by no means clear-cut, for the Soviet position was shifting and ambiguous. First let us deal with its ideological aspects, and then turn to the practical policies guiding Soviet actions in the satellite nations.

In Soviet writings after the war the Communist states of Eastern Europe were referred to as "Peoples' Democracies," a transitional form of Communist rule less advanced than the Soviet Union's. The significance of the Peoples' Democracies was first said to lie in the fact that they were pioneers in the development of a new path to socialism.<sup>11</sup> After 1948 (the year of the Soviet-Yugoslav break) the line changed, and Soviet writers insisted that Peoples' Democracies were following the laws of development first applied in the Soviet Union. "National" roads to communism—such as Tito's—were made the object of a vicious, uncompromising attack.

The earlier interpretation of the meaning of People's Democracy seemed a linear descendant of the pre-war notion of the "Proletarian United Front Government."<sup>12</sup> This view suggested that conditions in Eastern Europe precluded simple imitation of Soviet development. For this reason, it might be expected to find favor among those satellite leaders who wished to build socialism in one country by adapting Soviet practices to local conditions. By comparison, the post-1948, "narrow" interpretation of People's Democracy left the satellites with little room for independent development. But it is important to note—and this is often overlooked—that after 1948 it was clearly spelled out for the first time that each Eastern European nation, since it must follow the Soviet path, could do so. Soviet socialism could be duplicated in each Communist state. Communist totalitarianism could be built in each country separately.

In one sense, at least, this suggested more, not less power for the new Communist states: if the East European nations could duplicate the Soviet performance, they might one day become her equals. Imitation of the Soviet Union, after all, did not necessarily imply subordination and dependence. It could also mean power and independence for each Communist nation separately. But the Soviets were at pains to deny just this set of conclusions after 1948. It was claimed instead that the formation and development of the Peoples' Democracies rested on the decisive role played by the Soviet Union in Eastern Europe after World War II. Indeed, the aim of Soviet policy after 1948 was to bind the satellites even more tightly to the Soviet Union, and the new version of Peoples' Democracy was rightly interpreted as one means to this end.

<sup>11</sup> See the remarks of E. Varga that "the social structure of these states is distinguished from all known to us up to now; it appears as something completely new in the history of humanity." "Demokratia novago tipa," Mirovoe khoziaistvo i mirovaia politika, No. 3, 1947, p. 3. For an exhaustive analysis of the term see H. Gordon Skilling, "People's Democracy in Soviet Theory," Soviet Studies, III, pp. 16-33 and 131-49.

<sup>12</sup> The origins of the theory of People's Democracy have been the source of some disagreement. For other views, cf. Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc, ch. 2, and G. Ginsburgs, Soviet Studies, XIII, p. 451.

<sup>10</sup> See Carl Friedrich and Zbigniew Brzezinski, Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy (Cambridge, 1956), ch. 6, and Hannah Arendt, The Origins of Totalitarianism (New York, 1958), p. 391.

The ideological issue was even more complex than this brief summary suggests. But enough has been said to indicate that national party leaders, especially those most imbued with Stalinist concepts of building totalitarianism in each country separately, might accept the premise of Soviet theory—the necessity of following Soviet laws of development—and reject the important caveat that the process would result in greater, not less, dependence on the Soviet Union.

The policy of the Soviet Union in regard to economic and political matters also suggested that the methods of building totalitarianism in each country separately were being applied, in a somewhat contradictory fashion, to build communism and to favor the narrow interests of the Soviet Union.

As noted earlier, Stalin had on occasion made a distinction between the federal form of government, suitable for the Soviet Union, and a looser confederation, suitable for a number of Communist states. In the years 1945–1948, Soviet policy went to considerable lengths to adjust to the special problems facing the formation of an integrated Communist community among formerly independent nation-states. During this time satellite leaders were permitted a degree of flexibility which allowed them to consolidate their power in accordance with local conditions.<sup>13</sup> In 1948 a reversal of policy took place. The national parties were then forced to apply Soviet cultural standards as well as Soviet political methods without regard for local conditions or the national feelings of the population.

Even after 1948, however, there was ample evidence that the Soviets continued to develop their policies within the framework of the existing pattern of nation-states in Eastern Europe. One striking example of this was the manner in which treaties between the Soviet Union and the states of Eastern Europe adhered to traditional concepts of territorial integrity and diplomatic rights.<sup>14</sup> More important was the increasing emphasis on autarchic economic development<sup>15</sup> within each Eastern European state after 1948. The exact reasons for the adoption of such a policy have remained a source of debate. Both the Soviets and the satellites seem to have had complete faith in the methods of economic development which had worked so well in the Soviet Union, even when the arguments for economic autarchy would seem difficult to justify under East European conditions.<sup>16</sup> On the other hand, Stalin's sup-

<sup>14</sup> See John N. Hazard, "Soviet Socialism as a Public Order System," Proceedings of the American Society of International Law, 1959, pp. 36–37. Border treaties carefully dealt with questions of land mass, waterways and airspace in a manner designed to protect the sovereign rights of each partner. Consular conventions between the Soviet Union and the Peoples' Democracies carefully defined diplomatic privileges and immunities—including the right to the use of cipher in communicating with the home country!

<sup>15</sup> Although the term "economic autarchy" is normally used to describe the economic development of Eastern Europe in this period, the situation was complicated by the fact that each of the Eastern European nations depended heavily on trade, especially with the Soviet Union, to supply it with basic raw materials, and further by the tendency of the major partner to set the terms of this trade to its own advantage. Still, autarchy—in the sense of constructing all the components of heavy industry—was the goal of these countries.

<sup>16</sup> The economic benefits of such a policy for Eastern Europe were argued by David Granick, "The Pattern of Foreign Trade in Eastern Europe and Its Relations to Economic Development," Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 68, pp. 366–400. Granick suggested that the satellites were following a policy of "balanced national economy," meaning that "each country should produce sufficient agricultural and industrial products to meet its own consumption needs, that it should provide the means of production necessary to make this possible, and that the remainder of its production should be geared to heavy industry and the construction of machinery with which to further industrialize its economy." Dealing with this problem at a later date, Granick suggested that the forced pace of economic development led port for this policy can be interpreted as consistent with his desire to isolate the satellite nations from one another in order to assure their control by the Soviet Union. Stalin may also have calculated that self-contained autarchic development would permit the maximum exploitation of the East European economies.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>13</sup> See Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc, pp. 32–36, for a description of how the Eastern European parties and the Soviet Union adjusted their policies in the light of the strong nationalism of the Eastern European peoples immediately after the war. Brzezinski emphasizes how, in this period, the national parties masked their designs under appeals to national interests. Thus (p. 36), "the founding declaration of the Polish Workers (Communist) Party reads almost like a national harangue."

In our opinion, Stalin accepted the principle to repeated bottle-necks and uncertainty of supply, compensated by efforts to be self-sufficient. This general pressure toward autarchy can be observed in the Soviet enterprise and can be extended, in principle, to the nations of the Communist bloc. See Norman J. G. Pounds and Nicolai Spulber (eds.), Resources and Planning in Eastern Europe, p. 140. The small size of the Eastern European states may not have been as great a barrier to the policy of economic autarchy as was once thought; a recent discussion of the economic problems posed by the limited size of nations suggests that it is easy to over-estimate the role of economies of scale achieved by large states. See Austin Robinson (ed.), The Economic Consequences of the Size of Nations (New York, 1960), p. xvii. Only in "small" countries of under 10 to 15 million do economies of scale make it unwise to engage in the construction of certain key industries such as large machine tools or heavy electrical equipment (without access to an adequate foreign market). This very rough criterion suggests that in Eastern Europe, Albania and Bulgaria were too small to engage in an all-out program of heavy industry construction, while Yugoslavia, Hungary, Rumania and Czechoslovakia were borderline cases.

On the other hand, the policy of economic autarchy produced obvious distortions in the Eastern European economies, and was subject to bitter attack after 1955 by the more liberal Communist elements as economically indefensible. See Imre Nagy, On Communism (New York, 1957), ch. 20, and Oscar Lange, The Political Economy of Socialism (The Hague, 1958).

<sup>17</sup> Granick, in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, rejected the thesis that the pattern of economic development in Eastern Europe was governed by Soviet interests in exploiting the area, suggesting that if this were the case, the Soviet Union would not have encouraged heavy industry, but a type of economy more complementary to her own (consumer goods, for example). For a contrary view—that the Soviets were primarily interested in exploiting the East European economies in the Stalinist period—see Alfred Zauberman, "Economic Integration: Problems and Prospects," Problems of Communism, VIII, No. 4, pp. 23-29.

of building totalitarianism in each country separately as the basic method of consolidating Communist rule. Within, and sometimes contrary to this principle, he attempted to exploit and control the satellite nations. Certainly the frame of reference for the international Communist community as a whole, even before 1948, was the duplication, through a series of stages, of Soviet development within the existing nation-state system, rather than political and economic integration throughout the bloc as a whole. The pattern of development which was to lead to a world Communist state was therefore unique. It was not integrative so much as it was reproductive. One could say that each nation was going along parallel tracks, guided by Moscow. More concretely each was engaged in an effort to duplicate, in toto, the structure of Soviet totalitarianism.

IV. STRAINS IN THE COMMUNIST BLOC AFTER WORLD WAR II

As a result of the Communist approach to the problem of consolidating power, the historical nation-state came to have a central importance for those Communists faced with the postwar task of constructing a totalitarian system in Eastern Europe. The ultimate goal was still to create a uniform pattern of totalitarian rule that would destroy all differences among nations. But it is clear from the discussion of People's Democracy above that considerable confusion prevailed concerning the immediate consequences of the development of totalitarianism in each country separately.

Broadly speaking, three possible alternatives were envisaged: (i) the nation in question might develop a form of Communist rule somewhat different from that in the Soviet Union but adapted to her own conditions (a pattern hereinafter referred to as "domesticism"<sup>18</sup>); (ii) the nation might adopt Soviet institutions and practices in their entirety but remain so dependent on the Soviet Union that any form of integration would only make permanent the inferior status of the satellite nation and its party; (iii) the nation might pattern herself after the Soviet Union in the belief that the successful construction of a totalitarian state required (and would lead to) the duplication not only of Soviet institutions, but also of Soviet power. In this case integration, if and when it took place, would have to be among equals.

<sup>18</sup> A term coined by Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc, p. 52, to refer to the adaptation to local circumstances by a national party within the general pattern.

The kinds of problems that arose in relations between members of the Communist bloc after World War II can be associated, for the most part, with attempts to pursue one or another of these courses of development. It might be supposed that the choice among these alternatives, since it revolved around means rather than ultimate ends, would not necessarily have been of importance for the new Communist nations. Yet the dynamics of the process did indeed create strains between the national parties and Moscow, and ultimately prejudiced the end of supranational integration itself.

The manner in which Eastern Europe developed these distinctive patterns is well known. In the countries where the national parties were weak (such as Poland), there was a tendency to accept the first alternative suggested above—domesticism. In Yugoslavia, on the other hand, the third alternative—the duplication of Soviet institutions and Soviet power—came to be accepted as the only proper method of building communism in each country separately. After 1948, the nations within the Soviet orbit were forced to accept the second course—duplication of Soviet institutions artificially and with extreme reliance on Soviet power.

The trend toward domesticism has sometimes seemed to be potentially the most divisive force. It is closely associated with nationalism and the desire to question the infallibility of Soviet methods. But such an interpretation makes too mechanical a connection between the lingering effects of nationalism and the dynamics of Communist development—at least in the years immediately after the war. If our analysis is correct, the trend toward domesticism in the immediate postwar period was not a preferred choice but essentially a sign of weakness among parties that were not yet able to duplicate the Soviet pattern of development. Poland is a case in point. Here, opposition to the Soviet demands for conformity from the satellites in 1948 was inspired not by a wish to pioneer in the development of new institutions, but by a desire to move slowly in the introduction of Soviet methods, especially in the field of agriculture.<sup>19</sup>

It was the Yugoslav path to Communism which, as events proved, posed the greatest threat to the unity of the Communist bloc. The Yugoslav case is extremely instructive, for the party leaders, working in a multi-national state to begin with, had no strong national loyalties and were the most eager, among the Communists of Eastern Europe, to follow the Soviet path of development. On the other hand the Yugoslav Communists had, since the time of the Partisan campaigns in World War II, developed the habit of independent thinking and an overbearing confidence in their own abilities. This arrogance has been well described as "Partisan chauvinism." It led the Yugoslav Communist Party to believe that it was the dominant party in the Balkans and not unnaturally produced friction with the Soviet leadership. Many of the difficulties that then arose, far from being peculiarly national in origin, can be traced back to differences over the tactics to be pursued in the world revolutionary struggle for the consolidation and spread of Communist power.<sup>20</sup>

The dispute between the Yugoslav and Soviet parties might be described in this context alone. But to do so would overlook another essential element in the struggle. The Yugoslav Communists had been led, by their very success in building communism, to believe that they had become indispensable for the task of socialist construction in Yugoslavia. Within the broad and ambiguous bounds of the prevailing mystique of building totalitarianism in each country separately, this position of duplicating Soviet institutions and power seemed absolutely orthodox to the Yugoslav Communists, although it immediately precipitated them into conflict with the Soviet party. Matters were only made worse when the Soviets accused the Yugoslavs of moving too fast down the road to socialism.<sup>21</sup> Correctly or not, their own Stalinist outlook led Tito and his associates to the conclusion that Moscow, by questioning the means pursued by the Yugoslav Communist party, had renounced the end of socialism itself—at least as far as Yugoslavia was concerned. Thus fortified by the belief that the very fate of the revolution was at stake in Yugoslavia, the Yugoslav Communists were able to take the momentous step of openly defying the military, political and ideological pressures brought to bear by the Soviet Union.

The Chinese party also adhered to the method of building communism followed by the Yugoslavs. Stalin learned from his experience in 1948 that strong-arm tactics could not reverse this trend, while the Chinese, for their part, were careful not to provoke a split with the Soviet Union.<sup>22</sup> The outward unity between these two great Communist powers could nevertheless not disguise the fact that the Chinese party had decided upon an autarchic path of economic development resting on an independent power base. Thus it came to pass that historical national boundaries, which should only have been incidental factors in Communist plans for the future world society, came instead to represent crucial dividing lines between separate, and often clashing, concentrations of power.

<sup>20</sup> There is evidence that the Yugoslavs associated themselves with the Zhdanov faction within the Soviet leadership, and that the discrediting of this group in the spring of 1948 helped touch off the attack on Yugoslavia. See R. Conquest, Power and Policy in the USSR (New York, 1961), pp. 101-02.

<sup>21</sup> See Royal Institute of International Affairs, The Soviet-Yugoslav Dispute (London, 1948).

<sup>19</sup> See Adam B. Ulam, Titoism and the Cominform (Cambridge, 1952), pp. 174-78.

V. THE GROWTH OF NATIONALISM

We can now return to the problem of nationalism and inquire more closely into its role in the development of the Communist bloc after World War II. Nationalism, as already noted, should be considered in its several meanings: first, as a positive commitment to the values embodied in the national culture and history; second, as a belief in the fundamental need to maintain independence in the international sphere; and third, as a belief that progress comes about through the vehicle of the nation-state. "National communism" was tentatively associated with this third type of nationalism.

Following one line of argument, the failure of the Communists to establish a supra-national state after World War II could be interpreted as the last of a series of concessions on the part of communism to one or another of these forms of nationalism. In support of this theory one could point to the acceptance of the idea of revolutionary nationalism; the rise of aggressive Soviet chauvinism; and, finally, the application of the concept of building totalitarianism in each country separately. The logical conclusion, after such an enumeration, might be that nationalism had swallowed communism.

Yet this view oversimplifies the situation. Our analysis has not indicated that the first type of nationalism listed above was of crucial importance after the war: i.e., that the Communist leaders of Eastern Europe were infected with the nationalistic prejudices of the former ruling groups in their countries, or that Soviet chauvinism came into immediate conflict with the principles associated with revolutionary nationalism. Nor would it be correct to say that Tito's national communism, although it gave priority to the interests of the Yugoslav state, was originally motivated by a belief in the desirability of establishing independence for Yugoslavia in the international sphere (the second type above).

Might we say that the pattern of development in the Communist bloc after World War II reflected the acceptance of nationalism in the third sense—the belief that progress is accomplished through development of the nation-state? Here we meet a curious paradox. As we have described it, the process of building Stalinist totalitarianism took place within the boundaries of existing historical states for precisely the opposite reason, not out of a desire to strengthen the nation-state, but in order to carry out more swiftly the "de-nationalization" of the states concerned and the "atomization" of their populations.

On the other hand, those who most faithfully followed the Soviet method of building totalitarianism—the Yugoslavs and the Chinese—came almost immediately to champion the need and desirability of an independent power base built within the existing pattern of nation-states, in order to carry out the construction of a Communist totalitarian state in the most ruthless and effective manner. The result was at least in the short run, to reinforce rather than to destroy the role of the nation-state as vehicle of change.

Some of the reasons why this was so have already been suggested: the difficulty of insisting on uniform practices throughout the Communist bloc at an early stage of its development before national differences had been levelled; the feelings of the Yugoslavs and Chinese that the rapid progress of communism in their state was the result of their own efforts; and, finally, the suspicion that Moscow did not actually wish communism to develop as rapidly in these countries as the national leaders felt was possible.

The most important point remains, however: the context in which these problems arose: the doctrine of building totalitarianism in each country separately. This perspective, by assuming that industrialism and socialism were the product of political factors, completely divorced the concept of progress through economic betterment from its original class determinants (the international proletariat) or environmental factors (resources, population, the location of markets) and gave the concept of the nation-state a new significance which, although the product of the totalitarian mentality, was akin to the third type of nationalism we have distinguished.

As long as this mystique held sway it would seem impossible to envisage any real integr-tion of the Communist bloc under the conditions prevailing after World War II. Upon reflection it seems clear that none of the three alternative modes of building communism in each country separately (domesticism; the duplication of Soviet institutions on a weak power base; the duplication of Soviet institutions and Soviet power) could really create the pre-conditions for integration. The most likely path in the short run, the duplication of Soviet institutions on a weak power base, was thoroughly compromised by the Stalinist excesses between 1948 and 1953. Domesticism was either the result of weakness (the situation in most European nations between 1945 and 1948) or was transformed into a reaction against Stalinist exploitation. In the former case it was largely a temporary phenomenon; in the latter, an explosive force that stimulated a national reaction against the whole idea of duplicating Soviet institutions—of which more presently.

<sup>22</sup> Cf. Brzezinski, "Deviation Control," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (March 1962), pp. 5-22.

Building Soviet institutions and power might seem the most realistic path to eventual integration if all the parties in question were willing to accept each other as equals. Militating against this solution, however, was a dogma equally as strong as that of building totalitarianism in each country separately—that of monolithic solidarity based on the dominance of one party. This latter principle, usually considered a cohesive force in the Communist bloc, was ultimately responsible for the collapse of the Communist international order, for it made integration between equals an impossibility and forced the more radical and powerful parties of Yugoslavia and China to abandon the goal of integration entirely.

In general, the articulation of nationalism in its more concrete forms begins in each Communist country after these alternative paths to integration have been foreclosed, and the doctrine of building socialism in each country separately is no longer viewed as a means to an end but as an end in itself. In its least complicated aspect, such nationalism should most closely resemble the third type of nationalism we have mentioned (the belief that progress is made possible through developing the nation-state). And its identification would be most sure when a Communist country has incorporated this idea into its ideological view of the national question.

Yugoslavia has, indeed, made such an ideological re-evaluation, criticizing the canons of Marxism-Leninism in this field—in particular, Stalin's Marxism and the National Question. The present Yugoslav view is strongly internationalistic. But it departs significantly from earlier Marxist-Leninist views by stressing the essential role of the nation-state in the building of socialism, even after the revolution.<sup>23</sup>

Whether articulated in the ideology or not, the primary role of this third type of nationalism has been to facilitate a re-interpretation of the goals of communism in the light of national capabilities. The process should be distinguished from the domesticism of the period immediately following World War II and in our view is the only case where the term national communism is correctly applicable. The development of Titoism in Yugoslavia illustrates this type of change. The introduction of the communes in China is a similar, although less clear-cut, example.

The Soviet Union, after several years of hesitation in the mid 1950s, has now launched a counter-attack within her own orbit against this form of nationalism. Khrushchev, while avoiding the excesses of the Stalinist period, has pressed the nations of Eastern Europe to adopt Soviet practices, especially the collectivization of agriculture. These nations are now to work for the elimination of differences in levels of economic development within their own ranks. Eventually, they are to reach the same stage of development as the Soviet Union, and all will enter the stage of "communism" more or less simultaneously.<sup>24</sup> The emphasis on eliminating differences within the bloc has been paralleled by a cautious modification of the principle of economic autarchy, and forms of economic cooperation unknown in the Stalinist era have now developed within the Soviet sphere.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>23</sup> See, in particular, Sperans [Edvard Kardelj], Razvoj slovenačkog nacionalnog pitanja (2d ed; Belgrade, 1958). Kardelj defined the nation as "a specific community of peoples arising on the basis of the social division of labor in the epoch of capitalism in a compact territory and within the framework of a common language and close ethnic and cultural similarity in general" (p. 104). The insertion of the phrase, "on the basis of the social division of labor in the epoch of capitalism," differentiates this from Stalin's classic definition of a nation given in Marxism and the National Question. For Kardelj, this addition was meant to signify that nations are a progressive factor in developing socio-economic relations, and will not disappear until they have exhausted their functions in this regard, the victory of a Communist revolution notwithstanding.

<sup>24</sup> A statement of these plans for Eastern Europe can be found in the Program of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Part Two, Section VI, "Communist Construction in the USSR and Cooperation of the Socialist Countries."

By re-examining the practice of economic autarchy, the nations of the Soviet bloc have initiated a trend away from the dogma of building totalitarianism in each country separately. Conceivably, this could lead to new forms of integration impossible in the Stalinist period. In practice, however, each satellite state has resisted proposals which would work to its own economic disadvantage.<sup>26</sup> These disagreements have operated to strengthen the feeling that each country must protect its own interests in building socialism, thus encouraging the type of nationalism about which we are speaking. Poland has even refused to collectivize agriculture, and sustains a form of national communism in which the goals of socialism are re-interpreted in accordance with local Polish conditions. The Communist world as a whole seems to have reached a stage where competing modes of socialism encourage, to an ever greater degree, the identification of national institutions with universally desired ends.

It would still be premature, however, to predict the ultimate victory of nationalism over communism in this way. No fixed pattern has yet emerged. Much will depend on the future commitment of each nation to autarchic economic development. It would also be misleading, in our opinion, to identify centrifugal forces within the Communist bloc solely, or even primarily, with this form of nationalism. In Yugoslavia, for example, the trend toward nationalism must also be measured by the degree to which the regime has stressed non-alignment in foreign affairs and the protection of immediate national interests (the second type of nationalism described earlier). Yugoslavia interprets many of her most vital interests from the perspective of a neutral power in the East-West struggle, and this stand, far more than her domestic innovations, has led to Yugoslavia's isolation from the rest of the Communist world.

The crystallization of the second type of nationalism takes place, we would suggest, after a Communist nation is isolated from the bloc by a concerted attack against its leadership.<sup>27</sup> Such a country is then obliged to consider its former partners as enemies and potential aggressors. This situation—and therefore the nationalism it breeds—seems most likely to arise in the case of small Communist states whose powers of resistance to attack by the rest of the bloc have been underestimated by Moscow (Yugoslavia, and now, perhaps, Albania). Unfortunately for the West, this second form of nationalism, while it is of decisive importance for the balance of power in the cold war, is therefore apt to develop in the least important of the Communist states.

The failure of post-war plans to consolidate the Communist bloc have also created conditions for the appearance of the first type of nationalism (a positive commitment to the values embodied in the national culture and history). Here again the pattern is a complex one, and generalizations are dangerous. Some brief comments may nevertheless serve to clarify the problem. First, if nationalism was to appear in this form a necessary preliminary was to re-interpret the doctrine of revolutionary nationalism in such a way that it could provide a link with the bourgeois nationalism of the masses and the pre-revolutionary ruling elites. In Yugoslavia and China, the ground was laid for such a step by the attempt to build socialism on an independent power base. Under such conditions, a gradual infusion of nationalistic values into the system would enable the leadership to strengthen its power and thus actually facilitate a rapid transformation of the society and the economy.<sup>28</sup> In this case, a parallel can <sup>25</sup> For the development of economic integration generally, see Zauberman, pp. 23–29. Information on the coordination of heavy industry under the Council for Mutual Economic Aid can be found in Nikolai Kent, "Soviet Plans for Developing Heavy Industry in the Satellite Countries," Bulletin: Institute for the Study of the USSR, VIII, No. 2, pp. 3–9. Eastern Europe, XI, No. 7, p. 30, contains an account of recent developments, including the publication of the "Basic Principles of the International Division of Labor," approved at the June, 1962, meeting of the Council for Mutual Economic Aid. For the principles governing economic integration see the reference in note 24, above.

<sup>26</sup> The differences among the Eastern European states over economic interests are well described by Michael Gamarnikow, "The Future of COMECON," East Europe, XI, No. 6, pp. 3–10.

<sup>27</sup> The origins of such a dispute are, of course, quite another matter. In the Yugoslav case, as we have seen, nationalism of the second type was a result, not a cause, of the break with the Soviet Union.

<sup>28</sup> Thus, in 1958 in China the Great Leap Forward, by departing from accepted methods of industrialization and putting great strains on the Chinese social and economic structure, gave rise to nationalistic appeals to discard Western methods in favor of traditional Chinese practices in the sciences, medicine, and other fields. See Geoffrey Hudson, et al., The Chinese Communes (Institute of Pacific Relations, 1960), p. 35. Conditions in be drawn with the growth of Soviet nationalism in the 1930s. In the East European satellites of the Soviet Union, on the other hand, revolutionary nationalism came to be associated with bourgeois national values as a result of the reaction against Soviet cultural chauvinism in the period 1948-1953. The situation at that time encouraged the Communists of these nations to identify their plight with that of the oppressed peoples of the non-Communist world for whom the doctrine of revolutionary nationalism had originally been formulated. In its origins, therefore, this reaction did not imply a re-interpretation of the doctrine of revolutionary nationalism, but only a demand that the doctrine be faithfully observed. When the satellite leaders realized the necessity of re-establishing links with the masses after the campaign to duplicate Soviet institutions on a weak power base was abandoned in the post-Stalin period, the doctrine of revolutionary nationalism became infused with nationalistic elements, above all in Poland and Hungary.

Local conditions must be taken into account from this point on. The decisive stage in the development of this type of nationalism comes when the nation in question admits to an historical continuity between past and present, between the pre- and post-revolutionary systems. If the nation has an imperial tradition, such an identification will be easier, as in the case of China. The existence of large national minorities in neighboring states may also encourage appeals to this type of national feeling, as in the case of Albania's quarrel with Yugoslavia. On the other hand, nationalism of this sort may be curbed in a multi-national state. Thus ethnocentrism has never developed in Yugoslavia because of the delicate nationalities question within that country.

The growth of this sentimental form of nationalism, and its association with the national forms of communism discussed earlier, would indeed mean the triumph of nationalism over communism. But here again a word of caution is in order. No Communist nation, not even the Soviet Union, has gone so far as to claim that its own form of communism is the product of the unique genius of its people, thus transforming communism from a universalistic to a particularistic philosophy. To do so would be to undercut the revolutionary appeal of the doctrine, and this no Communist nation is at present prepared to do. Nor should the divisive effects of this form of nationalism be overestimated. Relations between Poland and the Soviet Union in recent years have demonstrated how mutual interest and sheer necessity can overcome national antipathies. The post-war history of the Communist bloc suggests that disputes over minorities or boundaries have become acute only when the countries in question were already at odds for other reasons.

These observations all must be viewed in the light of current transitions within the Communist bloc; predictions concerning its future evolution are hazardous. Nationalism, in its various forms, seems on the increase. This should not, however, lead us to forget that some of the strongest centrifugal forces within the bloc originated in the "pre-national" period after World War II, and that the conditions of that time were in many ways unique. Communist doctrine was committed to the construction of a supra-national community on the basis of a universalistic model of socialism—the Soviet Union—and the monolithic solidarity of national parties under Soviet leadership. However sound a basis this might at first glance seem to provide for beginning the construction of a supra-national community, the facts were otherwise. Soviet totalitarianism, by its fascination with what could be achieved through political power and organizational skills—to the almost total disregard of other factors—encouraged the consolidation of power separately within existing nation-states. This delayed the obvious first step to integration, the development of a supra-national economic bloc, and meant that integration could only be achieved through sharing power at the top—something the Soviet Union would not agree to and something which, even if it had been achieved, would probably have destroyed the monolithic unity on which the whole structure of the supra-national community supposedly rested.

National boundaries thus became crucial dividing lines between separate and often clashing centers of power. But could not a new start now be made toward integrating the Communist nations, when the shortcomings of economic autarchy are slowly becoming appreciated, and when the Soviet leadership is increasingly willing to tolerate diversity within the Communist bloc? The possibility should be considered, even in the face of the current drift toward nationalism and the importance of Sino-Soviet tensions. For paradoxical as it may appear, only through the consolidation of nationalism may the conditions ultimately be created for the integration of the Communist nations. First, the principle of monolithic unity under the direction of one party must give way to a flexible form of cooperation which will permit the internationalization of the leadership of the world Communist movement. Only then can the national parties be assured of equal treatment in a supra-national union. Second, the drive for world domination must spend its force. As long as this dynamic goal is urging on the nations of the Communist bloc, quarrels such as that presently going on between China and the Soviet Union over the proper tactics of the revolutionary struggle seem inevitable. Third, the powerful nations of the Communist bloc must exhaust the possibilities inherent in development within national boundaries in order to re-focus their energies on the construction of supra-national institutions. National consolidation would favor such a process; the growth of virulent nationalism would, of course, have an opposite effect, destroying any hope of integration. Situations conducive to the second type of nationalism would have to be avoided.<sup>29</sup>

Yugoslavia dictated the more theoretical approach of Kardelj, supra.

<sup>29</sup> For a discussion of the concept of the "Socialist Commonwealth," which the Communists have developed recently in response to changing conditions within and outside the bloc, see Kurt L. London, "The 'Socialist Commonwealth of Nations': Pattern for Communist World Organization," Orbis, III, pp. 424-42. London speaks of the problem of "establishing a conceptual framework vast and flexible enough to contain the organizational structure within which world communism could be achieved," and sees this in the concept of the Socialist Commonwealth. The term still lacks clarity, however, and is used by the Communists almost interchangeably with the phrases "socialist camp" and "world socialist system" (ibid., p. 430).

We believe, on reflection, that the West may take comfort at what lies ahead. It seems difficult to imagine that the Communist states will be able to meet the conditions just laid down for effective integration across national boundaries. But this is not all; for while the powerful supra-national community of Communists dreams may not be entirely a chimera, its realization may well entail a prior national development which would emasculate those elements of the Communist system most dangerous to our survival. The nation-state system will then have performed its function of stemming the Communist drive for world conquest. While the victory of the Bolsheviks in 1917 was indeed a setback for those who believe in national self-determination and democracy, we may also be thankful that Communism appeared when it did, before integration of the nations of the world had progressed to the point—as it someday may—when the groundwork for an international totalitarian state would already have been laid.

THE GERMAN PARTY SYSTEM AND THE 1961 FEDERAL ELECTION<sup>1</sup>

SAMUEL H. BARNES, FRANK GRACE, JAMES K. POLLOCK
AND PETER W. SPERLICH
The University of Michigan

Each German federal election since 1949 has resulted in a reduction in the number of parties securing representation in the Bundestag. While this trend continued in 1961, there is evidence that the party system is becoming stabilized, making it unlikely that any of the present parties will disappear in the near future. This article examines the 1961 election and its significance for the German party system.

I

The major outlines of the present German party system became apparent as early as 1946, when party activities were resumed on a zonal basis. The principal parties then in the field were the Communist Party, the Social Democratic Party, the Christian Democratic Union, and the Free Democratic Party.<sup>2</sup> The last two of these were known differently in different sections of West Germany, but today, with very few exceptions, the designation for each group is the same throughout the Federal Republic.

In the first election held in the Federal Republic, the Bundestag election of 1949, no less than ten parties won seats.<sup>3</sup> The CDU/CSU emerged as the strongest, and its chief opposition, then as now, was the SPD. The third major party, winning more seats than the total of the next three (DP, BP, and KPD), was the FDP.<sup>4</sup> Inasmuch as no party had received a majority it became necessary for Adenauer, elected chancellor by a one-vote majority of the Bundestag, to form a coalition cabinet. Of its thirteen ministries, eight went to the CDU/CSU, three to the FDP, and two to the DP. The parties of the center and the right thus formed the first government, leaving the SPD in the opposition role and excluding completely from any role of significance the extreme left (KPD), the radical right (DRP) and the special interest, strictly regional and particularist groups (ZP, BP, WAV and SSW).<sup>5</sup>

In the second Bundestag election in 1953 "a radical simplification of the political spectrum" had already become quite pronounced: only six parties were successful in winning seats. The CDU/CSU was able to increase its share to 243 (49.9 per cent) of the total of 487; and the SPD, although taking a small loss in terms of its percentage of seats (from 32.7 to 31.2), was nevertheless able to increase its bloc of seats from 131 to 151. The FDP, the DP, and the ZP suffered losses both absolutely and in percentage terms. None of the other parties which had won seats in 1949 was successful, but in 1953 the new "Refugee Party" (BHE), had appeared and was able in its first election to surpass all but the three leading parties (the CDU/CSU, the SPD, and the FDP) and win 27 (5.1 per cent) of the 487 seats.<sup>6</sup>

The two major parties together accounted for

<sup>3</sup> Three seats were won by independent candidates.

<sup>4</sup> See Table XII, infra, for the distribution.

<sup>5</sup> The six minor opposition parties held a total of only sixty (14.8%) of the Bundestag seats.

<sup>6</sup> See Table XII, infra.

<sup>1</sup> The authors wish to express their gratitude to the Whiting Foundation for enabling them to observe the German election during August and September of 1961.

<sup>2</sup> The abbreviated designations contained in the following glossary will be used through the rest of the paper:

CDU/CSU: Christian Democratic Union
(Christian Social Union in Bavaria).

SPD: Social Democratic Party.

FDP (DVP) (BDV): Free Democratic Party
(Democratic People's Party in Wuerttemberg, Bremen Democratic People's Party in Bremen).

KPD: Communist Party of Germany.

BP: Bavarian Party.

DP: German Party.

DKP/DRP: German Conservative Party,
German Rightist Party.

EVD: European People's Movement of Germany.

RSF: Radical Social Freedom Party.

RWVP: Rhenish-Westphalian People's Party.

SSW: South-Schleswig Voters' Association.

WAV: Economic Reconstruction Association.

ZP: Center Party.

BHE: Refugee Party.

DFU: German Peace Union.

GDB: All-German Bloc.

DRP: German Reich Party.

DG: German Community.

394 (81.1 per cent) of the Bundestag seats, and an impartial observer viewing this election might have concluded that a two party system was emerging in West Germany. The radical groups, both left and right, had, for all practical purposes, suffered a total defeat; and the CDU/CSU was able to draw the FDP, the DP, and the BHE into its coalition, leaving only the SPD in opposition.<sup>7</sup>

The further weakening or elimination of the minor parties continued apace. By 1957 only four parties retained representation in the Bundestag. In that year the CDU/CSU was able to win an absolute majority of the seats (270 or 54.3 per cent of the 497), and for the first time in the history of democratic Germany it became possible for a single party to organize a government without a coalition. The SPD was able to increase its strength to 169 seats, 34.1 per cent of the total. The FDP lost seven seats; and the DP, although regaining two it had lost in 1953, nevertheless lost in proportion of total seats as compared with 1949.<sup>8</sup> After the 1957 election, all evidence pointed toward Germany's arrival at a stage at which the doctrinaire, programmatic party is discouraged and in which the spirit of compromise so necessary and conducive to a two-party system appears.

II

A number of changes within the parties took place between 1957 and 1961 and affected their fortunes in the fourth Bundestag election. The condition of the parties on the eve of the campaign therefore deserves mention.

The CDU/CSU continued the policies of pragmatism and compromise that had brought it increasing majorities in previous elections. It is Christian but not in any narrowly confessional sense. It has asserted the inviolability of the rights of persons and property and in consequence has opposed such concentrations of power as constitute a threat to these rights. It has stood for both economic and political decentralization and the separation of Church and state. And perhaps none of its tenets is adhered to more fervently than the alliance with the democracies of the West.

The CDU/CSU unites Catholics and Protestants, businessmen and trade unionists, Bavarian particularists and refugee nationalist within its ranks; it is an amalgam of virtually every element in the body politic, and considerable skill is necessary to maintain this precarious balance of interests. In fact, the CDU/CSU is two parties, and the composition of the Government has always reflected this. The CSU has always considered itself a separate party working in alliance with the CDU for reasons of mutual advantage, but in no sense subservient to it. It is pertinent to note that although the CDU/CSU lost strength nationally in 1961, the CSU losses in Bayern were less than in any other state except Niedersachsen (a special case), a fact tending to indicate that its strength is not entirely dependent on that of its ally.

To date Chancellor Adenauer, by his great political skill and his successes, has managed to hold the party together. Paradoxically, this strength is also a potential party weakness: we do not know the extent to which he personally is responsible for its unity, nor whether its unity can be preserved when the problem of Adenauer's succession presents itself.

Unquestionably, Adenauer has lost prestige since the zenith of 1957. His actions in the recent campaign in the face of the Berlin crisis to be described later, no doubt account for much of the loss. Perhaps he suffered even more from his maneuvers in connection with the election of a successor to President Heuss in 1959. In this year, fearing that Carlo Schmid, the popular and respected SPD leader, might be elected to the presidency, Adenauer urged the election of Dr. Ludwig Erhard, the ever more popular architect of the Wirtschaftswunder. Dr. Erhard, however, suspected that Adenauer's support was inspired principally by a desire to elevate him upstairs to a position of much less influence than the one he held. When the ensuing disagreement threatened the unity of the party, Adenauer announced that he himself would seek the presidency and that if he attained it he would make it into an office of real power and influence. Soon, however, he came to realize that his choice for chancellor, the minister of finance, Franz Eitzel, was no nearly so popular with the party as Erhard, and that there was a real possibility of his losing or <sup>8</sup> Of the six direct seats the DP won, five were unopposed by CDU candidates. The BHE was completely unsuccessful, but it is reasonable to assume that a part of its 1953 following had shifted allegiance to the CDU/CSU. It is equally reasonable, however, to assume that it had lost its raison d'être, that the refugees of 1953 had by 1957 for the most part become integrated into West German society, and, as a consequence, identified themselves with one or another of the older and less particularistic political groupings.

<sup>7</sup> The Center Party, in its last effort in a federal election, won three seats. One of these can be attributed to the planned absence of CDU opposition, while a second was won by a CDU member running on the ZP list.

both the presidential and chancellor fronts. Whereupon he reversed himself and announced that he would remain chancellor. This quite high-handed and arbitrary behavior, together with his age and a resentment in some quarters of the alleged growing influence of the German Catholic hierarchy, portended no little disaffection and loss of confidence as he prepared to lead his party into the campaign of 1961. The only question was the degree of his loss.

After the election of 1957 the Social Democrats, soundly defeated in three consecutive elections, began what must have been a painful process of self-criticism. The economic system which had produced the Wirtschaftswunder was highly popular, and an overwhelming majority of West Germans also approved maintaining strong ties with the West and sharing in the responsibility of keeping Western defenses at a level sufficient to discourage Russian aggression. A new program was adopted at Bad Godesberg in 1959 which, although perhaps repugnant to many of the older and more doctrinaire elements within the party, represented a triumph for the realists. With the promulgation of this program, the SPD abandoned its Marxist trappings, and accepted both the free market and the necessity of participating in NATO. In terms of its declared objectives, the SPD after Bad Godesberg became a middle-of-the-road party with a program designed to appeal to almost all segments of the populace.

This new posture was also reflected in the new leadership to which the SPD turned. By accepting Willy Brandt as its standard bearer in August, 1960 the party added a new dimension to the qualities it sought in its leaders. A new emphasis had been placed upon popular image and appeal, and a consequent de-emphasis of such traditional qualifications as length of service to the party and orthodoxy of view. As the 1961 election approached, the SPD was prepared as never before to compete with the CDU/CSU in the middle ground of democratic politics where majorities are obtained. Although it had little hope of obtaining a majority in 1961, it had come to realize the direction in which future success must be sought.

The importance of the third major force in the 1961 election, the FDP, could not have been foreseen in 1957. In that year it lost both absolutely and relatively for the second time. Its own history and that of other minority parties in the Federal Republic warranted an anticipation of a still further decline in support—even to the point of being denied any seats in the Bundestag through the operation of the 5 per cent-3 direct seats clause. The FDP had suffered severely from internal strife, from the absence of effective leadership, and from the fact that its economic program had been taken over by the CDU/CSU and implemented in an amazingly successful way by Dr. Erhard. Its loss of positive appeal was also compounded by a certain loss of negative appeal after the SPD issued its Bad Godesberg program.

The fortunes of the FDP, however, took a turn for the better when in 1960 Dr. Erich Mende succeeded to its chairmanship. With a strong, forceful personality, a fine appearance and a distinguished World War II record, Dr. Mende was able to bring to the FDP a unity long lacking, and to infuse it with a wholly new vitality. By the summer of 1961 it had succeeded in putting together an effective and well financed organization which could exploit all available opportunities. Among these was a considerable dissatisfaction with the cultural policies of the CDU/CSU, and particularly with its reputedly close alliance with the Catholic Church, already noted. A vague unhappiness with Adenauer was unsettling in some quarters, and the FDP emphasized "Adenauer's policies without Adenauer."

Another unknown factor in the 1961 election was a new political party, the All German Party (GDP), composed of the surviving elements of the BHE and the DP. In 1957 the BHE secured only 4.5 per cent of the vote and accordingly failed to win any seats in the Bundestag; and its leadership had been disintegrating since 1955. The DP, although enjoying a slight gain in 1957 (up from 15 to 17 Bundestag seats), had a future hardly more promising than that of the BHE. Prior to 1961 many of its leaders and members had moved into the CDU. The marriage of these two disparate groups was evidently one of convenience and had been formalized primarily for the purpose of avoiding the consequences of the "five-three" clause.

The other two parties entering the campaign in every state, and discussed in some detail below, were the DRP and the DFU, the former an extremist splinter of the right, and the latter a splinter of the extreme left. From the outset of the campaign they were not regarded seriously and need not be considered here. The SSW and DG also entered the campaign, but not on a national basis. We now turn to the electoral campaign itself.

III

The parties sought to profit in the 1961 campaign from the strengths and weaknesses they revealed in 1957. The great success of the chancellor in securing an absolute majority of the seats left the CDU/CSU feeling confident, and it adopted the general theme of "more of the same." The SPD, on the other hand, spent the intervening years attempting to reshape its public image; by 1961 its principal task was convincing the electorate that its new face was real, and not just assumed for the elections. The FDP sought to rebuild its organization and internal unity, and to project an image different from the other two major parties.

The campaign opened with little drama; few people expected much excitement or doubted that the final results would be similar to those of 1957. But intensive campaigning had barely begun when the Berlin crisis quickly came to dominate political discussion. Consequently, the following analysis will note first the original campaign strategy of the parties and then will examine the impact of that crisis.

The CDU/CSU campaign, repeating the 1957 pattern, emphasized prosperity and a continuation of present foreign and domestic policies. The slogans "No experiments" and "Let's keep our freedom" accurately expressed the mood it sought to convey. That new departures in policy would be necessary, was not even anticipated. As before, the party sought to be everything to everybody. If any particular effort was made to court new sources of support, it was the special attention devoted to regions of former DP and BHE strength. The importance of these areas was clearly recognized, and the CDU took special care in the selection of its candidates and in the scheduling of the speeches of the party notables in these districts.

A second CDU tactic of particular interest was its handling of the question of Adenauer's age and the succession in the party—it ignored the subject. Adenauer's age seemed not to be nearly the issue it had been in 1957, nor did his vigor seem to have weakened appreciably during the interval. The chancellor pointedly avoided the question of his successor numerous times during the campaign despite invitations to comment on it. He replied merely that the CDU/CSU government was a "team" affair, and that there were several capable men to succeed him. Erhard was one of these, said the chancellor, but he refused to single him out as being superior to the others. Different party notables shared posters with Adenauer in different parts of the country, depending upon their popularity in the locality, but none was built up as the heir apparent. Adenauer was criticized both inside and outside the party for this, and late in the campaign the portrait of Erhard looking hopefully over the shoulder of Adenauer was increasingly in evidence. But the chancellor never wavered in his domination of the party.

Another interesting aspect of the CDU/CSU campaign was its treatment of the socialists. In general, the opposition was shrugged off with contempt or ignored; but occasionally CDU/CSU speakers were asked about the recent changes in the SPD party program and leadership. They questioned the sincerity of the changes; they called Herbert Wehner, a former communist and presently a member of the SPD executive, the real power within the party which was merely using Brandt and a platform of moderation to get into power. Alternatively, they accused the SPD of "me too-ism," of repudiating its past in an opportunistic attempt to win votes: "How bankrupt a party must be when it no longer believes in its title."<sup>9</sup>

The 1961 campaign began for the SPD with its determination to seek to secure the votes of the growing middle class in Germany. The Bad Godesberg program of 1959 removed the formal ideological barriers to the attempt; and its selection of Willy Brandt, the mayor of Berlin, as its candidate for chancellor gave it an attractive and skillful leader. The party's strategy in 1961 was based on his personality to an extraordinary extent. His youth, dynamism, moderation, and responsibility were emphasized as symbolic of a new SPD. The party accepted the economic miracle and the system which had achieved it, demanding only that the fruits be more equitably shared. The SPD accepted the principal elements of the Adenauer foreign policy, including European integration and NATO, but wished greater flexibility and increased efforts to overcome the division of Germany. It hammered away at these points, and when the Berlin crisis interrupted the campaign, the SPD was able to incorporate it into its preconceived line of attack, while the CDU/CSU was momentarily thrown off stride.

The FDP entered the campaign with more optimism than in many previous years. It had an attractive leader in Erich Mende, it was relatively united internally, and it hoped to benefit from the recent internal difficulties of the CDU/CSU. The FDP advocated fewer welfare measures and a strict laissez-faire in economic policy, along with greater independence for Germany and less emphasis on European unity. It differed with the CDU/CSU also in the sensitive cultural realm; the FDP acted subtly to gain from Protestant unrest within the CDU/CSU.

As the FDP could not hope to govern alone, it had to face the issue of what it would do following the elections. This was a sensitive question, as the FDP conceivably would hold the balance of power and so might determine the composition of the government. A statement of intent to support one party or the other could have damaged its electoral chances, as potential supporters might prefer to vote for the major party rather than a minority ally. Furthermore, the FDP had suffered greatly from its last experience in a coalition under Adenauer. Mende announced that it would not be possible to work with the socialists, but that the FDP might support Erhard, Gerstenmaier or Krone; more definite statements would have to wait, he said, until after the election.<sup>10</sup> The FDP generally took the "plague-on-both-your-houses" approach, although it obviously viewed the SPD as the more undesirable.

<sup>9</sup> Erhard, in a press conference reported in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, September 8, 1961.

The minor parties entered the electoral contest with little to hope for, and their campaigns never got off the ground. Only the GDP, the DRP, and the DFU made any pretense at national coverage, and their campaigns seemed to be limited largely to their ubiquitous posters. The DFU was a new party which entered the campaign seemingly well financed—so it was hinted—by the East Zone. It capitalized also on the prestige of Albert Schweitzer, whose portrait appeared on its posters, and the pacifism of some Protestant ministers in southwest Germany. It appealed to the desire for peace and the fear of atomic warfare; after an initial publicity splash, it faded rapidly following the erection of the Berlin Wall. Most of its respectable followers abandoned it at that time, or even before; and it probably ended with only the support of the hard-core communists remaining in West Germany.

The DRP made an even smaller impact during the campaign. Featuring the looming shadow of Bismarck on its posters, it hinted that he would have responded differently to the Berlin Wall. The party did not run a very active campaign. Radicalism was of no significance in the election.

The GDP, formed of the union of the DP and the BHE, also failed to get its campaign off the ground. The merged parties were combining weaknesses, not strengths, and the absence of well known leaders and money was a severe handicap. Even the weather improved by mid-September so that agrarian discontent, traditionally a source of DP strength, was reduced; and the party did badly in the competition.

The erection of the wall separating East and West Berlin, on August 13, enlivened what had begun as a rather dull campaign. The Berlin crisis gave Brandt an unexpected amount of publicity, and this advantage was compounded by Adenauer's reaction to it. The crisis focused not only German but world attention on the youthful mayor of the city, and he used the opportunity to stress the vitality, moderation, dynamism, and patriotism of the SPD. Brandt called for all-party unity on this issue; while Adenauer called the crisis a Khrushchev trick to help the SPD. In reply, Brandt said that "Der alte Herr" had lost contact with reality by his "politics as usual" attitude when the German people were threatened.<sup>11</sup> Brandt addressed a personal letter to Kennedy requesting that something be done for the morale of Berlin. This letter was followed by—although it was not necessarily the cause of—Vice President Johnson's trip to Berlin.<sup>12</sup> Adenauer did not go there immediately, ostensibly because of the press of business in Bonn, but he did find time to attend a CDU rally in Regensburg, almost as far from Bonn as Berlin. And at the Regensburg rally, Adenauer raised the issue of Brandt's illegitimate birth by referring to him as "Brandt alias Frahm." When Adenauer finally went to Berlin on August 22, he was greeted coldly by Brandt and subjected to unpleasant remarks from the crowd. The chancellor explained that Vice President Johnson had asked him not to come with him.

It seems likely that Adenauer badly gauged the political significance of the Berlin crisis and refused for over a week to heed his advisors. He has no strong attachment to Berlin, which is not only strongly SPD but was also the headquarters of Jacob Kaiser, long his chief competitor for the CDU leadership.<sup>13</sup> For Adenauer, Berlin is a "heathen city," and he sometimes lets a year pass without visiting it. Consequently, he refused at first to believe that the event could force him to alter his original campaign plans and fight on issues and terrain favorable to, if not chosen by, his opponent. His response contrasted unfavorably with Brandt's actions and call for an all-party government of national unity; and this seems to have cost Adenauer greatly in prestige in August.

In evaluating the campaign, August 13 is a significant date. Before then, the campaign was largely devoid of excitement. The CDU/CSU was concentrating on repeating the success of

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., August 30, 1961.

<sup>12</sup> We heard criticism of Johnson's trip from CDU sources in Germany who felt that his visit was a campaign aid to Brandt.

<sup>13</sup> On this latter point see Arnold J. Heidenheimer, Adenauer and the CDU (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1960), passim.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., August 25, 1961; September 4, 1961.

1957; with no prospects of a majority, the SPD sought to improve its national image by its moderation. While the FDP was hopeful of improving its position, the other minor parties never seemed of great importance. After August 13, the campaign took on a new vitality. The SPD took the initiative, aided by the events and Adenauer's reaction to them, and handled the opportunity presented them very skillfully. Brandt benefitted greatly from the limelight in which he stood as mayor of Berlin, as well as from his underdog role.

While the initial impact of the crisis favored the SPD greatly, it is not so easy to evaluate the importance of the incident in the campaign as a whole. Its capacity to dominate headlines had all but evaporated by election day. Adenauer's view that there was nothing pressing to be done made more sense a month later, too. It is doubtful that many votes were altered by the crisis, despite criticism of Adenauer's reaction to it; there are other acceptable explanations for the changes in voting between 1957 and 1961. And except for the Berlin crisis, the campaign was devoid of the unexpected.

IV

The law under which the election was held is unchanged in its essential features from that adopted for the 1953 elections.<sup>14</sup> The 494 regular seats in the Bundestag are distributed among the states on the basis of population. Half the seats are filled from single-member districts and half from state lists. Originally, each state filled half its seats each way; however, the districts have remained unaltered, so population shifts are reflected by altering the number of list candidates assigned.<sup>15</sup> Parties run candidates in the districts and also prepare a state list. Voters indicate their choices twice: once for the individual party candidate in the district and once for the list. The party which wins a plurality in the district takes that seat. On the state list, seats are distributed by proportional representation, with the seats won in the districts being subtracted from those elected from the state list. The net results are similar to those obtained by straight PR, while the presumed benefits of close contact between the delegate and his constituents are achieved by electing half of the members in single-member districts.

<sup>14</sup> See James K. Pollock, "The West German Electoral Law of 1953," this REVIEW, Vol. 49 (March, 1955), pp. 107-130.

<sup>15</sup> See Table XI for the division of district-state seats in each state. This slightly aids the CDU/CSU because it encourages Ueberhangsmandate, explained below.

The system has in each election resulted in additional seats being assigned, as a party retains the extra seats it wins by taking more direct seats than its proportion of the state vote would give it (Ueberhangsmandate).<sup>16</sup>

The combination list-district system has several advantages not immediately apparent. Important candidates who risk being defeated in their districts can also be placed high on the list in order to insure their election, and the party can bring needed specialists into parliament in a similar fashion. Finally, in practice each district has a member of each of the two major parties to represent it, for the minor party in the district is still informally represented in parliament by someone elected from the state list, often the defeated constituency candidate himself.

An important element of the electoral law which cuts down on the number of parties in parliament is the "five-three" clause, under which a party may send representatives to parliament only if it gets 5 per cent of the popular vote in the entire Federal Republic or wins three direct seats. These provisions apply to all except parties of national minorities, of which only the Danes in Schleswig-Holstein are presently organized, and they have elected no one since their single success in 1949.

The only significant change between the 1953 and 1961 election laws was the provision for absentee balloting. In 1953, a citizen could use an election certificate (Wahlschein) to vote anywhere in the Federal Republic. In 1957, the certificate could be used to vote in person in any precinct of one's election district, or could be used as a postal ballot; this change was to prevent communists from concentrating their votes in one district. In 1961, one could vote only in one's own precinct or by post ballot, which was tabulated separately on election night.

A final provision of the electoral law which deserves special mention is the method of distributing seats following the election. Individual parties may, and the major ones do, combine their votes in all the states in determining the distribution of seats (Listenverbindung). Seats are distributed nationally to the parties so combined, not the states, on the basis of the parties' proportion of the votes for parties which surmounted the "five-three" clause. The seats are then assigned to individual states on the basis of the proportion the state's vote for the party bears to the party's total national vote. Hence the exact number of representatives from a state is not determined until after the election; and states with low participation and many invalid votes, as well as states with a high proportion of votes for parties which do not secure representation in the Bundestag, are penalized. This system of tabulating the results, of course, favors the larger parties. We turn now to the results of the 1961 election.

<sup>16</sup> As can be seen from Table XI below, the representation of Schleswig-Holstein, for instance, would have been 20 in 1961, due to the loss of population relative to the rest of the country, with 14 of these elected directly and from the list. But the CDU took 13 direct seats by plurality although it had but 41.8 per cent of the Zweitstimmen votes. The SPD with 36.4 per cent and the FDP with 13.8 per cent received 2 and 3 list seats, bringing the SPD total to 8. The CDU under proportional representation would have gotten 9, but it kept the additional four had won directly.

V

The election was held on Sunday, September 17, 1961. Polls were open from early in the morning until late in the afternoon, and the day passed with no unusual incidents. Participation was high even by European standards. Whatever the optimum participation in democratic elections may be, the advocates of high turnout will be pleased to see that 87.7 per cent of the eligible electorate of the Federal Republic went to the polls.

Table I shows that a high turnout level was also the rule for the several states. From the lowest participation percentage, in Baden-Wuerttemberg (84.8), to the highest, in Hessen (89.2), there was only a 4.4 per cent spread. Looking at the turnout trend over the years,

TABLE II. PERCENT PARTICIPATION, BY STATES, 1949-1961*

States	1949	1953	1957	1961
Schleswig-Holstein	82.7	88.5	88.3	88.0
Hamburg	81.2	87.4	89.2	88.6
Niedersachsen	77.7	88.7	89.0	88.5
Bremen	81.9	87.4	88.7	88.2
Nordrhein-Westfalen	79.6	86.0	88.0	88.4
Hessen	77.3	86.7	89.1	89.2
Rheinland-Pfalz	79.6	86.0	88.3	88.2
Baden-Wuerttemberg	70.6	81.8	84.4	84.8
Bayern	81.1	85.8	87.7	87.2
Saarland	—	—	89.3	87.7
Federal Republic	78.5	86.0	87.8	87.7

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18.

however, we can also observe a very interesting leveling off in popular participation: 1949: 78.5%; 1953: 86.0%; 1957: 87.8%; and 1961: 87.7%. With certain variations, this leveling off can also be found for each of the states in Table II. Apparently a plateau has been reached which constitutes the "appropriate" voting turnout for current West German politics. Apparently, only a major crisis could increase participation further. Without question, the 1961 election was more interesting and conducted with greater vigor and enthusiasm than the rather cut-and-dried affair of 1957, yet participation remained essentially the same.

The ratio of invalid ballots cast in 1961 does not appear to be excessively high, considering the relative complexity of voting in Germany (two votes per voter): 2.6 per cent of the Erststimmen and 4.0 per cent of the Zweitstimmen were invalid. The higher figure for the Zweit-

TABLE I. PARTICIPATION AND VALIDITY OF VOTES CAST, BY STATES, 1961 (Zweitstimmen)*

States	Eligible voters	Particip. voters	% Part.	Valid votes	Invalid votes	% Inv.
Schleswig-Holstein	1,626,141	1,431,704	88.0	1,363,366	68,338	4.8
Hamburg	1,386,411	1,227,787	88.6	1,193,737	34,050	2.8
Niedersachsen	4,613,112	4,083,490	88.5	3,942,955	140,535	3.4
Bremen	507,760	447,936	88.2	428,241	19,695	4.4
Nordrhein-Westfalen	11,085,775	9,799,429	88.4	9,518,246	281,183	2.9
Hessen	3,395,285	3,028,241	89.2	2,878,689	149,552	4.9
Rheinland-Pfalz	2,348,108	2,069,927	88.2	1,969,933	99,994	4.8
Baden-Wuerttemberg	5,211,883	4,419,748	84.8	4,189,163	230,585	5.2
Bayern	6,551,728	5,714,545	87.2	5,486,962	227,583	4.0
Saarland	714,512	626,817	87.7	579,609	47,208	7.5
Federal Republic	37,440,715	32,849,624	87.7	31,550,901	1,298,723	4.0

* Statistisches Bundesamt, Wiesbaden (hereafter referred to as "Bundesamt"): VIII/5/18. (Roman VIII refers to the electoral series of the Bundesamt; the other numbers refer to the particular document.)

stimmen appears to result from the failure of some to have understood the need for two checkmarks on their ballots.

The highest percentage of invalid votes, not surprisingly, was cast in the Saarland, 5.6 per cent of the Erststimmen and 7.5 per cent of the Zweitstimmen. This state has been part of the Federal Republic only since January 1, 1957, so voters there have had less experience than others with the German electoral system. The other states (with two exceptions) had less than 3 per cent of the Erststimmen invalid, and (with one exception) less than 5 per cent of the Zweitstimmen invalid. (See Table I.)

The trend figures exhibit an interesting counter-movement:

Erststimme: 1949: 3.1%; 1953: 3.4%; 1957: 3.0%; 1961: 2.6%

Zweitstimme: 1949: none; 1953: 3.3%; 1957: 3.8%; 1961: 4.0%

Since the two trends do not go in the same direction, the "natural" theory that the increase in participation over the years has brought to the polls less interested and less discerning people cannot readily be accepted. Indeed even for the Zweitstimmen, the correlation coefficient (Pearsonian r) for invalid votes and participation shows no relationship between the two factors. It amounts to minus 0.0001 when computed on a state basis (N = 10). A better explanation is that there are now more voters without a sufficient understanding of the function of the Zweitstimme vote. Here the (largest) increase of 0.5 per cent following the admission of the Saarland is significant. In any case, the low magnitude of invalid votes is as favorable a sign of the success of political education in postwar Germany as the high level of popular participation.

We turn now to the party vote in the election of 1961. For the first time the nationwide electoral trends favorable to the CDU/CSU met reverse. The CDU/CSU again emerged from the election as the strongest party, as can be seen from Table III. However, the slim popular majority of 1957 was lost; and furthermore, the margin by which it was lost—the difference between what the party received and 50% of the popular vote—was large enough also to result in a loss of the parliamentary majority. In both these respects, then, the CDU/CSU must be appraised as one of the losers of the election. This, however, need not at all mean a troubled future for the party. The CDU/CSU, as already noted, had to fight the campaign under far less than ideal conditions. Furthermore, the actual loss is not so very large; its significance lies in the margin involved.

For the SPD the election brought an important gain, even if it was not as large as the party had hoped. But for the first time the party did attract substantially more than its usual 30 per cent, more or less, of the popular vote in federal elections. This may well indicate an important "breakthrough" for the SPI

TABLE III. VOTES RECEIVED BY PARTIES (Erststimmen AND Zweitstimmen), IN PER CENT, 1949-1961*

Party	Erststimmen				Zweitstimmen
	1949	1953	1957	1961	1949	1953	1957	1961
CDU/CSU	—	43.7	50.3	46.0	31.0	45.2	49.8	45.4
SPD	—	29.5	32.0	36.5	29.2	28.8	31.8	36.2
FDP	—	10.8	7.5	12.1	11.9	9.5	7.7	12.8
DP	—	3.9	3.5	2.7 <sup>a</sup>	4.0	3.3	3.4	2.8 <sup>a</sup>
BHE	—	5.9	4.4	—	—	5.9	4.6	—
ZP	—	0.2	1.0 <sup>b</sup>	—	3.1	0.8	0.9 <sup>b</sup>	—
BP	—	1.5	—	—	4.2	1.7	—	—
DRP	—	0.7	1.0	0.8	1.8	1.1	1.0	0.8
KPD	—	2.2	—	—	5.7	2.2	—	—
DFU	—	—	—	1.8	—	—	—	1.9
Other	—	1.6	0.3	0.1	9.1	1.5	0.8	0.1

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18; VIII/100/1; VIII/200/1.

<sup>a</sup> GDP.

<sup>b</sup> FU.

indeed one for which the party has been working quite hard: it may have made the transition from a class-based organization to a Volkspar-tei (a party based on, and integrating, a variety of social groups).

However, a certain guarded optimism is called for on the part of the SPD. Only the future can tell whether the 4.4 percentage-point increase was produced by factors particular to the 1961 campaign or by long-range voter realignments. The first state election following the federal election of 1961 was held in Hamburg on November 12, 1961. In it, the SPD expanded its already impressive majority. Yet it must be kept in mind that over the years the results of federal and state elections have been highly independent of one another.

The great winner in the federal election was the FDP. While its actual gain of about 5 percentage points was not much greater than that of the SPD, it had started out with a far smaller base. Its success, therefore, was quite spectacular. Three factors seem to have been primarily responsible for this gain: a modern and ably conducted campaign; the events of August in Berlin; and a favorable popular response to the party's main theme: Adenauer's politics without Adenauer.

Now the party's problem is whether it will be able to hold the new voters to its colors. The probability of doing so will depend essentially on whether most of the new FDP voters were traditional CDU/CSU voters now dissatisfied with the person of Dr. Adenauer, but not necessarily also with his party or his politics; or whether these new voters were the old followers of the constituent organizations (DP and BHE) of the collapsing GDP? Most election commentators ascribed the greater part of the increase to former CDU/CSU voters. If this should be the case, the future does not look quite as bright for the FDP as it seemed immediately after the election.<sup>17</sup>

Indeed, the 1961 state election in Hamburg (Table IV) shows that the FDP could not hold on to most of its new voters there. However, several reasons warn that this should not be regarded as an important indication of things to come. First of all, participation was lower in the state election. Secondly, the combined DP and BHE vote of the federal election of 1957 constituted a smaller percentage in Hamburg than in the Federal Republic as a whole. This means that the FDP could draw on a proportionately larger non-CDU/CSU reservoir in

TABLE IV. FEDERAL AND STATE ELECTIONS IN HAMBURG, IN PER CENT*

	SPD	CDU	FDP
1957 State election	53.9	32.2	8.6
1961 Federal election	46.9	31.9	15.7
1961 State election	57.4	29.1	9.6

* Adapted from Newsletter. Hamburg: Atlantik-Bruecke, November 17, 1961.

other states. And finally, as noted above, state elections and federal elections move more or less independently of each other.

The case of the GDP is also interesting. It has been noted that this merger was a desperate attempt of two rather incompatible groups to escape the 5 per cent-3 direct seats clause by joining forces. It turned out that the dynamics of politics do not conform to mathematical conventions: 4.6 plus 3.4 summed to 2.8 per cent.<sup>18</sup> Table III shows that the fate of the GDP is not without precedent in German politics. In the election of 1957 the BP and the ZP merged to form the FU since neither alone could hope to hurdle the "five-three" clause. But in spite of help from a rather strange corner (the SPD did not run candidates for the direct seat in a number of districts, to increase the chances of the FU), the alliance did not succeed in its purpose. By 1961 the FU had disappeared from the scene. A similar fate can be predicted for the GDP.

As for the other small parties, the continuing decline of the DRP, which received a total of only 0.8 per cent of the popular vote, suggests the unpopularity of right wing extremism in today's Germany; and the 1.9 per cent of the DFU indicates a similar lack of support for left wing extremism. If the events in Berlin—bringing home with great force to the Germans the divided condition of their country—could not revive German nationalism, one might doubt that anything short of catastrophe could do it. For the DFU, of course, the effect of the Berlin wall was entirely negative. Yet, even without it, this party was never a serious contender in the election.

The Danish minority party (SSW) of Schleswig-Holstein—exempted from the "five-three" clause—failed again to gain a seat in parliament. Its share of the vote in Schleswig-Holstein fell to 1.9 per cent (1949: 5.4; 1953: 3.3; 1957: 2.5). The SSW's share of the federal <sup>17</sup> A statistical analysis of voter re-alignments is under way currently which is expected to throw considerable light on this and related questions.

<sup>18</sup> Unless indicated otherwise, all percentages and figures given in the text refer to Zweitstimmen.

TABLE V. Erststimmen BY STATES AND PARTIES, IN PER CENT, 1961*

Party	Schl-Holst.	Hamb.	Nied-Sachs.	Brem.	Nordr-Westf.	Hess.	Rhein-Pfalz	Bad-W.	Bayern	Saarl.	Party Total <sup>c</sup>
CDU/CSU	43.5	32.4	40.1	27.6	48.1	35.8	49.4	45.8	55.7	49.3	46.0
SPD	36.5	47.2	38.9	50.1	37.6	43.2	33.8	32.4	30.3	33.6	36.5
FDP	12.5	15.1	11.9	14.6	11.1	14.4	12.8	16.3	8.1	12.7	12.1
GDP	3.6	0.9	6.3	3.9	0.8	3.9	0.4	2.6	3.8	0.3	2.7
DFU	1.2	3.5	1.2	2.8	1.9	2.1	1.5	2.1	1.5	3.1	1.8
DRP	0.8	0.8	1.5	1.1	0.4	0.5	2.1	0.6	0.4	0.9	0.8
DG	0.1	—	0.1	—	#	#	0.1	0.1	0.1	0.1	0.1
SSW	1.8	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	0.1
Other	—	—	#	—	#	#	—	—	#	—	#
State Total <sup>b</sup>	4.4	3.8	12.5	1.4	29.9	9.2	6.2	13.4	17.4	1.8	100.0

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/18.

<sup>a</sup> Total Erststimmen of the parties in the Federal Republic.<sup>b</sup> Total Erststimmen of the states in the Federal Republic. Except for rounding errors, the sums of the columns add up to 100.0%.

Less than 0.1%.

vote was 0.1 per cent. The DG also received 0.1 per cent of the federal vote. Primarily a South German party, it did not run candidates in all the states. (See Tables V and VI.) The DG is essentially a nationalist-conservative group, and its failure to attract support underlines our observations on the weakness of the DRP.

In four states—Niedersachsen, Nordrhein-

Westfalen, Hessen, and Bayern—splinter group and non-party nominations were made for altogether six direct seats. None of them was successful. (See Table V.)

We shall now briefly examine the party vote in each of the states. In six of them—given in order of CDU/CSU strength: Bayern, Saarland, Rheinland-Pfalz, Nordrhein-Westfalen,

TABLE VI. Zweitstimmen BY STATES AND PARTIES, IN PER CENT, 1961*

Party	Schl-Holst.	Hamb.	Nied-Sachs.	Brem.	Nordr-Westf.	Hess.	Rhein-Pfalz	Bad-W.	Bayern	Saarl.	Party Total <sup>c</sup>
CDU/CSU	41.8	31.9	39.0	27.0	47.6	34.9	48.9	45.3	54.9	49.0	45.4
SPD	36.4	46.9	38.7	49.7	37.3	42.8	33.5	32.1	30.1	33.5	36.2
FDP	13.8	15.7	13.2	15.2	11.8	15.2	13.2	16.6	8.7	12.9	12.8
GDP	3.9	1.0	6.1	4.1	0.9	4.1	0.5	2.8	3.9	0.3	2.8
DFU	1.3	3.6	1.3	3.0	2.0	2.3	1.5	2.3	1.6	3.2	1.9
DRP	0.9	0.9	1.6	1.1	0.5	0.6	2.3	0.7	0.5	0.9	0.8
DG	0.1	—	0.1	—	#	—	0.1	0.2	0.1	0.1	0.1
SSW	1.9	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	0.1
Other	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
State Total <sup>b</sup>	4.3	3.8	12.5	1.4	30.2	9.1	6.2	13.3	17.4	1.8	100.0

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/18.

<sup>a</sup> Total Zweitstimmen of the parties in the Federal Republic.<sup>b</sup> Total Zweitstimmen of the states in the Federal Republic. Except for rounding errors, the sums of the columns add up to 100.0%.

Less than 0.1%.

TABLE VII. VARIABILITY OF PARTY STRENGTH IN THE STATES, GIVEN AS PERCENTAGE DEVIATION FROM THE TOTAL PERCENTAGE OF POPULAR VOTES (Zweitstimmen) RECEIVED BY THE PARTIES IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC, 1961*

Party	Fed. Rep.	Schl-Holst.	Hamb.	Nied-Sachs.	Brem.	Nordr-Westf.	Hess.	Rhein-Pfalz	Bad.-W.	Bayern	Saar-land
CDU/CSU <sup>a</sup>	45.4	-3.6	-13.5	-6.4	-18.4	+2.2	-10.5	+3.5	-0.1	+9.5	+3.6
SPD	35.8	+0.6	+11.1	+2.9	+13.9	+1.5	+7.0	-2.3	-3.7	-5.7	-2.3
FDP	12.8	+1.0	+2.9	+0.4	+2.4	-1.0	+2.4	+0.4	+3.8	-4.1	+0.1
GDP	2.8	+1.1	-1.8	+3.3	+1.3	-1.9	+1.3	-2.3	0.0	+1.1	-2.5
DFU	1.9	-0.6	+1.7	-0.6	+1.1	+0.1	+0.4	-0.4	+0.4	-0.3	+1.3
DRP	0.8	+0.1	+0.1	+0.8	+0.3	-0.3	-0.2	+1.5	-0.1	-0.3	+0.1

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/18.

<sup>a</sup> The +’s and -’s are unweighted (not adjusted for state size) and therefore do not average out across the states.

Baden-Wuerttemberg, and Schleswig-Holstein—the chancellor’s party (or parties) placed first. Correspondingly, the greatest margin over the second-running SPD was gained in Bayern, the smallest in Schleswig-Holstein. See Tables V and VI.

In three of the states—in order of SPD strength: Bremen, Hamburg, Hessen—the SPD was the strongest party. By the same token, its largest margin over the CDU/CSU was received in Bremen, its smallest in Hessen.

Only Niedersachsen failed to give one of the two leading parties a commanding advantage over the other. The CDU received only 1.2 per cent more Erststimmen and 0.3 per cent more Zweitstimmen than the SPD. This state was formerly more strongly CDU than SPD. In the 1961 election, however, the SPD increased its popular vote by about 6 percentage points, while the CDU barely managed to hold its own. In 1957, it is pertinent to note, Niedersachsen had the highest (19 per cent) combined DP and BHE vote of any state.

Table VII gives an idea of the variability of party strength. Each entry represents the difference between a party’s federal and state percentage of the popular vote. In absolute terms we find greater variability in the larger parties, as might be expected. But when we examine the variations in relative terms (as per cent of the federal average), the greater variability is found in the smaller parties. In only two of the ten states did the three major parties deviate more than 25 percentage points from the federal average. Nine deviations of such magnitude were found for the GDP, six each for the DFU and DRP.

Some attention may be given to the difference in the voting for district candidates (Erststimme) and list candidates (Zweitstimme). Table VIII shows that in 1961, in all the states, the two large parties received fewer, and the smaller parties received more, Zweitstimmen than Erststimmen. In general, this has also been true in previous federal elections. The reason seems to be that at least some supporters of smaller parties view their direct candidates’ chances of election as negligible. (As will be seen below, at least in 1961, this appraisal was entirely correct: all direct seats were won by the CDU/CSU and the SPD.) To choose a small-party candidate, then, is to throw away one’s vote; however, to vote for the list of a small party is an entirely different matter, for

TABLE VIII. LOSS OR GAIN IN Zweitstimmen AS COMPARED TO Erststimmen, IN PER CENT, 1961*

Party	Schl-Holst.	Hamb.	Nied-Sachs.	Brem.	Nordr-Westf.	Hess.	Rhein-Pfalz	Bad.-W.	Bayern	Saar-land	Fed. Rep.
CDU/CSU	-1.7	-0.5	-1.1	-0.6	-0.5	-0.9	-0.5	-0.5	-0.8	-0.3	-0.6
SPD	-0.1	-0.3	-0.2	-0.4	-0.3	-0.4	-0.3	-0.3	-0.2	-0.1	-0.3
FDP	+1.3	+0.6	+1.3	+0.6	+0.7	+0.8	+0.4	+0.3	+0.6	+0.2	+0.7
GDP	+0.3	+0.1	-0.2	+0.2	+0.1	+0.2	+0.1	+0.2	+0.1	+ #	+0.1
DFU	+0.1	+0.1	+0.1	+0.2	+0.1	+0.2	+ #	+0.2	+0.1	+0.1	+0.1
DRP	+0.1	+0.1	+0.1	+ #	+0.1	+0.1	+0.2	+0.1	+0.1	+ #	+ #
DG	+ #	—	+ #	—	+ #	—	+ #	+0.1	+ #	+ #	+ #
SSW	+0.1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	+ #

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/18.

# Less than 0.1%.

all the votes in the state (or under Listenverbindung, in several, or all, states) are combined. Thus, every Zweitstimme counts.

One could argue, of course, that from the standpoint of strengthening the party of one's choice, even a wasted vote would be better than an effective vote for another party. Yet, since one's own party is deserted on the Erststimme, this is not quite true. For, as was seen above, with the exception of possible Ueberhangsmandate, it is the Zweitstimme that determines how many seats a party will receive in parliament. All this seems to indicate a rather sophisticated understanding of the electoral law on the part of some of the small-party followers. The habitual large-party voters, of course, are never bothered by this matter.

The phenomenon just noted might be attributed simply to the attractiveness of some candidate who by his personal appeal is able to win support among the followers of other parties, but for the great regularity of large-party Zweitstimmen loss, and small-party Zweitstimmen gain. It is hardly plausible that only the two larger parties ever have attractive candidates.

One more point may be observed on Table VIII: the SPD vote is more stable than that for other parties. This, of course, is to be expected, since all the smaller parties, with the exception of the DFU, are essentially bourgeois in their orientation. Thus, their voters are much more likely to desert them on the Erststimme for the CDU/CSU, than for the SPD.

We consider next the distribution of seats in the Bundestag. Only three parties (four, if we count the CSU separately) were able to surmount the 5 per cent-3 direct seats hurdle and thus receive seats: CDU/CSU, SPD, and FDP. Table IX lists the number and percentages of seats won by the various parties since 1949. The 1961 distribution follows the division of the popular vote quite closely, except, of course, for the dropping out of the smaller parties. The CDU/CSU received 2.7 per cent, the SPD 2.3 per cent, and the FDP 0.6 per cent more seats than votes. Another indication of the relative equity of the seat distribution among the successful parties is the votes-per-seat index. (See Table X.) The slight advantage of the CDU/CSU results from its winning five Ueberhangsmandate.

From Table IX we can also observe a constant reduction in the number of parties seated in the Bundestag. In 1949, ten parties plus three independents were represented; in 1953, six parties; in 1957, four parties. Now only three survive. A parallel reduction can be observed in the total number of parties in the Federal Republic. We shall return to this mat-

TABLE IX. NUMBER AND PER CENT OF BUNDESTAG SEATS WON BY PARTIES, 1949-1961*

Party	Number				Per Cent
	1949	1953	1957	1961	1949	1953	1957	1961
CDU/CSU	139	243	270	242	34.7	49.9	54.3	48.5
SPD	131	151	169	190	32.7	31.2	34.1	38.1
FDP	52	48	41	67	12.9	9.9	8.2	13.4
DP	17	15	17	0 <sup>a</sup>	4.2	3.2	3.4	0.0 <sup>a</sup>
BHE	—	27	0		—	5.1	0.0
ZP	10	3	0 <sup>b</sup>	—	2.5	0.7	0.0 <sup>b</sup>	—
BP	17	0			4.2	0.0
DRP	5	0	0	0	1.2	0.0	0.0	0.0
SSW	1	0	0	0	0.2	0.0	0.0	0.0
KPD	15	0	—	—	3.7	0.0	—	—
WAV	12	—	—	—	3.0	—	—	—
Other	3	0	0	0	0.7	0.0	0.0	0.0
Total <sup>c</sup>	402	487	497	499	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18.

<sup>a</sup> GDP.

<sup>b</sup> FU.

<sup>c</sup> Does not include the members from Berlin.

TABLE X. AVERAGE NUMBER OF VOTES
(Zweitstimmen) PER SEAT IN BUNDES-
TAG, BY PARTIES, 1949-1961

Party <sup>a</sup>	1949*	1953	1957	1961
CDU/CSU	52,932	51,210	53,759	59,084
SPD	52,918	52,616	52,462	60,144
FDP	54,382	54,774	53,654	60,131
DP	55,299	59,742	59,252
BHE <sup>b</sup>	318,418	59,887
ZP	54,382	72,359
BP	58,036
DRP	85,790
SSW	75,387
KPD	90,667
WAV	56,832
Other	422,315

* James K. Pollock, "The Electoral System of the Federal Republic of Germany—A Study in Representative Government," this REVIEW, Vol. 46 (December 1952), pp. 1056-1068. Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18 for 1953-1961.

<sup>a</sup> Does not include the members from Berlin.

<sup>b</sup> Various refugee groups in 1949.

ter presently, in discussing the nature of the emerging party system.

An examination of the types of seats won by the parties in each of the states provides a further indication of their strengths. In particular, it should be noted that the FDP was not able to win a single direct seat in 1961.

Table XII provides information about the types of seats won by the parties in all four federal elections. It shows that in previous elections smaller parties were quite able to win direct seats. This, however, should not necessarily be taken to mean that certain parties were previously much stronger in certain districts. Rather, most of the previous successes were due to Wahlabkommen, usually among the bourgeois parties, whereby one party would refrain from nominating a direct candidate in the district and ask its supporters to give their Erststimmen to the candidate of the other party.

The German party system, it has been seen, has undergone considerable change since 1949. But if there are only three parties represented in the Bundestag today, it has certainly not been because of any scarcity of political groups in the Federal Republic since 1949. About 80 parties and splinter groups have at some time or other, at some place or other, run candidates for the Bundestag or for a state legislature. On the supply side, then, the situation is certainly similar to that of the Weimar Republic. That the demand side shows such a retrenchment seems attributable to at least these three factors: the electoral law, West Germany's economic stability, and the greater political maturity of the citizenry.

TABLE XI. NUMBER AND TYPE OF SEATS WON, BY STATES AND PARTIES, 1961*

States	Direct Seats			List Seats			All Seats			Total
	CDU <sup>a</sup>	SPD	FDP	CDU <sup>a</sup>	SPD	FDP	CDU <sup>a</sup>	SPD	FDP
Schleswig-Holstein	13	1	0	0	7	3	13	8	3	24
Hamburg	0	8	0	6	1	3	6	9	3	18
Niedersachsen	15	19	0	11	6	9	26	25	9	60
Bremen	0	3	0	1	0	1	1	3	1	5
Nordrhein-Westfalen	41	25	0	35	35	19	76	60	19	155
Hessen	3	19	0	14	2	7	17	21	7	45
Rheinland-Pfalz	10	5	0	6	6	4	16	11	4	31
Baden-Wuerttemberg	27	6	0	5	16	12	32	22	12	66
Bayern	42	5	0	8	23	8	50	28	8	86
Saarland	5	0	0	0	3	1	5	3	1	9
Federal Republic	156	91	0	86	99	67	242	190	67	499 <sup>b</sup>

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/18.

<sup>a</sup> In Bayern: CSU.

<sup>b</sup> In principle, one-half of the seats should be Direct, and one-half List. It will be seen, however, that the total of 499 seats actually is comprised of 247 Direct seats and 252 List seats. The 5 additional List seats are the so-called Ueberhangsmandate, all of which were won by the CDU/CSU: 4 in Schleswig-Holstein and 1 in the Saarland.

TABLE XII. NUMBER AND TYPE OF SEATS WON BY PARTIES, 1949-1961*

Party	1949			1953			1957			1961
	Direct	List	Total	Direct	List	Total	Direct	List	Total	Direct	List	Total
CDU/CSU	115	24	139	172	71	243	194	76	270	156	86	242
SPD	96	35	131	45	106	151	46	123	169	91	99	190
FDP	12	40	52	14	34	48	1	40	41	0	67	67
DP	5	12	17	10	5	15	6	11	17	0	0	0 <sup>a</sup>
BHE	—	—	—	0	27	27	0	0	0	—	—	—
ZP	0	10	10	1	2	3	0	0	0 <sup>b</sup>	—	—	—
BP	11	6	17	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
DRP	0	5	5	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
SSW	0	1	1	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
KPD	0	15	15	0	0	0	—	—	—	—	—	—
WAV	0	12	12	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Other	3	0	3	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Total <sup>c,d</sup>	242	160	402	242	245	487	247	250	497	247	252	499

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18.

<sup>a</sup> GDP.<sup>b</sup> FU.<sup>c</sup> Does not include the members from Berlin.<sup>d</sup> The intended divisions between Direct Seats and List Seats for the Federal Republic were 60/40 per cent in 1949 and 50/50 per cent in the other elections. List Seats beyond 40 per cent or 50 per cent constitute Ueberhangsmandate.

The great reduction in running and seated parties between 1949 and 1961 has already been noted. A multi-party system, similar to that of Weimar, or another one-party system, definitely do not appear as real possibilities at this point. The question is essentially whether a two- or a three-party system, will emerge; and the party in doubt is the FDP.

To test this question, Table XIII gives the

TABLE XIII. PERCENTAGES OF POPULAR VOTES (Zweitstimmen) AND SEATS IN THE BUNDESTAG, 1949-1961,* COMBINED FOR TWO MAJOR PARTIES AND FOR THREE MAJOR PARTIES

Year	CDU/CSU+SPD		CDU/CSU+SPD+FDP
	Popular Vote %	Seats in Bundestag %	Popular Vote %	Seats in Bundestag %
1949	60.2	67.2	72.1	80.1
1953	74.0	80.9	83.5	90.7
1957	81.6	88.3	89.3	96.5
1961	81.6	86.6	94.4	100.0

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18. Computations do not include the members from Berlin.

percentage of popular votes and seats alternatively for the CDU/CSU plus SPD and the CDU/CSU plus SPD plus FDP. We can see immediately that the percentages have increased steadily both in the two- and in the three-party category. On the federal level the two-party combination now holds 81.6 per cent of the popular vote and 86.6 per cent of the seats. The three-party combination, by contrast, now holds 94.4 per cent of the popular vote and, of course, all the seats. This leads us to classify the current situation as a three party system. It seems unwarranted to call it a two-party system when the two parties receive only 81.6 per cent of the vote, for the possibility of a clear majority and alternation in office seems remote with such a division of the vote.

Very similar conditions prevail in each of the states. (See Table XIV.) Selecting 90 per cent of the popular vote as an arbitrary dividing line between sufficient and insufficient ground for ascribing the whole domain to a certain number of parties, we find that three parties are required in each of them. We also find a reduction in the number of parties parallel to that at the federal level.

Whether the current three-party system has reached stability or instead will give way to a two-party system depends largely on the future of the FDP. And the future of the FDP would

TABLE XIV. THE PARTY SYSTEMS OF THE STATES:
NUMBER OF PARTIES NECESSARY TO ACCU-MULATE 90 PER CENT OF THE POPULAR VOTE (Zweitstimme) IN BUNDESTAG
ELECTIONS, 1949-1961*

State	Number of parties necessary to accumulate 90% or more
	1949	1953	1957	1961
Schleswig-Holstein	7	5	4	3
Hamburg	5	4	3	3
Niedersachsen	7	5	4	3
Bremen	6	5	3	3
Nordrhein-Westfalen	5	4	3	3
Hessen	5	4	4	3
Rheinland-Pfalz	3	3	3	3
Baden-Wuerttemberg	7	4	3	3
Bayern	5	5	3	3
Saarland	—	—	3	3

* Bundesamt: VIII/5/14; VIII/5/18.

seem to depend on at least two things: the source of its 1961 increment and the reaction of the electorate to the FDP's post-election behavior. On this second score, to date, the most important and consequential political act of the FDP has been its entrance into a coalition with the CDU/CSU under Adenauer, discussed below. The source of the FDP's gains will be dealt with elsewhere.

The most significant phenomena of the German party system appear to be the de-emphasizing of ideology, noted above, and the widening of the support bases of the three major parties. The CDU/CSU, while by no means a complete cross-section of the German people, has nevertheless become a genuine Volkspartei drawing support from a great variety of social groups. The SPD, by contrast, has a long history as a class-party; yet in recent years it seems to have succeeded in widening its base. The party most narrowly based still is the FDP. While its support is not monolithic—it rather varies with region—it is predominantly middle class. Nevertheless, there is no evidence at present that the FDP will inevitably suffer the fate of the other small parties.<sup>19</sup> The German party system seems to have stabilized at its present equilibrium. Assertions concerning the emergence of a two-party system are at this time unwarranted.

POSTSCRIPT: AFTER THE ELECTION

It became readily apparent when the votes

<sup>19</sup> For a contrary view see Peter Merkl, "Equilibrium, Structure of Interests, and Leadership: Adenauer's Survival as Chancellor," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (September 1962), pp. 634-650.

were counted that the election had really decided nothing except that the CDU/CSU had lost its absolute majority in the Bundestag. If the election meant the end of the Adenauer era, the chancellor himself refused to depart: two days after the election he announced that he wished to remain as chancellor. Later, he agreed not to stay the entire four years. The next seven weeks were spent determining the terms under which the FDP would enter a coalition with the CDU/CSU, and once again the chancellor exhibited his political skill in a game of nerves which deserves brief attention.<sup>20</sup>

Prior to the vote, Mende had expressed his opposition to serving under Adenauer, and some of his statements were interpreted as indicating an unwillingness on the part of the FDP as a whole to serve under the old CDU/CSU leader. Mende had listed several CDU/CSU leaders who were acceptable, of whom Erhard was the favorite. The FDP faced difficult decisions. There was widespread feeling that to serve under Adenauer would be a betrayal of many of the party's supporters; yet, the alternatives of either joining with the SPD or seeing the CDU/CSU and SPD come to terms were equally repugnant. The FDP also risked destroying its newly found internal unity should an open struggle take place; on the other hand, it feared the results of a coalition with the CDU, which had swallowed up several previous coalition partners. Finally, a remaining solution, a minority CDU government existing by the sufferance of the FDP, was ruled out by Federal President Luebke, who announced that Germany must have a strong government during the crisis over Berlin.

The SPD continued with its pre-election plea for an all-party government during the emergency period. Talks were held between Brandt and Mende, but given the difference in clientele and outlook between the two parties, an SPD-FDP coalition would have been an unholy alliance. However, a CDU/CSU-SPD coalition, though unlikely, was not completely unthinkable; and when a CDU/CSU spokesman reminded the FDP that the CDU/CSU could sit down with the SPD and work out a satisfactory arrangement "in three hours," he was only saying publicly what the FDP already knew and feared. And the SPD did not allay this fear when its spokesmen stated that while an all-party coalition was preferable, an SPD-CDU/CSU government, even under Adenauer, was not beyond contemplation.

Attempts to alter Adenauer's decision to remain in office were unrewarding. Several CDU/CSU backbenchers spoke out politely against his continuance. Party leaders such as Strauss, Erhard, and Gerstenmaier said nothing in public, although they were known to oppose his candidacy. An unconvincing plan, which appeared in an FDP journal, to elevate Adenauer to a new governing council separate from the present institutional structure was stillborn. In the face of Adenauer's determination and the absence of effective opposition from within the CDU/CSU, the FDP found itself without acceptable alternatives to serving in a coalition under Adenauer. This they accepted, but only after the impasse caused by their demand that Von Brentano be replaced as foreign minister had been broken by his supposedly self-willed resignation, for the chancellor had remained firm; indeed, the FDP charge against Von Brentano was that he was a yes-man, but his replacement, Gerhard Schröder, was even closer to Adenauer.

<sup>20</sup> For a more extensive analysis of the process of forming the coalition see ibid.

The FDP insisted upon a formal coalition agreement which stated the terms upon which the cooperation of the two parties would be based.<sup>21</sup> It provided for a coalition committee, composed of the two top parliamentary leaders of the partners plus the whips, to meet weekly to work out common parliamentary programs and so avoid conflict on the floor of the Bundestag. The agreement also stated that Adenauer would not remain chancellor for the full four years.

Thus on November 7, 1961, after several weeks during which Adenauer exhibited little manipulative skill, the Bundestag elected him chancellor on the first ballot, giving him 258,499 Bundestag votes. There were 206 votes against him, 26 abstentions, and 9 members absent. Hence, Adenauer failed to receive 51 of the 309 votes of the coalition.

In the distribution of cabinet positions, the FDP received five of twenty—those of justice, finance, expellees and refugees, federal property, and economic cooperation. Mende did not take a position in the cabinet, nor did he receive the chairmanship of the Bundestag foreign affairs committee which he had desired. Moreover, the FDP plan for the appointment of a state-secretary in each ministry, from a party different from that of the minister, was rejected by the CDU/CSU.

The chief difference between the pre-election and post-election cabinets is that the FDP secured five ministries. Another significant change was the shift in the foreign ministry. In addition, a woman was brought in to the cabinet for the first time, as minister of public health, a new cabinet post. The major issue of the campaign—the nature of the post-Adenauer era in German politics—remains unsettled by the election and its aftermath.

<sup>21</sup> Reprinted in Die Welt, October 21, 1961.

PRESIDENT SUKARNO AND THE COMMUNISTS: THE POLITICS OF DOMESTICATION

DONALD HINDLEY
Brandeis University

The Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) is today the largest communist party outside the Sino-Soviet bloc. In a country with a population of some 96 million, it claims today a membership of two million, and the communist mass organizations claim more than 11 million members. At the same time PKI is well represented in parliament and the several high-level councils appointed by Sukarno to render advice to the government. The deputy governors of three of the four provinces in Java are communists, and as of March 9, 1962 the two main Party leaders acquired quasi-cabinet status. Yet the possibility is remote that PKI may achieve power in Indonesia in the foreseeable future. My purpose here is an analysis of the Party's place in Indonesian politics that results in this forecast.

On March 14, 1957 Sukarno declared the whole of Indonesia to be under a state of war and siege. The army commanders in their capacity as war administrators thereby received wide powers over political activities and the administration, powers they have not relinquished. Three weeks later, on April 4, Sukarno appointed himself, "citizen Sukarno," as formateur of an "extra-parliamentary business cabinet," an action declared illegal by many Indonesian politicians but one which pointedly demonstrated the increasingly important political role the president had taken. His nomination of the Djuanda cabinet on April 9 marked the end of a line of cabinets chosen as the result of bargaining between the political parties in parliament. From about the middle of 1958 Sukarno and the central army leadership have clearly dominated the government, a domination formalized by the decreed restoration of the 1945 constitution on July 5, 1959. Sukarno took over the post of prime minister, and officers of the armed forces were brought into his cabinet. [Army officers had urged him to assume greater power—and thereby responsibility—in 1956–1957, and it was also a major proponent of the return to the 1945 constitution, erecting a system that ensured him a considerably enhanced share in the conduct of affairs.]

The government coalition between Sukarno and the army has been marked by both cooperation and conflict. Cooperation, because each needs the other in order to rule: Sukarno has legitimate authority as the leader of the revolution, and the army has the naked power with which to maintain order. But because Sukarno lacks his own organized basis of support or power, he has sought allies to bolster his position in the governing coalition. His main ally is PKI.

I. THE ALLIANCE IS ESTABLISHED

Sukarno first sought the friendship of PKI at the end of 1955, and his alliance with the communists was firmly cemented by early 1957. Two basic factors explain why Sukarno sought this alliance: his struggle to achieve and maintain a dominant political position, and his wish "to complete the revolution".

In 1956, after more than ten years of parliamentary democracy in Indonesia, the parliamentary regime was crumbling. Parliament and the political parties had notably failed to create political stability or an expanding economy. Dutch capital still controlled much of the economic activity, and the Dutch still occupied West New Guinea. Among the politically conscious Indonesians a widespread belief developed that the parliamentary system—or "free-fight liberalism" as Sukarno was to call it—had failed and must be replaced. Sukarno sought to become the dominant political force in the country, and needed allies to help counterbalance the other emerging power, the army. He viewed the army with suspicion because many of its officers would have been glad to establish either an army-led government or an army-backed government in which his political opponents, Dr. Hatta and the Masjumi party, would probably have played a major role. The nationalist party, PNI, despite rare floutings of his wishes, was so dependent upon Sukarno for its mass support and for his backing in political maneuvers that he could count on it. But his own popularity and political skill combined with PNI support were still not enough to counter the army, Masjumi, and other opponents. Therefore Sukarno sought the alliance of PKI, not only the largest but also the best organized party (at that time, in mid-1957, PKI claimed over one million members, and more than seven million members in a network of mass organizations). PKI organization could be used to demonstrate to the army Sukarno's apparent great popularity, his legiti-mate position as father and leader of the revolution, by mobilizing enormous crowds for his speeches, by plastering the country with his slogans. Communist support would be of importance in parliament and the constituent assembly. And with PKI on his side, Sukarno could feel fairly certain that the army dare not attempt to oust him for fear of civil war.

Apart from seeking PKI's alliance for purely power reasons, Sukarno probably viewed PKI as the only party able and willing to assist him toward his major policy goal, "the completion of the revolution." What he means by this is somewhat nebulous, but it includes maintaining the people in a state of nationalist fervor through mass actions toward the elimination of all imperialist (that is, Western) political, economic and cultural power in Indonesia. PKI, combining a vociferous anti-colonialism with size and efficient organization, is the only Indonesian party that can be of much assistance in Sukarno's revolutionary task.

From PKI's viewpoint, it was preferable that parliamentary democracy continue and the extra-parliamentary forces remain relatively insignificant. For a time, during the second Ali Sastroamidjojo cabinet of March 1956 to April 1957, the PKI leaders attempted to bolster the crumbling parliamentary system, but once it was obvious that the regime would be drastically overhauled anyway, they accepted Sukarno's proffered hand. Within the army, voices advocated the abolition of all parties, and prominent officers, both in the central command and in the regions, were outspokenly anti-communist. PKI was not yet strong enough to make its own bid for power, and the only person or political force capable of preventing an army-led or army-backed anti-communist government was Sukarno. Consequently the Sukarno-PKI alliance was established.

II. COMMUNIST EXPECTATIONS AND GAINS

The main purpose of the alliance, for PKI, was the maintenance of Sukarno as the dominant force in or behind the government. In that position he was seen as likely to have protective and positive results of benefit to the Party. Dependent upon PKI, he could protect the Party from repression by the army—both the central army command and the regional commanders—and he could exert his influence to prevent PNI and the orthodox Moslem party (NU) from attacking the Party.

PKI probably hoped for four main positive results from the alliance. First, it expected to be able to exploit Sukarno's popularity, especially in Java, by closely identifying itself with him. Dangers of course attended such a use of his popularity. If the identification became too rooted, and he were then to become unpopular, the Party would suffer likewise (and it is to be noted that, anyway, Sukarno is not so popular in several regions, especially outside Java). Another danger in the identification, if Sukarno was built up or maintained in the eyes of many Party members as the great leader and father of the revolution, lay in the corresponding degree of control he might gain over the Party members. Identification with and praise of Sukarno might increase PKI's mass support, but might also reduce the PKI leaders' control over their supporters.

The second positive result PKI hoped for was leverage to exert pressure upon the present government to preserve the widest democratic freedoms—that is, to permit PKI and its mass organizations to continue to expand, to maintain a degree of parliamentary democracy in which political parties would still have a considerable role, and to permit PKI to train its members to an increasing "class consciousness" or militancy in preparation for a forceful communist take-over. A third possible benefit of the alliance might arise if Sukarno, in a dominant position in the government, should emphasize fervent nationalism to the neglect and detriment of economic stability or development. If this happened, then, with the retention of democratic freedoms, PKI would be able to exploit simultaneously the anti-colonial agitation and the inevitable dissatisfaction with the economic situation. In preparation for this eventuality, PKI announced in April 1957, when the Sukarno-appointed Djuanda government took office, and again in July 1959, when Sukarno himself became prime minister, that it would continue its policy of support for the government's popular measures, and criticism of its unpopular acts. Finally, PKI leaders alternately hoped and feared that the alliance would bring communist participation in the cabinet, which had been Sukarno's declared goal since the end of 1955. Through the control of ministries, PKI might gain significant control of the administrative apparatus and so make electoral victory or revolution unnecessary.

In the event, under the alliance with Sukarno, PKI has gained much. It is impossible to measure how far PKI's support has enabled Sukarno to maintain his position as the leading power in Indonesia and to push through his ideas and aims against those of his partners in the government, but communist support has certainly been a considerable factor. Partly because of unwavering communist support, Sukarno has been able to thwart efforts in 19 to form a government led by Hatta; he has been able to prevent the formation of an army-led government (if that is what a majority of officers have wanted, which is doubtful) or an army-dominated government; he has been able to ban the two parties most opposed to himself and PKI and most oriented to efficient administration and economic development (Masjumi and PSI); and he has ensured the military defeat of the anti-Sukarno and anti-communist PRRI-Permesta rebellion that broke out in February 1958.

As to the protective expectations from the alliance, Sukarno has prevented the army from banning or severely repressing PKI and its mass organizations. Among his more public interventions on their behalf, he insisted against army opposition that the PKI sixth national congress of September 1959 be held (and he himself delivered a friendly speech to the congress); he frustrated army-inspired attempts in 1960 and 1961 to obtain the fusion of the communist trade union federation and youth association into tame, all-embracing organizations; and he insisted on the lifting of bans on PKI and its mass organizations imposed in August 1960 by army commanders in South Sumatra/Djambi, South Borneo, and South Celebes.

Sukarno, as expected, has ensured that PNI and NU pay at least lip service to the need for Nasakom (Nasionalis-Agama-Komunis, nationalist-religious-communist) unity in solving the nation's problems. During the second half of 1957, after local elections in Java had shown a rapid communist advance, particularly at the expense of PNI, several national and regional leaders of PNI and NU demanded an end to the alliance with PKI and proposed a new period of cooperation with Masjumi. Sukarno is reported to have exerted pressure on the national leaders of PNI and NU to stop such a move—which they did.<sup>1</sup>

PKI has been less successful in securing from the alliance what I have termed positive results. Certainly its close identification with Sukarno was a contributory factor in the increase in PKI's vote in Java from 5,477,707 to 7,514,197 between the parliamentary elections of September 1955 and the local and regional elections held from June to November 1957. PKI thus emerged as the largest Indonesian party in terms of a direct electoral following as well as in membership and control of mass organizations. Under Sukarno's protection, PKI and its mass organizations have been permitted to hold regular conferences and congresses, and they claim a considerable increase in their organizational network and in membership. For example, between July 1959 and October 1962 PKI claims to have increased its membership from 1½ millions to 2 millions, while the four major communist mass organizations claim an increase from 7.8 to over 11.0 millions.

As expected, Sukarno has emphasized fervent nationalism, especially the campaign to liberate West Irian, to the detriment of the domestic economy.<sup>2</sup> But, as will be seen below, the nationalist agitation and economic decline have not brought PKI the great benefits that were hoped for because Sukarno, in conjunction with the army, has removed most of the opportunities for PKI to exploit either. And if, on March 9, 1962, Sukarno gave the two PKI leaders Aidit and Lukman quasi-cabinet status, this may have proved an unwanted embarrassment for the Party, not the political lever that had been expected.

III. OBSTACLES TO COMMUNIST VICTORY

Today, after five years of the close alliance, PKI seems as far as, or further than, ever from winning power. Two basic and related reasons account for this: the strengthening and entrenchment of the army, and what I term the domestication of PKI.

The strengthening and entrenchment of the army has been a process that Sukarno has been unable to prevent, and one which his policies have indirectly encouraged. His insistence on the military defeat of the PRRI-Permesta rebellion improved the fighting ability of the army and strengthened the control of General Nasution, then army chief of staff, over what had been a loosely integrated national army. The West Irian campaign necessitated the enlargement and modernization of the armed forces; large purchases of modern equipment have been made, especially from the USSR, and the army now contains over 300,000 troops. Sukarno's declaration of a state of war and siege in March 1957, at the time when he was preparing to instal the Djuanda cabinet, conferred wide powers on the army over administration and political life—powers which the army has not relinquished. The Sukarno-inspired workers' seizure of all Dutch enterprises in December 1957 enabled the army to take over the administration of those enterprises in the name of order and production.<sup>3</sup> And Sukarno's restoration of the 1945 constitution in July 1959 and his implementation of "guided democracy" gave the army a legitimate and formal part in the government, whereas previously it had exerted influence from behind the scenes. Seven army officers received posts in the presidential cabinet appointed in July 1959, army officers received seats in the appointed parliament announced in June 1960 and in the local and regional councils appointed at the end of that year, and army officers have been appointed as governors of several provinces.

<sup>1</sup> Some leaders of PNI and NU, however, especially at the center, were and are ready to cooperate with PKI, and to keep criticism of PKI in check. This is because they see PKI as an ally in their struggle against Masjumi and PSI (until those parties were banned in August 1960), and also as an ally against the encroachments by both Sukarno and the army against the role and freedom of the parties and parliament.

<sup>2</sup> To give but two illustrations: in December 1957 all Dutch enterprises were seized, resulting in a drastic decline in production and efficiency so that they are now a financial liability; and since 1960 huge sums have been spent on modernizing and enlarging the armed forces in order to force the Dutch from West Irian. Inflation has accelerated, and severe shortages have occurred of basic commodities.

Time has been another factor in the strengthening of the army. General Nasution, though he has lately given up the post of army chief of staff, has retained the Ministry of Defense, with a protégé as chief of staff. Counting both posts, he has been in command of the army continuously since October 1955. He has had the interval since then to weed out from important positions the officers he considers less than trustworthy.

As for the domestication of PKI, Sukarno has eradicated Masjumi and PSI, the only two parties that dared to oppose him openly and consistently, and he has successfully tamed the remaining political parties, including PKI. Within the other major partner in the government, the army, many officers apparently would like to be rid of all political parties, and especially PKI. In this, they have been thwarted by Sukarno, who needs the parties in his power struggle with the army. But the army has been Sukarno's eager partner in the policy of domesticating the parties, especially PKI, the greatest potential threat to the present ruling groups.

<sup>3</sup> The army officers placed in charge of the former Dutch enterprises were later required to relinquish formally their positions in the army. However they still retain their army titles and maintain close contact with the army.

IV. DOMESTICATION

Domestication in the context of Sukarno's policy towards PKI contains two main elements. One is the protection of PKI and its mass organizations from above-ground extinction; that is, the preservation of their legality and of at least a limited freedom of overt activities. The other is the creation of effective blocks to PKI's possible assumption of power, so that the Party provides Sukarno with support but cannot exploit the alliance towards its own major goal, which is governmental power. Such a policy is only possible if one of the two allies wields greater power or is considerably shrewder than the other. On the record so far, Sukarno is both; he is not only an extremely able politician, but as the leading force in a governmental coalition he can use the government's coercive powers to compel PKI to either accept the situation or break the alliance. It is not his interest to coerce PKI too far, for if the alliance were broken his own position vis-à-vis the army would be greatly weakened; therefore the process of domestication has been gradual, and PKI and its mass organizations have been allowed to expand. On the other hand, PKI has felt obliged to accept the risks of domestication because a break with Sukarno would bring down severe governmental repression, which PKI could hardly survive.

At the beginning of the alliance, there were broadly four ways by which PKI might conceivably have been able to achieve power. The first was infiltration of the armed forces and the bureaucracy. The second was by parliamentary means, by skilful use of the then existing parliamentary system in which the cabinet was responsible to parliament. Through electoral and therefore parliamentary strength, PKI might have aspired to form its own government, or might have secured communist inclusion in a coalition government as the first step towards the seizure of power. The third was the development of existing cadres and members into a force capable of seizing power. And the fourth was by acclamation; that is, the politically conscious Indonesians might have turned to PKI as the only group capable and worthy of ruling, after all other groups had demonstrated their inability to solve the major problems facing Indonesia. These alternative possibilities are worth examining in turn.

Infiltration. As a means of achieving power, infiltration could be ruled out as a practical possibility in 1957, and the same applies today. PKI has gained very little support among the officers of the armed forces, and it appears that since 1956 General Nasution has gradually removed the few pro-communist army officers from positions of influence. It also appears that the officers retain the respect and obedience of the lower ranks. The Indonesian bureaucracy, too, like white-collar groups in general, has proved surprisingly resistant to PKI so that the Party commands little support among public servants in strategic positions. Since January 1948 no communist has had control of a ministry. The two PKI members of the cabinet, appointed on March 9, 1962, have been given positions without portfolio; they do not sit in the regular meetings of cabinet; and their status is that of advisers on economic matters and on measures for the liberation of West Irian.

Parliamentary success. In the September 1955 elections for parliament, PKI emerged as the fourth party, with 6.2 million votes or 16.4 per cent of the total. In the local and regional elections held in Java in the second half of 1957, PKI received 27.4 per cent of the votes. Communist leaders, perhaps purposely understating their strength lest alarm provoke counter-measures, estimated they would receive about 25 per cent of the votes in the second national parliamentary elections scheduled for September 1959. On such a showing, if these elections had been held and if the parliamentary system had been maintained, PKI would have emerged as the largest or second largest party in parliament and so would have been in a strong bargaining position in the formation of a cabinet, if it were settled by the usual processes of inter-party bargaining. However, this prospect has been completely removed. In September 1958 the government announced that the 1959 elections would be postponed for one year, and when that time was up they were postponed again. They were put off once more in 1962. Meanwhile, parliament is now appointed and its power destroyed.

On July 5, 1959, President Sukarno decreed the restoration of the 1945 constitution—an action that PKI very reluctantly accepted after the elected constituent assembly had failed to reach an agreement on a new constitution.<sup>4</sup> Under the 1945 constitution the cabinet is chosen by the president and is not responsible to parliament. Furthermore, Sukarno has taken advantage of the loose wording of that constitution to rule largely by decree, and so bypass parliament. When parliament from December 1959 to March 1960 demanded at least control of the budget, Sukarno decreed its dissolution and in June 1960 appointed a new one. He has made quite clear that he will tolerate neither opposition nor major criticism from parliament, nor from the several advisory councils that he has appointed since July 1959. At the end of 1960, Sukarno also "re-tooled" the local and regional councils, and replaced them by appointed bodies. Their executive committees, too, are now nominated by the government, as are the regional and local district heads.

In short, it must have been fairly clear to the PKI leaders by 1955 at the latest that they had little hope of winning power through the infiltration of the army and the bureaucracy. The army's direct involvement in government from late 1956 onwards, followed by the re-enactment of the 1945 constitution, Sukarno's rapid removal of parliament's limited powers under that constitution and the increasingly authoritarian nature of the regime, all showed that the parliamentary road to power was also closed. Hence, shortly after Sukarno's assumption of the office of prime minister in July 1959, only two ways were left by which PKI might aspire to power: the development of the existing or enlarged support into a force capable of seizing power (by the use or threat of force), and the elevation of the Party by acclamation.

Developing the cadres. By the middle of 1957, as already noted, PKI claimed a membership of over 1 million, while the communist mass organizations claimed about 7½ millions.<sup>5</sup> If these members or even a small proportion of them could have been trained to a higher level of revolutionary discipline and class consciousness, then the PKI leaders might have had at their disposal a force capable of capturing power even against the forceful opposition of the non-communists. But the PKI leaders have been unable to develop such a force from their mass support for two basic reasons: one that may be called built-in obstacles, and the other, preventive government action.

Built-in obstacles. Few members of the Indonesian political elite, armed forces or bureaucracy, have been attracted to communism.<sup>6</sup> The PKI leaders have therefore been forced to seek and build support among the poorer segments of society: the peasants, the workers and the "petty bourgeoisie." In Indonesia, however, and especially in Java where for a complex of reasons PKI found the readiest support, the poorer people are essentially passive in face of the wealthier and ruling groups, and even in face of the problems which press most directly upon them. Partly as a result of this passive nature, and of the overwhelming superiority in power (that is, ability to coerce and repress) of the non-communist ruling groups, the Aidit leadership of PKI in late 1951 and early 1952 decided that large numerical support was essential if PKI was to win power from the incumbent ruling groups.<sup>7</sup> Consequently the leadership formulated a broad national united-front strategy capable of amassing the necessary support.<sup>8</sup> The two essential elements of this strategy were painstaking but "limit-conscious" work among the poorer social groups, and friendship toward the internal non-communist political groups. These two elements were mutually dependent. Without the image of PKI as patriotic, sympathetic to religion, opposed to the use of force in the achievement of its goals, attached to democracy, moderate in demands, friendly toward the non-communist political forces, and generally responsible in the exercise of the role of non-governing party, the Party could have won neither the sympathy of the broad masses of poorer people, nor the toleration of ruling groups toward PKI's organizational activities.

<sup>4</sup> For PKI's public explanation of how it was forced by political circumstances to agree to the restoration of the 1945 constitution, see Sakirman, "Apa arti sokongan PKI kepada UUD 1945 dan Demokrasi terpimpin," Part II, Bintang Merah, July-August 1960, pp. 320-28.

<sup>5</sup> The membership claims of the main communist mass organizations in the latter half of 1957 were: Sobsi (trade union federation), 2.7 millions; BTI (peasants' association), 3.0 millions; Pemuda Rakjat (youth), 800,000; Gerwani (women), 671,000; and PPDI (village officials), 350,000.

Thus, since early in 1952 PKI has increased its membership from under 8,000 to about 2 millions, and has educated its new and old members in the strategy of the broad national united front. Typical slogans devised by the Aidit leadership for Party members have been "national interest above class and Party interests," "national unity above all else," and "the basic contradiction is between the people and imperialism." Alliance has been sought with the non-communist political groups, from Sukarno through PNI to the conservative Moslem NU, and with social groups ranging from the "national bourgeoisie" through the devout Moslems, even to the "patriotic landlords." That is, under the Aidit strategy, Party members and cadres have not been educated to militant action against internal enemies, with some exceptions such as the regionalist councils established in 1956 and 1957.

Despite the great change in the Indonesian political situation during and since 1956 and 1957, PKI has not altered its basic strategy; it has adapted the strategy to the new situation. To alter the strategy would have been very difficult. First, a switch to a policy of hostility to "class enemies" would have alienated a large part of the mass support which is unprepared for such hostility. Second, a radical switch would probably have caused a major division among Party cadres and members, where since 1951 there had been a unity unequalled in any other major communist party. And third, a switch could have brought down severe government repression, as it had in September 1948, repression for which the Party was unprepared after many years of the Aidit strategy. In other words, the PKI leaders were and are faced with a dilemma: their strategy has certainly achieved mass support, but at the same time it has created a party incapable of seizing power, apart from winning it by the parliamentary road, a road no other fraternal party has yet traversed successfully.

Preventive measures. The government has been careful to restrict the opportunity for PKI and its mass organizations to develop militancy among their members. Two broad categories of restrictions have been applied: general threats, and specific controls.

Two government laws enacted in 1960 posed a legal threat to PKI's above-ground existence. The first, adopted on January 12, 1960, is <sup>6</sup> PKI, founded on May 23, 1920, is the oldest communist party in Asia. Dutch repression, which became severe after the communist rebellion of 1926-1927, prevented it from gaining wide support among the increasing group of politically conscious Indonesians. From 1927 to the end of World War II, PKI virtually ceased to exist. During the Indonesian revolution, which broke out in August 1945, PKI did succeed in attracting the support of a small section of the political elite and the revolutionary armed forces. But due to the mis-timed communist rebellion at Madiun in September 1948, many of the more prominent communists were shot, most of the pro-communist elements in the armed forces were weeded out, and PKI for several years suffered from an anti-patriotic stigma.

<sup>7</sup> Only through mass support could PKI build a large body of competent cadres, win a significant position in parliament (with the possibilities for political maneuver that this would bring), or develop a power basis capable of ousting the ruling groups if they opposed PKI by force.

<sup>8</sup> For a study of the formulation and implementation of this strategy see Donald Hindley, "The Communist Party of Indonesia, 1951-1961: a decade of the Aidit leadership," Ph.D. thesis, Australian National University, 1961.

called "Conditions and Simplification of the Party System." Under this law political parties must accept and defend the 1945 constitution and Pantjasila,<sup>9</sup> and must use peaceful and democratic methods to achieve their political goals; political parties may receive assistance from abroad only with the consent of the government; the president may order an investigation into the administration, finances and wealth of any party; and the president may dissolve any party if its program is aimed at undermining the principles and objectives of state policy, or if it has not officially condemned party members who have acted in support of a rebellion. By this law PKI could be banned at any time the government so decided, and a precedent for dissolution was set with the banning of Masjumi and PSI in August 1960. In order to stay within the law, PKI has altered its constitution to include adherence to Pantjasila and a gotong-rojong (mutual help) democracy; but a party could still be banned which aims at communism, instead of socialism-on-the-Indonesian-plan, and which contends that the communist Madiun rebellion of 1948 was a patriotic act of self-defence.

Later in 1960, all parties were required by law to present the government with a list of their branches and of all members. The address, date of entry to the party, and position in the party were required for every member. PKI handed in its list on February 4, 1961.

By these two laws, the government holds the threat of banning over PKI's head, while the government's possession of details of every Party member must discourage members from action in defiance of the authorities.

As has been seen, Sukarno has protected the legal existence of PKI, and has thwarted army-inspired efforts to obtain the merger of the communist-led trade union federation and youth organization into national, all-embracing, government-controlled organizations. PKI has lost, however, one very important constituent unit, Perbepsi, the para-military veterans' association which by December 1957 was claiming 300,000 members. Because Perbepsi had the makings of a formidable force at PKI's command, it is possible that Sukarno acquiesced in—and there is no evidence that he opposed—the army's efforts to fuse all veterans' organizations into an army-led veterans' legion. This process of fusion was begun in December 1956 and completed by August 1959, to PKI's considerable chagrin. But with this exception, PKI and its main mass organizations have been protected by Sukarno.<sup>10</sup> On the other hand, with the ready assistance of the army, he has sought to prevent the development of the communist mass support into a militant force capable of disputing for power. The two ways by which the PKI leaders might heighten the revolutionary discipline and militancy of their followers are by the dissemination of news and ideas, and by practical training of cadres and members in militant actions. The government has fairly effectively blocked both these ways.

The main channels open to PKI for the dissemination of news and ideas are the schools and courses of the Party and its mass organizations, and publications. The schools and courses appear to have been developed since 1957, and now form a nation-wide network. They have suffered little interference from the government, except, of course, during the few months when all party activities have been banned and in the regions where local army commanders have placed temporary bans on all activities of PKI and its mass organizations.<sup>11</sup> However, the political content of the education given is set by the central Party leadership, and it consists of an enunciation and justification of the broad national united front. This means that it emphasizes the imperialist rather than the internal enemies, alliance with and moderation toward the "national bourgeoisie" (that is, ruling groups) and religion and rich peasants and "patriotic landlords," rather than hostility and militancy in face of them. Undoubtedly the authorities would take severe measures if the schools and courses were to teach class antagonisms.

In the realm of publication, PKI and its mass organizations have been dealt with severely. In October 1960, the central war <sup>10</sup> In 1961, Sukarno also forced the merger of all scout and pioneer associations, including PKI's, into a national association with himself as chief scout.

<sup>11</sup> All political activity was banned from June 4 to August 1, 1959, and from September 13 to December 1, 1960. In the last ten days of August 1960, temporary bans on all activities of PKI and its mass organizations were imposed by the regional army commanders in South Borneo, South Sumatra/Djambi, and South Celebes. Due to direct intervention by Sukarno the bans in the last two regions were lifted on December 1, 1960, but that in South Borneo was lifted only on August 28, 1961.

<sup>9</sup> Pantjasila, or the five principles, are the guiding principles of the Indonesian nation enunciated by Sukarno in June 1945. They are humanism, nationalism, democracy, social justice, and belief in God the Almighty.

administration, of which Sukarno is supreme administrator, refused permits to all seven periodicals published under the auspices of the PKI central committee.<sup>12</sup> At the same time, the permit of the thrice-monthly periodical of Sobsi, the communist trade union federation, was indefinitely suspended. The only regular publication left to the central committee is the daily newspaper "Harian Rakjat," whose circulation was cut arbitrarily from 60,000 to 44,000 in June 1960 at a time when the government reduced newsprint to all newspapers. The only periodicals apparently left to the mass organizations are BTI's "Suara Tani" (circulation 5,000), BTI's "Pembangunan Desa" (5,000) Gerwani's "Api Kartini" (2,500), and the fortnightly "Zaman Baru" (5,000) of the communist cultural association Lekra. A few regional publications are permitted, but their circulation is very restricted.

Control of the contents of publications is, of course, far more important than the control of numbers. The decree of March 14, 1957, placing Indonesia under a state of war and siege, and making the army commanders war administrators, has since been modified, but in effect the army commanders retain wide powers of control and supervision over political activities. One power widely used is that of censorship. News and opinions disliked by the army and other sections of the government have been suppressed, and newspapers have suffered frequent suspension for arousing the displeasure of the ruling groups. For example, "Harian Rakjat" was suspended for a total of 65 days in the period from January to September 1960 inclusive. In the same year, the communist news agency, INPS, was suspended for several months. Also, temporary but lengthy bans on the circulation of "Harian Rakjat" have been imposed by some regional commanders, notably in South Sumatra and Nusatenggara.

Sukarno intervened to protect "Harian Rakjat" from complete closure, but as part of his policy of taming the parties he has brought all newspapers under tight government control. On February 15, 1960 a decree stated that newsprint would be withheld from any newspaper or periodical which failed to develop public opinion or national culture along lines he laid down. On October 12 of that year, publishers were told that their newspapers and periodicals must support and defend the principles of state he enunciated, assist in the abolition of liberalism, imperialism and separatism, promote a free and independent foreign policy, remain aloof from the Cold War, and promote the Indonesian personality. Several non-communist newspapers have been closed. During 1961 all private printing shops were brought under direct government supervision, as were all duplicating machines, to prevent their clandestine political use.

In short, Sukarno and the army have successfully controlled the press in Indonesia, including the communist press, so that it supports the government on all major issues, and dares utter no more than the most minor criticisms. The communists have been even more cautious in their publications than some non-communists because they know that the army is ready to suspend their now limited publications on the slightest excuse.

Practical training. As we have noted, the Aidit leadership of PKI has been restrained in the encouragement and promotion of militant action by its mass support in part because the Indonesian poorer classes are unprepared for such action, and in part because the communists require the government's toleration of their organizational activities. However, PKI and its mass organizations attempt to increase the political consciousness and militancy of their supporters by stepping gradually from "small but successful" actions (such as a demand for the distribution of work clothes in a factory, or for payment for peasant sharecroppers who carry the landlords' share from the fields) to the point where workers dare openly oppose employers, peasants oppose landlords, and both oppose the authorities. This practical training in actions of increasing scope is of supreme importance in Indonesia, and especially in Java where most PKI support lies, because the lower social strata have no tradition of nor experience in such actions. The lower social strata are, in general, devoid of any belief in the short- or long-term efficacy of their own action in removing social and economic inequalities. It is even true that, in general, the Indonesian poor still need much convincing that inequalities are unjust and removable, and not predestined and unchangeable by man. The Indonesian ruling groups, including Sukarno, the army, and the civil service, have been prompt to prevent their poorer compatriots from acquiring practical experience in the efficacy of united action in the general political, the labor and the peasant fields.

<sup>12</sup> These seven were: Bintang Merah (the monthly ideological journal), Kehidupan Partai (a monthly with practical information for cadres), Ilmu Marxis (containing news of scientific and cultural developments in the countries of the Sino-Soviet bloc), Mimbar Komunis (an Indonesian version of World Marxist Review), PKI dan Perwakilan (a quarterly containing news of PKI activities in parliament and the local and regional councils), Ekonomi dan Masyarakat (a quarterly with articles on economic and financial matters), and Review of Indonesia (an English-language monthly of news on the whole "progressive" movement in Indonesia).

PKI had also hoped, as earlier noted, that the maintenance of Sukarno as the leading force in the government would lead to a government emphasis on anti-colonial agitation and to the neglect of the economy. This has happened, but PKI has been prevented from unduly exploiting either nationalist feeling or popular dissatisfaction with the deteriorating economic situation. Whatever the legal powers held by the central war administration and the regional war administrators over the activities of the political parties, the mass organizations, and the populace in general, in practice the administrators take the power to deal more or less severely with activities deemed detrimental to the government as a whole, or to its various main components.

At the end of 1959 and in January 1960, the communists had a ready popular grievance to exploit in the economic situation. Inflation was intense and wages lagged far behind. Consequently demonstrations were held throughout Indonesia, and the government was inundated with delegations, petitions, letters and telegrams demanding (not requesting) price cuts and wage increases—until General Nasution ordered strict measures against them. Since then the communists have not used the public as a means of pressing the government, complaints being confined to requests by usually muted statements, telegrams and deputations.

Even on anti-colonial matters the government has exercised strict control over communist activities. On February 10, 1958 the army established the National Front for the Liberation of West Irian, to channel and control all activities in this campaign, and so prevent PKI from gaining advantage from it. At present the recently formed National Front seems to be playing this role. And where the communists in a frenzy of anti-colonial zeal have acted independently, the authorities have not hesitated to react severely.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>13</sup> A typical incident occurred in Malang on July 4, 1961, when communist-led workers seized control of the Belgian Faroka cigarette factory in protest against alleged Belgian intervention in the Congo. The army immediately arrested the ring-leaders, and put them on trial. In North Sumatra the army commander threatened severe action against anyone attempting to disrupt production on the Belgian-owned estates.

Labor agitation has been peremptorily eradicated. In August 1957 strikes were banned in all "vital" enterprises, the definition of "vital" being gradually widened to cover virtually all industries. Strikes have ceased, and many communist trade union cadres have been imprisoned for long terms for merely discussing with workers the possibility of strikes. Even May Day ceremonies have been controlled. As of May Day 1958, the authorities have organized joint rallies at which speeches are given by representatives of the army, the Department of Labor, and the various trade union federations. The speeches of the trade union representatives must be presented to the authorities for prior clearance.

In the rural areas, the only significant group of peasants still willing to take militant action in defense of their interests are the squatters who occupied estate and forestry lands during the Japanese occupation and the revolution. Since the demise of parliamentary democracy, the authorities have taken firm and often forceful action against squatters protesting eviction. The latest example occurred in Kediri, East Java, in November 1961 when several of them were shot down.<sup>14</sup> Official reprisals have greatly reduced the incidence of militant squatter actions which were, anyway, rare events in the broad sea of peasant passivity.

Embourgeoisement. Thus it appears that PKI is effectively obstructed in its efforts to create a militant force from its mass support. Firm action by the authorities to prevent the first steps in militant experience seem to have successfully prevented the step by step acquisition of experience hoped for by the Aidit leadership. Worse still for PKI, a decline in the revolutionary morale of some of the important cadres seems to have set in simultaneously. In fact, government policy, with Sukarno as its chief proponent, is aimed deliberately to reduce or remove it. There are two facets to this process, the one more obvious, the other more complex.

The more obvious aspect is the inevitable general discouragement among cadres because of the overall situation in which PKI finds itself. Despite its continued legal existence, there are severe restrictions on the activities of the Party and its mass organizations; there is enforced servile praise of Sukarno—who in private is heartily disliked by the cadres; the non-communist forces appear to be consolidating their hold on power and to be creating a “semi-fascist” regime; and the Party is at best marking time in its own march to power.

<sup>14</sup> Typically, as a result of the incident in Kediri, the government suspended the activities of all major Communist mass organizations throughout the entire Residency of Kediri from November 21, 1961 to September 11, 1962. Prominent cadres were arrested and placed on trial, including the BTI secretary for East Java.

The other facet of the decline in revolutionary morale is the embourgeoisement of the cadres. A number of communist cadres apparently are finding sufficient satisfaction of their material and status ambitions so that they have lost or are losing the will to overthrow the existing socio-political order—and under present and foreseeable circumstances that order will have to be forcibly destroyed if PKI is to win power.

In the September 1955 general elections, PKI won 16.4 per cent of the total votes, as noted above, and 39 seats in the parliament that met for the first time in March 1956. Local and regional councils were established in 1956 on the basis of these election results.<sup>15</sup> Between June and November 1957, local elections were held throughout Java, PKI increasing its vote compared with September 1955 by 37.2 per cent and the number of communist councillors to almost 1,000. At lower levels, PKI has succeeded in placing its members and sympathizers into such positions as village head. Javanese society, particularly, is extremely status-conscious; the status (and income) deriving from membership in parliament, councils and the body of village officials may be for many a fully acceptable substitute for power.<sup>16</sup> Thus for many cadres, coming from the poorer segments of society, PKI and the mass organizations have provided them directly (through positions in the extensive communist organizational network) or indirectly with prestigious and materially secure positions—but within the framework of the existing order.

In March 1960, Sukarno dissolved the elected parliament and appointed a new one. Toward the end of the year, the local and regional councils were also “re-tooled.” The heads of the various levels of “autonomous districts” became the appointees of the government. Communists were given about 65 seats in the new parliament, and PKI and its mass organizations have been well represented in the appointed local and regional councils. Communist-supported—though independent-minded—appointees now fill the positions of deputy-governor in Djakarta Raja, West Java and Central Java, and communist members have been appointed mayors in Semarang, Surakarta, Tjirebon, and Surabaya. In the new, appointed high councils to advise the government, such as the National Advisory Council, the National Planning Council and the Provisional People’s Consultative Assembly, communists have received many positions.<sup>17</sup>

Some Western observers have been horrified by these appointments, and view them as evidence that Sukarno is either pro-Communist or blind to the danger of communism. In fact, they are further evidence that Sukarno is a shrewd political manipulator determined to maintain the present non-communist regime. The appointments help him in three ways. First, parliament, the Consultative Assembly, and the various councils, though shorn of any power, are still necessary for the president to legitimize his rule and to give an appearance that there is a democratic aspect of guided democracy. Second, by bringing PKI and other political parties into the various appointed bodies, but at the same time preventing those bodies from voicing criticism, he is forcing the parties to identify themselves with the government. This in turn makes it difficult for them to exploit popular discontent at the government’s inadequacies and failures, particularly in the economic field.<sup>18</sup> And third, he is giving communist cadres a vested interest in the regime. To have excluded communists from the appointed positions would have made many of them bitterly resentful of the loss of dignifying and materially rewarding positions; to include them, at the <sup>15</sup> In Java alone there are 4 province-level councils, and 99 city and kabupaten councils. There are usually about 75 members in the provincial councils, and 35 in the lower councils.

<sup>16</sup> PKI requires that any member who receives a remunerated position because of his membership in the Party must give the Party his wages and in return receive an honorarium. But, in general, communist members of parliament and councils, as well as cadres holding important positions in the Party and the mass organizations, are readily distinguishable from their colleagues by the better quality of their clothes and the expensive brands of their cigarettes.

<sup>17</sup> On March 9, 1962, Sukarno even appointed the top two PKI leaders, Aidit and Lukman as cabinet ministers. However, they have been given positions not only without power, but ones which identify them with the government in the field of activity in which the government is least successful and least popular, namely, economic affairs.

<sup>18</sup> So long as the West Irian liberation campaign was the center of government and national attention, the government found a ready “cause” for economic disorganization, and criticism of the economic situation necessarily smacked of anti-patriotism.

same time making the positions virtually powerless, may well reduce or remove their ardor as communists for the overthrow of the regime. If their personal situation is quite good, it is doubtful that they will risk the gamble of revolutionary action.

In short, Sukarno and the other groups in the government have prevented the communist leaders from educating and training their mass following in militant and successful actions, and, worse still, the revolutionary spearhead of cadres appears to have been somewhat blunted.

Power by acclamation. The possibility that PKI might achieve power "by acclamation" has never loomed large in Indonesia, and has grown no larger during the period of the alliance with Sukarno.<sup>19</sup> Certainly inflation continues at a rapid pace, and there are often grave shortages of basic consumer commodities. But the situation is very different from that in Weimar Germany or the last years of Kuomintang China. In the economic field, the Indonesian government manages to ensure a minimum of basic goods and occasional luxuries to the politically important sections—the armed forces, the public servants, the leading politicians, and the white-collar groups in general—while in the villages the tendency to share available wealth not too unequally among all villagers prevents the appearance of a truly impoverished rural proletariat. The administrative apparatus in the towns and countryside is unimpaired and, with the final collapse of the PRRI-Permesta rebellion in 1961 and of the Darul Islam in 1962, government control now reaches to all parts of Indonesia for the first time since independence. Of greatest importance, the non-communist ruling groups, and especially the army, are now more firmly entrenched in power, and more cohesive, than they were in 1956 or 1957. And the ruling groups are as sure of their ability to govern as they have ever been.

At the same time, PKI, unlike the Chinese Communist Party in the years before 1949, does not appear to be a strong alternative ruling group with a distinctive program. At present PKI submits to government control, and the obstacles to its victory (for example, the army, Islam, and the outer islands) are so great as to suggest that even if victory could be achieved it would be at the expense of a protracted civil war. Furthermore, the close identification of PKI with Sukarno and the government, with at the most minor proposals for improvements in the implementation of the government's program, does not suggest that the Party has a clearly distinctive program capable of solving the country's main problems.

In other words, the present ruling groups, who have a considerable edge on PKI in terms of power, have given no indication of turning to PKI as the only group able to govern well, especially as their hold on power is being strengthened.

V. CONCLUSION

When the Aidit leadership won control of PKI in January 1951, it took over a small, poorly organized party still licking its wounds after the failure of the Madiun rebellion. The more politically conscious and politically influential sections of Indonesian society had proved and continued to prove resistant to the Party's search for support. Consequently the Aidit leadership was forced to seek support among the masses, the workers, peasants and poorer sections of the "petty bourgeoisie," who were still by and large outside the political process. In order to win mass support it was necessary to present an image of PKI that would be both attractive to the poorer, generally passive, sections of society, and acceptable to significant sections of the non-communist ruling groups who controlled the means of repression and who could have made communist organizational work extremely difficult if not impossible. This image was one of PKI as fervently patriotic, sympathetic to religion, peaceful in pursuit of its goals, painstakingly solicitous of the small problems consciously felt by its potential supporters, moderate in demands, and self-effacing in the friendliness shown towards most other Indonesian political forces. With this image plus organizational skill and tenacity, PKI has become the largest non-governing communist party in the world, and important non-communist political forces have worked in alliance with PKI.

When the possibility of a parliamentary road to power was firmly blocked after 1955, PKI was forced to seek the alliance of one of the two emerging dominant powers in the country. PKI had mass support, but after many years of the broad national united-front policy, and in face of the overwhelming power superiority of the extra-parliamentary political forces, the Party was in no position to challenge the new ruling groups. Certainly the Party could have survived severe government repression, but it would have survived as a mere underground shadow of its former self. In these circumstances the Aidit leadership preferred to seek alliance with Sukarno, who was primarily concerned with his power struggle with the army. Undoubtedly the communist leaders hoped that the alliance would provide at least the protection of legality and the opportunity to continue the necessarily slow process of developing their mass support into a force capable of acting in a disciplined and revolutionary manner.

<sup>19</sup> The proposition that PKI might come to power peacefully, "called to power, as it were, by acclamation," is argued in Guy J. Pauker, "Current Communist Tactics in Indonesia," Asian Survey, Vol. 1 (May 1961), pp. 26-35.

Sukarno has understood and exploited the major dilemma faced by the PKI leaders. He knows that they can either earn his protection by rendering him support in his struggle with the army, but at the same time accept the risk of domestication; or they can break the alliance, which would very probably alienate much of the existing support, divide the cadres, and bring about a strongly anti-communist government. In the knowledge of this dilemma, Sukarno, with the willing assistance of the army, has implemented a policy of domestication. PKI and its mass organizations have been protected, but the foreseeable roads to power have been effectively blocked. Communists have been given no control of ministries or positions in the bureaucracy from which they could pad the administration with their own supporters; and the central army command has had a free hand to remove to powerless positions officers suspected of communist sympathies. Parliament and elections have been rendered ineffective as a means to power. At the same time the government has gradually applied restrictions, controls and supervision over communist activities with a view to preventing the PKI leaders from creating a disciplined, militant force capable of winning power against the opposition of the ruling groups. And the very process of domestication removes the possibility that PKI may be called to power by acclamation.

Because Sukarno would lose from a break in the alliance, government action at no time has been sufficient to force PKI to the point of making a break. The restrictions, controls and supervision have been applied piecemeal, the communist organizations have been permitted to expand, and communist cadres have been given prestigious and remunerative honors, so that the Aidit leadership and the majority of cadres can justify to themselves and their followers the continuation of the alliance. But nevertheless domestication has taken place.

Since 1951 PKI has been notably free of "heretics" largely because the broad national united-front strategy of the Aidit leadership appeared to be bringing the Party ever closer to power. Now, however, the alliance with the "national bourgeoisie" may be viewed as strengthening the ruling groups at the same time as blocking all possible roads to PKI's assumption of power. Unrest among the cadres over the continuation of the alliance is to be expected, and has been admitted by the Party leadership.<sup>20</sup> Now that the Chinese Communist Party, as one of the two competitors for leadership of the communist world, is also questioning the general usefulness of such an alliance, the dissenters within PKI can claim international authority in support of their dissent. In short, unless the internal and international situation alters radically to the advantage of PKI, the unity of the world's largest nongoverning communist party may soon be broken.

<sup>20</sup> See, for example, Sakirman, op. cit., pp. 328-40, 348; for indication of unrest, see D. N. Aidit, political report to the third PKI central committee plenum, Harian Rakjat, January 2, 1962; and Muhammad Samikidin, "Diatas segala-galanya: Persatuan!", Madjalah PKI Surabaya, February 1962, p. 12.

THE DIALECTICS OF SUPRANATIONAL UNIFICATION*

AMITAI ETZIONI
Columbia University

The application of several European Free Trade Association (EFTA) countries for membership in the Common Market (EEC) is viewed in Washington with great pleasure: the development of a United States of Europe is widely anticipated. Many observers have already calculated the combined manpower, economic resources, military power, etc. of the new union, and have pointed to the decisive advantage the United States, in coalition with this "third power," will have over the Soviet Union. Even the fact that the EEC and EFTA, if completely merged, would have 13 members is not considered unlucky: after all, the United States itself evolved out of a union of 13. It may however, be premature to prepare a celebration for the birthday of the United States of Europe. The following theoretical excursion suggests that loading the EEC with new members may well reduce it to the level of a glorified customs union rather than forward it to a political federation. Moreover, I shall argue, political communities often unify not by increasing their membership, but in a dialectic fashion: two or more groups form; they appear to be moving in opposite directions until each is well integrated, then they are "synthesized" (not merged) in a superior union. That is, they form one encompassing union without dissolving the bonds that held together the units that composed a group before the larger unification. The earlier autonomous groups become sub-groups in one union, adjusting to the new over-riding bond without being fused into one group that knows no internal divisions.

I. CONSENSUS FORMATION IN HETEROGENEOUS COMMUNITIES

The political process is one in which groups of citizens who differ in belief and interest work out a shared policy. The larger the number of participants in a unit, the greater the differences of belief and interest among them, the more difficult such a consensus becomes, to form or keep.<sup>1</sup> This holds for students in social relations laboratories, for executives in industrial conferences, and for politicians in national government. Increasing the number of participants in a group may cause it to become so heterogeneous that one of two things will happen: either the ability of the group to form consensus breaks down or a new structure for the formation of consensus is built. In this structure consensus is formed on two (or more) levels. On the first, participants are separated into sub-groups according to the relative affinity of their beliefs and interests. Each of these sub-groups forms consensus among its members, and sends a representative to the second level. The second level, composed of representatives only, establishes consensus for the whole unit. This differentiation can be extended to more than two levels.

Political systems differ in the way consensus formation is institutionalized. In some, the lower level is strictly informal, having no legal or organizational status, like the blocs in the United Nations. The recent Russian proposals, commonly referred to as the "troika" system, can be viewed as a suggestion to institutionalize a two-level structure in the UN. Three blocs would be recognized—a Communist, a Western, and a Neutral one. This would require each of the blocs to form consensus internally first, on a "lower" level.<sup>2</sup> In other systems, two or more levels are formally recognized. In the United States, for example, the state primaries serve as one level, national party conventions as another, and interaction between the parties and between the President and Congress (see below) as still another level.

In some systems, policies formulated on the top level, the most encompassing level, are

<sup>1</sup> Theoretically one can increase the number of participants without increasing heterogeneity by adding new participants who are just like the old ones; this is the common justification for immigration policies, e.g., that discriminate in favor of readily assimilable applicants for entry. In practice, I assume for the purpose of this discussion that heterogeneity increases with size. Note, though, that no one-to-one relationship is assumed. Actually, the marginal heterogeneity produced by increases in size probably declines.

<sup>2</sup> The obvious disadvantages of this system for the UN are irrelevant to the present analysis.

* This article was written while I was a Research Associate at the Institute of War and Peace Studies. I am grateful to my colleagues at the 1962 Summer Institute of the American Academy of Art and Sciences, in particular to James A. Robinson, for comments on an earlier draft.

brought before all the participants for final approval (e.g., the recent nomination of Burma's U Thant to be acting Secretary General of the UN was approved, but hardly worked out, by the plenum of the General Assembly). In other systems, approval by the representatives of the sub-groups is deemed satisfactory, as is the case in practically all bureaucratic structures.

II. ON THE NATIONAL LEVEL

All heterogeneous polities that effectively attain consensus have a multi-level consensus formation structure. The major national political systems differ greatly, however, in their specific structures. In multi-party systems, as long as they work—a problem to which we will return—consensus is first formed in each faction; then the factions contained by each party reach a compromise (which all consensus formation involves). Inter-party consensus is then worked out among representatives of the parties, not the factions. The general outline of the consensus is worked out during the negotiations over the formation of a coalition, which follows the elections; more specific consensus is worked out daily in the parliament, expressed in legislation and motions supported by votes of confidence.

In some instances, the minority party or parties (the opposition) may be left out of the process; quite often, though, they affect the policies formed, by reason of the fact that the coalition parties take their positions into account, in bi-partisan policy (especially foreign policy), as well as through participation in other "governments." Often parties that are in opposition in the national government nevertheless participate in the national consensus formation process by joining a coalition with government-parties on the city or municipal level.<sup>3</sup> The effective operation of the multi-party system of consensus formation requires that the number of parties be limited, otherwise communication difficulties arise and the top level may become too heterogeneous for effective negotiations; it also requires that the parties be stable, at least to the degree that a consensus reached on the lower level will be maintained on higher levels. If members of parliament maintain only a limited loyalty to their party once the parliament is elected, party representatives cannot negotiate in the name of its factions, and we are back to the state of many participants on one level. The French parliaments of the Third and Fourth Republics were at various times confronted with this type of stalemate.<sup>4</sup>

In two-party countries, more consensus formation takes place on the lower levels than in multi-party countries, because only two positions can compete on the top level. So, for instance, there are only two presidential candidates for national elections, but often more than two for one party's nomination. The British system differs from the American in that the minority party tends to be excluded from the top consensus formation level, except in periods of national crises and infrequent instances of bi-partisan foreign policy. In the United States, such exclusion is rare because the Congress and the Presidency are frequently not held by the same party, and because party ties sit more lightly than in England: witness the conservative Republican southern Democratic coalition. Moreover, in the United States, instances of a bi-partisan foreign policy—e.g., on Castro's Cuba—are common.

Totalitarian societies are not exempted from the need to form consensus, though they can rely to a greater degree on coercion and downward-produced consensus through the manipulation of the mass media, rituals, etc. The major upward consensus formation takes place within extra-political structures; first, in each major bureaucracy (e.g., the military, the economic planning agency, the party); then, among the bureaucracies. One might even speak, with caution, about coalitions of some bureaucracies against others (e.g., Army and Party against the NKVD). In sum, while political systems differ in their consensus-formation structure, it is multi-level wherever it is effective.

III. IN INTERNATIONAL SYSTEMS

An examination of the international scene from this viewpoint shows first, that the hypothesis that the formation of consensus within and among heterogeneous units requires differentiation, holds here too, though several additional variables have to be taken into account.

The United Nations is probably best characterized by lack of consensus because of the deep cleavages in interests and beliefs among many of its members. But when we review

<sup>3</sup> In Israel, many opposition parties share the leadership with the government leader, Mapai (Labor party), by joining the executive board of the Jewish Agency and the Histadrut, often referred to as the two other governments of Israel. On their functions and their effect on Israeli politics see my "Kulturkampf or Coalition: The Case of Israel" Revue Française de Science Politique, Vol. 8 (June, 1958), pp. 311-331.

<sup>4</sup> See Constantin Melnik and Nathan Leites, The House Without Windows (Evanston: Rowe Peterson, 1958).

those infrequent decisions—limited in importance, to be sure—where an overall consensus was reached we see the same multi-level structure in operation. Representatives of various groups of nations “caucus” to work out their shared position; then, their unofficial spokesmen negotiate with those of the other caucuses or blocs, to work out a general compromise which in turn is brought, for discussion or approval by acclamation, to the UN floor.<sup>5</sup> Bloc decisions themselves are frequently reached in a two-level process of a similar sort. In this light one may wonder whether we do not exaggerate the monolithic nature of the Communist bloc. China seems to have “caucused” with Albanian, and evidently North Vietnamese and North Korean representatives also, before the Congress of Communist countries in Moscow, in October, 1961.<sup>6</sup> Khrushchev is reported to have conferred with East European Communist countries during his boat trip to New York in 1959. The 1961 conference of twenty-five unaligned nations in Belgrade is reported to have comprised three factions: neutral-neutrals, pro-Western neutrals, and pro-Communist neutrals. The African “bloc” seems to have at least two groupings—though their degree of cohesion is as yet hard to assess—that of the Casablanca group and that of the Brazzaville group.<sup>7</sup> Although the latter is reported to have taken a more moderate, pro-Western line on the Congo issue, the two groups frequently vote en bloc in the UN.<sup>8</sup>

While blocs in international organizations such as the UN, and in particular conferences such as the Belgrade Conference, are highly fluid, sub-groupings of potential supranational communities seem to have a somewhat higher degree of permanency. Thus, the Benelux countries constitute such a sub-grouping in the EEC, though by no means with regard to all or even most issues. Australia and New Zealand seem to constitute such a sub-group in the British Commonwealth of Nations. The EEC and the EFTA play such a part in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).<sup>9</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Private communication with UN officials, and participant-observation in a UNESCO Conference in Montreal, in 1959.

<sup>6</sup> Zbigniew K. Brzezinski, Ideology and Power in Soviet Politics (New York, 1962), pp. 150 ff.

<sup>7</sup> Immanuel Wallerstein, “Background to Pagan-I,” West Africa, July 29, 1961, p. 819.

<sup>8</sup> See Thomas Hovet, Jr., Bloc Politics in the United Nations (Cambridge, Mass.: Center for International Studies, M.I.T., 1958).

<sup>9</sup> The EEC is represented in certain GATT negotiations by the Economic Commission as one

So far, the process of forming consensus in international systems seems to be quite similar to the national one. Moreover, further examination of international consensus formation suggests that, there too, a multi-level structure is more effective than direct representation of all participants on the same level, and points to the process by which such a multi-level structure tends to emerge. First, the lower level of consensus is attained by grouping a few states at a time; once the union of such groups solidifies, a more encompassing union—and a higher level of consensus—is produced. In the initial stage of the formation of this multi-level structure, there are seldom harmonious relations between two groups of nations (or unions). In fact, intense rivalry among them is more frequent. Such rivalry seems to help the integration of each group, preparing it for the next step, i.e., the formation of higher level, more encompassing unions. Finally, to push an analogy further, if one group is seen as the thesis, the other as the anti-thesis, the emerging synthesis tends to include both unions. The original units are now permanent elements (though changed in character) of the union, acting as lower-level consensus formation units; the new union is not built on the atomization of the groups, but on their inclusion as “individual” members. The development of several unions will illustrate this hypothesis about the dialectics of unification.

The history of Benelux is enlightening from this viewpoint. Any historical development is affected by many factors; the degree to which a multi-level consensus-formation structure is erected is, of course, just one of them. Still, it is noteworthy that after centuries of shared rule under dukes of Burgundy and kings of Spain, the Low Countries—integrated into two groups, the northern and the southern provinces—were not ready when they tried to form one republic (1795–1814), or a United Kingdom (1814–1830). The effort failed, among other reasons, because all provinces were thrown together. The two unions of provinces were not recognized in the new structure; efforts were made to form all consensus on one level. In 1830, the southern provinces rebelled, and formed Belgium. The ensuing war between the north (the Netherlands) and the south (Belgium) helped the integration of each, but did not hinder the eventual union of the two, in a structure that does recognize the distinctive-polity rather than six national polities. See W. W. Kitzinger, The Challenge of the Common Market (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1962), 3d ed., p. 27.

ness of the two regions, i.e., in Benelux. This analysis suggests that if Benelux should ever attain complete supranational integration, it would be functional to maintain some degree of local governmental structure in units that are the present Belgium and the Netherlands. The inclusion of small Luxemburg was also not simply a matter of adding a nation to an existing union; the way was prepared, as far back as 1921, by a customs union (BELU) with Belgium, which is maintained as a sub-union of the present, larger union, just as Benelux itself is a viable part of the EEC.<sup>10</sup>

The 13 colonies that formed the United States were more or less autonomous societal units, with internal consensus-formation mechanisms. These societal units were not abolished with the federation, but found expression in the states' governments. They still have an important influence on the Federal government, both by carrying out some functions on the state level and through representation in the Senate. Moreover, groups of states—the South, East, Midwest, and West (sometimes smaller groupings, e.g., the New England States or the Southwest) are still an important middle level of consensus formation informally recognized in Congress and in party conventions. The union here, as in Benelux, was completed only after a war between the South and the North, which did not eliminate either the South or the North or the states, as meaningful intermediary units in American politics. A similar analysis could be applied to the various Swiss cantons, and possibly even to their German and French-Italian groupings. Here too, civil wars, one as late as the suppression of a rebellion of a Roman Catholic canton in 1847, preceded but did not prevent federation in 1848.<sup>11</sup> To return to the contemporary scene, the Organization of American States, which has 21 members, may well be too large for effective, one-level unification; recent efforts to form common markets have been made between five Central American countries and seven South American ones. The possibility of forming a more encompassing union later is explicitly recognized.<sup>12</sup> The strains that have re-asserted themselves in the last two years in the relations between the United States and western European powers, especially over the question of national nuclear deterrents, advance rather than retard the political unification of France and West Germany, and will not necessarily as often claimed, undermine the proposed Atlantic Union.<sup>13</sup>

It would be hasty, however, to conclude from the preceding discussion that the only or the best way to form a European Community is to integrate the EEC and the EFTA—as they are—in some super-system. Before the validity of other approaches can be assessed, some additional factors that affect supranational unification need to be examined. First, there is the question of the degree of integration a union aims at and the scope desired.

IV. DEGREE OF INTEGRATION, AND SCOPE

Political communities of nations differ from other international systems—such as alliances, blocs, international organizations—in having a “supranational” structure and not just an inter-governmental one. By definition they have one center of government that legitimately decrees and enforces decisions within its jurisdiction on matters that affect the member nations and their citizens; this requires a higher degree of consensus than the inter-governmental structure of other international systems. Since the decisions of inter-governmental bodies are not binding and collective international actions are under national control, consensus can often be worked out in an ad hoc manner, and on specific issues, even when general consensus is lacking. In short, supranationalism is a politically more integrated structure which requires correspondingly more consensus formation than typical inter-governmental organizations.<sup>14</sup> This is, though, a question of degree, not a “yes” or “no” proposition. NATO, for instance, has a supranational SHAPE, the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) its High Authority, and the European Economic Community, the Economic Commission; but all have also superior inter-governmental bodies, the various Councils of Ministers. They are, thus, part supranational, part inter-governmental.<sup>15</sup> Since the Council of Ministers has both formal and realistic superiority, these European bodies

<sup>13</sup> Cf. Walter Lippmann, Western Unity and the Common Market (Boston, 1962), ch. 3.

<sup>14</sup> For a keen analysis of the difference between inter-governmental and supranational structures, see Ernst B. Haas, The Uniting of Europe (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1958), pp. 520 ff.

<sup>15</sup> This point is elaborated in my “A Paradigm for the Study of Political Unification,” World Politics, Vol. XV (October 1962), pp. 44.

<sup>10</sup> See F. Gunther Eyck, The Benelux Countries (New York, 1959), Pt. I.

<sup>11</sup> Charlotte Muret, “The Swiss Pattern for a Federal Europe,” in E. M. Earle, ed., Nationalism and Internationalism (New York, 1950), pp. 261 ff.

<sup>12</sup> Federal Reserve Bank of New York, “The Emerging Common Markets in Latin America,” Monthly Review, September, 1960.

should be regarded as predominantly inter-governmental.

We would expect that the smaller a union is, all other things equal, the more homogeneous it could be, and the more integrated and "supranational."<sup>16</sup> This is in fact the case since, while many international organizations include almost all the states there are, from five continents and from all blocs (e.g., 109 members of the UN), most supranational communities have less than ten members and are, comparatively homogeneous in their cultural, educational, economic, and political backgrounds. Hence, the question, whether the EEC and the EFTA should be merged and if merged should be preserved as sub-units, is in part dependent upon the degree of integration sought. A highly integrated union—a United States of Europe—is least likely to be formed by a large expansion of the membership of the EEC,<sup>17</sup> while a customs union—directed by an inter-governmental body—can readily accommodate a membership larger than that of the EEC and the EFTA combined. This conclusion, reached on the basis of studying the relationship between integration, heterogeneity and size, is reinforced by an examination of the relationship between integration and scope.

International systems differ in the number of societal sectors they pervade. Some, especially international organizations, are strictly mono-sectorial; they deal only with labor issues, or health issues, or postal services, or aviation; and as a rule only with some activities in these sectors, and not necessarily the most central ones. Other international organizations penetrate into two or more sectors (as, for instance, the Nordic Council which serves political, economic, educational, and cultural needs of the member-nations). The larger the sectorial scope of a union, the more consensus is required; and hence the fewer the number of nations (or more precisely, the degree of heterogeneity) it can tolerate, and the more it will need two (or more) structural levels of consensus formation. Thus, it is not surprising that the typical mono-sectorial unions have many members, while typical multi-sectorial unions have only from 3 to 8 members: for instance, the Nordic Council has 5 members; the Eastern European Community (with two major organizations as tools, the Warsaw Treaty Organization and the Council for Mutual Economic Aid) has 8 members; the Conseil de l'Entente has 4, and Benelux has 3.

Even more important than the number of sectors encompassed is the nature of any particular sector to be integrated, in terms of its articulation with other sectors of the same society. Several authorities in the study of supranationalism have pointed out that integration in one sector tends to spill over into other sectors, i.e., tends to trigger integration in them as well. Haas' study of the ECSC, for instance, shows how it spilled over into Euratom and the EEC.<sup>18</sup> He has also suggested that various societal sectors differ in their spill-over function.<sup>19</sup> On the basis of various sociological considerations that cannot be elaborated here,<sup>20</sup> I would order international organizations in various sectors with respect to their spill-over tendencies—from low to high—as follows: (a) organizations that deal with services, such as postal services, allocation of radio frequencies, police cooperation, etc.; (b) organizations dealing with labor, health, and cultural exchange, i.e., services to which "human values" are attached; (c) tariff agreements and military organizations; (d) economic unions or common markets.

The spill-over phenomenon points to the fact that societal sectors differ in the degree to which they are inter-related. Integrating some of them triggers unification tendencies in many other sectors; while integrating some other sectors has comparatively small repercussions. The military sector, for instance, is highly segregated and autonomous, unless industrial mobilization is involved. Military units of two nations can be integrated, their war plans coordinated, their navies participate in combined maneuvers, military information extensively exchanged, etc., without this having much effect on other societal sectors. Only

<sup>16</sup> See note 1, above, on the relationship between size and heterogeneity.

<sup>17</sup> The union of the United States, well "prepared" by 1789, took a hundred years and a civil war before it solidified, and yet was one of a highly homogeneous group: "... Providence has been pleased to give this one connected country to one united people—a people descended from the same ancestors, speaking the same language, professing the same religion, attached to the same principles of government, very similar in their manners and customs." John Jay, The Federalist, No. 2, cited by Gerard J. Mangone, The Idea and Practice of World Government (New York: Columbia University Press, 1951), p. 26, fn. 10.

<sup>18</sup> Uniting of Europe, op. cit.

<sup>19</sup> Ernest B. Haas, "International Integration," International Organization, Vol. 15 (1961), pp. 366–392.

<sup>20</sup> See my "The Epigenesis of Political Community at the International Level," American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 68 (Jan. 1963).

when integration reaches the higher level of policy making is there a considerable spill-over into the political sector, and this because integration here requires some governmental integration, e.g., of Defense Departments. Similarly, standardization of weapons and other equipment often has some repercussion on the economic sector. Economic integration, on the other hand, affects all societal groups—consumers, producers, management, labor, farmers, small business—and therefore tends to have extensive political repercussions. In contrast, tariff agreements, especially to the degree that they cover only some goods and concern only reduction but not abolition of tariffs, affect only some exporters and importers and a limited number of related industries. It is only as such unions become so broadly encompassing as to tend to affect the flow of capital, monetary policy, levels of employment, etc., in the countries involved, that they spill over into economic unions, i.e., that they trigger integration of many other spheres.

In cases where the unification of a high spill-over sector has occurred and unification of other related sectors is blocked, an unbalanced state is created which generates pressures to "solve" the imbalance, either by removing the blocks or by reducing the degree of unification in the sector in which it was initiated. For instance, if furnishing nuclear weapons to NATO would require NATO to create a joint political authority to command their use (there would hardly be time to consult 15 governments if NATO is attacked nuclearly, and contingent decisions are unsatisfactory), and if for some reason the 15 nations are not "ready" for the required political integration, these would be two factors working against the acceptance of such weapons by NATO. The prospect that spill-over from the military into the political sector is blocked would work against military integration. [Integration, so to speak, proceeds in steps. There are several plateaus on which one can rest, but one cannot stand on two steps simultaneously; one has either to progress to more encompassing unification or retreat to a narrower one.]

What does the study of the scope of integration and spill-over add to our understanding of EFTA-EEC relations? The EEC is continuously growing closer to an economic union, above and beyond a mere tariff agreement. Such unions have high spill-over effects, as is evident in the EEC talks about federation and in the increased public and private support for a strong, political EEC.

In short, by 1962, the Europe of the Six was on the verge of an increasing spill-over into the political sector. Britain, on the other hand, though consistently interested in a European tariff agreement, or even in an economic one, was ambivalent if not negatively disposed toward a political union. This was one of the major reasons why England did not join the EEC in the first place and instead joined the EFTA, a free trade association with limited spill-over potentialities. By 1961 Britain had changed its position. EFTA clearly failed. Some of its members traded more across the tariff wall with EEC countries than with each other. While customs reductions within the EEC seemed to trigger a rapid rate of economic growth—better than six per cent a year—economic stagnation in Britain continued. The prospect of a fully integrated Western Europe became more and more real. Hence Britain's resolution, in the middle of 1961, to abandon EFTA, to weaken its ties to the Commonwealth if necessary, and to join the EEC on any reasonable conditions. Britain's interest in the EEC is, though, almost completely economic. British feelings against political unification with the continent have deep roots which include a long history of hegemony; a self-image of a big power, or even more painful, of an ex-big power, jealous of its remaining privileges, sensitive about its status, anxious to preserve its strong ties to the Commonwealth and to the United States. Many of these roots will have to be considerably weakened before the United Kingdom can genuinely participate in a political integration of Western Europe.

Last but not least, is the question of hegemony in the EEC. International communities seem to function best when one nation has clear hegemony;<sup>21</sup> sometimes, two countries can share the leadership, especially when there is a third outside force against which they unite. This is the present situation in the EEC, where <sup>21</sup> Cf., for instance, the period of hegemony in the British, Hapsburg, and German empires to the periods of dual or multi-leadership. See also Crane Brinton, From Many One (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1948). And compare the Communist bloc in the days when the Soviet Union had a clear hegemony to the later period of the Soviet-Chinese rift. See T. M. Mills, "Power Relations in Three Person Groups," American Sociological Review, Vol. 18 (1953), pp. 351-7; Georg Simmel, "The Number of Members as Determining the Sociological Form of the Group," American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 8 (1902), pp. 45-6.

France and West Germany share the leadership. Systems with three leaders hardly ever stabilize.<sup>22</sup> There are too many latent and tempting benefits to be derived from the collusion or coalition of two against the third partner. On all these counts, Britain's entry into the EEC makes the completion of the spill-over from the economic to the political area quite unlikely. And this may mean that the EEC will not even remain an economic union, but instead will more likely regress to the level of a tariff agreement. This point requires some elaboration.

International unions of this type seem to have two stable stages: low integration with little or no spill-over, and high integration, where unification initiated in one sector spills over to many others, especially the political. Unions that try to maintain a medium-level integration, e.g., economic only, or economic with a minimum of political integration, are unstable, not because they are likely to disintegrate but because their capacity to form consensus is out of balance with the need for it: they are likely to become more integrated or regress to a lower level of integration. The chances, in case England joins the EEC, favor regression rather than progression.

The fact that England and other EFTA members apply for membership in the EEC as individual countries, not en bloc, makes high integration of the EEC less, not more, likely, for it produces a merger rather than a synthesis on a higher level. One might therefore be inclined to favor the formation of a super-system, to include both the EFTA and the EEC as sub-units. But this will not do because the units of an effective union, one that can maintain an adequate level of consensus, have to be fairly cohesive, stable units. One cannot build a second floor structure of consensus formation unless the first one has a firm foundation. While the EEC is already quite cohesive, and becoming more so, the EFTA is not. EFTA was formed, not out of any genuine commitment to a union, but to countervail the EEC; it was viewed as a temporary union, to be used to bargain with the EEC, hardly a morale-building feature. Austria and Switzerland, e.g., trade more with EEC countries than with EFTA countries. In addition, the EFTA membership is highly heterogeneous: it includes NATO and non-NATO members; democracies and Portugal; Protestant countries and Austria.

<sup>22</sup> See Miriam Camps, Division in Europe, Policy Memorandum No. 21, Center of International Studies (Princeton University, 1960).

The preceding discussion suggests that western Europe includes too many countries, is too heterogeneous, to form one union. It follows that two or more unions are needed, to form the units of a larger system. But it does not follow that the unification of any specific group of countries would be more conducive to European integration than any other, as long as cohesive unions serve as building blocs. One course toward unification is the expansion of the EEC to include a few more countries (though not all the members of the EFTA), such as some that are contiguous to the EEC and less competitive for its leadership than Britain. Austria and Switzerland are natural candidates. The fact that they are not NATO countries, and in the past have taken a neutral position in the inter-bloc strife, is not necessarily a barrier to their inclusion, probably first as associate members; and later as full members, to be included also in the political union. The neutrality of these nations is quite pro-Western and both France (since De Gaulle) and West Germany (since the inclusion of the Free Democrats in the government) move in the direction of a somewhat more "independent" foreign policy. [It is hard to see how the USSR could stop a gradual integration of Austria into the EEC.]

Another European union, the Scandinavian community, forms a core for a larger union. It has already grown from three to five members, adding Iceland and Finland to Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. Once European trade problems are solved in a large framework, as discussed below, Britain might find this union—which is democratic, Protestant and welfare-oriented—more appealing for political unification than the continental one. Portugal and Spain have been reported to have considered an Iberian union of their own.<sup>23</sup> Once the major requirements of small size and cohesion are satisfied, other possible combinations might emerge; the major question that remains is the type of super-system to which these unions can belong.

V. KINDS OF SUPER-SYSTEMS

How encompassing could such a super-system be, in terms of the number of unions to be included? What could be the functions of the super-system, above and beyond those of the member unions? The major alternatives discussed seem to be a European super-system or an Atlantic one, the latter to include the United

<sup>23</sup> Christian Science Monitor, October 28, 1957, p. 6.

States and Canada in addition to the European countries (including either all western Europe or only NATO members).<sup>24</sup>

The following analysis suggests that a European super-system<sup>25</sup> will be more integrated and stable than an Atlantic one, as long as it will itself be a part of a third-level organization. The main reason for this is that the United States, as the leading Western power, has many commitments and functions in other international communities than the European ones, especially in Latin America, but also in the Far East, South East Asia, the Middle East, and to an increasing degree in Africa. Strong integration of the United States in a European union would impose sharp strains on these other American ties.

The optimal participation for the United States is on the third level of consensus formation, a structural level where super-systems—of several European unions, of several African ones, and of several Latin American ones, etc.—are integrated in a single super-super-system, already vaguely recognized as the “Free World.” A three-level structure may perhaps seem too complicated to be attained; or if attained, to function effectively. It should therefore be pointed out that three-level structures are quite common. Most national governments and practically all large corporate enterprises have at least a three-level structure, and many of them are quite effective. Actually, the evolution of a third-level structure would not preclude active participation in the development of a fourth level, that of the United Nations.

The main problem is not the number of levels but the distribution of functions, powers and political loyalties among the various levels. The formal, legal and institutional differences between unions whose members are nations, and super-systems whose members are unions, is that representation in super-systems is in the hands of those who speak in the name of the unions (e.g., the EEC), either in addition to or instead of national representatives. For the division of functions, we can consider two major possibilities: one is that the super-systems will be a replica of member-unions on a more encompassing level. Such a super-system is approximated (in limited spheres to be sure) in the relations between the EEC and the EFTA in the OEEC and in GATT. Each group, for instance, introduced some internal reductions of tariffs, then met in the wider arena of GATT to consider mutual tariff cuts—as well as small cuts for “third” countries, not members of either union. According to this plan the control of one specific function, in this case setting tariff rates, is divided between two levels beyond the national one: that of the unions and that of the super-system.

The second way to integrate unions into super-systems is to introduce a functional division of labor among the levels instead of a differentiation of authority. One such arrangement might take the form of leaving to the small, cohesive unions the economic and political functions; to the super-systems, the role of military integration; and to the third-level system (or bloc), the coordination of foreign policy, monetary policy (e.g., through a revised International Monetary Fund), and tariff agreements.<sup>26</sup> This might also be the best level on which to coordinate aid to underdeveloped countries.

This specific division only illustrates the nature of inter-level division of functions; of course other arrangements can be worked out. It should, though, be emphasized that the division outlined above takes into account the need to reserve to smaller, lower-level units those functions that require a high degree of consensus formation and hence of relatively strong supranationalism. The actual structure of the West approaches such a division with the smaller economic-political EEC and Nordic Council, the larger NATO, and the still more encompassing GATT, IMF, and OECD. The third-level system is still highly informal, and centered around trips of premiers to Washington, foreign tours of American representatives, and regional meetings—but no Free World ministerial conferences.

Which of the two types of inter-level division is optimal has yet to be determined. It seems that they differ in effectiveness with regard to different goals: functional division of labor seems better for short-run stability, and an inter-level division of control over each function the better for long-run integration of second- and third-level super-systems. This latter seems to be the case because here high spill-over functions are in part carried out by super-systems, and because the units which carry out high spill-over functions command more political loyalty than those which do not.

<sup>24</sup> Such a union has been advocated by Henry A. Kissinger, The Necessity for Choice (New York, 1960), pp. 165–8. See also Joseph Kraft, The Grand Design (New York, 1962). Some of the problems involved in its formation have been pointed out by Karl W. Deutsch et al., Political Community and the North Atlantic Area (Princeton University Press, 1957).

<sup>25</sup> Not to be confused with a merger of nations as “individuals” in a European union, such as “revised” OEEC.

<sup>26</sup> See Robert Trillon, Gold and the Dollar Crisis (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1961), ch. 4, and Alastair Buchan, NATO in the 1960's (London, Wiedenfeld & Nicolson, 1959), ch. 4.

The long-run trend toward integration seems to be for functions, authority and loyalties to be transferred from smaller units to larger ones; from states to federations; from federations to supranational unions; and from these to super-systems. This transfer may progress without major upsets because a variety of processes tend to reduce the heterogeneity of the member-units—through industrialization, the spread of education, democratization, and the unification process—to lower-level units.<sup>27</sup> Hence the transfer of additional powers of decision to higher levels—those encompassing more members—need not undermine stabilization as long as the pace of upgrading function or authority does not overtake that of decreasing heterogeneity. We close with the speculative, though not unimaginable possibility that eventually, in this way, the highest super-system, that of a global society, might develop.

<sup>27</sup> This point is elaborated in my The Hard Way to Peace (New York: Collier Books, 1962), ch. 8.

GAME THEORY AND CUMULATIVE VOTING IN ILLINOIS: 1902-1954*

JACK SAWYER AND DUNCAN MACRAE, JR.
University of Chicago

Since the theory of games was first made widely available, with application to economic behavior,<sup>1</sup> its use has been suggested in many other areas, from the global<sup>2</sup> to the individual.<sup>3</sup> Several correspondences between game theory and certain aspects of political process have been noted.<sup>4</sup>

The contribution of game theory to substantive knowledge in the empirical sciences, however, has been modest; Luce and Raiffa<sup>5</sup> judge that its impact has been greater in applied mathematics. The area of political behavior—despite the apparent applicability of the notion of conflict of interest—is similarly lacking in studies, although a few notable exceptions exist.<sup>6</sup>

* Revised version of a paper presented at the annual meeting of the American Statistical Association, Stanford, California, December, 1959. This research was conducted during the senior author's tenure as a National Science Foundation postdoctoral fellow. Computations were supported by funds from the Social Science Research Council.

<sup>1</sup> J. von Neumann and O. Morgenstern, Theory of Games and Economic Behavior (Princeton University Press, 1944).

<sup>2</sup> M. Kaplan, System and Process in International Politics (Wiley, 1957).

<sup>3</sup> H. A. Simon, "A Comparison of Game and Learning Theory," Psychometrika, Vol. 21 (1956), pp. 267-72.

<sup>4</sup> Richard C. Snyder outlines conceptual parallels and several potentially fruitful areas of application in "Game Theory and the Analysis of Political Behavior," in Stephen K. Bailey, et al., Research Frontiers in Politics and Government (The Brookings Institution, 1955). See also the broad collection edited by Martin Shubik, Readings in Game Theory and Political Behavior (Doubleday, 1954).

<sup>5</sup> R. D. Luce and H. Raiffa, Games and Decisions (Wiley, 1957).

<sup>6</sup> L. S. Shapley and M. Shubik, "A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System," this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (1954), pp. 787-792; R. D. Luce and A. A. Rogow, "A Game Theoretic Analysis of Congressional Power Distributions for a Stable Two-Party System," Behavioral Science, Vol. 1 (1956), pp. 83-95; and William H. Riker, "A Test of the Adequacy of

Many of the previous studies have taken the form of defining a situation in terms of game theory and prescribing the proper behavior for a given set of conditions. In the present study, however, it was possible not only to specify a simple game theory model, but to try it out in a large number of actual cases. The following sections describe a voting behavior being modeled, the game theory model employed, an empirical test of the model, and implications of the results.

I. THE VOTING SITUATION

Voting for representatives for the Illinois General Assembly proceeds in a manner unique among state legislatures.<sup>7</sup> The system used, cumulative voting, is intended to secure minority representation and does so by providing multiple member constituencies and allowing individuals to "cumulate" their votes on fewer than the total number of candidates to be elected.<sup>8</sup> the Power Index," Behavioral Science, Vol. 4 (1959), pp. 120-131.

<sup>7</sup> Cumulative voting is, however, common in voting for corporate boards of directors; for an application of the theory of games in this area, see G. J. Glasser, "Game Theory and Cumulative Voting for Corporate Directors," Management Science, Vol. 5 (1959), pp. 151-156. In England, cumulative voting for school boards of from five to fifteen members was instituted through the Education Act of 1870, and continued until school boards were abolished in 1902; see J. F. S. Ross, Elections and Electors: Studies in Democratic Representation (Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1955), pp. 62-63.

<sup>8</sup> In 1870, when cumulative voting was adopted in Illinois by referendum as part of a new constitution, the General Assembly was sharply divided by region. In the Assembly of 1867, one could draw a line across the state about the latitude of Springfield such that districts north of the line returned 52 Republicans and no Democrats and those south of the line returned 8 Republicans and 24 Democrats. In the first election after the change to cumulative voting, however, all but one of the 51 newly created three-member districts returned members of both parties. North of the same line referred to above, the Democrats had increased their representation from zero to

As it is applied in Illinois, three representatives are elected from each district, and each voter has three votes, which he may distribute 3-0, 2-1,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ - $1\frac{1}{2}$ , or 1-1-1, among the candidates. Each party may nominate for the general election one, two, or three candidates, and the number to be nominated is decided upon and announced prior to the primary. This decision is made more or less independently by separate three-man committees elected by members of each party, with the voters in the primary election then determining who the candidates shall be.

The committee's decision is made under uncertainty as to the percentage of the vote that the party will receive, and often, though not always, the number of candidates that the other party will nominate. The behavior of this committee in arriving at a decision in the face of uncertainty is the object of the present study. In particular, the "rationality" of this decision in terms of its success in maximizing the number of the party elected is investigated by reference to the theory of games.

Previous studies of cumulative voting,<sup>9</sup> while giving major attention to other aspects, have noted that occasionally the majority party fails to nominate two candidates and thereby loses the second seat it could otherwise fill. (As it turns out, however, by far the most frequent occasion of loss comes when a party with a 75 per cent majority nominates only two rather than three candidates.) Hence, in order to examine systematically the behavior of the nominating committee, the present study postulates a model based upon the theory of games, for the process of deciding upon the number of candidates.

II. THE GAME THEORY MODEL

The behavior of the two nominating committees—one for each party—may be viewed as a two-person game in which the payoff is the number of candidates elected. The game is 34%, and south of the line, the Republicans had increased their representation from 25% to 38%. For an account of the operation of cumulative voting in Illinois over the period 1872-1954, see George S. Blair, Cumulative Voting: An Effective Electoral Device in Illinois Politics (University of Illinois Press, 1960).

<sup>9</sup> B. F. Moore, "The history of cumulative voting and minority representation in Illinois, 1870-1919," University of Illinois Studies in the Social Sciences, Vol. 8, No. 2 (1919); C. S. Hyne-man and J. D. Morgan, "Cumulative Voting in Illinois," Illinois Law Review, Vol. 32 (1937), pp. 12-31; and George S. Blair, op. cit.

essentially zero-sum, in that positions not filled by one party are filled by the other. Each party has three strategies, namely to nominate one, two, or three candidates.<sup>10</sup>

Applicability of the Model. The theory of games assumes that each player (1) knows all the rules of the game, i.e., the payoff matrix; (2) has a preference ordering of the payoffs, and also knows that of his opponents; and (3) expresses his preference ordering in selecting strategies, i.e., he acts to maximize expected utility. As Luce and Raiffa<sup>11</sup> point out, the third condition may perhaps best be taken as tautological, being simply a description of "preference ordering." The alternative is to determine preference orderings independently and use these to test the postulate.

In this application—unlike many experimental trials of the theory of games—the stakes are so considerable that there is good reason to assume a preference ordering. At the least, electing one candidate is not preferred to electing two candidates, and neither is preferred to electing three candidates. The assumption of a known payoff matrix is also met unusually well in this case, for both the available strategies and the outcomes for different combinations of strategies are completely prescribed and known to both parties. Hence, among situations involving actual political behavior, the case of cumulative voting appears particularly appropriate and specifically overcomes many of the problems raised by Deutsch<sup>12</sup> in the application of game theory to politics.

Factors in the Committee's Decision. In determining the number of candidates to nominate, the committee acts under uncertainty as to (1) the percentage of the vote its party will receive, (2) how the vote will be divided among its candidates, and (3) how many candidates the other party will nominate. The division of the vote among the various candidates of the same party, however, is in practice usually very even, reflecting perhaps a combination of voter indifference, party discipline, and the effect (in machine voting) of the party lever, which makes it relatively easier to divide one's votes equally among the party's candidates. In any event, given a rational opponent, an equal division of the votes among the candidates is

<sup>10</sup> The theoretical alternative of nominating none may be eliminated from consideration since it is never optimal and never employed.

<sup>11</sup> Op. cit., pp. 50-51.

<sup>12</sup> K. W. Deutsch, "Game Theory and Politics: Some Problems of Application," Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, Vol. 20 (1954), pp. 76-83.

TABLE I. NUMBER ELECTED BY PARTY A, BY PERCENTAGE OF VOTE

0-25% A		B Nominates			25-40% A		B Nominates			40-50% A		B Nominates
		1 2 3					1 2 3					1 2 3
A Nominates	1	1	1	0	A Nominates	1	1	1	1	A Nominates	1	1	1	1
	2	2	1	0		2	2	1	0		2	2	1	2
	3	2	1	0		3	2	1	0		3	2	1	0
50-60% A		B Nominates			60-75% A		B Nominates			75-100% A		B Nominates
		1 2 3					1 2 3					1 2 3
A Nominates	1	1	1	1	A Nominates	1	1	1	1	A Nominates	1	1	1	1
	2	2	2	2		2	2	2	2		2	2	2	2
	3	2	1	3		3	2	3	3		3	3	3	3

always reasonable for a given party. Otherwise, as has happened in a small percentage of elections, a party barely in the majority may find its less preferred candidate running behind both the equally preferred minority party candidates. Consequently, the formulations which follow assume that each party's vote is divided equally among all candidates of that party.<sup>13</sup>

The Payoff Matrices. The two remaining uncertainties may be dealt with by considering, for any given distribution of the vote, what the payoffs are in terms of number of candidates elected for any particular combination of strategies. It turns out that, given a two-party situation, there are only six different payoff matrices, one for each of the following ranges of the vote for the first party: 0-25%; 25-40%; 40-50%; 50-60%; 60-75%; 75-100%. These six matrices are given in Table I, with the payoff the number of candidates elected by party A.

Take, for example, the matrix for the case in which A has 50-60 per cent of the vote. If each party nominates only one candidate, both are elected, and the payoff to A is one.<sup>14</sup> If A nominates one while B nominates two or three, A being in the majority, will elect that one, while B will elect the other two. If A nominates two he will elect both, regardless of how many B nominates. The third strategy of A presents an interesting inversion in outcomes: if B nominates one, he will elect that one and A will elect two; if B nominates two, he will elect both (despite his overall minority, each of his two will have more than 20 per cent of the vote while each of A's three candidates will have less than 20 per cent); but if B nominates three, he will elect none and A will elect all three. This latter case illustrates particularly how it is possible to nominate either too many or too few candidates.

Solution of the Game. In the same payoff matrix (50-60%) considered before, what is the optimal strategy for each party? Among A's strategies, it is apparent that by nominating two, he can guarantee electing that many which is more than can be guaranteed by any other choice of strategy. B, on the other hand by choosing to nominate two, can assure that A will elect at most two. The same assurance is <sup>13</sup> Actually, as will be made apparent later, the most desirable situation—although difficult to attain—would be the ability to maintain a very small, but highly reliable, difference among the candidates.

<sup>14</sup> This is an extremely rare event, occurring only when there is a strong third party—a case not covered by the present exposition. Technically, this feature makes the game non-zero-sum in that the gains of A plus the gains of B do not sum to the constant three for this case. In a two party situation, however, this combination of strategies is never optimal, and, in practice, never occurs.

given B if he chooses to nominate only one, but this strategy is dominated, since the outcome resulting from its selection is in no case better, and sometimes worse than that from nominating two. Thus the minimax loss solution for this game matrix calls for each party to nominate two, in which case the outcome is that A elects two.<sup>15</sup>

In the 60-75% matrix, B can, by nominating only one, guarantee himself electing that one, while for A, nominating either two or three guarantees his electing two. Nominating two, however, is consistent with A's minimax strategy in the 50-60% case, and provides for the event that the vote should actually fall below 60 per cent (which is much more likely, on the basis of past experience, than that it will exceed 75 per cent).

In the 75-100% matrix, A's best strategy clearly is to nominate three, which guarantees his electing all of them, while B can by no choice guarantee himself even one. It might seem that B's best choice is to nominate two or three, in the hope that A might grossly err by nominating only one. It seems more reasonable, to assume, however, that B in this case acts as if he knew the a priori distribution of A's choices to have zero probability for the strategy of nominating one.<sup>16</sup> With this assumption, B's three strategies give identical outcomes and leave no choice. However, given even the slightest positive probability (which always exists in practice) of the percentage of the vote to party A being not 75-100 but instead between 60 and 75, then B should nominate only one, as a hedge against this possibility. In addition, other considerations enter, such as the cost of candidacy, the discouraging effects of running redundant candidates in the face of certain defeat, etc., which might suggest that B should realistically choose to run no candidates. But the chance of A's vote falling below 75 per cent will practically always be large enough to justify the costs of a single candidacy; moreover, there may be a positive benefit to party morale from running one candidate rather than none.<sup>17</sup>

Solutions for the three remaining matrices are symmetrical to the ones already obtained, and, in summary, the hypothesized behavior, based upon a combination of probability and game theory principles, is that the number of nominations by each party will conform to the table below:

Per Cent of the Vote to Party A	Expected Number Nominated
	A	B
0- 25	1	3
25- 40	1	2
40- 50	2	2
50- 60	2	2
60- 75	2	1
75-100	3	1

Rationale for a minimax solution. The conservative minimax loss criterion—providing a sure minimum rather than a chance of greater gain or loss—appears particularly compatible with a stable political system. Using the minimax loss solution excludes the possibility that parties try to demolish the opposition completely, even at considerable risk to themselves. One would not expect, on the other hand, such a consensus-promoting model to apply to revolutionary parties, which might be more likely to risk all for total victory.

Alternative Solutions. One might consider the minimax regret criterion,<sup>18</sup> and ask, given a particular choice of strategy by the opponent, what the regret (in terms of a smaller number elected) would be at one's actual choice of strategy compared with one's best choice in the light of that particular strategy of the opponent. While much post mortem speculation is carried on over election results, it is not clear that this retrospective criterion is invoked before the choice is made. One can, however, compare the solutions obtained by minimizing loss with those obtained by minimizing regret. In the latter case, of course, a non-zero-sum game results, since A's regret for a particular outcome depends upon the other entries in that row of the matrix. In the case of these small matrices and limited range of payoffs, however, <sup>15</sup> In general, the minimax loss criterion calls for an individual to determine, for each of his possible strategies, the maximum loss which he could suffer (depending upon the choice made by the other party); he then chooses that strategy which minimizes his maximum loss. Equivalently, this may be considered as maximizing one's minimum gain, referred to by Luce and Raiffa, op. cit., pp. 218-219, as maximin.

<sup>16</sup> In the more than 1500 district elections since 1902, this has indeed been the case: with 75% of the vote, the majority party has never nominated less than two.

<sup>17</sup> The detrimental consequences of local atrophy of party organization are suggested in V. O. Key, Jr., American State Politics (Knopf, 1956), ch. 6.

<sup>18</sup> L. J. Savage, The Foundations of Statistics (Wiley, 1954), pp. 163-164.

it happens that precisely the same solutions result from minimaxing either regret or loss.

In general, solution of a game by the minimax principle assumes a rational opponent who will behave in the same conservative fashion, i.e., to assure himself a guaranteed minimum. Such behavior may not be optimal against an opponent who behaves in some other fashion, although it will still guarantee one the stated minimum. It may be more profitable yet, though, to utilize some more risky strategy. In particular, if some a priori preference distribution can be ascribed to the strategies of the opponent (as was done in a limited sense in the 0-25% matrix), then a solution, given this particular distribution, can be found which maximizes the expected number elected. A party nominating committee could act on such a basis, of course; the problem is to specify the a priori distribution. The number of previous elections upon which to base experience is small, and in most districts the distribution of the vote has varied considerably, affecting the choice of strategy. It seems unreasonable, therefore, to assume constant probabilities, unchanging over time. Yet if separate distributions among strategies are posited for different distributions of the vote, the number of previous elections upon which to base any such distribution becomes very small. In addition, committee membership, and perhaps party philosophy, is continually changing. Considering all these contingencies, minimax loss seems the most appropriate model for this situation.

Since the proportion of the vote received by party A is a variable, imperfectly estimated, it is not entirely certain, of course, that the vote will be within the range applicable to a particular matrix. Hence, as a first approximation to a stochastic model, the solutions just described incorporate the following feature: in the case of a matrix for which a party has two possible minimax strategies, that strategy is preferred which is consistent with the minimax strategy of one of the adjacent matrices (the one closer to the middle of the distribution). A further step might involve specifying a probability that the vote is in each of the six ranges, and solving the composite game, based upon the relations among the six probabilities. However, the present examination of empirical data, described in the next section, is based upon the simpler model.

III. ANALYSIS OF ELECTION DATA

To examine the fit of the model, data were obtained from official records<sup>19</sup> for the 1377

<sup>19</sup> Illinois Secretary of State, Blue Book of the State of Illinois (State of Illinois, 1902-1954).

biennial elections (27 in each of Illinois' 51 districts) for the years 1902-1954.<sup>20</sup> Of these 1377 elections, 187 resulted in one party receiving fewer seats than following a minimax strategy would have guaranteed it. (Of the non-minimax outcomes 29 were, however, the result of an uneven distribution of the party's vote among its candidates.) In 86 of the non-minimax outcome elections, the Democrats won fewer seats than guaranteed by minimax strategy; in 101 elections, the Republicans were the losers. The following sections examine further the factors involved in rationality of the choice of the number nominated.

Number Nominated and Per Cent Democratic. Table II displays, for each of the six ranges of the per cent of the vote which is Democratic (the same as for the six payoff matrices in Table I), the distribution of the number nominated: 1-3 (one Democrat; three Republicans), 1-2, 2-2, 2-1, 3-1. Columns add to one hundred per cent. The 24 elections (many of them involving strong third parties) which display a nomination pattern other than one of these five are omitted from the table.

From both sets of marginals, it is evident that Illinois General Assembly districts were more Republican than Democratic over this period. The table entries themselves, however, show, for the more than ninety per cent of the elections in which the Democratic vote fell between 25% and 75%, a remarkable symmetry between the two parties. The second (25-40% Dem) column (5, 81, 13, 1, 0) corresponds closely to the reverse of the fifth (25-40% Rep) column (1, 87, 10, 2, 0); likewise the third column (1, 26, 68, 5, 0) to the reverse of the fourth (0, 27, 67, 6, 0). Given a vote between 25% and 75%, the parties behave with remarkable similarity in respect to the number nominated.

As a test of the appropriateness of the particular game theory model in this situation, one may examine the distribution of the number nominated for each of the six ranges of the vote. The predicted cells (as specified in the preceding section entitled "Solution of the Game") contain 27%, 81%, 68%, 67%, 87%, and 9% of the elections in their range of the vote, the overall proportion in those cells being 69 per cent.

In over half of all elections, the vote was between 40% and 60% Democratic. In about two-thirds of these elections both parties employed the minimax strategy of nominating two <sup>20</sup> Fortunately for research purposes—although in disregard of the constitution—the Illinois Assembly had failed to redistrict during this entire period.

TABLE II. DISTRIBUTION OF ILLINOIS GENERAL ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS 1902-1954, BY NUMBER NOMINATED AND PER CENT DEMOCRATIC

Number Nominated		Per Cent Democratic for the Same Election						Total
Dem	Rep	0-25	25-40	40-50	50-60	60-75	75-100
		(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1	3	27	5	1				3
1	2	69	81	26	6	2		36
2	2	4	13	68	67	10		40½
2	1		1	5	27	87	91	20
3	1					1	9	½
Total no. of elections		77	371	419	295	145	45	1353

candidates. In another quarter of these elections, only the majority party nominated two candidates, with the result that the election was uncontested, but its outcome was the same as that obtained by use of minimax strategy. For about five per cent of the elections, however, the majority party nominated only one candidate, thereby losing a seat it could have obtained.

The case in which one party had between 60 and 75 per cent of the vote resulted in an uncontested election about five-sixths of the time. Only rarely (2 per cent for Democrats; 1 per cent for Republicans) did the party with this distinct majority fail to nominate the two candidates which it could surely have elected.

With more than 75 per cent of the vote, however, both parties were considerably reluctant to nominate the three which that proportion enabled them to elect, although the Democrats were much less likely to nominate three than the Republicans (9 per cent compared with 27 per cent).

The foregoing results convey a strong implication of non-linear utility: parties never fail to run at least one candidate; 5 per cent of the time when they could elect two, they fail to run the second candidate; but 80 per cent of the time when they could elect three, they fail to nominate a third candidate. The third seat seems less valuable to the nominating committee than the first or the second, especially for the Democrats.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>21</sup> Such non-linear utility, of course, implies a non-zero-sum game, although the more complex model resulting would necessarily describe the data somewhat better. Another possible extension of the present model would formally incorporate stochastic properties; there could be determined an expected distribution of the variable, per cent Democratic, based upon past experience, and

Insensitivity to Change. In examining various aspects of the sensitivity of the behavior of the nominating committee to change, the most striking result is the basic conservatism of both parties. No matter what political changes occur from one election to the next, by far the most likely number of nominations for any given year is the same as that for the previous election. Changes in number nominated often represent changes in the vote that occurred several years before.

Multiple Regression to Predict the Number Nominated. To investigate the association of variables with the choice of the number of candidates, multiple regressions were performed separately for Democrats and Republicans, using as dependent variables the numbers of candidates chosen at the 1275 elections of 1906-1954. Independent variables were the number nominated at the previous election; the percentage of the vote at the present election, the previous election, and the next previous election; and the occurrence of a minimax (rather than a non-minimax) outcome at the previous election.

The same general pattern of partial regression coefficients was obtained for both parties (Table III); nearly all the weight is placed on the first two variables, the number nominated at the previous election and the percentage of the vote at the present election.<sup>22</sup> Note, though, from this could be stated the probability of any given one of the six matrices obtaining in the next election. Choice of strategy would then be based upon a composite super-game, amalgamating the six matrices and their respective probabilities.

<sup>22</sup> The relevance of the latter variable may be taken as reflecting on the committee's use of estimates of the forthcoming vote—which correlates, however, .82 with the vote of the previous election.

TABLE III. PARTIAL REGRESSION COEFFICIENTS
FOR NUMBER NOMINATED AT TIME  $t$

Variable	Democrats	Republicans
Number nominated at time $t-1$	.462	.519
Per Cent Democratic* at time $t$	.470	.301
Per Cent Democratic* at time $t-1$	.012	.044
Per Cent Democratic* at time $t-2$	-.085	.027
Minimax outcome at time $t-1$	.041	-.022
Multiple Correlation	.767	.800

* For the Republicans, the second, third, and fourth partial regression coefficients are for per cent Republican, at times  $t$ ,  $t-1$ , and  $t-2$ .

that while for Democrats, the two variables are weighted about equally, for the Republicans, the number nominated in the previous year has significantly ( $p < .01$ ) more weight, showing them to behave more conservatively. The correlations of the number nominated at the present election with the number nominated at the previous election, the percentage Democratic at the present election, the previous election, and the next previous election, are all between .60 and .75, and in decreasing order as named, for both Republicans and Democrats.

Number Nominated vs. Change in Per Cent Democratic. Examination of the behavior of each party in the face of a changing vote gives additional insight into the differential role of conservatism as a correlate of choice. The following implications are drawn from Table IV: (1) change (in the number of nominations from that of the previous election)—for all values of change in the vote—comes slowly for both parties, but more so for the Republicans; (2) between the small and large vote change situations, Democrats show a larger reduction in the proportion of elections showing no change in number nominated, than do Republicans; (3)

TABLE IV. CHANGE IN NUMBER NOMINATED VS.
CHANGE IN PER CENT DEMOCRATIC

Change in Number Nominated	Change ( $\pm$ ) in Per Cent Democratic
	0-10	10-50
	(%)	(%)
Democrats
Same direction as (Dem) vote	9	26
No change in number nominated	87	72
Opposite direction from vote	4	2
Republicans
Same direction as (Rep) vote	7	12
No change in number nominated	91	84
Opposite direction from vote	2	4
Number of elections	1080	246

when the vote changed over 10 per cent, and a party did change its number of nominations, the Democrats were more likely to change in the proper direction; (4) for the Democrats, the change in the number nominated is much more likely to be in the appropriate direction if the change in the vote is large; (5) for the Republicans, however, the change in the number nominated is no more likely to be in the appropriate direction for a large change of the vote than for a small change. (The differences of statements (1) to (4) above are all significant at  $p < .01$ .)

Examination of particular years of great change in the vote further documents the conservatism. Given below are the total number of changes in number nominated, over all 51 districts for the years 1920 (when the Republicans should have been increasing their number nominated) and 1932 (when the Democrats should have been doing the same):

	Democrats			Republicans
	Up	Down	Same	Up	Down	Same
1920	1	8	42	5	1	45
1932	8	1	42	0	7	44

Some anticipation is shown, but far from adequate: in 1920, the Republicans failed to win 21 seats they could have gained by running more candidates; four years later they lost 14 seats in a similar fashion; in 1932, the Democrats lost 8 seats by failing to run enough candidates.

Number Nominated vs. Non-minimax Outcome. A similar reluctance to change the number nominated can be observed even in the case in which the previous election resulted in a lesser number of seats for a given party than the minimax strategy would have guaranteed. For the Democrats, loss of a seat by occurrence of a non-minimax outcome at the previous election increases the probability of change in the number nominated from .15 to .26; while for the Republicans, the corresponding probabilities are .10 and .20. Following a non-minimax outcome, the Democrats and Republicans each have a probability of changing the number of nominations which is only about ten per cent greater than that obtaining if the number elected were at least equal to the number guaranteed by following minimax strategy. Of the changes in the latter situation, two-thirds are in the direction of nominating more candidates; this is appropriate, since practically all of the non-minimax losses result from nominating too few, rather than too many candidates.

Correlations Over Districts. Table V presents correlations among 12 variables for the 51 districts. The variables represent the experi-

TABLE V. CORRELATIONS OVER 51 DISTRICTS

Variable	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
1. Number of contested elections	—
2. Number of non-minimax losses: Dem	-.43	—
3. Number of non-minimax losses: Rep	-.40	-.17	—
4. Number of changes in no. nom'd: Dem	.14	-.08	-.12	—
5. Number of changes in no. nom'd: Rep	.01	.21	.05	-.03	—
6. Mean % Democratic	-.04	.67	-.41	-.23	.19	—
7. Absolute value of (mean % Dem-50%)	-.57	.24	.44	.11	-.07	-.28	—
8. Variance (over years) in % Dem	-.27	.43	.15	.04	.23	.10	.11	—
9. Change in % Democratic, 1902-1954	-.20	.62	-.06	-.11	.05	.42	.06	.70	—
10. Var. of 2 yr change in % Democratic	-.42	.58	.20	.00	.19	.29	.17	.64	.59	—
11. Var. of presidential yr change in % Dem	-.33	.41	-.02	.01	.17	.20	.03	.37	.34	.72	—
12. Var. of off-year change in % Dem	-.21	.31	.25	.18	.09	.09	.25	.59	.28	.54	.14 ence of each district over the period 1902-1954, and are as follows:

1. Number of elections in which there were a total of more than three candidates for the three seats.

2. Number of elections in which the Democrats elected fewer than guaranteed them by following the minimax strategy.

3. Number of elections in which the Republicans elected fewer than guaranteed them by following the minimax strategy.

4. Number of elections for which the number nominated by the Democrats represents a change from the previous election.

5. Number of elections for which the number nominated by the Republicans represents a change from the previous election.

6. Mean, over all years, of the variable, per cent Democratic.

7. Absolute value of the difference between 50% and variable (6) above.

8. Variance, over all years, of the variable, per cent Democratic.

9. Change in per cent Democratic from 1902 to 1954.

10. Variance of the change in per cent Democratic from the previous election.

11. Variance of the change in per cent Democratic from the second previous election, for the 12 presidential election years, 1908-1952.

12. Variance of the change in per cent Democratic from the second previous election, for the 13 non-presidential election years, 1906-1954.

The relation of non-minimax losses (variables 2 and 3) to the other variables is of particular interest. Districts having more contested elections had fewer non-minimax outcomes, although even in these districts, far from all of the elections are contested. Perhaps the willingness to contest is the critical element. Each party has the most non-minimax losses in those districts in which its mean proportion of the vote is highest. This may again reflect the decreasing utility of the third seat. For the Democrats, non-minimax losses are also greater in those districts where the mean vote has been increasing over time. The number of contested elections is much greater in those districts where the mean vote is close to 50 per cent.

Correlation Over Years. Correlations were also computed (Table VI) among 12 variables for the 25 election years, 1906-1954 (1902 and 1904 could not be used, since some of the variables involved changes from two or four years earlier). For each year, the variables in Table VI represent all 51 districts. Variables 2-7, and 10,

TABLE VI. CORRELATIONS OVER 25 BIENNIAL ELECTION YEARS, 1906-1954

Variable	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
1. Year	—
2. Number of contested elections	.42	—
3. Number of non-minimax losses: Dem	.14	.38	—
4. Number of non-minimax losses: Rep	-.25	-.07	-.26	—
5. Number of changes in no. nom'd: Dem	-.36	-.58	-.36	.32	—
6. Number of changes in no. nom'd: Rep	-.43	.24	.31	-.07	-.42	—
7. Mean % Democratic	.45	.44	.71	-.69	-.54	.19	—
8. Mean of 2 yr change in % Democratic	-.06	-.10	.27	-.67	-.34	.37	.44	—
9. Mean of 4 yr change in % Democratic	-.06	.15	.35	-.40	-.44	.64	.44	.46	—
10. Variance in % Democratic	.39	.20	-.03	.01	.10	-.17	-.08	.02	-.13	—
11. Variance of 2 yr change in % Dem	-.74	-.05	-.12	.52	.38	.37	-.53	-.09	-.07	-.02	—
12. Variance of 4 yr change in % Dem	-.70	-.37	-.18	.04	.20	.30	-.31	.38	.00	-.18	.59

correspond to variables 1-6, and 8, respectively in the correlations over districts. The other variables are:

1. Year of the election: 1906, 1908, . . . , 1954.

8. Mean, over all districts, of the variable, change in per cent Democratic from the previous election.

9. Mean, over all districts, of the variable, change in per cent Democratic from the second previous election.

11. Variance, over all districts, of the variable, change in per cent Democratic from the previous election.

12. Variance, over all districts, of the variable, change in per cent Democratic from the second previous election.

The changes associated with time have been considerable in Illinois, and many significant relations emerge. Paralleling the previous finding concerning districts, non-minimax losses are highly related to the party strength that year, as well as to the increase in the party's vote from two and four years previous. This is true for both parties. Both parties are also more likely to change the number of nominations from the previous year when their vote is dropping than when it is rising.

A number of variables change with time itself: an increase in the number of contested elections; decreases in the number of changes in the number nominated from the previous election (for both parties); an increase in the Democratic vote; an increase in the variance among districts; and sharp decreases in the variance of the change from the previous election or the second previous election. Changes over time are further examined in the next section.

Changes in the Vote, 1902-1954. Figure 1 gives the mean Democratic vote of the 51 counties for each of the 27 biennial elections, 1902-1954.

It can be seen that the variance among the means of the districts for presidential years is much greater than that among off-years—in fact, more than twice as great. However, the variance among districts within years is much less for presidential years than for off-years. Associated with presidential voting, then, is a unifying effect among districts. However, the unity among districts of the presidential years is less stable than the relative diversity among districts of the off-years. If the presidential election could be said to bring the districts together, then it tends to unite them at a different level from election to election, following which the districts return in the off-years to a more stable diversity.<sup>23</sup>

FIG. 1. Mean per cent Democratic of all 51 districts, 1902-1954.

In general, the variance among districts is greater than the variance among years, and the greater variance among districts is associated particularly with the division between Cook county (Chicago and suburbs) and the rest of the state. Moreover, this division has been increasing over time. In 1960, the average Democratic vote in the Cook county districts was 57 per cent, compared to 46 per cent for the remaining districts.

IV. IMPLICATIONS

It is apparent from the preceding sections that the particular game theory model employed here provides a partial, though not a complete description of the behavior of the nominating committee in determining the number of candidates to run. This section examines some factors relevant to the agreement and disagreement of data and model.

Rationality. Game theory may be employed as a model of rational behavior, defined in terms of minimaxing a certain quantity. In this sense, a considerable amount of rationality was demonstrated by the nominating committees in their determination of the number of candidates: in 69 per cent of all elections, both parties employed the predicted strategy.

It is, however, for both parties, a rationality associated with a basic conservatism. A number of years often elapse between a change in the vote and the corresponding adjustment in the number nominated. There is some question whether the effective behavior which is shown results from a considered rationality, or simply from the conservatism of not changing the number nominated, which usually turns out to be the best thing to do. Or perhaps, more significantly, the general decision for conservatism has been made on a rational basis, since this is generally effective.

Utility and Job Security. The principal departures from the model occur in the relatively rare cases in which one party has more than seventy-five per cent of the vote. In these cases, however, the departure is very considerable, with parties nominating three candidates only about 20 per cent of the time. As has been previously suggested, there is a strong implication of non-linear utility particularly with respect to the election of third candidates. Further investigation has revealed some possible bases for this non-linearity.

A relevant consideration seems to be the individual job security of incumbents (or less often of other candidates). Nominating committees may know that they can elect three candidates with 75 per cent of the vote, and that even if the vote falls somewhat below that, they will surely elect two. But the critical question to them is "Which two?" The nominating committee naturally seeks to control who is nominated, as well as the number nominated. Hence, coalitions may form between the two stronger forces within the party and militate against adding a third nomination which would reduce the certainty of the incumbents' reelection.<sup>24</sup>

In addition, there is evidence that in certain cases, again most likely to occur when one party has 75 per cent of the vote, bi-partisan agreements are reached to allow the minority a seat, in exchange for what in game theory would be termed an appropriate "side payment." The bi-partisan agreement is also seen to alleviate the job-security problem, and perhaps to satisfy both parties, inasmuch as, if the utilities are non-linear, the side payment can be larger than the utility of the majority's third member and less than the utility of the minority's first member.

Minority Representation. In terms of the intent of the law—to provide minority representation—the game theory solution is optimal. If both parties follow a minimax strategy, and divide their votes equally among all their candidates, the result will be to give the minority one seat whenever it has as much as 25 per cent of the vote. This end has been generally achieved, as Blair has noted.<sup>25</sup> Indeed, as we have seen, nearly all of the mal-representation that has occurred has been in the direction of giving the minority over-representation.

<sup>23</sup> A related theory, taking into account the differential composition of the electorate in Presidential and off-years, has been proposed in A. Campbell's "Surge and Decline: A Study of Electoral Change," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 24 (1960), pp. 397-418. See also V. O. Key, Jr., "Partisanship and County Office: The Case of Ohio," this REVIEW, Vol. 47 (1953), p. 526; and Malcolm Moos, Presidents, Politics, and Coattails (Baltimore, 1952), pp. 13n, 110.

<sup>24</sup> The possibility of coalitions of two against one would seem to make job-security-initiated pressure against an additional nomination more likely against a third candidate when the vote is 75%, than against a second candidate when the vote is 50%.

<sup>25</sup> Op. cit.

In the earlier days of cumulative voting in Illinois, some "good government" groups protested the lack of choice available to the voter in the general election—with many elections having only three candidates, no more than the number of seats—and hence proposed that parties be required to run full slates. This would, of course, negate the basic purpose of this scheme of minority representation. In addition, several writers have implied that a non-contested election represented collusion, but this is not necessarily so. Such a case may indeed be the best strategy for each party, and may also represent the only way in which nearly proportional representation can be assured.

A modification might be proposed, however, to guarantee more proportional representation by removing the uncertainty which influences committees to limit the number of candidates unnecessarily (and unprofitably). Allow the primary elections to specify the order of election of candidates, and the number of votes for the party (without regard to candidates) in the general election to determine the number elected from each party, in the already-specified order. Better yet, let one election suffice for both functions, by allowing the votes within a party to determine the ordering of candidates within that party, and the total number of votes cast for each party to determine the number of candidates it elects.<sup>26</sup> Each voter would, as before, have a number of votes equal to the number of candidates to be elected, and would still be able to cross party lines if he desired. Thus proportional representation could be achieved to a much greater extent, unhampered by possibly non-optimal committee decisions.

<sup>26</sup> This system has some similarity to the French provision for apparentements in their legislative elections of 1951 and 1956. But in France it was only the order of candidates among parties in an alliance, and not (for practical purposes) within parties, that was determined by the votes. American party organizations, like the French, would undoubtedly prefer to retain control of the intraparty ordering; insofar as their assent is necessary to electoral reform, some compromise in the direction of a list system might be required, although this would, however, run contrary to the presumed intention of the present direct primary law.

TWO FACES OF POWER<sup>1</sup>

PETER BACHRACH AND MORTON S. BARATZ

Bryn Mawr College

The concept of power remains elusive despite the recent and prolific outpourings of case studies on community power. Its elusiveness is dramatically demonstrated by the regularity of disagreement as to the locus of community power between the sociologists and the political scientists. Sociologically oriented researchers have consistently found that power is highly centralized, while scholars trained in political science have just as regularly concluded that in "their" communities power is widely diffused.<sup>2</sup> Presumably, this explains why the latter group styles itself "pluralist," its counterpart "elitist."

There seems no room for doubt that the sharply divergent findings of the two groups are the product, not of sheer coincidence, but of fundamental differences in both their underlying assumptions and research methodology. The political scientists have contended that these differences in findings can be explained by the faulty approach and presuppositions of the sociologists. We contend in this paper that the pluralists themselves have not grasped the whole truth of the matter; that while their criticisms of the elitists are sound, they, like the elitists, utilize an approach and assumptions which predetermine their conclusions. Our argument is cast within the frame of our central thesis: that there are two faces of power, neither of which the sociologists see and only one of which the political scientists see.

I

Against the elitist approach to power several criticisms may be, and have been levelled.<sup>3</sup> One has to do with its basic premise that in every human institution there is an ordered system of power, a "power structure" which is an integral part and the mirror image of the organization's stratification. This postulate the pluralists emphatically—and, to our mind, correctly—reject, on the ground that nothing categorical can be assumed about power in any community. . . . If anything, there seems to be an unspoken notion among pluralist researchers that at bottom nobody dominates in a town, so that their first question is not likely to be, "Who runs this community?" but rather, "Does anyone at all run this community?" The first query is somewhat like, "Have you stopped beating your wife?" in that virtually any response short of total unwillingness to answer will supply the researchers with a "power elite" along the lines presupposed by the stratification theory.<sup>4</sup>

Equally objectionable to the pluralists—and to us—is the sociologists' hypothesis that the power structure tends to be stable over time.

Pluralists hold that power may be tied to issues, and issues can be fleeting or persistent, provoking coalitions among interested groups and citizens, ranging in their duration from momentary to semi-permanent. . . . To presume that the set of coalitions which exists in the community at any given time is a timelessly stable aspect of social structure is to introduce systematic inaccuracies into one's description of social reality.<sup>5</sup>

A third criticism of the elitist model is that it wrongly equates reputed with actual power:

If a man's major life work is banking, the pluralist presumes he will spend his time at the bank, and not in manipulating community decisions. This presumption holds until the banker's activities and participations indicate otherwise. . . . If we

<sup>3</sup> See especially N. W. Polsby, op. cit., p. 475f.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., pp. 476.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., pp. 478–79.

<sup>1</sup> This paper is an outgrowth of a seminar in Problems of Power in Contemporary Society, conducted jointly by the authors for graduate students and undergraduate majors in political science and economics.

<sup>2</sup> Compare, for example, the sociological studies of Floyd Hunter, Community Power Structure (Chapel Hill, 1953); Roland Pellegrini and Charles H. Coates, "Absentee-Owned Corporations and Community Power Structure," American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 61 (March 1956), pp. 413–19; and Robert O. Schulze, "Economic Dominants and Community Power Structure," American Sociological Review, Vol. 23 (February 1958), pp. 3–9; with political science studies of Wallace S. Sayre and Herbert Kaufman, Governing New York City (New York, 1960); Robert A. Dahl, Who Governs? (New Haven, 1961); and Norton E. Long and George Belknap, "A Research Program on Leadership and Decision-Making in Metropolitan Areas" (New York, Governmental Affairs Institute, 1956). See also Nelson W. Polsby, "How to Study Community Power: The Pluralist Alternative," Journal of Politics, Vol. 22 (August, 1960), pp. 474–84.

presume that the banker is "really" engaged in running the community, there is practically no way of disconfirming this notion, even if it is totally erroneous. On the other hand, it is easy to spot the banker who really does run community affairs when we presume he does not, because his activities will make this fact apparent.<sup>6</sup>

This is not an exhaustive bill of particulars; there are flaws other than these in the sociological model and methodology<sup>7</sup>—including some which the pluralists themselves have not noticed. But to go into this would not materially serve our current purposes. Suffice it simply to observe that whatever the merits of their own approach to power, the pluralists have effectively exposed the main weaknesses of the elitist model.

As the foregoing quotations make clear, the pluralists concentrate their attention, not upon the sources of power, but its exercise. Power to them means "participation in decision-making"<sup>8</sup> and can be analyzed only after "careful examination of a series of concrete decisions."<sup>9</sup> As a result, the pluralist researcher is uninterested in the reputedly powerful. His concerns instead are to (a) select for study a number of "key" as opposed to "routine" political decisions, (b) identify the people who took an active part in the decision-making process, (c) obtain a full account of their actual behavior while the policy conflict was being resolved, and (d) determine and analyze the specific outcome of the conflict.

The advantages of this approach, relative to the elitist alternative, need no further exposition. The same may not be said, however, about its defects—two of which seem to us to be of fundamental importance. One is that the model takes no account of the fact that power may be, and often is, exercised by confining the scope of decision-making to relatively "safe" issues. The other is that the model provides no objective criteria for distinguishing between "important" and "unimportant" issues arising in the political arena.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., pp. 480–81.

<sup>7</sup> See especially Robert A. Dahl, "A Critique of the Ruling-Elite Model," this REVIEW, Vol. 52 (June 1958), pp. 463–69; and Lawrence J. R. Herson, "In the Footsteps of Community Power," this REVIEW, Vol. 55 (December 1961), pp. 817–31.

<sup>8</sup> This definition originated with Harold D. Lasswell and Abraham Kaplan, Power and Society (New Haven, 1950), p. 75.

<sup>9</sup> Robert A. Dahl, "A Critique of the Ruling-Elite Model," loc. cit., p. 466.

II

There is no gainsaying that an analysis grounded entirely upon what is specific and visible to the outside observer is more "scientific" than one based upon pure speculation. To put it another way,

If we can get our social life stated in terms of activity, and of nothing else, we have not indeed succeeded in measuring it, but we have at least reached a foundation upon which a coherent system of measurements can be built up. . . . We shall cease to be blocked by the intervention of unmeasurable elements, which claim to be themselves the real causes of all that is happening, and which by their spook-like arbitrariness make impossible any progress toward dependable knowledge.<sup>10</sup>

The question is, however, how can one be certain in any given situation that the "unmeasurable elements" are inconsequential, are not of decisive importance? Cast in slightly different terms, can a sound concept of power be predicated on the assumption that power is totally embodied and fully reflected in "concrete decisions" or in activity bearing directly upon their making?

We think not. Of course power is exercised when A participates in the making of decisions that affect B. But power is also exercised when A devotes his energies to creating or reinforcing social and political values and institutional practices that limit the scope of the political process to public consideration of only those issues which are comparatively innocuous to A. To the extent that A succeeds in doing this, B is prevented, for all practical purposes, from bringing to the fore any issues that might in their resolution be seriously detrimental to A's set of preferences.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Arthur Bentley, The Process of Government (Chicago, 1908), p. 202, quoted in Polsby, op. cit., p. 481n.

<sup>11</sup> As is perhaps self-evident, there are similarities in both faces of power. In each, A participates in decisions and thereby adversely affects B. But there is an important difference between the two: in the one case, A openly participates; in the other, he participates only in the sense that he works to sustain those values and rules of procedure that help him keep certain issues out of the public domain. True enough, participation of the second kind may at times be overt; that is the case, for instance, in cloture fights in the Congress. But the point is that it need not be. In fact, when the maneuver is most successfully executed, it neither involves nor can be identified with decisions arrived at on specific issues.

Situations of this kind are common. Consider, for example, the case—surely not unfamiliar to this audience—of the discontented faculty member in an academic institution headed by a tradition-bound executive. Aggrieved about a long-standing policy around which a strong vested interest has developed, the professor resolves in the privacy of his office to launch an attack upon the policy at the next faculty meeting. But, when the moment of truth is at hand, he sits frozen in silence. Why? Among the many possible reasons, one or more of these could have been of crucial importance: (a) the professor was fearful that his intended action would be interpreted as an expression of his disloyalty to the institution; or (b) he decided that, given the beliefs and attitudes of his colleagues on the faculty, he would almost certainly constitute on this issue a minority of one; or (c) he concluded that, given the nature of the law-making process in the institution, his proposed remedies would be pigeonholed permanently. But whatever the case, the central point to be made is the same: to the extent that a person or group—consciously or unconsciously—creates or reinforces barriers to the public airing of policy conflicts, that person or group has power. Or, as Professor Schattschneider has so admirably put it:

All forms of political organization have a bias in favor of the exploitation of some kinds of conflict and the suppression of others because organization is the mobilization of bias. Some issues are organized into politics while others are organized out.<sup>12</sup>

Is such bias not relevant to the study of power? Should not the student be continuously alert to its possible existence in the human institution that he studies, and be ever prepared to examine the forces which brought it into being and sustain it? Can he safely ignore the possibility, for instance, that an individual or group in a community participates more vigorously in supporting the nondecision-making process than in participating in actual decisions within the process? Stated differently, can the researcher overlook the chance that some person or association could limit decision-making to relatively non-controversial matters, by influencing community values and political procedures and rituals, notwithstanding that there are in the community serious but latent power conflicts?<sup>13</sup> To do so is, in our judgment, to overlook the less apparent, but nonetheless extremely important, face of power.

III

In his critique of the "ruling-elite model," Professor Dahl argues that "the hypothesis of the existence of a ruling elite can be strictly tested only if . . . [t] here is a fair sample of cases involving key political decisions in which the preferences of the hypothetical ruling elite run counter to those of any other likely group that might be suggested."<sup>14</sup> With this assertion we have two complaints. One we have already discussed, viz., in erroneously assuming that power is solely reflected in concrete decisions, Dahl thereby excludes the possibility that in the community in question there is a group capable of preventing contests from arising on issues of importance to it. Beyond that, however, by ignoring the less apparent face of power Dahl and those who accept his pluralist approach are unable adequately to differentiate between a "key" and a "routine" political decision.

Nelson Polsby, for example, proposes that "by pre-selecting as issues for study those which are generally agreed to be significant, pluralist researchers can test stratification theory."<sup>15</sup> He is silent, however, on how the researcher is to determine what issues are "generally agreed to be significant," and on how the researcher is to appraise the reliability of the agreement. In fact, Polsby is guilty here of the same fault he himself has found with elitist methodology: by presupposing that in any community there are significant issues in the political arena, he takes for granted the very question which is in doubt. He accepts as issues what are reputed to be issues. As a result, his findings are fore-ordained. For even if there is no "truly" significant issue in the community society like ours a ruling elite might be so influential over ideas, attitudes, and opinions that a kind of false consensus will exist—not the phony consensus of a terroristic totalitarian dictatorship but the manipulated and superficially self-imposed adherence to the norms and goals of the elite by broad sections of a community. . . . This objection points to the need to be circumspect in interpreting the evidence." But that he largely misses our point is clear from the succeeding sentence: "Yet here, too, it seems to me that the hypothesis cannot be satisfactorily confirmed without something equivalent to the test I have proposed," and that is "by an examination of a series of concrete cases where key decisions are made. . . ."

<sup>14</sup> Op. cit., p. 466.

<sup>15</sup> Op. cit., p. 478.

<sup>12</sup> E. E. Schattschneider, The Semi-Sovereign People (New York, 1960), p. 71.

<sup>13</sup> Dahl partially concedes this point when he observes ("A Critique of the Ruling-Elite Model," pp. 468-69) that "one could argue that even in a

under study, there is every likelihood that Polsby (or any like-minded researcher) will find one or some and, after careful study, reach the appropriate pluralistic conclusions.<sup>16</sup>

Dahl's definition of "key political issues" in his essay on the ruling-élite model is open to the same criticism. He states that it is "a necessary although possibly not a sufficient condition that the [key] issue should involve actual disagreement in preferences among two or more groups."<sup>17</sup> In our view, this is an inadequate characterization of a "key political issue," simply because groups can have disagreements in preferences on unimportant as well as on important issues. Elite preferences which border on the indifferent are certainly not significant in determining whether a monolithic or polythitic distribution of power prevails in a given community. Using Dahl's definition of "key political issues," the researcher would have little difficulty in finding such in practically any community; and it would not be surprising then if he ultimately concluded that power in the community was widely diffused.

The distinction between important and unimportant issues, we believe, cannot be made intelligently in the absence of an analysis of the "mobilization of bias" in the community; of the dominant values and the political myths, rituals, and institutions which tend to favor the vested interests of one or more groups, relative to others. Armed with this knowledge, one could conclude that any challenge to the predominant values or to the established "rules of the game" would constitute an "important" issue; all else, unimportant. To be sure, judgments of this kind cannot be entirely objective. But to avoid making them in a study of power is both to neglect a highly significant aspect of power and thereby to undermine the only sound basis for discriminating between "key" and "routine" decisions. In effect, we contend, the pluralists have made each of these mistakes; that is to say, they have done just that for which Kaufman and Jones so severely taxed Floyd Hunter: they have begun "their structure at the mezzanine without showing us a lobby or foundation,"<sup>18</sup> i.e., they have begun by studying the issues rather than the values and biases that are built into the political system and that, for the student of power, give real meaning to those issues which do enter the political arena.

IV

There is no better fulcrum for our critique of the pluralist model than Dahl's recent study of power in New Haven.<sup>19</sup>

At the outset it may be observed that Dahl does not attempt in this work to define his concept, "key political decision." In asking whether the "Notables" of New Haven are "influential overtly or covertly in the making of government decisions," he simply states that he will examine "three different 'issue-areas' in which important public decisions are made: nominations by the two political parties, urban redevelopment, and public education." These choices are justified on the grounds that "nominations determine which persons will hold public office. The New Haven redevelopment program measured by its cost—present and potential—is the largest in the country. Public education, aside from its intrinsic importance, is the costliest item in the city's budget." Therefore, Dahl concludes, "It is reasonable to expect . . . that the relative influence over public officials wielded by the . . . Notables would be revealed by an examination of their participation in these three areas of activity."<sup>20</sup>

The difficulty with this latter statement is that it is evident from Dahl's own account that the Notables are in fact uninterested in two of the three "key" decisions he has chosen. In regard to the public school issue, for example, Dahl points out that many of the Notables live in the suburbs and that those who do live in New Haven choose in the main to send their children to private schools. "As a consequence," he writes, "their interest in the public schools is ordinarily rather slight."<sup>21</sup> Nominations by the two political parties as an important "issue-area," is somewhat analogous to the public schools, in that the apparent lack of interest among the Notables in this issue is partially accounted for by their suburban residence—because of which they are disqualified from holding public office in New Haven. Indeed, Dahl himself concedes that with respect to both these issues the Notables are largely indifferent: "Business leaders might ignore the public schools or the political parties without any sharp awareness that their indifference would hurt their pocketbooks . . ." He goes on, however, to say that

<sup>16</sup> As he points out, the expectations of the pluralist researchers "have seldom been disappointed." (Ibid., p. 477).

<sup>17</sup> Op. cit., p. 467.

<sup>18</sup> Herbert Kaufman and Victor Jones, "The Mystery of Power," Public Administration Review, Vol. 14 (Summer 1954), p. 207.

<sup>19</sup> Robert A. Dahl, Who Governs? (New Haven, 1961).

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., p. 64.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., p. 70.

the prospect of profound changes [as a result of the urban-redevelopment program] in ownership, physical layout, and usage of property in the downtown area and the effects of these changes on the commercial and industrial prosperity of New Haven were all related in an obvious way to the daily concerns of businessmen.<sup>22</sup>

Thus, if one believes—as Professor Dahl did when he wrote his critique of the ruling-elite model—that an issue, to be considered as important, “should involve actual disagreement in preferences among two or more groups,”<sup>23</sup> then clearly he has now for all practical purposes written off public education and party nominations as key “issue-areas.” But this point aside, it appears somewhat dubious at best that “the relative influence over public officials wielded by the Social Notables” can be revealed by an examination of their nonparticipation in areas in which they were not interested.

Furthermore, we would not rule out the possibility that even on those issues to which they appear indifferent, the Notables may have a significant degree of indirect influence. We would suggest, for example, that although they send their children to private schools, the Notables do recognize that public school expenditures have a direct bearing upon their own tax liabilities. This being so, and given their strong representation on the New Haven Board of Finance,<sup>24</sup> the expectation must be that it is in their direct interest to play an active role in fiscal policy-making, in the establishment of the educational budget in particular. But as to this, Dahl is silent: he inquires not at all into either the decisions made by the Board of Finance with respect to education nor into their impact upon the public schools.<sup>25</sup> Let it be understood clearly that in making these points we are not attempting to refute Dahl's contention that the Notables lack power in New Haven. What we are saying, however, is that this conclusion is not adequately supported by his analysis of the “issue-areas” of public education and party nominations.

The same may not be said of redevelopment. This issue is by any reasonable standard important for purposes of determining whether New Haven is ruled by “the hidden hand of an economic elite.”<sup>26</sup> For the Economic Notables have taken an active interest in the program and, beyond that, the socio-economic implications of it are not necessarily in harmony with the basic interests and values of businesses and businessmen.

In an effort to assure that the redevelopment program would be acceptable to what he dubbed “the biggest muscles” in New Haven, Mayor Lee created the Citizens Action Commission (CAC) and appointed to it primarily representatives of the economic elite. It was given the function of overseeing the work of the mayor and other officials involved in redevelopment, and, as well, the responsibility for organizing and encouraging citizens' participation in the program through an extensive committee system.

In order to weigh the relative influence of the mayor, other key officials, and the members of the CAC, Dahl reconstructs “all the important decisions on redevelopment and renewal between 1950–58 . . . [to] determine which individuals most often initiated the proposals that were finally adopted or most often successfully vetoed the proposals of the others.”<sup>27</sup> The results of this test indicate that the mayor and his development administrator were by far the most influential, and that the “muscles” on the Commission, excepting in a few trivial instances, “never directly initiated, opposed, vetoed, or altered any proposal brought before them. . . .”<sup>28</sup>

This finding is, in our view, unreliable, not so much because Dahl was compelled to make a in past years, but not actual decisions of the Board of Finance or their effects on the public school system.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., p. 71.

<sup>23</sup> Op. cit., p. 467.

<sup>24</sup> Who Governs?, p. 82. Dahl points out that “the main policy thrust of the Economic Notables is to oppose tax increases; this leads them to oppose expenditures for anything more than minimal traditional city services. In this effort their two most effective weapons ordinarily are the mayor and the Board of Finance. The policies of the Notables are most easily achieved under a strong mayor if his policies coincide with theirs or under a weak mayor if they have the support of the Board of Finance. . . . New Haven mayors have continued to find it expedient to create confidence in their financial policies among businessmen by appointing them to the Board.” (pp. 81–2)

<sup>25</sup> Dahl does discuss in general terms (pp. 79–84) changes in the level of tax rates and assessments

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., p. 124.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid. “A rough test of a person's overt or covert influence,” Dahl states in the first section of the book, “is the frequency with which he successfully initiates an important policy over the opposition of others, or vetoes policies initiated by others, or initiates a policy where no opposition appears.” (Ibid., p. 66)

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., p. 131.

subjective selection of what constituted important decisions within what he felt to be an important "issue-area," as because the finding was based upon an excessively narrow test of influence. To measure relative influence solely in terms of the ability to initiate and veto proposals is to ignore the possible exercise of influence or power in limiting the scope of initiation. How, that is to say, can a judgment be made as to the relative influence of Mayor Lee and the CAC without knowing (through prior study of the political and social views of all concerned) the proposals that Lee did not make because he anticipated that they would provoke strenuous opposition and, perhaps, sanctions on the part of the CAC?<sup>29</sup>

In sum, since he does not recognize both faces of power, Dahl is in no position to evaluate the relative influence or power of the initiator and decision-maker, on the one hand, and of those persons, on the other, who may have been indirectly instrumental in preventing potentially dangerous issues from being raised.<sup>30</sup> As a re-

<sup>29</sup> Dahl is, of course, aware of the "law of anticipated reactions." In the case of the mayor's relationship with the CAC, Dahl notes that Lee was "particularly skillful in estimating what the CAC could be expected to support or reject." (p. 137). However, Dahl was not interested in analyzing or appraising to what extent the CAC limited Lee's freedom of action. Because of his restricted concept of power, Dahl did not consider that the CAC might in this respect have exercised power. That the CAC did not initiate or veto actual proposals by the mayor was to Dahl evidence enough that the CAC was virtually powerless; it might as plausibly be evidence that the CAC was (in itself or in what it represented) so powerful that Lee ventured nothing it would find worth quarreling with.

<sup>30</sup> The fact that the initiator of decisions also refrains—because he anticipates adverse reactions—from initiating other proposals does not obviously lessen the power of the agent who limited his initiative powers. Dahl missed this point: "It is," he writes, "all the more improbable, then, that a secret cabal of Notables dominates the public life of New Haven through means so clandestine that not one of the fifty prominent citizens interviewed in the course of this study—citizens who had participated extensively in various decisions—hinted at the existence of such a cabal. . . ." (p. 185).

In conceiving of elite domination exclusively in the form of a conscious cabal exercising the power of decision-making and vetoing, he overlooks a more subtle form of domination; one in which those who actually dominate are not conscious of sult, he unduly emphasizes the importance of initiating, deciding, and vetoing, and in the process casts the pluralist conclusions of his study into serious doubt.

V

We have contended in this paper that a fresh approach to the study of power is called for, an approach based upon a recognition of the two faces of power. Under this approach the researcher would begin—not, as does the sociologist who asks, "Who rules?" nor as does the pluralist who asks, "Does anyone have power?"—but by investigating the particular "mobilization of bias" in the institution under scrutiny. Then, having analyzed the dominant values, the myths and the established political procedures and rules of the game, he would make a careful inquiry into which persons or groups, if any, gain from the existing bias and which, if any, are handicapped by it. Next, he would investigate the dynamics of nondecision-making; that is, he would examine the extent to which and the manner in which the status quo oriented persons and groups influence those community values and those political institutions (as, e.g., the unanimity "rule" of New York City's Board of Estimate<sup>31</sup>) which tend to limit the scope of actual decision-making to "safe" issues. Finally, using his knowledge of the restrictive face of power as a foundation for analysis and as a standard for distinguishing between "key" and "routine" political decisions, the researcher would, after the manner of the pluralists, analyze participation in decision-making of concrete issues.

We reject in advance as unimpressive the possible criticism that this approach to the study of power is likely to prove fruitless because it goes beyond an investigation of what is objectively measurable. In reacting against the subjective aspects of the sociological model of power, the pluralists have, we believe, made the mistake of discarding "unmeasurable elements" as unreal. It is ironical that, by so doing, they have exposed themselves to the same fundamental criticism they have so forcefully levelled against the elitists: their approach to and assumptions about power predetermine their findings and conclusions.

it themselves, simply because their position of dominance has never seriously been challenged.

<sup>31</sup> Sayre and Kaufman, op. cit., p. 640. For perceptive study of the "mobilization of bias" in a rural American community, see Arthur Vidich and Joseph Bensman, Small Town in Mass Society (Princeton, 1958).

INFLUENCE AND INTERACTION IN A STATE LEGISLATIVE BODY

WAYNE L. FRANCIS*

Syracuse University

The purpose of this article is to investigate distributions of influence in a legislative body, to spell out the resulting hypotheses, to introduce a method for estimating the degree of interaction between legislators, and to demonstrate the relevance of specific indicators to the study of legislative behavior. The methodological task falls somewhere between the small group laboratory situation and the more complex arena of community decision-making. Intense observation, control, and precision are sacrificed in favor of a real and vital situation. The analysis of a relatively self-sufficient political entity is lost in favor of maintaining some of the advantages of laboratory research. The universe selected for this study consists of fifty people who must directly or indirectly, but not remotely, rely upon each other in order to satisfy their official purposes.

I. DISTRIBUTION OF INFLUENCE

Data classified here under the term "influence" are accumulated from responses to nine items included in a structured interview form. The items were administered to 47 of 50 members of the 1961 Indiana Senate while the 1961 session was in progress. The responses represent "attributed" influence; that is, each response is treated as a reflection of the degree of influence one senator attributes to another.

Influence Data. The reliability of attribution data is a function of experimental conditions. The writer judged that the conditions of this experiment were favorable. The respondents were members of a face-to-face group where knowledge about other members is likely to be relatively great, especially in view of the fact that the continuity of membership from session to session has been high. The respondents were encouraged to make only those choices about which they had information. The sample approached the total universe about which conclusions are drawn. And finally, pre-session interviewing contacts and the usual assurance of anonymity aided in establishing the proper rapport. For reasons of convenience the term "attributed" will not be reiterated in the presentation of data. It should suffice to keep in mind that interview responses are classified under "influence" because the key word in the questions asked of legislators is the word "influential."

The first question asked was read as follows:

Generally speaking and regardless of the legislator's formal position, who would you say are the most influential members of your chamber when it comes to determining policy?

The second question was stated in the following way:

Regardless of the legislator's formal position, who would you say are the most influential members of your chamber in each of the following areas when it comes to determining policy?

Eight areas were then considered:

- |                     |                            |
|---------------------|----------------------------|
| 1. Local Government | 5. Labor                   |
| 2. Agriculture      | 6. Business                |
| 3. Education        | 7. Taxation                |
| 4. Appropriations   | 8. Benevolent Institutions |

Legislators were invited to supply as many names as they wished for each item. Of the 25 Democrats and 22 Republicans interviewed for these items, no respondent named only his own party associates.<sup>1</sup> Approximately five names per respondent were obtained from the general influence question; the substantive area question elicited approximately two names per respondent for each item. Some respondents made no choice for certain items. Four of the substantive areas utilized reflect the names of Senate Committees (Agriculture, Education, Labor, Benevolent Institutions), the others do not. The distinction in design was made in order to avoid a group of responses that might adhere strictly to the formal structure of the legislature.

Senators were grouped and ranked according to the following distinctions:

1. General Influence—the number of times they

<sup>1</sup> The Democrats held 26 seats and the Republicans 24. The Democratic majority was the first in the Indiana Senate since 1939.

* Financial support for my stay at the 1961 Indiana legislative session came from the Indiana Citizenship Clearing House. I am in debt to Charles S. Hyneman for access to materials he has gathered through a Social Science Research Council grant, and to David R. Derge for his aid in developing an earlier manuscript upon which this article is based.

were named in response to the question on general influence.

2. Specific Area Influence—the total number of times they were named in all substantive areas taken together.
3. The number of times they were named in each substantive area.
4. The number of substantive areas in which they were mentioned.

The distribution of responses for (1), (2) and (3) consistently characterizes a large majority of senators as having relatively little or no influence. The number of mentions tends to accelerate when moving from the least to the most frequently mentioned senator, in a graphic approximation of the "J" curve. In the substantive areas with designations that do not coincide with the names of Senate Committees, the responses tend to be spread among more members and are not so concentrated upon one or two members. The data reveal the same distributions for each political party, when political party is held constant.

General Influence and Specific Area Influence. The ten senators most frequently mentioned in the responses to the general influence question are named in a large number of substantive areas as well (Table I). Eight of the senators ranking highest in general influence make up eight of the top nine ranked by the number of areas in which senators were mentioned. Four of the top ten in general influence—numbers one, four, five, and ten—held Senate offices (excluding committee positions), and five of the ten were members of the minority party. Only two of the top ten general influencers were men-

TABLE I. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN GENERAL INFLUENCE AND THE NUMBER OF SUBSTANTIVE AREAS IN WHICH GENERAL INFLUENCERS ARE MENTIONED

(Question #1) Rank of Senators by General Influence	(Question #2, Items 1-8) Number of Areas Mentioned
	8	7	6	5	4	3	2	1	0
1	1
2			1
3		1
4		1
5						1
6		1
7		1
8			1
9			1
10						1
11-50			1	3	7	9	11	6	3
Totals	1	4	4	3	7	11	11	6	3

TABLE II. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN GENERAL INFLUENCE AND SPECIFIC AREA INFLUENCE

	High Specific Area Influencers	Low Specific Area Influencers
High general influencers	21	4
Low general influencers	4	21

$$\chi^2 = 23.12, p < .001.$$

tioned in relatively few substantive areas. Both exceptions held the office of Conference Chairman, but in opposite parties.

The number of substantive areas in which legislators were named as influential, however, does not reveal the degree of influence they had in each substantive area. A handy way to gauge roughly the amount and scope of a legislator's influence is to total the number of times he is named in a variety of policy-making areas. The resulting total is described as the legislator's specific area influence score. In the Indiana Senate, senators who scored high in specific area influence tended also to score high in general influence. To illustrate, in Table II the median serves to distinguish between high influencers and low influencers. High general influencers tend to be high specific area influencers, and low general influencers low specific area influencers. General influence appears to be related to several sub-structures of influence which are based upon policy determination within certain substantive areas.

II. EMERGENCE OF INFLUENCE

If influence or power relationships are vital to an understanding of political phenomena, then the emergence of influence or power is of special significance. Insight into the emergence of influence can be acquired by examining attribution data. While the data and categories are derived from responses to interview questions, the resulting generalizations need not be untenable if they are otherwise consistent with our present knowledge of human behavior.

Observers of legislative activity don't need to be told there is a direct relationship between length of service and degree of influence, ceteris paribus. The Indiana Senate conforms to that expectation. Both general influence and specific area influence are strongly associated with length of service. In the full spread of the data for general influence rankings, there is a clear break between senators serving in at least their fourth session and those still in their first, second or third session. The former tend to be high general influencers, and the latter low.<sup>2</sup>

Specific area influence and length of service present a slightly different relationship. Of the six senators in their third session of service five rank high and one low in specific area influence; yet only two of these senators rank high in general influence. Senators in their first or second session of service tend to be low specific area influencers.<sup>3</sup> Although the number of senators involved in these correlations is fairly small, the evidence does suggest that specific area influence tends to precede general influence.

One cannot simply assume, however, that legislators always will first become influential in rather specific substantive areas and then broaden their scope of influence with time. Recall that the Conference Chairmen were named a large number of times in response to the question on general influence; yet they were named relatively few times for the more specific influence items. It is possible that their policy specialties were not included among the influence items; however, it was the writer's observation that they seldom attempted to argue the specific content of important legislation. Their roles were more attuned to the maintenance of party organization and discipline. One would need to search their earlier records to see if they once possessed an influence now lost in specific areas.

The evidence also indicates that some legislators become highly specialized without the reward of becoming generally influential in the legislature. Of the top ten specific area influencers, four do not fall among the top ten general influencers. The four exceptions have a fairly similar influence description (Table III). Their recognized influence fell primarily into one substantive area. They received respectively 93, 92, 93, and 57 per cent of their mentions in that single area. Among the top ten general influencers, only the minority party Conference Chairman received more than 60 per cent of his mentions in one substantive area, and only one other received more than 50 per cent in one area. Furthermore, the substantive areas listed in Table III are highly significant areas from the legislators' standpoint. When senators were asked to rate their preferences among committee assignments, Education ranked first, Finance fourth, Labor fifth, and Benevolent and Penal Institutions tenth in a listing of 29 committees.

<sup>2</sup>  $\chi^2 = 15.7$ ,  $df = 1$ ,  $p < .001$ .

<sup>3</sup>  $\chi^2 = 16.34$ ,  $df = 1$ ,  $p < .001$ .

TABLE III. SENATORS IDENTIFIED WITH ONE SUBSTANTIVE AREA

	Total No. of Mentions	No. of Mentions in One Area	Name of Area	No. of Areas Men- tioned	Specific Area Influence Ranking
1	44	41	Benevolent Institutions	3	5
2	39	36	Labor	3	6
3	30	28	Education	3	8
4	30	17	Appropriations	5	9

Tentative Hypotheses. The terms utilized to specify substantive areas of policy (taxation, labor, education, etc.) may perhaps more realistically be described as interviewing stimuli which represented different contexts of ideas; then legislators responded to these terms by naming those they regarded as influential within the context of ideas represented by each term. Alternatively, legislators responded by naming those they had heard of as influential within the same contexts.

The foregoing data then suggest that: (1) legislators generally become recognized as influential within certain policy-making areas before they achieve general influence; (2) organizational skills, falling outside the context of ideas relating to specific policy-making areas, give legislators recognition as having general influence; (3) in the terms utilized in the interviews, legislators become recognized as competent or influential in more than one context of ideas before becoming recognized as generally influential (i.e., among the top ten general influencers).

Specialization in the Indiana Senate is not as complete as one might find in other legislative bodies, such as Congress. Members of the 1961 Indiana Senate served on a minimum of three and a maximum of eight committees. When the tasks are more complex, when the stakes are higher, and when the institutional arrangements enforce a greater division of work, the emergence of influence may change accordingly. A legislator may then find that the path of least resistance calls for a demonstration of competence in a single context of ideas relating to policy and a greater emphasis upon organizational skills.

III. EXERCISE OF INFLUENCE

Influence is exercised through interaction, along patterns related to the proximity of issues, ideas and people, and via certain styles. These facets of influence are the concern of this section. More specifically, I have devised and applied an interaction scale, an index to influence transferability, and indices to bill success and formal position success, to analyze them.

Influence and Interaction. Influence is exercised through interaction in one form or another. Like "influence," "interaction" is an elusive concept. Ambiguity is reduced, it may be hoped, when such concepts are applied to specific sets of data. In this article "interaction" is described in a scale administered to 48 of 50 members of the Indiana Senate while the 1961 session was in progress. Every senator was asked to rate every other senator according to the following items and scale of weights:

- 0—Do not connect the name with the face
- 1—Recognize him, but have only a greeting acquaintance
- 2—Stop and talk with him regularly
- 3—Aid each other in common activities through actual personal contact
- 4—Visit or entertain in each other's house, apartment, or rooms, or eat meals together frequently, as well as aid each other in common activities

The total of scores that each senator received was calculated and utilized as a rough measure of his degree of interaction. For this immediate research senators were then grouped into quartiles by ranking their interaction scores.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> The interaction scale is an adaptation from a scale presented by Theodore Caplow and Robert Forman, "Neighborhood Inter-action in a Homogeneous Community," American Sociological Review, Vol. 40 (June, 1950), p. 358. An elaborate description of its reliability and usefulness can be found in a work by Theodore Caplow, Sheldon Stryker, and Samuel E. Wallace, The Urban Microcosm: Neighborhood Structure in a Changing Metropolis, manuscript in preparation. Establishing the reliability of the neighborhood interaction scale, of course, only indirectly supports the use of a similar scale in a legislative situation. In the adaptation of the scale it was feared that the seasonal nature of legislative activity would raise the interaction ratings during the latter part of the interviewing period. Consequently, three weeks were allowed to elapse before beginning the interviews, in the hope that the social patterns would stabilize by that time. The evidence indicates that this was the case. The first ten interviews were compared with the last ten and no rise occurred in the average scale value for the ratings made by the latter ten. By necessity, no interviews were conducted during the last week of the session; however, for each group of ten interviews the party distribution and experienced-inexperienced distribution reasonably approximated the distributions in the entire Senate and for all those interviewed.

TABLE IV. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN GENERAL INFLUENCE AND LEGISLATIVE INTERACTION

	Interactors
	Very High	High	Low	Very Low
High general influencers	11	10	3	1
Low general influencers	1	3	9	12

$$\chi^2 = 23.12, p < .001, \text{ when } df = 1.$$

Both influence and interaction scores are calculated from responses to interview items; however, the judgments necessitated by the two types of questions are quite different. The interaction scale called for a judgment applying only to the respondent when paired with each colleague in turn. The influence questions called for a judgment of each colleague's impact on the entire chamber. From these very different judgments comes the relationship between interaction scores and influence totals.

High legislative interactors (those falling above the median) tend to be high general influencers, and low legislative interactors tend to be low general influencers (Table IV). High legislative interactors also tend to be high specific area influencers and low legislative interactors tend to be low specific area influencers.<sup>5</sup> The distribution of Democrats and Republicans into high and low on these variables approximates the distribution in the chamber as a whole and can be ruled out as an explanatory factor.

In order to exert influence, senators must communicate either directly or indirectly with other senators. Those who are recognized as most influential interact at a higher rate than others; furthermore, the items of the scale indicate that the interaction is direct and face-to-face. Influence tends to be exerted or exercised through that type of interaction.

Index of Influence Transferability. The exercise of influence follows patterns partly determined by the nature of the tasks a group must perform. A task-diversified organization requires a number of skills, many of which the members of the organization can recognize. Over time skills build up priorities in relation to specific tasks. In a legislature the skills are not always easily identified, and their priorities in relation to policy-making follow no rigid standard. However, certain patterns are distinguishable through the use of attribution data. Sub-

<sup>5</sup>  $\chi^2 = 17.8, df = 1, p < .001.$

TABLE V. MATRIX OF AN INDEX OF INFLUENCE TRANSFERABILITY

	Gen. Infl.	Tax.	Appr.	Bus.	Educ.	Agr.	Ben.	Lab.	Loc.	Area $\bar{x}$	Area Rank	Gen. Infl. Rank
Gen. Infl.	X	.7	.6	.7	.4	.3	.3	.3	.5
Tax.	.7	X	.7	.6	.4	.4	.3	.2	.2	.40	1	1.5
Appr.	.6	.7	X	.4	.5	.4	.2	.3	.2	.39	2	3
Bus.	.7	.6	.4	X	.3	.2	.1	.4	.4	.34	3	1.5
Educ.	.4	.4	.5	.3	X	.2	.3	.2	.2	.30	4	5
Agr.	.3	.4	.4	.2	.2	X	.1	.2	.1	.23	7	7
Ben.	.3	.3	.2	.1	.3	.1	X	.1	.1	.19	8	7
Lab.	.3	.2	.3	.4	.2	.2	.1	X	.5	.27	5	7
Loc.	.5	.2	.2	.4	.2	.1	.1	.5	X	.26	6	4

 $r' = .84^*$

* Rank correlation coefficient computed from formula (10.19) appearing in Allen L. Edwards, Statistical Methods for the Behavioral Sciences (New York, 1960) p. 195.

stantive areas of policy can be identified. The top influencers in each area can be compared with the top influencers in every other area. Legislators with recognized skills in one area can influence other areas with varying degrees of difficulty. Certain types of influence, that is, are more transferable than others. For instance, influence in the area of taxation may be more transferable than influence in the area of agriculture.

The term "transferable" is employed in place of a lengthy explanation of assumptions concerning the reasons why legislators with influence in certain areas tend to have influence in certain other areas. The patterns along which influence is exercised are the major concern here. The immediate and central questions are: (1) from which substantive areas is a legislator most likely to transfer his influence to what other substantive areas; and (2) which areas appear to be characterized by high general influence? Rough answers to these questions can be calculated through a percentage matrix (Table V).

The top ten influencers from each influence category are compared with the top ten influencers of every other category.<sup>6</sup> In those substantive areas in which a greater percentage of top influencers overlap into other influence categories there is also a tendency to overlap more frequently into the general influence category. For example, of the ten members rated as having the highest influence in the area of taxation, seven fall into the top ten in the general influence category, an overlap which is as high as, or higher than, the overlap between general influence and any other substantive area. Correspondingly, members of the taxation influence area also fall more frequently into other substantive areas ( $\bar{x} = .40$ ). The rank correlation coefficient of .84 demonstrates the more general nature of this tendency.

Several hypotheses can be drawn from the matrix analysis of the index of influence transferability, bearing in mind again that the matrix is composed from attribution data, while the discussion runs in terms of "influence." One underlying assumption concerning the matrix should be made clear. It is assumed that the substantive areas in the matrix do overlap, but that they nevertheless connote different meanings to respondents. No two substantive areas follow entirely consistent patterns when compared against other substantive areas and general influence, and no two substantive areas demonstrate a one-to-one correspondence when compared against each other. This assumption allows one to make tentative statements concerning the nature of influence transferability:

1. The higher the index of influence transferability between any two substantive areas, the easier it is for a legislator to transfer his influence from one area to the other area.
2. Conversely, the lower the index of influence transferability between any two substantive areas, the more difficult it is for a legislator to transfer his influence from one area to the other area.

Example: It is easier for a legislator with high influence in the area of taxation to transfer his influence to the area of appropriations than to the area of labor.

<sup>6</sup> Ties occurring at the lowest boundary of categories were broken randomly. For more precise purposes the index would not require equal groups of ten or any other number, but for the sake of clarity it is helpful to think of a .7 index value as an overlap of seven senators out of ten for two separate sets of data.

3. At any given level of influence transferability between two substantive areas, a legislator with high influence in the area more closely associated with general influence can more easily transfer his influence to the other area than a legislator with high influence in the area less closely associated with general influence.

Example: It is easier for a legislator with high influence in the area of taxation to transfer his influence to the area of benevolent institutions than it is for a legislator with high influence in the area of benevolent institutions to transfer his influence to the area of taxation.

4. If two substantive areas A and B have the same index value in relation to area C, and if area A is more closely associated with general influence than area B, a legislator who is identified with area A will find it easier to transfer his influence to area C than will a legislator identified with area B.

Example: It is easier for a legislator with high influence in the area of taxation to transfer his influence to the area of labor than it is for a legislator with high influence in the area of agriculture, even though both taxation and agriculture demonstrate an index value of .2 in relation to the area of labor.

Certainly there are factors not fully taken into account when applying the index and stating the consequent hypotheses. For example, the index does not account for differences resulting from the influence rank of legislators within a given substantive area. Will a legislator with the highest rank in the area of taxation find it easier to transfer his influence to the area of education than the fifth ranking legislator in the area of taxation, assuming their ranks are equal in the area of education? Or if the answer is self-evident, then how much easier is it for him to transfer his influence to the area of education? The latter question opens up the old problem of how to measure the relative influence of individuals in a problem-solving situation, an answer for which this research will lay no claim to provide.

The index of influence transferability is further limited in the sense that it does not pinpoint the substantive and environmental complexities encountered in any specific piece of legislation, nor does it account for personality differences which might have an effect upon the influence structure.<sup>7</sup> Such limitations, however, do not prevent more general probability statements. Although the index may not apply to a specific legislator in regard to a specific piece of legislation, it is not so unreasonable to apply it to a group of legislators in regard to a large number of bills that fall more or less within a certain substantive area. Or it might be reasonable to advise a legislator to become recognized as competent in the areas of taxation and appropriations rather than in the areas of agriculture, benevolent institutions, or labor if he wishes to have the best chance of influencing all areas of legislation at some date in the future. Finally, the index lends itself to a more precise way of stating common sense judgments concerning the associations between substantive areas of legislative activity as they relate to the influence structure.

Styles of Influence. The previous analysis, as explained, rests upon attribution data acquired through interviews. The data so gathered can be supported and supplemented by specific legislative facts, and, in turn, the arrangement of specific legislative facts can be supported by the judgments of qualified interview respondents. In this section two sets of facts are analyzed, bill sponsorship and passage data, and formal or official position data. The data are arranged into two indices: (1) the index to bill success; and (2) the index to formal position success.

The index to bill success for each legislator is defined as:

$$\frac{(\text{Number of his sponsored bills passing chamber})^2}{\text{Number of bills he sponsored}}$$

The index is the ratio of bills passed to bills sponsored, the numerator squared because of a J-distribution of bill sponsorship among senators.

The index to formal position success for the minority party member is defined as:

$$\frac{\text{Committee assignment total}}{\text{Number of assigned committees}}$$

The committee assignment total is calculated by assigning group weights to a list of all committees ranked on the basis of the questionnaire previously mentioned, and then determining the committees to which each minority party member belongs. The same calculation is made for the majority party members, except that an allowance is made for those Senators with official chamber positions by totaling the official position weight of each (President Protem = 10; Conference Chairman = 5; Committee Chairman = 3; Ranking Majority Member = 1). Thus the index to formal position success for these majority party senators is defined as:

<sup>7</sup> Carl I. Hovland, Irving L. Janis, and Harold H. Kelley, Communication and Persuasion (New Haven, 1953). The authors emphasize the importance of personality in determining influence patterns.

Official Position Weight

$$\frac{\text{Committee assignment total}}{\text{Number of assigned committees}}$$

Minority and majority party members are then ranked separately and distributed proportionally into four Senate quartiles.

Six classifications of legislators are relevant at this point. Legislators have been classified according to general influence, specific area influence, degree of interaction, the index to bill success, and the index to formal position success. The latter two are treated as indices to styles of influence. Some legislators exercise influence by actively and personally sponsoring legislation. Others seek and obtain strategic committee assignments and positions of authority, and exercise the sorts of influence that flow from these positions. Some legislators practice both styles effectively. To accommodate the third group, a sixth classification will be based upon a combination of the bill and formal position indices.<sup>8</sup>

Since the number of legislators involved in each classification is constant ( $N = 50$ ), though small, it is practical to employ the phi coefficient ( $r\phi$ ) to measure the observed degree of association between the various classifications.<sup>9</sup> Three relationships were considered earlier: (1) the significant relationship between general influence and specific area influence ( $r\phi = .68$ ); (2) the significant relationship between general

<sup>8</sup> This classification is based upon an accumulative quartile ranking. Let Q1 be the highest ranking and Q4 the lowest for both bill success and formal position success. A legislator's accumulative ranking can then range from the sum of 2 to the sum of 8. The line between high and low was drawn at that class boundary which most closely approaches the median (between the sums of 4 and 5).

<sup>9</sup>  $r\phi = \sqrt{\chi^2/N}$  The phi coefficient has more meaning when it is considered in conjunction with chi-square ( $\chi^2$ ). When  $N$  is constant  $r\phi$  varies directly with  $\chi^2$ ; therefore, certain values of  $r\phi$  reflect significant values of  $\chi^2$ . When  $N = 50$ , the probability of a distribution occurring by chance less than five times out of a hundred reflects a phi coefficient of at least .277. Thus when  $p < .05$ ,  $r\phi > .277$ ; when  $p < .02$ ,  $r\phi > .329$ ; when  $p < .01$ ,  $r\phi > .365$ ; when  $p < .001$ ,  $r\phi > .466$ .

TABLE VI. DEGREE OF ASSOCIATION BETWEEN VARIABLES

	General Influence	Specific Area Influence	Inter- action
Bill success	.20	.36	.44
Formal position success	.20	.44	.28
Bill and formal position success	.32	.64	.48

Phi Coefficients,  $N = 50$

influence and degree of interaction ( $r\phi = .68$ ); and (3) the significant relationship between specific area influence and degree of interaction ( $r\phi = .60$ ). These strongly related variables can be given greater meaning when they are compared with the remaining classifications.

The index to bill success is significantly related to specific area influence and degree of interaction, but not significantly related to general influence (Table VI). Senators who sponsor a substantial number of bills which pass the chamber tend to be senators who are high interactors. In the Indiana Senate sponsors are generally responsible for their own bills.<sup>10</sup> That they should of necessity interact with other senators at a high rate in order to have high bill success seems quite reasonable; however, there are certainly off-setting factors such as the aid of lobbyists or the governor's support, either of which might diminish the need for interaction by the sponsor.

Senators who have high bill success also tend to have high specific area influence. Their influence is felt within vital substantive areas of legislation. However, they are not necessarily recognized as generally influential in the chamber. The bills they sponsor may be narrow in scope, falling predominantly into one area of legislation. To be recognized as generally influential may require activities in addition to those required by bill sponsorship.

The index to bill success does not relate significantly to the index to formal position success.<sup>11</sup> Senators who sponsor a relatively large number of bills which pass the chamber do not necessarily achieve formal positions of authority or serve on the most sought-after committees. One type of activity neither precludes nor necessitates the other; yet, like senators with high bill success, senators with high formal position success tend to be high specific area influencers, high interactors, but not necessarily recognized as high general influencers. High formal position success (as defined above) is not sufficient for high general influence.

<sup>10</sup> In the Indiana Senate no bill may have more than two named sponsors. The sponsors generally explain their own bills on the floor and quite often in committee.

<sup>11</sup>  $\chi^2 = 2.00$ ,  $df = 1$ ,  $p > .05$ .

Senators who have high bill and formal position success tend to be high interactors, high specific area influencers, and high general influencers. When the bill and formal position indices are combined the phi values rise in each case (Table VI). Bill and formal position success is most closely related to specific area influence ( $r\phi = .64$ ). Senators who serve on the most preferred committees, who hold such positions as committee chairman, and who sponsor a large number of bills which pass the chamber, are mentioned frequently as the most influential within substantive areas of legislation. Senators who practice both styles of influence effectively also tend to be recognized as generally influential ( $r\phi = .32$ ).

IV. ANALYSIS OF EXCEPTIONS

The brief analysis below attempts to explain exceptions to observed relationships, through the use of variables and relationships already considered, and with a minimum of recourse to other related variables.

In Table IV eight legislators did not fit the predominant pattern. Four were high general influencers but low interactors, and four were low general influencers and high interactors. Of the former, three were serving in at least their seventh session of the legislature and were members of the middle age group (born between 1900 and 1919) for members serving in the 1961 Senate. Experienced senators tend to be high general influencers, as previously noted. Senators born between 1900 and 1919 also tend to be high general influencers (Table VII). But why do a few highly experienced senators approaching the age norm of the chamber have a tendency to interact at a low rate?

Perhaps they have learned to communicate efficiently in order to fulfill their policy desires, or possibly the mere fact that they do approach the age norm has an effect which reduces the need for high interaction. It should be stressed, however, that the interaction questionnaire was designed to test interaction for only the 1961 session. Past interaction in previous sessions may very well carry over into the influence structure of the session under study, yet this past interaction would not necessarily register for certain items on the questionnaire. Finally, there is the possibility that the senators had outside sources of influence which minimized the need for high interaction with other senators. All but the last of these suggestions prove too much: they are as applicable to the normal as to the deviant cases.

The fourth senator who was characterized as having high general influence and low interaction was a freshman senator who interacted at a higher rate, at least, than any other freshman senator—a borderline case.

Of the four senators who were characterized as having low general influence but high interaction rates, one fell into the oldest age group and was serving in his sixth session, one was a female legislator, and the remaining two were in their second and third sessions of service. The latter two were rated high in specific area influence and would conform to the previous hypothesis on the emergence of influence if they should become recognized as general influencers in future sessions of the legislature. The other two evidently were content to talk without action.

The exceptions to the direct relationship between specific area influence and degree of interaction can to a large extent be accounted for by the same reasoning, partly because many of the same legislators are involved. Four of the ten exceptions to this second relationship appear to be of a different character; however, all four were in either their second or third session of service which appears to be a transitional phase of interaction and influence in the Indiana Senate.

There are eight exceptions to the direct relationship between general influence and specific area influence. All but one were in their first, second, or third session of service, and six of them were in their second or third session. These exceptions did not support the hypothesis that specific area influence precedes general influence, nor did they support the contrary. On the other hand, the evidence did suggest that those classified as high specific area influencers but low general influencers were named significantly more frequently in one single substantive area than were those classified as low specific area influencers but high general influencers.

TABLE VII. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN AGE AND GENERAL INFLUENCE

Date of Birth	High General Influencers	Low General Influencers
1900-1919	17	9
Before 1900 or After 1919	8	16

$$\chi^2 = 5.12, p < .05.$$

CIVIL SERVICE* AND MANAGING WORK: SOME UNINTENDED CONSEQUENCES

ROBERT T. GOLEMBIEWSKI

University of Illinois

Nature seldom allows us to get what we wish without paying her price. This truism is commonly illustrated by the delicate balance in animal life which often cannot be disturbed to satisfy man's wants (e.g., for fox hunting) without demanding of man in return (e.g., by increases in the rabbit population and in crop damage).

The several civil service systems in this country also illustrate this bittersweet combination of intended and unintended consequences. The argument here will not go to the extreme of one observer, in whose judgment the United States Civil Service Commission was the single greatest obstacle to the successful waging of World War II.<sup>1</sup> Rather, the focus here will be upon several characteristics of our civil service systems that have as presumably unintended consequences an increase in the burdens of managing work. For the most part, the analysis of management problems will derive from the research literature dealing with behavior in organizations, a field of study presently seething with activity.

I. THE GOAL-MATRIX OF OUR CIVIL SERVICE MOVEMENT

The nature of these unintended consequences is suggested by the matrix of goals, or purposes, underlying our civil service movement. The primary goal, of course, was the separation of the management of public work from party patronage. Within this overriding goal, Sayre has noted three early subsidiary purposes of our public personnel systems:<sup>2</sup>

1. the guarantee of equal treatment of all employees and all applicants for employment;
2. the application of the logic (or theory) and methods of "scientific management"; and
3. the development of a public career service.

These goals define the field of my present effort. Detailed analysis later will demonstrate the significance for the management of work of the unintended consequences which derive from the ways adopted to achieve these purposes. I take this opportunity to suggest the general nature of these consequences.

<sup>1</sup> John Fisher, "Let's Go Back to the Spoils System," reproduced in part in Dwight Waldo, ed., Ideas and Issues in Public Administration (New York, 1953), pp. 200-1.

<sup>2</sup> Wallace Sayre, "The Triumph of Technique Over Purpose," Public Administration Review, Vol. 8 (Spring, 1948), pp. 134-35.

Consider first the general tethers on the management of work implicit in the historical pursuit of the three purposes listed. The guarantee of equal treatment, to begin with, has never quite made peace with the managerially convenient notion that unequal contributions demand unequal reward. To take a recent and characteristic example, the teachers' union in Illinois has lately expressed violent opposition to a proposal for merit pay increases based upon performance. This opposition goes deeper than the convenience of seniority or of hours of graduate study as objective criteria for pay increases and far deeper than the blatant protectionism of hacks. However lofty the motives, their effect is clear. In practice, the struggle toward the "equal treatment" goal virtually forced public personnel systems into a monumental preoccupation with technique and mechanics. As Sayre concluded:<sup>3</sup>

Its main effect has been to move personnel administration, in the words of Gordon Clapp, "into the cold objective atmosphere of tests, scores, weighted indices, and split-digit rankings" so completely that "these technical trappings have become symbols of the merit system."

The management of work pays a stiff price for such technical elegance. Work is notoriously insensitive to such easy capture, and the most subtly contrived managerial rewards and punishments might be frustrated by an awkward distribution of test scores. Moreover, these technical trappings put powerful weapons into the hands of "staff" people. That more than one "line" manager has been stymied by one of these "split-digit rankings" without accepting the results as divinely ordained, moreover, does nothing to lessen the often intense jurisdictional tugs-of-war encouraged by the traditional "line-staff" distinction. These tensions are apt to be increased by the time lag inherent in centralized administrative systems, and public personnel systems are usually operated centrally.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., p. 134.

The logic and methods of "scientific management," second, tended to condemn managers to a treadmill even as it aided them. Scientific management was imported from the "practical" world of business where its impact was enormous.<sup>4</sup> But the impact was not one-way. Thus there is no denying the useful revolution in viewing work that the methods of scientific management sparked. However, as recent research particularly demonstrates,<sup>5</sup> the assumptions in the logic (or theory) of scientific management concerning man and his work were mechanistic caricatures. Consequently, the manager tended to be less effective in direct relation to the degree that he patterned his behavior on the logic of the approach. That is, the reasonable methods of scientific management often were guided by an inadequate theory. Consequently, the usefulness of engineering a task with the methods of scientific management must be differentiated sharply from the usefulness of organizing a task's component sequential steps in terms of the theory of scientific management.<sup>6</sup>

The establishment of a public career service, third, also tended to have unintended and unfavorable consequences which counterbalanced the favorable and intended consequences. As Sayre put it,<sup>7</sup>

Stated in its most positive terms, this objective represents an effort to provide the conditions of work which will attract and hold a public service of optimum talents. In its negative aspects, the goal has been translated into an elaborate system of protectionism. In the area of methodology the negative connotations have slowly but surely won the dominant position. . . .

Such protectionism, of course, often would bind the manager severely even as it safeguarded him (and his subordinates) from arbitrary removal.

In sum, then, striving toward the purposes of the civil service movement had its general costs. Three more specific sets of restrictions that burden the management of work in our civil service systems will concern us presently.

These costs of our civil service systems, however, must be kept in perspective. Today we can profit from hindsight and a sophisticated research literature. The efforts to achieve the separation of the civil service from patronage, in contrast, came before enough was known about the conceptual and operational problems of the description of organization, personality, or "position" to preclude an uncomplicated Tinker Toy approach to all three of these elements of personnel administration. That is, simple assumptions took the place of an understanding of empirical phenomena which were at least more complex and often essentially different from the assumptions.

Consequently, the early approach to public personnel administration is understandable, if inadequate. The compulsions of life could not wait on the scientific explanation of the universe. However, necessity should not be suffered to be a virtue, lest the original simplistic assumptions become too deeply buried under a specialized literature. Students of public personnel administration, fortunately, have done considerable self-critical work of late. The determined, if preliminary, efforts since World War II to outgrow its early biases are a leading feature of the reorientation currently underway in public administration.<sup>8</sup>

II. SUPERVISORY POWER AND CIVIL SERVICE

Perhaps the most rewarding clue to supervisory effectiveness in recent research exploits the "power" concept. "Power" refers, in general, to the ability to control the job environment. Getting recommendations for promotion accepted, for example, indicates that a supervisor has relatively high power. "Power" thus conceptually complements "authority," which refers to the degree to which the formal organization legitimates a supervisor's control of the job environment. Typically, all supervisors at the same level monitoring similar operations have similar authority; and typically, these supervisors will differ in their power.

Power seems to be related to effective supervisory performance, whether it is exercised upwards, as influence with superiors, or downwards, as control of the specific job site. Pelz, for example, studied some fifty measures of supervisory practices and attitudes without finding any marked correlations with employee morale and attitudes. When the influence of a supervisor with his superior was specified, however, rather sharp differences were observed. High supervisory power was associated with

<sup>4</sup> Dwight Waldo, The Administrative State (New York, 1948), pp. 47-64.

<sup>5</sup> See my Behavior and Organization (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1962), esp. chs. 1-4.

<sup>6</sup> See my "Organizing Work: Techniques and Theories," Advanced Management—Office Executive, Vol. 1 (June, 1962), pp. 26-31.

<sup>7</sup> Op. cit., pp. 134-35.

<sup>8</sup> The outlines of this reorientation are drawn sharply in O. Glenn Stahl, Public Personnel Administration (New York, 1956), pp. 577-82.

effective performance.<sup>9</sup> Consequently, as Likert concluded, a supervisor must be an effective subordinate as well as an effective superior.<sup>10</sup> Otherwise, reasonably, a supervisor cannot be expected to influence his subordinates consistently.

Similarly, power expressed as control of the job site is associated with effective performance. Likert provides much supporting data. A comparison between the top third and the bottom third of departments (ranked in terms of productivity) is particularly relevant here. Personnel in the "top" departments, in contrast with the "bottom" departments, uniformly attributed greater influence over "what goes on in your department" to these four sources: higher management; plant management; department manager; and the workers themselves. Moreover, the "top" departments also desired that greater influence be exercised by all four sources than did the "bottom" departments. Significantly, the greatest differences between the "top" and "bottom" departments are in the power attributed to department managers (their primary supervisors) and in the power the men desired that department managers exercise.<sup>11</sup> These are reasonable results. A low-power supervisor has little leverage for motivating his men via his control over the job site. That is, the men have little reason to take him seriously.

If the reasons for the importance of supervisory power to effective performance seem clear enough, our civil service systems do little to ease the burdens of managing work via increases in supervisory power. This is particularly lamentable because much evidence suggests that the "power" variable may be influenced substantially by the design of the job, by the organization structure (of which more later), and by training. The supervisor's personality, in short, does not appear to be the crucial (or major) factor in determining power.

Although only empirical research can establish the point definitely, there seems ample evidence of this failure of civil service systems to respond to the need to facilitate the management of work by increasing supervisory power. On the broadest level, the first and third primary goals of the civil service movement certainly do not encourage supervisory power; and (as will be demonstrated) the application of the logic and methods of scientific management has the same effect.

To become more specific, these limitations on supervisory power have many practical impacts. For example, first-line supervisors seem to have less control over hiring and firing than their counterparts in business. The difficulty in business organizations of firing or reductions-in-force need not be underplayed, but the elaborate review procedures and the novel "bumping" arrangements<sup>12</sup> often found in our civil service systems probably admit of less flexibility in public agencies even on the part of officials at relatively high organizational levels. Raw turnover ratios seem to support this position.<sup>13</sup> Similarly, the emphasis upon seniority in promotions and pay increases in the public service plus the failures of supervisory rating of employee performance<sup>14</sup>—both common in our civil service systems—suggest that the environment in public agencies has not been conducive to the general heightening of supervisory power.

Some counterforces are at work, although they do not promise imminent change in the present condition of limited encouragement of supervisory power. Thus the federal program for rewarding superior performance permits a modest increase in supervisory power. Even in this case, however, apparently many agencies have preferred to ride very close herd over the recommendations of lower-level supervisors or (in at least one case of which I have personal knowledge) to neglect the immediate supervisor altogether. Thus this program not only died aborning as an opportunity to increase supervisory power, but its administration may even further reduce that power.

All this, be it noted, is not by way of an argument for arbitrary managerial or supervisory action. Just such abuses, of course, supplied motivation for the restraints emphasized above. The stress here, rather, is upon ways of reinforcing formal authority so as to permit greater effectiveness consistent with the policies of an agency. Just as in the case of any delegation, that is, attempts to increase supervisory power imply training and the develop-

<sup>9</sup> Donald C. Pelz, "Interaction and Attitudes Between Scientists and Auxiliary Staff," Administrative Science Quarterly, Vol. 4 (December, 1959), pp. 321-36, and Vol. 4 (March, 1960), pp. 410-25.

<sup>10</sup> Rensis Likert, New Patterns of Management (New York, 1961), p. 114.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., pp. 56-57.

<sup>12</sup> James E. Drury, The Displaced Career Executive Program (Inter-University Case Program, University of Alabama Press, 1952).

<sup>13</sup> Stahl, op. cit., p. 473.

<sup>14</sup> Felix Nigro, Public Personnel Administration (New York, 1959), p. 295.

ment of suitable overhead controls. Moreover, "power" in the relevant research does not imply heavy-handed coercive techniques, which most subjects interpret as lack of control of the environment. Evidence such as that reviewed below in the context surrounding footnotes 48-51 supports this point.

The task of inducing high supervisory power, then, is more delicate than a mere reversal of gears toward the "spoils system" or advocacy of an administrative law of the jungle.

III. JOB DESIGN AND CIVIL SERVICE

Similarly, our civil service systems tend to limit the potential for increasing managerial effectiveness implicit in job design. The second primary goal noted above is the chief culprit, with strong support from the goal of "equal treatment." Their interaction in increasing managerial burdens can be illustrated in two ways, by considering specific job content, and by considering the place of the job in the broad organization-structure.

In its doctrine about simplifying job content, particularly, the logic of scientific management makes difficulties for managing work effectively. As in industry, at low organization levels, the process of routinization often has been carried too far in the public service. The effects of "job enlargement" on employee performance, at least in business concerns,<sup>15</sup> suggest the contribution to effective management that may be gained by adding content to a worker's responsibilities. This may be accomplished by increasing the scope of jobs or by rotating individuals through several jobs.<sup>16</sup> The crucial factor does not seem to be the number of task-elements given to an individual or the complexity of these elements. Patently, a job could become too complex. Rather, the significant point seems to be that various techniques of job enlargement, when they work, work because they increase the worker's control over his job environment.<sup>17</sup> Hence the success of plans for increasing the employee's control over factors which are not in his flow of work, such as that often called "bottom-up management."<sup>18</sup>

The effects of "job enlargement" may be explained in terms of the earlier analysis. In Likert's study, as already noted, employees in high-producing units felt that they themselves exercised and desired more power over their work than did individuals in low-producing units. This is consistent with the favorable effects on output commonly reported in the "job enlargement" literature, while it suggests an apparent paradox. Note that Hi-Pro units ranked themselves and three levels of supervisors as higher on "power" than did Lo-Pro units. This might seem curious, but only if one assumes that there is only so much "power" to be had, so that what superiors gain subordinates must lose. The fact seems to be, on the contrary, that a high-power supervisor can afford to (and usually does) allow his subordinates to exercise greater power also.<sup>19</sup> A low-power supervisor is in such an insecure position that he can seldom bring himself to be so generous. The real paradox, then, is that the apparently most straightforward way of adding to one's power is often the most direct way of reducing it. The common mechanical conceptions of organized activity implicit in scientific management discourage such thinking.

The often marked consequences of job enlargement may be illustrated briefly. Machine operations in an industrial concern, for example, had been plagued by an array of difficulties: productivity and quality were falling; and tension between operators and inspectors was growing. The crucial factor was that the tool in this particular operation, when dulled to a certain point, would suddenly begin producing pieces which did not meet specifications. Inspectors were not always able to spot such sudden deteriorations in the product quickly, and operators (inspection not being their job) did not always cease work even when the quality was obviously unacceptable. Inspection reports helped little when they did come, the operators marking them down as "ancient history." The solution was easy. Simple gauges were given to operators to make periodic checks on their production, and the operators were allowed to decide when it was necessary to resharpen their cutting tools. The consequences: runs of defective products became shorter and less frequent; the nagging tension between inspectors and operators was reduced; and output zoomed.

Examples need not be confined to industrial operations. In a paperwork operation, similarly, a rather simple change increased output by 30

<sup>15</sup> Chris Argyris, Personality and Organization (New York, 1957), pp. 177-87, summarizes many relevant studies.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., p. 177.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., p. 180.

<sup>18</sup> William Givin, Bottom-Up Management (New York, 1949).

<sup>19</sup> The point has been amply demonstrated in experimental situations. See James G. March, "Influence Measurement in Experimental and Semi-Experimental Groups," Sociometry, Vol. 19 (March, 1956), pp. 26-71.

FIGURE 1A. Functional (Process) Organization with Narrow Span of Control.

percent and reduced employee turnover by 70 percent.<sup>20</sup>

Although the design of the job could be an important means of reducing the problems of managing work, however, our civil service systems do not encourage the exploitation of such techniques as job enlargement. Consider only one feature which has an inhibiting effect, the very detailed job descriptions common in the public service. That these are an important part of the mechanisms for guaranteeing equal treatment of employees and for developing a career service does little to encourage flexibility in job design. Employee unions and the civil service commission staff can make much of these job descriptions, even in cases in which employees solidly favor changes of a job-enlargement sort. The difficulty is not necessarily avoided by job descriptions which conclude: "or other duties the supervisor may designate." Custom, employee unions, and an overprotective civil service commission can void such open-end descriptions.

Perhaps, however, this leans too heavily on personal (and limited) experience. Some administrators no doubt pay little attention to detailed job descriptions, except for such purposes as convincing the civil service commission that an individual deserves a multi-step promotion. And it may be argued that the significant point is not whether detailed job descriptions exist, but whether strong employee unions exist. Even in such cases, however, the detailed job description is part of the institutional framework within which management and union must function.

In determining the place of the job in the broad organizational pattern, our civil service systems also increase the problems of managing work. Consider two characteristics which tend to dominate patterns of organization in the public service, a limited span of control and organization by function or (at lower levels) by process. These characteristics largely derive from the impact of scientific management upon public personnel administration. Analysis of these two characteristics is particularly useful because it demonstrates, among other features, their tendency to reduce supervisory power.

The analysis of these two characteristics is facilitated by some simplified graphics.<sup>21</sup> Figure 1A presents the orthodox organization of functions (or processes) A, B, C—which may be taken to be any components whose integration is required to perform some administrative task—under the condition of a limited span of control. Figure 1B presents the more unorthodox organization by product (or discrete sub-assembly), which permits a far broader span of control.

The functional model, with modest reservations, can be considered the pattern for government organizing. This does not do full justice to the diversity of actual organizational arrangements, admittedly. Various factors—size, pressure of work, geography, and the like—have encouraged significant deviations from the functional model. Thus the Justice Department long ago surrendered the fancy of having every government lawyer in the department. The functional model, however, is commonly encountered in practice and it is certainly the most commonly prescribed model in the literature, as in the Hoover Commission's Report on the General Management of the Executive Branch.

<sup>20</sup> Peter F. Drucker, The Practice of Management (New York, 1954), pp. 291-92.

<sup>21</sup> The parent of this analysis may be found in James C. Worthy, Big Business and Free Men (New York, 1959), pp. 90-99.

FIGURE 1B. Product (Discrete Sub-Assembly) Organization with Broad Span of Control.

The following contrast of the functional model with the product model, then, requires that two points be kept in mind. First, the functional model does not guide all public organizing, but it is nonetheless influential. Second, the product model will not always be a feasible alternative, although it often will be. The contrast, that is, has much to recommend it, although hardly everything. Thus, although the analysis may have an either-or flavor, many other factors would serve to soften the contrast in practice and would guide the choice in specific cases of the functional model, the product model, or combinations of the two.

These simple variations in the organization of jobs in larger structures can have profound consequences for the management of work. In general, the type of structure common in most public agencies (see Figure 1A) incurs substantial costs avoided by the less familiar structure in Figure 1B. These costs derive from three features associated with these two patterns of structure: job enlargement; the size of the "managerial entity"; and supervisory power.

First, to point up the obvious, Figure 1B is based upon job enlargement at all levels. Each employee at the work-level in Figure 1B performs all three components of the task, and each supervisor's responsibilities encompass all three. Figure 1A's emphasis upon routinization limits the scope, and perhaps thereby the effectiveness of the management of work. Of course, there are some limits on the functions or processes (A, B, C, . . .) that may be strung together. In general, however, the limits seem to be very broad indeed.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>22</sup> The point is supported by the example in Drucker, op. cit., p. 291. See also Argyris, op. cit., pp. 177-87.

Second, the "managerial entity" is vastly larger in Figure 1A than in Figure 1B. The size of the managerial entity can have profound consequences. It may appear, for instance, that the structure in Figure 1B puts too much strain on the capacities of management, because of the apparently greater demands it imposes upon the supervisors. In reality, however, structures such as that in Figure 1A often imply greater (and different) demands upon management talent. Figure 1B structures reduce in significant ways the management burden carried by  $M_{ABC}$  and the supervisors as well. The difficulties faced by  $M_{ABC}$  in structures like that in Figure 1A cause considerable problems for supervisors, for example, by tending to reduce their supervisory power. Many of the problems associated with sizeable organizations, more generally, derive not from the aggregate size of the organization, but from the size of its component managerial entities. Thus the manager in our hypothetical organization in Figure 1A directs the work of 99 employees and encounters the difficulties to be enumerated below; the manager in Figure 1B oversees the work of 195 employees, yet significant problems facing the management of work are reduced.

The "managerial entity" concept warrants further analysis. Worthy defines it in these terms:<sup>23</sup>

The administrative unit can be no smaller than that portion of the organization falling within the jurisdiction of an individual who controls enough elements of the total process to make effective decisions regarding the total process.

A high-level managerial entity might be organized around some total product, for example, water resource development in the Kings River Valley. The processing by each of several competing teams of all categories of mail received by the Government Printing Office, with each team handling all correspondence from writers whose names begin with designated letters of the alphabet, illustrates the kind of discrete sub-assembly around which a low-level managerial entity might be organized.

<sup>23</sup> Worthy, op. cit., pp. 92-93.

At whatever level of organization, then, a "managerial entity" contains that parcel of process-components necessary for the performance of some discrete task. The areas enclosed by the heavy dotted lines in the two figures above symbolize "managerial entities." Interpretively, any  $S_{ABC}$  in Figure 1B can "get all the way around" our hypothetical administrative task. In Figure 1A, in contrast, only  $M_{ABC}$  can do this job.  $M_{ABC}$  in Figure 1A has a managerial entity which contains 100 individuals; that of  $S_{ABC}$  contains only 15.

Many of the problems in sizeable organizations derive from the failure to restrict the size of the organization's managerial entities. Haire's analogy seems apt in this connection. He suggested the mushrooming problems caused by the growth in the size of organizations via the "square-cube law" applied to the story of Jack and the Beanstalk:<sup>24</sup>

... Jack had nothing to fear from the Giant. If he were, as he is pictured, ten times as large as a man and proportioned like one, Jack was perfectly safe. The Giant's mass would be  $10^3$  or a thousand times a man's, because he was ten times as big in every dimension. However, the cross section of his leg bones would have increased in only two dimensions, and they would be  $10^2$  or a hundred times as big as a man's. A human bone simply will not support ten times its normal load, and the Giant, in walking, would break his legs and be helpless.

In a similar way, arithmetic increases in the size of the managerial entity seem to generate exponential increases in the problems of the management of work. Meeting these increases in size within the framework of the type of organization structure in Figure 1A does nothing to reduce these difficulties.

This general position can be elaborated. The size of the managerial entity, in sum, is likely to affect such significant features of administration as: the time lag between the perception of a problem and action on it, which influences supervisory power; the style of supervision; the measurement and the motivation of performance; and the training of subordinates.

Patently, first, decisions will tend to be pushed upward in an organization such as that in Figure 1A; for only  $M_{ABC}$  oversees all of the components which require integration. As a result, delegation to supervisors is all but restricted to routine matters, that is, those which involve the single component supervised by any supervisor and only that component.

The separation of decision-making from the action level often has significant costs. Overloading upper levels may make time-pressure a very serious factor, the more so if the stakes are high. A shutdown in any of the sections in Figure 1A might cause output to drop as low as zero. The manager, then, is under great pressure to assure that A, B, and C are integrated, and he is likely to exert that pressure downward. This does not encourage upward communication, in turn, which is difficult enough in the "tall" organization described in Figure 1A. (Notice that Figure 1B, with 69 per cent more people, has one less organization level than Figure 1A.) The efforts of the manager to fight the daily battle of integration of the components of his operation and to get the information required for his job, finally, will tend to undercut any efforts by the supervisors to gain high power. The common development of large "staff" units complements this tendency.

In contrast, decisions in Figure 1B organizations would strongly tend to be forced down to the action level, and certainly at least to the level of  $S_{ABC}$ . Indeed,  $M_{ABC}$  may have no other reasonable alternative, given his broad span of control. Upward communication and supervisory power often will be affected favorably.  $M_{ABC}$ , consequently, should be freed from the unremitting pressure of integration implicit in a Figure 1A structure. Downtime at any work station, for example, will not cause difficulty throughout the managerial entity. Output would fall at most by  $1/N$ . The manager therefore could devote himself to motivating superior performance, to training and counseling, and the like, rather than attempting to eliminate the possibility of error.

These comments on decision-making, second, suggest that the two types of structures encourage different styles of supervision. The structure in Figure 1A encourages "close supervision," i.e., detailed instructions, persistent attempts to direct and observe performance, and the like. The limited span of control, of course, permits this, and the pressure for the integration of the task components may force it. The structure in Figure 1B encourages "general supervision," i.e., monitoring performance in terms of results with considerable freedom for the employee so long as he is performing up to standard. Close supervision of janitors, for example, would require such directions as: "You will sweep from left to right, forty strokes per minute," and correspondingly close checks on performance. General supervision, in contrast, would assume competence and give such instructions as: "Sweep the floors in such time that you are able to get your other work done and so that the floor will reflect  $x$  units of light from a refractometer." The refractometer provides the check on performance. Acknowledgedly, this goes a little far. All of the components of general supervision are there, however, especially the measure of performance.

<sup>24</sup> Mason Haire, ed., Modern Organization Theory (New York: Wiley, 1959), pp. 273-74.

Structures of the type in Figure 1A pay a heavy cost to the degree that they in fact do encourage close supervision. In one study, for example, less than 30 percent of the work teams whose first- or second-level supervisors practiced close supervision had high output. Nearly 70 percent of the work units receiving only general supervision had high output.<sup>25</sup>

The reader may suppose, third, that the manager and supervisors in a Figure 1B organization would face an impossible task in motivating and measuring performance. For general supervision must be based upon performance standards, and what will keep standards high if the supervisor "gets off their backs?" But the several units headed by an  $S_{ABC}$ , each performing the same task, obviously set the stage for a relative measure of performance. They are in competition with each other, which tends to keep performance high. This would complement the added contributions to be expected because of the job enlargement practiced in 1B-type structures. At the same time, reduced "line-staff" conflict seems implied by this potential for motivation and measurement, "staff" development being in large part due to top-level management's difficulties in motivating and, especially, measuring performance.

Figure 1A organizations do not offer the same possibilities. One might try to encourage competition within, for example, some  $S_A$  unit, or between the  $S_A$  units and the  $S_B$  units. But competition of that sort, as experimental studies suggest, is not likely to aid performance on most tasks,<sup>26</sup> since the tasks themselves are not comparable, and may indeed be incommensurable. The point may be driven home by considering this proposition: Assembling all As (or Bs or Cs) in organizationally separate units encourages the restriction of output and invites substantial jurisdictional conflict when the responsibility for an error must be assigned. Much evidence supports this proposition.<sup>27</sup> Responsibility is far more difficult to assign in a 1A-type structure, for at least three inspections would be required to permit accurate assignment of praise or blame, one after each of the component operations. Figure 1B organizations would require only one such inspection. Such considerations, and there are many others, attest to the difficulties of motivating and measuring performance in Figure 1A organizations.

These features of Figure 1B organizations suggest a way out of the objection that public agencies are not guided by "profit" and that therefore performance measurement is difficult. In Figure 1A organizations, in business, the measurement of macroscopic profit does little to determine the often crucial measurement of the effectiveness of constituent units. Hence many business enterprises have approached the type of organization sketched in Figure 1B by establishing "individual profit centers" within (for example) a plant. Their services are then "sold" internally, sometimes with the useful provision that outside purchase is possible if price or quality are not considered appropriate by the "buyer."<sup>28</sup> This encourages self-discipline of both "buyer" and "seller." Comptroller W. J. McNeil worked for years to install arrangements of this sort in the Department of Defense, for the provision of common procurement of goods and services, as a means of economy and of strengthening the Secretary's hand.

In any case, fourth, Figure 1B organizations seem to have a definite advantage in the training of subordinates. Patently,  $S_{ABC}$  faces training challenges not available to  $S_A$  (or  $S_B$  or  $S_C$ ) in the normal course of events. Reasonably, then, organization structures such as that in Figure 1B should tend toward the early elimination of those without management ability, while it would attract the more able. Reasonably, also, high satisfaction and output should characterize Figure 1B organizations. These expectations, indeed, are supported by some research in the Sears, Roebuck chain<sup>29</sup> and elsewhere.<sup>30</sup>

<sup>27</sup> Eliot D. Chapple and Leonard R. Sayles, The Measure of Management (New York, 1961), pp. 18-45.

<sup>28</sup> W. H. Mylander, "Management by Executive Committee," Harvard Business Review, Vol. 33 (May, 1950), pp. 51-58.

<sup>29</sup> See William F. Whyte, Man and Organization (Homewood, Ill.: Irwin, 1959), pp. 11-16.

<sup>30</sup> Ernest Dale, "Centralization versus De-

<sup>25</sup> Dorwin Cartwright and Alvin Zander, eds., Group Dynamics (Evanston, 1953), esp. pp. 617-19.

<sup>26</sup> Robert T. Golembiewski, The Small Group: An Analysis of Research Concepts and Operations (University of Chicago Press, 1962), pp. 202-4.

Despite these (and other) advantages of 1B structures, our public personnel systems do not provide a congenial home for them. The dominant emphasis in these systems—and it is no doubt often a necessary emphasis—is negative rather than positive. As one observer with high-level experience in both government and industry noted:<sup>31</sup>

... no matter how well briefed on federal service peculiarities the private business executive may be, one of the first things he notices in public administration is this emphasis on procedure and routine. This emphasis is admittedly necessary and desirable provided it does not make method an end in itself. When it does, over-organized bewilderment results. The newcomer to top management positions in the federal service frequently feels that the organization and methods set up with the laudable idea of keeping him from doing wrong actually result in making it excessively difficult to do right.

This emphasis, despite its legitimacy, seems to have been overdone at all levels. Overdone or not, it is something to know what it costs to preserve the emphasis in Figure 1A structures.

Generations of organization theorists have labored hard to preserve the fiction of the unity of command in our public affairs, this being the very slender thread by which we demonstrate that the electorate really does control the administration through its election of the president. One may judge the impact of this theory upon supervisory practices from the longevity of the logically consistent but unrealistic notion that "politics" and "administration" are somehow separate. This notion, of course, is the keystone of our civil service systems. Their failure to respect the realities of delegation hardly augurs for better treatment of this matter at lower organization levels. Comfortable as the fiction of unity of command may be to many, multi-line relations exist. We may choose to neglect this datum for various reasons, as the Hoover Commission did in arguing for a structure such as that in Figure 1A.<sup>32</sup> But this neglect may prove embarrassing,<sup>33</sup> and it is very likely that our theoretical simplicism has a high cost. Gaus long ago put the argument for a multi-line view in these convincing terms:<sup>34</sup>

Such a theory . . . is the only one which fits the facts of contemporary delegation of wide discretionary power by electorates, constitutions, and legislatures to the administrators [who] must, of necessity, determine some part of the purpose and a large part of the means whereby it will be achieved in the modern state.

Finally, the accepted pattern of organization in public agencies (as well as in business concerns) is functional. This reflects the historic strength of the model sketched in Figure 1A and suggests the barriers which will restrain attempts to approach the Figure 1B model in organizing.

IV. JOB DESCRIPTION AND CIVIL SERVICE

It says worlds, while it avoids an enormous complexity, to note that our civil service systems typically are based upon a duties classification, as opposed to a rank classification. Public personnel specialists have gone in for a duties classification with a sometimes uncritical zeal. As Nigro explains:<sup>35</sup>

In a duties classification, the beginning point is a detailed analysis of the tasks required in the individual position. In fact, the tendency in the United States has been to make fairly minute investigations of job content.

The emphasis need not be exaggerated, for the specialists have providently refrained from stressing the content of all jobs. The handling of secretarial positions—whose importance is usually measured by secretaries and bosses in terms of what the boss does rather than what the secretary does—is perhaps the most striking illustration of what has been called the "realistic" approach to classification.<sup>36</sup> But the bias of job description in this country has not moved very far from the classic expression it was given, for example, in the 1932 classification plan for Philadelphia. Nigro called this "one of the best books of specifications on record." It listed twenty individual classes of clerks, for each of which specifications had been developed. Specifications also were stated for thirty additional classes of principal and chief clerks in the various city departments.<sup>37</sup> centralization," Advanced Management, Vol. 21 (June, 1956), p. 15.

<sup>31</sup> Marver Bernstein, The Job of the Federal Executive (Washington, D. C.: Brookings Institution, 1958), pp. 34–35.

<sup>32</sup> Hoover Commission, Report on the General Management of the Executive Branch (Washington, D. C., 1949), pp. 1, 3–4.

<sup>33</sup> As, e.g., in Morgan vs. United States, 298 U.S. 468, where the Secretary of Agriculture was rebuked for deciding a case he had not heard in person.

<sup>34</sup> In Gaus, Leonard D. White, and Marshall E. Dimock, The Frontiers of Public Administration (University of Chicago Press, 1940), p. 91.

<sup>35</sup> Nigro, op. cit., p. 85.

<sup>36</sup> Julius E. Eittington, "Injecting Realism into Classification," Public Personnel Administration, Vol. 15 (March, 1952), pp. 31–35.

<sup>37</sup> Nigro, op. cit., pp. 98–99.

The inspirations for this emphasis on job description in our public personnel systems seem clear enough. The logic and methods of scientific management—which encouraged the view of organization as a “delicate mechanism” of gear-like “positions” whose driveshaft was the line of command—clearly had their influence. Moreover, position classification provides the bases for equal treatment, general formal policies and procedures regarding recruitment, salary, promotions, and the like. Finally, position classification encourages the attempt to group similar jobs into a reasonable number of classes, sub-classes, and so on. This provided a ladder-like framework upon which a permanent career service could be built.

Despite its contribution to achieving the goals of our civil service movement, the American approach to job description has its unintended costs. Some obvious costs will be considered immediately; subsequent analysis will consider one less obvious set of costs in some detail.

Since one product of position classification was to be a manageable number of classes, first, this required a procrustean neglect of distinguishing job characteristics. The position approach, second, became the victim of its own imprecise terms. Consider the common observation that the “position” is the “universal building block of all organizations.”<sup>38</sup> The observation has a certain validity, since all organizations contain positions. It tended to mislead the unwary, however, into supposing that “organization” is only a set of positions. The temptation to think of organization as some massive mechanical structure of positions linked by lines of authority was strong, since it apparently served to simplify the problems of personnel work.

The emphasis upon a duties classification, third, implies a substantial rigidity. Consider the difficulties of dealing with the many positions which have a kind of life cycle, with stages that impose varying demands on the incumbent. Developing an administrative role may be a very delicate task, while playing the role thereafter may be child’s play. This phenomenon is difficult to accommodate within the framework of most of our public personnel systems. Some adaptations may be made quickly enough. But often it is necessary to waste a “big” man on a job too small for him or to give a “small” man a job too big for him. Similarly, the emphasis upon a duties classification makes it difficult to utilize positions for training purposes without the stretching of a point or two by the position analyst. The traditional question—What does the incumbent do?—is not appropriate for such positions, for he may, in fact, contribute little toward immediate task performance.

The abortive struggles toward a Senior Civil Service, and then a Career Executive Program, for the federal government, reflect the tenacity of the grip of these two types of inflexibilities.<sup>39</sup> For it was intended that the highly mobile and select corps of administrators in such programs would be used in both of the ways alluded to above, that is, as experienced “firefighters” and as trainees getting the “big picture.” The rank-in-job bias in our civil service systems played not a little part in the lack of action.

Fourth and finally, the approach via a duties classification taken in this country is not the only available one. Indeed, in public administration, it appears that only Canada and Brazil follow our example closely. Many personnel systems—public and business—emphasize broad and general classes rather than narrow and detailed ones. Some of the spirit claimed for the British civil service, for example, is suggested by this open-end description of the few grades of “scientific officer” in Her Majesty’s service:<sup>40</sup>

It is not possible to define with precision the duties of the various grades but, broadly speaking, the duties of the grades above principal scientific officer include responsibility for the administration and direction of scientific work while the principal scientific officer and lower grades concentrate on the scientific work itself.

But the posts of senior principal scientific officer and above may, with Treasury authority, be created for outstanding individual research workers.

Not infrequently, on the business side, executives will take the more extreme ground that they will not tolerate even an organization chart at their level, lest it force them into patterns of action which may become inappropriate, just as these patterns develop a vested interest in protecting personnel.

This general approach to job description has its virtues. For example, by all accounts, the

<sup>39</sup> Paul P. Van Riper, “The Senior Civil Service and the Career System,” Public Administration Review, Vol. 18 (Summer, 1958), pp. 189–200.

<sup>40</sup> Royal Commission on the Civil Service, Introductory Factual Memorandum on the Civil Service (London: Her Majesty’s Stationery Office, 1953), p. 54.

<sup>38</sup> Leonard D. White, Introduction to the Study of Public Administration (New York, 1948), p. 28.

British achieve great flexibility, avoid the sometimes gross artificialities of more "precise" efforts, and (one supposes) increase the power of the supervisors whose discretion is obviously emphasized. Their approach also seems to avoid that situation which haunts position analysts and outside observers alike: that an Einstein would have the same grade as any other physicist doing "similar work."

These problems of the American approach are known well enough, although they do not prove the inferiority of a detailed approach to job description in the lower classifications. These problems may have profound consequences for the management of work. At its worst, taking the mechanical aspects of job description too seriously can disrupt the flow of work. Moderation on the part of both "line" and "staff" seems indicated. The decentralization of much personnel work in the federal service suggests that just such a mature moderation has set in.

Other factors encourage a diluted devotion to the methods and theory implicit in the duties classification in this country. Here let us consider only this feature: it is not obvious that the common attempts at precision are precise about all (or most) of the elements of work which are important. This should encourage a healthy skepticism in developing and administering duties classifications. For, first, the technology of duties classification cannot support great precision now, nor is it likely to do so in the immediate future. Second, if a duties classification purports to describe the behaviors required for the effective performance of an organization's work, existing efforts commonly miss many significant possibilities. If it merely codifies existing practices it may not be worthy of vigorous support, for duties classifications are at least implicitly prescriptive.

The specific dimensions which characterize tasks are but imprecisely known. The usual guidelines for classification—level in the hierarchy, formal authority and responsibility, funds administered, and the like—are not sufficient for doing the job tidily. For example, they do not take into account whether Supervisor X is the informal as well as formal leader of his work unit. It is impractical and unjust to treat Supervisor X's job as the same whatever the answer to this question. Moreover, if a job description is prescriptive, a supervisor's socio-emotional performance cannot be overlooked. We may fairly ask of an approach which preaches and seeks precision: Precision about what?

The question remains, what is significant in describing a task? It is a disarming question.

Existing research does not suggest that it has an obvious or an uncomplicated answer. Factor analysis, a sophisticated mathematical technique, perhaps offers the most hope of developing a set of dimensions which will permit us to describe jobs precisely. A technical discussion of factor analysis hardly can be attempted here. In general, however, the technique permits an initial judgment as to the number of independent dimensions necessary to account for the variation in some batch of scores (e.g., in rankings by several analysts of jobs in terms of the discretion they require incumbents to exercise). The technique has been utilized, for example, to isolate the various kinds of intellectual abilities measured by intelligence tests. There is no way to solve such problems a priori. Factor analysis, in sum, might well complement and direct the enormous amount of observation that normally goes into developing a duties classification and into keeping it current.

Applications of factor analysis to job description suggest the problems which must be met. The technique, for example, has been applied to the ratings of a very large number of characteristics of various jobs. Existing results do not suggest that a synthesis is imminent. A simple manual task, for example, required only a few factors to describe it in one study.<sup>41</sup> Another factor analysis of more complex tasks isolated twenty-three factors.<sup>42</sup> Yet only seven factors were considered necessary to describe the 4,000 jobs listed by the U. S. Employment Service.<sup>43</sup> Thus existing work does not suggest a clear pattern. To further complicate matters, there seem to be "families" of tasks for which individual sets of factor dimensions probably must be developed.<sup>44</sup>

Despite the inconclusiveness of such factor analytical work, two points seem clear. First, the dimensions isolated thus far do not closely resemble the guidelines implicit in much classifi-

<sup>41</sup> A. W. Melton, Apparatus Tests, AAF Aviation Psychological Program, Research Report No. 4 (Washington, D. C.: Government Printing Office, 1947).

<sup>42</sup> L. L. McQuitty, C. Wrigley, and E. L. Gaier, "An Approach to Isolating Dimensions of Job Success," Journal of Applied Psychology, Vol. 38 (1954), pp. 227-32.

<sup>43</sup> E. J. McCormick, R. H. Finn, and C. D. Scherps, "Patterns of Job Requirements," Journal of Applied Psychology, Vol. 41 (1957), pp. 358-64.

<sup>44</sup> Launer F. Carter, William Haythorn, and Margaret Howell, "A Further Investigation of the Criteria of Leadership," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 45 (1950), pp. 350-58.

cation work. In fact, the factors need not have any obvious connection with "commonsense" notions.<sup>45</sup> Second, the isolation of such factors is only the initial step. Factor analysis provides a rough map of those things which are important descriptively. Successful prediction, however, is the crucial test. Such validity work might take such a form: If the task has dimensions a and d, individuals with such-and-such training, proficiency, attitudes, and personality will prove to be high producers.

Even this preliminary factorial work has clear implications for our public personnel systems. Duties classification will have limited usefulness to the degree that task dimensions are not developed and the validity work referred to above is not undertaken. The interim question of whether the pursuit of precision about characteristics—which may or may not be functionally important in describing the task—is worthwhile probably must remain open. The answer is not obviously in the affirmative. A fundamental reevaluation of the common approach to job description in this country seems required, while we await the scientific explanation which will permit great precision. It would seem useful to attempt to test whether general classification provides savings beyond the reach of the detailed classification.

If detail there must be in job description, many factors could fruitfully be included in the usual duties classification. One such is the style of supervision.

Different jobs seem compatible with different styles of supervision. On the available evidence, general statements under this head must be tentative, largely because we know so little about the dimensions along which tasks differ. An example, however, may be hazarded. Provisionally, jobs may be conceived as differing in the degrees to which their performance is programmed and to which their successful performance requires interpersonal cooperation. When a task is unprogrammed and requires high interpersonal cooperation, a permissive supervisory style has seemed most appropriate for those subjects tested. An authoritarian supervisory style will cause the least socio-emotional dislocation on tasks which are highly programmed and require little interpersonal cooperation.<sup>46</sup> These are general relations, indeed, and require much specification of intervening conditions. Similarly, individuals with differing personality characteristics tend to perform most effectively under different supervisory styles.<sup>47</sup> Meeting the needs of employees via an appropriate supervisory style probably would serve to increase the power of supervisors, or at least to provide supervisors with a favorable environment in which to seek high power.<sup>48</sup>

The specification of such factors as the supervisory style congenial to a job is particularly important because the logic of scientific management encourages the choice of a generally inappropriate style. Thus close supervision—which is consistent with this theory—seems to be associated with high output in only a minority of cases, as already noted. If one had to make a choice between the two types of supervision, then, it is not crystal clear that one would be well advised to obey the logic of scientific management.

This analysis can be extended. Close supervision, patently, is encouraged by a structure such as that in Figure 1A. Supervisory pressure would seem to be most directly applicable in this model, which in turn might suggest high supervisory power. Things, however, do not seem to happen this way often. Likert reports that the more "unreasonable pressure" reportedly exerted by a supervisor, the less the power attributed to that supervisor.<sup>49</sup> Moreover, evidence suggests that greater supervisory pressure serves to isolate the supervisor from his men by increasing the danger of communication.<sup>50</sup> In addition, pressure seems inversely related to output. For example, ten of eleven departments in Likert's study which reported little outside pressure to control the pace of work were above-average producers. Nine of ten departments reporting great pressure were below-average producers.<sup>51</sup> Reasonably, then, job descriptions might well profit from the specification of such job-relevant factors as the style of supervision.

This discussion of two approaches to job description—through those factors normally included, and through those factors which are often neglected—permits of simple summary. There seem to be very substantial costs of com-

<sup>45</sup> The naming of factors is not always an easy task, for any factor normally has "loadings" of several variables. Hence the sometimes exotic designations of factorial structures.

<sup>46</sup> Robert T. Golembiewski, "Three Styles of Leadership and Their Uses," Personnel, Vol. 38 (July-August, 1961), pp. 38-39.

<sup>47</sup> Allen D. Calvin, Frederick K. Hoffman, and Edgar L. Harden, "The Effect of Intelligence and Social Atmosphere on Group Problem-Solving Behavior," Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 45 (February, 1957), pp. 61-74.

<sup>48</sup> Likert, op. cit., pp. 93-94.

<sup>49</sup> Likert, op. cit., pp. 56-57.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., p. 45.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., p. 20.

mission and omission in the job descriptions common in our civil service systems. These costs complicate the management of work, however nicely the systems fit the three core goals underlying the American approach to public personnel administration.

V. SUMMARY

Our federal Civil Service Commission has been accustomed to serve more than one master. As one commentator noted:<sup>52</sup>

"For whom does the Civil Service Commission work?" We used to reply, "Well, we think it works first for its congressional committees, second for the status employees, third for the American Legion in support of veterans' preference laws, fourth for civil service employees' unions, and possibly fifth for the President." Since the end of World War II, the President has moved up in this list but it is difficult to tell just how far.

The analysis above, in essence, argues that yet another master requires service, the development of a work environment within which a professional manager can do his most effective job. Substantial revisions in traditional thinking and technique about our civil service systems will be required to that end.

<sup>52</sup> Bernstein, op. cit., p. 76.

COMMUNICATIONS

ON PARSONS ON FLORIDA POLITICS

TO THE EDITOR:

From my occasional browsing of articles on the history of science I judge that questions of "priority" of discovery and instances of "multiple" independent discoverers are both rather common happenings. With the steady growth in the size of the political science profession and the rapid proliferation of journals the difficulty of keeping up with the literature in any given specialty has increased markedly. Still, I think anyone even roughly familiar with the Florida political scene or with the not-so-extensive published literature on Florida politics would note some striking omissions, both substantive and bibliographic, from Malcolm Parsons' article on the Florida senate (September issue, pp. 605-615).

First, and to my mind most glaring, is Parsons' failure to make any reference at all to the various pieces by William C. Havard and Loren P. Beth, who have previously pointed out virtually everything that Parsons has to say (and more—since they cover the lower house as well as the senate). Thus small-county control of the Florida senate presidency and of the major committees is discussed in their 1960 monograph, Representative Government and Reapportionment: A Case Study of Florida (Gainesville: Public Administration Clearing Service, 1960), pp. 61-67; and the deliberate "stacking" of committees is extensively analyzed in their article, "Committee Stacking and Political Power in Florida," Journal of Politics (February 1961), pp. 57-83. Although the Havard-Beth book on the Florida legislature, The Politics of Misrepresentation (Louisiana State University Press, 1962) has only recently become available, their previous pieces have been in print for almost two years. They seem more relevant than references to A. Lawrence Lowell.

Second, to write of tension and conflict in the Florida senate without some serious consideration of the disruptive impact of the reapportionment issue is surely to produce Hamlet without the prince. Parsons notes that none of the sessions from 1947-1953 are even roughly comparable in terms of sectionalism to the pattern evident in all of the sessions from 1955-1961. The obvious question then is, what happened in 1954-1955 to change the whole nature of legislative politics? Population growth and "creeping Republicanism" have been going on for decades; what seemed to spark the conflict was the bitter duel between LeRoy Collins (governor from 1955-1961) and the dominant North Florida senate clique (generally referred to in the Florida press as "the pork-chop gang"). That reapportionment was the crucial issue and that the organization of the "pork-choppers" was the mechanism for achieving North Florida cohesion stand out clearly from such accounts as that by Virgil M. Newton, Jr., managing editor of the Tampa Tribune, in his Crusade for Democracy (Iowa State University Press, 1961). We should all guard against a sort of Gresham's Law which permits an enthusiasm for chi square tests to drive from political science the basic issues that "politics" is about.

Third, the pattern of sectionalism which Parsons presents in his map (p. 608, which unfortunately fails to show senate district boundaries) is a familiar one, used over the past ten years by virtually everybody writing on Florida electoral politics. Here I would cite only Herbert J. Doherty, "Liberal and Conservative Voting Patterns in Florida," Journal of Politics (August 1952); Donald S. Strong, "Presidential Election in the South," ibid. (August 1955), especially pp. 351-352; and my own book, The Negro and Southern Politics (New York University Press, 1957), pp. 93-102 (especially maps 4 and 5). On the substantive side I think a more sensitive index of change than Parsons' measure, which is two-thirds plain Republican vote, would point up some important distinctions within North Florida, especially between the generally stagnant area between the Suwannee and Apalachicola Rivers and the rapidly booming far Gulf coast. Since the state's overall rate of growth over the past decade was 78.7 per cent, counties which are below the state average are by no means all "stable" in population.

Fourth, the classification of districts as "urban," "mixed," or "rural" is made in a manner that results in some curious distortions. An "urban" district defined as containing at least one urban place with a population of 50,000 or over would be understandable. But how should we classify a multi-county district that has several smaller urban places, with an aggregate population of 50,000 or over? Parsons apparently calls it an urban district too. Thus footnote 16, page 611, notes the "urban"

Fort Myers district, although Fort Myers has a 1960 population of only 22,523. Since the existing legislative malapportionment gives North Florida more single-county districts than population warrants, but lumps numerous South Florida counties together into multi-county districts, the measure exaggerates the "urban-ness" of South Florida and of some South Florida districts. Consider the classification of four counties, each with a town of 14,000. These would make four "rural" districts if each were a single-county district. It is hard to see why the identical inhabitants should be converted into urbanites by lumping the same four towns into a single multi-county district (which thus would have a total urban population of 56,000). Fort Myers plus Key West indeed have other 50,000 residents, but only prophecy could justify putting either of these charming little places, or the two together, into the same category with Miami and Jacksonville. Is a state senator representing several little county seat towns likely to be any more urban-oriented than one representing a single county?

Students familiar with the previously published literature on Florida politics will doubtless find some satisfaction in the additional confirmation of findings provided by Parsons' laborious check of senate roll-call votes. Teasing any conclusions out of such data is often a difficult task. It might be facilitated by making better use of the existing literature, and by picking up the analysis at a point calculated to build on what has already been done. Increasing sophistication in the study of legislatures is certainly to be applauded—at least with two cheers—but it should not be encouraged to proceed at the cost of divorcing the study of "legislative systems" entirely from the real-life world of politics.

HUGH DOUGLAS PRICE

Syracuse University

INSTRUMENTAL VALUES AND ULTIMATE GOALS

TO THE EDITOR:

In his article on "Values and Interests" (this REVIEW, Vol. 56, pp. 567-576), Professor Van Dyke has provided a lucid and fruitful analysis of these concepts. Nevertheless, his interpretation leads to certain difficulties. I should like to point them out and to propose a solution.

According to the author, making a choice consists essentially of two successive steps: (1) selecting an "ultimate goal" (or "intrinsic value" or "independent interest"); and (2) determining the necessary means ("proximate goals" or "instrumental values" or "dependent interests"). Step 1 is logically and empirically arbitrary, since there is no objective way of determining what ought to be done for its own sake. On the other hand, the rationality of step 2 can be objectively ascertained by empirical science, since the relationship of means to end is one of cause to effect.

First of all, it is doubtful whether, as a matter of fact, actors in general and political decision makers in particular normally first "assume or postulate the goal values or independent interests that guide their behavior" (p. 569) and afterwards decide to use whatever means are necessary to such ultimate goals. Second, ultimate goals are usually too general and vague to allow for articulate disagreement. Nearly everyone is committed to the same intrinsic values, e.g., mental health, the public good, the national interest. Yet, not everyone makes the same value judgments. Third, the more proximate the goal, the greater the probability of disagreement as to whether it ought to be pursued. On the basis of the author's analysis, such disagreements about means to an agreed end could only be factual, never valuational. Finally, while the author realizes that "the same thing may be both goal value and an instrumental value," (p. 372) he does not take into account that the same thing may be considered intrinsically disvaluable—e.g., the expected losses in an attack—and yet a necessary means to an end—e.g., victory. Are we to say that these losses constitute a proximate goal, an instrumental value, a dependent interest?

These four objections indicate the need for a more realistic model of rational choice than the author's underlying two-step theory—a theory supposing that predictions precede evaluations. A rational actor does not simply determine the causal relationships that lead from his contemplated immediate action via his intermediate goals to his ultimate end, "like rungs on a ladder or links in a chain." (p. 567) Rather, he must predict, as far as possible, the total outcome of the action, which includes side-effects and after-effects as well as the ultimate goal itself. (The picture of a network of causal relationships would therefore be more appropriate.) The actor must also determine what alternative courses of action are open to him in the given situation, and their respective outcomes as well. If the same goal can be reached by different means, that goal will be included in several of these possible outcomes. The actor's evaluations pertain, not to "goal values" in isolation, but to means and total outcomes, which may include elements that are intrinsically disvaluable to him. Furthermore, he does not make absolute value-judgments, but appraises the relative over-all desirability of each alternative outcome. The question then becomes: What is on the whole more valuable to me, the (probable) loss of so and so many lives and victory and . . . etc.; or saving these lives and defeat and . . . etc.? I agree with the author's non-cognitivist value theory; there are no objective criteria for validating preferences among alternative outcomes. An actor's choice of a course of action is rational provided the expected outcome is, on the whole, more valuable to him than (or rather: at least as valuable as) the outcome of any available alternative; i.e., if its net expectable utility is maximal.

Doing away with the distinction between intrinsic and instrumental values or goals, and interpreting choices as comparative evaluations of alternative total possible outcomes, eliminates all the above-mentioned difficulties. This approach is also in line with recent developments in analytic philosophy.<sup>1</sup>

FELIX E. OPPENHEIM

University of Massachusetts

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Richard Brandt, Ethical Theory (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1959), ch. 15; Carl G. Hempel, "Rational Action," Proceedings and Addresses of the American Philosophical Association, 1961-62 (Antioch Press, Yellow Springs, Ohio, 1962).

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS

Pye , Politics, Personality and Nation Building. WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD . . . . .	978
Fiser , Mastery of the Metropolis. JAMES G. COKE . . . . .	979
Hodgkin , African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide. FRANK UNTERMYER . .	980
Huntington , The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in National Politics. LAURENCE I. RADWAY . . . . .	982
Manning , The Nature of International Society. CHARLES A. McCLELLAND . . . .	983
Robinson , Congress and Foreign Policy-Making. DONALD E. STOKES . . . . .	984
Wilson , A Theory of Public Opinion. SAMUEL KRISLOV . . . . .	985
Mackintosh , The British Cabinet; Lord Morrison of Lambeth , British Parliamentary Democracy. ROLAND YOUNG . . . . .	986

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY . . . .	988
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS . . . . .	1000
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT . . . . .	1017
INTERNATIONAL LAW, POLITICS, AND ORGANIZATION . . . . .	1029
OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED . . . . .	1037

BOOK REVIEWS

Politics, Personality, and Nation Building: Burma's Search for Identity. BY LUCIAN W. PYE. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1962. Pp. 307. $7.50.)

Politics, Personality and Nation Building is a striking new effort to explain why transitional societies have such difficulty in modernizing. The answer, says Lucian W. Pye, lies in the psychic dimension of change, not in the lack of resources or foreign aid. Specifically, it is the spirit and calculations of the political elite that are the main barrier to progress. Taking Burma as an example, the author probes sensitively into the anxieties and self-doubts of her political leaders that inhibit purposive, cooperative action. The result is a subtle and deeply pessimistic account of frustration in the building of a modern state.

Pye's thesis is skilfully elaborated with the tools of psychology, political science and sociology. It is amplified with a good deal of empirical data on Burma, including long personal interviews with politicians and administrators. In fact, two thirds of the book is devoted to the political culture of the Burmese elite, as it has developed out of socialization processes begun in childhood and carried on through career experiences in colonial and post-colonial times.

The themes are of wider significance, however. They are set forth as a model to which most transitional societies are believed to conform today. Thus the book is a general study of the politics of modernization, with the Burmese case detailed to give concreteness and color.

The crux of the difficulty, the author argues, lies in psychological insecurities created in the minds of politicians and administrators by the diffusion of modern culture. Government is all-important; but its achievements are stultified because its leading actors are confused in their values and unsure of their capacities. As transitional people, they lack any confident sense of identity either for themselves or their societies. This makes for unpredictability, a sense of isolation, and mutual distrust in interpersonal relations. It robs them particularly of "the spirit of associational life" which is the sine qua non of organization building. A politics of personal intrigue and public fantasy becomes therefore an almost insurmountable obstacle to nation building. Unhappily the difficulty is not a temporary carry-over from tradition. It is a psychic dilemma built into the very process of acculturation that makes modernizing elements unfit for creative leadership.

The author's delineation of these subjective, irrational dimensions of Burmese politics is vigorously impressionistic. His argument is exemplified though hardly verified by the evidence assembled. It appears to illuminate many facets of elitist behavior in Burma and other transitional societies. And it offers plausible interpretations of the non-development, even retrogression, observable in many fields. The chapters on Burma give deft sketches, for example, of "backward-looking modernizers" in the bureaucracy, of rootless politicians who do not feel at home either with the peasant or the Westerner, of personal tensions growing out of religion and the family, of gentleness and violence in politics, of intentions valued above deeds, of the myth of omnipotence in the midst of incompetence, and so on. It is a pleasure to read a book so well designed and lucidly written.

Any thesis so selective in its facts, and so boldly presented, is bound to invite challenge. Sentiments about power in Burma are detailed, but not the actual power structure. There is much about public administrators, but little about administration. Public investment is mentioned as little more than a program for optimizing loyalty (p. 90), and development projects as virtually the private fiefs of politicians (p. 155). Questionnaire statistics are happily eschewed in favor of more subtle intuitions regarding personality and outlook. Yet this leads sometimes to judgments that seem rather strained. Can the political class of Burma be described as people highly tolerant of nonsense (p. 131) who see events as having neither antecedents or consequences (p. 167), and who believe that political action can neither greatly hasten nor retard economic development (p. 154)? Other observers, too, manage to construct for Burma a balance sheet of social progress not so negative as the one given here.

One suspects that the author may be trying to prove too much by giving an unqualified and inclusive priority to psychic tensions that are only one aspect of the Burmese scene. It is open to question, furthermore, how adequately the modernizing difficulties of China or Indonesia or Egypt can be summed up in the same formula. Yet no one familiar with such societies in transition can fail to be struck with the wide relevance and authenticity of Pye's insights from Burma.

Finally, profound doubts about foreign aid are implicit in this view of politics as the inhibitor of progress. Capital from abroad can hardly cure conspiratorial factionalism or a "paralysis of will" growing out of psychological insecurity. In fact, says Pye, the aid-giving nations are caught in a dilemma. Assistance on rational terms invites suspicion of foreign control. On the other hand, its suspension leads to charges of abandonment and betrayal. We are damned if we do, and damned if we don't.

The only solutions suggested are (1) "a grand ideological breakthrough," inspired by some charismatic leader, or (2) the slow growth of "communities of modernizers" gaining self-confidence from their mastery of new skills. But the first is unlikely—Martin Luthers come rarely—and the second is a long, slow process.

One is left then with a rather gloomy prospect, and a conviction that governments in the aid-giving business should pay more attention to a nation's subjective capacity to utilize external assistance. The author joins others today who call for a more realistic appraisal of political needs and consequences in the realm of foreign aid. Particularly, a more imaginative effort is required to build confident leadership and organizational capacities.

WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD

Princeton University

Mastery of the Metropolis. BY WEBB S. FISER. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962, Pp. 168. $1.95.)

In the literature of urban areas, we may identify two main streams among the metropolitan evangelists. The first, and older, tradition was that of the structural reformers, who sought governmental institutions that were both efficient and expressive of "area-wide" considerations. Their allies were the civic actionists, who found that sweet reasonableness emerged when all interests could be induced to sit down together.

The impotence of this social gospel in worldly affairs became so evident that neo-orthodoxy was bound to emerge. Writers like Wood and Banfield demonstrated that sin abounds. Using analytical concepts that cracked the bonds of a strictly structural approach, these writers were led to the conclusion that the Metropolitan Kingdom was not likely to be achieved in this generation, and certainly not through the simplistic strategies of governmental reform. Buttressed with such new views of political relationships, political scientists have begun to approach the older literature with the same analytical treatment that contemporary theologians would accord Walter Rauschenbusch and "Acres of Diamonds."

During the rise of neo-orthodoxy, certain professional groups, who could not be expected to be au courant with the recent political science literature, began to be stimulated by the dramatic changes in American urban areas. Thus, a newer stream of metropolitan fervor became evident in other quarters. This might be called the good news according to Architectural Forum. The literature stemming from Fortune magazine has a similar tenor, but its emphasis on works is so strong that it occupies the same position with respect to much of the architecture-planning literature as James does in relation to the synoptic gospels.

From this standpoint, Professor Fiser's book is the first synthesis to appear; it is an interesting and not unsuccessful attempt to blend the old and the new evangelical traditions. Fiser is a man with a mission. As the title indicates, his major concern is with the conditions under which citizens of a metropolitan area can control growth and change for the "common good." The "basic proposition" is "the desirability of creating a base which will facilitate political and social adaptation."

The book is hortatory in character. Fiser builds his case on certain key evaluations of modern urban society: (1) Urban residents do not have available the wide range of choices in physical environment that modern technology has made possible; therefore, the quality of urban existence leaves much to be desired, (2) the nationalization of economic life has produced a crisis in local leadership, and (3) the central problems of urban life are so interrelated that an effective attack upon them cannot be mounted seriatim; the urban environment is a seamless web.

His suggested strategy contains three elements: governmental reorganization, citizens' organization, and public education. In his treatment of these three, Fiser implicitly acknowledges his debt to the older tradition of reform.

Specifically, Fiser most closely follows the structural reformers in his enthusiastic acceptance of that grand old term "area-wide-comprehensive-planning." Early in the first chapter he complains, "No one is responsible for making sure that all the federal programs which impinge upon the metropolitan regions make parts of a coherent whole. Nor is anyone responsible for making sure that all the state programs fit into a general scheme. Within the metropolitan region itself, no authority exists which has the power to harmonize local plans."

Now, in its original formulation, this sentiment usually referred to the need for area-wide capital programming, zoning, and other coordinative administrative mechanisms. For Fiser, however, the commitment to comprehensive planning is important for another reason, which is where the Architectural Forum stream comes in. Quite rightly, Fiser asserts that our technology has created a new condition of life: that is, our range of alternatives is so great that we can have the kind of cities we want. To Fiser, this means meeting the varied needs of urban populations so that the metropolis can become "an exciting, vital, and pleasing human experience." In turn, this objective requires a combination of public and private actions, which become geared together only through comprehensive community planning.

Fiser recognizes a fundamental change in city government in the past thirty years. He sees that the management of growth and change, rather than the simple provision of services, has become the touchstone of municipal policy. This recognition gives particular force to his chapter on urban renewal, which is the best section of the book.

Nevertheless, the appreciation of the complementary roles of public and private agencies is not carried far enough. Potentially, Fiser's chapter entitled "The Intermingling of Public and Private" is seminal. He succinctly summarizes the general trend: "In general this movement can be seen as a pattern: arising in the use of regulation to prevent certain abuses, progressing to inducements to achieve minimum standards, and finally culminating in a kind of public-private partnership in order to get the most out of the system." But Fiser's illustrations of his point—large-scale private suburban developments like Oak Park, Levittown, and Sterling Forest, central city renewal, and new zoning techniques—suggest only situations in which public policy allows a wider scope for purely private initiatives. What seems more significant is the further extension of the public role from being simply instrumental to an active concern with goal-setting and goal-implementation. A good current example is the covey of non-profit corporations set in motion in Philadelphia. These constitute the nearest approach of American cities to the activation of a polity.

It is this turning aside from the full implications of the intermingling of public and private that produces, in this reviewer's judgment, an inadequate treatment of two most important points. In the first place, Fiser does not cover at all the role of the professionals as innovators of policy. He berates planners for trying to sell their plans through public relations techniques, but he does not mention the increasing instances of professionals (not all "planners," and not always employed by public agencies) who furnish political leaders with the agenda of alternatives.

Second, Fiser's relative myopia about the implications of professional roles produces a curious contradiction. After arguing most forcefully for a wide variety of programs that do not directly coincide with the economic interests of business and industry, such as housing for the aged, central city renewal at pedestrian scale, and mass transportation, he concludes that "in the end the market will decide what kinds of neighborhoods and specialized units are most congenial to human survival and development." Such a conclusion neglects the obvious: that is, almost all of the programs Fiser considers good have been possible only because of active public intervention in the market to achieve ends which the market was incapable of promoting.

Since the book does not come to grips with fundamental problems of this type, it does not contribute to an understanding of the reasons for shifts in governmental roles, nor to the differential impact of these reasons in cities of varying sizes and types. Nevertheless, it does furnish a relatively neat summary of the rehabilitated tradition of metropolitan reform, appropriately tempered by some of the gradualism called for by the neo-orthodox writers. Although Fiser communicates rather breathlessly at times ("Gruen is to be congratulated for insisting that these dreams are practical"; "Mr. Bartlett and State Senator John Hughes moved from room to room breaking log jams"; "James Rouse inspired the delegates . . ."; "It will not do to be a man of little faith even if the obstacles are enormous," etc.), his goals for the metropolis are decent ones. The level of the audience conditions the book's utility. A packet of materials including this book, the CED publications, and The Exploding Metropolis should do very nicely as background reading for intelligent laymen.

JAMES G. COKE

University of Illinois

African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide. BY THOMAS HODGKIN. (Baltimore: Penguin Books, Inc., 1961. Pp. 217. $0.95.)

It is hardly necessary to argue today that Africa has a recorded and recordable past. For political scientists, the question is no longer the existence of that past, but its relevance to contemporary politics.

Africa not only has a history; it has a rich tradition of historical research, and the history of history in the Western Sudan alone has become a respectable and well-worked branch of African studies. Arab scholars a thousand years ago were speculating about this great region, and Sudanese studies have an almost continuous history from that day until this.

The practical concern of the Arabs with kings and rulers caused much of this early scholarship to emphasize African constitutions and governments. More recently, anthropologists have taken up this concern with political history, have learned to supplement the interview with the archive, and have added a further dimension to African political studies. But the study of political problems has always been important in African historical research.

Only the slightest shift in emphasis has been required in order to reach the radically new assumption that contemporary African politics can be comprehended only in the light of an ancient and continuous past. It is the distinction of Thomas Hodgkin that he not only embraced this assumption earlier and more enthusiastically than most Africanists, but also that he has superbly equipped himself for the double disciplines of pre-colonial historian and contemporary political analyst. Fluent in both French and Arabic (the two primary influences in the Sudan), almost ten years ago he was writing simultaneously about the medieval city-states of the savanna and political parties in contemporary Liberia, and now African Political Parties has appeared within a year of Nigerian Perspectives, a learned anthology of materials bearing on Nigerian history prior to 1900. The richness and excitement of Hodgkin's writing derive in large part from his ability to illustrate contemporary problems with incidents drawn from Africa's distant past; from his almost reckless enthusiasm, as he draws analogies between events fifteen hundred years apart; and from a relish for the problems of political style, sometimes at the expense of the hard questions of political power. Although Hodgkin states his intention, in the Introduction to the present book, to say little about political parties prior to about 1945 (and although he correctly emphasizes the recentness of African parties), he fortunately neglects to be bound too closely by his own rules. His mind is too filled with African history, and his approach is too eclectic, to be confined to any limitation in favor of the contemporary.

African historical research is now a thoroughly international discipline, and there are several distinguished African historians, but it was not long ago when the most important work (particularly on the Western Sudan) was being done by French scholars. The Arab historians, for example, were frequently translated into French, but not into English. The most important research on African politics, on the other hand, is now clearly American, and it has been interesting to observe the work of Hodgkin, once so obviously dependent upon the writings of the great French Africanists, fall under the influence of American scholars, and then under their guidance return to France, and to the model set by Maurice Duverger for the comparative study of political parties.

Duverger was concerned with party as a special phenomenon, distinct from its membership and its ideology, and his remarkable book is in the narrow sense a "natural history" of political parties. Hodgkin now presents us with a parallel natural history of African parties, and in some cases he actually follows the chapter headings of Duverger, which means that significant portions of this book are on organization and the analysis of pure types—on party morphology. Yet even Duverger was unable to avoid such labels as "left," "conservative," "socialist," and "monarchist"; the vocabulary of 19th Century European politics. In the case of Hodgkin, one suspects that his real interest lies in ideology, while the model of Duverger points in exactly the opposite direction. This study is not nearly so systematic and rigorous as that of Duverger, the statistical apparatus of Duverger is entirely lacking, and the conclusions are sometimes suggestive rather than exhaustive. This is the necessary outcome of Hodgkin's indifference to reconciling structure with ideology, his concern with practical questions, and his historicism.

Yet the result is an intricate and lively essay; original, entertaining, and enormously instructive. The illustrations are drawn from the entire continent, including the Maghrib, which Hodgkin has studied so deeply, but correctly excluding the European parties of Southern and Eastern Africa. The illustrations, moreover, are chosen for their political rather than their geographic appropriateness, so that in one paragraph one encounters, in this order, Gambia, Ghana, Uganda, Upper Volta, Guinea, Mali, and Somalia. No doubt one of the purposes which Hodgkin had in mind in writing this book was to give Africans a continental overview from which to interpret the politics of their individual nations.

Although this book may be written in part for African politicians, Hodgkin is a Renaissance man, with a strong feeling for the unity of scholarship and politics. This is a scholar's book, too, and it is filled with suggestions for research, on some of which work is already in progress. Aristide Zolberg, for example, is now working on local party branches, and Immanuel Wallerstein is working on the political theory of African parties, thereby plugging two of the gaps of which Hodgkin complains.

The Table of Contents is by itself a fascinating document, and many of the subheadings ("Legality and Illegality," "The 'Party within the Party,'" "Constitutional Action and Violence") point up the utility of African studies for the specialist in Western political parties. Inevitably, Hodgkin commences with a chapter on "The Setting," and equally inevitably, the first two parts of this Setting are on pre-colonial society and the "colonial situation." (This Marxist touch, within an essentially non-Marxist book, although quoted from the French sociologist, Georges Balandier, is a typical Hodgkin ornamental flourish.) Always allowing for exceptions (indeed, underlining the exceptions), he conceives that pre-colonial society carries over into contemporary parties in three ways: through the highly stratified "chiefs' parties," through parties which incorporate an ethnic renaissance, and through appeals to pre-colonial segments for the support of modernist, nationalist political parties. All of this, richly illustrated, constitutes the first three pages of the chapter on the Setting.

What is a party? This question, academic in countries where there is a competitive party system, is central to an understanding of African parties. Hodgkin treats the question as if it were an exercise in linguistic definition, which it certainly is not. On the one hand, there is a proliferation of competing political groups within many territories. On the other, there is the single effective party in Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Ghana, and Tanganyika, for example, which has become so powerful that the struggle for control must take place within its upper reaches, rather than within the apparatus of the state. In some of the countries of Africa, the primacy of party over state has become an article of national faith, and the party has set up its welfare agencies, its propaganda machine, and its police system, which sometimes dominate the equivalent agencies within the state. Is this a political party in any meaningful sense?

Hodgkin is still less concerned with the other side of the problem: the tendency of African parties to break along barely concealed tribal lines. The complexity of Hodgkin's analysis serves a good purpose, for he avoids such over-worked categories as tribalism versus nationalism and unitary versus federal systems. When he does refer to such bald opposites, he makes clear that they are merely the extreme ends of a continuum. But this has the effect of obscuring the desperate seriousness of a struggle between modernist and tribal parties which would destroy most of the values for which both sides are contesting. It may be that this is the only alternative to single party rule.

FRANK UNTERMYER

Roosevelt University

The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in

National Politics. BY SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1961. Pp. 500. $8.75.)

This important study is the product of sophisticated theory as well as prodigious research. Its purpose is not to propound defense policy but to dissect and ultimately to defend the pluralistic system that produces it. In pursuing this goal it provides a superb demonstration of how military data ought to be exploited by political science as a whole and by students of national government in particular. For this reason alone its audience should not and undoubtedly will not be limited to specialists in national security affairs.

At the heart of the book are five interrelated essays that analyze the foreign and domestic impacts on postwar defense policy, the relative influence of different participants in the policy process, the conflict between national security and other social values, the innovation of major strategic programs, and the competitive relationships among the partisans thereof.

One of Huntington's major theses is that decisions on defense strategy and structure are made in different ways. The formation of structural policy—and here he refers to military personnel, supply, organization, etc.—resembles the familiar processes of domestic legislation. The President takes the lead in developing an Administration position which is then reviewed closely by relatively concerned and informed Congressional committees. Decisions on strategy govern the nature and size of armed forces maintained for particular functions, for example deterrence or European defense. Here the attentive audience is smaller. Final power tends to rest with the executive branch, but the President, paradoxically, has relatively less influence over his subordinates. Why? Because the executive branch, as if some compensatory mechanism were at work, disposes of strategic issues by essentially legislative proceedings. At this point the President is only first among equals.

In the workings of both sub-systems of government Huntington finds evidence that should reassure those who fear an America dominated by militarists. The champions of national security have apparently been less influential than the champions of private consumption; on occasion they have even had to yield to claimants for domestic welfare expenditures. Civilians, not soldiers, usually initiated new departures in strategy. Military leaders tended to acquiesce in Presidential decisions about the total size of the defense effort, limiting themselves to debate over the sub-allocation of funds set aside for military purposes.

Conservatives may take comfort in the author's evident skepticism about sweeping institutional reform, in his temperate praise of the existing system, and in his positive affection for some of its complex or apparently illogical features. Strategic policy, he insists, must be acceptable as well as rational. Vague platforms unify joint chiefs as well as party chiefs. Log-rolling, buckpassing, and service rivalry are appropriate and inevitable. Those who demand greater purpose, unity, and direction may stand in a tradition of liberal reform that dates back at least to Woodrow Wilson. But one cannot impose a "symmetrical and immaculate model of executive decision-making" on a pluralistic polity. "Madison not Bagehot wrote the Constitution." As a parting shot Huntington implies that the liberal ethos may impede our advance from security to the nobler and costlier goal of "preeminence in world politics." Readers of The Soldier and the State (1957) will be reminded of his earlier argument that liberalism interferes with professionalism and objective control of the military. But Burke doesn't win every round this time. Note, for example, the devastating rebuttal of Lippmann's strictures on public opinion.

Huntington's argument is intricate, replete with paradox, sometimes dogmatic, often brilliant, and always provocative. He places a perhaps inordinate emphasis on the concept of deterrence. More important, he tends to press his case so vigorously that possible objections are discounted too lightly or passed over in silence. To be sure, rivalry and bargaining are inevitable and often productive in administration; indeed, they are perhaps less peculiar to the process of developing strategic programs than Huntington suggests. But are they really that desirable or inevitable? The case against service rivalry, let us remember, is not primarily economic or aesthetic. It rests on the suspicion that service rivalry may corrupt strategic judgment. It may delay innovation. (Why is change so often initiated by outsiders?) It certainly undermines public confidence in military professionalism. (When military leaders attack each others' expertise, why shouldn't laymen follow suit?)

Again, if a President can fix or alter the overall magnitude of the defense effort decisively enough to satisfy Bagehot, and if his economy drives can force the cancellation of a super-carrier or jeopardize commitments to NATO, is it not important to record a rather large qualification to the proposition that strategic programs are argued out by essentially legislative processes? Finally, did conciliar structures loom so large in the Eisenhower years only because consensus is indispensable and because the President was by temperament addicted to compromise? Or did this also reflect a Whiggish readiness, rather marked in the Republican party since 1940, to put the presidency in commission? My guess is that Democratic Administrations will continue to find practical political reasons for relying more heavily on personal leadership even in the area of strategic decision-making.

LAURENCE I. RADWAY

Dartmouth College

The Nature of International Society. By C. A. W. MANNING. (London: G. Bell and Sons Ltd., 1962. Pp. xi, 220. 30 s.)

For more than a quarter-century, C. A. W. Manning has been arguing persistently against treating the study of international relations as a bundle of academic specialties or as a mere collection of certain historical and legal topics. He has urged that, in teaching and training, the subject be viewed as a whole—in effect, as a special sociology. His readers have not always gained a firm impression of his meaning. Now Professor Manning has taken sufficient space to write down what he had in mind. The result is a systematic conception of what international relations is all about. A theory of international relations is presented, conversationally and at considerable length, and then fitted to a broad array of subjects.

The professional student of international relations who is accustomed to American practices may readily become impatient or be thrown off the track of Manning's presentation because of several characteristics of the book. One of these is the style. Manning would be likely to describe it as a "natural-history, idiosyncratic, descriptive, ostensive, portrait-painting treatment . . ." (p. 208). A second quality is the sophisticated simplicity of a discussion that is intended to set forth what one should realize and appreciate before beginning a study of international politics. "It is not an XYZ book, but an ABC." (p. ix) and it is meant to be "An essay, then, for beginners" (p. x) on the subject of "Metadiplomacy." This is not an idea that is given much explicit pedagogical attention in the United States and, in any case, we are not accustomed to serious intellectual fare in such writing directed to undergraduate students.

The Nature of International Society is not really amenable to a summary statement of its contents. Much of its value lies in the clear illustrations and the wise side-comments. A few of the concepts in its basic theory will be given, however.

Manning puts heavy emphasis on the constructed nature of social reality. Under the heading of the "social cosmos" there is described eloquently the "notional" character—as contrasted to the "factual" character—of the "realities" by which men live in all societies. Both the structures and dynamics of human behavior are guided by Sorelian myths, belief systems, and abstract notions that have grown up over long periods of experience and that receive social and cultural blessings. In a sentence, men act according to those socially reinforced and perpetuated images of how things are "out there" in the world. "The social cosmos is a multi-cultural world, a mosaic of belief systems, a jungle, after all—of luxuriant myths" (p. 174). This is Manning's fundamental and much-repeated point.

The study of one particular set of rules, myths, and conventions is the special business of international relations. "Diplomatics" is another name for the study of the society of sovereign states and of actions directed by norms and rules that arose historically as if sovereigns once decided, "Let's play the game of sovereign states." International relations, then, is conceived as resembling a game having its own unchanging rules, not entirely unlike cricket or chess.

Connoisseurship, focused on what the game is about and how its abstractions and myths govern the evaluations of the plays is what the non-specialized and beginning student should aspire toward in studying international relations. Manning believes in the teaching of social science analysis which will help to break unthinking belief in the mythology of the game. He welcomes the "sophisticated realist" who will understand the artificiality of the system, yet who will resist "adolescent" skepticism and cynicism.

Student, practitioner, and connoisseur, alike, have need to grasp at more than an understanding of the "quasi-game" of the sovereign states and its rules contained in international law, however. The international system is not open to change by planned reforming actions—this system compares to the lily pads on the surface of the pond and not to the muddy roots. Below the surface in the "ponddy depths" of particular cultures and sub-cultures are sources of influence in the game and, possibly, of long-term changes in the system. Thus, the man who would adjust his view to a Copernican outlook on the international system must take into account, as well as possible, the dazzling variety of the games concurrently being played inside national organizations and national cultures. Manning's discussion of the interplay of contemporary cross-national political influence provides a simple introduction to this particular complexity of international relations.

In a longer review, criticisms and objections to Manning's portrayal of the social cosmos and the international system might well be advanced but, in any case, it must be pointed out that his thinking is very much in tune with the "phenomenological approach" being espoused by a number of the new breed of American international relationists. This is so, despite the style and focus of the work and despite Manning's skepticism about American "Rocket-borne Researchers." The book seems to make the best for itself of both the old and the new. The question is whether or not this remarkable essay directed at the beginning student of international relations can be read and understood in American colleges and universities. The answer can come only by trying the assignment in the classroom.

CHARLES A. MCCLELLAND

San Francisco State College

Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative. By JAMES A. ROBINSON. (Homewood, Illinois: The Dorsey Press, Inc., 1962. Pp. 262. $5.50.)

This honest and gracefully written book opens several new windows to the subject of legislative-executive relations on foreign affairs. Robinson marshals an unusual range of materials to describe these relations in recent years and to offer some factual and evaluative conclusions, especially as to the significance of communication between Congress and the Executive. This work should be of great interest to the specialist and to anyone who wants a feel for what has been going on in a superlatively important sector of national government.

A sketch of the book may suggest the range of its evidence. The first chapter uses some concepts of recent discussions of power and influence to restate the problems of who influences foreign policy within Congress and between Congress and the Executive. The second and third chapters document the decline of Congress's foreign policy role in terms of twenty-two cases over the past quarter century, including one that Robinson regards as a mild exception, the passage of the resolution sponsored by Senator Monroney leading to the establishment of an International Development Association. The fourth chapter offers some generalizations about factors influencing foreign policy actions of the Senate and its Foreign Relations Committee from the legislative history of several hundred bills and resolutions within the jurisdiction of the Committee in the 81st through 85th Congresses. The fifth and sixth chapters utilize survey interviews to describe the contacts between Congress and the Department of State and to propose several generalizations about the impact of these contacts on foreign policy action by Congress. The seventh chapter states some broad conclusions about the foreign policy role of Congress, ending with an interesting argument about the real or potential influence that several major Senate figures have had on the relations of Congress and Executive.

The proper use of these various kinds of evidence is a major, if implicit, theme of the book. Much of the discussion is purely descriptive. The author is not afraid, for example, to describe a week in the life of the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, and the cases that constitute a good deal of the book's matter are heavily exploited for descriptive purposes. But Robinson obviously believes that more is needed to reach generalized knowledge and that such knowledge is the appropriate goal of his work. The cases are carefully sifted for factors that ought to be included in general conceptualizations of foreign policy making. And generalizations evolved in this way are tested, by what must at times have been prodigious labor, against a wider set of facts. The book will therefore be suggestive to students of public administration and of other fields in which the problem of generalizing from individual cases has arisen. Robinson's focus of explanation remains on Congress. But his underlying belief is that explaining the recent history of legislative-executive relations and predicting their future course requires some decent verified theory.

The twin theses of the book—that the modern role of Congress is to legitimate or amend foreign policy rather than to initiate it and that this limited role is the result of the incomparably greater information available to the Executive—are not new, though I doubt that they have been so impressively supported before. One might wish that the book had dealt more intensively with the reasons Congress has remained so much the prisoner of the Executive's information in identifying policy alternatives and calculating their consequences. Robinson evidently believes that the relative unwillingness of Congress to bureaucratize its intelligence function is a decisive factor. But why so unwilling? What is it in the motivations of the legislator or the structure of the legislative system that discourages the growth of differentiated intelligence arms? Why has the foreign policy role of Congress been influenced so much by the Sol Blooms, who are content to be notified of a decision before it reaches the newspapers, and so little by the Lyndon Johnsons, who have sought to create a bureaucratic staff structure that could rival the Executive in locating problems and proposing solutions. Robinson's interviews in Congress and the State Department presented a rare opportunity to explore the reasons for this contrast.

Quite new is the material linking the nature of communication between Congress and State Department to congressional support for Administration policy. Pursuing his broad interest in the role of information, Robinson uses interview data to show that adequate communication from the Department to Senators and Representatives enhances the likelihood of their supporting the Executive's policies, especially if they are of the opposite party. Robinson is cautious in stating this finding, and what emerges from his qualifications is a purely intra-psychic proposition—the more satisfied the legislator is with the Department's communication, the more satisfied he is likely to be with its policies—with all the pitfalls of causal inference to which such a relation is prey. Nonetheless, Robinson's finding is very suggestive and his discussion of the problem excellent. What he has done is certain to stimulate further work.

There is a good deal of respect, even affection, in Robinson's attitude toward Congress. A belief that proposals for expanding Congress's role ought to be taken seriously is implicit in much of the evaluative discussion of the final chapter. Robinson considers several proposals and endorses one for strengthening the majority party leadership of the House by transferring to the leadership the Rules Committee's present power to propose the terms under which a measure is to be debated. Although the discussion of reform is not closely integrated with the factual generalizations of earlier chapters, it reflects again the author's belief that verified general propositions are needed. "If the government of the United States is to master the future, it needs to know how to think about the future. It needs more explicit theory about the future . . . (p. 207)." Robinson might equally have written that the success of institutional change to expand the foreign policy role of Congress depends on our getting some better factual generalizations about legislative-executive relations. To this task the book is dedicated.

DONALD E. STOKES

The University of Michigan

A Theory of Public Opinion. BY FRANCIS GRAHAM WILSON. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company. Pp. xii, 295. $7.00.)

This volume reflects Francis Wilson's lifetime interest in public opinion and political philosophy. A Theory of Public Opinion is neither aptly nor happily named, and is principally a history of usage and thought on the theme of public opinion. In this aspect, it can best be characterized as a hybrid between the well-known essays of Palmer and Allport in that it also adumbrates difficulties that have developed in the use of the term. The final portion of the book gathers together several related essays by Wilson—many of them previously appearing elsewhere—on particular aspects of public opinion in democratic society.

Professor Wilson's philosophical commitments lead him to an implicit definition of public opinion which is broader than that of most current practitioners. And there is little, indeed, said in these pages about empirical tabulations and the quantification of anyone's actual opinions on anything. In dealing with the more speculative aspects of the topic, he quite soundly argues for the legitimacy of such a posture in view of a tradition of serious questions raised by thinkers in the past—some of them by the empiricists themselves—and currently left unexplored in the light of present-day fashions in the social sciences. He shrewdly observes that epistemological inquiries—I would say methodological quests often indistinguishable in practice, though different in intent—have regained respectability today. Wilson, however, wishes to range far beyond this to questions of values and judgments systematically considered.

Unfortunately, his framework is not well suited to his aim. His bold, broad questioning transforms the questions of "public opinion" into problems of majority rule, the ethical rights of minorities, the rationality of man and its limits, and other transcendental, though immediately pressing, moral issues.

To attempt to deal with these problems primarily through the vehicle of authors who have centered their thought upon the concept "public opinion" is extremely difficult. Many of the issues with which this volume deals have been treated with far greater precision and depth by writers other than those who have speculated on "public opinion." The author allows himself wide latitude in this respect, but there are limits. Plato, to be sure, can be readily treated—the images of the cave, for example—but Freud is introduced chiefly through a discussion of Edward Bernays. Similar examples could easily be multiplied. The result is an inevitable fuzziness and an impression of incomplete delvings into the discussion of the key issues. Even Professor Wilson's own strongly-held conservative views tend to be asserted more in passing than through systematic examination.

A word, too, seems to be in order about his attitude toward the contemporary researchers who have taken over the term "public opinion," presumably to its detriment. On the whole, Professor Wilson seems to wish to avoid debate with them. Indeed, in the Introduction his disagreements are said to be only over details; yet throughout the volume he gives evidence of rather deeper disagreement, and even ventures occasional specific criticisms of such work as Stouffer's. In general, though, he, if anything, shows an exaggerated respect for work in the field: his criticisms tend to be tangential, or in some instances are unexceptionable. Nevertheless, this book makes a small beginning—it criticizes without stridency and irrationality—toward restoring the dialogue between theorists and practitioners in political science. If political theory is, as a recent committee of the Association again asserted, the core of our discipline, it deserves to be restored to relevance for the periphery.

SAMUEL KRISLOV

Michigan State University

The British Cabinet. By JOHN P. MACKINTOSH. (London: Stevens & Sons Limited, 1962. Pp. xi, 546.)

British Parliamentary Democracy. By LORD MORRISON OF LAMBETH. (London: Asia Publishing House, 1962. Pp. vii, 99.)

There are formidable difficulties facing a scholar who attempts to write an informed book about the operation and influence of the British Cabinet. In the first place, there are stylized ways of thinking about the Cabinet—to Bagehot, it was the "buckle that binds"—and even so astute a political practitioner as Lord Morrison has resorted to stereotypes when he characterizes the Prime Minister as primus inter pares, a coordinating minister whose position differs only in degree from any other non-departmental minister. Further difficulties arise because inquisitiveness in the operation of the Cabinet is not encouraged. The British Cabinet is a collegiate body which is expected to show a united front on policy, not the fissures of indecision and of opposition, and it carries on its activities behind a protective hedge of semisecrecy. One may occasionally get a peep at the maneuvers and procedures of the Cabinet when things go wrong and there is an official inquiry, or a minister reveals the schisms on policy in a speech of resignation, or political memoirs are published in a Sunday supplement, or when the Opposition forces the Government to make an indiscreet admission or disclosure, but all of these occasions are not normal proceedings; they are an extra bit of frosting on the cake, a further revelation of the spiciness of British politics, but continuous, reliable material on the workings of the Cabinet is not information to which the British has a solid claim. Moreover, the law itself supports the confidential nature of Cabinet procedures, and the Official Secrets Act prohibits the publication of any Cabinet memorandum or the disclosure of information which officials or politicians have come by in the course of their duties.

In this lucid, well-informed, and original study of the Cabinet system, Professor Mackintosh has admirably circumvented the handicaps of traditional explanations and of protective secrecy. When did the cabinet develop? When did it acquire its present status? In the historical sections of the book (culled from printed sources, manuscript collections, and archival material) he attempts to show the development of the constitutional conventions which have given the Cabinet its unique position in the British political system. He is less interested in the organization of the Cabinet than in the question of the power and place of the Cabinet in each period of government.

The functions now exercised by the Cabinet have been acquired over an extended period of time, and the relationship between the Cabinet, Parliament, and Crown has constantly changed. In the early seventeenth century, for instance, there was a need for maintaining harmony between an increasingly independent Parliament and the Crown, and one sees the development of the convention that the King's ministers should include those members of the legislature who were most likely to command its confidence. In the modern period, the complex external relationship of his Cabinet extends also to the Civil Service, the Parties, the Electorate, the Press, and Interest groups.

The latter half of the book discusses the function of the Cabinet in the period since 1914. Much of the archival information for this period is not yet available for scholars, and relevant material has been supplied by letters, diaries, and interviews with ministers and officials who have had the opportunity to observe the Cabinet at work. Permission was given to use this material, providing the source was not acknowledged.

In the modern period, the functions of the Cabinet have changed so markedly that the traditional picture of the Cabinet system as it developed in the nineteenth century is no longer strictly accurate; some might find this section the most rewarding part of the book, and the pages on the expanding role of the Prime Minister are especially well done. Political theory has not kept up with the changing times and has offered little guide to the operation of political institutions. Professor Mackintosh is critical of what he calls "the widespread retreat from the idea that public discussion and decisions made with some participation by those concerned are desirable." Professional and business sections, he says, "may be interested in certain reforms but it is generally accepted that they should come from within the organization." The electorate "does not want to be bothered" and pressure groups "prefer to pursue their interests without anyone asking them to justify their priorities and explain their methods." He blames the political theorists, in part, for this condition, and finds it surprising that academic thinkers have "encouraged the community to overlook this retreat from democracy."

Professor Mackintosh is now teaching at the University College, Ibadan, Nigeria, and it is to be hoped that he will find time to write a companion volume on the transference of the Cabinet system to Nigeria.

In India, the successful transfer of the parliamentary system is one of the proud achievements of the Commonwealth, and recently Lord Morrison was invited there to give a series of lectures under the Dorab Tata Foundation to explain in popular terms the operation of British political institutions. These lectures have now been published under the title, British Parliamentary Democracy.

The result is a personalized explanation of British history and politics by one of the most perspicacious leaders of the Labour Party, who after many years of dedicated public service (as Mr. Herbert Morrison) was recently translated to the House of Lords as a Life Peer. We are taken by the hand, as it were, and permitted to see the operation of local government in the London County Council; the expression of party conflict in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords (Lord Morrison recently told the Lords, "You know, it would not really be a bad thing if your Lordships would have a dust up now and again."); and the operation of the Cabinet system as observed by Lord Morrison as a minister in the Macdonald, Churchill, and Attlee governments. The lectures are reflective, light-hearted, good humored, and pleasantly opinionated.

ROLAND YOUNG

Northwestern University

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

Tocqueville and the Old Regime. BY RICHARD HERR. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1962. Pp. 142. $3.50.)

Professor Herr has written a short but pithy account of the writing and arguments of Tocqueville's Ancien Régime et la Révolution. In the first part of his task, detailing the circumstances and evolution of the book, he has succeeded admirably; in the second part, analysing its import, his achievement is, if stimulating, yet more questionable. According to Herr, the work is not merely an attempt to trace the growing centralisation of French administration or the decline of the French aristocracy. Nor even is it limited to showing how these changes contributed to the outbreak of the Revolution. Its basic theme is the growth of democracy in France. In consequence, it marks a return to the concerns of Democracy in America. This root meaning, claims Herr, "has seldom been hinted at by critics." It is perhaps true that some commentators need this reminder; it is a frequent if gross misinterpretation of this work to see it as simply an essay in eighteenth century French history, just as Democracy in America is sometimes seen as simply a description of American government and society. But the mistake is by no means as universal as Herr supposes; and some commentators, Dicey and Laski for example, have warned us specifically against it. Nor are the generality and continuity of Tocqueville's purposes hidden, for he quoted at length from his earlier book in the introduction to the later.

Nevertheless, Herr argues, there were significant changes in Tocqueville's outlook. His earlier confidence in his own generation's responsibility for deciding between liberty and servitude was in the 1850s submerged under the gloomy certainty that their character and history rendered Frenchmen incapable of freedom. Political recommendations were replaced by the doctrine of historical inevitability, the politician by the historian. In Herr's words, "France could never long be free. This fatalism is the main ingredient of Old Regime that distinguishes it from his earlier works." If this were true, Tocqueville would be open to more serious charges than those Herr brings, inconsistency and ambiguity. The Old Regime would then mark the abandonment of the value he always claimed as supreme, for, rightly or wrongly, he insisted repeatedly that a belief in liberty could never be reconciled with fatalist doctrines. However, Herr does not prove his case. He produces little solid internal evidence for his view, and the external evidence (such as Tocqueville's passionate attack on fatalism in his letters to Gobineau) is given only as proof of inconsistency. Tocqueville never believed that descriptions of social tendencies precluded political choices. They were useful, not in showing what was inevitably to be, but in sketching the environment in which decisions were to be made. Doubtless he was more pessimistic in the 1850s than earlier, for he thought that wrong decisions were being made. But a pessimism springing from a belief in the wrongness of present decisions is not the same as, is indeed incompatible with, fatalism. That the Old Regime was a tract for the times, as Herr realises, is a disproof of his main conclusion.

A number of subsidiary themes can also be criticised. According to Herr, Tocqueville moved from approval of royal centralisation as the means of assuring French territorial integrity (expressed in Democracy in America) to disapproval of it as the cancer of liberty (expressed in the Old Regime). To support the first branch of this argument, Herr uses Tocqueville's claim that a federal system would be harmful in France as a proof of his approval of royal centralisation. This, however, is to misunderstand what Tocqueville was saying. Federalism, or "governmental" decentralisation, was impractical in France, but "administrative" decentralisation was both possible and desirable. In Democracy in America as in Old Regime, administrative centralisation was taken to be the major trend of eighteenth century royal government; and Tocqueville disapproved of this trend in the first as much as in the second.

Again, Herr argues that Tocqueville adopted Montesquieu's notion of republican virtue, the idea that a democracy requires a greater willingness to subordinate private concerns to the public good than any other political form. In fact, Tocqueville implicitly rejected this view by preaching the necessity of accepting the notion of enlightened self-interest in a democracy.

It is clear that this reviewer would quarrel with many of Herr's conclusions. Nonetheless, this is a valuable book. If there is, as the dust-cover claims, a Tocqueville Cult, it has been a cult singularly free of systematic theology. Professor Herr has raised discussion of Tocqueville to a more rigorous and serious level.—JACK LIVELY, University College of Swansea, Wales.

Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946–1969. BY HAROLD SWATZ. (Cambridge, Mass.:

Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. ix, 301. $5.95.)

There was quiet satisfaction among lovers of literature in this country when Robert Frost was invited to read a few stanzas of his verse at the last Presidential inauguration. Russian poets cannot complain that the State takes no interest in their affairs. Most of them, in fact, would no doubt be happier if the State took less interest in poetry. But almost since the beginning of the Soviet regime, men of letters have been leading a politically precarious existence somewhat reminiscent of a crude caricature on the role assigned to them in Plato's Republic. The Communist regime treats the novelist, the dramatist, the poet and the critic as very important people. They are highly respected, very well paid—and closely supervised. Mr. Harold Swayze, a political scientist from the University of Michigan, has now brought out a most thoroughly documented study of political controls of Soviet Russian literature during the crucial years from 1946 to 1959, i.e., from the beginning of the "Zhdanov era," now chiefly remembered for its "anti-cosmopolitan" witch-hunts, through the period of relative freedom following Stalin's death, to the rather recent Third Congress of the Union of Soviet Writers. Mr. Swayze gathers impressive evidence to support the thesis that in the USSR literature is not allowed to be merely a neutral observer of life, that in the USSR, in the words of the versatile Soviet writer Konstantin Simonov, "the first and main criterion for evaluating literature is the contribution it makes to our Communist cause" (p. 18). Similarly, Mr. Swayze's view that without stringent political controls Soviet literature would become ideologically "subversive," and his pessimistic predictions of the political future of Soviet literature, are all convincingly argued.

The non-specialist reader of Mr. Swayze's book is likely to be overwhelmed by the hundreds of unfamiliar names and references to Russian sources, while the specialist is likely to question seriously a number of Mr. Swayze's basic assumptions. In the first place, he attempts to trace the origins of Soviet literary policies to Marx and Engels, and ignores completely their infinitely more important native Russian forefathers—the so-called "revolutionary democrats" of the nineteenth century, men like Chernyshevskii, Dobroliubov and Pisarev (for an excellent discussion of this problem see Rufus W. Mathewson, Jr., The Positive Hero in Russian Literature, New York, Columbia University Press, 1958). Further, one is astonished by the fact that a book devoted to the problem of political controls over Soviet literature makes no mention of Glavlit, the Soviet censorship agency. "Narodnost" (literally, "popularity" or "folksiness") is not synonymous with partiinost ("party-ness," or Communist partisanship), as some Soviet critics and Mr. Swayze would have us believe. Narodnost has serious esthetic connotations, some of which could be traced to Tolstoy's What Is Art; its requirement that the work of art be "popular" and "accessible" to the masses makes experimentation in Soviet literature and the arts all but impossible, since innovators rarely meet with immediate public acclaim. One may have the right partiinost but fail to be accepted by the Soviet pundits for deficiencies in narodnost. Picasso offers perhaps the best recent example: the only work of his known to broad strata of Soviet citizenry is the famous "dove of peace." Recent attempts by Ehrenburg to gain acceptance for those who sin against narodnost have, so far, produced no results.

Mr. Swayze's book also suffers from poor editing. Certain words are italicized on one page and not on another; the transliteration is both unsatisfactory and inconsistent; a number of names—including this reviewer's—is misspelled.

There can be no questioning, however, the book's value as a thorough chronicle of Soviet political polemics clad as literary criticism. Fortunately, some Soviet literary critics occasionally succeed in producing scholarship of a higher order than that which Mr. Swayze had to quote because of the specific nature of his project. —MAURICE FRIEDBERG, Hunter College.

Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets. By MAURICE FRIEDBERG. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962. Pp. xiv, 228. $4.75.)

Much attention has been given in recent years to the Soviet regime's efforts to regiment the thoughts and emotions of its citizens by controls on the literary output of authors. This depressing tale, once told, inevitably provokes tantalizing and difficult questions about the place of the classics of prerevolutionary Russian literature in Soviet society. What is the attitude of Soviet authorities toward this rich and diverse literary heritage? What is the role of a body of works which convey ideas and values that are indifferent and even alien to the claims of Soviet ideology? These are among the questions examined in this balanced and informative study.

The bulk of Mr. Friedberg's study is devoted to an analysis of the methods by which the Soviet regime attempts to make political use of the greater and lesser classics of Russian literature. In the early chapters of the book, Mr. Friedberg describes in detail how the Soviet government has attempted to harness prerevolutionary belles-lettres to the changing political demands of the moment through the selection of authors and titles for publication and the size of individual editions. While Mr. Friedberg believes that "on the whole" the Soviet reader has been "well supplied with a wide variety of the better-known works of prerevolutionary Russian fiction," he also offers evidence which indicates that selective publishing and limited editions have still left a large unsatisfied demand for pre-Soviet literary works.

Especially revealing with respect to the political uses of prerevolutionary fiction is Mr. Friedberg's lengthy analysis of the treatment of nineteenth-century literature in Soviet literary scholarship. In tracing the changing interpretations of Russian nineteenth-century writers, Mr. Friedberg demonstrates how closely Soviet literary criticism—particularly that intended for the broader reading public rather than the more scholarly studies appealing to the smaller group of intellectuals—is tied to the shifting internal and external political needs of the Soviet government. Mr. Friedberg's treatment of this subject is replete with examples, at once depressing and amusing, of reversals in Soviet evaluations of particular authors, re-writing of history, and crude distortion. It is somewhat disappointing that this section of the study, which focuses primarily on changing Soviet assessments of writers' general ideological positions, was not broadened to include illustrations of Soviet exegeses of specific literary works; for such exegeses—particularly in textbooks intended for use in schools and universities—are surely an important aspect of the regime's effort to limit and direct Soviet readers' responses to the content of prerevolutionary literary works.

The two final chapters of the book are the most suggestive with respect to the broader implications of the Soviet government's policy of publishing the classics. After demonstrating convincingly that the preference of the Soviet reading public is for prerevolutionary, as against Soviet, fiction, Mr. Friedberg speculates on the reasons for this and on its implications. Although much that the author says on these points must, owing to the very nature of his subject, remain hypothetical, the evidence that he adduces strongly suggests that the Russian classics continue to exercise a "subversive" influence—in the peculiar sense that imaginative writing may be said to be subversive—with respect to the tenets of official Soviet ideology.

This is a careful and useful study of an intrinsically interesting topic, and it is regrettable that its occasional redundancies and rather uninspired language bear witness to its origins as a dissertation.—HAROLD SWAYZE, University of Michigan.

Groups in Theory and Practice. By PETER LOVEDAY AND IAN CAMPBELL. (Melbourne C-1: F. W. Cheshire, 1962. Pp. 98. 15 shillings.)

With this monograph the Department of Government and Public Administration of the University of Sydney inaugurates the Sydney Studies in Politics. Three other volumes are announced and others are to come. This one contains two essays: one by Peter Loveday entitled "Group Theory and Its Critics" and a second by Ian Campbell entitled "Groups, Parties and Federation." Both are evidence that Australian political science has accomplished its "take-off." As these studies demonstrate, the mixture of British and U. S. skills produces excellent results.

Loveday's essay is a contribution to the fray that has developed about the group theory of politics. He writes incisively, demonstrates a massive knowledge of the literature and, what is better, wends his way through it with intelligence. He shows that the critics have not usually faced the questions raised by Bentley, and that some who criticize Bentley have not understood his position. He also points out that the supporters of the group view have not adequately dealt with these critics. Loveday clarifies some of the ambiguities that Bentley incorporated into his delineation of the political process; ambiguities that have confused his followers and have also provided a basis for his critics. As a result Loveday leaves the group theory in a better intellectual position than it has been heretofore, and the critics in the future will need to be better than they have had to be in the past. Group theory survives as the sound approach to the study of politics, and Bentley's contribution is more adequately assessed.

Mr. Campbell's essay accomplishes two results: 1) it shows how the Australian parties developed into organizations independent of pressure groups, and 2) how governmental structure influences the organization and activities of pressure groups. Both parts of the study trace the relations between parties and the pressure groups of particular interests. Conclusions of a general character are formulated and the study should stimulate other essays applying the hypotheses in different political systems and under different circumstances.—CHARLES B. HAGAN, University of Illinois.

The Nationalist Movement: Indian Political Thought from Ranade to Bhave. By D. MACKENZIE BROWN. (Berkeley: University of California, 1961. $1.50, paper)

This useful volume presents a collection of polemic writing by key Indian political activists. It serves as counterpoint rather than as a sequel to the earlier, more philosophically-oriented group of selections of Indian thought edited by Mr. Brown under the title, The White Umbrella.

To provide a setting for his excerpts, Mr. Brown briefly outlines the Indian nationalist ferment as it moved from an emphasis upon social and religious reform to the all-consuming desire for political independence. Yet so intertwined are these two impulses that all of the Indian leaders presented reflect them. It is precisely this dual nature of Indian nationalism which has fascinated and beguiled foreigners. Western ideas did not merely engender a demand for political freedom; by then they had already penetrated deeply into the conglomerate of Hindu thought. Thus the familiar pattern of a Westernized elite contending with cultural traditionalists so often met in newly independent countries is recast in the Indian context to include Westernized religious leaders and cultural reformers. No wonder, then, that much of Indian political thought deals with the role of religion and morality in politics. No wonder also that such doctrines as satyagraha and sarvodaya have received world-wide notice, often at the expense of other detailed knowledge concerning contemporary India.

Mr. Brown's new book provides a good introduction to a greater understanding of Indian political thought in its own milieu. It is a pity that the author persists in referring to Muslims, incorrectly and unacceptably, as Mohammadans. Nonetheless this volume, like its predecessor, is certain to be widely used as collateral reading in introductory area courses and should be of interest to non-specialists as well.—IRENE TINKER, Howard University, Washington, D. C.

Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs. By PERCY W. BIDWELL. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962. Pp. vi, 215. $5.00.)

Those who cultivate the sacred soil of the policy sciences frequently see their interest in foreign affairs reflected in the eyes of their students. They may also associate the concerns of departmental majors in international problems with those of students en masse. Hence it is both instructive and compelling to be reminded of the casual role education in foreign affairs plays in most colleges, and the ease with which the average student can run the academic hurdles without being exposed to a serious course in international problems.

For three years under a grant from Carnegie Corporation, Percy W. Bidwell studied the state of undergraduate education in foreign affairs in American colleges. The results of his study hardly call for any great rejoicing. In fact, when a representative group of college seniors can barely answer half of the questions (55%) of a carefully constructed test on foreign affairs, it is a cause for alarm if not a motion toward the panic button. Moreover, excluding the better liberal arts schools and the high-grade tax-supported institutions, it is generally conceded that the mood of college students toward foreign affairs is one of apathy or, at best, sufferance.

The reasons behind the lack of student interest are multiple—inadequate background, stemming from the home or the high school, or both; the orientation of the college campus along other lines; and the curriculum itself. The specialized courses in international relations attract few students, and, more grievous still, virtually all of the survey courses in Economics, American Government, American History and Social Science Survey give foreign affairs only a lick and a pat. In addition language teachers generally do not regard the teaching of cultural empathy as a basic part of the course. Literature which should undergird international understanding seldom serves as a gateway to foreign cultures. Knowledge and understanding of international relations should be an integral part of a college education. To this end, the author recommends: (1) expanding the knowledge base of international affairs in the survey courses and lower division courses; (2) opening broad, conceptual courses in foreign affairs to lower division students; (3) staffing R. O. T. C. courses dealing with American history and international relations with civilian teachers appointed by academic authorities; (4) improving instruction in the introductory courses and enlarging the scope of language and literature courses; (5) supplementing the academic program with significant extracurricular activities; and (6) appointing a campus coordinator for studies and activities in international affairs. Above all, however, is the need to create a college atmosphere which stimulates and encourages interest in foreign affairs.

Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs is not only a good report, it is the only comprehensive study of this subject which has been made so far. A copy of this book should be on the shelves of every political scientist interested in pedagogy or concerned about the American future. For unless we now develop widespread understanding and intelligent dialogue on problems in foreign affairs, it may not matter what we teach later on.—JAMES A. BURKHART, Stephens College.

Local Political Surveys. By E. E. SCHATT-SCHNEIDER AND VICTOR JONES. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1962. Pp. v, 229, appendix. $3.75.)

Local Political Surveys is intended "for use by students, teachers, businessmen, civic groups, politicians, labor leaders, [and] public officials" (p. 1). Its main objective is to inform a reader about "the great wealth of raw materials" that are available in seeking a better understanding of his own community.

The volume is essentially a limited-focus sequel to the author's earlier Guide to the Study of Public Affairs (1952 with Stephen Bailey). The illustration-packed pages of the paper-bound volume present tables, maps, charts, graphs, and sample pages from widely distributed sources, e.g., Bureau of the Census publications, Democratic (and Republican) party manuals, The Municipal Yearbook. The catholicity of sources and the types of data presented succeed in showing the mines of raw materials that aid in understanding the economic, social, demographic, and geographic characteristics underlying governmental structure, functions, and political behavior in the local community. The reader is assisted in mining the resources through textual discussions and bold-faced hand-written comments in the margins and/or across the illustrative materials.

Two additional descriptive points bear mention. The local community focus may be on a city, county, metropolitan area, or congressional district in a metropolitan area. Survey denotes an approach broader than, although not excluding, sample surveys; it aims at documenting and interpreting the community "as an economic enterprise and social structure." What John Gaus has called "the study of political ecology" aptly summarizes the point of view which guided the selection of materials. Furthermore, a local political survey extends to local manifestations of state and national politics which, based on the materials presented, appear to influence local decisions largely through the structure and activities of the political parties.

The volume will not be very valuable to the reasonably sophisticated political researcher; the authors acknowledge it is for the "non-specialist." But because the volume is most likely to be used by novice and non-professional researchers a caveat mentioned by the authors needs double emphasis. Any amount of "raw material" readily available and easily marshalled, will be limited and perhaps meaningless or misleading unless some prior research requirements are met, e.g., precise operational statement of a significant problem, rigorous methodology, and careful interpretation of findings. For gold-rush miners with a political bent who consult the many out-croppings of ore presented in Local Political Surveys, a sign emblazoned "Miner Beware!" needs to be posted lest the diggers mistake a thin vein for the mother lode.—DEIL S. WRIGHT, State University of Iowa.

Studies on the Civilization of Islam. By SIR HAMILTON A. R. GIBB. (Boston: Beacon Press, 1962. Pp. iii, 344. $7.50.)

Scholars in many fields will appreciate this volume, for it collects articles by this eminent author written over a span of nearly 40 years. The first of three parts focuses upon the expansion of mediaeval Islam. Here we find not only the author's fundamental interpretation of the growth of the Islamic empire, but also more specialized articles on Arab-Byzantine relations, Saladin's army, and Arabic historiography. Part two collects Gibb's views on various theories of the caliphate, on Arabic literature, and his article on "The Structure of Religious Thought in Islam." The final section, "Contemporary Intellectual Currents," includes his work on the impact of western culture and machine civilization upon Moslem literature and institutions. The writer says of his four literary studies that "... written about 1930 they reflect something of the optimism and assurance of that period"; while the "Reaction against Western Culture in the Near East," published some 20 years later, demonstrates "the rapidity of changing moods and phases in modern Arab society."

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON #### POLITICAL THEORY

CECELIA M. KENYON

Smith College

Accame, Giano. Contradictions d'un romantisme de droite (fin). Defense de l'Occident. July-August, 1962.

Akzin, Benjamin. Politische Probleme polyethnischer Gemeinwesen. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. June, 1962.

Alquié, F. Les philosophes du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle devant l'homme. XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. No. 54-55, 1962.

Arfé, Gaetano. La Rivoluzione Liberale di Piero Gobetti. Revista Storica Italiana. II/LXXIV/1962.

Arfé, Gaetano, Thomas, Norman, et. al.

Stalinism and Destalinisation. The Review. 2-3/IV/1962.

Bachrach, Peter. Elite Consensus and Democracy. Journal of Politics. August, 1962.

Bahne, S. "Die Deutsche Ideologie" von Marx und Engels. International Review of Social History. 1/VII/1962.

Barnes, Thomas G. Due Process and Slow Process in the Late Elizabethan-Early Stuart Star Chamber. American Journal of Legal History. July, 1962.

Belaval, Y. Les philosophes du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle devant la nature. XVIIe Siècle Nos. 54-55, 1962.

Besson, Waldemar. Regierung und Opposition in der Deutschen Politik. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. September, 1962.

Burns, J. H., and Cobban, A. Rousseau's Du Contrat Social: Some Problems of Translation. Political Studies. June, 1962.

Camilleri, Andrea. Una storia del pensiero cattolico sullo Stato. Civitas. April-May, 1962.

Chroust, Anton-Hermann. The Lawyers of New Jersey and the Stamp Act. American Journal of Legal History. July, 1962.

Chroust, Anton-Herman. Plato's Detractors in Antiquity. Review of Metaphysics. September, 1962.

Collotti, E. Il "secondo libro" di Hitler. Studi Storici. 1/iii/1962.

Colwell, James L. The Populist Image of Vernon Louis Parrington. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1962.

Cowie, H. T. Liberalism's New Deal. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Dahrendorf, Ralf. Ausbildung einer Elite. Der Monat. July, 1962.

Davis, David Brion. The Emergence of Immediatism in British and American Anti-slavery Thought. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. September, 1962.

Della Peruta, F. Un capitolo di storia del socialismo risorgimentale: Proudhon e Ferrari. Studi Storici. 2/iii/1962.

Ebeling, Hermann. Lassalle oder Die List der Unvernunft. Der Monat. August, 1962.

Echeverria, Rafael. El valor político del consentimiento popular. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.

Engel, S. Morris. Language and the Structure of Locke's "Essay." Indian Journal of Philosophy. December, 1961.

Epstein, Klaus. Essay-Review of Richard W. Sterling's Ethics in a World of Power: The Political Ideas of Friedrich Meinecke. History and Theory. 1/II/1962.

Fizer, John. La erupción ideológica de la USSR. Foro Internacional. April-June, 1962.

Fougeyrollas, Pierre. L'azione politica e il futuro delle società contemporanee. Civitas. January-February, 1962.

Fourier, Charles. Several Articles in Revue internationale Philosophie, No. 2, Vol. 60 (1962), are devoted to Fourier.

Frisch, Alfred. Le mythe libéral et la réalité allemande. Documents. March-April, 1962.

Gallo, Jorge Iván Hubner. El conservatismo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1962.

de Gandia, Enrique. As idéias políticas de Bernado O'Higgins. Revista de História. No. 49, Vol. XXIV, 1962.

Gerstenmaier, Eugen; Zehrer, Hans; Dürren-matt, Peter. Was heisst heute konservativ? Der Monat. July, 1962.

Gini, Corrado. Las manías del mundo contemporáneo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.

Giorgetti, G. Su alcuni "falsi problemi" nell'interpretazione di Marx. Studi Storici. 1/iii/1962.

Goerdts, Wilhelm. Widerspruch und Welt-politik: Über eine Tendenz der Sowjetdialektik Heute. Ost. Europa. July, 1962.

Goguel, François. Réflexions sur le régime présidentiel. Revue Française de Science Politique. June, 1962.

Gossman, Norbert J. Republicanism in Nineteenth Century England. International Review of Social History. 1/VII/1962.

Guardia, Sol Ferrer. Las concepciones político-sociales de F. Ferrer Guardia. Cuadernos Americanos. May-June, 1962.

Guillaume, Françoise. La doctrine sociétiqué du sous-développement. Politique Étrangère. 4/27/1962.

van den Haag, Ernest. Quia Ineptum. Ethics. July, 1962.

Heróles, Jesús Reyes. Rousseau y el liberalismo mexicano. Cuadernos Americanos. September-October, 1962.

Huthmacher, J. Joseph. Urban Liberalism and the Age of Reform. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. September, 1962.

Iribarne, Manuel Fraga. Carl Schmidt: el hombre y la obra. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.

Jones, William J. Due Process and Slow Press in the Elizabethan Chancery. American Journal of Legal History. April, 1962.

Kemp, Tom. The Epigones of Lenin and the Theory of Imperialism. The Review 2-3/IV/1962.

Kendall, Walter. Stalinist Socialism—Myth of the XXth Century. The Review. 2-3/IV/1962.

Kerr, Malcolm. The Emergence of a Socialist Ideology in Egypt. Middle East. Spring, 1962.

Lavergne, Bernard. La civilisation chrétienne, les sociétés occidentales et l'ordre communiste, heresie inconsciente du christianisme. L'année Politique et Économique. May, 1962.

Lehouck, Emile. Psychologie et morale dans l'oeuvre de Charles Fourier (1772-1837). Revue des Sciences Humaines. July-September, 1962.

Leuschner, Joachim. Der Nationalsozialismus, I. Neue Politische Literatur. October, 1961.

Lloyd, A. C. Natural Justice. The Philosophical Quarterly. July, 1962.

Maier, Hans. Zur Lage der Politischen Wissenschaft in Deutschland. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. July, 1962.

Mayo, Henry B. How Can We Justify Democracy? American Political Science Review. September, 1962.

Miranda, Torcuato Fernandez. Existencia y justificación, como conceptos metódicos de la ciencia política. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1962.

Mookerjee, S. Political Wisdom of Ancient India. Journal of the Bihar Research Society. January-December, 1959.

Moulin, Leo. La tecnocracia, tentación y espantajo del mundo moderno. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1962.

Oakley, Francis. On the Road from Constance to 1688: The Political Thought of John Major and George Buchanan. Journal of British Studies. May, 1962.

Olea, Victor Flores. La crisis del stalinismo. Cuadernos Americanos. May-June, 1962.

Paloczi-Horvath, George. The Theoretical and Legal Origins of "Stalinist Terrorism." The Review. 2-3/IV/1962.

Pampaloni, Guido. Fermenti di riforme democratiche nella Firenze medicea del Quattrocento. Archivio Storico Italiano. CXIX, 429, 1961.

Pauker, Guy. Political Doctrines and Practical Politics in Southeast Asia. Pacific Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Perticone, Giacomo. I partiti di massa fra la strategia e la tattica. Civitas. January-February, 1962.

Petrovic, Gajo. El concepto del hombre en Marx. Cuadernos Americanos. July-August, 1962.

Quaroni, Pietro. Cultura occidentale ed etica moderna. Civitas. March, 1962.

Radabaugh, John. Spencer Roane and the Genesis of Virginia Judicial Review. American Journal of Legal History. January, 1962.

Riedel, Manfred. Tradition und Revolution in Hegels "Philosophie des Rechts." Zeitschrift für Philosophische Forschung. April-June, 1962.

Roberts, Warren, Jr. Behavioral Factors in Bentham's Conception of Political Change. Political Studies, June, 1962.

Rogger, Hans. Nationalism and the State: a Russian Dilemma. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 3/IV/1962.

Rottcher, Feodor. Theorie und Praxis in den Frühschriften von Karl Marx. Archiv für Philosophie. 3-4/11/1962.

Sanakoyev, Sh. Foreign Policy and the Battle of Ideas. International Affairs. August, 1962.

Saurin de la Iglesia, Maria Rosa. Momentos y problemas del liberalismo ochocentista alemán. Hispania. No. LXXV, Vol. XXII, 1962.

Saville, Max. Nationalism and Other Loyalties in the American Revolution. American Historical Review. July, 1962.

Schmitt, Carl. El orden del mundo despues de la segunda guerra mundial. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1962.

Shneidman, J. Lee. Political Theory and Reality in Thirteenth Century Aragon. Hispania. No. LXXXVI, Vol. XXII, 1962.

Sigmund, Paul, Jr. Cusannus' Concordantia: A Reinterpretation. Political Studies. June, 1962.

Sontheimer, Kurt. Nationalismus und Konservative Revolution. Der Monat. September, 1962.

Steffani, Winfried. Gewaltenteilung im Demokratisch-Pluralistischen Rechtsstaat. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. September, 1962.

Stoetzer, Otto Carlos. La influencia del pensamiento político europeo en la América española: el escolasticismo y el período de la ilustración, 1789-1815. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1962.

Stoppino, Mario. Il liberalismo politico. Il Federalista. March, 1961.

Sulzbach, Walter. Zur Definition und Psychologie von "Nation" und Nationalbewusstsein. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. June, 1962.

Toesca, Pietro Maria. Cristianesimo e politica nella storia. Civitas. April-May, 1962.

Toesca, Pietro Maria. L'impegno politico del cattolico tra interiorità e socialità. Civitas. June, 1962.

Toumanov, V. A. "Le Welfare State" est-il un mythe ou une réalité? Journal of World History. 1/VII/1962.

Utz, A. F. Gerechtigkeit, Recht und Moral. Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie. 1/9/1962.

Van Bever, P. J. J. Rousseau. Dialog. Summer, 1962.

Van Dyke, Vernon. Values and Interests. American Political Science Review. September, 1962.

Vejarano, Juan Javier Trias. La autonomía local y las asociaciones en el pensamiento de Tocqueville. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1962.

Vernant, Jacques. Une interprétation rationnelle du monde contemporain. Politique Etrangere. 3/27/1962.

Walcott, Robert. The Idea of Party in the Writing of Later Stuart History. The Journal of British Studies. May, 1962.

Walsh, W. H. Plato and the Philosophy of History: History and Theory in the Republic. History and Theory. 1/ii/1962.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON
METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

JULIAN FELDMAN

University of California, Berkeley

Philosophy of Social Science

Burt, C. Francis Galton and his contributions to psychology. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1962, 15, 1, May.

Helm, J. The ecological approach in anthropology. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 630, May.

Horowitz, I. L., The sociological imagination of C. Wright Mills: in memoriam. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 105, July.

Schneider, L. The role of the category of ignorance in sociological theory: an exploratory statement. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 492, August.

Research Methods

Ake, J. N. A rapid machine procedure for determining scalability of any number of questions. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 121, Spring.

Axelrod, M., Matthews, D. R. and Prothro, J. W. Recruitment for survey research on race problems in the South. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 254, Summer.

Birnbaum, A. On the foundations of statistical inference. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 269, June.

Blalock, H. M., Jr., Spuriousness versus intervening variables: the problem of temporal sequences. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 330, May.

Brunner, E. deS. Social research dollars and sense. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 97, Spring.

Carter, R. E., Jr. and Troidahl, V. C. Use of a recall criterion in measuring the educational television audience. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 114, Spring.

Chapanis, A. An exact multinomial one-sample test of significance. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 306, July.

Coale, A. J. and Stephan, F. F. The case of the Indians and the teen-age widows. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 338, June.

Cramer, E. M. A comparison of three methods of fitting the normal ogive. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 183, June.

Cureton, E. E. A note on simultaneous equations and matrix inversion. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1962, 15, 51, May.

Dhrymes, P. J. On devising unbiased estimators for the parameters of the Cobb-Douglas production function. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 297, April.

Fan, C. T., Muller, M. E. and Rezucha, I. Development of sampling plans by using sequential (item by item) selection techniques and digital computers. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 387, June.

Fields, R. I., Kramer, C. Y. and Clunies-Ross, C. W. Joint estimation of the parameters of two normal populations. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 446, June.

Gibson, W. A. On the least-squares orthogonalization of an oblique transformation. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 193, June.

Goldberger, A. S. Best linear unbiased prediction in the generalized linear regression model. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 369, June.

Goodman, L. A. Statistical methods for analyzing processes of change. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 57, July.

Grant, D. A. Testing the null hypothesis and the strategy and tactics of investigating theoretical models. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 54, January.

Hooper, J. W. Partial trace correlations. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 324, April.

Horst, P. Matrix reduction and approximation to principal axes. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 169, June.

Jones, C. O. A suggested scheme for classifying congressional campaigns. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 126, Spring.

Kaiser, H. F. Scaling a simplex. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 155, June.

Kaiser, H. F. and Dickman, K. Sample and population score matrices and sample correlation matrices from an arbitrary population correlation matrix. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 179, June.

Kugel, P. Computers and political strategy. Computers and Automation, 1962, 11, 17, May.

Li, C. H. A sequential method for screening experimental variables. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 455, June.

McDonald, R. P. A note on the derivation of the general latent class model. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 203, June.

Magid, F. N., Fotion, N. G. and Gold, D. A mail-questionnaire adjunct to the interview. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 111, Spring.

Marks, E. S. The fetish of sample size. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 92, Spring.

Michael, W. B., Jones, R. A., Gaddis, L. W. and Kaiser, H. F. Abacs for determination of a correlation coefficient corrected for restriction of range. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 197, June.

Miller, C. R., Sabagh, G. and Dingman, H. F. Latent class analysis and differential mortality. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 430, June.

Osborne, M. F. M. Periodic structure in the Brownian motion of stock prices. Operations Research, 1962, 10, 345, May-June.

Perry, P. Gallup poll election survey experience, 1950-1960. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 272, Summer.

Polk, K. A note on asymmetric causal models. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 539, August.

Rider, P. R. Expected values and standard deviations of the reciprocal of a variable from a decapitated negative binominal distribution. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 439, June.

Rungiman, W. G. A method for cross-national comparison of political consensus. British Journal of Sociology, 1962, 13, 151, June.

Ryan, T. A. The experiment as the unit for computing ratio of error. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 301, July.

Sandon, F. An alternative table for determining means of sections from a normal distribution. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1962, 15, 71, May.

Shepard, R. N. The analysis of proximities: multidimensional scaling with an unknown distance function. I. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 125, June.

Stekler, H. O. A simulation of the forecasting performance of the diffusion index. Journal of Business, 1962, 35, 196, April.

Suchman, E. A. An analysis of "bias" in survey research. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 102, Spring.

Wilson, W. A note on the inconsistency inherent in the necessity to perform multiple comparisons. Psychological Bulletin, 1962, 59, 296, July.

Wynar, B. Current Russian bibliographies in the field of economics. Western Business Review, 1962, 6, 41, May.

Zellner, A. An efficient method of estimating seemingly unrelated regressions and tests for aggregation bias. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1962, 57, 348, June.

Motivation and Personality

Becker, J., Spielberger, C. D. and Parker, J. B. On the relationship between manic-depressive psychosis and inner-directed character. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 149, June.

Bennis, W. G. and Peabody, D. The conceptualization of two personality orientations and sociometric choice. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 203, June.

Davidson, H. H., Riessman, F. and Meyers, E. Personality characteristics attributed to the worker. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 155, June.

Gibson, H. B. The lie scale of the Maudsley personality inventory. Acta Psychologica, 1962, 20, 18.

Jackson, E. F. Status consistency and symptoms of stress. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 469, August.

Lefton, M., Angrist, S., Dimitz, S. and Pasa-manick, B. Social class, expectations, and performance of mental patients. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 79, July.

McClelland, D. C. Business drive and national achievement. Harvard Business Review, 1962, 40, 99, July-August.

Rosenbaum, M. E., Horne, W. C. and Chalmers, D. K. Level of self-esteem and the learning of imitation and nonimitation. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 147, June.

Rosenberg, M. Self-esteem and concern with public affairs. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 201, Summer.

Rychlak, J. F. and Eacker, J. N. The effects of anxiety, delay, and reinforcement on generalized expectancies. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 123, June.

Sampson, H., Messinger, S. L. and Towne, R. D. Family processes and becoming a mental patient. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 88, July.

Sheppard, J. L. A theory of hypothesis conflict in anxiety. Australian Journal of Psychology, 1961, 13, 234, December.

Weitman, M. More than one kind of authoritarian. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 193, June.

Zigler, E. and Kanzer, P. The effectiveness of two classes of verbal reinforcers on the performance of middle- and lower-class children. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 157, June.

Opinions and Attitudes

Adams, J. S. and Rosenbaum, W. B. The relationship of worker productivity to cognitive dissonance about wage inequities. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 161, June.

Aronson, E. and Golden, B. W. The effect of relevant and irrelevant aspects of communicator credibility on opinion change. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 135, June.

Baur, E. J. Opinion change in a public controversy. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 212, Summer.

- Byrne, D. Response to attitude similarity-dis-similarity as a function of affiliation need. Journal of Personality, 1962, 30, 164, June.
- Campbell, E. Q. Scale and intensity analysis in the study of attitude change. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 227, Summer.
- Carter, R. F. Stereotyping as a process. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 77, Spring.
- Converse, P. E. and Dupeux, G. Politicization of the electorate in France and the United States. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 1, Spring.
- Dotson, L. An empirical study of attitude-component theory. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 64, Spring.
- Feather, N. T. Cigarette smoking and lung cancer: a study of cognitive dissonance. Australian Journal of Psychology, 1962, 14, 55, April.
- Johnson, B. Ascetic Protestantism and political preference. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 35, Spring.
- McGuire, W. J. and Papageorgis, D. Effectiveness of forewarning in developing resistance to persuasion. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 24, Spring.
- Smith, R. J. and Ramsey, C. E. Attitudes of Japanese high school seniors toward the military. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 249, Summer.
- Weinberger, M. Do people know how susceptible they are to television advertising? Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 262, Summer.
- Cognitive Processes and Individual Decision Making
- Ackoff, R. L. Some unsolved problems in problem solving. Operational Research Quarterly, 1962, 13, 1, March.
- Aronoff, J. Freud's conception of the origin of curiosity. Journal of Psychology, 1962, 54, 39, July.
- Asch, S. E. and Ebenholtz, S. M. The process of free recall: evidence for non-associative factors in acquisition and retention. Journal of Psychology, 1962, 54, 3, July.
- Blackman, S. Some factors affecting the perception of events as chance determined. Journal of Psychology, 1962, 54, 197, July.
- Bower, G. H. An association model for response and training variables in paired-associate learning. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 34, January.
- Deese, J. On the structure of associative meaning. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 161, May.
- Deutsch, M. and Krauss, R. M. Studies of interpersonal bargaining. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 52, March.
- Doob, L. W. The effect upon recall of syntactical construction in German. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 133, June.
- Duffy, N. F. and Taylor, P. M. The implementation of a decision. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 7, 110, June.
- Edwards, W. Utility, subjective probability, their interaction, and variance preferences. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 42, March.
- Edwards, W. D. Dynamic decision theory and probabilistic information processing. Human Factors, 1962, 4, 59, April.
- Fox, D. J. and Lorge, I. The relative quality of decisions written by individuals and by groups as the available time for problem solving is increased. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 227, June.
- Froman, L. A. Jr. and Skipper, J. K., Jr. Factors related to misperceiving party stands on issues. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 265, Summer.
- Good, I. J. How rational should a manager be? Management Science, 1962, 8, 383, July.
- Harsanyi, J. C. Bargaining in ignorance of the opponent's utility function. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 29, March.
- Homer, E. D. A generalized model for analyzing management information systems. Management Science, 1962, 8, 500, July.
- Hood, W. R. and Sherif, M. Verbal report and judgment of an unstructured stimulus. Journal of Psychology, 1962, 54, 121, July.
- Ikle, F. C. and Leites, N. Political negotiation as a process of modifying utilities. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 19, March.
- Johnson, R. C. Reanalysis of "meaningfulness and verbal learning," Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 233, May.
- Kendler, H. H. and Kendler, T. S. Vertical and horizontal processes in problem solving. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 1, January.
- Kilbridge, M. A model for industrial learning costs. Management Science, 1962, 8, 516, July.
- Kuhn, H. W. Game theory and models of negotiation. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 1, March.
- Lewis, L. S. and Lopreato, J. A rationality, ignorance, and perceived danger in medical practices. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 508, August.
- Little, K. B., Brackbill, Y. and Kassel, S. H. A test of a general utility theory model for probability learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 404, April.
- Luce, R. D. An observable property equivalent to a choice model for discrimination experiments. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 163, June.
- Maier, N. R. F. and Solem, A. R. Improving solutions by turning choice situations into problems. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 151, Summer.
- Massell, B. F. Investment, innovation, and growth. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 239, April.
- Mednick, S. A. The associative basis of the creative process. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 220, May.

Moglewer, S. A game theory model for agricultural crop selection. Econometrica, 1962, 30, 253, April.

Pruitt, D. G. An analysis of responsiveness between nations. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 5, March.

Pruitt, D. G. Pattern and level of risk in gambling decisions. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 187, May.

Pubols, B. H., Jr. An application of Levine's model for hypothesis behavior to serial reversal learning. Psychological Review, 1962, 69, 241, May.

Rapier, J. L. Measured intelligence and the ability to learn. Acta Psychologica, 1962, 20, 1.

Shepard, H. R. and Blake, R. R. Changing behavior through cognitive change. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 88, Summer.

Siegel, S. and Andrews, J. M. Magnitude of reinforcement and choice behavior in children. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 337, April.

Uhr, L., Vossler, C. and Uleman, J. Pattern recognition over distortions, by human subjects and a computer simulation of a model for human form perception. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 227, March.

Waugh, N. C. and Smith, J. E. K. A stochastic model for free recall. Psychometrika, 1962, 27, 141, June.

Williamson, R. C. Social class determinants of perception and adjustment in an adolescent and adult sample: El Salvador. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 11, June.

Young, R. K. Tests of three hypotheses about the effective stimulus in serial learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1962, 63, 307, March.

Zellner, A. War and peace: a fantasy in game theory? Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 39, March.

Interpersonal Influence

Miner, J. B. Conformity among university professors and business executives. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 7, 96, June.

Mouton, J. S. and Blake, R. R. The influence of competitively vested interests on judgments. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 149, June.

Schein, E. H. and Ott, J. S. The legitimacy of organizational influence. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 67, 682, May.

Group Behavior

Bach, R. E., Jr., Dolansky, L. and Stubbs, H. L. Some recent Contributions to the Lancaster theory of combat. Operations Research, 1962, 10, 314, May-June.

Coleman, J. Comment on Harrison White,

"Chance models of systems of casual groups." Sociometry, 1962, 25, 172, June.

Dinoff, M., Kew, J. K., Rickard, H. C. and Timmons, E. O. The stability of group verbal behavior. Psychological Record, 1962, 12, 323, July.

Taietz, P. Conflicting group norms and the "third" person in the interview. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 97, July.

Turk, H. and Lefcowitz, M. J. Towards a theory of representation between groups. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 337, May.

Ulrich, R. E. Conversation control. Psychological Record, 1962, 12, 327, July.

White, H. Chance models of systems of casual groups. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 153, June.

Organizational Behavior

Alger, C. F. The external bureaucracy in United States foreign affairs. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 7, 50, June.

Allen, P. J. Growth of strata in early organizational development. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 34, July.

Balderston, F. E. Models of multiple branch organization. California Management Review, 1962, 4, 40, Spring.

Chapple, E. D. Quantitative analysis of complex organizational systems. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 67, Summer.

Cohen, A. M., Bennis, W. G. and Wolkon, G. H. The effects of changes in communication networks on the behaviors of problem-solving groups. Sociometry, 1962, 25, 177, June.

Cumming, E. and J. The organization of the large mental hospital. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 97, Summer.

Fleishman, E. A. and Peters, D. R. Interpersonal values, leadership attitudes, and managerial "success." Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 127, Summer.

Golembiewski, R. T. Organization as a moral problem. Public Administration Review, 1962, 22, 51, Spring.

Grusky, O. Authoritarianism and effective indoctrination: a case study. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 7, 79, June.

Guest, R. H. Managerial succession in complex organizations. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 47, July.

Hilton, T. L. and Dill, W. R. Salary growth as a criterion of career progress. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 153, June.

Huse, E. F. and Taylor, E. K. Reliability of absence measures. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1962, 46, 159, June.

Koontz, H. Making sense of management theory. Harvard Business Review, 1962, 40, 24, July-August.

McNulty, J. E. Organizational change in growing enterprises. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 7, 1, June.

Mann, F. C. and Williams, L. K. Some effects of the changing work environment in the office. Journal of Social Issues, 1962, 18, 90, July.

Meltzer, L. and Salter, J. Organizational structure and the performance and job satisfaction of physiologists. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 351, June.

Porter, A. Diagnostics of administration: Hawthornitis. Public Administration Review, 1962, 22, 82, Spring.

Porter, E. H. The parable of the spindle. Harvard Business Review, 1962, 40, 58, May-June.

Rabe, W. F. Managerial power. California Management Review, 1962, 4, 31, Spring.

Sayles, L. The change process in organizations. Human Organization, 1962, 21, 62, Summer.

Simon, H. A. New developments in the theory of the firm. American Economic Review, 1962, 52, 1, May.

Simpson, R. L. and Gulley, W. H. Goals, environmental pressures, and organizational characteristics. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 344, June.

Vroom, V. H. Ego-involvement, job satisfaction, and job performance. Personnel Psychology, 1962, 15, 159, Summer.

Wall, R. G., and Hawkins, H. Requisites of effective leadership. Personnel, 1962, 39, 21, May-June.

Yoder, D. Management theories as managers see them. Personnel, 1962, 39, 25, July-August.

Zald, M. N. Power balance and staff conflict in correctional institutions. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1962, 7, 22, June.

Voting Behavior

Levin, M. B. and Eden, M. Political strategy for the alienated voter. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 47, Spring.

Patterson, S. C. Dimensions of voting behavior in a one-party state legislature. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 185, Summer.

Remmers, H. H. Social distance in voting behavior in two presidential elections. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 280, Summer.

Culture and Institutions

Babchuk, N. and Bates, A. P. Professor or producer: the two faces of academic man. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 341, May.

Bharucha-Reid, R. P. Appearance and reality in culture. Journal of Social Psychology, 1962, 57, 169, June.

Blanchard, W. H. National myth, national character, and national policy: a psychological study of the U-2 incident. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 1962, 6, 143, June.

Dohrenwend, B. P. Some aspects of the appraisal of abnormal behavior by leaders in an urban area. American Psychologist, 1962, 17, 190, April.

Doob, L. W. South Tyrol: an introduction to the psychological syndrome of nationalism. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 172, Summer.

Downs, A. The public interest: its meaning in a democracy. Social Research, 1962, 29, 1, Spring.

Granick, D. On patterns of technological choice in Soviet industry. American Economic Review, 1962, 52, 149, May.

Grether, E. T. Competition as a dynamic process. California Management Review, 1962, 4, 72, Summer.

Kennedy, R. E., Jr. The Protestant ethic and the Parsis. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 11, July.

Kilby, P. Organization and productivity in backward economies. Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1962, 76, 303, May.

Powell, E. H. The evolution of the American city and the emergence of anomie. British Journal of Sociology, 1962, 13, 156, June.

Putney, S. and Putney, G. J. Radical innovation and prestige. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 548, August.

Robins, L. N., Gyman, H. and O'Neal, P. The interaction of social class and deviant behavior. American Sociological Review, 1962, 27, 480, August.

Schmookler, J. and Brownlee, O. Determinants of inventive activity. American Economic Review, 1962, 52, 165, May.

Sebald, H. Studying national character through comparative content analysis. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 318, May.

Shuval, J. T. Emerging patterns of ethnic strain in Israel. Social Forces, 1962, 40, 323, May.

Stokes, D. E. and Iversen, G. R. On the existence of forces restoring party competition. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1962, 26, 159, Summer.

Vallier, I. Church, society, and labor resources: an intradenominational comparison. American Journal of Sociology, 1962, 68, 21, July.

Wolfe, J. B. and Horn, P. Racial friction in the deep south. Journal of Psychology, 1962, 54, 139, July.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Urban Social Structure. By JAMES M. BESHES. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, Inc., 1962. Pp. 207, $5.50.)

This study seeks to explore whether or not there is an urban social structure and an overall network of social relationships among urban inhabitants. The author's theoretical orientation comes from the works of Max Weber, Radcliffe-Brown, Lewin and Asch. Beshers' main points emphasize: (1) that extension of present social theory is needed to cope with urban facts; (2) that social classes, ethnic groups, and racial groups are integral parts of American urban social structure that cannot be meaningfully treated in isolation to each other; (3) that historical research, census tract research, survey research, and observational research must be integrated into an effective analysis of urban social structure; and (4) that rigorous development of theory, specifically mathematical formulation, can clarify issues presently confused.

Professor Beshers limits his analysis to the correlation of residential proximity and marriage, social class/caste structures and occupational status using census tract data, official registrations of residence on marriage licences to corroborate sociological hypothesis. The most interesting aspect of the study is the construction of a theoretical model for urban social structure which stresses the relationship among marriage, symbols and power in the community. An appendix of mathematical aspects is added at the end of the study and the probability formulas serve as illustrations for testing.

The book should be of interest especially to those interested in community power structure as it provides a good summary of recent sociological works in this area. The author concludes that power structure may tend to be "authoritarian" and under other conditions may be "democratic" or even "anarchistic." The actual power structure prevailing in a particular community, the author feels, must be regarded as a result of such conditions, "not as a distinctive and permanent feature of the community."—MAURICE E. O'DONNELL, University of Maryland.

The Metropolitan Problem and American Ideas. By LUTHER HALSEY GULICK. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1962. Pp. 167.)

Anything Luther Gulick writes about public administration is worth reading. From the time he left Oberlin in 1915 with a master's degree and spent the next two years as a student in the Training School for Public Service of the New York Bureau of Municipal Research, he has been teaching, studying, practicing the art—or science—of public administration (if one wants to get into the argument) that he—as much as anyone—started. He has consistently striven to understand how government executives get their work done and how they might do it more efficiently. Always he has tried to frame observation in the light of theory.

Here, in five lectures delivered at the University of Michigan he sees the metropolitan problem within the framework of American theory. As usual, he pricks some conventional solutions to the problem. Such answers have failed, he says. "In every big city the slums are spreading faster than they are being cleared up. Circulation of people and goods is becoming less and less satisfactory and more and more costly. Even the delightful expansion of suburban life is beginning to run into difficulties as the suburbs 'fill in'; and the service and control jobs are so big that the local governmental units involved are unequal to the tasks they face."

Two of the chief elements of the traditional approach have failed to cope with metropolitanism. One is the "market mechanism," or private enterprise checked, when necessary, by government. The other is "local municipal action."

The first change needed in a new theory of metropolitan government, Dr. Gulick says, is to discard the notion that the problem is the city. "We are not dealing with a 'city' at all! We are dealing with people, industries, shops, offices, community institutions, recreations, methods of transport and easy communication, and a maze of urban services, both public and private, which focus on many centers. . . ." The next change is to decide that all the historic elements of government, federal, state, and local, must be involved in the solution of the metropolitan problem, and no one government can solve it alone. Then new assignments can be made to the various governments.

Dr. Gulick develops his analysis and solution in more detail than can or should be revealed in a review. Each topic gets bold, inventive treatment. As one example, he says it is too late for city governments to take the lead in reaching their own salvation. Only the President, who leads the most comprehensive constituency in metropolis and who is now elected by urban voters, can start the change.

This is a readable, provocative, disturbing book. Readers will be jolted. If they are devoted to the failing solutions, they will be upset, perhaps angered. But if they are seeking new ways, they will find good sense. The dean is going as strong as ever.—JAMES L. McCAMY, University of Wisconsin.

Boss Cermak of Chicago: A Study of Political Leadership. BY ALEX GOTTFRIED. (University of Washington Press, 1962. Pp. xiii, 459. $7.50.)

Anton J. Cermak is in one respect a unique figure in American politics. For a period of thirty years he held both elective public office and party office in the nation's second major city, emerging in 1932 as Mayor of Chicago and Democratic boss of the city, of Cook County and of the State of Illinois. Few political bosses have ever ventured to expose themselves to the hazards of election campaigns except perhaps in comfortably one-sided areas. Here is a man who ran for election successively (and in all but two cases successfully) as state representative (4 terms), alderman (4 terms), bailiff, sheriff, county commissioner, U. S. Senator and Mayor. Yet he never relinquished his party position as boss, first of his ward, then of a cluster of wards, then of the city organization and finally of the state in the crucial year 1932 when the Democrats finally returned to power in the nation.

In other respects Cermak's career is by no means unique. As a son of poor immigrant parents who could afford him scant education, he may be compared to Al Smith or Fiorello LaGuardia. Cermak became the leader and symbol of the Czechs as Smith was of the Irish and LaGuardia of the Italians. Like them, Cermak voiced for all minority groups the opposition to prohibition as an imposition of the rural nativists and a threat to the liberties and cultural habits of the urban immigrants. For Cermak, as for Smith and LaGuardia, the prohibition issue provided a powerful and unifying rallying cry. All three became protagonists not only of their own people but generally of the newer immigrants in their aspirations for recognition and power.

But here the similarity abruptly ends. Cermak was singularly lacking in the wit and warmth that made Smith and LaGuardia legends in their own lifetimes. Cermak, as Dr. Gottfried's careful examination reveals, was a tough, taciturn figure. Where Smith accepted the party machine and used his knowledge and influence to improve its public image or LaGuardia fashioned his own image fighting the dominant machine and rejecting and out-manuevering the party leaders who supported him, Cermak alone sought to both create and dominate party organization. Both as party leader and as office-holder, he was autarchic, if not autocratic.

Even as Mayor, the image of Party Boss was dominant. Gottfried suggests that "Cermak's performance in the complex roles of this office has been ignored or dismissed by otherwise competent observers, chiefly owing to their belief that he was 'the biggest crook of the lot,' or 'the most ruthless and acquisitive man in Chicago politics' or 'a spoils politician' or simply that he came under that wonderfully all-inclusive anathema 'Boss.' These descriptions are fairly accurate."

But are they, by Dr. Gottfried's evidence, either "fair" or "accurate"? Boss, "A. J." certainly was. He held, and held tautly, the reins of official and party power. Acquisitive, Cermak was, of power. But if acquisitiveness suggests, as with many political bosses it surely does, that he used his political power to acquire personal wealth, Dr. Gottfried's own painstaking research demonstrates that the suggestion is false. Certainly it would be neither fair nor accurate to call Cermak a "crook" or "the biggest crook of the lot."

In the first place, Cermak had parlayed a kindling wood business into a real estate operation and had become a successful small businessman before he first ran for public office in 1902. Politics, to be sure, never hurt his business but politics with "A. J." always came first. In the rough and tumble of Chicago in the thirty years that saw such figures as the Carter Harrisons, father and son, Roger Sullivan, George Brennan, Al Capone and Big Bill Thompson, Cermak was not above political or patronage deals that would enhance his political fortunes. But whether it was caution or because he was comfortably circumstanced, he never used his political opportunities to build up a private fortune. His dominant urge—and as Dr. Gottfried demonstrates, he could be ruthless about it—was the quest for political power. Gottfried quite properly calls him "a power seeker"; no other needs or desires competed with the demand for political power and prestige.

Great as was his skill as "a peerless party organizer" he was no less competent as a public executive. Gottfried stresses "Cermak's habit of giving a minimum of effective administration in every elective office." He seems rather to have given a maximum of effective administration. He was as aggressive and dominant, as tireless and indefatigable as a public officer as he was as a party organizer. He was, says Gottfried, of the "bull whip" school of administration. His cabinet officials, Gottfried tells us, admired him but had no affection for him; the rank and file employees "feared and hated him." "No Chicago Mayor surpassed him in detailed knowledge of the intricacies of administration, including operation at the lowest ministerial level." This last, of course, was true of Al Smith in respect to New York State and F. H. LaGuardia in regard to the City of New York. Unlike them, Cermak, however, had "the social philosophy of the businessman," particularly that of the small, self-made businessman. He was the "rugged individualistic, laissez-faire entrepreneur." Gottfried is, therefore, surprised to find him an early champion of great government programs of assistance. But what "depression" mayor who had known poverty in childhood and had himself emerged as the spokesman and champion of the urban immigrant masses, or, for that matter, what politician in intimate touch with the needs of these people, could, in 1931 and 1932, have clung stubbornly to the tradition of laissez-faire?

It might be interesting—but hardly fruitful—to speculate how Cermak five years later might have reacted to the New Deal. In 1932 he rejected Roosevelt as not "wet" enough and went down fighting for Al Smith, who was. But an assassin's bullet intended for Roosevelt brought martyrdom and an abrupt end to Cermak's career at his moment of maximum power.

Here then, is a career full of fascination for the student of politics and government. Dr. Gottfried has combed the newspapers of the period and sought out the dwindling group of Cermak contemporaries. But "A. J." was a man of few words and fewer records. The 20th Century politician commits little to paper. His most important arrangements are oral, with few witnesses and fewer still who are likely to talk. This was no less true of Al Smith or F. H. LaGuardia. But they at least were lively personalities. Tony Cermak, despite the power he wielded, was not.

The scant records of our political figures make the task of the historian of the 20th Century a difficult one. Dr. Gottfried has tried to write more than a history of A. J. Cermak. He seeks to discover the kind of power "A. J." sought, how he used it and the sources of his power. He has provided one Appendix on the Chicago in which Cermak lived, and even another devoted to Psychosomatic Analysis. He has tried, at least, to bring the insights of the sociologist and even of the psychoanalyst to answer the questions which the political scientist must raise about this potent, enigmatic man.

There are no amusing anecdotes to liven Dr. Gottfried's narrative. "A. J." was always in deadly earnest, concentrated and close-mouthed. He had few friends; no intimates. It would be hard, I dare say impossible, to penetrate his deep reserve, to bring him to life as an engaging personality.—JOSEPH D. MCGOLDRICK, Professor of Political Science, Queens College.

The Economics of the Political Parties. By SEYMOUR L. HARRIS. (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1962. Pp. 349. $7.00.)

The distinguished Littauer Professor of Political Economy at Harvard has given us a partisan testament in crisp, hard hitting prose, hopefully directed to a wide audience. Professor Harris describes the differences between the Democrats and the Republicans on every major economic issue of the day and the GOP fares badly at every turn.

In a nub, the Republicans have failed to grasp the basic tenets of modern (i.e., Keynesian) fiscal policy. They have made a fetish of the balanced budget, refused to relate debt to G. N. P., revere the stable dollar at the expense of growth, and generally regard government expenditures as non-productive.

Republicans are also guilty of deprecating the role of academics in government and of appointing to key posts officials whose previous records reveal downright hostility to the programs they are to administer. The historical attempts of Republicans to emphasize the role of state and local governments gloss over their regressive tax systems.

The Democratic party, or at least its center of gravity, stands for the obverse of these. Dedicated to full employment and growth, Democrats seek a balanced economy, rather than the balanced budget. While many Democrats still have much to learn, Harris holds that the leadership of the party is fully conversant with the necessary economic tools to meet its responsibilities. When it fails to act, or acts improperly, the reason is political reality, i.e., the lack of popular understanding of elementary economics.

Harris' great fear is that the Republican position will not permit the nation to solve "the central issue" of establishing national priorities in the allocation of resources. If our resources are dissipated in self-indulgence and only what is left over is directed to our needs, we cannot win the Cold War. The historical Republican equation of consumer sovereignty with democracy is, then, a threat to our survival.

Political scientists, while probably in agreement with most of what Harris says, would probably point out the difficulties posed by the "language of politics." For example, GOP orthodoxy did not prevent the use of Keynesian measures in 1953-54, yet in August, 1962, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, as well as the Republican congressional leadership, stated its opposition to any tax cut which was not accompanied by a cut in non-defense spending. Would Republicans in power be equally vehement?

President Kennedy may be a sophisticated economist, but did candidate Kennedy help the cause by his frequent campaign parry, "Never before in the history of the United States did any administration in peacetime have a larger deficit than this administration in 1958, $12 billion. They would have had an increase in the debt of more than $10 billion except a Democratic Congress in the last six years cut the budget requests . . . by $10 billion."? And so, on to a Yale commencement, clutching a copy of Samuelson.

While Harris notes that a Democratic congress is still conservative and that a Javits outlook is hardly a Halleck approach, not enough attention is given to the economics of the congressional parties and the pressures which fall on individual members.

When a majority of Republican congressmen describe a $900 million public works bill as a boondoggle and two of them, one a candidate for governor, the other a candidate for U. S. senator, cross the aisle, the problem of congressional voting behavior is obviously more complex than Professor Harris suggests. Neither ignorance nor cupidity is the sole answer.

Harris' thesis is sometimes dulled by overzealous assertions such as "... a reduction in the appropriations for the Weather Bureau in fiscal 1955 was followed by a hurricane that probably cost the nation more than a billion dollars." And one must also wonder if Professor Harris feels the Communications Satellite Bill was part of the New Frontier or a latter-day example of Eisenhower orthodoxy.

But as long as most Americans, college students included, feel that balancing the Federal budget is like dealing with a personal checking account writ large, Professor Harris' labor of partisan love deserves the widest circulation.—SIDNEY WISE, Franklin and Marshall College.

Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. BY ARTHUR MAASS, MAYNARD M. HUFSCMIDT, ROBERT DORFMAN, HAROLD A. THOMAS, JR., STEPHEN A. MARGLIN, GORDON MASKEW FAIR, AND OTHERS, (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1962, Pp. xviii, 620, $12.50.)

On the first page of the book the senior author, Arthur Maass, declares his independence of a conventional approach; Design of Water-Resource Systems "differs basically from the many volumes on water resources published in the last decade, which have been concerned mainly with governmental organization for development of resources, the economics of project evaluation, and the collection and evaluation of basic data." (p. 1) The purpose of this study, the product of the joint researches of the Harvard Water Program, is quite different. Put boldly, but simply, it is to devise techniques of water-resource system design sufficiently sophisticated to permit identification of the one best design for any physical environment on the basis of specified objectives. With such a goal the book is aimed at an audience of "engineers, economists, and administrators," named in that order by the authors. (p. 10) The details of the techniques examined and explained will be of interest to some political scientists, specialists in the resource field; for a larger number, however, far more interest will attend the implications that the findings carry for the more traditional study of administrative organization, both within resource development and in other program areas.

Put differently, the purpose of the book is to provide a mechanism for the automatic conversion of social objectives through engineering techniques to detailed plans and implementation. Maass distinguishes four steps in system design, "identifying the objectives of design; translating these objectives into design criteria; using the criteria to devise plans . . . that fulfill the criteria in the highest degree; and evaluating the consequences of the plans that have been developed." (p. 2) From the first step, the rest follow. "Once the objective has been determined, our methodology leads to the selection of that combination of structures, levels of development for different water uses, and operating procedures that will best achieve the objective." (p. 3) The scope of this claim is suggested by another: "We have undertaken to translate into a design criterion any reasonable objective." (p. 9) Although the process of system design is easier when the single goal is economic efficiency, the same procedures can be employed to plan for a combination of objectives including efficiency, income redistribution, or even non-economic goals.

All this carries overtones of the classic dichotomy between policy and administration, but the authors are too experienced to fall into such simplification. Recognizing the necessity of interplay between policy-makers and planners, they see three types of situations within which planning may take place. 1) In the absence of objectives clear enough to lead to the identification of a single best design, the project planners have sought to maximize physical development, using economic data only to justify rejection of excessively costly projects. Individual projects have then been subjected to spasmodic review, strongly influenced by the local interests most directly involved. This has in practice been the most common procedure within the federal government. 2) The planners have designed their systems around the single goal of economic efficiency, seeking to maximize the contribution to economic development. Other objectives, if desired, have been incorporated into the design by ad hoc modification. 3) With sufficiently detailed design criteria, elaborate techniques can be employed that will determine the best plan to maximize all objectives, in the internal priority rank assigned in advance. If modifications in objectives are made after the preparation of the plan, they can be made under circumstances in which the cost of each change is known in terms of reduced capacity to accomplish other goals.

Not surprisingly, the authors offer their own work as a vehicle to reach the third type of relationship. The advantages would be twofold: by incorporating the multiple objectives in the original criteria, consideration of sufficient alternatives to ensure an optimal combination of benefits would be guaranteed; such a procedure would discourage the setting of policy objectives within a parochial atmosphere focused on specific projects, and would encourage the establishment and maintenance of national standards for resource development. Consistent with this emphasis on the rational resolution of problems, Maass develops in the last chapter a model of constitutional democratic government that rejects interest group theories of politics in favor of an emphasis upon community consensus.

Two obstacles would appear to stand in the way of the full accomplishment of this method of planning. As the authors modestly acknowledge, their procedures do not as yet permit the incorporation of all potential variables. In the design of a system for an artificial river-basin, created for research purposes, the planners were forced to exclude consideration of alternative means of accomplishing objectives other than control of water in the channel, e.g., flood plain zoning, pollution controls, etc. The design procedure likewise excludes ground water sources. Further work by economists and engineers will be necessary to elaborate and extend the techniques here developed.

The second difficulty, most directly of concern to political scientists, concerns the problems involved in reducing many development objectives to the form of design criteria. These difficulties are set aside by the authors; for any specified objective, gross benefits equal "the willingness of beneficiaries to pay" or "how much the beneficiaries of a system output would purchase at successive prices if the output were sold in a market." These concepts are difficult to apply, however, to willingness to pay for continued opportunity to enjoy a scenic view, for relief from the stench caused by pollution, for protection against loss of life by flood, or for the sense of honor that comes from the knowledge that treaty obligations to Indian tribes—whether or not enforceable in the courts—are still being observed. These problems of measuring benefits are not ignored by the authors; they are defined out of the scope of a study concerned with other matters. They remain for continued exploration. This volume is a distinguished beginning toward the development of procedures that may serve to further rationalize policy formation in resource development and may, by analogy, lead to the application of comparable techniques in other program areas.—FRANK MUNGER, Syracuse University.

Render Unto Caesar. The Flag-Salute Controversy.
By DAVID R. MANWARING. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962. Pp. viii, 321. $5.50.)

A particular decision of the Supreme Court of the United States often brings renewed interest in previous decisions which set the stage or broke the ground for the new one. In light of the present controversy over prayers in the public schools, Manwaring has, through the coincidences of history and the docket of the Supreme Court, produced a particularly timely study of the long legal struggle of the Jehovah's Witnesses against the compulsory flag salute in public schools. Last year such a study of events of twenty years ago might have been tardy rather than timely.

The book is concerned with the flag-salute controversy during the 1930's and 40's, when the Supreme Court in Gobitis first ruled for a compulsory salute and three years later, in Barnette, ruled against the compulsory salute. The Jehovah's Witnesses are the stars of this drama; the Supreme Court of the United States is the arena; and various groups such as the American Legion, the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Bar Association, and the United States Department of Justice are the supporting actors. This setting has the makings of judicial-political drama at its finest, but in some respects the script falls short.

The book jacket describes the flag-salute controversy as "a classic example of interest-group involvement in constitutional litigation" and credits the author with tracing "the strategies of the various interest groups through every step in the proceedings of both Gobitis and Barnette." That is what this reviewer had hoped Manwaring would do. But while there is a tiringly detailed account of the legal briefs presented by the various interest groups there is an almost complete absence of any consideration of the extra-judicial activities of these participants. The stuff of interest-group representation includes far more than the presentation of legal briefs in judicial tribunals, yet a careful reading of this account of the Jehovah's Witnesses' troubles before the courts fails to reveal the non-judicial, political, processes of interest-group representation. While the author is not guilty of suggesting that the filing of legal briefs is the sum-total of interest-group strategy, his overly extensive consideration of the courtroom gymnastics engaged in by the various groups, while serving perhaps to demonstrate to an introductory student the process whereby litigation is carried on, at the same time over-emphasizes the judicial as opposed to the political activities of these interest groups.

Perhaps more annoying than important are several mechanical shortcomings of the book for which the reviewer is inclined to blame the publisher rather than the author. The book, which began as a doctoral dissertation and still bears the unmistakable earmarks of its origin, is written in outline form complete with A's, B's, 1's, and 2's, a form which this reviewer finds distracting. It is, as most dissertations tend to be, profusely annotated and referenced to the point of absurdity. In eleven chapters with a total of 253 pages of text there is a grand total of 1,403 notes, which, however, do not occur at the bottom of the page but are grouped together in 59 pages at the end of the volume. The mere number of notes, their atrocious location at the end of the volume, and the indiscriminate mixing of references with annotations and explanatory material were enough to make this reviewer marvel at the publisher's skill in interfering so handsomely with the enjoyment of an otherwise well-done commentary. This admixture of notes and references was particularly bothersome in Chapter 2, for instance, when a neophyte in religious orders finds to his dismay that some of the most interesting and pertinent parts of the Witnesses' theology are discussed not in the text but in notes over 240 pages removed (see notes 10, 16, and 23, pp. 260-61). The extremely detailed accounting in Chapter 7 of the number of favorable and unfavorable articles in magazines, journals and newspapers in reaction to the Gobitis decision and the inclusion of three graphs and one table relative to the incidences of persecution of the Witnesses are rather labored efforts at systematization and appear both unnecessary and insufficient in themselves to establish any critical point. They detract seriously from the readability of the study.

These annoyances are minor, however, and this is a thoroughly worthwhile volume. It will serve as an excellent case study for undergraduate students with which to illustrate the trial procedures of major constitutional questions. It likewise demonstrates effectively the process—often engaged in but rarely quite so openly admitted—whereby the Court changes its mind within a very short period of time. But perhaps the greatest value of this volume is that it will serve as excellent food-for-thought on the past treatment of children—including forceable separation from their parents and commitment to correctional institutions—just because they refused to salute the flag. Also, the violence against the Witnesses, here vividly portrayed, frightened this reviewer. That such treatment of a minority is possible in this country underscores the need for a re-evaluation of the real meaning of freedom and tolerance, not from the standpoint of constitutional right but from the more important standpoint of the potentiality of mob action and mass deprivation of rights through passion and irrationality. Manwaring has here, then, caused at least one person to reflect on the provocative question of the relationship of legal rights to the social and individual behavior of others with whom we differ. —GERALD RIGBY, University of Southern California.

The Contours of American History. By WILLIAM APPLEMAN WILLIAMS. (World Publishing Co. 513 pp. $7.50.)

Surveying the American past, William Appleman Williams finds a single dominant motif—the dollar sign. The pursuit of private gain, he laments, has seduced Americans away from the noble ideals of their beginnings and brought them to their present unhappy state. Fragmentation, alienation, and purposelessness reigns within; nuclear destruction looms without. But his purpose is more than simply to trace the path by which the republic has come to this pass. The Contours of American History is a jeremiad warning the American people to repent before Armageddon. Accompanying this warning is a message of hope. A saving alternative remains, Mr. Williams proclaims. Socialism will build a humane world in which all men can live freely and happily as brothers.

The story presented by Mr. Williams is a tale of decline. The founding fathers of the republic had a glimpse, partial and limited to be sure, but a glimpse nonetheless, of the meaning of a true community. All, even Jefferson, remained within the mercantilist Weltanschauung, with its sense of social responsibility, its belief in state action to promote the general welfare, its goal of a diversified and balanced economy, and its vision of a Christian corporate commonwealth. This American mercantilism came of age during the presidency of the younger Adams. Yet its very success in fostering economic growth whetted men's appetites to exploit the new opportunities without restraint. The new spirit, Mr. Williams believes, triumphed with Jacksonian democracy, and with this triumph came the ascendancy of the new Weltanschauung of laissez nous faire.

Laissez faire retained its spell over the public mind until the end of the century. By the 1880's, however, the giant corporation had become the dominant force in American life. With the advent of the age of corporate capitalism, Americans came increasingly to see their society as composed of different groups—farmers, workers, and businessmen—and to look to achieve the good life by balancing these groups one against the other. Twentieth-century reformers from T. R. to

F. D. R., Mr. Williams declares, have not challenged this "functionalist-syndicalist system," but have merely sought to remove its worst abuses and promote a fairer balancing of forces—all without undermining private property.

Their ability to do so, Mr. Williams holds, has depended—and continues to depend—upon the continuing expansion of the market. In response to the depression of the 1890's, American leaders concluded "that overseas economic expansion provided the sine qua non of domestic prosperity and social peace" and "consciously initiated a broad program of sophisticated imperialism." The United States began the Spanish-American War to "establish firm control of the Caribbean; and proceed with expansion into Asia." Wilson led the United States into World War One because he feared that Germany was this country's "main competitor for economic empire." F. D. R. fought the Second World War to safeguard "America's recovery-and-prosperity-through-expansion campaign" from the Axis challenge. Coming to the present, Mr. Williams warns that the continued acceptance in the postwar years of this "frontier-expansionist outlook" has led to the impasse of the cold war with its threat of a nuclear holocaust.

The job of the historian, Mr. Williams avers in his introduction, is to clear away myths about the past so that men can better understand the present. Unfortunately, he himself has merely replaced one set of myths with another—those arising from his attempt to force the whole of the American experience into the straitjacket of an economic interpretation of history. Take, for instance, the quotes Mr. Williams features from American business and political leaders bemoaning the "spectacular gains" made by Hitler Germany in the markets of the world. Was the Third Reich no more than a trade rival of the United States? Simply to ask the question is to reveal the shallowness of Mr. Williams's approach.

Or let us examine Mr. Williams's account of the background of Pearl Harbor. He starts by showing the importance of American trade with Asia. This trade, he goes on to say, revived "the old idea that China (italics mine) was the next American frontier." To protect that frontier, "Japan had to be forced to withdraw from China." The weapon was the embargo on oil, steel, and other war materials. But this strategy backfired when Japan refused to retreat and war followed. Now let us look at the facts. While trade with Asia was important, American trade with Japan was four times that with China—a fact not mentioned by Mr. Williams. The available evidence indicates that most American businessmen active in China sympathized with the Japanese, while most American business journals echoed the plaint of the Magazine of Wall Street, "It would take more than the Orient appears to offer us in economic advantages to induce the United States to risk war." The Roosevelt administration acted in China more from a stubborn adherence to principle than from any master plan to save the Chinese market for American business. The truth is that American policy in the Far East may be more justly assailed as Quixotic than as Machiavellian.

Perhaps we should judge Mr. Williams not as a historian but as a prophet leading the American people to salvation. Unhappily, Mr. Williams is no sounder a prophet than he is a historian. He exults that the Bolshevik Revolution reasserted the ideal of a true commonwealth. But what do we find in the Soviet Union of today? A ruthless, self-seeking dictatorship. The melancholy record of human frailty should warn us against the seductive appeal of his millennial faith. Given the imperfections of mankind, the most we can hope for is a rough approximation to justice from the balancing of rival self-interests—and this the present "functionalist-syndicalist system" in the United States performs to the satisfaction of the overwhelming majority of the American people.

Even more naive and wrongheaded is Mr. Williams's faith that this country's embracing socialism would end world tensions and prevent nuclear war. This faith rests upon two premises—both patently false. First, that economic rivalries are the prime cause of wars. Second, that the drive for overseas markets by American corporations backed by the State Department is responsible for the cold war. The cold war is, for Mr. Williams, "very largely the result of the conflict between the expansion of those corporations and the opposition to them manifested by vigorous and militant rivals." The conflict between East and West involves, in short, no more than a struggle for the world's markets. Such thinking at this date can only reflect willful blindness not simply fuzzy-mindedness.—JOHN BRAEMAN, Brooklyn College.

Morale in the Civil Service: A Study of the Desk Worker. BY NIGEL WALKER, (Edinburgh, Edinburgh University Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 302.)

It has been said that a major function of statistics is to strengthen what one already knows. To a considerable extent that comment characterizes the contribution made by Nigel Walker's Morale in the Civil Service. At the outset of this brief review, it should be noted that although the study is concerned with English civil service clerical grades including administrative officers and some technical personnel, much of the data and conclusions are applicable to their American counterparts.

The author examines in some depth the concept of morale and its "effect" upon the individual and group, using two government agencies, and two private firms for this purpose. The methods employed are the questionnaire (a sample of which is supplied in the Appendix) and followed up by interviews wherever necessary. Both the questionnaires and the interviews were directed to a carefully selected sample. The questionnaires were returned in 70% of the cases.

The reader is given to understand quite early that the term morale has little operational use, and is not quantifiable as a concept and is of little use in studying efficiency, which the author takes to be the goal of morale. Considerable emphasis is given to American studies of the industrial worker which disclosed that while productivity of workers could be increased by greater mechanization, better working conditions, time study and incentive payments of various kinds, it also depended on the worker's attitudes towards their management and to their immediate supervisors, on the values which people seem to attach to their work and on other such psychological factors.

This legacy from the contributions of scientific management and the more recent insights which the industrial psychologists and sociologists have given us as to motivation and group behavior, currently vie for attention and application both in industry and the government service.

Since Leonard D. White's ground-breaking studies of prestige, and to some extent, morale in the public service appeared in 1929 and 1932, much has been written about the importance of morale and how to improve it. Actually, little has been produced of substantive value about this elusive factor in employee relations. The usual cause-and-effect reasoning has run as follows: A given personnel technique pleases employees; the result is improved morale; and improved morale will lead to better personnel relations and greater efficiency. Mr. Walker has, in effect, subjected this plausible chain of reasoning to analysis using careful methods of inquiry to substantiate or reject the myths which have developed.

To summarize: As the author was unable to find a useful and measurable element to morale as such, he found through his analysis that a composite definition would lend itself much more adequately to this technique. He indicated the following factors as important and quantifiable to a significant extent: 1. Productivity or efficiency. 2. Job satisfaction. 3. Pride in the working group. 4. Cohesiveness.

Data secured from questionnaires and interviews amply reproduced in the text seemed to bear out the author's contentions in the main that the factors noted could be measured. Other questions examined by the study involved a wide variety of subjects such as absenteeism, turnover rates, leave, promotion policies, pensions, wage rates, job security and the like.

Efficiency and job-satisfaction are the components which the author found the most significant as an indication of "high morale." One of the fallacies, he points out is that of diagnosing "low morale" in an organization without comparing its symptoms with those of other organizations. Quite apart from the doubtful utility of the whole concept of "morale," comparison of this kind might well show that what seemed to be pathological symptoms were in fact equally frequent in all offices of the same kind.

In the final analysis, this book is a description of a problem, not the prescription for a remedy, as Nigel Walker notes. There is thus no grounds for arguing that increasing the enjoyment of the work for the employee will help in increasing production. The author does cautiously admit, however; that increasing job-satisfaction is linked with efficiency.—LOUIS L. FRIEDLAND, Wayne State University.

City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination. BY GLADYS M. KAMMERER, CHARLES D. FARRIS, JOHN M. DE-GROVE, ALFRED B. CLUBOK. (University of Florida Monographs, No. 13, Winter, 1962, U. of Florida Press, Gainesville. $2.50, 93 pp.)

The purpose of this study is two-fold: to catalogue the discrepancies between the "classical" doctrine of council manager plans and the "reality" of manager behavior, and to make some recommendations, consistent with the authors' commitment to programmatic democracy, regarding institutional improvements in city manager plans. In their comparison of seventy-six manager cities in Florida, the authors focused on two dependent variables: at the community level, the average tenure per city of managers since 1945; and, at the personal level, variations in tenure of individual managers. Employing a pluralistic framework they tested hypotheses about tenure in the light of institutional-structural differences in councils, especially the manager's authority over personnel; political factors in the community such as its political style (monopolistic, oligopolistic or competitive); nonpolitical factors such as the size and rate of growth of the city; and individual factors of managers such as their career patterns and degree of professionalization.

It should come as no surprise to the political scientist that hypotheses with political factors as independent variables are the more accurate predictors of tenure. As was expected, the city manager is a more politicized animal than the International City Managers' Association (and most local government textbook writers) would have us believe. The degree of politicalization (e.g., the extent to which the manager initiates policy) of this "administrative" position is directly related to its vulnerability to the effective political forces of the community. At the community level of analysis a hypothesis tested and confirmed was that tenure tends to average longer in stable than in unstable communities. In assessing the reasons given for involuntary terminations, the authors found that electoral or public opinion considerations predominated in cities with a competitive political style, while "palace" considerations, trouble with the boss or mayor, predominated in monopolistic situations.

Though the many hypotheses were subjected to rigorous testing, and the study reports useful findings, this reader felt that an unduly narrow theoretical scheme prevented full exploitation of the data. For example, in handling the personal tenure data, had the authors been more explicit about their latent role-theory, the material could well have led to generalizations about role-types and degree of vulnerability in differing political situations. At the community level, an implicit theoretical assumption that local politics are to be explained primarily in terms of conflict situations prevents what might have been useful statements regarding consensus patterns.

Nevertheless, the study carefully accomplishes its stated purpose in demonstrating that the behavior of city managers is not consistent with council-manager doctrine, and, in the process, turns up data and reports findings which should be welcomed by the student of local politics. The well-argued prescriptive addendum does not interfere with the study and merits the attention of the practitioner.—KENNETH PREWITT, Stanford University.

The Government of Missouri, 7th ed. By ROBERT F. KARSCH. (Columbia, Missouri: Lucas Brothers Publishers, 1961. Pp. 199.)

The present text started out more than 10 years ago as a brief exposition of Missouri's government. It was prompted at that time by the need for a handbook to assist in fulfilling a statutory requirement that the Missouri constitution be taught in state colleges and universities. Now, six editions later, the work has been enlarged into a substantial text and has become a standard reference guide to the structure and organization of Missouri state government.

A large number of treatises on the governments of individual states have appeared in recent years. The American Commonwealths Series inaugurated by the Crowell publishing firm a decade or so ago optimistically envisioned a text for each state. Other publishers have selected areas, such as Texas and California, where legal requirements or custom result in widespread teaching of courses on the government of particular states. Most works which have appeared in this genre are legally and institutionally oriented. They describe comprehensively the formal structure of the state's government, review the wide range of functions it performs, and set forth many of the legal provisions pertaining to political parties, voting, reapportionment, powers of the governor and legislature, and similar matters. Seldom does one find more than passing reference to the informal structure and operations of the governmental and administrative machinery or to the political realities that permeate the system from top to bottom.

The Government of Missouri conforms to the traditional pattern. It is excellent on description but short on the informal functioning of the state's administrative and legislative organs. The student who masters it will have broad knowledge of the constitutional and statutory underpinnings of Missouri government but little feel for its politics or the manner in which the public business of running the commonwealth is actually carried out. However, a text must be judged by its purpose; and Professor Karsch's objective is to supply college students in Missouri with a carefully written and documented handbook outlining the state's executive, legislative, and judicial structure, and the legal basis for its operations. Knowledge of this kind must obviously precede a more sophisticated approach to state government.—HENRY J. SCHMANDT, University of Wisconsin.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Bilder, Richard B. The Office of the Legal Adviser: The State Department Lawyer and Foreign Affairs. American Journal of International Law. July, 1962.

Vardys, V. Stanley. Select Committees of the House of Representatives. Midwest Journal of Political Science. August, 1962.

State Government

Barrett, Charles A. Reapportionment and the Courts. State Government. Summer, 1962.

Bartlett, Roy R. State Taxation Powers in Federal Areas. Washburn Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Boyd, William J. D. Patterns of Apportionment. National Municipal League. 1962.

Goodman, William I. Urban Planning and the Role of the State. State Government. Summer, 1962.

Greaney, Walter T., Jr. The Massachusetts Budget Process. Bureau of Government Research, University of Massachusetts. 1962.

Hatchett, John T., and T. Noel Stern. Revenue Estimating in Indiana. Bureau of Government Research, Indiana University. 1962.

Heller, Francis H., and Don R. Bowen. Uniform State Laws in Kansas. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1962.

Larson, Robert W. Statehood for New Mexico, 1888-1912. New Mexico Historical Review. July, 1962.

Martin, James W. The States Must Plan. National Civic Review. July, 1962.

McKay, Robert B. Reapportionment and the Federal Analogy. National Municipal League. 1962.

McKinney, David, et al. Money for [Highway] Miles in Mississippi. Bureau of Business and Economic Research and Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Mississippi. 1962.

Palmer, Dwight R. G. State Government and Transportation. State Government. Summer, 1962.

Pray, Joseph C., and George J. Mauer. The New Perspective of Legislative Apportionment in Oklahoma. Bureau of Government Research, University of Oklahoma. 1962.

Zimmerman, Joseph F. The Executive Veto in Massachusetts, 1947-1960. Social Science. June, 1962.

Local Government

Agnew, John W. The Economics of Urban Redevelopment. Municipal Finance. August, 1962.

Bartley, Ernest R. Urban Planning: An Introduction for the Citizen. Public Administration Clearing Service, University of Florida. 1962.

Bird, Frederick L. Local Special Districts and Authorities in Rhode Island. Bureau of Government Research, University of Rhode Island. 1962.

Briley, Beverly. The Davidson County Story [Consolidation with Nashville]. County Officer. September, 1962.

Browning, Beverly L. North Kingstown Selects Two Managers—A Case Study. Bureau of Government Research, University of Rhode Island. 1962.

Constitutional Provision for Streamlining County Government Needs Enabling Statutes. Missouri Public Expenditure Survey. 1962.

Crosswhite, William M., and Gerald F. Vaughn.

Land Use in the Rural-Urban Fringe: A Case Study of New Castle County, Delaware. Agricultural Experiment Station and Division of Urban Affairs, University of Delaware. 1962.

Despain, I. Dale. Excessive Land Subdivision. County Officer. September, 1962.

Duggar, George S. Urban Renewal: Current Criticism and the Search for a Rationale. Public Management. September, 1962.

Dukeminier, Jesse, Jr., and Clyde L. Stapleton. The Zoning Board of Adjustment: A Case Study in Misrule. Kentucky Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

Hein, Clarence J. Rural Fears Allayed [on Local Services]. National Civic Review. September, 1962.

Kolb, William L. The City and Its Planners. [Symposium]. Carleton Miscellany. Summer, 1962.

MacCorkle, Stuart A. Council-Administrative Relationships. Public Management. August, 1962.

———. Tenure of City Managers. Ibid. July, 1962.

Reynolds, William J. Is Economy in Local Government Popular? Municipal Finance. August, 1962.

Saville, Lloyd. Regional Contrasts in the Development of Local Public Finance. National Tax Journal. June, 1962.

Schaller, Lyle E. The Changing Face of Urban Renewal. Mayor and Manager. June, 1962.

Scheffer, Walter F. Problems in Municipal Finance. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Scheuer, James H., Eli Goldston, and Wilton S. Sogg. Disposition of Urban Renewal Land—A Fundamental Problem in the Rebuilding of Our Cities. Columbia Law Review. June, 1962.

Schriever, Paul. Municipal In-Service Training—Performance and Prospects. Public Management. August, 1962.

Taylor, Milton C. Local Income Taxes after Twenty-one Years. National Tax Journal. June, 1962.

Twichey, Robert H. Zoning and the Expanding Public Utility. Syracuse Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Weaver, Robert C. The Future of the American City. Walter J. Shepard Foundation, Ohio State University. 1962.

Whittier, Jeannette S. Administrative Problems in a Small Community. Municipal Finance. August, 1962.

Winters, John M. Classification of Municipalities. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1962.

Intergovernmental Relations

Conroy, Harold A. Municipal Sharing in State Revenues. Municipal Finance. August, 1962.

Kohl, John C. Urban Transportation—A National Problem. Ibid.

Loeks, C. David. Taming Urban Giant [by Coordinated Planning]. National Civic Review. July, 1962.

Walker, W. Paul. Taxation in Maryland with Special Reference to State-County Fiscal Relations. Department of Agricultural Economics, University of Maryland. 1962.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Bonfield, Arthur Earl. Baker v. Carr: New Light on the Constitutional Guarantee of Republican Government. California Law Review. May, 1962.

Cairns, Robert B., James C. N. Paul, and Julius Wishner. Sex Censorship: The Assumptions of Anti-Obsecenity Laws and the Empirical Evidence. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1962.

Collings, Rex A., Jr. Toward Workable Rules of Search and Seizure—An Amicus Curiae Brief. California Law Review. August, 1962.

Constitutional Rights of Prisoners: The Developing Law. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. May, 1962.

Cox, Archibald. Current Constitutional Issues. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1962.

Dillard, Hardy Cross. Freedom of Choice and Democratic Values. Virginia Quarterly Review. Summer, 1962.

Dure, Leon. Individual Freedom versus "State Action." Ibid.

Employment Discrimination and Interstate Carriers. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1962.

Frantz, Laurent B. The First Amendment in the Balance. Yale Law Journal. July, 1962.

Hink, Heinz R. The Application of Constitutional Standards of Protection to Probation. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Judicial Review: Its Role in Intergovernmental Relations: A Symposium. Georgetown Law Journal. Summer, 1962.

Justice Black and First Amendment "Abso-lutes": A Public Interview. New York University Law Review. June, 1962.

Levy, Leonard W. School Prayers and the Founding Fathers. Commentary. September, 1962.

Lynch, John A., Jr., and G. Robert Wileman. Remand to State Courts and Its Effect on the Dual-Sovereign System. Georgetown Law Journal. Summer, 1962.

McKeever, Patrick C., and Billy Dwight Perry. The Case for an Advisory Function in the Federal Judiciary. Ibid.

Nelson, Randall H. The Subject-Matter Limitation upon the Treaty-Making Power. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1962.

Resnick, Edward H. Prior Restraint—The Constitutional Question. Boston University Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Sentell, R. Perry, Jr. The Opinions of Hughes and Sutherland and the Rights of the Individual. Vanderbilt Law Review. March, 1962.

Shapiro, Martin. Judicial Review: Political Reality and Legislative Purpose: The Supreme Court's Supervision of Congressional Investigations. Ibid.

Tresolini, Rocco J. Justice Rutledge and the Yamashita Case. Social Science. June, 1962.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Abrams, Norman. Conspiracy and Multi-Venue in Federal Criminal Prosecutions: The Crime Committed Formula. University of California, Los Angeles, Law Review. July, 1962.

Armstrong, Walter P., Jr. Uniform State Laws and the National Conference. State Government. Summer, 1962.

Chappell, Richard A. The Lawyer's Role in the Administration of Probation and Parole. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1962.

Crosse, Murray L. Criminal and Civil Jurisdiction in Indian Country. Arizona Law Review. Fall, 1962.

Diamond, Bernard L. From M'Naghten to Currens, and Beyond [re Criminal Responsibility]. California Law Review. May, 1962.

The Evolution and Scope of the Doctrine of Pendent Jurisdiction in the Federal Courts. Columbia Law Review. June, 1962.

Federal Rule 43(a): The Scope of Admissibility of Evidence and the Implications of the Erie Doctrine. Ibid.

Fundamental Concepts of Public Law—A Symposium: Part II. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1962.

Garwood, W. St. John. Democracy and the Popular Election of Judges: An Argument. Southwestern Law Journal. July, 1962.

George, B. J., Jr. Legal, Medical and Psychiatric Considerations in the Control of Prostitution. Michigan Law Review. April, 1962.

Goldstein, Abraham S., and Edith W. Fine. The Indigent Accused, the Psychiatrist, and the Insanity Defense. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1962.

Griswold, Erwin N. The Standards of the Legal Profession: Canon 35 Should Not Be Surrendered. American Bar Association Journal. July, 1962.

Hall, Jerome. The Scientific and Humane Study of Criminal Law. Boston University Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Karlen, Delmar. Appeals in England and the United States. Law Quarterly Review. July, 1962.

Kuh, Richard H. The Insanity Defense—An Effort to Combine Law and Reason. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. April, 1962.

LaFave, Wayne R. Detention for Investigation by the Police: An Analysis of Current Practices. Washington University Law Quarterly. June, 1962.

Lane, Morton. The Contempt Power v. the Concept of a Fair Trial. Kentucky Law Journal. Spring, 1962.

McCabe, Francis V. Rhode Island Family Court. Boston University Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Nagel, Stuart S. Sociometric Relations among American Courts. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1962.

———. Testing Relations between Judicial Characteristics and Judicial Decision-Making. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Newspaper Libel: Barriers to Expanding Personal Jurisdiction. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Salzman, Leon. Psychiatric Interviews as Evidence: The Role of the Psychiatrist in Court—Some Suggestions and Case Histories. George Washington Law Review. June, 1962.

Shears, Curtis C. Legal Problems Peculiar to Children's Courts. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1962.

Stimson, Edward S. Omnibus Statutes Designed to Secure Jurisdiction over Out-of-State Defendants. Ibid.

Summers, Marvin R. Analysis of Factors That Influence Choice of Forum in Diversity Cases. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Supreme Court Treatment of State Court Cases Exhibiting Ambiguous Grounds of Decision. Columbia Law Review. May, 1962.

Symposium: Louisiana and the Civil Law. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1962.

Warren, Earl. Developments in Federal Judicial Administration. Pennsylvania Bar Association Quarterly. October, 1962.

Wessel, Milton R. Procedural Safeguards for the Mass Conspiracy Trial. American Bar Association Journal. July, 1962.

Zeisel, Hans. Delay by the Parties and Delay by the Courts. Journal of Legal Education. Vol. 15, No. 1. 1962.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Bell, David E. Management in the Federal Government. Civil Service Journal. July–September, 1962.

Briggs, John F. A Refined Program Budget for State Governments. School of Government and Public Administration, American University. 1962.

Davis, Kenneth Culp. Suing the Government by Falsely Pretending to Sue an Officer. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Dillon, Conley H. Government Purchases and Depressed Areas. Challenge. July, 1962.

Dionisopoulos, P. Allan. Procedural Safeguards in Administrative Rule Making in Indiana. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1962.

Elias, Erwin A. Administrative Discretion—No Solution in Sight. Baylor Law Review. Winter, 1962.

Evan, William M. Due Process of Law in Military and Industrial Organizations. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1962.

Fisher, John E. Do Federal Managers Manage? Public Administration Review. Spring, 1962.

Garwood, John D. When Should Government Agency Operations Remain Secret? Public Utilities Fortnightly. August 30, 1962.

Golembiewski, Robert T. Organization as a Moral Problem. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1962.

Gordon, Oakley, Reed Richardson, and J. D. Williams. Personnel Management in Utah State Government. Institute of Government, University of Utah. 1962.

Hart, Wilson R. Government Labor's New Frontiers through Presidential Directive. Virginia Law Review. June, 1962.

Hicks, Herbert G. The Meaning of Line and Staff. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Iverson, Paul E. Endorsement and Negotiation of Government Warrants. Utah Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Killian, James R., Jr. Can Government Maintain Vital Scientific Leadership? National Civil Service League. [1962].

Klepak, Daniel. Organizing for Effective Centralized Services. State Government. Summer, 1962.

Koontz, Harold. Making Sense of Management Theory. Harvard Business Review. July–August, 1962.

Krislov, Joseph. The Independent Public Employee Association: Characteristics and Functions. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. July, 1962.

Lehman, William P. Federal Pay Reform: Some Facets of Comparability. Public Personnel Review. July, 1962.

Luepke, Clement J. Safeguarding the Public Employee. Public Management. July, 1962.

Mainzer, Lewis C. Injustice and Bureaucracy. Yale Review. Summer, 1962.

Newland, Chester A. Public Employee Unionization in Texas. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1962.

Patterson, L. Ray. Hearsay and the Substantial Evidence Rule in the Federal Administrative Process. Mercer Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Quinn, Thomas A. Government Subcontractors' Remedies in Rem. George Washington Law Review. June, 1962.

Riggs, Fred W. Convergences in the Study of Comparative Public Administration and Local Government. Public Administration Clearing Service, University of Florida. 1962.

Stodola, Edward T. Problems in Expedition and Disposition of Large Administrative Proceedings at the Civil Aeronautics Board. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Summer, 1961-62.

Sullivan, John Paul. Federal Power Commission Jurisdiction over Commingled Sales of Natural Gas: A Problem in Judicial and Administrative Legislation. George Washington Law Review. April, 1962.

Tannenbaum, Arnold S. Control in Organizations: Individual Adjustment and Organizational Performance. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1962.

vom Baur, F. Trowbridge. Administrative Agencies and Unauthorized Practice of Law. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1962.

Voorhees, William F., Jr. Administering Investment of Public Funds. Municipal Finance. August, 1962.

Washnis, George J. Polygraphic Tests for City Employees. Public Personnel Review. July, 1962.

Witherspoon, Joseph P. Administrative Discretion to Determine Statutory Meaning: "The Middle Road": I. Texas Law Review. June, 1962.

Woll, Peter. Administrative Law Reform: Proposals and Prospects. Nebraska Law Review. June, 1962.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Baur, E. Jackson. Opinion Change in a Public Controversy. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Bement, Reed H. Congressional Authority to Restrict the Use of Literacy Tests. California Law Review. May, 1962.

Blackorby, Edward C. William Lemke: Agrarian Radical and Union Party Presidential Candidate. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1962.

Booth, David A., and Charles R. Adrian. Power Structure and Community Change. Midwest Journal of Political Science. August, 1962.

Clark, David G. Radio in Presidential Campaigns: The Early Years (1924-1932). Journal of Broadcasting. Summer, 1962.

The Constitutionality of Federal Anti-Literacy Test Legislation. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1962.

Cornwell, Elmer E., Jr. The Press Conferences of Woodrow Wilson. Journalism Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

David, Paul T., and Ralph Eisenberg. Devaluation of the Urban and Suburban Vote. Vol. II. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Virginia. 1962.

Derthick, Martha. City Politics in Washington, D. C. Joint Center for Urban Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University, and Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies. 1962.

Dodge, Richard W., and Eugene S. Uyeki. Political Affiliation and Imagery Across Two Related Generations. Midwest Journal of Political Science. August, 1962.

Donoghue, James R. How Wisconsin Voted, 1848-1960. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1962.

Easton, David, and Robert D. Hess. The Child's Political World. Midwest Journal of Political Science. August, 1962.

Eulau, Heinz, and David Koff. Occupational Mobility and Political Career. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Ewing, Cortez A. M. Constitutional Crisis in the American Party System. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Goldberg, Morton David. Promoting the Progress of Science and Useful Arts: A Commentary on the Copyright Office Report on General Revision of the United States Copyright Law. Cornell Law Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Goldstein, Richard, and Arthur Kessler. The Twilight Zone: Meanderings in the Area of Performers' Rights. University of California, Los Angeles, Law Review. July, 1962.

Haller, Mark H. The Rise of the Jackson Party in Maryland, 1820-1829. Journal of Southern History. August, 1962.

Hennings, Robert E. California Democratic Politics in the Period of Republican Ascendancy. Pacific Historical Review. August, 1962.

Hirschfield, Robert S., Bert E. Swanson, and Blanche D. Blank. A Profile of Political Activists in Manhattan. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Janosik, Edward G. Report on Political Activity of Philadelphia Businessmen. Committee for Economic Development and Wharton School, University of Pennsylvania [n.d.]

Johannsen, Robert W. Stephen A. Douglas' New England Campaign, 1860. New England Quarterly. June, 1962.

Kammeyer, Kenneth. A Comparative Study of Decision Making in Rural Communities. Rural Sociology. September, 1962.

King, Donald B. Corporate Political Spending and the First Amendment. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. June, 1962.

Kurtz, Robert S. The Right to Privacy: A Legal Guidepost to Television Programming. Journal of Broadcasting. Summer, 1962.

Lipset, Seymour Martin. Michels' Theory of Political Parties. Institute of Industrial Relations, University of California, Berkeley. Reprint No. 185. 1962.

Lowry, Ritchie P. The Functions of Alienation in Leadership. Sociology and Social Research. July, 1962.

McConaughy, John B., and John E. Gauntlett. A Survey of Urban Negro Voting Behavior in South Carolina. South Carolina Law Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

McGrath, Joseph E., and Marion F. McGrath. Effects of Partisanship on Perceptions of Political Figures. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Miller, Helen Hill. The City Vote and the Rural Monopoly. Atlantic. October, 1962.

Mitgang, Herbert. The Downfall of Jimmy Walker. Ibid.

Netterville, Victor S. Copyright and Tort Aspects of Parody, Mimicry and Humorous Commentary. Southern California Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Patterson, Samuel C. Dimensions of Voting Behavior in a One-Party State Legislature. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Perry, Paul. Gallup Poll Election Survey Experience, 1950 to 1960. Ibid.

Pfantz, Harold W. The Power Structure of the Negro Sub-Community: A Case Study and a Comparative View. Phylon. Summer, 1962.

Poulshock, S. Walter. Pennsylvania and the Politics of the Tariff, 1880-1888. Pennsylvania History. July, 1962.

Reid, Thomas R. Businessmen in Politics. National Civic Review. September, 1962.

Rogin, Michael. Voluntarism: The Political Functions of an Antipolitical Doctrine. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. July, 1962.

Rosenberg, Marvin and Dorothy. The Dirtiest Election [1884]. American Heritage. August, 1962.

Rosenberg, Morris. Self-Esteem and Concern with Public Affairs. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Ross, Hugh. Was the Nomination of Wendell Willkie a Political Miracle? Indiana Magazine of History. June, 1962.

Ross, William R. An Introduction to the Electoral Process in West Virginia. Bureau for Government Research, West Virginia University. [1962.]

Runciman, W. G. A Method for Cross-National Comparison of Political Consensus. British Journal of Sociology. June, 1962.

Stokes, Donald E., and Gudmund R. Iversen. On the Existence of Forces Restoring Party Competition. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Walker, David B. The Presidential Politics of the Franco-Americans. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. August, 1962.

Werdegarr, Kathryn Mickle. The Constitutionality of Federal Legislation to Abolish Literacy Tests: Civil Rights Commission's 1961 Report on Voting. George Washington Law Review. April, 1962.

Wildavsky, Aaron B. On the Superiority of National Conventions. Review of Politics. July, 1962.

Yates, W. Ross. The Functions of Residence Requirements for Voting. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Bazon, David T. The Paper Economy. Commentary. September, 1962.

Brandt, Karl. The Public Sector and Price Fixing. Modern Age. Summer 1962.

Breimyer, Harold F. The Three Economies of Agriculture. Journal of Farm Economics. August, 1962.

Dickinson, William B., Jr. Fiscal and Budget Policy. Editorial Research Reports. August 1, 1962.

Galloway, Lowell E. An Economic Analysis of Public Policy for the Depressed Areas. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. July, 1962.

Growth of Federal Domestic Spending Programs, 1947-1963. Tax Foundation. 1962.

McClelland, David C. Business Drive and National Achievement. Harvard Business Review. July-August, 1962.

Price, Don K. Control of the Monetary System. Ibid.

United States Trade Policy, 1962. [Symposium.] Current History. August, 1962.

von Nardoff, Ellen. The American Frontier as a Safety Valve—The Life, Death, Reincarnation, and Justification of a Theory. Agricultural History. July, 1962.

Worsnop, Richard L. Government Stockpiling. Editorial Research Reports. August 22, 1962.

Natural Resources

Milliman, J. W. Can People Be Trusted with Natural Resources? Land Economics. August, 1962.

Reich, Charles A. The Public and the Nation's Forests. California Law Review. August, 1962.

Shannonhouse, Royal G. Some Principles of Water Law in the Southeast. Mercer Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Waite, G. Graham. Public Rights in Indiana Waters. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1962.

Zobler, Leonard. An Economic-Historical View of Natural Resources. Economic Geography. July, 1962.

Agriculture

An Adaptive Program for Agriculture. Committee for Economic Development. 1962.

Business and Labor

Ablard, Charles D., and Marion Edwyn Harrison. The Post Office and Publishers' Pursestrings: A Study of the Second-Class Mailing Permit. George Washington Law Review. April, 1962.

Anderson, Donald R. Landrum-Griffin and the Trusteeship Imbroglio. Yale Law Journal. July, 1962.

Applications of Federal Antitrust Laws to the Insurance Industry. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1962.

Barber, Richard J. Airline Mergers, Monopoly, and the CAB. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Summer, 1961-62.

Barkin, Solomon. Differentiated National Labor Policies to Meet Present Problems. Labor Law Journal. September, 1962.

Bernhardt, Herbert N. The Allen Bradley Doctrine: An Accommodation of Conflicting Policies [in Labor Antitrust Actions]. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1962.

Brandwen, Maxwell. Punitive-Exemplary Damages in Labor Relations Litigation. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Burstein, Herbert. Subcontracting and Plant Removals. Labor Law Journal. June, 1962.

Cummings, Frank. Individual Enforcement of Rights under Collective Bargaining Agreements. Ibid. August, 1962.

Dakin, Melvin G. The Changing Nature of Utility Rate Regulation: Just Compensation, Due Process, and Equal Protection. Part II. Tulane Law Review. June, 1962.

Denbo, Milton C. Jurisdiction of Federal Courts to Award Back Pay in Injunction Suits under Fair Labor Standards Act. Labor Law Journal. June, 1962.

———. Taft-Hartley Act and Newspaper Publishers. Ibid. September, 1962.

Dubin, Gary V., and Anthony C. Gooch. Unilateral Action as a Legitimate Economic Weapon: Power Bargaining by the Employer upon Expiration of the Collective Bargaining Agreement. New York University Law Review. June, 1962.

Gellhorn, Walter, and Louis Lauer. Administration of the New York Workmen's Compensation Law. Part III. Ibid.

Gregory, Charles O. Enforcement of Collective Agreements by Arbitration. Virginia Law Review. June, 1962.

Handler, Milton. Some Unresolved Problems of Antitrust. Columbia Law Review. June, 1962.

Jacobs, Paul. Dead Horse and the Featherbed. Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, Santa Barbara, Calif. 1962.

Johnson, David B. The New Frontier Collective Bargaining Policy. Labor Law Journal. July, 1962.

Labor Arbitration—A Symposium. New York University Law Review. May, 1962.

Merger and Monopoly in Domestic Aviation. Columbia Law Review. May, 1962.

Miller, Arthur S., ed. The Ethics of Business Enterprise. [Symposium.] Annals. September, 1962.

Mueller, Stephen J. The Current Legal Status of Peaceful and Truthful Picketing. American Bar Association Journal. July, 1962.

Rothman, Stuart. The Development and Current Status of the Law Pertaining to Hiring Hall Arrangements. Virginia Law Review. June, 1962.

Suss, Fredric T. Small Business and Government Procurement, 1961. Mercer Law Review. Spring, 1962.

Symposium on Price Competition and Antitrust Policy. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1962.

Symposium on Securities Regulation. Part I. New York Law Forum. March, 1962. Part II. Ibid. May, 1962.

Van de Water, John R. Labor Law and National Defense. Labor Law Journal. August, 1962.

von Kalinowski, Julian O. Section 7 and Competitive Effects. Virginia Law Review. June, 1962.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Abato, Anthony A., Jr. The Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act—Its History, Operation, and Amendment. George Washington Law Review. April, 1962.

Burns, Eveline M. What's Wrong with Public Welfare? Social Service Review. June, 1962.

Cacciapaglia, Frank, Jr., and Howard B. Rockman. The Proposed Drug Industry Antitrust Act—Patents, Pricing, and the Public. George Washington Law Review. June, 1962.

Cohen, Elias S. An Aging Population and State Government. State Government. Summer, 1962.

D'Amours, Ernest R. State Supervision of Charities: Present Status. Ibid.

Fraese, Ronald W. Teacher-Employer Relations: An Annotated Bibliography. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of California, Los Angeles. 1962.

Hayes, John Cornelius. The Constitutional Permissibility of the Participation of Church-Related Schools in the Administration's Proposed Program of Massive Federal Aid to Education. DePaul Law Review. Summer, 1962.

Markel, Michael F. Federal Pre-emption [in Food and Drug Laws]. Food-Drug-Cosmetic Law Journal. August, 1962.

McKenna, William J. The Transportation of Private and Parochial School Children at Public Expense. Temple Law Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Problems of the Aging. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Winter, 1962.

Vail, David J. Administration of Mental Health Research in a State Program. State Government. Summer, 1962.

Webb, James E. Education and the National Space Program. Higher Education. July, 1962.

Military Affairs and National Security

Avins, Alfred. The Execution of Private Slovik and Punishment for Short Desertion. George Washington Law Review. June, 1962.

Fliess, Peter J. The Legality of Atmospheric Nuclear Tests. University of Florida Law Review. Summer, 1962.

McLaughlin, John J. Organization of the Air Force. Air University Quarterly Review. Spring, 1962.

Meadows, Martin. Eugene Hale and the American Navy. American Neptune. July, 1962.

New Hope for Disarmament. [Symposium.] Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. September, 1962.

Piel, Gerard. Can Our Economy Stand Disarmament? Atlantic. September, 1962.

Reis, John C., and Owen S. Nibley. Justice, Juries, and Military Dependents. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Rundell, Walter, Jr. Invasion Currency: A U. S. Army Fiscal Problem in World War II. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1962.

Russell, Kendall. Strategic Missiles and Basing Concepts. Air University Quarterly Review. Spring, 1962.

Schrader, George D. National Sovereignty in Space. Military Law Review. July, 1962.

Singer, J. David. Stable Deterrence and Its Limits. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1962.

Worsnop, Richard L. Peaceful Use of Outer Space. Editorial Research Reports. June 27, 1962.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Armed Services. Hearings before Special Subcommittee on Defense Agencies. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Military Reserve Posture Hearings. Also Report of Subcommittee No. 3 [Committee Print]. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Authority over the Trust Powers of National Banks and National Bank Branches. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Higher Interest Rates on Time Deposits of Foreign Governments. Hearings. Also House Report No. 2162. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. The Senior Citizens Housing Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2052. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1962. House Report No. 1961. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Education of Migrant Agricultural Employees and Their Children. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1962. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Purchase of United Nations Bonds. Hearings. Also House Report No. 2176. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. United States Contributions to International Organizations. House Doc. No. 460. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Administration of Grants by the National Institutes of Health. House Report No. 1958. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Defense Supply Agency. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Disposition of Reserved Minerals. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Withdrawal, Reservation, and Restriction of Public Lands. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Air Pollution. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2265. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Quality and Price Stabilization. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2352. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. SEC Reorganization. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Drug Industry Antitrust Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Sales and Use Taxes. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Review of Merchant Marine Policy, 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Confidentiality of Census Reports. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Duties of Census Enumerators and Advancing Economic Censuses. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Hazardous Duty Pay. Hearing. Also House Report No. 2269. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

- . Retirement Credit for Federal-State Service; Employee Organization Health Plans; Survivor's Annuities. Hearings. Also House Report No. 2295. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Revision of Major Federal Statutory Salary Systems. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Science and Astronautics. Amending the Organic Act of the National Bureau of Standards. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Limitation on Indirect Costs in Research Grants. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . National Science Foundation Briefing. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Qualifications for Astronauts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Un-American Activities. Communist Activities in the Cleveland, Ohio, Area. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Structure and Organization of the Communist Party of the United States. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Select Committee on Small Business. Advertising Opportunities for Small Business in Television and Radio. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1962.
- House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. AEC Regulatory Problems. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1677. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Indemnity and Reactor Safety. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Joint Economic Committee. Inventory Fluctuations and Economic Stabilization. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Measures of Productive Capacity. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- Senate. Committee on Armed Services. Authorizing the President to Order Units and Members in the Ready Reserve to Active Duty for Not More than 12 Months. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Inquiry into the Strategic and Critical Material Stockpiles of the United States. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Nonjudicial Punishment. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1911. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Banking and Currency. Construction Set-Aside Amendments. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Miscellaneous Bank Bills. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Truth in Lending—1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1962. Senate Report No. 1852. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Commerce. Control of Illegal Interstate Motor Carrier Transportation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Problems of the Softwood Lumber Industry. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Proposed Amendments to Federal Transportation Laws. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Quality Stabilization. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Finance. Trade Expansion Act of 1962. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Foreign Relations. Communications Satellite Act of 1962. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1873. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Government Operations. American Guild of Variety Artists. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Gold and Silver Production Incentives. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on the Judiciary. Conflicts of Interest. Hearing. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Congressional Representation for the District of Columbia. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Constitutional Rights of Military Personnel. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Drug Industry Act of 1962. Senate Report No. 1744. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . National Penitentiaries. Senate Report No. 1704. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Nomination of Thurgood Marshall. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Refusal of Certain Steel Companies to Respond to Subpenas Issued April 12, 1962. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.
- . Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Equal Pay Act of 1962. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Federal Assistance to General University Extension Education Programs. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Reform in Statutory Pay Provisions. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Committee on Public Works. Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1997. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Government Patent Policies in Meteorology and Weather Modification—1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Operations of Small Business Investment Companies. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

———. Small Business Failures. Hearings. 87th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1962.

Other Federal

Administrative Conference of the United States. Statistics Relating to Administrative Proceedings Conducted by Federal Agencies during Fiscal Year 1961. 1962.

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. Factors Affecting Voter Reactions to Governmental Reorganization in Metropolitan Areas. 1962.

Commission on Civil Rights. Housing in Washington. Hearings. 1962.

Department of the Army. Military Justice Evidence. Pamphlet 27-172. 1962.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. Property Tax Assessments in the United States. 1962.

———. Public School Systems in the United States, 1961-62. 1962.

———. Governments Division. Compendium of City Government Finances in 1961. 1962.

———. State Tax Collections in 1962. 1962.

———. Summary of City Government Finances in 1961. 1962.

———. Summary of Governmental Finances in 1961. 1962.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Social Security Administration. Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance. Annual Paid Man-Hours of Employment and Annual Wages, 1946-54. By David J. Farber. 1962.

Department of the Interior. Bureau of Land Management. Public Lands Bibliography. 1962.

Executive Office of the President. Bureau of the Budget. Progress in Measuring Work. 1962.

Housing and Home Finance Agency. Workable Program for Community Improvement. 1962.

Presidential Railroad Commission. Report [with separate appendices]. 1962.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

La IVe République et sa Politique Extérieure. By ALFRED GROSSER. (Librairie Armand Colin, Paris, 1961. Pp. 438.)

With the present publication Alfred Grosser, favorably known by his work on Germany, enters a field which is both important and not yet well charted. The 4th Republic and its Foreign Policy deals primarily with the domestic political factors influencing the making of foreign policy decisions. In the first of two parts of almost equal length he presents the network of official and unofficial institutions, groups, and persons contributing to the end products of French foreign policy. The second part narrates, in a chronological fashion, how the various decisions were arrived at in the most important issues facing the IVth Republic. To the great delight of his readers the author sticks to the pattern of his previous books: the work carries an immensely valuable bibliographie raisonnée, providing short but judicious characterisations of the labyrinth of source material in the field.

Among the countless insights provided in the first part of the book we find a subtle and well documented analysis of the manifold elements entering into the relations between foreign office personnel and politically responsible ministers. Grosser also elaborates upon the techniques tried by parliament to keep some influence on the shaping of foreign policy; he gives interesting explanations on how the impreciseness of coalition contracts constantly militate against the maintenance of effective parliamentary control. Very rarely has the influence of the French clergy's permissive-attitudes on the emergence of pluralistic political behavior patterns have been as clearly recognized as in the present study.

In the second part the reader will find a forceful elaboration of the tortuous course of decolonization and its foreign policy repercussions including the (by now) classic pattern of how the 1954 Indo-Chinese crisis situation led to Mendès France's temporary leadership. While the author shuns the elaboration of a formalised thesis about the relative importance of institutional, situational and personal factors, he leaves the reader in no doubt as to the varying effectiveness of Bidault, R. Schumann and Mendès-France in various phases of their careers.—O. H. KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University.

The States in West German Federalism: A Study in Federal-State Relations. By ROGER HEWES WELLS. (New York: Bookmann Associates, 1961. Pp. 148. $4.00.)

Professor Wells, whose earlier studies of German state and local government are well known, here presents within an institutional framework a short and pithy description of the functioning of German federalism. He builds not only on the studies he edited for the US High Commission, but on a good acquaintance with recent German and English-language literature and discussion. In touching on territorial organization, state elections and legislatures, Federal-Land relationships, Land administration and the Länder's role in cultural affairs, he covers quite a bit of ground, and hence he had little opportunity to develop subtle details or to add local color. But extremely ample references to relevant materials are given in thirty pages of notes, and the main text includes enough illustrative data and examples to enlighten, and not so much as to confuse. It is hence very suitable for assignment for students, even under-graduates, who will find it an excellent tool for developing a comparative perspective on American federalism.

There is little doubt that the Länder have been able to remain more significant centers of power than many observers had thought likely. Responsible for this development in recent years have been the decisions of the Constitutional Court (though the "Television" decision came down too late for its repercussions to be examined in this book), the SPD's interest in protecting its power position in the Land capitals, and the strong financial position of the Länder as against the Bund. The relative increase in the power position of the interest groups vis-a-vis the parties has probably also indirectly served to shore up the Länder's general bargaining position as against Bonn.

But how do the Land politicians and bureaucrats participate in the decision-making process on the Federal level, which to such a very great degree sets the framework for what can be done on the Land level. Mainly through the Bundesrat, suggests Professor Wells, and he claims that the Bundesrat "has become a more powerful second chamber than the constitutional fathers had envisioned." But only ten percent of West Germans know what the Bundesrat is, and a two-year public relations campaign over the radio failed to spread knowledge of its role. So the Bundesrat remains a sort of hydra-headed eminence, grise which exercises power and influence through administrative channels and the network of links between civil servants in Bonn and the Länder. But quite aside from the German voters, what do political scientists know about how the German administrative process really functions? Precious little, for books such as that of Professor Wells are able to build on few substantial investigations in this area. The German discussion has largely centered on the relationships between interest groups and civil servants, but very little attempt has been made to investigate the decision-making process within the administration. It is to be hoped that German political scientists, now that they are ensconced in some three dozen political science chairs, will feel sufficiently established to undertake some initiatives in this direction.—ARNOLD J. HEIDENHEIMER, University of Florida.

Democracy and the Cost of Politics in Britain. By WILLIAM B. GWYN. (London: The Athlone Press, 1962. Pp. 256. 35 s net.)

Winning consent to govern is the core of political democracy. The process operates at the crossroads where capitalism and popular government meet. The tangled networks of economic and political factors crisscross so closely it is difficult to isolate the separate threads into intricate patterns. Since political democracy evolved in Great Britain, a genetic study of the rise and growth of the interactions is very important. Professor Gwyn has here made a penetrating and illuminating investigation of the interrelation between wealth and politics in the development of the much admired British party system.

Politics, like sin, proliferates in an infinite variety of ways. The electoral franchise in England originated as a species of feudal property. Mr. Gwyn observes (Page 4): "During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, public office once achieved took on the aspect of private property, and at no time was the latter more hallowed." As property it could be bought and sold. It is little wonder that as capitalism evolved commercialism at first placed a price upon the vote as a kind of incorporeal legacy connected with the land. The great landowners who inherited their peerages exercised indirect ownership in the House of Commons. Elections to Parliament took on many of the characteristics of a pseudo-free market. Candidates paid the costs of holding elections, including the salaries of returning officers who took advantage of their monopoly to charge what the traffic would bear.

It sears democratic souls to read that the newly enfranchised voters under the Reform Act of 1832 (many of them fairly well-to-do middle class people) sold their new franchise at the highest possible price. The urge for participation in citizenship was less strong than the cash motive, or "treating," the civic incentive which came from the pubs at candidates' expense. Alcohol frequently incites enthusiasm but nowhere more effectively than in politics. It is comforting to know that the good citizens of Eastern Kentucky who corrupt political leadership by taking advantage of free enterprise competition to raise the price of votes on election day are following in the tradition of their Anglo-Saxon ancestors. The freshly emancipated and enfranchised ex-slaves in the South during and after Reconstruction who were willing to sell their votes for a consideration had ample precedent in England among the founders of representative government.

"Nursing a constituency" became an expensive pastime, more costly even than maintaining several mistresses, setting up a large stable of horses and hounds, or owning a yacht. In fact, the costs became so great that reform, in the shape of indirect governmental price control, was brought about by Tories joining Whigs to cut down the expense of this luxury. Gradually, as the state intervened, the legislature assumed the costs of holding elections and paid returning officers. As the electorate increased, and its processing became more costly, the state regulated competition by setting up expenditures limits for candidates and by providing that the better corporate managerial accounting techniques should apply. Each candidate had to have an agent who was responsible for keeping an account of the income and outgo. This was evidence of the existence of a new ethos, and the British wisely placed enforcement of the new rules in the hands of judges with independent tenure instead of leaving the decision to a partisan legislature. The national party organizations as such are free to spend without interference but must account for grants-in-aid to candidates.

Democracy and the Cost of Politics is an analytical and historical study little troubled by the statistics and graphs which are the stock in trade of current American publications. Probably more illumination of the electoral process has been produced here than could have been gotten from a larger display of what people say when questioned by interviewers.

A heartening note for believers in democracy is that electoral results have come to be more revealing of opinion and less a measure of candidates' expenditures. That a new ethic grew up—important for political science—is perhaps Gwyn's most significant finding, notwithstanding the view of some political scientists that ethics should be outlawed from the discipline as too "un-scientific." More studies in the twilight zone between politics and economics would contribute very valuable information to a viable political science, a discipline which is more than a pale collection of facts put together by electronics and financially underwritten by tax-evading foundations in the name of scholarship.

There is much in the Gwyn volume to confirm the findings of Graham Wallas a half-century ago, namely, that politics is cultural and not biological. Democracy must be learned, its processes acquired, not inherited. Gwyn's valuable study, adds greatly to our detailed knowledge of money and politics while at the same time throwing a revealing light upon the whole nature of government. In perspective, Democracy and the Costs of Politics in Britain illuminates the way toward a more effective democracy. The volume deserves serious attention.—JASPER B. SHANNON, The University of Nebraska.

The Role of The Military in Underdeveloped Countries. BY JOHN J. JOHNSON (ed.) (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1962.)

Several years ago, when the headlong rush into independence had not yet engulfed much of Asia and Africa, a number of nationalist leaders at a Mediterranean conference discussed the problems of training and equipping the armed forces in their countries. One observer listened patiently for some time and then put the question: "Why do these nations need armies, anyway?" After an awkward silence and an exchange of uncertain glances, one delegate responded with a rhetorical question of his own: "Why do gentlemen wear neckties?" His logic was compelling; just as the absence of a necktie might shed doubt on the social quality of the human male, the absence of an army would reflect on the claims to sovereign independence of the ex-colonial societies. In addition to serving as the badge of political virility, what is the role of the military establishment in the newly emerging societies of Asia, Africa, and Latin America? In the conference sponsored by the Rand Corporation, which led to this collection of essays, we get an excellent idea of that role.

As must all brief reviews of anthologies, this one will suffer seriously from incompleteness. Therefore, rather than attempt a superficial summary of the chapters, this reviewer will merely note them and then dwell at some length on the two more theoretical and general opening chapters, and then terminate with a note on methodology. There are three papers on Latin America: John Johnson, the volume's editor, examines the military as a politically competing group in that region; Edwin Lieuwen and Victor Alba each provide us with historically oriented papers, and in the process remind us how different is the role of the military in Latin America as contrasted to its role in Asia and Africa. Next, three papers focus on South Asia: Guy Pauker on Indonesia, Lucian

Pye on Burma, and David Wilson on Thailand. Then Manfred Halpern examines the behavior of Middle Eastern armies in general, while Ben Halpern looks at Israel in particular. The volume is closed by James S. Coleman and Belmont Brice in an appraisal of the military in Sub-Saharan Africa.

To this reviewer, the separate regional papers were a constant source of fascinating information and provocative ideas, and in that respect they fulfilled one of the major functions of such a symposium. Further, there is for no need for the standard reference to "uneven quality." As political, social, and historical essays, all were of excellent quality: coherent, organized, literary, and as far as discernible, accurate. Turning then to the more general papers, there are first the two prefatory essays on the general nature of political development, by sociologist Edward Shils and political scientist Lucian Pye.

The opening essay by Shils is a wide ranging and comprehensive tour de force, constituting a happy choice for the stage-setting role. Though more of a check list than a formal model, Shils' essay is by no means theoretically unsophisticated, and while almost devoid of hard empirical data, it is full of information. His emphasis is on the struggle for modernization and the role of the elites within the changing social structure. For Shils, modernization implies egalitarian democracy, representative government, technological progress, economic planning, efficient and honest administration, and perhaps most important, national autonomy and status in the international system. Modernization also implies Westernization without dependence upon, or subservience to, Western nations. If these are the characteristics of the society to be built, the society that now exists tends to be traditional, rigidly hierarchical, technologically backward, inefficiently and dishonestly administered, and often independent in name only.

Whether or not those who strive for modernity will prevail against the ancien régime depends, according to Shils, on closing the gap between the rich few and the poor masses, the educated and the uneducated, the city dweller and the villager, the cosmopolitan and the provincial—the gap between the ruler and the ruled. As civilian elites falter in closing that gap, the military will tend to move in and assume that function. Among the possible outcomes of the effort to close this gap, Shils sees six different political forms, ranging from bona fide to tutelary democracy through modernizing, traditional, or totalitarian civil oligarchies, to modernizing military oligarchies. As to the assets and liabilities of each form, Shils offers a number of cogent and telling epigrams, and concludes that the totalitarian oligarchy would have the best chance of remaining in power once there, but that some form of tutelary democracy "offers a more realistic settlement with the slowly tractable realities. . . ."

Just as Shils is markedly influenced by his familiarity with (one might even say affection for) the Indian post-independence élites, Lucian Pye in the second general paper reflects his special concern with Southeast Asia in general and Burma in particular. As a student of comparative politics, however, he carries us further into our discussion of the military's role than does the opening paper. Pye begins by reminding us that the prevailing prediction, until quite recently, was that "the future of the newly emergent states would be determined largely by the activities of their Westernized intellectuals, their socialistically inclined bureaucrats, their nationalist ruling parties, and possibly their menacing Communist parties." The key role of the military was largely unanticipated.

Pye seems to feel that certain shortcomings in traditional Western thought account not only for our failure to anticipate this role, but for our attitude toward military regimes per se. Among these shortcomings, two come in for critical comment. First, we have—in contrast to Communist theoreticians—no appropriate doctrine which, "in lieu of tested knowledge," indicate the socio-political requirements for the transition from traditional and authoritarian to democratic and representative society. This leads to an overemphasis on the utopian goal rather than the complex process, producing in turn a premature and unjustified sense of failure on the part of the would-be modernizers. Secondly, Pye observes that we are essentially Sumnerians (my phrase) and hence prone to view political institutions (stateways) primarily as the consequence of social forces (folkways) rather than as levers by which fundamental societal change may be brought about. This model, he argues, is inappropriate for nations whose "indigenous values" have been far less instrumental than externally-imposed institutions in the shaping of their society.

He then turns to two central queries: (a) what are the major characteristics of armies in the underdeveloped countries? and (b) what is their modernizing role? As to the first, Pye concludes that these armies are not organized or staffed to wage war, and that their officers and men are even further apart than in most military organizations. On the other hand, they do reflect the tendency of all armies to apply international and non-parochial standards to their own societies, they are "relatively immune to pragmatic tests of efficiency on a day-to-day basis." Because of their remoteness from their societies they tend to minimize its central problems and assume that these can be overcome "if the right orders are given." The army's modernizing role, the author emphasizes, depends upon the degree to which it provides an acculturation process for its recruits which is very different than that experienced by the civilian villager. Not only does the process enhance the psychic and material security of the inductee, and provide for social mobility, but it provides considerable training in both technology and citizenship; all of these are seen as assets. The chapter concludes with a very relevant warning against stereotyping the military. On the one hand, we must recognize that military aid may well be indirect economic aid, and on the other we had better be careful not to assume that military rule is any guarantee of either political stability or resistance to the internal or external Communist threat.

Having praised both the introductory and the detailed papers, I must register a serious reservation. First, Hans Speier's preface might have led one to expect a "serious and sustained effort to study the role of the military in the underdeveloped countries on a comparative basis." This study is comparative in only the most casual sense of the word. Secondly, and in the same vein, my appraisal of the papers—because it is essentially personal and intuitive—may be readily challenged by another reader, and there will be no way to decide the issue. This is the price we pay as long as our data are anecdotal, our selection and classification implicit, and our theory invisible.

In other words, until political science and history "go operational" (as have much of sociology, psychology and economics) there will be no visible and objective criteria by which our research may be evaluated. Admittedly, the early stages of operationalization in any given field are painful, awkward and only partially productive. But without it, we will never get any empirical generalizations which are susceptible to disproof, and in the absence of such data-based propositions, our "theories" will remain merely models. Given the talent that went into this symposium, and the fascination—not to mention the importance—of its subject matter, it is too bad that all we have to show for it is a collection of first-class essays.—J. DAVID SINGER, Mental Health Research Institute, University of Michigan.

Genocide in Satellite Croatia, 1941–1945. By EDMOND PARIS. (Chicago, American Institute for Balkan Affairs, 1961. Pp. 306. Price $5.00.)

Between Nazi Germany's conquest of Yugoslavia, in April, 1941, and the end of the war more than 700,000 men, women and children were massacred in one area of the partitioned land, Axis-sponsored "Independent State of Croatia." They were killed by their Croat countrymen in the cause of a Croatian nationalism which demanded racial and religious uniformity in the new state. Croatian death-squads also murdered about 60,000 Jews and 20,000 Gypsies; the ratio of victims to the total population of "Independent Croatia" makes this perhaps the worst example of genocide in the Second World War.

The post-war establishment of a unified Yugoslavia, dominated by its Serbian plurality, threw the Croat nationalists, who had hoped for a state of their own, into opposition. This opposition found expression in an underground organization of "Ustashi" (Rebels), headed by Ante Pavelich and patronized by Fascist Italy and Hungary. The complicity of Pavelich and the Ustashi in the assassination of King Alexander of Yugoslavia at Marseilles, in 1934, was established by a French court; Pavelich was sentenced to death in absentia after Mussolini refused a request for his extradition to France. On the day that Hitler attacked Yugoslavia, Pavelich broadcast to Croatia: "Croatian soldiers, take up arms against the Serbian officers and soldiers! From now on we shall fight side by side with our new allies, the Germans and Italians." A week later he entered Zagreb with an escort of Italian tanks. After Yugoslavia's surrender the country was partitioned by the Axis powers and on Easter Day, in Zagreb Cathedral, the Roman Catholic Archbishop Stepinac proclaimed the "Independent State of Croatia" with Pavelich as its "Poglavnik" (Führer). The Pavelich government declared war on Hitler's enemies. The Poglavnik himself appeared with Mussolini before cheering crowds and was received in private audience by Pius XII; a papal representative in Zagreb was treated as dean of the diplomatic corps; Stepinac sat in the Croatian Diet as one of eleven representatives of the Roman Catholic Church in Croatia and was later appointed "Head of Military Chaplains" sine titulo to the Ustashi army.

Soon the massacres began, perpetrated by the Ustashi with the collaboration of certain Franciscan priests and monks. The intentions of the regime were clarified by the Minister of Education: "We shall kill one part of the Serbs, we shall transport another, and the rest of them will be forced to embrace the Roman Catholic religion." Fascist Croatia extended the policy of genocide to the Croatian Jews; the journal Katolicki Tyednik declared on June 15, 1941, that "the Serbs are the greatest enemies of the Croats, while the Jews and Masons are the greatest enemies of all Europe." During the four years of Axis Croatia about 240,000 Serbs were "converted," whole villages at a time. The Serb who clung to his Orthodoxy had to wear an armband like the Jew; the latter, being "non-Aryan," was not allowed to save himself by conversion. The Orthodox cathedral at Bihach was dynamited; about 300 Serbian churches were destroyed. On October 31, 1943, Stepinac stated: "the [Roman Catholic] Church does not agree with the injustices committed against the Jews and the Serbs"; he added that "we cannot be responsible for some of the dare-devil fanatics in the ecclesiastical ranks." After the war a Yugoslav Communist court found Stepinac guilty of treason and responsibility for the massacres and forced conversions. Sentenced to sixteen years imprisonment, he served five. The Vatican promoted him to Cardinal.

As Nazi Germany collapsed, its Croatian allies ran for their lives. Pavelich, after being caught by the British and released under obscure circumstances, fled to Rome disguised as a priest; he then moved to Argentina and ultimately to Spain, where he died in 1959, having received the personal benediction of John XXIII. Pavelich's Minister of the Interior escaped to Los Angeles, via Switzerland and Ireland; his name cropped up at the trial of Adolf Eichmann when a witness testified it was "common knowledge" that the official had carried out "anti-Jewish measures on orders from Germany"; his extradition to Yugoslavia was refused by the United States. Former Ustashi officials and sympathizers have organized many propaganda centers in the United States and elsewhere which appear to enjoy lavish financial support. They continue to preach hatred of the Serbs and Yugoslavia; completely distorting the history of Pavelich's Croatia, they portray it as a crusade for independence and against Communism.

This tragic story is thoroughly supported by source material drawn largely from Ustasha and clerical publications appearing during the four years of the "Independent State of Croatia," and by a large bibliography in numerous languages. An appendix lists the names of 171 Serbian Orthodox priests and 47 rabbis who were murdered by the Ustashi; a collection of photographs shows the Ustashi leaders, their Nazi-Fascist allies, and their victims. The author of this book, a French anti-clerical, writes with sympathy and anger; the translation is often awkward and sometimes ungrammatical, while Serbo-Croatian words are neither transliterated nor supplied with diacritical marks. These flaws do not detract from a stark portrayal of what can happen when nationalist ferocity and religious intolerance conclude an unholy alliance.—JOHN CLINTON ADAMS, Dartmouth College.

The British Parliament. By ROLAND YOUNG. (London: Faber and Faber, 1962. Pp. 259. $4.20.)

A new book on parliament has been needed for some time as Sir Ivor Jennings' classic work Parliament (1939) has become outmoded. Studies of such special aspects as question time, private bill procedure, delegated legislation, the role of the House of Lords, control of public expenditure, and detailed accounts of the passage of individual items of legislation have appeared in recent years and would help to provide the background. Professor Young is to be congratulated on attempting a new synthesis, but the result is disappointing.

It is not quite clear what this book is trying to do. It might have simply set out to describe parliament, and it does contain long accounts of personalities and debates. For most students of politics the key questions are evident. How much power does parliament exercise over the government? What other functions does it perform? And how is power distributed within parliament? Professor Young touches on these points without making a resolute attempt to answer any of them and his conclusions are blurred into mere suggestions by a constant use of the conditional "it can be said that" or "it might be argued that. . . ."

The general impression left is of an over-emphasis on the importance of parliament but the imprecision of the book has the same effect on any attempt at assessment. For instance it asserts that "parliament is sovereign in the sense that if its consent is required and there is a conflict of wills, the will of Parliament prevails. Parliament has the final word." Legally this is true but how often in the last fifty years has there been a "conflict of wills"? And how far can Parliament be said to have a will of its own apart from that of the Government? There is, for instance, no attempt to draw a distinction between the influence of government and of opposition back-benchers. Professor Young says the opposition can insist "on accountability and full discussion" but as his own later examples show, the government often flatly refuses to disclose or discuss large areas of defence, foreign and colonial policy. The reader is told that "some Conservative members have remarked that since the development of the committee system there has been a trend towards debating and deciding controversial matters within the confines of the party and off the floor of Parliament." Yet is hard to reconcile this statement with one six pages later that "the great political drama is unfolded on the floor of parliament. This is where the game is played." As an example of Commons' control over legislation the Bill to Repeal Restrictions on the Use of Cars in Elections (1958) is chosen but it is not in any way typical. The point at issue was small, understood by every M. P., and the object of intense partisan passion. A more accurate picture would have been derived by studying one of the highly complex bills involving many changes in administrative practice where only a handful of members even understand the provisions. On the power of the purse Professor Young says "we would miss the main impact of parliamentary control if we limited our observations to the formal procedures only" but there is no account of any informal methods whereby MPs might control taxation or expenditure.

It is a pity that an American study of parliament does not employ any of the techniques that have only recently begun to be imported into the U.K. One would like to have a systematic survey of the reasons for the withdrawal of many able MPs from parliament, and for the decline in the prestige of politics as a profession—which makes it so difficult to offer MPs anything like a reasonable salary. Too little is known about attitudes to parliament though the decline in reports of debates (almost a cessation in the case of the popular press) is a pointer. It is becoming accepted in Britain that Parliament is no longer the forum of the nation but why and how this has happened still requires investigation.—JOHN P. MAC-KINTOSH, University College, Ibadan, Nigeria.

South Africa 1906-1961: The Price of Magnanimity. By NICHOLAS MANSERGH. (New York: Praeger, 1962. Pp. 104. $3.50.)

"Radicalism was a more potent force than humanitarianism in early twentieth century liberalism," writes History Professor Mansergh (Cambridge) in this analysis of the establishment of the Union of South Africa. "... It is not the English way to govern white men as a subject race ..." said Liberal Prime Minister Campbell-Bannerman during the Boer War, and more than anyone he was responsible for the evolution of a united South Africa. The unification of the two defeated republics and two British colonies in 1910 was an act of generosity toward the vanquished Boers.

In some ways, the title of this slim volume is misleading, for it concentrates heavily upon the period 1906 until 1910, while there are frequent references to the period between 1899 and 1905 as well as the years of Union in South Africa. The author deals with two major topics: first, what considerations led to the South Africa Act, and second, the effects of this magnanimous gesture upon the well-being of the non-white and English-speaking sectors of the South African population, sectors that later came to be ruled by a fanatically supremacist Afrikaner nationalist minority. Both subjects are covered extremely well, the first perhaps somewhat more effectively than the second.

Professor Mansergh writes objectively, fairly and in an impeccably scholarly fashion about issues which all too often become shrouded in emotionalism. Tracing the decision-making processes that led to the South Africa Act, he shows that Liberal policy was neither one of blind and sudden impulse nor one without precedent. Quoting extensively and absorbingly from correspondence files, the Colonial Office Records and the Public Record Office, he proves that Union in South Africa was carefully considered, and that the price to be paid was forecast by several eminent critics (Milner, Schreiner, Graham and others).

In considering the price of Liberal generosity to non-Afrikaner South Africans, the author faced difficult obstacles. It is easy, for instance, to create the impression that in pre-Union days (as well as during Union) the English-speaking resident of South Africa was the real liberal, with the interests of the non-white at heart. Professor Mansergh reminds the reader that the decision not to adopt the Cape native franchise throughout united South Africa was arrived at by English-speaking as well as Afrikaner whites. To quote Botha: "... a great number of people in the Transvaal, English as well as Dutch, are quite prepared to wreck the Union on this question. ..." On these and other, similar matters, the author proves his intimate knowledge of South African affairs while avoiding all bias in his writing. In dealing with so vast a subject as the woes of South Africa, there is obviously a need for selectivity, and the author appears to assume some knowledge on the part of the reader of the nature of apartheid and its architects. Throughout, the work retains its high-level, academically sound approach.

South Africa 1906-1961: The Price of Magnanimity is an important contribution, which will retain its value long after the current storm of writing on Africa has abated—and has been largely forgotten.—HARM JAN DE BLIJ, Michigan State University.

Portugal's Stand in Africa. By ADRIANO MOREIRA. (New York: University Publishers. 265 pp. $3.95.)

Portugal is in deep trouble in Africa. Nationalists of Portuguese Guinea, Angola, and Moçambique have established headquarters at Conakry, Leopoldville, and Dar es Salaam to pursue their common goal of freedom from Portuguese rule. Border incidents in Portuguese Guinea and the uprising in northern Angola are visible evidences of this resistance.

Portugal's Stand in Africa is an attempt of the Salazar regime to defend her position in these countries. The book is a collection of eleven addresses delivered in the years from 1958 to 1961 by Adriano Moreira, a lawyer, professor of law at the Lisbon Center for Political and Social Studies, and since 1961, Portugal's Overseas Minister. All of the addresses were delivered in Portugal and cover a wide range of subjects, from a report on the conferences at Bandung and Cairo to a treatise on Portugal's contribution to the progress of man in its overseas regions. The book also contains a preface addressed to the American people and the text of three decrees of 1961: the repeal of the Native Statute in Portuguese Africa; the decree setting up Provincial Settlement Boards to aid in the European colonization program for Angola and Moçambique; and the decree to review existing legislation to give a new impulse to create municipal institutions in Portugal's African empire.

In the addresses the author attacks the neutralist ideology of the Afro-Asian group, laments the ignorance of her western allies of the basic issues involved in Africa, defends her policy of cultural assimilation, and confirms the mission of Portugal in Africa from the days of Vasco da Gama to the present. Throughout the addresses one dominant theme prevails: the distinctiveness of the Portuguese way of life, the fundamental code of which is the equality of the human race. Applying this principle to Africa, Mr. Moreira states that "between the North of Africa, which discriminates against the white man, and the South, which discriminates against the black man, the Portuguese way of life assures a zone in which prevail the universal values from which all benefit and to which many may eventually have to resort in order to remedy the errors which are presently accumulating."

Unfortunately, the history of Angola and Moçambique give very little substance to Mr. Moreira's exposition of Portugal's philosophic, political and juridical doctrines of peaceful assimilation in her overseas colonies. Portuguese occupation of her African territories was violent, evidenced by the Angolan wars of the Dembos in the north, Bailundu in the central area, and Cuamato in the south. Moreover the parent-child relationship inherent in the Portuguese colonial policy makes a mockery of its pronouncements regarding the equality of all races. Under this concept, equality is applied within a fraternal relationship between the master and all of his dependents, the Portuguese assuming the role of the master. As long as Mr. Moreira and his government hold to the position that "our politics of today are the politics of yesterday," there will be continued resistance against Portuguese rule in Angola, Moçambique, Portuguese Guinea, and the Islands of Cape Verde, São Tomé, and Príncipe.—THOMAS OKUMA, Boston University.

Africa South. By HARM J. DE BLIJ. (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1962. Pp. vii, 399. $5.95.)

Africa South can be recommended highly to the general reader. Professor de Blij's purpose to provide the basic social and economic data as well as historical background for understanding those political entities under substantial white rule has been fulfilled. A major portion of this book is devoted to the Republic of South Africa; however, the descriptions of Bechuanaland, Swaziland, Basutoland, Angola and Moçambique are also of high quality, and only a slight reservation is noted below regarding the treatment of the Central African Federation.

The "Wind of Change," as Prime Minister Macmillan called the urge to African independence, provides the theme of this book. During the ten years that geographer de Blij lived in South Africa he taught, worked for a newspaper, participated in civic organizations, and became acquainted with all shades of African opinion and life. He explains that his expectation of tragedy will not be agreeable to many of his acquaintances. He emphasizes the importance to the Republic of continued white domination of the buffer dependencies under Portuguese and British control; however, even the lack of rigidity of the assimilation and partnership policies are viewed as threats to apartheid, not to speak of the growing African nationalism beginning to bear fruit in the High Commission Territories. Apartheid also faces grave domestic economic and political obstacles; apparently, the Africaner is not willing to pay the price for carrying through this policy. On the other hand, the author warns that the ability of the political leaders of the Republic should not be underestimated.

Specialists may find controversial de Blij's judgment on the assimilation policy, that "Portuguese Africa can present a semblance of real harmony, progress, and good will." However, this view is very much qualified. "Portugal's African provinces have one or two show cases . . . but they are rare instances in an ocean of isolation and deprivation." The discussion of the Central African Federation can be criticized because it underemphasizes the role of Christians and missions, especially in Nyasaland. Not only have missions been important in developments here, but church groups in Britain have helped prevent this white dominated federation from becoming independent.

The author is to be commended for his short and useful bibliographies following each chapter, for his helpful maps, and for his beautiful descriptions of the land and the people who live on it. This is the best general treatment of this area presently available.—RICHARD W. TAYLOR, Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research. By SIR HARRY MELVILLE. (London:

George Allen & Unwin, Ltd.; New York: Oxford University Press, Inc., 1962. Pp. 200. $4.00.)

Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. BY SIR JAMES CROMBIE. (London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd.; New York: Oxford University Press, Inc., 1962. Pp. 224. $4.80.)

These are the latest volumes in the New Whitehall Series published under the auspices of the Royal Institute of Public Administration. The stated purpose of this series is to provide authoritative descriptions of the present work of the major departments of British central government. Among the eight volumes previously published are those on the Home Office, the Foreign Office, and the Colonial Office. Four volumes now in preparation include those on the Treasury and the Ministry of Agriculture.

Modern Swedish government. BY NILE ANDRÉN. (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1961. Pp. 252. Sw.kr. 19.50.)

The aim is to present a comprehensive introduction to modern Swedish government, mainly on the national level. The Swedish Constitution of 1809, which sets the pattern, is the oldest European constitution still in force. The author has had ten years experience in teaching Swedish government at the International Graduate School for English Speaking Students at the University of Stockholm. The work has been published with a grant from the Swedish Council for Social Science Research.—J. B. C.

Wir sind die stärkste der Partei'N! Eine Bibliographie zum 15. Jahrestag der Gründung der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Deutschlands. BY THE INSTITUT FÜR MARXISMUS-LENINISMUS BEIM ZK DER SED. (Leipzig, Verlag für Buch und Bibliothekswesen, 1961. Pp. 67.)

The annotated and classified bibliography of some three hundred titles was prepared for the 15th anniversary of the SED by that party's chief scientific institute. The selection is of course limited to publications which have appeared in German in the German Democratic Republic. Most of the publications included appeared through the Dietz Verlag in Berlin. There are some references to periodicals and newspapers. Understanding and analysis of the material collected here might furnish a key to the present party development in the DDR, and the aims it is trying to hammer home on that jurisdiction in the present unsettled world.—J. B. C.

European elections by direct suffrage, a comparative study of the electoral systems used in Western Europe and their utility for the direct election of a European parliament. BY WOLFGANG BIRKE. (Leyden: A. W. Sythoff, 1961. Pp. 124. European aspects, series C. Studies on politics, no. 5.)

The study was prepared at the College of Europe at Bruges under a grant from the Council of Europe at Strassbourg to assist in the consideration and determination of a uniform electoral system for the common European Assembly. It contains a brief treatment of the electoral system of each of the countries as well as a comparison of the different features. There is a draft of articles for a European electoral law.—J. B. C.

Senegal, A Study in French Assimilation Policy. BY MICHAEL CROWDER. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. x, 104. $1.25.)

The author, editor of Nigeria magazine, has presented an excellent case study of the growth, application, and consequences of one aspect of French colonial policy. He traces the idea and practice of assimilation in Senegal from its earliest manifestations at the turn of the nineteenth century to Senegal's independence in 1960; his study concludes with an examination of the impact of assimilationist doctrine on contemporary Senegalese politics and policies. Mr. Crowder is also the author of The Story of Nigeria, London: Faber, 1962, probably the first comprehensive history of Nigeria.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

HIRAM M. STOUT

The George Washington University

General

Avakumovic, Ivan. World Communism in Figures. International Journal. Spring, 1962.

Avineri, Shlomo. Afro-Asia and the Western Political Tradition. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1962-62.

Baly, Denis. The Sanction of Religion in the New Societies. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1962.

Long, Erven J. Agriculture and Political Destiny. Foreign Agriculture. August, 1962.

Bivkin, Arnold. The Politics of Nation-Building: Problems and Preconditions. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1962.

Sondermann, Fred A. Political Implications of Population Growth in Underdeveloped Countries. Colorado College Studies. No. 5, Fall, 1961.

United Kingdom and Commonwealth

Banwell, Sir Harold. The Different British Basis. European Review. July-August, 1962.

Bonham, John. The Middle Class Revolt. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Cowie, H. T. Liberalism's New Deal. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Epstein, Leon D. Who Makes Party Policy: British Labour, 1960-61. Midwest Journal of Political Science. May, 1962.

Goldblatt, David. Beyond Orpington—Hysteria Toryensis. Contemporary Review. May, 1962.

Harman, Nicholas. Minor Political Parties in Britain. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Hindell, Keith and Williams, Philip. Scarborough and Blackpool: An Analysis of Some Votes of the Labour Party Conferences of 1960 and 1961. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Holmes, John. The Impact on the Commonwealth of the Emergence of Africa. International Organization. Spring, 1962.

Lewis, Paul. Party System in the "New Commonwealth." New Commonwealth, June, 1962.

Liberal Revival: A New Trend in Great Britain. Round Table. June, 1962.

Marquand, David. The Liberal Revival. Encounter. July, 1962.

Monroe, Ann D. The British Dilemma: Commonwealth or Common Market? Current History. July, 1962.

New Vintage Liberalism. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Opposition Parties and Policies. Notes on Current Politics. No. 14, July 9, 1962.

Pear, Richard H. The Liberal Vote. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Sainsbury, Keith. The Constitution—Some Disputed Points. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Shaw, Malcolm. An American Looks at the Party Conferences. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Shearman, Hugh. Northern Ireland; Its People, Resources, History, and Government. rev. ed. Belfast, H. M. S.O., 1962.

Soskice, Frank. Rome Treaty's Impact on Law and Sovereignty. European Review. July-August, 1962.

The Government Crisis. The Economist. July 21, 1962.

Waller, Ian. Pressure Politics. Encounter. August, 1962.

Western Europe

Anghelatos, A. G. Greece: Political and Economic Developments 1944-1962. British Survey. June, 1962.

Aron, Raymond. The General and the Tragedy. Encounter. August, 1962.

Atlantic Report on Rome. Atlantic Monthly. September, 1962.

Barzini, Luigi. The Difference in the South. Encounter. June, 1962.

Brutto, Frank. In Italy: The Word is Complicated. Journalism Review. Spring, 1962.

Converse, Philip E. and Dupeux, Georges. Politicization of the Electorate in France and the United States. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1962.

Crane, Wilder, Jr. The Errand-Running Function of Austrian Legislators. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Doob, Leonard W. South Tyrol: An Introduction to the Psychological Syndrome of Nationalism. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1962.

Feld, Werner. The German Administrative Courts. Tulane Law Review. April, 1962.

Girbau-León, Vincente. General Franco's Opponents. World Today. August, 1962.

Graff, Donald F. In Austria: The Press Walks a Tightrope. Journalism Review, Spring, 1962.

Ireland: Requiem for Sinn Féin. The Round Table. June, 1962.

Les Domaines respectifs de la Loi et du Règlement d'après la Constitution de 1958; Essai d'établissement d'un Bilan de la Pratique suivie depuis trois ans. Paris, Documentation Française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2908).

Lichtheim, George. West Germany Today. Commentary. July, 1962.

Miller, Robert W. Recent Efforts Toward Legal Regulation of Political Parties in Western Germany. Papers of the Michigan Academy of Science, Arts, and Letters. Vol. XLVII, 1962.

Pedersen, A. E., Jr. Kekkonen and the Finnish Press. Journalism Review. Spring, 1962.

Pinney, Edward L. Latent and Manifest Bureaucracy in the West German Parliament: The Case of the Bundesrat. Midwest Journal of Political Science. May, 1962.

Presidency of the Council of Ministers Information Service. Italian Affairs, January-February, 1962.

The Referendums in France Since World War II. Ambassade U. S. Service de Presse et d'Information. New York, 1962. (French Affairs No. 135).

Welles, Benjamin. Salazar in Trouble. Atlantic Monthly. August, 1962.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Bromke, Adam. Nationalism and Communism in Poland. Foreign Affairs. July, 1962.

Kastrati, Qazim E. Liberalism Behind the Iron Curtain. Contemporary Review. July, 1962.

Kind, Christian. Rumania Today. Swiss Review of World Affairs. July, 1962.

Pierre, André. Le nouveau Soviet suprême de l'U.R.S.S. Revue de défense nationale. May, 1962.

Reform of Civil Law in Hungary, Poland, and the Soviet Union. American Journal of Comparative Law. Summer, 1961.

Some Aspects of the Social-psychological and Political Climate in Poland; an Attitude Survey. Audience Research Section, Radio Free Europe. Munich, 1961.

Szczepanski, Jan. The Polish Intelligentsia: Past and Present. World Politics. April, 1962.

Middle East and Arab North Africa

Aries. The Sudan and Democracy. African Affairs. July, 1962.

Binder, Leonard. The Cabinet of Iran: a Case Study in Institutional Adaptation. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1962.

Constitution de la République Turque (9 juillet 1961). Paris, Documentation Française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2900).

Furlonge, Geoffrey. The Lebanon. Quarterly Review. July, 1962.

Giritli, Ismet. Some aspects of the New Turkish Constitution. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1962.

Hahn, Lorna. Tunisia: Pragmatism and Progress. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1962.

Horton, Alan W. The Central Social and Political Problem of the UAR. Part III: The Search for Popular Support. New York, American Universities Field Staff, 1962. (American Universities Field Staff. Reports service. Northeast Africa Series, v. 9, No. 4, United Arab Republic).

Horton, Alan W. The Charter for National Action of the UAR. New York, American Universities Field Staff, 1962. (American Universities Field Staff Reports Service. Northeast Africa Series, V. 9, No. 5, United Arab Republic).

Kapani, Münici. Outlines of the new Turkish Constitution. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1961-62.

Karpat, Kemal H. Recent Political Developments in Turkey and their Social Background. International Affairs. July, 1962.

Kelly, George A. Prospects of an Algerian Algeria. Orbis. Summer, 1962.

Le Maroc en 1962. Paris, Documentation Française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2907).

L'Iraq. Paris, Documentation Française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2896).

Moore, Clement Henry. The Neo-Destour Party of Tunisia; a Structure for Democracy? World Politics. April, 1962.

Salem, Elie. Emerging Government in the Arab World. Orbis. Spring, 1962.

Siegmán, Henry. Arab Unity and Disunity. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1962.

The Shah's Proclamation on Reform. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1962.

Africa

Amme, Carl H. Political Trends in Former French Territories of Black Africa. U. S. Naval Institute Proceedings. August, 1962.

Ardenner, Edwin. The Political History of Cameroon. World Today. August, 1962.

Ballinger, Margaret. The Outlook for the South African Republic. International Affairs. July, 1962.

Bascom, William R. Tribalism, Nationalism, and Pan-Africanism. The Annals. July, 1962.

Bull, Theodore. Politics and Power in the Rhodesias. World Today. July, 1962.

Emerson, Rupert. Pan-Africanism. International Organization. Spring, 1962.

Halberstam, David. Mystery—and Tragedy—of Tshombe. New York Times Magazine. August 12, 1962.

Heerden, W. Van. Why Bantu States? Optima. June, 1962.

La Constitution de la Fédération du Nigéria (1er Octobre 1960). Paris, Documentation Française, 1962. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2891).

Latham-Koenig, A. L. Ruanda-Urundi on the Threshold of Independence. World Today. July, 1962.

Leys, Colin. Tanganyika: The Realities of Independence. International Journal. Summer, 1962.

Lowenkopf, Martin. Uganda: Prelude to Independence. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1961-62.

Milcent, Ernest, and Meisler, Stanley. Two Views of Senegal. Africa Report. August, 1962.

Nigeria Works it Out. The Economist. July 7, 1962.

Nigeria's Quietness is her Strength. New Commonwealth. June, 1962.

Report of the Kenya Constitutional Conference, 1962. London, H.M.S.O., 1962. Cmd. 1700.

Report of the Zanzibar Constitutional Conference Held in London, March and April, 1962. London, H.M.S.O., 1962. Cmd. 1699.

Robertson, Sir James. Notes on the Viability of Emerging African States. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2, 1962.

Sheehan, Edward R. F. East Africa. . . . The Birth Pangs of Independence. Harper's Magazine. September, 1962.

Spence, J. E. The Political Implications of the Bantustan Policy. Race. May, 1962.

Tatz, C. M. Dr. Verwoerd's "Bantustan" Policy. Australian Journal of Politics and History. May, 1962.

Tribe and Nation in East Africa. The Round Table. June, 1962.

Udochi, Julius Momo. The Conflict Involving Communism in Mid-Africa. The Annals. July, 1962.

Uganda. British Information Services. New York, 1962.

United States Information Agency Library Resources on Africa; an annotated selection of 400 books from the Agency Library's holdings on Africa, indexed according to region and country and coded as to principal subjects, together with a description of newspapers, periodicals, and documentary and other materials available in or through the Agency Library, compiled and edited by Joseph L. Dees. Washington, 1962.

Williams, G. Mennen. Aids and Obstacles to Political Stability in Mid-Africa. The Annals. July, 1962.

South and Southeast Africa

A Constitution for Pakistan. The Round Table. June, 1962.

Banerji, S. C. Burma: Coup and Aftermath. Far Eastern Economic Review. April 12, 1962.

Bernheim, Roger. Pakistan in Transition. Swiss Review of World Affairs. July, 1962.

Chaudhury, N. C. B. Ray. India's Third General Election. Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Crozier, Brian. Indonesia: Retrospect and Prospect. World Today. July, 1962.

Dupree, Louis. The "Good" Dictator: President Field Marshal Mohammad Ayub Khan of Pakistan. New York, American Universities Field Staff, 1962. (American Universities Field Staff. Reports Service. South Asia Series, V. 6, No. 4, Pakistan).

Fitzgerald, C. P. Overseas Chinese in South East Asia. Australian Journal of Politics and History. May, 1962.

Floris, George A. India After the Elections. Contemporary Review. May, 1962.

Friedrich, Paul. Language and Politics in India. Daedalus. Summer, 1962.

Gangal, S. C. An Approach to Indian Federalism. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Ginsburgs, George. Local Government and Administration in North Vietnam, 1945-1954. China Quarterly. April-June, 1962.

Grandchamp, René. Les elections de l'avenir de l'Inde. Revue de Défense Nationale. May, 1962.

Hammer, Ellen J. South Viet Nam: The Limits of Political Action. Pacific Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Johnstone, William C. The Appeals of Communism in Asia. The Annals. July, 1962.

Leifer, Michael. The Cambodian Opposition. Asian Survey. April, 1962.

Newman, K. J. The Constitutional Evolution of Pakistan. International Affairs. July, 1962.

Pauker, Guy J. Political Doctrines and Practical Politics in Southeast Asia. Pacific Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Pylee, M. V. Free Speech and Parliamentary Privileges in India. Pacific Affairs. Spring, 1962.

Rolnick, Phyllis J. Charity, Trusteeship, and Social Change in India; a Study of a Political Ideology. World Politics. April, 1962.

Rossiter, Clinton. The Paradox of India's Democracy. New York Times Magazine. June 3, 1962.

Rothermund, Dietmar. Constitutional Reforms Versus National Agitation in India, 1900-1950. Journal of Asian Studies. August, 1962.

Sheridan, L. A. Equal Opportunity of Public Employment (Non-discrimination in Public Services in India). The International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1962.

Signal, D. P. Nationalism and Communism in South-East Asia. Journal of Southeast Asian History. March, 1962.

Weiner, Myron. India's Third General Elections. Asian Survey. May, 1962.

Weiner, Myron. The Struggle for Equality in India. Foreign Affairs. July, 1962.

Welty, Paul S. Islam and the Constitution of Pakistan. World Affairs. Summer, 1962.

Far East

Bibliography of Korean Studies; a bibliographical guide to Korean publications on Korean studies appearing from 1945 to 1958. Seoul, Asiatic Research Center, Korea University, 1961.

Buxbaum, David C. Preliminary Trends in the Development of the Legal Institutions of Communist China and the Nature of the Criminal Law. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1962.

Focus on Japan. Intercom. July, 1962.

Hucker, Charles O. China; a Critical Bibliography. Tuscon, University of Arizona Press, 1962.

Ishida, Takeshi. Popular Attitudes Toward the Japanese Emperor. Asian Survey. April, 1962.

Jan, George P. Minor Parties in Communist China. Current History. September, 1962.

Langer, Paul F. The Japanese Communists and the Struggle for Power. Santa Monica, Calif., Rand Corp., 1962. (P-2571).

Scalapino, Robert A. The Left Wing in Japan. Survey. August, 1962.

Silberman, Bernard S. Japan and Korea; a Critical Bibliography. Tuscon, University of Arizona Press, 1962.

Soukup, James R. Japanese Labor: Goals and Political Tactics. Orient West. March, 1962.

Wurfel, David. The Philippine Elections: Support for Democracy. Asian Survey. May, 1962.

Zinn, Howard. Another Look at the Chinese Communists. Antioch Review. Spring, 1962.

Australia and New Zealand

Castles, Alex C. Limitations on the Autonomy of the Australian States. Public Law. Summer, 1962.

Chateaufvieux, Pierre. La Politique Générale de l'Australie. Revue de Défense Nationale. May, 1962.

New Zealand: An Abortive Industrial Venture. The Round Table. June, 1962.

Latin America and West Indies

Belaunde, Victor Andrés. The Economic Basis of Politics in Latin America. Trans. by Ruth Lundelius. The Annals. July, 1962.

Blakely, Judith. Press and Politics in Argentina. Journalism Review. Spring, 1962.

Botsford, Keith. Brazil's New Language. New Leader. September 3, 1962.

Brown, Lyle C. Latin America, a Bibliography. Kingsville, Texas College of Arts and Industries, 1962.

Chiefs of State and Cabinet Ministers of the American Republics. Rev. Washington, Pan American Union, 1962.

Dell, Edmund. Brazil's Partly United States. The Political Quarterly. July-September, 1962.

Failure of a Federation: Causes of Breakdown in the West Indies. The Round Table. June, 1962.

Gil, Frederico Guillermo. Genesis and Modernization of Political Parties in Chile. Gainesville, University of Florida Press, 1962. (The Latin American Monograph Series 18).

Hafter, Rudolph P. Report from Panama, Costa Rica, Honduras. Swiss Review of World Affairs. August, 1962.

Hafter, Rudolph P. The New Mexico. Swiss Review of World Affairs. June, 1962.

Patch, Richard W. Personalities and Politics in Bolivia. New York, American Universities Field Staff, 1962. (American Universities Field Staff. Reports Service. West Coast South America Series, v. 9, No. 5, Bolivia).

Pereira, L. C. Bresser. The Rise of Middle Class and Middle Management in Brazil. Journal of Inter-American Studies. July, 1962.

Rodrigues, José Honório. The Foundations of Brazil's Foreign Policy. International Affairs. July, 1962.

Szulc, Tad. Trujillo's Legacy: a Democratic Vacuum. New York Times Magazine. September 2, 1962.

Tannenbaum, Frank. Castro and Social Change. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1962.

Wallace, Elisabeth. The West Indies Federation: Decline and Fall. International Journal. Summer, 1962.

Wilgus, A. Curtis. The Chemistry of Political Change in Latin America. The Annals. July, 1962.

Canada

A Turning-Point in Quebec: The Situation in French Canada. The Round Table. June, 1962.

Dickinson, William B., Jr. Canadian Election. Washington, Editorial Research Reports, 1962.

Gordon, Donald R. Canada at the Polls. World Today. July, 1962.

Story, Christopher. Canadians in Difficulty. Contemporary Review. May, 1962.

Sutherland, R. J. Canada's Long Term Strategic Situation. International Journal. Summer, 1962.

INTERNATIONAL LAW, POLITICS, AND ORGANIZATION

What Price Coexistence? A Policy for the Western Alliance. By SIR JOHN SLESSOR. (Frederick A. Praeger, New York, 1961. 153 Pp. $4.50.)

If political knots could be untied by the logic of military analysis, Sir John Slessor would have made a significant contribution to the reduction of East-West tensions. A Marshall of the Royal Air Force, the author was Chief of the Air Staff, Commandant of the Imperial Defense College, and Commander-in-Chief, Coastal Command, during the Battle of Britain. He has written extensively on military strategy and political policy.

Many of the ideas in the present volume are taken from his earlier works.

Sir John seeks an acceptable way out of the present stalemate which would combine Western toughness and strength with greater flexibility, based on mutual and balanced concessions. He desires to decrease the present terrible risks and wasteful costs by approaches which will increase confidence on both sides in peaceful coexistence. He believes the Russians still hold fast to their goal of world communism and to their strategy of nibbling away at the non-communist world by subversion and Pavlovian psychological warfare. Sir John is convinced, however, that the Soviet leaders are unwilling to risk nuclear war to achieve their objectives, and that they are as aware as are our Western leaders of the danger of the process of escalation in limited war. His long-range object is a world government with limited responsibilities to enforce disarmament and insure world order through some form of an international police. However, this work is concerned primarily with first steps, and he believes these should be taken in Europe on Western initiative.

No possibility of a rapid or spectacular change in the communist system is deemed feasible. Thus, the West must not overtly try to destroy the communist camp if it wishes to establish a modus vivendi under which increased contacts and the slow influence of various internal and external factors may change Soviet practice. On the side of toughness, Sir John warns against expecting too much from negotiations with the communists, although the West should always stand ready to negotiate. He advocates pacts with the communists whose validity should not, as far as possible, depend upon communist good faith. He proposes a hard policy to counter the nibbling processes of subversion and intervention.

On the side of flexibility, Sir John advances the policy of disengagement in Europe, starting with Germany. Eventually, a cordon of buffer states should be erected from Sweden to the Black Sea. The immediate objective is to get the Red Army back within the present Soviet borders. It is assumed that the Soviet Union will not start a war over Berlin but will use the situation in that city for bargaining purposes. Sir John hopes for the eventual reunification of Germany and by this process the solution of the Berlin problem, but he offers no support for the recovery of Germany's former territories in the East. The first step in his program is to be an agreement for Russian and Allied withdrawal from Germany. German arms will remain, and while Germany might then withdraw from both NATO and the Warsaw Pact, it would continue its ties with the West. The military forces of the United States would remain in some strength in Western Europe and in Britain.

There is a long discussion of the possibilities for making the military arrangements of NATO more effective. Sir John advocates the abolition of tactical nuclear weapons and warns that military plans must not aggravate fear. He is opposed to having NATO become a fourth nuclear power.

Sir John casts about in all directions in his discussion. He calls for aid to the developing countries but regards them with obvious contempt. Regarding disarmament he makes the point that nuclear weapons should be the last weapons to be abolished, since it is they that make war obsolete.

Immediate admission of Communist China to the United Nations is urged, but so is a United Nations trusteeship for Formosa, a proposal unacceptable to Communist China. A chapter is devoted to "the American obsession" with anti-colonialism, which Sir John believes to be the most disruptive force in the Atlantic Alliance.

There is much bluff and superficiality in this book. Such aspects of the main subject as the ability of the present Soviet leadership to make concessions, the position of De Gaulle, and the acceptability of disengagement to both the Russians and the Germans are not examined. Despite such pronounced flaws, the book has the merit of presenting a provocative, if not wholly original, plan for Western initiative in easing cold war tensions.—ALFRED FERNBACH, University of Virginia.

The Eternal Triangle? Communist China, the United States and the United Nations. By SHELDON APPLETON. (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press. 1961. xiv, 274 pp. $5.95.)

Speaking before the United Nations General Assembly on December 1, 1961, Adlai E. Stevenson presented with new eloquence U. S. arguments against the seating of Communist China in the world body. Many people, who had expected Ambassador Stevenson, in light of earlier statements before joining the Kennedy Administration, to be rather luke-warm in his presentation, were surprised at the force with which he expressed his views. But it was, after all, merely a reflection of the emphasis on security considerations which holding responsible office had brought, as well as his access to classified material and awareness of interrelationships that cannot be talked about openly by Administration spokesmen.

Such considerations are generally missing from Professor Sheldon Appleton's study of the United States and the question of the admission of Communist China to the U. N. He has researched the literature diligently, carried out some enterprising interviewing, and attempted to isolate the important components of the problem. His major research is summarized in six chapters sandwiched between a summary history of the question and a final "Summing Up." In these chapters he examines the legal and procedural aspects of the question, backgrounds of the two Chinese governments, significance of the representation issue, voting record of the U. N., U. S., policy, and the relation of American public opinion to that policy.

Appleton finds that "the history of the question in the United Nations to date makes it clear enough that political rather than legal factors have been, and will continue to be, decisive in determining U. N. action in the matter." (32-33) Nevertheless in a weighing of political factors and with only a cursory glance at the international security and power considerations, he concludes "the seating of Peking in the U. N. would probably yield more advantages than disadvantages to the United States." (103) His position in support of seating Communist China is buttressed by an imposing array of statistical analysis of past U. N. voting records, public opinion surveys, and projection of trends. On the basis of public opinion surveys, for example, he finds that "there is much greater support for seating Peking among American elite and leadership groups than in the population generally." (217) The same could, of course, have been said with regard to the rationalization of the policies of Stalin in the 1930s.

The title of this study is an accurate reflection of its major shortcoming. By concentrating attention on the United Nations representation issue Appleton tends to ignore some of the political and military power realities of the problem. The China representation issue has become a highly-charged political issue and one which simply cannot be isolated from other international problems in the manner attempted by Professor Appleton. Although he does present many of the complexities of the China problem, his concentration on the United Nations as the center of world attention and concern leads him to overplay the extent to which various governments consider the U. N. or the China question as an issue to which other questions are subordinate. It also leads him to overlook many aspects of U. S. foreign policy. In discussing the importance of seating Peking to the overseas Chinese communities, for instance, he comments that the U. S. might "attempt . . . to utilize the influence available to it in Southeast Asia to persuade local governments there to pursue policies which would encourage the gradual re-orientation of overseas Chinese toward their country of residence." (119) This has long been a major U. S. policy on which able diplomats have already spent many agonizing years.

Events have dated Appleton's efforts. The explosion in U. N. membership, budgetary problems, and such issues as the Congo operation have provoked responsible U. S. and NATO leaders to raise reservations which throw the whole China representation problem into different focus. Again, as long as Mao Tse-tung and Chiang Kai-shek are firmly committed that only one China will be represented at the U. N., the diligence and effort behind much of the statistical analysis and detached projections are hardly likely to be of lasting certainly not "eternal" significance. The book can serve as a handy reference work on the past history of the China problem at the U. N., but unfortunately its use for reference purposes is marred by the fact that the author has not seen fit to provide an index.—RICHARD L. WALKER, University of South Carolina.

Southeast Asia Today—And Tomorrow. A Political Analysis. BY RICHARD BUTWELL. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1961. Pp. x, 176. $4.25 cloth, $1.75 paper.)

Political developments in Southeast Asia have covered so much ground in the last fifteen years or more that it is nearly impossible to follow them with any semblance of precision. In recent years research in Burma, Vietnam, the Philippines, Indonesia, Malaya, Thailand, and less so in Cambodia and Laos, has begun to produce fragments of an understanding of what is happening in the area. But we are obviously still very far away from confidence in discussing the politics of any one of these states. To discuss them all together in one brief book is quite a task, and one that only a few scholars have tried so far.

Mr. Butwell's book is a recent attempt to throw some light on all of Southeast Asia. Having spent several years studying this area, sometimes in the field, he sets out in this book "to describe and assess the record of the lands of Southeast Asia in governing themselves after a decade of independence; to offer some suggestions, based on this examination, concerning the nature of government in this part of the world; and to chart the probable course of future development." He devotes a chapter each to pre-independence background, the governmental system each state began with after independence, later adjustment of the political systems, the political process, development of government policies, changing policy patterns and directions, Communism (The Communist Challenge), foreign policy; and he concludes with a very brief comment on some problems of the future.

A few of Mr. Butwell's observations are debatable—among them his reasoning that neutralism must necessarily benefit the Communists. But a majority of knowledgeable readers will not disagree with most of his conclusions.

The primarily descriptive and comparative approach of this book seems at first glance to be promising, but its content is not satisfying. Covering as much as he does, the author necessarily sketches and over-simplifies most of his descriptive material. This certainly reduces the value of the book for area experts, who require rather meatier detail. And there is not sufficient depth and precision of analysis to compensate for this. On the other hand, the beginning student, who is not likely to have more than an odd bit of information about Southeast Asia at his disposal, may find it hard to weather the apparent flood of countries, systems, and leaders that comes at him as he goes from section to section in the book.

However, Mr. Butwell has provided the reader with some information of more recent date—into 1961—than other books available at this time. It may therefore have limited value as supplementary reading, especially the chapter on “the search for the appropriate political system.” A short selected bibliography will be useful to the general reader.—DANIEL S. LEV, Cornell University.

Latin America between the Eagle and the Bear. By SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. xiv, 192. $4.50.)

In conception and intent, this is a good book. In execution, it is at best mediocre. Sketching the dangers which hem Latin America in its position between the American eagle and the Soviet bear, Sr. de Madariaga considers the various pertinent influences: Spanish, American, and Soviet-Chinese. The obvious intent is to enhance the reader's comprehension of Latin America and its Communist threat, and with such a goal no one can quarrel:

But with execution one cannot be as well satisfied. The Table of Contents expounds a neat organization, but the text is often rambling and diffuse. One learns some things with which he was not previously familiar: that Spain's rule over the Latin American countries was not really “colonial,” and that Spain did not, as so often thought, practice a selfish, extractive, gold-hungry policy. Other matters are only too familiar. North American students of hemispheric relations hardly need to be told of the evils of dollar diplomacy, economic imperialism, fraternization with Batista- and Trujillo-type dictators, and similar shortcomings of our Latin American policies; this tale has been told many times, and often far better than in the present volume.

Questions of balance are not answered to the satisfaction of this reviewer. No one could cover this subject matter intensively in the fewer than two hundred pages used here, but one can look askance at the judgment exercised when the author spends fourteen pages discussing details of party organization and program in various countries, while agrarian reform, by his own statement one of Latin America's very most pressing problems, is dismissed in one superficial twenty-line paragraph. Sr. de Madariaga sensibly maintains that international non-intervention is indeed practically impossible, but nevertheless repeats the stock Latin criticisms of United States intervention. The United States is advised, among a great many other things, to improve its image in Latin America—and surely most of us will agree with this suggestion despite the fact that the bloom of youth has long since faded from its cheeks—but this perennial admonition is offered in such a fashion as to cause at least one North American to wonder whether Latins have ever considered improving their image in North America. This one American has grown weary of this warmed-over diet, even when served by so distinguished an author.—HOLLIS W. BARBER, The University of Illinois, Chicago.

The United States and Inter-American Security, 1889-1960. By J. LLOYD MECHAM. (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1961. Pp. xii, 514. $7.50.)

In this lengthy and extensively documented study of hemisphere relations Professor Mecham has examined so many questions of inter-American interest within so broad a range of history that it is difficult to do justice to his work in a short review. He has produced a useful and informative book to which the reader, once exposed, will in all probability return again and again.

As the title suggests, the author's basic approach to inter-American relations is historical, but his treatment actually goes beyond the dates specified. An early chapter deals with the “old” Pan Americanism, the phase of limited cooperative efforts among Spanish-American nations between 1826 and 1888. Later chapters bring the story of continental politics down through 1960. Synthesis, or at any rate skillful management, of the vast historical detail of a century and a quarter seems to be achieved largely through four key concepts which dominate the book.

The first of these is security, which is generally assessed as the preservation of national independence through cooperation among the several nations. At various points in his narrative Mecham dwells on the recurrent problem faced by the small Latin American state: is national independence generally favored or hindered by the type of regional security arrangement that has evolved in the Western Hemisphere? Recognizing the validity of the question, the author makes a convincing case for the regional organization as a guarantor of national independence in Latin America, and he cites distinguished and discriminating Latin American sources in support of his case, (for example, Dr. Alberto Lleras Camargo).

A concept that is immediately related is, of course, the special power of the United States in the inter-American system. “Twenty mice and a cat” has been a glib and cynical description of the twenty-one member OAS. There is nothing cynical in Mecham's more thoughtful appraisal: “Although nominally a regional arrangement of twenty-one juridically equal and sovereign states, the Organization of American States is actually an association of one Great Power with twenty small weak member nations in which evidences of United States predominance are readily apparent." The realities of United States power, its hazards and benefits, are constantly acknowledged throughout the work.

No comprehensive treatment of the Inter-American scene can avoid involvement with those two perennial ideas of regionalism and universalism. As everyone knows there have been "regionalists," ready to wall off the American hemisphere from contagion with a wicked world, who have been opposed by champions of a universalism which denies any validity to the hemispheric concept. Mecham's contention is that "there is no inherent contradiction between universalism and regionalism, for neither is an exclusive principle." In the chapters dealing with World War II and the integration of inter-American security into UN he makes an excellent case for the compatibility of the two principles.

This reviewer would have welcomed a somewhat more extended treatment of a fifth concept, namely, nationalism in Latin America. The relevance of nationalist sentiments to specific questions of hemispheric security is suggested in various sections including those which pertain to challenges from international communism. Yet, in other important parts of the story, at the eve of World War II for example, the full force of nationalism as an element in the security equation appears to be underrated.

Mecham's direct concern, however, is not with the isms and other abstractions. The concrete acts of specific governments, managed and controlled by beings of flesh and blood, absorb his interest and stimulate his appreciation of the steps by which the Western Hemisphere nations have moved, whether clumsily or adroitly, toward a regional security system which, he believes, can contribute to the peace and well-being of the world at large. A vital and important book is the result of this appreciation.—JOHN J. KENNEDY, University of Virginia.

Urbanization in Latin America: A UNESCO Survey. PHILIP M. HAUSER, ed., (New York: International Documents Service. 1961. Pp. 331. $4.50.)

The growth of the social sciences in Latin America has been slow not only because of the centuries-long emphasis given to professional training at the university level, but also because of widespread political, religious, and ideological impediments. Until very recently the serious consideration of social matters was a labor only of humanistic essayists—some of high quality indeed, but still "scientists of the spirit," a phrase which many of them continue to use to defend themselves against the onslaught of the "operationalists" and "nose counters." The present slow but persistent spread of empirical sociology, following a quite rapid expansion of modern economics dating in some countries from the mid-thirties, still has not been accompanied by more than an isolated vocation here and there for the ministry of political science. As a result Latin American political sociologists and political economists, joined by a few daring denizens of law schools, are doing the only relatively disciplined work on the political process other than the sporadic efforts of visiting foreign scholars. An important role in the encouragement of sociological and economic studies has been taken by the United Nations through such of its agencies as UNESCO, UNESCO-Western Hemisphere, and the Economic Commission for Latin America. These institutions have engaged in such formally promotional activities as the underwriting of research and interchange, training, and the calling of many international meetings which have served to establish communications and create a certain feeling of community among scholars from different countries. An unanticipated result has been to clothe certain Latin American professors with an international repute which has cushioned them from a measure of discomfort at home. In this context, it is ironic and unfortunate, although probably necessary, that the international agencies should so cautiously skirt both political issues and political science in the work they choose to sponsor in Latin America.

Urbanization in Latin America is a competently condensed collection of the proceedings of a seminar sponsored by four U. N. agencies and the Organization of American States in 1959 in Santiago de Chile, Latin America's Geneva. The volume, another in the Technology and Science Series of UNESCO, can profitably be paired with a preceding volume, Urbanization in Asia and the Far East, to reveal some of the special characteristics of Latin America's problems of development. Some of these contrasts are pointed out in the rapporteur's presentation which opens the book, a section implicitly containing some well considered theoretical ideas with exciting research implications. The general conclusions of the seminar following the opening summary hardly even mention the problems of decision and power involved in public action to grapple with the difficulties and promises of rapid urbanization. Indeed, the conclusions list demographic, economic, employment, educational, and administrative aspects of urbanization, as well as a few others, but nowhere is city government as such discussed, let alone pressure groups, parties, political values, styles, ideologies, or the leadership-followership relation. The last chapter, entitled "Some Policy Implications of Urbanization," belies its generous title in its first sentence by restricting itself only to the "socio-economic policy implications of the rapid growth of cities in Latin America." One would think that a U. N. with Korea behind it and the Congo all around it could muster the courage to face political research with a little more determination, especially when dealing with Latin American cities, the incubators of the region's nationalistic politics of development.

The eleven selected seminar papers presented in the book are by and large interesting and sometimes even piquing, and will serve to introduce the American reader to some of the more important Latin American social scientists. While common sense precludes accepting certain of the statistical material as being rigorously and meticulously reliable (a pretense no contributor to this book makes), the general outlines indicated are often of a high level of sophistication, and the analysis sometimes subtle and richly suggestive. These comments are especially true of the studies of slum and working class sections of Buenos Aires, Lima, Rio de Janeiro, and São Paulo. It should also be emphasized again that some of these studies were written by persons quite new to this kind of research; even since this quite recent effort, most of them have demonstrated their continuing intellectual and technical growth. Even though this review, then, has voiced the discontent of a political scientist, it would be unjust not to end on the happier note that this book is not only "useful"—pallid word!—but is informative on several planes about both Latin America and Latin American scholars, and constitutes a prod to further research despite the officialese in which the summary and conclusions are couched. This volume suggests that the day will yet come when we shall be able to judge a book about Latin America on its intrinsic merits, and not shade our remarks with considerations of the weakness of data, the insufficiency of researchers, and the lack of intellectual company. The international agencies warrant our thanks for their encouragement, despite their belief that the entire discipline of political science is composed of experts in public administration.—K. H. SILVERT, Dartmouth College.

Yugoslavia and The New Communism. BY GEORGE W. HOFFMAN AND FRED WARNER NEAL. (New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1962. Pp. xvi, 546. $8.00.)

This book, which seeks to present a sympathetic treatment of the Titoist system, is difficult to evaluate. It attempts too much; in addition to history, politics and economics, the authors also devote some space to geography, anthropology, demography and linguistics, with uneven results.

Much of their work covers old ground, already gone over by others (including a previous book by one of the authors), adding little that is new. The chapters on the economy, however, particularly those on Industrial Growth and Resources Base and Foreign Economic Relations, are good, although the unquestioning reliance on official Yugoslav statistics is open to criticism. Perhaps the book's main contribution is to be found in its recounting of the various forms of experimentation that the Yugoslav Communists have undertaken in their attempt to create a workable state-directed economy. Since the publication of the book, however, certain of their actions demonstrate that they are still seeking an answer to the question of how to decentralize an essentially centralist system.

The authors engage in a prodigious effort to "prove" that the theoretical foundations of Titoism are radically different from those of the Soviet Union and the other countries of Eastern Europe. Yet they admit that "there is an essential core of theory which is the same . . . both ideologies have their roots in the theories advanced by Lenin" (p. 156). Elsewhere they assert that the "concept of the state under socialism is one of the most significant points of theoretical difference. . . . The Yugoslavs [hold that] the state must begin to 'wither away.' " (One wonders if the authors have read State and Revolution). Moreover, the "concept of 'independent paths to socialism' is the main theoretical pillar" in Yugoslav theory, which "is to claim for Yugoslavia and all other states what Stalin and his successors have claimed for the Soviet Union." (How is all this radically new?) In talking about the Titoist system, the authors use a plethora of words such as "novel," "new," "unique," but have not the Russians too reorganized their party apparatus any number of times, and are they not still experimenting with different techniques in their search for a workable state-directed economy?

Time after time, it is evident that the authors want to present the Tito regime in as good a light as possible, often at the expense of historical accuracy. The chapter entitled "The Climb to Statehood" is incredibly poor, vague, and full of historical errors and questionable assertions. Its burden, seemingly, is to prove, that the Yugoslavs have had no experience with democracy. No scholar with even a rudimentary knowledge of this area could so contend. In the brief treatment of the Mihailovich-Tito struggle and the Communist seizure of power, the Mihailovich side does not get a fair hearing, although the authors unintentionally pay Mihailovich a compliment by citing information that he was right all along about Communist intentions. Moreover, the authors say nothing about Tito's admissions that he had no intention of living up to the Tito-Shubashich Agreement. Further, the assertion that the Partisans "liberated most of the country themselves" is questionable. Even if one discounts the not insignificant actions of Soviet forces in Yugoslavia in 1944, and if one forgets about Western aid to Tito (also not insignificant), there is still the fact that even when Berlin was falling, large areas of Yugoslavia were still not in Tito's grasp. Also, the assertion that Western foreign offices were "befuddled" by the Cominform Resolution is simply not correct. To the best of this reviewer's knowledge, there is no proof of a Yugoslav Politburo decision not to bear down on the peasants (prior to 1948) and a great deal of evidence to the contrary.

Along with their desire to present the Tito regime in a favorable light, the authors seemingly have a compulsion to hedge. This often creates the impression that they cannot make up their minds. For example: "The voting [in 1945] took place without obvious intimidation" (p. 80), but "Communist strong-arm tactics, already tried out in the 1945 election. . . ." (p. 91). Also: "Almost from the first [there was] a sort of collective leadership," but "the only really top Communists who ever seriously challenged Tito . . . went to prison." (p. 499). Frequently they talk of new democratic forms in Yugoslavia, but at one point conclude that "although there may be more parliamentary 'debate' in Poland than in Yugoslavia, the result is the same: what the Communist Party proposes is enacted." (p. 461)

In a final section, the authors find that the influence of Titoism abroad is nil except perhaps in the new underdeveloped nations of Asia and Africa, but they do not examine the implications of the latter statement. In the final chapter, the authors do some speculating about what will happen after Tito, without reaching any firm conclusions. This speculation is preceded by a return to some dubious assertions to support their position that the present regime is a significant improvement over the past, and is accompanied by other declarations that demonstrate that the authors have not really penetrated the thinking of the average Yugoslav citizen.—ALEX N. DRAGNICH, Vanderbilt University.

International Protection of Human Rights. By MANOUCHEHR GANJI, (Geneva: Droz, 1962, pp. xvi, 317.)

Manouchehr Ganji's survey of the international protection of human rights is divided into seven chapters dealing respectively with (1) humanitarian intervention (2) the post world war II minorities treaties (3) slavery (4) the U. N. Charter (5) the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (6) the draft Covenants on Human Rights (7) the European Convention on Human Rights. A little more than half the work is devoted to the last two chapters; rightly so since the historical evolution of the protection of individual human rights and of minority rights is already well covered by the literature. The book is completed by useful appendices.

The author gives unity to his analysis by adhering to the thesis that world wide international instruments should codify only those human rights already recognized as universally acceptable and applicable. For the present, Manouchehr Ganji proposes the following list of basic rights: "freedom from deprivation of life save in the execution of a court sentence; freedom from subjection to torture, physical mutilation, cruel or inhuman punishments; freedom from being held in slavery or subjected to the performance of compulsory labour unless provided as punishment duly imposed by a competent judicial tribunal, or required as a temporary public service equally incumbent upon all; freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention and exile; the right of "habeas corpus"; the right to compensation in case of unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty; freedom from the application of ex post facto laws; freedom from being restricted in the exercise of civil rights or deprived of judicial personality (except in the case of: (a) minors; (b) persons convicted of crime for which this penalty is provided by law); the right to emigrate; the right to freedom of religion, conscience and belief, and the right to practice and to propagate one's religious belief, the exercise of this right being qualified only by the provisions of laws passed in the interest of humanity, of morals and public order, and to protect the rights and freedoms of others; the right to constitute associations for the promotion and protection of legitimate interests and of any other lawful object." He also proposes to include the right of ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities to enjoy their own culture and to use their own language, but he excludes the so called socioeconomic rights and in particular the right to own property.

To supplement a basic universal instrument the author puts his hope in regional agreements, such as the European Convention on Human Rights, made by countries of similar culture and politics which may, consequently, offer wider and more specific protection.

The author decided, and such a decision is perfectly legitimate, to exclude from his study the examination of political or sociological factors which underlie the attitude of states on the question of the international codification of human rights. He tends to give at times, however, what this reviewer considers is undue importance to official reasoning presented by governments wanting to justify their own positions.

There are minor mistakes such as the date of the treaty of Oliva (p. 16) or the equating of "national origin" with "nationality" (p. 209) but they detract from what is a careful and well organized analysis. More regrettable are certain omissions. The Genocide Convention receives only passing reference and the Trieste Settlement of 1954, one of the more interesting of the post World War II minorities treaties, has been left out of the study. Considering that the work originated in a Swiss University one may also be surprised by the lack of German language material in the bibliography. —JEAN A. LAPONCE, Univ. of British Columbia, Vancouver, B. C.

Foreign Affairs and You! BY ANDREW BERDING (Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday and Company,
1962. Pp. 264. $4.50.)

President Eisenhower's assumption of blame for the U-2 flights "ended in disaster" for the United States, cancelling one of the "greatest opportunities in our diplomatic history"—Eisenhower's scheduled trip to Moscow. A staff meeting of the Secretary of State resembles "a king holding court of his feudal lords," each zealous to prevent any trespassing within his private dominion. "To some White House advisers there is something irresistibly fascinating about foreign affairs," a lamentable fact placing still another hazard in the way of State Department efforts to steer a true course in foreign affairs. The State Department, however, has been too addicted to "negative reciprocity" in dealing with the USSR—that is, in invoking a tit-for-tat policy of restrictions upon Russians in America whenever prohibitions are placed on Americans in Russia.

These are but a few random judgments advanced by Andrew Berding, whose concern with foreign affairs began over thirty years ago as a newspaper reporter. Subsequently, he accepted a State Department appointment under Truman and became Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs under Eisenhower. In the light of his experience, concern for the role of public opinion in foreign policy is therefore natural. His book is intended for the layman. Its description of the machinery and substance of foreign policy seldom rises above the elementary, on the theory perhaps that even on this level public understanding of the foreign policy process remains rudimentary. The specialist is thus likely to find the analysis commonplace, not to say in some instances (when the author ventures outside his own area of expertise) naive.

Consider his evaluation of summit conferences and other techniques associated with "open diplomacy." The liabilities of such diplomacy are too well-known to require repetition here, yet Berding advances two principal conclusions. One is that summit conferences are probably inevitable. The other is that they may have more value than critics suppose. Citing Eisenhower's trips abroad, he reasons that such appearances often make a lasting impression upon foreign officials: "If they believe the President has won the hearts of their public they are likely to be more amenable. . . ." If there exists any creditable evidence for such reassuring verdicts, the author does not supply it.

In the realm he knows best—propaganda and the "public relations" of foreign policy—the treatment is more convincing and illuminating. The author points out, for example, that revolution remains a popular concept throughout Latin America. How much more effective, therefore, for propagandists in America to talk about the revolutionary movement against Castro than about counter-revolutionary activities in Cuba! Similarly, he dwells upon the unnecessary problems the United States sometimes creates for itself by citing the history of foreign aid. How can citizens at home and abroad generate enthusiasm and support for the agency administering such aid, much less understand its complex administrative structure, when five different agencies have administered foreign aid within the last thirteen years?

Commendable as it may be to focus public attention on such problems, politically literate readers are likely to question a number of Berding's simplistic judgments. What informed student of Asian affairs, for example, would agree that the major difficulty with America's recent policies toward Quemoy and Matsu was the way they were explained to the American public? Or, after reading the author's plea for greater American understanding of the "neutralist" mentality, what competent observer would accept the assertion that when Washington also advocates "peaceful co-existence" it automatically does Khrushchev "a favor"? Again, after deploring the dominant anti-communist theme in much of contemporary American policy, does it really help to suggest that as a substitute "our output" ought to be more "pro-American"?

Highlighted as it is with the author's first-hand experiences, Foreign Affairs and You! can serve as a useful introduction to an increasingly complex subject. If it arouses further interest and a desire to probe deeper—if only to examine critically some of Berding's own assertions—then it will have achieved one of the author's primary objectives.—CECIL V. CRABB, JR., Vassar College.

The Imperialism Reader. EDITED BY LOUIS L. SYNDER. (New York: D. Van Nostrand Co., 1962. Pp. xvii, 619. $8.50.)

Professor Synder's editorial efforts have produced the first anthology of materials related to the subject of imperialism. The 178 readings include eyewitness reports, travel accounts, historical disquisitions, contemporary essays and arguments, treaties, historical commentary, and excerpts from newspapers and magazines. The volume is divided into ten sections; the most useful are those (parts 5 through 9) collecting representative materials dealing with the context and content of imperialism in Africa, the Far East and Southern Asia, the Near and Middle East, American imperialism, and with the "Twilight of Western Imperialism." Of doubtful polemic value are items collected under the rubric "The Emergence of Communist Imperialism." The pointed inclusion of the latter group of readings do not, however, detract from the usefulness of the rest.

The bibliographical section that has customarily appeared at this point, covering articles and documents on international relations, law and organization, will be resumed in the March 1963 number.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- AMERICAN SOCIETY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW. International Legal Matters, Vol. 1, No. 1. (Washington, D. C.: American Society of International Law, 1962. Pp. 196.)
- ANDREWS, WILLIAM G. American National Political Institutions. (New York: D. Van Nostrand, Inc., 1962. Pp. 200, $1.50.)
- ANDREWS, WILLIAM G. European Political Institutions, A Comparative Government Reader. (New York: D. Van Nostrand, Inc., 1962. Pp. xii, 380, $3.95.)
- BAGBY, WESLEY M. The Road to Normalcy: The Presidential Campaign and Election of 1920. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1962. Pp. 167, $5.50.)
- BALDWIN, HANSON W. World War I, an Outline History. (New York: Harper and Row, 1962. Pp. ix, 181, $3.95.)
- BANERJEE, D. N. Some Aspects of the Indian Constitution. (Calcutta: The World Press Private, Ltd., 1962. Pp. x, 287, 25/-.)
- BARBOUR, K. M. AND PROTHERO, R. M., editors. Essays on American Population. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1962. Pp. x, 336, $7.50.)
- BARNETT, A. DOAK. Communist China in Perspective (Oreon E. Scott Foundation Lectures, Washington University, 1961). (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. vi, 88, $2.95.)
- BELOFF, MAX. New Dimensions in Foreign Policy. (New York: Macmillan and Co., 1961. Pp. 208.)
- BETTELMHEIM, CHARLES. L'inde Indépendante. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1962. Pp. 528, 3N.F.)
- BIRRENBACH, KURT. The Future of the Atlantic Community. (Freiberg: Verlag Rombach, 1962. Pp. 92, 7.80 D.M.)
- BLACK, MAX, editor. The Importance of Language. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. Pp. viii, 172, $1.95 Spectrum paperback.)
- BOCK, EDWIN A. AND CAMPBELL, ALAN K., editors. Case Studies in American Government. Inter-University Case Program. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. Pp. x, 368, $3.95.)
- BOTZARIS, NOTIS. Visions balkaniques dans la Revolution Grecque: 1789-1821. (Geneva, Librairie E. Droz, 1962. Pp. vii, 280, 20.—F.)
- BOUSCAREN, ANTHONY TRAWICK. Soviet Foreign Policy: A Pattern of Persistence. (New York: Fordham University Press, 1962. Pp. 160, $5.00.)
- BRIMMER, BRENDA; WALL, LINWOOD R.; HOVET, JR., THOMAS; CHAMBERLIN, WALDO. A Guide to use of United Nations Documents. (Dobbs Ferry: Oceana Publications, 1962. Pp. xv, 272, $6.00.)
- BROOKS, JOHN. The One and the Many: The Individual in the Modern World. (New York: Harper and Row, 1962. Pp. xvi, 331, $6.00.)
- BUSEY, JAMES L. Notes on Costa Rican Democracy. (Boulder: University of Colorado Press, 1962. Pp. vi, 84, $2.00 paperback.)
- CARPER, EDITH T. Illinois Goes to Congress for Army Land. (University: University of Alabama Press, 1962. Inter-University Case Program No. 71. Pp. 32, $.50 paperback.)
- CARPER, EDITH T. Lobbying and the Natural Gas Bill. (University: University of Alabama Press, 1962. Inter-University Case Program No. 72. Pp. 39, $.50 paperback.)

- CARR, J. C. AND WRIGHT, A. E. G. History of the British Steel Industry. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. xii, 632, $11.00.)
- CARRELL, JEPHTHA J. The Role of the City Manager. (Kansas City: Community Studies, Inc., 1962. Public Affairs Monograph Series No. 2. Pp. iii, 47, $2.00 paperback.)
- CHAGLA, M. C. An Ambassador Speaks. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co., Inc., 1962. Pp. vi, 152, $5.75.)
- CHERINGTON, PAUL W. AND GILLEN, RALPH L. The Business Representative in Washington. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution, 1962. Pp. x, 124.)
- CHIPMAN, WILLIAM K. Non-Military Defense for the United States. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1961 (Ph.D. Thesis). Pp. 613)
- CH'U, T'UNG-TSU. Local Government in China under the Ch'ing. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. xiv, 342, $9.50.)
- CLEM, ALAN L. South Dakota Political Almanac. (Vermillion: State University of South Dakota, 1962. Report No. 47. Pp. 85, paperback.)
- CONANT, MELVIN. The Long Polar Watch. (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1962. Pp. xii, 197, $5.00.)
- DAVISON, R. B. West Indian Migrants. (New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. xix, 87, $1.75 paperback.)
- DEGLER, CARL N. Out of Our Past. (New York: Harper, Row, and Peterson, 1962. Pp. xvi, 484.)
- DOUGLAS, ANN. Industrial Peacemaking: A Report on Union-Management Negotiations. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962. Pp. viii, 668, $13.50.)
- DOZER, DONALD MARQUAND. Latin America: An Interpretative History. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc., 1962. Pp. xiii, 618, $7.95.)
- DREIER, JOHN C., editor. The Alliance for Progress: Problems and Perspectives. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1962. Pp. xviii, 146, $3.95.)
- DUFFY, JAMES. Portugal Africa. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. 240, $3.95.)
- DUNLOP, JOHN Q. Automation and Technological Change. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. Pp. vi, 184, $1.95 paperback.)
- DURDEN, ROBERT F. Reconstruction Bonds and Twentieth Century Politics. (Durham: Duke University Press, 1962. Pp. xi, 260, $6.00.)
- DYER, RICHARD MACCANN. Hollywood in Transition. (Boston: Houghton-Mifflin, 1962. Pp. xv, 208, $6.00.)
- DVORNICK, FRANCIS. The Slavs in European History and Civilization. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1962. Pp. xxviii, 688, $15.00.)
- EMDEN, CECIL S. The People and the Constitution. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Reprint from 1933. Pp. vi, 316, $1.85.)
- FATOUROS, A. A. Government Guarantees to Foreign Investors. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962. Pp. xvii, 411, $12.00.)
- FOSTER, MARGERY SOMERS. "Out of Smaller Beginnings . . ." An Economic history of Harvard College. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. xvi, 232, $6.25.)
- FRIEDMANN, W. An Introduction to World Politics. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 4th edition, 1960. Reprint from 1951. Pp. xiv, 384, $2.95 paperback.)
- FRYE, ALTON. The Hazards of Atomic Wastes. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1962. Pp. iv, 45, $1.00.)
- GAVSHON, ARTHUR L. The Mysterious Death of Dag Hammarskjöld. (New York: Walker and Company, 1962. Pp. 243, $4.50.)
- GERHARD, DIETRICH. Alle und Neue Welt in Vergleichender Geschichtsbetrachtung. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1962. Pp. 249, D.M. 23,—paperback.)
- GORDIS, ROBERT. The Root and the Branch: Judaism and the Free Society. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962. Pp. xv, 254, $3.95.)
- HABERMAS, JURGEN. Politica. (Neuweid, Berlin: Hermann Luchterhand Verlag, 1962. Pp. 283, 28 D.M.)
- HARTMANN, FREDERICK H. The Relations of Nations. (New York: Macmillan, 2nd edition, 1962; 1st edition, 1957. Pp. xx, 648, $7.50.)
- HEILBRONER, ROBERT L. The Making of Economic Society. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. Pp. xiii, 241, $4.95.)
- HEMPSTONE, SMITH. Rebels, Mercenaries, and Dividends: The Katanga Story. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. 250, $4.95.)
- HEREDORO, MANUEL HIGUERAS. Standards of Position Classification in the Public Service. Madrid: Office of the Technical Secretary—General of the Ministry of Government, 1961. Pp. 202, 70 pesetas.
- HERTZ, FREDERICK. The Development of the German Public Mind, Vol. II. (New York: Macmillan Co., 1962. Pp. 482, $7.75.)
- HERZBERG, DONALD G. AND TILLET, PAUL. A Budget for New York State, 1956-1957. Inter-University Case Program No. 69. (University: University of Alabama Press, 1957. Pp. 33.)
- HINDERAKER, IVAN. American Government Annual, 1962-1963. (New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, Inc., 1962. Pp. 110.)
- HOCHFELD, GEORGE. Henry Adams: an Introduction and Interpretation. (New York: Barnes and Noble, 1962. Pp. x, 150, $2.95 cloth, $1.25 paperback.)
- HOMO, LÉON. Roman Political Institutions: From City to State. (New York: Barnes and Noble,

- 2nd edition, 1962; 1st edition, 1929. Pp. xviii, 426, $8.50.)
- HUNT, ERLING M. et al. High School Social Studies in Perspective. (Boston: Houghton-Mifflin Co., 1962. Pp. ix, 344, $3.75.)
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. Proceedings of the Third Institute for Tax Assessors, December 3-5, 1961. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1961. Pp. 159.
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. Fifty-Seventh Texas Legislature: A Review of Its Work. (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1962. Pp. 61, $1.00.)
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. Fourth County Auditors' Institute. (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1962. Pp. v, 61.)
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. Eighth Governmental Accounting and Financing Institute. (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1962. Pp. v, 108.)
- INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR SOCIAL SCIENCES DOCUMENTATION. International Bibliography of Political Science. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Co., 1962. Pp. 333, $10.00.)
- IRISH, MARIAN D. AND PROTHRO, JAMES W. The Politics of American Democracy. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 2nd Edition, 1962. Pp. xii, 658, $7.50.)
- JACOBINI, H. B. International Law, A Test. (Homewood: Dorsey Press, Inc., 1962. Pp. 304, $6.95.)
- JOYCE, JAMES AVERY. Capital Punishment: A World View. (New York: Grove Press, 1961. Pp. 288, $1.95 Evergreen paperback (1962).)
- JUVIGNY, PIERRE. Towards Equality in Education: The Fight Against Discrimination. (Paris: UNESCO, 1962. Pp. 65.)
- KAZNACHEEV, ALEKSANDR. Inside a Soviet Embassy: Experiences of a Russian Diplomat in Burma. (Edited by Simon Wolin. Philadelphia, J. B. Lippincott Co., 1962. Pp. 250, $4.95.)
- KENNEDY, ROBERT F. Just Friends and Brave Enemies... (New York: Harper and Row, 1962. Pp. xi, 206, $3.95.)
- KOHN, HANS. The Age of Nationalism. (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1962. Pp. xvi, 172, $4.50.)
- KRAFT, JOSEPH. The Grand Design: From Common Market to Atlantic Partnership. (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1962. Pp. 120, $2.95.)
- KREUZER, JAMES R. AND COGAN, LEE, editors. The Bobbs-Merrill Reader. (New York: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1962. Pp. ix, 440, paperback.)
- LANE, ROBERT E.; BARBER, JAMES D.; GREENSTEIN, FRED I. An Introduction to Political Analysis, 3rd Edition. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. 1st and 2nd editions, 1952 and 1957. Pp. v, 385, $4.95 paper workbook.)
- LAWRENCE, SAMUEL A. The Battery Additive Controversy. Inter-University Case Program, No. 68. (University: University of Alabama Press, 1962. Pp. 33.)
- LEE, RICHARD HENRY. Additional Number of Letters from the Federal Farmer to the Republican. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc., 1962. Pp. numbered according to letters, $5.00.)
- LEPAWSKY, ALBERT, editor. Agenda for International Training. (Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1962. Pp. 44, $1.50 paperback.)
- LINDSAY, A. D. The Modern Democratic State. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. 286, $1.75 paperback.)
- LIPSKY, GEORGE A. Ethiopia. (New Haven: Hraf Press, 1962. Pp. 376, $8.75.)
- LONDON INSTITUTE OF WORLD AFFAIRS. Year Book of World Affairs, 1962, Vol. 16. (London: Stevens and Sons, Ltd., 1962. Pp. xv, 344, £3 3s.)
- LOWENSTEIN, ALLARD K. Brutal Mandate: A Journey to South West Africa. (New York: Macmillan Co., 1962. Pp. vi, 257, $5.00.)
- MARQUARD, LEO. The Peoples and Policies of South Africa, 3rd Edition. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. vii, 284, $2.25.)
- MAY, GEORGE S. Michigan Civil War History: An Annotated Bibliography. (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1961. Pp. 141, $1.75 paperback.)
- MCCARDELL, LEE. Ill-Starred General: Braddock of the Coldstream Guards. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1958.)
- MELMAN, SEYMOUR, editor. No Place to Hide. (New York: Grove Press, 1962. Pp. 206, $.75.)
- MENEGAZZI, GUIDO. I Fondamenti Dell'ordine Vitale dei Popoli. (Milano: Dott A. Giuffrè, editore, 1961. Pp. (II) 465; (III) 457; (IV) 545. Lire 2500; Vol. IV, Lire 3000.)
- MEYER, KARL E. AND SZULE, TAD. The Cuban Invasion, Chronicle of Disaster. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. 156, $3.95.)
- MOSSE, GEORGE L. The Culture of Western Europe. (Chicago: Rand McNally and Co., 1961. Pp. 439, $6.50.)
- MULLEY, F. W. The Politics of Western Defense. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. viii, 272, $6.75.)
- NEALE, WALTER C. Economic Change in Rural India. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1962. Pp. xii, 325, $7.50.)
- NEVINS, ALLEN. The State Universities and Democracy. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1962. Pp. vii, 171, $2.95.)
- NISBET, ROBERT A. Community and Power. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Reprint)

- from 1953 title QUEST FOR COMMUNITY. $1.75 Galaxy paperback.)
- O'CONNOR, HARVEY. World Crisis in Oil. (New York: Monthly Review Press, 1962. Pp. xiii, 423, $7.50.)
- O'CONNOR, RAYMOND G. Perilous Equilibrium: The United States and the London Naval Conference of 1930. (Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1962. Pp. 180, $5.00.)
- O'MEARA, FRANCIS E. The New Age: Essays on the Future of the Western World. (New York: Exposition Press, 1962. Pp. 85, $3.00.)
- PAIKERT, G. C. The German Exodus: A Selective Study on the Post World War II Expulsion of German Populations and Its Effect. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1962. Pp. x, 97, guilders 8.50.)
- PANIKKAR, K. M. In Defence of Liberalism. (New York: Taplinger Publications, Inc., 1962. Pp. vi, 136, $4.50.)
- PARRIS, JOHN. The Lion of Caprera: A Biography of Giuseppe Garibaldi. (New York: David McKay Co., Inc., 1962. Pp. 347, $5.00.)
- PERKINS, DEXTER. The American Approach to Foreign Policy. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Revised edition; 1st edition, 1951. Pp. vii, 247, $4.95.)
- PLAINE, HENRY L. Darwin, Marx, and Wagner: A Symposium. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1962. Pp. viii, 165, $3.50.)
- PORTER, EUGENE O. Fallacies of Karl Marx. (El Paso: Texas Western Press, 1962. Pp. viii, 96, $5.00.)
- POWELL, THEODORE. Democracy in Action. (New York: Macmillan Co., 1962. Pp. 438, $3.25.)
- PLYEE, M. V. India's Constitution. (Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1962. Pp. vii, 380, $6.00.)
- RAMSEY, PAUL. Nine Modern Moralists. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1962. Pp. 271, $2.95 Spectrum paperback.)
- RAY, PHILIP ALEXANDER. South Wind Red: Our Hemispheric Crisis. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1962. Pp. viii, 242, $5.00.)
- RIDDELL, WALTER A. Documents of Canadian Foreign Policy, 1917-1939. (Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. xxi, 806, $13.50.)
- ROBBINS, ROY M. Our Landed Heritage: The Public Domain, 1776-1936. (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1962. Reprint from 1942 (Princeton University Press). Pp. vii, 423, $1.95 paperback.)
- ROCKEFELLER, NELSON A. The Future of Federalism. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press 1962. Pp. 83, $2.75.)
- SCHATTSHNEIDER, E. E. AND JONES, VICTOR. Local Political Surveys. (New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1962. Pp. v, 229, $3.75.)
- SCHIEDER, THEODOR, editor. Documents on the Expulsion of the Germans from Eastern Central Europe, Vols. II and III. (Bonn: Federal Ministry for Expellees, Refugees, and War Victims, 1962. Pp. viii, 355.)
- SCHIFF, ASHLEY L. Fire and Water: Scientific Heresy in the Forest Service. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. ix, 225, $5.00.)
- SCHUMAN, FREDERICK L. The Cold War Retrospect and Prospect. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1962. Pp. xv, 104, $3.50.)
- SHAPIRO, HENRY D. Confiscation of Confederate Property in the North. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1962. Pp. v, 58, $1.50.)
- SHARMA, INDRA D. Modern Constitutions at Work. (Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1962. Pp. v, 541, $8.50.)
- SHEPHERD, GEORGE W., JR. The Politics of African Nationalism: Challenge to American Policy. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. x, 216.)
- SHERWOOD, FRANK. United States City Planners in Iran. (Inter-University Case Program No. 70. University: University of Alabama Press, 1962. Pp. 25, $40.)
- SMITH, HENRY. The Economics of Socialism Reconsidered. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. x, 225, $4.80.)
- SMOTHERS, FRANK, editor. The Book of the States. (Chicago: Council of State Governments, 1962. Pp. 616.)
- STEBBINS, RICHARD P., editor. Documents on American Foreign Relations, 1961. (New York: Harper and Row, 1962. Pp. xxi, 555, $6.95.)
- STEEFEL, LAWRENCE D. Bismarck, the Hohenzollern Candidacy, and the Origins of the Franco-German War of 1870. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1962. Pp. xi, 281, $6.50.)
- STERN, CLARENCE A. Republican Heyday: Republicanism through the McKinley Years. (Ann Arbor: Edwards Brothers, 1962. Pp. vi, 45.)
- STUEBER, FRITZ A. The Contribution of Switzerland to the Economic and Social Development of Low-Income Countries. (Winterthur: P. G. Keller, 1962. Pp. 59 (pamphlet).)
- STILLMAN, EDMOND AND PFAFF, WILLIAM. The New Politics: America and the End of the Post-war World. (New York: Harper and Row, 1962. Pp. 191, $1.35 Harper Colophon paperback.)
- STRAUSS, LEWIS L. Men and Decisions. (New York: Doubleday and Co., 1962. Pp. viii, 430, $6.95.)
- SYRETT, HAROLD C. AND COOK, JACOB H., editors. The Papers of Alexander Hamilton, Vol. III. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962. Pp. xii, 745, $12.50.)
- TOYNBEE, ARNOLD J. A Study of History, Vols. V and VI. (London: Oxford University Press, 1962. Reprints. Pp. Vol. V, 712; Vol. VI, 633; Vol. V, $2.75; Vol. VI, $2.45 Galaxy paperbacks.)

- TOYNBEE, ARNOLD J. America and the World Revolution. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1962. Pp. 231, $4.75.)
- TURNER, LYNN W. William Plumer of New Hampshire. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1962. Pp. 366, $7.50.)
- UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS. Statistical Abstract of the United States, 83rd Edition. (Washington, D. C.: United States Government Printing Office, 1962. Pp. 1036.)
- VANEK, JAROSLAV. The Balance of Payments, Level of Economic Activity, and the Value of Currency. (Geneva: Librairie E. Droz, 1962. Pp. 36.)
- VEICHOPOULOS, NICOLAS. Traité des Territoires Dependants. (Athens: French Institute of Athens, 1960. Pp. 455.)
- VERNON, RAYMOND. Myth and Reality of Our Urban Problems. (Cambridge: Joint Center for Urban Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University, 1962. Pp. 84.)
- WALDO, DWIGHT. Organization Theory: An Elephantine Problem. Reprint No. 3. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1962. Pp. 210-225, $.25 paperback.)
- WALDO, DWIGHT. Bureaucracy. Reprint No. 5. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1962. Pp. 732-739, $.25 paperback.)
- WALKER, WARREN S. James Fenimore Cooper, an Introduction and Interpretation. (New York: Barnes and Noble, 1962. Pp. xv, 142, $2.95 cloth; $1.25 paperback.)
- WARD, HARRY M. The Department of War: 1781-1795. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1962. Pp. xi, 287, $4.95.)
- WARNER, W. LLOYD. The Corporation in the Emergent American Society. (New York: Harper and Row, 1962. Pp. 64, $3.00.)
- WEBER, MAX. Basic Concepts in Sociology. (New York: Philosophical Library, 1962. Pp. 123, $3.75.)
- WHITING, KENNETH R. The Soviet Union Today: A Concise Handbook. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1962. Pp. ix, 405, $7.50.)
- WRIGHT, DAVID McCORD. The Keynesian System. (New York: Fordham University Press, 1962. Pp. vii, 90, $3.00.)
- WRIGHT, EDMOND T. Ladies and Gentlemen of the Jury. (New York: Exposition Press, 1962. Pp. 166, $3.50.)
- WRIGHT, RICHARD. Elements of Government in California. (New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1962. Pp. ix, 131, $1.96.)
- ZIMMERMAN, JOSEPH F. State and Local Government. (New York: Barnes and Noble, 1962. Pp. xiii, 352, $1.85 paperback.)
- ZINK, HAROLD. Modern Governments. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand and Co., Inc., 1962. 1st edition. 1958. Pp. xv, 804, $6.95.)

NEWS AND NOTES

NOMINATIONS

The Association's Committee on Nominations invites all members to propose candidates for the elective offices of the Association, to wit: President-elect, three Vice Presidents, Secretary, Treasurer, and eight members for two-year terms on the Council. Suggestions and supporting statements may be sent to any member of the Committee: Jack Peltason, University of Illinois, Chairman; Weldon Cooper, University of Virginia; John Lewis, Oberlin College; Rupert Emerson, Harvard University; J. Austin Ranney, University of Illinois (after February 1, University of Wisconsin); Robert Scalapino, University of California (Berkeley). The sooner suggestions are received the better; to be considered at all they must arrive by March 15, 1963.

1963 PROGRAM

Since the notice in the June issue, John D. Montgomery, Boston University has been appointed Chairman for the Special Topic sessions on Problems of the Developing Countries; and Allen S. Whiting, Department of State, has succeeded Zbigniew Brzezinski, who is on leave, as Chairman for Politics of the Soviet Bloc.

The 1963 Program, as in 1962, will include sessions for brief contributed papers, to be selected on a competitive basis of merit from those offered. Typescripts of papers for consideration should be submitted by May 1, 1963. Accepted papers will be read by their authors, either in special sessions or in regular panels, as the Program Committee determines. Prospective authors are invited to correspond with the Chairman for Selected Papers, Professor J. David Singer, Mental Health Research Institute, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

Fifty-eighth Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association: Minutes of the Council Meeting

The Council of the American Political Science Association met at 9:00 A.M., September 4, 1962, in the Virginia Room of the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C. with President Charles S. Hyneman presiding. The following members of the Council, nominees for election in 1962, and former presidents of the Association were present: William Anderson, Franklin L. Burdette, Byrum E. Carter, Lawrence Durisch, William O. Farber, Carl J. Friedrich, Alfred de Grazia, John Hallowell, H. Field Haviland, Jr., Alexander Heard, Pendleton Herring, V. O. Key, Jr., Evron M. Kirkpatrick, Joseph La Palombara, Robert E. Lane, Ruth Lawson, John D. Lewis, Harvey C. Mansfield, Ithiel de Sola Pool,

C. Herman Pritchett, Emmette S. Redford, Leo C. Riethmayer, Lester G. Seligman, Richard C. Snyder, Harold H. Sprout, Kenneth W. Thompson, Vernon Van Dyke, Dwight Waldo, Robert E. Ward, John D. Williams, Bryce Wood.

Prior to the meeting the Executive Director had mailed to each Council member reports from the Executive Director, Editor of the APSR, Representative to ACLS, Representative to AAAS, Treasurer, Auditor, Committee on Standards of Instruction. These reports were the basis of Council discussion in the morning session.

The Executive Director reported continuing cooperation with other social science organizations and improvement in the status of political science with the National Science Foundation. In response to questioning, the Director noted that the National Science Foundation has made several grants for political science projects in the past year: to Karl Deutsch and Harold Lasswell for a data assembly and analysis program and to Duncan MacRae for a study of the use of computers in election analyses. The Director's Report stressed the extension of working relations with Congress: the expansion of the Congressional Fellowship Program to include federal career executives ("the first planned attempt to create mutual understanding among employees of the legislative and executive branches"); the establishment of the Senate Youth Program, financed by the William Randolph Hearst Foundation, which will bring two outstanding high school students from each state to Washington in January, 1963, "for an intensive introduction to the Federal Government"; the promotion of an in-service training program for staff members of congressional committees. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Council accept the Report of the Executive Director.

Carl Friedrich reported on the recent agreement between the APSA and the Atherton Press. This agreement is on an annual renewal basis and can be terminated at any time by the APSA. Under the contract, the Atherton Press now has priority in the publication in book form of papers presented at the annual meetings of the Association. The Program Committee this year was acquainted with the agreement. In response to questions, Mr. Friedrich indicated that the new publication arrangement does not cover all, but only a selected number of papers. It is anticipated that the professional journals and reviews will continue to publish some of the best papers. The APSA is not subsidizing publication. As to royalties, the Atherton Press will offer the usual contractual relationship to authors but APSA may expect some monetary returns for its editorial services in selection of manuscripts. In connection with the program, the Atherton Press is establishing a prize for outstanding scholarly monographs.

The Managing Editor of the REVIEW, Harvey Mansfield, reported that, due to personnel problems, the September and December issues of the REVIEW will not carry the international relations bibliography, and that a decision on its resumption is in abeyance pending expressions of demand. On recommendation of the Editor, Rowland Egger and Andrew Hacker will replace Alexander Heard and Wallace Sayre, retiring members of the Editorial Board. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Council accept the Report of the Managing Editor.

Max Kampelman, summarizing the Treasurer's Report, noted that "the financial picture of APSA is a healthy one." The endowment fund has grown to $100,000, an increase of $25,000 over last year. During the past five or six years $2,000,000 in grants has been received for special projects administered by the Association. The Council requested that letters of appreciation be sent to those who gave gifts or grants to the Association during the past year. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the budget be approved as it appears in the Treasurer's Report.

Under general announcements, the Executive Director noted a good response to the new group accident insurance plan for members, which becomes effective October 1, 1962; also that the World Tour Seminar is growing, with eighty-seven people already signed up for the tour, scheduled August 1 to September 10, 1963.

Mr. Friedrich reported that the IPSA would meet September 8 in Freudenstadt, Germany, with several members of APSA attending. Topics for discussion at this meeting would include "Political Role of the Courts" and "The Theory of Constitutionalism." A meeting of IPSA has been proposed at Oxford in 1963 and at Geneva in 1964.

The APSA members on the Board of Directors for SSRC this year were David Truman, James Coleman, and Roland Pennock. President Hyne- man appointed David Truman for a second term on the Board.

Byrum Carter, reporting on the status of political science in elementary and secondary schools, pointed out that a number of states have enacted statutes that require courses about communism to be taught in the public schools. He announced the preparation of a study guide with an annotated bibliography by Carter and Alfred Diamant under APSA auspices. The guide discusses "the Soviet Union as a going system."

The afternoon session was given over to general discussion of three interrelated topics: relationship with the elementary and secondary schools, the status and prospects of the profession of political science, and the concern of APSA for "the democratic process." The continuation of discussion on Byrum Carter's report led to a motion, seconded and passed:

that the Association undertake a major review of the framework of inquiry and the teaching methods in respect to political and civic topics in elementary and secondary schools (comparable to those undertaken in mathematics, physics, and economics) and take appropriate steps to modify and improve inquiry and teaching in these fields. As measures to this end, the Council urges continuing attention by the Executive Committee to the recommendations of the Fellman Committee as well as consideration of the following specific actions: (a) developing and encouraging pamphlets to supplement textbook materials; (b) preparing lists of suggested reading materials, audio-visual, and other teaching aids; (c) encouraging establishment of summer programs for teachers in this field; (d) enlisting the cooperation of regional political science associations; (e) consulting directly with the appropriate groups and agencies; (f) promoting professional interest and concern in selection and adoption of textbooks in government; and (g) making a systematic survey of legal requirements, administrative regulations, and political practices in the choice of social studies materials.

On the status and prospects of the profession, President Hyneman reported that "the Lasswell Document" now in preparation will be ready in November. Ithiel de Sola Pool reported that the Committee on Science has been exploring "the politics of science" with a view to securing greater recognition for the science of politics. Mr. Kirkpatrick commented on the status of the Millett Report, a statement by the Committee on Standards of Instruction which appears in the June, 1962, issue of the REVIEW.

Discussion of the third topic, APSA concern with the effective functioning of the democratic process, focused on a resolution brought to the Council in person by James M. Burns, preliminary to its introduction at the general Business Meeting. This resolution proposes the establishment of a commission to assess the election and organization of the executive and legislative branches of the federal government and the relation between the two branches, with power to make recommendations. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Council approve in principle the resolution submitted by Mr. Burns and recommend it for consideration by the Association at its Business Meeting.

It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Council send Sigmund Neumann, a member of the Council, a telegram expressing concern for his illness.

The Council adjourned at 5:00 P.M.

MARIAN D. IRISH, Secretary

Minutes of the Annual Business Meeting

The Annual Business Meeting of the American Political Science Association was called to order by President Charles Hyneman in the Grand Ballroom of the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., at 4:30 P.M., September 5, 1962.

The minutes of the Council meeting of September 4, 1962, were read by Secretary Marian Irish and upon her motion, the minutes were approved as read.

Harvey Mansfield, Editor of the REVIEW, commented briefly on his report which had been distributed to the members prior to the meeting. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Editor's report be accepted.

Evron Kirkpatrick, the Executive Director, made a brief report on Association activities. In particular, the Director called attention to the new Atherton Press Agreement. The main provisions of this agreement call for the publication of selected papers presented at the Annual Meeting, a monograph series, and the establishment of a $1000 prize to be given each year for the best original manuscript in the field of political science. The prize was awarded for the first time at this year's Annual Meeting. A letter giving the details of this agreement with Atherton Press will be sent to the members by the Director. The Director mentioned that the new group accident insurance program and Senate Youth Program showed promise of being highly successful during the coming year. In conclusion, the Director expressed his appreciation to the officers of the Association and particularly to the President for their generous and cooperative efforts. Written reports of the activities of the Office of the Executive Director were distributed at the meeting. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Executive Director's report be accepted.

Max Kampelman, Treasurer, discussed his report which had been distributed to the members prior to the meeting. He reported that the financial affairs of the Association are in healthy condition, reviewed briefly the income and expenses for the past year, called attention to the numerous foundation grants, and reviewed the proposed budget for the coming fiscal year. It was moved, seconded, and passed that the Treasurer's report be accepted.

J. Roland Pennock, Chairman of the Nominating Committee, recommended the following slate of officers and council members for 1962-1963:

President-elect: C. Herman Pritchett (University of Chicago)

Vice Presidents: Alexander Heard (University of North Carolina); John D. Lewis (Oberlin College); and Wallace S. Sayre (Columbia University)

Secretary: Ruth Lawson (Mt. Holyoke College)

Treasurer: Max M. Kampelman (Washington, D. C.).

Members of the Council for two years: Franklin Burdette (University of Maryland); Charles B. Hagan (University of Illinois); H. Field Haviland, Jr. (Brookings Institution); Joseph La Palombara (Michigan State University); Robert E. Lane (Yale University); Ithiel de Sola Pool (Massachusetts Institute of Technology); Harold H. Sprout (Princeton University); and Sheldon S. Wolin (University of California).

Mr. Pennock moved approval of the slate. The motion was seconded and passed unanimously.

James Titus appeared briefly before the meeting to express appreciation to the Senate and the Subcommittee on Freedom of Information for preparing and publishing the materials on the 1960 presidential campaign.

Charles D. Hounshell, National Representative, Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship

Foundation, presented the following statement to the meeting:

The Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation attracts men and women to the profession of college teaching by annually awarding fellowships to 1000 prospective first-year graduate students. We have just received $27.5 million from the Ford Foundation to carry on our work through 1968.

It has been estimated that the number of full-time teachers of political science needed annually will rise during this decade from 450 to 600, while the present annual production of Ph.D.'s in political science is approximately 200, a large percentage of whom do not go into college teaching.

You will be interested in knowing that 558 of the seven thousand Wilson Fellows have been political scientists. In the early years of the program 19 per cent of the Wilson Fellows were political scientists, but in recent years this figure has dropped to about 7 per cent.

There are two new aspects of the Wilson program designed in part to reduce the time span between entering graduate school and earning the Ph.D. First, the Regional Selection Committees will give preference to candidates who are fully prepared for graduate study, including the possession of competence in foreign language.

Second, the Wilson Foundation has launched a Dissertation-Year Fellowship Program which seeks to demonstrate that all Ph.D. requirements can be met within a four year period. Deans of graduate schools may nominate former Wilson Fellows for the 200 dissertation-year awards. Selections will be made by committees in each of the disciplines. I am pleased to announce that Professor Edgar S. Furniss of Princeton University has agreed to serve as chairman of the committee to select political scientists for the dissertation-year awards.

The specific task of the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation involves the general problem of the effective allocation and utilization of intellectual talent in a free society.

We would be glad to hear from any of you who have a research interest in this area.

James Burns appeared before the members to present the following resolution:

Be it resolved that:

This Association recommend to the President and Congress the establishment of a commission to examine and evaluate the election and organization of the executive and legislative branches of the federal government, and the relations between the two branches with power to make recommendations;

Be it further resolved that:

This Association proffer its full cooperation in the work of such a commission.

It was moved and seconded that the Association adopt this resolution. After some discussion, a motion was made to table the motion but this was later withdrawn. The motion to adopt the resolution was then put to a vote and passed.

President Hyneman expressed his appreciation to the officers and council members for their generous cooperation and excellent assistance during the past year.

President Carl Friedrich took the chair as the new president. He expressed the Association's gratitude to President Hyneman for his fine work during the past year.

The meeting was adjourned at 6:00 P.M.

MARIAN D. IRISH, Secretary

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The XIIth International Congress of Administrative Sciences, held in Vienna 16-20 July, 1962, attracted over 500 participants from 75 countries and 15 international organizations. New Officers elected for three years are: Herbert Emmerich (USA), President; Henri Matton (Belgium), Gustavo Martinez-Cabanas (Mexico), Raymond Nottage (U.K.), and Nikola Stjepanovic (Yugoslavia), Vice-Presidents.

Seats on the Executive Committee are held ex officio by chairmen of standing committees, elected as follows: Administrative Practices, Erik Pers Lassen (Denmark); Scientific, Henry Puget (France); Contracts, Andre Molitor (Belgium); Editorial Board, Laureano Lopez Rodo (Spain); Comparative Administrative Cases, G. A. van Poelje (Netherlands). Six alternate members of the Executive Committee were elected: T. B. Balta (Turkey); Hans Krauthausen (West Germany); Edwin Loebenstein (Australia); Tahar Mekouar (Morocco); V. K. Menon (India); Ten That Trach (Vietnam).

Under the revised statutes, confirmed by the General Assembly at Vienna, the next Congress will take place in 1965. There will be a smaller Round Table in 1964, but 1963 is left free for regional conferences. (The representatives of Mexico reported they were considering a hemispheric conference for the Americas in 1963.)

A leading element in the Vienna Congress was a series of sessions, attended by nearly 150 persons representing schools and institutions concerned with training for public administration. An ad hoc steering committee, chaired by Donald C. Stone (USA), presented for consideration by the Executive Committee a program whereby IIAS could meet the felt needs of some 80 such national institutions by serving as a clearing house, to promote the provision of more effective teaching materials, etc.

The themes selected for study and debate at the next Congress are: participation of the citizen in the conduct of public administration; new techniques of budget preparation and management; the internal administration of public economic enterprises.

There were over thirty participants from USA, many on mission in countries as diverse as Nigeria, Sudan, Indonesia, Pakistan, Yugoslavia, Vietnam, Philippines, Italy, Thailand. The leaders of the U. S. group were Elmer B. Staats and Stephen B. Sweeney, past president and president of ASPA. G. W. Lawson, Jr., was U. S. member of the Committee on Administrative Practices; Walter Gellhorn, U. S. member of the Committee on Comparative Cases; Charles S. Ascher, U. S. member of the Contracts Committee.

The new officers of the American Society of International Law are: Dean Rusk, honorary president; Hardy C. Dillard, president; James N. Hyde, Brunson MacChesney, Marjorie Whiteman, vice-presidents; Edward Dumbauld, Secretary; Monroe Leight, treasurer.

The International Studies Association, a group of teachers, researchers and others devoted to the interdisciplinary approach to the study of international relations, recently held its third annual meeting at Portland State College, Portland, Oregon. The topic of the meeting was "The Developed Nations of the Free World: Problems and Prospects."

The following new officers of the organization were elected: Fred A. Sondermann, The Colorado College, president; Charles McClelland, San Francisco State College, first vice president; Karlin Capper Johnson, Lewis and Clark College, second vice president; Charles LaCugna, University of Seattle, treasurer; Mark Cannon, Brigham Young University, secretary; John Pustay, U. S. Air Force Academy, assistant secretary. Josef Korbel of the University of Denver, and Minos Generales, San Diego State College were elected to the executive board of the group. Colonel Wesley Posvar of the U. S. Air Force Academy joins the executive board as the out-going president.

The ISA plans next year to expand its membership and coverage on a nation-wide basis, to publish a journal devoted to recent trends in interdisciplinary research in the international field, and to sponsor professional meetings for members of various disciplines. Inquiries and other communications are invited. Please address these to Dr. Fred A. Sondermann, The Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colorado.

The 20th Congress of the Institut International de Sociologie, originally scheduled for September 1962 at Cordoba, Argentina, has been postponed to 1963, to coincide with the celebration of the 35th anniversary of the founding of the National University of Cordoba. The date and program will be announced later.

The United States Department of State and the Hoover Institution at Stanford University are publishing jointly: "A catalogue of files and microfilms of the German foreign ministry archives, 1920-1945." This catalogue, consisting of three volumes, will list for the period 1920 to 1945 all files from the political archives of the German foreign ministry that were seized by the American and British armies at the end of World War II. It will continue and complete the work of the catalog of German foreign ministry files and microfilms, 1867-1920 which was published by the American Historical Association in 1959. The catalog will include the title, number and date of all files contained in the archives, and the corresponding serial and frame numbers of those files that were microfilmed. It was compiled and prepared for printing by Dr. George O. Kent of the historical office of the department of state and its publication and distribution will be financed by the Hoover Institution. Volume I is scheduled to be published in the summer of 1962. The remaining volumes are scheduled to appear, respectively, late in 1962 and in 1963.

GORDON E. BAKER, associate professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara, has been awarded a faculty research fellowship by the Social Science Research Council.

RICHARD D. BAKER, instructor in government at the University of Oklahoma, has been granted a two year leave of absence to accept an assignment with the University of Tennessee under grants from AID to set up a political science program at the University of Panama.

SAMUEL H. BARNES, political science department, University of Michigan, will be on leave in 1962-63 on Fulbright grant to lecture at the University of Florence, Italy.

CHESTER L. BARROWES retired as professor and chairman of history and government at Adelphi College, effective July, 1962.

OLIVER E. BENSON, professor of government at the University of Oklahoma, will become the director of the bureau of government research, in September, 1962.

EDWARD M. BERSHTEIN of Purdue University has been granted leave of absence in order to permit him to serve as Counsel on the Presidential Commission on the Status of Women in Washington, D. C.

GUTHRIE S. BIRKHEAD, professor of political science at Syracuse University, has accepted an assignment to serve as Syracuse representative at the Administrative Staff College, Lahore, Pakistan, for the coming year.

WILLIAM W. BOYER, associate professor of political science, University of Pittsburgh has been granted a leave of absence for two years to become advisor to the University of Punjab, Lahore, Pakistan to develop a doctoral program in public administration.

R. WALLACE BREWSTER, professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University, will serve as visiting professor of political science at Haverford College during the academic year 1962-63.

HERBERT W. BRIGGS of Cornell was elected a member of the International Law Commission by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

GEORGE BRINKLEY of Notre Dame is spending a year in Russia.

FRED G. BURKE, assistant professor of political science at Syracuse University, will be on leave of absence for the coming year for research in East Africa.

FRANKLIN M. BRIDGE has resigned the position of assistant director of research projects of the bureau of governmental research and associate professor of political science at the University of Colorado, to become chief of local government research in the office of local government services of the state of New York.

ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI of the department of public law and government and director of the research institute on communist affairs, Columbia University, will be on leave during the academic year, 1962-63.

PHILIP H. BURCH, JR. has been appointed as assistant research specialist in the bureau of government research at Rutgers University.

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE, University of Maryland, has been appointed by the governor to the chairmanship of a state commission on legislative reapportionment in Maryland.

PAUL CASTLEBERRY, Washington State University, has been awarded a research scholar's grant under the Fulbright Act and will spend the 1962-63 academic year in Turkey.

GEORGE ANDREWS CONDON, acting instructor in political science at Washington State University has been awarded a Congressional Fellowship for 1962-63 by the American Political Science Association.

ALFREDO PAREJA DIEZCONSECCO has been appointed in political science at the University of Florida to work with the University of Florida Portuguese-Spanish Area Studies Institute, which has been established under the federal national defense program funds.

BEATRICE DINERMAN, formerly public administration analyst, bureau of governmental research, University of California at Los Angeles, has been appointed director of a three-year Ford Foundation project to be conducted under the auspices of the Welfare Planning Council of Los Angeles.

ROBERT B. DOVE will serve as assistant professor of political science at The Citadel for 1962-63, as a replacement for Donald Fairchild who will be on leave.

ALEX N. DRAGNICH will be on an overseas assignment to Ankara University, Ankara, Turkey for 1962-63 under the auspices of Vanderbilt University.

WILLIAM B. EDDY, Michigan State University, has joined the faculty of the University of Missouri, working with the graduate program in public administration.

HARRIS I. EFFROSS has been promoted to assistant research specialist in the bureau of government research at Rutgers University.

RAYMOND ENGLISH will spend 1962-63 year on sabbatical in England. During his absence S. R. McGowan will serve as acting chairman of the department of political science at Kenyon College in Gambier, Ohio.

VERNON L. FERWERDA will be on leave during the 1962-63 academic year from his position as chairman of the department of government, Trinity College, to serve as director, U. S.-U. N. Interpretation, for the department of international affairs of the national council of churches.

EDWIN FOGELMAN, associate professor at the University of Oklahoma, and presently visiting associate professor at the University of Minnesota, will be at the institute for behavioral sciences, Palo Alto, during 1962-63.

RUSSELL O. FUDGE, who for the past three years was course director at the United States Army War College, Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania, for international relations and United States foreign policy, has retired from the regular army to become an associate professor of political science at Howard Payne College, Brownwood, Texas.

BERNARD K. GORDON has been given a leave of absence from Vanderbilt University during 1962-63 to join the staff of the institute for defense analysis.

DONALD J. GRADY will serve as instructor in the department of political science at the University of Washington during 1962-63.

MALBONE WATSON GRAHAM retired June 30, 1962 after forty-two years. Speaking to his career and retirement at a farewell sendoff on May 25 were Homer Durham, president, Arizona State University; Malcolm C. Moss, Rockefeller Foundation; and H. Arthur Steiner, professor of political science, UCLA.

DAVID H. GURBBS, assistant professor of political science at the University of Tennessee is on loan to the Tennessee state planning commission for a two year period beginning September 1962 where he will serve as director of research.

VINCENT W. HAUGE has been given a one-year appointment as instructor of government at Purdue, effective June, 1962.

RUTH R. HAWKINS, formerly assistant professor at West Liberty State College, has been given a one-year appointment as assistant professor of government, effective September, 1962 at Purdue University.

SAMUEL P. HAYES has been appointed as president of the foreign policy association as of September, 1962.

CLINTON S. HERRICK will serve as assistant professor of political science at the Citadel for 1962-63 as a replacement for Paul J. Kingston who will be on leave.

JOSEPH JIANG and YUNG-MIN KIM of Indiana University have been appointed research assistants in the institute of advanced projects at the University of Hawaii's east-west center for the year 1962-63.

ROY JUMPER, associate professor of political science at Wake Forest College, spent the spring semester, 1962, in South Viet Nam as a consultant with the agency for international development. He will continue on leave during 1962-63 to serve as consultant in public administration for the Ford Foundation in Beirut, Lebanon.

GEORGE McT. KAHIN of Cornell University, department of government, will be on leave 1962-63 at the University of London.

BOYD R. KEENAN, assistant professor of government at Marshall University, has accepted the associate directorship of the committee on institutional cooperation with headquarters at Purdue University. In addition, he will teach in the government department.

YOUNG C. KIM, Hobart and Smith College, is serving as visiting assistant professor of political science at Vanderbilt University during 1962-63.

HANS KOHN is serving as John Hay Whitney visiting professor emeritus for the academic year 1962-63 with the department of international relations and the department of history, University of Denver.

ENVER M. KOURY, formerly lecturer in government and politics program of the University of Maryland, has been transferred to the European program of the University of Maryland.

MORTON KROLL, University of Washington, will be on leave 1962-63 to serve under a Smith-Mundt award as visiting professor of political science at the University College at the University of British West Indies.

RUTH C. LAWSON, professor of political science and chairman of the department at Mount Holyoke College has been granted an American society of international law research fellowship.

AVERY LEISERSON is taking a year's research leave (1962-63) from Vanderbilt University to spend as senior fellow of the social science research council.

WERNER LEVI, of the University of Minnesota, is visiting professor at the University of Hawaii during the 1962-63 school year.

CHARLES E. MARTIN, University of Washington, retired in June 1962 after having served the political science department since 1924. He has accepted appointment as professor of American studies at the University of Philippines, effective in July.

GEORGE MAUER has been appointed on a full-time basis as assistant director of the bureau of government research at the University of Oklahoma.

VERNON MCKAY, professor of African Studies, the Johns Hopkins University school of advanced international studies, has been elected chairman of the State Department's Advisory Council on African affairs.

EDWARD W. MILL, department of political science, Long Island University, has accepted a new position as chevalier professor of diplomacy and world affairs at Occidental College in Los Angeles.

GERHART NIEMEYER, Notre Dame, is spending a year at Munich on a Fulbright Scholarship.

STANLEY PERRY, C.S.C. of Notre Dame, is spending a year at Munich.

O. WILLIAM PERLMUTTER will be visiting professor of political science at the University of Minnesota during the academic year 1962-63.

RICHARD H. PFAFF, assistant professor of political science, University of Colorado, is spending the 1962-63 year in Iran and other countries of the middle East, under a Fulbright research award.

LAURENCE I. RADWAY, chairman of the government department at Dartmouth College, is on leave for 1961-63 to serve on the faculty of the National War College.

ERNEST C. REOCK, JR. has been promoted to associate research specialist and director of the bureau of government research at Rutgers University.

ROSS R. RICE of Arizona State University is visiting professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara, for 1962-63.

JOHN P. ROCHE, of Brandeis University, has been appointed visiting professor of political science and of the social sciences in the college at the University of Chicago for the academic year 1962-63.

GEORGE K. ROMOSER of the University of New Hampshire, has been appointed Fulbright professor at the University of Mainz, Germany, for the academic year 1962-63.

VICTORIA SCHUCK, professor of political science, Mount Holyoke, has been appointed a member of the state advisory committee for Massachusetts, to the United States commission on civil rights.

WALTER R. SHARP has been appointed Ford research professor in public affairs at Yale University for the year 1962-63.

MULFORD Q. SIBLEY of the University of Minnesota will be visiting professor in the department of government during the 1962-63 academic year at Cornell.

FRANKLIN SMALLWOOD of the government department at Dartmouth College is on leave for 1962-63.

HERMAN M. SOMERS, professor of political science at Haverford College, will be serving as counsellor to the international labour office in Geneva during the academic year, 1962-63.

JOHN W. SPANIER, assistant professor of political science at the University of Florida, will be visiting assistant professor of political science at Haverford College, 1962-63.

DAVID SPITZ, professor of political science at the Ohio State University, is serving as visiting Fulbright professor at the Bologna Center of the Johns Hopkins University in Bologna, Italy, 1962-63.

WILLIAM S. STOKES, senior professor of comparative political institutions, Claremont Men's College, is spending the year 1962-63 as professor of foreign affairs at the National War College.

ROBERT S. SULLIVANT of DePauw University has been appointed visiting associate professor of political science at the University of Chicago for the academic year 1962-63.

THOMAS LANDON THORSON, assistant professor of political science, received the William H. Kiekhof Award of $1000 for distinguished teaching at the University of Wisconsin. He will be on leave in Europe during 1962-63 on a John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Fellowship.

PIO ULIASSI of the United States State Department has been appointed a senior fellow of the research institute on communist affairs, Columbia University.

S. P. VARMA, university professor of political science, University of Rajasthan, Jaipur, India, has accepted an appointment as visiting professor of political science in the University of Oregon for the academic year 1962-63.

KENNETH N. VINES of Tulane University is serving as visiting associate professor of political science at Vanderbilt University.

NICHOLAS WAHL, assistant professor of government, Harvard University, is on leave in 1962-63 as a visiting research fellow of Nuffield College, Oxford University.

LOUIS WASSERMAN, professor of government and philosophy, San Francisco State College, is in Denmark for the 1962-63 academic year.

DONALD ZAGORIA of the Rand Corporation has been appointed a senior fellow of the research institute on communist affairs, Columbia University.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

THOMAS R. ADAM will be acting head of the all-university department of government and international relations at New York University for the academic year 1962-63.

MINOO ADENWALLA of Lawrence College has been promoted to associate professor and is spending the academic year of 1962-63 in London under a grant from the Lawrence College Asian studies program and from the Howard Foundation.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, formerly of the University of Texas, has accepted an appointment for 1962-63 as instructor in social sciences at Southwest Texas State College, San Marcos, Texas.

ALAN A. ALTSHULER, formerly of the University of Chicago, has been appointed assistant professor of government, beginning in the fall term of 1962, at Cornell.

STEPHEN ANDERSON has been appointed instructor in the government department at Boston University.

MORLEY AYEARTS has been promoted to professor and will be chairman of the department of government and international relations, Washington Square College, New York University.

JOHN H. BADGLEY, who has just returned from Burma, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Miami University.

HOYT B. BALLARD, formerly of the University of Texas, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of government at Texas College of Arts and Industries, Kingsville, Texas.

WILLIAM F. BARBER, retired foreign service and department of state officer has been appointed lecturer in international affairs in the department of government and politics at the University of Maryland.

RICHARD W. BARRON, who has been lecturer in political science at the University of Virginia, has been appointed professor of political science at Longwood College.

JAMES BARROS of Columbia University has been appointed assistant professor of government at Dartmouth College.

PHILIP BEACH has been appointed instructor of political science at Washington State University.

GEORGE D. BEAM has been appointed instructor in the department of political science at University of Michigan.

THOMAS J. BENNETT, has been appointed instructor of political science at Marquette University.

HERMAN G. BERKMAN, formerly professor of land economics at the University of Wisconsin, has been appointed professor of planning, graduate school of public administration, New York University.

HOWARD J. BIDDULPH has been appointed instructor in political science at Rutgers University.

ALLAN D. BLOOM, formerly of Cornell, has been appointed visiting assistant professor at Yale University.

VIRGIL C. BLUM, S.J. has been named chairman of the department of political science at Marquette University.

SHARON BOEN has been appointed instructor in political science at Northern Michigan College.

LOUIS F. BRAKEMAN has been appointed assistant professor of government at Denison University.

J. CUDD BROWN has become professor of political science and chairman of the social science division, Sonoma State College, Cotati, California.

D. MACKENZIE BROWN, professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara, has been appointed acting chairman of the department for 1962-63.

DONALD J. BROWNETT has been appointed lecturer in government and politics in the Atlantic Program of the University of Maryland.

CLAUDE BURTENSHAW has been appointed dean of students at Utah State University in Logan, and professor of political science.

ELEANORE BUSHNESS has become full professor in the department of history and political science at University of Nevada.

ROBERT S. CAHILL of the University of Oregon has been appointed assistant professor of political science at University of Hawaii.

DAVID P. CALLEO of Yale University has been promoted to assistant professor of political science. He is also director of undergraduate studies in political science.

WESLEY D. CAMP has been named professor and chairman of the history and government department at Adelphi College, effective July, 1962.

PHILIP CHAPMAN of University of California, has been appointed instructor of government at Lawrence College.

JAMES B. CHRISTOPH has been promoted to associate professor at Ohio State University.

CHARLTON F. CHUTE, formerly director, institute of public administration, has been appointed professor of public administration, graduate school of public administration, New York University.

TADEUSZ CIEPLAK, formerly of McGill University, has been appointed an assistant professor at San Francisco State College.

WALTER C. CLEMENS, JR. has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara.

OLIVER E. CLUBB, JR., has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Syracuse University and executive officer of the South Asia committee of the Maxwell center for overseas operations.

JOYOTPAUL CHAUDHURI has been appointed an instructor in government at the University of Oklahoma.

WILDER W. CRANE, JR., has resigned at Vanderbilt University to accept a position as associate professor at the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee.

DON M. CREGIER has accepted an appointment as assistant professor to the history and political science department at Keuka College.

RICHARD DALE, Princeton University, has been appointed instructor at the University of New Hampshire.

VINCENT DAVIS, Dartmouth College, has been appointed as assistant professor of international relations and staff member of the social science foundation, University of Denver, beginning September, 1962.

VERA MICHELES DEAN, formerly director of research, foreign policy association and professor of international relations at University of Rochester, has been appointed professor of international development, graduate school of public administration, New York University.

CLARE DENTON, formerly of the University of California at Berkeley, has been appointed an instructor at San Francisco State College.

MARTHA DERTHICK of the MIT-Harvard Center for urban studies has been appointed visiting lecturer in the government department at Dartmouth College.

BRUCE B. DEXTER has been appointed lecturer in government and politics in the Atlantic Program of the University of Maryland.

ROBERT H. DIX has been appointed instructor in political science at Yale University.

JOHN D. DONNELL of the institute of international studies of the University of California at Berkeley has been appointed assistant professor of government at Dartmouth College.

MARION DORO has been appointed visiting lecturer for 1962-63 at Connecticut College.

JOSEPH C. DOUGHERTY has been appointed lecturer in government and politics in the European program of the University of Maryland.

THOMAS R. DYE, has joined the University of Wisconsin, department of political science, University extension division as an assistant professor.

EDGAR SHLOMO EFRAT, formerly at the University of Texas Middle East Institute, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at Victoria, College, Victoria, British Columbia.

ROWLAND A. EGGER has been appointed acting dean of faculty at the University of Virginia.

JEDON A. EMERHISER has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor at Utah State University.

FREDERICK C. ENGELMANN, formerly of Alfred University, has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Alberta, Calgary, effective September, 1962.

JOHN ERIKSEN has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of government at the University of Oklahoma.

RICHARD A. FALK has been appointed associate professor of international law at Princeton University.

ROBERT A. FAULKNER has been appointed instructor in the department of politics, Princeton University.

JAMES W. FESLER has been appointed chairman of the department of political science at Yale University.

WILLIAM S. FLASH has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Vermont.

JOSEPH P. FORD, Harvard University, has accepted an appointment as an instructor at the University of New Hampshire.

WAYNE L. FRANCIS, formerly of Indiana University, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Syracuse University.

ROBERT C. FRIED has been appointed assistant professor at Connecticut College.

HARRY J. FRIEDMAN has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Hawaii.

CHARLES G. GATI has been appointed resident lecturer in government at the Kokomo campus of Indiana University.

ROBERT S. GETZ has been appointed an instructor in political science at Rutgers.

ROBERT GILPIN, JR., formerly associate director of the council for atomic age studies at Columbia University, has been appointed as assistant professor of politics and public affairs at Princeton University.

HARVEY GLICKMAN, assistant professor of political science at Haverford College will be on leave 1962-63.

RALPH M. GOLDMAN, formerly of Michigan State University and the University of Chicago, has accepted a full professorship at San Francisco State College.

STEPHEN GOROVE, college of law, University of Akron, has been appointed professor of international relations and law and member of the staff of the social science foundation, University of Denver. He is on a joint appointment with the College of law.

DEON C. GREER has been appointed lecturer in government and politics in the European program of the University of Maryland.

BRENT GUBLER, formerly of Syracuse University, has been named instructor in political science at Harpur College.

HORACE V. HARRISON has been appointed director of graduate studies in the department of government and politics at the University of Maryland.

ROBERT W. HATTERY, resigned as assistant professor of political science in the extension division of the University of Wisconsin to become director of the bureau of public education in the extension division and assistant professor in the department of government at Indiana University.

HARRY A. HOLLOWAY, assistant professor at the University of Texas has been appointed as an associated professor of government in the field of political theory at the University of Oklahoma.

JACK HOLMES has become associate professor and acting director of the bureau of governmental research at the University of Nevada.

JAMES E. HOLTON, Washington State University, has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor.

ABRAHAM HOLTZMAN has been promoted to professor of history and political science at North Carolina State College.

J. WOODFORD HOWARD, JR., has joined the department of political science at Duke University as assistant professor.

JOHN M. HUNGER has joined the University of Wisconsin, department of political science, university extension division as an assistant professor.

DAN N. JACOBS has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in the department of government at Miami University (Ohio).

WALTER DARNELL JACOBS, former lecturer in the Atlantic program of the University of Maryland has been appointed assistant professor of government and politics at the University of Maryland.

JAMES D. JOHNSON has been appointed instructor in the department of government at the University of Oklahoma.

ROBERT S. JORDAN was appointed assistant to the President of the George Washington University, effective July 1, 1962. He was appointed associate professor of international affairs in 1961.

RICHARD E. JOHNSTON, formerly of the University of Texas, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at Louisiana State University.

ELLIS KATZ has accepted an appointment as instructor at Temple University.

STANLEY KELLEY, JR., has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in the department of politics, Princeton University.

YOUNG WHAN KIHIL, formerly of New York University, has become instructor in political science and history at Juniata College.

DAVID C. KNAPP has been promoted from associate professor to professor at the University of New Hampshire.

KENNETH K. KOFMEHL has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of government at Purdue University.

RICHARD J. KOZICKI, formerly of Mansfield State College, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Marquette University.

HARVEY IRA LEIFERT, formerly of Columbia University, has been appointed an instructor at San Francisco State College.

NATHAN LEITES, of Rand Corporation, has been appointed professor of political science at the University of Chicago.

LEON N. LINDBERG, instructor at University of Wisconsin, has been appointed an assistant professor.

DUNCAN MACRAE, JR., of the University of Chicago, has been promoted to associate professor of political science.

VASYL MARKUS has joined the department of political science at Loyola University, Chicago, as assistant professor.

ARTHUR MARLOW, formerly of St. Louis University, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Marquette University.

REX MARTIN has been appointed assistant professor of government at Purdue University.

ROGER D. MASTERS of Yale University has been promoted to assistant professor of political science.

W. J. MATTHEWS has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Vermont.

THEODORE H. McNELLY has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of government at the University of Maryland.

RICHARD L. MERRITT has been appointed instructor in political science at Yale University.

HENRY L. MERRY, who was visiting associate professor at Northwestern University, has been given a one-year appointment as assistant professor of government at Purdue University.

CHARLES MICAUD, University of Virginia, has been appointed professor of international relations and member of the staff of the social science foundation, University of Denver, beginning September, 1962.

KENNETH MILLER has been promoted to associate professor of political science and appointed as department chairman at the Newark College of arts and sciences of Rutgers. He will be on leave during 1962-63 while he is in Denmark as a Fulbright research scholar.

ANDREW MILNOR has been appointed instructor in the government department at Boston University.

JOHN D. MONTGOMERY has been named research professor of government and associate director of the African studies program at Boston University.

JOHN A. MORGAN has joined the department of political science of Duke University as an instructor.

DONALD C. MUNDINGER, associate professor of government, Valparaiso University, has been appointed assistant dean of the college of arts and sciences. He will continue on the staff of the department of government.

FRANK MUNGER has been appointed chairman of the department of political science at Syracuse University. He succeeds Guthrie S. Birkhead, who is on a university assignment in Pakistan.

LARRY D. NACHMAN has been appointed instructor in political science at Newark College of arts and sciences of Rutgers University.

WLADIMIR NALEZÈKIEWICZ has been appointed assistant professor at Marquette University.

DICK NETZER, formerly vice president, Federal reserve bank, Chicago, and economic consultant to the regional plan association, has been appointed associate professor of metropolitan finance, graduate school of public administration, New York University.

LOUIS E. NEWMAN, former Assistant Director has been appointed Executive Director of the Bureau of Governmental Research, Inc. of New Orleans.

R. J. NOVOGROD, Ph.D. candidate at New York University, has been appointed acting chairman of the Long Island University political science department.

EDWIN E. OLSON, recently a research assistant at the Brookings institution center for advanced study, has been appointed an instructor in political science at the University of Southern California.

ARTHUR M. OSTEEN has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Syracuse University, and will also serve as executive director of the Africa-Asia program of the Maxwell overseas center. He succeeds Robert Heussler who has gone with the Ford Foundation on a project concerned with Latin American relations.

DENNIS PALUMBO has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Hawaii.

KIRK R. PETSHEK, urban development and economic coordinator, Mayor's office, Philadelphia, has resigned to join the University of Wisconsin as professor of commerce and coordinator of its urban research-action program in Milwaukee.

LARRY PIPPIN has become instructor in the department of history and political science at the University of Nevada.

JOSEPH PLANINSIC is now a member of the department of political science at Duquesne with the rank of assistant professor.

GERALD M. POMPER, formerly of City College, New York, has been appointed an assistant professor of political science at Rutgers University.

MOJMIH POVOLNY of Lawrence College has been promoted to associate professor and elected chairman of the department of government.

H. DOUGLAS PRICE, formerly of Columbia University, has been appointed associate professor of political science at Syracuse University.

ROBERT E. REORDAN has been appointed assistant professor of government at Stonehill College.

GERALD RIGBY, formerly of the University of Wyoming, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at the University of Southern California.

CHARLES M. REHMUS has been appointed associate professor of political science and co-director of institute of labor and industrial relations, department of political science, University of Michigan.

YOSAL ROGAT of the center for the study of democratic institutions of the Fund for the Republic, has been appointed assistant professor of political science and of the social sciences in the college at the University of Chicago.

RICHARD N. ROSECRANCE has been promoted to associate professor at UCLA. He is currently serving as coordinator of the national security studies program at UCLA.

WALTER ROSENBAUM has been appointed instructor in the department of political science at the University of Florida.

BRUCE M. RUSSETT, formerly at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Yale University, and is also serving as director of the political data program at Yale.

JOHN W. RYAN resigned as associate professor at the University of Wisconsin to become secretary to the president, University of Massachusetts.

ELIE A. SALEM, formerly of Johns Hopkins University, has been appointed associate professor in the department of political science and public administration at the American university of Beirut.

LEON SALAMON has been made instructor of government at Trinity College.

WALTER F. SCHEFFER, associate professor of government, has been appointed chairman of the department of government at the University of Oklahoma.

EDWARD V. SHTEN is serving as acting chairman of the University of Wisconsin department of political science, university extension division, while James R. Donoghue is on leave in Nigeria.

VALERIE SHINAVAR has become instructor in the department of history and political science at the University of Nevada.

OTIS H. SHAO, formerly of Moravian College, has been appointed associate professor of political science at Florida Presbyterian College.

PAUL E. SIGMUND, JR. formerly of Harvard University, has been appointed associate professor of politics, Princeton University.

J. DAVID SINGER has been promoted to research political scientist in the mental health research institute at the University of Michigan.

JAY B. SORENSON has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor in the department of politics, Princeton University.

CHARLES S. SPENCER has been promoted assistant professor of political science at the Citadel.

ROBERT J. STEAMER, formerly of Louisiana State University, has been appointed professor of government and chairman of the department at Lake Forest College, Lake Forest, Illinois.

E. W. STEELE, JR. has resigned from the staff of the department of political science at the University of Vermont, as of September 1, 1962.

ALBERT STILLSON, formerly of Montana State University, has accepted appointment as assistant professor of political science at Wake Forest College for 1962-63 academic year.

HERBERT J. STORING, of the University of Chicago, has been promoted to associate professor of political science.

CARL F. STOVER has been appointed senior political scientist in the economic development division of Stanford research Institute.

ALBERT L. STURM, formerly of West Virginia University, assumed his new duties as director of the institute of governmental research and professor of government at Florida State University in September.

RICHARD N. SWIFT of New York University has been promoted to full professor and is serving as a visiting lecturer in political science at Yale University during 1962-63.

JIVIAN R. TABIBIAN of Princeton University has accepted appointment as instructor in political science at Wake Forest College.

THOMAS F. THOMPSON resigned as assistant professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin Fox Valley extension center, to go to Western Michigan University.

VICTOR A. THOMPSON, formerly of the Illinois institute of technology has been appointed professor of political science at Syracuse University for the coming year. He will serve as director of the East Africa program of the Maxwell overseas center.

EMORY T. TROSPER has been appointed lecturer in government and politics in the Atlantic program of the University of Maryland.

DAVID B. TRUMAN becomes Dean of Columbia College in January, 1963, succeeding John G. Palfrey, who resigned to become a member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

TANG TSOU of the University of Chicago has been promoted to associate professor of political science.

WARREN M. TSUNEISKH, curator of the Far Eastern collections and research associate at the Yale University library, has been appointed lecturer in political science for the year 1962-63.

ROBERT C. TUCKER, formerly of Indiana University, has been appointed professor of politics at Princeton University.

HENRY A. TURNER has been advanced to the rank of professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara. He is on leave for the academic year 1962-63 to serve as a visiting professor at the University of Khartoum in the Republic of Sudan under a program sponsored by the department of State and by the African studies center of the University of California, Los Angeles.

SIDNEY VERBA has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in the department of politics, Princeton University.

WILLIAM R. VIZZARD, assistant professor of government at the University of Oklahoma, resigned to accept a position as command historian with the Fifth Air Force, Tokyo.

ERIC WALDMAN, who spent the academic year 1961-62 at the University of Munich on a Fulbright research fellowship, has been promoted to professor of political science at Marquette University.

MICHAEL WALZER, formerly instructor in government at Harvard University, has been appointed assistant professor of politics at Princeton University.

WALTER WEIKER, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the Newark College of arts and sciences of Rutgers University.

EUGENE WEINSTEIN, formerly with the department of interdisciplinary studies at the University of Minnesota, has been appointed an instructor at San Francisco State College.

DAVID WELBORN, formerly of the University of Texas, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of government at Texas Technological College, Lubbock, Texas.

W. HARDY WICKWAR has been appointed to the staff of the graduate school of public administration at New York University.

ANN R. WILLNER of the University of Chicago, has been appointed assistant professor at Harpur College.

FRED H. WILLHOITE has been promoted to assistant professor of political science at Florida Presbyterian College.

H. H. WILSON has been promoted to the rank of professor in the department of politics, Princeton University.

JOHN W. WOOD has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of government at the University of Oklahoma.

TAKEHIKO YOSHIHASHI of the American University has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of international relations and to a newly created post of associate dean of the school of international service.

The 1963 meetings of the Western Political Science Association will be held in San Diego, March 21-23, at Vacation Village Hotel. Albert Lepawsky (University of California, Berkeley), Vice President of the Association, is in charge of the program; and W. Richard Bigger (San Diego State College), in charge of local arrangements.

INDEX to VOLUME LVI

HOW TO USE THIS INDEX

This index is divided into two sections:

(a) Classified Section..... 1056

Here entries concerning the same or related topics are grouped together, or near to each other, to encourage "suggestive browsing" and refer you to the subject matter of Articles, Reviews, Notes, and Bibliographies.

Each entry may appear more than once in the Classified Section. Thus, for example, the article "The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession," by René Lemarchand, which appeared in the June, 1962 issue of the REVIEW appears in the following classifications:

- AA1 Methodology—Case Studies
- B436 Comparative Government—Africa—Katanga
- D211 International Law—Secession
- D613 International Law—United Nations
- F806 Election Returns

(b) Alphabetical Section..... 1071

Material is listed here by title, authors' last names, and topic. Many topic entries refer you to the Classified Section where you may be able to find related items by glancing at neighboring classes.

SECTION ONE:

A CLASSIFIED INDEX TO THE Review

AA METHODOLOGY

- Bibliography on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences..... 165, 448, 709, 995
- Formal Operations: A Comparative Approach*. Blau, Peter M. and Scott, Richard W. Book reviewed by Guetzkow, H..... 428
- Political Decision-makers: Recruitment and Performance*, ed. Marvick, Dwaine. Book noted by Verba, S..... 440
- Selected Articles and Documents on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences*. Feldman, Julian... 450

AA1 CASE STUDIES

- The Italian Socialist Party: A Case Study in Factional Conflict*. Zariski, Raphael..... 372
- The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession*. Lemarchand, René..... 404
- The Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives*. Niemi, Donald and Riker, William

- H..... 58
- Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative*. Robinson, James A. Book noted by Patterson, S.C..... 719
- Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics*. Wildavsky, Aaron. Book noted by Stratton, O..... 721
- The Development of the Social Security Act*. Witte, Edwin E. Book noted by Leiserson, A..... 723
- Decisions in Syracuse*. Martin, Roscoe C., Munger, Frank J. and others. Book noted by Monat, W. R..... 466
- Political Influence*. Banfield, Edward C. Book reviewed by Scoble, H. M. 151
- Cases in State and Local Government*. Frost, Richard T. (ed.) Book noted by Altschuler, A..... 178
- The House Appropriations Committee as a Political System: The Problem of Integration*. Richard F. Fenno, Jr. 310
- Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative*, by James A. Robinson, reviewed by Donald E. Stokes.... 984

AA2 STATISTICAL METHODS

- Quasi-Partisan Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System: The Florida Senate, 1947-1961*. Parsons, Malcolm B. 605

* The classification scheme is adapted from A Library Classification for Public Administration Materials, by Sophia Hall Glidden, Chicago, Public Administration Service and American Library Association, 1942.

- Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960.* Baggaley, Andrew R. . . . . 66
- Governmental Structure and Political Environment: A Statistical Note About American Cities.* Kessel, John H. . . . . 615
- Experimental Approaches to Vote-Counting Theory in Nominating Choice.* David, Paul. . . . . 673
- Influence and Interaction in a State Legislative Body.* Francis, Wayne L. . . . . 953
- Local Political Surveys.* Schattschneider, E. E. and Jones, Victor. Book noted by Wright, S. S. . . . . 991
- Communications on The 1960 Term of the Supreme Court: A Psychological Analysis.* Schubert, Glendon . . . . . 422
- The 1960 Term of the Supreme Court: A Psychological Analysis.* Schubert, Glendon . . . . . 90
- Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus in the Analysis of Dynamic Systems.* Fisher, Franklin M. and Ando, Albert. . . . . 108
- The Religious Factor.* Lenski, Gerhard. Book noted by Davis, H. R. . . . . 159
- Governmental Structure and Political Environment: A Statistical Note about American Cities.* Kessel, John H. . . . . 615
- Morale in the Civil Service: A Study of the Desk Worker.* Walker, Nigel. Book noted by Friedland, Louis L. 1006
- AA3 MODELS
- Comparative Politics: A Comprehensive Approach.* Spiro, Herbert J. . . . . 577
- Game Theory and Cumulative Voting in Illinois: 1902-1954.* Sawyer, Jack and MacRae, Duncan Jr. . . . . 936
- Two Faces of Power.* Peter Bachrach and Morton S. Baratz. . . . . 947
- B SOCIETY—THE STATE—GOVERNMENT
- Comparative Politics: A Comprehensive Approach.* Spiro, Herbert J. . . . . 577
- Modern Government.* Hitchner, Dell G. and Harbold, William H. Book noted by Steinbicker, P. B. . . . . 704
- B1 SOCIOLOGY
- The Progress of a Decade.* Lipset, Seymour, Martin and Smelser, Neil J. Book noted by Cottrell, F. . . . . 446
- Tradition, Values, and Socio-Economic Development,* eds. Braibanti, Ralph and Spengler, Joseph J. Book noted by Friedman, J. R. . . . . 157
- The Political Context of Sociology.* Bramson, Leon. Book noted by Scher, S. . 161
- B12 POPULATION
- B123 ECONOMIC ASPECTS: INCOME LEVELS, DISTRIBUTION OF ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY
- Problems of American Economic Growth.* Morris, Bruce R. Book noted by Reagan, Michael D. . . . . 174
- B124 SOCIAL AND CULTURAL CHARACTERISTICS
- National Character in Action.* Platt, Washington. Book noted by Rosecrance, R. N. . . . . 508
- American Perspectives,* eds. Spiller, Robert E. and Larrabee, Eric. Book noted by Backstrom, C. H. . . 179
- Neo-Freudian Social Philosophy.* Birnbaum, Martin. Book noted by Pinner, F. A. . . . . 703
- B1243 Religious Groups
- Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960.* Baggaley, Andrew A. . . . . 66
- B12431 Church & State
- Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages.* Ullmann, Walter. Book noted by Riesenberg, P. . . . . 447
- Religion, Government, and Education.* (ed.) Brickman, William W. and Lehrer, Stanley. Book noted by LaNoue, G. R. . . . . 468
- Render Unto Caesar. The Flag-Salute Controversy.* Manwaring, David R. Book noted by Rigby, Gerald. . . . . 1004
- B12439 Religious Organizations
- The Robe and the Sword: The Methodist Church and the Rise of American Imperialism.* MacKenzie, Kenneth M. Book noted by Morrow, R. E. . . . . 470
- Deviation Control: A Study in the Dynamics of Doctrinal Conflict.* Brzezinski, Zbigniew. . . . . 5, 676
- B13 THE COMMUNITY
- B131 URBAN SOCIOLOGY
- Urbanization in Latin America: A UNESCO Survey.* Philip M. Hauser (ed.). Book noted by K. H. Silvert. 1033
- B15 URBAN POPULATION—COMPOSITION & CHARACTER
- Urban Social Structure,* by James M. Beshers, noted by Maurice E. O'Donnell. . . . . 1000
- B151 NATIONAL GROUPS
- London's Newcomers: The West Indian Migrants,* by Ruth Glass assisted by H. Pollins, noted by James Q. Dealey. . . . . 195

- B2 THE STATE—POLITICAL SCIENCE, POLITICAL THEORY
 Bibliography on Political Theory . . . . . 163, 448, 707
Positive Liberty, 1880–1914. Nicholls, David. . . . . 114
Our Fundamental Rights: Their Nature and Extent (As Judicially Determined). Banerjee, D. N. Book noted by McWhinney, E. . . . . 490
Political Ideas in the Modern World. Heater, D. B. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A. . . . . 706
Studies on the Civilization of Islam. Hamilton, Sir, A. R. Book noted. . . . . 992
Reinhold Niebuhr: New Orthodoxy for Old Liberalism. Wilson Carey McWilliams. . . . . 874
- B21 THEORIES OF ORIGIN
The Threat of Violence and Social Change. Niebuhr, H. L. . . . . 865
- B23 THEORIES OF GOVERNMENT
Kant, Liberalism, and War. Waltz, Kenneth N. . . . . 331
The Revival of Classical Political Philosophy: A Critique. Rothman, Stanley. . . . . 341
A Reply to Rothman, Cropsey, Joseph. . . . . 353
Philosophy and Myth in Karl Marx. Tucker, Robert C. Book noted by McCallum, D. . . . . 442
Positive Liberty, 1880–1914. Nicholls, David. . . . . 114
Genesis and Structure of Society. Gentile, Giovanni. Book review by LaPalombara, J. . . . . 698
Conservatism in America: The Thankless Persuasion. Rossiter, Clinton. Book noted by McGiffert, M. . . . . 724
Marxism, An Historical and Critical Study. Lichtheim, George. Book reviewed by Catlin, G. E. G. . . . . 158
- B26 TYPES OF STATES
B262 NATIONAL STATES—NATIONALISM
Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II. Shoup, Paul. . . . . 886
- B263 FEDERATED STATES: FEDERALISM
 See also D67.
The Papers of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. I 1768–1778. Vol. II., 1779–1781, ed. Syrett, Harold C., assoc. ed. Cooke, Jacob E. Book reviewed by Barrett, P. . . . . 432
The Structure of American Federalism. Vile, M. J. C. Book noted by Farrelly, D. G. . . . . 465
The States in West German Federation: A Study in Federal-State Relations. Wells, Roger Hewes. Book noted by Heidenheimer, Arnold J. . . . . 1018
- B264 EMPIRES & IMPERIALISM
Portugal's Stand in Africa, by Adriano Moreire. Book noted by Thomas Okuma. . . . . 1023
The Imperialism Reader. Louis L. Snyder (ed.). Book noted. . . . . 1036
 See also D222.
- B4 COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT
 Bibliography on Foreign and Comparative Government. . . . . 203, 491, 756, 1025
The Edge of Freedom. Oakes, John B. Book noted by Wallerstein, Immanuel. . . . . 487
Food, Land, and Manpower in Western Europe. Yates, P. L. Book noted by Rothman, S. . . . . 506
Parliaments and Electoral Systems. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 491
Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings. Macridis, Roy C. and Brown, Bernard E. Book noted by Lanyi, G. A. . . . . 749
Constitutionalism: A Preliminary Discussion. Giovanni Sartori. . . . . 853
- B41 EUROPE
European Elections by Direct Suffrage, a Comparative Study of the Electoral Systems Used in Western Europe and their Utility for the Direct Election of a European Parliament, by Wolfgang Birke. Book noted. . . . . 1025
 See also T191
- B410 ITALY
The Italian Socialist Party: A Case Study in Factional Conflict. Raphael Zariski. . . . . 372
- B411 GREAT BRITAIN
 See also alphabetical index under "London"
British Broadcasting in Transition. Paulu, Burton. Book noted by Alperin, R. J. . . . . 755
Green Belts and Urban Growth: English Town and Country Planning in Action. Mandelker, Daniel R. Book noted by Stephens, G. R. . . . . 751
Questions in Parliament. Chester, D. N. and Bowring, N. Book noted by Millett, J. H. . . . . 753
The Administration of British Foreign Relations. Bishop, Donald G. Book noted by Harris, J. S. . . . . 755

- The Political Ideas of English Party Activists.* Rose, Richard. . . . . 360
- Parliamentary Reform 1933-1960.* The Hansard Society. Book noted by Marquis, L. C. . . . . 479
- "Responsible Government," Separated Powers, and Special Interests: Agricultural Subsidies in Britain and America.* Pennock, J. Roland. . . . 621
- Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom.* Alan T. Peacock, Jack Wiseman, assisted by J. Veverka. . . . . 194
- The British Cabinet,* by J. P. Mackintosh, and British Parliamentary Democracy, by Lord Morrison of Lambeth—reviewed by Roland Young. . . . . 986
- Democracy and the Cost of Politics in Britain.* Gwyn, William B. Book noted by Shannon, Jasper B. . . . 1018
- The British Parliament,* by Roland Young, book noted by John P. Mackintosh. . . . . 1022
- Department of Scientific & Industrial Research* by Sir Harry Melville; and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise by Sir James Crombie. Books noted. . . . . 1024
- B412 SPAIN
- Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism.* Payne, Stanley G. Book noted by Wilson, Larman C. . . . . 483
- B413 SCANDINAVIA
- Modern Swedish Government,* by Nils Andrén; Danmarks Folketing, by Svend Thorsen; & Stortinget på naert hold, by Per Øisang—noted by Anderson, S. V. . . . . 203
- B4131 Sweden
- Modern Swedish Government* by Nils Andrén. Book noted. . . . . 1025
- B414 SOVIET UNION
- See also B55
- Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets.* Friedberg, Maurice. Book noted by Swayze, H. . . . . 989
- Red Phoenix, The: Russia Since World War II.* Harry Schwartz. Noted by Hazard, J. N. . . . . 192
- Power and Policy in the U.S.S.R.: The Study of Soviet Dynasties,* by R. Conquest, noted by Bursey, L. G. . 192
- The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961.* Zagoria, Donald S. Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era.* Hsieh, Alice Langley. Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . 688
- The Sino-Soviet Dispute.* Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II.* Shoup, Paul. . . . . 886
- Russia and the West Under Lenin and Stalin.* Kennan, George F. Book reviewed by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 148
- A Report on Social Security Programs in the Soviet Union.* U.S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare. Book reviewed by Somers, H. M. . 149
- Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959,* by Harold Swayze, noted by Maurice Friedberg. . . . . 988
- B4141 Czechoslovakia
- Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948-1960* by Edward Taborsky, noted by Feierabend, I. K. . . . . 193
- B4142 Hungary
- Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism Versus Communism.* Vali, Ferenc A. Noted by Gyorgy, A. . . 489
- B4143 German Democratic Republic
- Wir sind die stärkste der Partei'N! Eine Bibliographie zum 15. Jahrestag der Gründung der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Deutschlands,* by the Institut für Marxismus-Leninismus beim ZK der SED. Book noted. . . . . 1025
- B415 GERMANY
- For German Democratic Republic, see B4143.
- Equilibrium, Structure of Interests and Leadership: Adenauer's Survival as Chancellor.* Merkl, Peter H. . 634
- The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election.* Barnes, Samuel H.; Grace, Frank; Pollock, James K.; and Sperlich, Peter W. . . . . 899
- The States in West German Federalism: A Study in Federal-State Relations.* Wells, Roger Hewes. Book noted by Heidenheimer, Arnold J. 1018
- B416 AUSTRIA
- Haggling for the Equilibrium: The Renegotiation of the Austrian Coalition, 1959.* Engelmann, Frederick C. . . . . 651
- B417 FRANCE
- For French-connected States in Africa, see B435.

- La IV<sup>e</sup> République et sa Politique Extérieure.* Grosser, Alfred. Book noted by Kirchheimer, O. H. . . . . 1017
- Tocqueville and the Old Regime.* Herr, Richard. Book noted by Lively, J. . . . . 988
- B418 YUGOSLAVIA
- Genocide in Satellite Croatia, 1941-1945,* by Edmond Paris, noted by John Clinton Adams. . . . . 1021
- Yugoslavia and the New Communism.* Hoffman & Neale. Book noted by Alex N. Dragnich. . . . . 1034
- B419 PORTUGAL
- Portugal's Stand in Africa,* by Adriano Moreire. Book noted by Thomas Okuma. . . . . 1023
- B42 ASIA
- Southeast Asia Today—and Tomorrow. A Political Analysis,* by Richard Butwell. Book noted by Daniel S. Lev. . . . . 1031
- B421 INDIA
- The Pedagogy of Democracy: Coercive Public Protest in India.* Bayley, David H. . . . . 663
- The Nationalist Movement: Indian Political Thought from Ranade to Bhave.* Brown, D. Mackenzie. Book noted by Tinker, I. . . . . 990
- A Comparative Study of the Indian Constitution. Volume One: General Principles of Organization.* By Sirdar D. K. Sen, noted by Retzlaff, R. H. . . . . 202
- B422 CHINA
- See also D2111.
- The Chinese Anarchist Movement.* Scalapino, Robert A. and Yu, George T. Book noted by Lindsay, M. . . . . 742
- Sun Yat-sen and Communism,* by Shao Chuan Leng & Norman D. Palmer, noted by Mao, J. Y. . . . . 197
- The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961.* Zagoria, Donald S. Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era.* Hsieh, Alice Langley. Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- The Sino-Soviet Dispute.* Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- B423 JAPAN
- The Sources of Protest in Japan.* Passin, Herbert. . . . . 391
- Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan.* Scalapino, Robert A. and Masumi, Junnosuke. Book noted by Kawai, K. . . . . 742
- The Japanese People and Foreign Policy: A Study of Public Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan.* Mendel, Douglas H. Jr. . . . . 743
- B424 ISRAEL
- The Herzl Paradox: Political, Social and Economic Theories of a Realist.* Adler, Joseph. Book noted by Lucatz, N. . . . . 701
- The Political World of American Zionism.* Halperin, Samuel. Book noted by Rubin, B. . . . . 721
- B425 MUSLIM ASIA
- Contemporary Arab Politics: A Concise History,* by George E. Kirk, noted by Lenczowski, G. . . . . 199
- History of the Islamic Peoples,* by Carl Brockelmann, noted by Fitzgerald, J. . . . . 201
- Middle Eastern Affairs: Number Two (St. Anthony's Papers No. 11)* Hourani, Albert. Book noted by Salem, E. . . . . 761
- Studies on the Civilization of Islam.* Hamilton, Sir A. R. Book noted . . . 992
- The Changing Patterns of the Middle East.* Rondot, Pierre. Book noted by Lucatz, N. . . . . 488
- B4251 Indonesia
- Central Authority and Regional Autonomy in Indonesia: A Study in Local Administration, 1950-1960.* Legge, J. D. Book noted by Mill, E. W. . . . . 745
- B426 LAOS
- Storm over Laos,* by Prince Sisouk na Champassak, noted by Fall, B. B. . . . 201
- B427 BURMA
- Politics, Personality, and Nation Building: Burma's Search for Identity.* Pye, Lucian W. Book review by Lockwood, W. W. . . . . 978
- B43 AFRICA
- African Affairs: Number One. St. Anthony's Papers: Number 10 (ed.)* Kirkwood, Kenneth. Book noted by Davies, J. C. . . . . 486
- Politics in Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara.* Spiro, Herbert J. Book noted by Adam, T. R. . . . . 747
- African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide.* Hodgkin, Thomas. Book review by Untermyer, F. . . . . 980
- Portugal's Stand in Africa,* by Adriano Moreire. Book noted by Thomas Okuma. . . . . 1023
- Africa South,* by Harm J. de Blij. Book noted by Richard W. Taylor. . . . . 1024

- B4311 Kenya
The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960-1961. Bennett, George and Rosenberg, Carl. Book noted by McConnell, G. . . . . 484
- B432 GHANA
I Speak of Freedom. Nkrumah, Kwame. Book noted by Bates, M. L. . . . . 485
- B433 SOUTH AFRICA
South African Predicament: The Economics of Apartheid. Spooner, F. P. Book noted by Richardson, C. B. . . . . 487
South Africa 1906-1961: The Price of Magnanimity, by Nicholas Mansergh. Book noted by Harm Jan de Blij. . . . . 1023
- B435 FRENCH-CONNECTED STATES
The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa. Thompson, Virginia and Adloff, Earl. Book noted by Le Vine, T. . . . . 486
- B4351 Senegal
Senegal, A Study in French Assimilation Policy, by Michael Crowder. Book noted. . . . . 1025
- B436 KATANGA
The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession. Lemarchand, Rene. . . . . 404
- B437 MUSLIM AFRICA
Contemporary Arab Politics: A Concise History, by George E. Kirk, noted by Lenczowski, G. . . . . 199
History of the Islamic Peoples, by Carl Brockelmann, noted by Fitzgerald, J. A. . . . . 201
 See also B425.
- B4371 Morocco
Political Change in Morocco, by Douglas E. Ashford, noted by Khadduri, M. . . . . 198
- B4372 Egypt
Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt 1804-1952. Safran, Nadav. Book noted by Gerteiny, A. G. . . . . 749
- B438 CONGO, REPUBLIC OF (LEOPOLDVILLE)
Congo Disaster, by Colin Legum, noted by Hanna, W. . . . . 199
 See also B436.
- B44 LATIN AMERICA & WEST INDIES
 See also D612 (O.A.S.).
 Bibliography. . . . . 759
Social and Economic Frontiers in Latin America. Stark, Harry. Noted by Plank, J. N. . . . . 482
- Pan America in Crisis.* Manger, William. Book noted by Fitzgibbon, R. . . . . 760
A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America, by F. Benham and H. A. Holley, noted by Lewis, F. M. . . . . 196
The Failure of Union: Central America, 1824-1960. Karnes, Thomas L. Book noted by Moses, C. C. . . . . 480
Prophets of the Revolution: Profiles of Latin American Leaders. Alexander, Robert J. Book noted by Burnett, B. G. . . . . 481
The Conflict Society: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America. Silvert, Kalman H. Book noted by Taylor, P. B. Jr. . . . . 482
 Davis, Harold Eugene. Latin American Social Thought. Book noted by Barber, W. F. . . . . 705
Urbanization in Latin America: A UNESCO Survey. Philip M. Hauser (ed.). Book noted by K. H. Silvert. . . . . 1033
- B441 CUBA
The Cuban Story. Matthews, Herbert L. Book reviewed by Busey, J. L. . . . . 146
- B442 VENEZUELA
Venezuela. Lieuwen, Edwin. Book noted by Baker, R. D. . . . . 746
- B443 URUGUAY
The Pedagogy of Democracy: Coercive Public Protest in India. Bayley, David H. . . . . 663
Government and Politics of Uruguay. Taylor, Philip B. Jr. Book noted by Padgett, L. V. . . . . 747
- B46 NORTH AMERICA
- B451 CANADA
The Art of the Possible: Government and Foreign Policy in Canada. Eayrs, James. Book noted by Williams, J. R. . . . . 750
- B46 AUSTRALASIA & OCEANIA
- B461 AUSTRALIA
Groups in Theory and Practice. Loveday, Peter and Campbell, Ian. Book noted by Tinker, I. . . . . 990
- B5 NATIONAL GOVERNMENT
- B52 ARISTOCRACY-OLIGARCHY
Tocqueville and the Old Regime. Herr, Richard. Book noted by Lively, J. . . . . 988
- B53 DEMOCRACY
How Can We Justify Democracy? Mayo, H. B. . . . . 555
Free Minds: A Venture in the Philosophy of Democracy. Nelson, Ralph W. Book noted by Zucker, F. D. . . . . 447
The Predicament of Democratic Man. Cahn, Edmond. Book noted by McKee, D. K. . . . . 156

- Tocqueville and the Old Regime.* Herr, Richard. Book noted by Lively, J. . . . . 988
- The Contours of American History.* Williams, William Appleman. Book noted by Braeman, John. . . . . 1005
- B531 UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
- B5311 Department of Commerce
- A History of the United States Weather Bureau* by Donald R. Whitnah. Book noted by Harvey, L. G. . . . . 182
- B54 SOCIALISM
- Radicalism and the Revolt against Reason: The Social Theories of Georges Sorel: with a translation of his essay on Decomposition of Marxism.* Horowitz, Irving Louis. Book noted by Witte, W. D. S. . . . . 439
- B55 COMMUNISM
- See also B414, B422, and B418.
- The Russian Revolution.* Berdyaev, Nicholas. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- Terrorism and Communism.* Trotsky, Leon. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- The Russian Revolution and Leninism or Marxism?* Luxemburg, Rosa. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- Russia and The West Under Lenin and Stalin.* Kennan, George F. Book reviewed by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 148
- Geschichte der Internationale.* Brauntal, Julius. Book noted by Sturmtal, A. . . . . 766
- Sun Yat-Sen and Communism,* by Shao Chuan Leng & Norman D. Palmer, noted by Mao, J. Y. . . . . 197
- Yugoslavia and the New Communism.* George W. Hoffman and Fred Warner Neal. Book noted by Alex N. Dragnich. . . . . 1034
- Alexander Herzen and the Birth of Russian Socialism, 1812-1855.* Malia, Martin. Book noted by Hammer, D. P. . . . . 443
- Deviation Control: A Study in the Dynamics of Doctrinal Conflict,* Brzezinski, Zbigniew. . . . . 5
- The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy.* Bolloten, Burnett. Book noted by Nagle, T. W. . . . . 503
- Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II,* Shoup, Paul. . . . . 886
- Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959.* Swayze, Harold. Book noted by Friedberg, M. . . . . 988
- Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets.* Friedberg, M. Book noted by Swayze, H. . . . . 989
- B58 TOTALITARIAN STATES
- See also D48
- Politics of Cultural Despair.* Stern, Fritz. Book noted by Kirchheimer, O. . . . . 444
- Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism.* Payne, Stanley G. Book noted by Wilson, L. C. . . . . 483
- B59 CHANGES IN THE FORM OF GOVERNMENT
- The Russian Revolution.* Berdyaev, Nicholas. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- The Russian Revolution and Leninism or Marxism?* Luxemburg, Rosa. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- Prophets of the Revolution: Profiles of Latin American Leaders.* Alexander, Robert J. Book noted by Burnett, B. G. . . . . 481
- The Conflict Society: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America.* Silvert, Kalman H. Book noted by Taylor, P. B. Jr. . . . . 482
- The Threat of Violence and Social Change.* Neiburg, H. L. . . . . 865
- B6 STATE GOVERNMENT—DEVELOPMENT AND CONDUCT
- Cases in State and Local Government.* Frost, Richard T. ed. Book noted by Altschuler, A. . . . . 178
- B65 GOVERNMENT OF PARTICULAR STATES
- The Government of Kansas.* Drury, James W. and Associates. Book noted by Dishman, R. B. . . . . 465
- Hawaii Pono: A Social History.* Fuchs, Lawrence H. Book noted by Horowitz, R. . . . . 727
- Quasi Partisan Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System: The Florida Senate, 1947-1961.* Parsons, Malcolm B. . . . . 605
- Communication on Parsons.* Price, H. D. . . . . 974
- Texas: Its Government and Politics.* Benton, Wilbourn E. Book noted by Ransone, C. B. Jr. . . . . 466
- Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics.* Rowe, Leonard. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 179
- Influence and Interaction in a State Legislative Body.* Francis, Wayne L. . . . . 953
- The Government of Missouri, 7th ed.* Karsch, Robert F. Book noted by Schmandt, H. J. . . . . 1008
- B7 LOCAL GOVERNMENT—FORM AND CONDUCT
- The Structure of Local Government throughout the World.* Humes, Samuel and Martin Eileen M. Book reviewed

- by Burke, F. . . . . 434
Cases in State and Local Government.
 Frost, Richard T. ed. Book noted by Altschuler, A. . . . . 178
- B71 COUNTY GOVERNMENT
Thirty Explosive Years in Los Angeles
 County. Ford, John Anson. Book noted by Rice, R. R. . . . . 726
- B73 MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT
Mastery of the Metropolis. Fiser, Webb
 S. Book review by Coke, J. G. . . . . 970
Decisions in Syracuse. Martin, Roscoe
 C. Munger, Frank J. and others.
 Book noted by Monat, W. R. . . . . 466
Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City. Dahl, Robert A.
 Book noted by Eulau, Heinz. . . . . 144
Political Influence. Bansfield, Edward
 C. Book reviewed by Scoble, H. M. 151
Megalopolis: The Urbanized North- eastern Seaboard of the United States.
 Gottman, Jean. Book review by Connery, R. H. . . . . 696
Exploring the Metropolitan Community,
 (ed.). Bollens, John C. Book reviewed by Greene, L. S. . . . . 152
Governmental Structure and Political En- vironment: A Statistical Note about
American Cities, Kessel, John H. . . . 615
The LaGuardia Years: Machine and Reform Politics in New York City.
 Garrett, Charles. Book noted by Rice, R. R. . . . . 726
Boss Cermak of Chicago: A Study of Political Leadership, by Alex Gottfried, noted by James D. McGoldrick. . . . . 1001
Urban Social Structure, by James M.
 Beshers, noted by Maurice E.
 O'Donnell. . . . . 1000
The Metropolitan Problem and Amer- ican Ideas, by Luther H. Gulick, noted by James L. McCamy. . . . . 1000
- B734 CITY MANAGER PLAN
City Managers in Politics: An Analy- sis of Manager Tenure and Term- ination. Kammerer, Gladys M.;
 Farris, Charles D.; DeGrove, John
 M.; and Clubok, Alfred B. Book noted by Prewitt, Kenneth. . . . . 1007
- B8 GOVERNMENT COOPERATION
Design of Regional Accounts: Papers presented at the Conference on Regional Accounts, 1960. Hochwald, Werner,
 (ed.). Book noted by Wengert, N. . . 730
- C CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY AND LAW
The Antifederalists: Critics of the Con- stitution, 1781-1788. Main, Jackson
 Turner. Book noted by Abbott, F. C. . 731
Free Speech: At What Price? Hyneman,
 Charles S. . . . . 847
Constitutionalism: A Preliminary Dis- cussion. Giovanni Sartori. . . . . 853
- C4 CONSTITUTIONAL LAW
Montesquieu: A Critical Biography.
 Shackleton, Robert. Book noted by Pennock, J. R. . . . . 445
- C41 CIVIL RIGHTS—DUE PROCESS
Supreme Court Behavior in Racial Ex- clusion Cases: 1935-1960. Ulmer,
 Sidney S. . . . . 325
Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the
Mail. Paul, James C. N. and Schwartz, Murray L. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . . 464
Justice Frankfurter and Civil Liberties.
 Jacobs, Clyde E. Book noted by*
 Kallenbach, J. E. . . . . 172
Civil Liberties and the Constitution.
 Kauper, Paul G. Book review by Steamer, R. J. . . . . 694
Deeds Without Doctrines: Civil Rights
in the 1960 Term of the Supreme Court. McCloskey, Robert G. . . . . 71
Freedom and Protection: The Bill of Rights. Weinberger, Andrew D.
 Book reviewed by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
Courts and Rights: The American Ju- diciary in Action. Roche, John P.
 Book reviewed by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
A Century of Civil Rights. Konvitz, Milton R. With a study of State Law
Against Discrimination. Leskes, Theodore. Book noted by Wiltsey,
 G. G. . . . . 718
Free Speech: At What Price? Hyneman,
 Charles S. . . . . 847
Render Unto Caesar. The Flag-Salute
Controversy. Manwaring, David R.
 Book noted by Rigby, Gerald. . . . . 1004
International Protection of Human Rights. Manouchehr Ganji. Book
 noted by Jean A. Laponce. . . . . 1035
- D INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS—FOREIGN POLICY
 Bibliography. . . . . 219, 510
Values and Interests. Van Dyke, Vernon. 567
International Politics and Foreign Policy:
A Reader in Research and Theory,
 Rosenau, James N. (ed.). Book review by Platig, E. R. . . . . 431
America in Britain's Place: The Leader- ship of the West and Anglo-American Unity. Gleber, Lionel. Book noted by Joynt, C. B. . . . . 496
Strategy for the 60's, Cerf, Jay H. and

- Pozen, Walter (ed.). Book noted by Alger, C. F. . . . . 507
- Bibliography on International Law and Relations. . . . . 510
- The Administration of British Foreign Relations*. Bishop, Donald G. Book noted by Harris, J. S. . . . . 754
- A Theory of Foreign Policy*. Modelski,
George. Book noted by Almond, G. A. 700
- Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative*. Robinson, James A. Book noted by Patterson, S. C. . . . . 719
- Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs*. Bidwell, Percy W. Book noted by Burkhart, J. A. . . . . 991
- The Nature of International Society*. Manning, C. A. W. Book review by Mc-Clelland, C. A. . . . . 983
- Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A
Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative*. Robinson, James A. Book review by Stokes, D. E. . . . . 719
- D1 DIPLOMACY—NEGOTIATION
- Professional Diplomacy in the United States: 1779–1939*. Ilchman, Warren
Frederick. Book noted by Crabb,
C. V. Jr. . . . . 177
- Ambassadors Ordinary and Extraordinary*. Spaulding, E. Wilder. Book noted by Gibbs, H. S. . . . . 762
- D21 SOVEREIGNTY
- D211 FORMATION, DISSOLUTION AND PAR-TITION OF STATES
- The Backward Society*. Frost, Raymond. Book noted by Rothchild,
D. S. . . . . 504
- The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession*. Le-marchand, René. . . . . 404
- Africa: The Politics of Independence*.
Wallerstein, Immanuel. Book reviewed by Hanna, W. . . . . 429
- The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960–
1961*. Bennett, George and Ros-berg, Carl. Book noted by Mc-Connell, G. . . . . 484
- The Herzl Paradox: Political, Social and Economic Theories of a Realist*.
Adler, Joseph. Book noted by Lucatz, N. . . . . 701
- The Role of the Military in Underdeveloped Countries*. Johnson, John J.
Book noted by Singer, J. D. . . . . 1019
- I Speak of Freedom*. Nkrumah, Kwame. Book noted by Bates,
M. L. . . . . 485
- The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa*. Thompson, Virginia and Adloff, Earl. Book noted by Le Vine, V. T. . . . . 486
- African Affairs: Number One. St. Anthony's Papers: Number 10* (ed.)
Kirkwood, Kenneth. Book noted by Davies, J. C. . . . . 486
- D2111 Recognition
- Recognition of Communist China?*
Newman, Robert P. Book reviewed by Stauffer, R. B. . . . . 145
- The Eternal Triangle? Communist China, the United States, and the United Nations*, by Sheldon Appleton. Book noted by Richard
L. Walker. . . . . 1030
- D213 PUPPET STATES
- Deviation Control: A Study in the Dynamics of Doctrinal Conflict*.
Brzezinski, Zbigniew. . . . . 5
- Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II*.
Shoup, Paul. . . . . 886
- See also D48 and sub-heads under B414.
- D2 INTERNATIONAL LAW
- When Nations Disagree: A Handbook on Peace through Law*. Larson, Arthur.
Book noted by Yalem, R. J. . . . . 498
- International Immunities*. Jenks, Wilfred. Book noted by Remec, P. P. . . 502
- World Policy II. A Yearbook of Studies in International Law and Organization*. Book noted by Tamko, M. . . . 765
- D22 GENERAL RIGHTS & OBLIGATIONS OF STATES
- D222 RIGHT OF DOMAIN—RIGHT OF ACQUISITION
- The Robe and the Sword: The Methodist Church and the Rise of American Imperialism*. MacKenzie, Kenneth M. Book noted by Morrow,
R. E. . . . . 470
- See also B264.
- D225 JURISDICTION OVER THE SEAS
- The United States and the Treaty Law of the Sea*. Reiff, Henry. Book noted by Mander, L. A. . . . . 505
- D227 OBLIGATION TO RESPECT HUMAN RIGHTS
- International Protection of Human Rights*. Manouchehr Ganji. Book
noted by Jean A. Laponce. . . . . 1035
- See also D48 (Genocide).

- D25 PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW
The Position of the Individual in International Law according to Grotius and Vattel. Remec, Peter P. Book noted by Engel, S. . . . . 767
- D3 COLD WAR
 See also D711.
The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain: The "Sandys Era." Martin, Laurence W. . . . . 23
Communications on A History of the Cold War. Lukacs, John. Reviewed by Armstrong, J. A. . . . . 141
A Political Theory of Foreign Aid. Morgenthau, Hans. . . . . 301
Scientists, Foreign Policy and Politics. Schilling, Warner R. . . . . 287
The Cold War and Its Origins: The Eloquent and Indelible Record of The Great Conflict of Our Time. Fleming, D. F. Book review by Wright, T. P. . 437
The Strategy of Truth: The Story of the U. S. Information Service. Dizard, Wilson P. Book noted by McLellan, D. S. . . . . 181
Storm over Laos, by Prince Sisouk na Champassak, noted by Fall, B. B. . . 201
Communications on books reviewed: A History of the Cold War. Lukas, John (Rev. by Armstrong, J. A.) . . . . 141
Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism Versus Communism. Váli, Ferenc A. Book noted by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 489
Around the Edge of War. Amory, John Forth. Book noted by Darling, F. C. . 497
Total War and Cold War: Problems in Civilian Control of the Military, Coles, Harry L. (ed.). Book review by Edinger, L. J. . . . . 692
What Price Co-Existence? A Policy for the Western Alliance, by Sir John Slessor. Book noted by Alfred Fernbach. . . . . 1029
The Common Defense: Strategic Program in National Politics. Huntington, Samuel P. Book review by Radway, L. I. . . . . 982
- D4 WAR
Kant, Liberalism, and War. Waltz, Kenneth N. . . . . 331
Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime. Grundstein, Nathan D. Book noted by Rackow, F. . . . . 462
- D44 PERSONS IN WAR: PRISONERS—PACIFIC INTERCOURSE OF BELLIGERENTS, NONCOMBATANTS
The Manipulation of Human Behavior, Biderman, A. D. and Zimmer, H. (eds.). Book reviewed by Rogow, A. 424
- D48 GENOCIDE
Genocide in Satellite Croatia, 1941–1945, by Edmond Paris, noted by John Clinton Adams. . . . . 1021
- D49 SPECIFIC WARS
The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War. Bolloten, Burnett. Book noted by Nagle, T. W. . . . . 503
- D6 INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION
Legal Problems of the European Economic Community and the European Free Trade Association. . . . . 499
- D61 INTERNATIONAL PUBLIC UNIONS
 See also D67.
- D612 ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES
The United States and Inter-American Security, 1889–1960. J. Lloyd Mecham. Book noted by Kennedy, J. J. . . . . 1032
- D613 UNITED NATIONS
The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession. Lemarchand, René. . . . . 404
The United States and the United Nations (ed.). Wilcox, Francis O. and Haviland, Jr. H. Field. Book noted by Stoessinger, J. G. . . . . 500
The United Nations: Constitutional Developments, Growth and Possibilities. Cohen, Benjamin V. Book noted by Sandifer, D. W. . . . . 501
- D67 INTERNATIONAL UNIONS OF STATES
The Dialectics of Supranational Unification. Amitai Etzioni. . . . . 927
 See also D74.
- D7 INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION—INTERNATIONALISM
Legal Problems of the European Economic Community and the European Free Trade Association. . . . . 499
H. G. Wells and the World State. Wagar, W. Warren. Book noted by Schaar, J. H. . . . . 160
Perspectives on Peace, 1910–1960. Published under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Book noted by Fried, J. H. E. 763
Studies in World Public Order. McDougal, Myres S. and associates. Book noted by Piper, D. C. . . . . 764
- D71 WORLD PEACE MOVEMENTS
D711 CONTROL AND LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS—DISARMAMENT
Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control. Bechhoefer, Bernard G. Book

- reviewed by Gange, J. . . . . 427
The Control of Arms Race. Bull, Hedley. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . 427
Disarmament: The Challenge of the Nineteen Sixties. Warburg, James P. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . 425
Soviet Policy towards International Control of Atomic Energy. Nogee, Joseph L. Book noted by Reshetar, J. S. Jr. . . . . 506
- D74 PAN-MOVEMENTS
European Elections by Direct Suffrage, a Comparative Study of the Electoral Systems Used in Western Europe and their Utility for the Direct Election of a European Parliament, by Wolfgang Birke. Book noted. . . . . 1025
 See also D67.
- D79 FOREIGN AID
A Political Theory of Foreign Aid. Morgenthau, Hans. . . . . 301
- D8 IMMIGRATION & EMIGRATION
London's Newcomers: The West Indian Migrants, by Ruth Glass assisted by H. Pollins. Book noted by Dealey, J. Q. . . . . 195
- F CITIZEN PARTICIPATION IN GOVERNMENT—POLITICS—ELECTIONS
 Bibliography compiled by Franklin L. Burdette. . . . . 183, 471, 733, 1008
The New America: Politics and Society in the Age of the Smooth Deal. Meyer, Karl E. Book noted by Chambers, W. N. . . 180
Groups in Theory and Practice. Loveday, Peter and Campbell, Ian. Book noted by Tinker, I. . . . . 990
- F1 PUBLIC OPINION—SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY
Public Opinion and Foreign Policy. Rosenau, James N. Book reviewed by Smith, B. L. . . . . 441
The Pedagogy of Democracy: Coercive Public Protest in India. Bayley, David H. . . . . 663
The Japanese People and Foreign Policy: A Study of Public Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan. Mendel, Douglas H. Jr. 743
A Theory of Public Opinion. Wilson, Francis Graham. Book review by Krislov, S. . . . . 985
Foreign Affairs and You! Andrew Berding. Book noted by Cecil V. Crabb, Jr. 1036
- F15 PROPAGANDA
Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets. Friedberg, Maurice. Book noted by Swayze, H. . . . . 989
- F5 POLITICS—POLITICAL ETHICS
The Presidential Election and Transition 1960–1961, David, Paul T. (ed.). Book noted by Chamberlain, L. H. . . . . 459
Conscience in Politics: Adlai E. Stevenson in the 1950's. Brown, Stuart Gerry. Book noted by Mallan, J.-P. . 469
Groups in Theory and Practice. Loveday, Peter and Campbell, Ian. Book noted by Tinker, I. . . . . 990
- F51 POLITICAL PARTIES—PARTY PARTICIPATION
The Italian Socialist Party: A Case Study in Factional Conflict. Zariski, Raphael. . . . . 372
The Political Ideas of English Party Activists. Rose, Richard. . . . . 360
The Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives, Riker, William H. and Niemi, Donald. . . . . 58
Equilibrium, Structure of Interests and Leadership: Adenauer's Survival as Chancellor. Merkl, Peter H. . . . . 634
Haggling for the Equilibrium: The Renegotiation of the Austrian Coalition, 1959. Engelmann, Frederick C. . . . 651
Questions in Parliament. Chester, D. N. and Bowring, Nona. Book noted by Millett, J. H. . . . . 753
Party Politics (Volume III): The Stuff of Politics. Jennings, Sir Ivor. Book noted by Rose, R. . . . . 753
The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. Barnes, Samuel H.; Grace, Frank; Pollock, James K.; and Sperlich, Peter W. . . . . 899
African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide. Hodgkin, Thomas. Book review by Untermeyer, F. . . . . 980
The Economics of the Political Parties, by Seymour L. Harris, noted by Sidney Wise. . . . . 1002
- F53 PRESSURE GROUPS
"Responsible Government," Separated Powers, and Special Interests: Agricultural Subsidies in Britain and America. Pennock, J. Roland. . . . 621
The Political World of American Zionism. Halperin, Samuel. Book noted by Rubin B. . . . . 721
- F55 BIOGRAPHIES OF POLITICIANS
Six Crises. Nixon, Richard M. Book noted by Kelley, S. Jr. . . . . 725
Mr. Europe, A Political Biography of Henri Spaak. Huizinga, J. H. Book noted by Mayer, A. J. . . . . 216
- F6 BASES OF REPRESENTATION—APPORTIONMENT
Parliamentary and Electoral Systems: A

- World Handbook*. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 491
- F7 NOMINATIONS
Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics. Rowe, Leonard. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 179
- F8 ELECTIONS
Parliamentary and Electoral Systems: A World Handbook. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 491
European Elections by Direct Suffrage, a Comparative Study of the Electoral Systems Used in Western Europe and their Utility for the Direct Election of a European Parliament, by Wolfgang Birke. Book noted. . . . . 1025
- F804 EXPENSE OF ELECTIONS
Democracy and the Cost of Politics in Britain. Gwyn, William B. Book noted by Shannon, Jasper B. . . . . 1018
- F805 CAMPAIGNS AND PLATFORMS
Six Crises. Nixon, Richard M. Book noted by Kelley, Stanley Jr. . . . . 725
National Party Platforms: 1840-1960, compilers Porter, Kirk and Johnson, Donald Bruce. . . . . 729
- F806 ELECTION RETURNS
The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession. Lemarchand, René. . . . . 404
Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960. Baggaley, Andrew R. . . . . 66
Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus in the Analysis of Dynamic Systems, Ando, Albert and Fisher, Franklin M. . . . . 108
The Religious Factor. Lenski, Gerhard. Book noted by Davis, H. R. . . . . 159
Experimental Approaches to Vote-Counting Theory in Nominating Choice. David, Paul. . . . . 673
The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. Barnes, Samuel H.; Grace, Frank; Pollock, James K.; and Sperlich, Peter W. . . . . 899
Game Theory and Cumulative Voting in Illinois: 1902-1964. Jack Sawyer and Duncan MacRae, Jr. . . . . 936
- G THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH
Parliamentary Reform 1933-1960. The Hansard Society. Book noted by Marquis, L. C. . . . . 479
Influence and Interaction in a State Legislative Body. Francis, Wayne L. . . . . 953
The British Parliament by Roland Young. Book noted by John P. Mackintosh. 936
- G1 LEGISLATORS
Political Decision-makers: Recruitment and Performance, Marvick, Dwaine (ed.). Book noted by Verba, S. . . . . 440
Biographical Directory of the American Congress 1774-1961. . . . . 470
- G2 LEGISLATIVE BODIES
G21 UPPER HOUSE
Quasi-Partisan Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System: The Florida Senate, 1947-1961. Parsons, Malcolm B. . . . . 605
Communication on Norms, Roles and Folkways. Huitt, Ralph. . . . . 142
The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Farnsworth, David N. Book noted by Elder, R. E. . . . . 461
- G22 LOWER HOUSE
History of the House of Representatives. Galloway, George B. Book noted by Moreland, L. B. . . . . 720
The House Appropriations Committee as a Political System: The Problem of Integration. Fenno, Richard F. Jr. . . . . 310
- G255 SUBCOMMITTEES
Subcommittees: The Miniature Legislatures of Congress. Goodwin, George Jr. . . . . 596
- G3 LEGISLATIVE POWERS & FUNCTIONS
Congressional Innovation and Intervention in Defense Policy: Legislative Authorization of Weapons Systems. Dawson, Raymond H. . . . . 42
- G39 PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF FOREIGN POLICY
Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative. Robinson, James A. Book review by Stokes, D. D. . . . . 984
Book note by Patterson, S. C. . . . . 719
- G5 PROCEDURE—LEGISLATIVE VOTING
Quasi-Partisan Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System: The Florida Senate, 1947-1961. Parsons, Malcolm B. . . . . 605
The Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives. Riker, William H. and Niemi, Donald. . . . . 58
Questions in Parliament. Chester, D. N. and Bowring, Nona. Book noted by Millett, J. H. . . . . 753
- G9 LAW
G91 JURISPRUDENCE
Justice and Social Policy, ed. Olafson, Frederick A. Book noted by Paul, J. . . . . 438
Political Justice: The Use of Legal Procedure for Political Ends. Kirchheimer, Otto. Book noted by Duncan, J. P. . . . . 438

H THE JUDICIARY-COURTS-LEGAL PROFESSION

- Freedom and Protection: The Bill of Rights.* Weinberger, Andrew D. Book reviewed by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
- Courts and Rights: The American Judiciary in Action.* Roche, John P. Book reviewed by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
- Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process.* Murphy, Walter F. and Pritchett, C. Herman. (eds.). Book noted by Vose, C. E. . . . . 717

H2 COURT SYSTEMS

H21 FEDERAL COURTS

H211 SUPREME COURT

- Deeds Without Doctrines: Civil Rights in the 1960 Term of the Supreme Court.* McCloskey, Robert G. . . . . 71
- Supreme Court Behavior in Racial Exclusion Cases: 1935-1960.* Ulmer, Sidney S. . . . . 325
- The 1960 Term of the Supreme Court: A Psychological Analysis.* Schubert, Glendon. . . . . 90
- Communications on same. . . . . 422
- The Supreme Court Review.* Kurland, Philip B. (ed.). Book reviewed by Chase, H. W. . . . . 427

H3 JUDICIAL POWERS AND FUNCTIONS

H31 JUDICIAL REVIEW

- Our Fundamental Rights: Their Nature and Extent (As Judicially Determined).* Banerjee, D. N. Book noted by McWhinney, E. . . . . 490

H5 JUDICIAL PROCEDURE

H57 JURY

H573 SELECTION OF JURY

- Supreme Court Behavior in Racial Exclusion Cases: 1935-1960.* Ulmer, Sidney S. . . . . 325

I EXECUTIVE-ADMINISTRATIVE MANAGEMENT—ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

- Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime.* Grundstein, Nathan D. Book noted by Rackow, F. . . . . 461

I2 THE EXECUTIVE AND EXECUTIVE BODIES

I21 CHIEF EXECUTIVE

I210 TRANSITION PERIODS

- Presidential Transitions.* Henry, Laurin L. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . . 173

I213 RELATION TO THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

- Congressional Innovation and Inter-* vention in Defense Policy: Legislative Authorization of Weapons Systems.

Dawson, Raymond H. . . . . 42

I27 CABINET SYSTEM—MINISTERIAL

RESPONSIBILITY

The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain: The "Sandys Era." Martin, Laurence W. . . . . 23

An Uncertain Tradition: American Secretaries of State in the Twentieth Century. ed. Graebner, Norman A.

Book noted by Cohen, B. C. . . . . 176

The British Cabinet. Mackintosh, John P. Book review by Young, R. . . . . 986

British Parliamentary Democracy. Morrison of Lambeth, Lord. Book review by Young, R. . . . . 986

I28 BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS

Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics.

Wildavsky, Aaron. Book noted by Stratton, O. . . . . 721

I5 ADMINISTRATIVE MANAGEMENT

I54 PUBLIC RELATIONS

I549 INFORMATION BUREAUS

The Strategy of Truth: The Story of the U. S. Information Service. Dizard, Wilson P. Book noted by McLellan, D. S. . . . . 181

J PLANNING

J2 RESOURCES PLANNING

J22 NATURAL RESOURCES

(Water) See V43.

J7 CITY PLANNING

Green Belts and Urban Growth: English Town and Country Planning in Action.

Mandelker, Daniel R. Book noted by Stephens, G. R. . . . . 752

K PERSONNEL ADMINISTRATION

K1 THE PUBLIC SERVICE

K12 MERIT SYSTEMS—CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE

Collective Bargaining in the Federal Civil Service: A Study of Labor-

Management Relations in United States Government. Hart, Wilson R.

Book noted by McNeill, R. J. . . . . 180

Morale in the Civil Service: A Study of the Desk Worker. Walker, Nigel.

Book noted by Friedland, Louis L. . . . . 1006

Civil Service and Managing Work: Some Unintended Consequences.

Robert T. Golembiewski. . . . . 961

K18 BUREAUCRACY

Formal Operations: A Comparative Ap-

- proach*. Blau, Peter M. and Scott, Richard W. Book reviewed by Guetzkow, H. . . . . 428
- L PUBLIC FINANCE
- United States Fiscal Policy 1945-1959*. Holmans, A. E. Book noted by Poland, O. F. . . . . 463
- The Economics of the Political Parties*, by Seymour L. Harris, noted by Sidney Wise. . . . . 1002
- L6 EXPENDITURES
- Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom*, by Peacock, Wiseman & Veverta, noted by Buck, P. W. 194
- N NATIONAL DEFENSE—LAW ENFORCEMENT—POLICE—FIRE PROTECTION—SAFETY
- N1 NATIONAL DEFENSE
- The Role of the Military in Underdeveloped Countries*. Johnson, John J. Book noted by Singer, J. David. . . . 1019
- N100 DEFENSE POLICY PLANNING
- Congressional Innovation and Intervention in Defense Policy: Legislative Authorization of Weapons Systems*. Dawson, Raymond H. . . . . 42
- Scientists, Foreign Policy, and Politics*. Schilling, Warner R. . . . . 287
- A Political Theory of Foreign Aid*. Morgenthau, Hans. . . . . 301
- The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain: The "Sandys Era."* Martin, Laurence W. . . . . 23
- The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in National Politics*. Huntington, Samuel P. Book review by Radway, L. I. . . . . 982
- N104 DEFENSE FINANCING AND COSTS
- Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus in the Analysis of Dynamic Systems*. Fisher, Franklin M. and Ando, Albert. . . . . 108
- N11 MILITARY POLICIES
- N119 CIVILIAN CONTROL OF MILITARY POLICY
- Congressional Innovation and Intervention in Defense Policy: Legislative Authorization of Weapons Systems*. Dawson, Raymond H. . . . . 42
- Scientists, Foreign Policy, and Politics*. Schilling, Warner R. . . . . 287
- A Political Theory of Foreign Aid*. Morgenthau, Hans. . . . . 301
- The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain: The "Sandys Era."* Martin, Laurence W. . . . . 23
- Changing Patterns of Military Politics*, ed. Huntington, Samuel P. Book review by Edinger, L. J. . . . . 926
- Total War and Cold War: Problems in Civilian Control of the Military*, ed. Coles, Harry L. Book review by Edinger, L. J. . . . . 692
- N6 PUBLIC SAFETY AND ORDER
- N63 CENSORSHIP
- Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail*. Paul, James C. N. and Schwartz, Murray L. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . . 464
- Secrecy and Publicity Dilemmas of Democracy*. Rourke, Francis E. Book noted by Penniman, H. . . . . 175
- Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959*. Swayze, Harold. Book noted by Friedberg, M. . . . . 988
- P EDUCATION—LIBRARIES
- P04 FINANCE
- The Role of the Federal Government in Financing Higher Education*. Rivlin, Alice M. Book noted by Abbott, F. C. . . . . 731
- P3 EDUCATION AND STATE
- Religion, Government, and Education*, (ed.) Brickman, William W. and Lehrer, Stanley. Book noted by Lanoue, G. R. . . . . 468
- P5 COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES
- P54 CURRICULA
- P544 SOCIAL SCIENCES
- Political Science as a Discipline. A Statement by the Committee on Standards of Instruction on the American Political Science Association*. . . . . 417
- Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs*. Bidwell, Percy W. Book noted by Buckhart, J. A. . . . . 991
- P7 PROFESSIONAL EDUCATION—THE PROFESSIONS
- Graduate Education in the United States*. Berelson, B. Book reviewed by Caldwell, L. K. . . . . 153
- P709 PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATIONS—AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION
- Political Science as a Discipline. A Statement by the Committee on Standards of Instruction on the American Political Science Association*. . . . . 417

- Toward a Definition of Editorial Policy.* Mansfield, Harvey C..... 129
- Toward a Definition of Book Review Policy.* Leiserson, Avery..... 139
- P7091 Appointments and Staff Changes
- March 1962..... 238
- June 1962..... 524
- September 1962..... 797
- December 1962..... 1049
- P7092 News and Notes
- March 1962..... 233
- June 1962..... 520
- September 1962..... 792
- December 1962..... 1042
- P7093 In Memoriam
- Lowrie, Selden Gale..... 241
- Margalith, Aaron M..... 526
- Lancaster, Lane W..... 526
- MacDonald, Austin F..... 526
- Lambie, Morris B..... 803
- Zink, Harold..... 803
- P7094 Dissertations
- on Political Science, Seyler, William C. compiler..... 774
- Q PUBLIC WELFARE
- A Report on Social Security Programs in the Soviet Union.* U. S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare. Book reviewed by Somers, H. M..... 149
- The Measurement of Social Welfare.* Rothenberg, Jerome. Book noted by Lindblom, C. E..... 702
- Q5 SOCIAL INSURANCE
- Q68 OLD AGE INSURANCE
- The Development of the Social Security Act.* Witte, Edwin E. Book noted by Leiserson, A..... 723
- R LABOR
- R7 LABOR RELATIONS
- The Man in the Middle—The Inside Story of the Hot and Cold Wars Between Labor and Management.* Shaffer, Nathan W. with Dramer, Dale. Book noted by Gilmour, C. E.. 467
- Collective Bargaining in the Federal Civil Service: A Study of Labor-Management Relations in United States Government.* Hart, Wilson R. Book noted by McNeill, R. J..... 180
- T KOMING
- T1 KOMING
- T19 KOMING
- T191 EUROPE
- Europe's Needs and Resources.* Dewhurst, J. Frederic, et al., book noted by Ritchie, W. A..... 208
- T194 LATIN AMERICA
- A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America.* Benham, F., & Holley, H. A., book noted by Lewis, F. M..... 196
- U GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS
- U2 REGULATION AND PROTECTION OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE
- Pricing Power and the Public Interest, A Study Based on Steel.* Means, Gardiner C. Book review by Latham, E.. 690
- The Politics of Oil.* Engler, Robert. Book review by Turner, H. A..... 695
- U24 PATENTS—COPYRIGHTS—TRADEMARKS
- Constraint by Copyright.* Schnapper, M. B. Book noted by Dilliard, I... 732
- U5 GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP
- Parliament and Public Ownership.* Hanson, A. H. Book noted by Dugan, A. B..... 752
- V PUBLIC UTILITIES
- V4 WATER—WATER UTILITIES
- V43 WATER SUPPLY
- Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning,* by Maass, Huffschildt, Dorfman, Thomas, Marglin & Fair—noted by Frank Munger..... 1003
- W TRANSPORTATION—TRAFFIC—COMMUNICATION
- W7 COMMUNICATION
- W71 POSTAL SERVICE
- Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail.* Paul, James C. N. and Schwartz, Murray L. Book noted by Longaker, R. P..... 464
- W9 RADIO—RADIO BROADCASTING
- British Broadcasting in Transition.* Paulu, Burton. Book noted by Alperin, R. J..... 755
- Z AGRICULTURE
- Z4 ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF AGRICULTURE
- "Responsible Government," Separated Powers, and Special Interests: Agricultural Subsidies in Britain and America.* Pennock, J. Roland..... 621
- The Farmer's Dilemma.* Andrews, Stanley. Book noted by Talbot, R. B.... 722

SECTION TWO:

ALPHABETICAL SECTION

- Abbott, F. C. Notes on The Role of the Federal Government in Financing Higher Education. Rivlin, Alice M. . . . . 731
- Adam, T. R. Notes on Politics in Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara. Spiro, Herbert. . . . . 747
- Adams, John Clinton. Book note on Genocide in Satellite Croatia, 1941-1945, by Paris, Edmond. . . . . 1021
- Adenauer, Konrad. see F51.
- Adler, Joseph. The Herzl Paradox: Political, Social and Economic Theories of a Realist. Book noted by Lucatz, N. . . . . 701
- Adloff, Earl (and Thompson, Virginia). The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa. Book noted by Le Vine, V. T. . . . 486
- The Administration of British Foreign Relations*. Bishop, Donald G. Book noted by Harris, J. S. . . . . 755
- AFRICA. See D211; B43.
- Africa: The Politics of Independence*. Wallerstein, Immanuel. Book reviewed by Hanna, W. . . . . 429
- Africa South*. de Blij, Harm Jan. Book noted by Richard W. Taylor. . . . . 1024
- African Affairs: Number One*. St. Anthony's Papers: Number 10 (ed.) Kirkwood, Kenneth. Book noted by Davies, J. C. . . . . 486
- African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide*. Hodgkin, Thomas. Book review by Untermeyer, F. . . . . 980
- AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES. See Z4
- Albrecht-Carrié, René. France, Europe, and the Two World Wars. Book notes by Neumann, R. . . . . 215
- Alexander Herzen and the Birth of Russian Socialism, 1812-1855*. Malia, Martin. Book noted by Hammer, D. P. . . . . 443
- Alexander, Robert J. Prophets of the Revolution: Profiles of Latin American Leaders. Book noted by Burnett, B. G. . . . . 481
- Alger, C. F. Notes on Strategy for the 60's. Cerf, Jay H. and Pozen, Walter (eds.). . . 507
- Almond, G. A. Notes on A Theory of Foreign Policy. Modelski, George. . . . . 700
- Alperin, R. J. Notes on British Broadcasting in Transition. Paulu, Burton. . . . . 755
- Altschuler, A. Notes on Cases in State and Local Government. Frost, Richard T. (ed.) 178
- Ambassadors Ordinary and Extraordinary*. Spaulding, E. Wilder. Book noted by Gibbs, H. S. . . . . 762
- America in Britain's Place: The Leadership of the West and Anglo-American Unity*. Gleher, Lionel. Book noted by Joynt, C. B. . . . . 496
- AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY. See D, B26, B4.
- AMERICAN GOVERNMENT & POLITICS. See B5, B6, B7, B8, F, G, and H.
- American Perspectives*, Spiller, Robert E. and Larrabee, Eric (eds.). Book noted by Backstroin, Charles H. . . . . 179
- American Political Science Association, see P709.
- American Political Science Association, Committee on Standards of Instruction. Political Science as a Discipline. . . . . 417
- AMERICAN POLITICAL THOUGHT. See B21 and B23.
- Amory, John Forth. Around the Edge of War. Book noted by Darling, F. C. . . . . 497
- Anderson, S. V. Book notes on Modern Swedish Government. Andrén, Nils. . . . 203
- on Danmarks Folketing: om dets hus og historie. Thorsen, Svend. . . . . 203
- on Stortinget på nært hold. Øisang, Per. . 203
- Ando, Albert & Fisher, Franklin M. Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus in the Analysis of Dynamic Systems. . . . . 108
- Andrén, Nils. Modern Swedish Government. Book noted by Anderson, S. V. . . . . 203
- Noted again. . . . . 1024
- Andrews, Stanley. The Farmer's Dilemma. Book noted by Talbot, R. B. . . . . 722
- The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781-1788*. Main, Jackson Turner. Book noted by Bowman, E. . . . . 729
- Appleton, Sheldon. The Eternal Triangle? Communist China, the United States and the United Nations. Book noted by Walker, R. L. . . . . 1030
- APPORTIONMENT. See F6.
- APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE, HOUSE. See HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE
- Apter, David. The Political Kingdom in Uganda. Book noted by Dvorin, E. P. . . . 199
- ARABS. See B425 and B437.
- ARMED SERVICE COMMITTEES. See G3.
- Armstrong, John A. See D3.
- Around the Edge of War*: Amory, John Forth. Book noted by Darling, F. C. . . . 497
- The Art of the Possible: Government and Foreign Policy in Canada*. Eayrs, James. Book noted by Williams, J. R. . . . . 750
- Asher, Robert E. Grants, Loans, and Local Currencies: Their Role in Foreign Aid. Book notes by Buehrig, E. H. . . . . 213
- Ashford, Douglas. Political Change in Morocco. Book noted by Khadduri, M. . . . 198
- ASIA. See B42.
- ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION, See N119; also see I28.

- ATOMIC ENERGY, CONTROL OF. See D711.
 AUSTRALIAN POLITICS. See B461.
 AUSTRIAN POLITICS. See B416.
- Bachrach, Peter & Baratz, Morton S. Two Faces of Power. . . . . 947
 Backstrom, Charles H. Notes on American Perspectives, Spiller, Robert E. and Larabee, Eric (eds.). . . . . 179
The Backward Society. Frost, Raymond. Book noted by Rothchild, D. S. . . . . 504
 Baggaley, Andrew R. Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960. . . . . 66
 Baker, R. D. Notes on Venezuela. Lieuwen, Edwin. . . . . 746
 Banerjee, D. N. Our Fundamental Rights: Their Nature and Extent (As Judicially Determined). Book noted by McWhinney, E. . . . . 490
 Banfield, Edward C. Political Influence. Book reviewed by Scoble, H. M. . . . . 151
 Barber, H. W. Notes on Latin America Between the Eagle and the Bear. deMadariaga, Salvadore. . . . . 1032
 Barber, W. F. Notes on Latin American Social Thought. Davis, Harold Eugene. . . . . 705
 Baratz, Morton S. & Bachrach, Peter. Two Faces of Power. . . . . 947
 Barnes, Samuel H. (with Grace, Frank, Pollock, James K. and Sperlich, Peter W.) The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. . . . . 899
 Barrett, P. Reviews The Papers of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. I., 1768-1778. Vol. II., 1779-1781. . . . . 432
 Bates, M. L. Notes on I Speak of Freedom. Nkrumah, Kwame. . . . . 485
 Bayley, David H. The Pedagogy of Democracy: Coercive Public Protest in India. . . . . 663
 Bechhoefer, B. G. Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . . . 425
 BELGIAN COLONIES. See Limits of Self-Determination; See also D211 and B4171.
 Benham, F., with Holley, H. A. A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America. Book noted by Lewis, F. M. . . . . 196
 Bennett, George (and Rosberg, Carl). The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960-1961. Book noted by McConnell, G. . . . . 484
 Benton, Wilbourn E. Texas: Its Government and Politics. Book noted by Ransone, C. B., Jr. . . . . 466
 Berdyaev, Nicholas. The Russian Revolution. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
 Berding, Andrew. Foreign Affairs and You! Book noted by Crabb, C. V. Jr. . . . . 1036
 Berelson, Bernard. Graduate Education in the United States. Book reviewed by Caldwell, L. K. . . . . 153
 Beshers, James M. Urban Social Structure. Book noted by O'Donnell, M. E. . . . . 1000
- BIBLIOGRAPHY
 on International Law and Relations, Roberts, William H., compiler. . . . . 219, 510 on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences, Feldman, Julian, compiler. . . . . 165, 450, 709, 995 on Foreign and Comparative Government, Stout, Hiram M., compiler. . . . . 203, 491, 756, 1025 on American Government and Politics, Burdette, Franklin L., compiler. . . . . 183, 471, 733, 1008 on Political Theory, Kenyon, Cecilia M., compiler. . . . . 163, 448, 707
Select list of publications issued by Senate and House committees. Committee prints, staff studies, reports, and documents, 80th-86th Congress (1947-60, inclusive) (Prepared by) The Senate Committee on Government Operations. Book noted by Childs, J. B. . . . . 471
 Biderman, A. D. (ed.) (with H. Zimmer). The Manipulation of Human Behavior. Book reviewed by Rogow, A. . . . . 424
 Bidwell, Percy W. Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs. Book noted by Burkhart, J. A. . . . . 991
- BILL OF RIGHTS. See C; also H.
 Birke, Wolfgang. European elections by direct suffrage, a comparative study of the electoral systems used in Western Europe and their utility for the direct election of a European parliament. Book noted. . . . . 1025
Biographical Directory of the American Congress, 1774-1961. Book noted by Childs, J. B. . . . . 470
 Birnbach, Martin. Neo-Freudian Social Philosophy. Book noted by Pinner, F. A. . . . . 703
 Bishop, Donald G. The Administration of British Foreign Relations. Book noted by Harris, J. S. . . . . 755
 Blau, Peter M. (with Richard W. Scott). Formal Organizations: A Comparative Approach. Book reviewed by Guetzkow, H. . . . . 428
 Blij, Harm Jan de. Africa South. Book noted by Richard W. Taylor. . . . . 1024
 Blij, Harm Jan de. Book note on South Africa 1906-1961: The Price of Magnanimity by Mansergh, Nicholas. . . . . 1023
 Bollens, John C. (ed.) Exploring the Metropolitan Community. Book reviewed by Green, L. S. . . . . 152
 Bolloten, Burnett. The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War. Book noted by Nagle, T. W. . . . . 503
- BOOK REVIEW POLICY. See P709.
 Booth, D. A. Book notes on The Relation

- Between International Law and Municipal Law in the Netherlands and in the United States.* Erades, L. and Gould, W. L. . . . . 218
- Boss Cermak of Chicago: A Study of Political Leadership.* Gottfried, Alex. Book noted by McGoldrick, J. D. . . . . 1001
- Bowman, E. Notes on The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781-1788. Main, Jackson Turner. . . . . 729
- Bowring, Nona (with Chester, D. N.). Questions in Parliament. Book noted by Millett, J. H. . . . . 753
- Braeman, J. Notes on Contours of American History. Williams, William Appleman. . . 1005
- Braibanti, Ralph (ed.) (and Spengler, Joseph J.). Tradition, Values, and Socio-Economic Development. Book noted by Friedman, J. R. . . . . 157
- Bramson, Leon. The Political Context of Sociology. Book noted by Scher, S. . . . . 161
- Braunthal, Julius. Geschichte der Internationale. Book noted by Sturmthal, A. . . . 766
- BRAZZAVILLE BLOC. See B435
- Brickman, William W. (ed.) (with Lehrer, Stanley). Religion, Government, and Education. Book noted by LaNoue, G. R. . . 468
- British Broadcasting in Transition.* Paulu, Burton. Book noted by Alperin, R. J. . . . 755
- The British Cabinet.* Mackintosh, John P. Book review by Young, R. . . . . 986
- BRITISH COMMONWEALTH
In Europe. See B41.
In Asia. See B42.
In Africa. See B43.
In Latin America & West Indies. See B44.
In North America. See B45.
In Australasia & Oceania. See B46.
- British Parliament, The.* Young, Roland. Book noted by Mackintosh, John P. . . . 1022
- British Parliamentary Democracy.* Morrison of Lambeth, Lord. Book Review by Young, R. . . . . 986
- Brockelmann, Carl. History of the Islamic Peoples. Book noted by Fitzgerald, J. A. . 200
- Brown, Bernard E. (with Macridis, Roy C.). Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings. Book noted by Lanyi, G. A. . . . . 749
- Brown, D. Mackenzie. The Nationalist Movement: Indian Political Thought from Ronade to Bhawe. Book noted by Tinker, I. 990
- Brown, Stuart Gerry. Conscience in Politics: Adlai E. Stevenson in the 1950's. Book noted by Mallan, J. P. . . . . 469
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew. Deviation Control: A Study in the Dynamics of Doctrinal Conflict. . . . . . 5
- Buck, Philip W. Note on Wiseman & Peacock, Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom. . . . . . 194
- Buehrig, E. G. Book notes on Grants, Loans and Local Currencies: Their Role in Foreign Aid. Asher, R. E. . . . . 213
- BUGANDA. See Political Kingdom in Uganda.
- Bull, Hedley. The Control of the Arms Race. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . . . 425
- Burdette, Franklin L., compiler of Bibliography on American Government and Politics. . . . . . 183, 471, 733, 1008
- Burke, F. G. Reviews The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World. . . . . 434
- Burkhart, J. A. Notes on Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs. Bidwell, Percy W. . . . . 991
- Burse, L. Gerald. Note on R. Conquest's Power and Policy in the U.S.S.R. . . . . 192
- BURMA. See B426.
- Burnett, B. G. Notes on Prophets of the Revolution: Profiles of Latin American Leaders. Alexander, Robert J. . . . . 481
- Busey, J. L. Reviews The Cuban Story. Matthews, Herbert L. . . . . 146
- Butwell, Richard. Southeast Asia Today—And Tomorrow. A Political Analysis. Book noted by Lev, D. S. . . . . 1031
- Cahn, Edmond. The Predicament of Democratic Man. Book noted by McKee, D. K. 156
- Caldwell, L. K. Reviews Graduate Education in the United States. Berelson, Bernard . 153
- CALIFORNIA POLITICS. See B65.
- Campbell, Ian, & Loveday, Peter. Groups in Theory and Practice. Book noted by Hagan, C. B. . . . . 990
- CARIBBEAN. See B44.
- CASE STUDIES, see AA1.
- Cases in State and Local Government.* Frost, Richard T. (ed.). Book noted by Altschuler, A. . . . . 178
- CENSORSHIP. See C41.
- CENTRAL AMERICA. See B44.
- Central Authority and Regional Autonomy in Indonesia: A Study in Local Administration, 1950-1960.* Legge, J. D. Book noted by Mill, E. W. . . . . 745
- A Century of Civil Rights.* Konvitz, Milton R. With A Study of State Law Against Discrimination. Leskes, Theodore. Book noted by Wiltsey, G. G. . . . . 718
- Cerf, Jay H. (ed.) (with Pozen, Walter). Strategy for the 60's. Book noted by Alger, C. F. . . . . 507
- CERMAK, ANTON J. See Boss Cermak.
- Chambers, W. N. Notes on National Party Platforms: 1840-1960. Porter, Kirk and Johnson, Donald Bruce, compilers. . . . 729
- Chambers, W. N. Notes on The New America: Politics and Society in the Age of the Smooth Deal. Meyer, Karl E. . . . . 180
- Champassak, Prince Sisouk Na. Storm Over

- Laos—A Contemporary History*. Book noted by Fall, B. B. . . . . 201
- The Changing Patterns of the Middle East*. Rondot, Pierre. Book noted by Lucatz, N. 488
- Changing Patterns of Military Politics*, Huntington, Samuel P. (ed.). Book review by Edinger, L. J. . . . . 692
- Chase, H. W. Reviews The Supreme Court Review. . . . . 427
- Chester, D. N. (with Bowring, Nona). Questions in Parliament. Book noted by Millett, J. H. . . . . 753
- CHICAGO. See B73.
- Childs, J. B. Notes on Biographical Directory of the American Congress. . . . . 470
- Select List of Publications Issued by Senate and House Committees. Committee Prints, Staff Studies, Reports, and Documents, 80th–86th Congress (1947–60, Inclusive)*. . . . . 471
- CHINA, COMMUNIST. See Deviation Control.
- CHINA. See B422.
- CHURCH & STATE. See B12431.
- CITIES. See B131, B15, and B73.
- CITY GOVERNMENT. See B73.
- CITY MANAGER. See B734.
- City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination*. Kammerer, Gladys M., Farris, Charles D., DeGrove, John M., Chubok, Alfred B. Book noted by Kenneth Prewitt. . . . . 1007
- Civil Liberties and the Constitution*. Kauper, Paul G. Book review by Steamer, R. J. . . . 694
- CIVIL RIGHTS. See C41.
- CIVIL SERVICE. See K.
- Civil Service and Managing Work: Some Unintended Consequences*. Golembiewski, Robert T. . . . . 961
- CIVIL WAR, SPANISH. See D49.
- CLASSICAL POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY, see Revival of Classical Political Philosophy . . . ; see also Reply to Rothman. . . . .
- Claude, I. L. Book notes on The International Status of the United Nations. Weissberg, Guenter. . . . . 209
- Chubok, Alfred B., with Kammerer, Farris & DeGrove. City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination. Book noted by Prewitt, Kenneth. . . . . 1007
- COALITION GOVERNMENT. See Haggling for the Equilibrium.
- Cohen, Benjamin V. The United Nations: Constitutional Developments, Growth and Possibilities. Book noted by Sandifer, D. V. . . . . 501
- Cohen, B. D. Notes on An Uncertain Tradition: American Secretaries of State in the Twentieth Century. Graebner, Norman A. . . . . 176
- Coke, J. G. Reviews Mastery of the Metropolis. Fiser, Webb S. . . . . 979
- COLD WAR. See D3.
- The Cold War and Its Origins: The Eloquent and Indelible Record of The Great Conflict of Our Time*. Fleming, D. F. Book reviewed by Wright, T. P. . . . . 435
- Coles, Harry L. (ed.). Total War and Cold War: Problems in Civilian Control of the Military. Book review by Edinger, L. J. . 692
- Collective Bargaining in the Federal Civil Service: A Study of Labor-Management Relations in United States Government*. Hart, Wilson R. Book noted by McNeill, R. J. . . . . 180
- COLONIALISM. See D211.
- COMMISSION PLAN. See B733.
- The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in National Politics*. Huntington, Samuel P. Book review by Radway, Lawrence I. 982
- COMMON MARKET. See D6.
- COMMUNIST PARTY. See C41, F51, and B55.
- Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948–1960*, by Edward Taborsky, noted by Ivo K. Feieraband. . . . . 193
- Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II*. Shoup, Paul. . . . . 886
- Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era*. Hsieh, Alice Langley. Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT. See B4, see also B7, F51, G1, N100, N119 and Bibliography.
- Comparative Politics: A Comprehensive Approach*. Spiro, Herbert J. . . . . 577
- Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings*. Macridis, Roy C. and Brown, Bernard E. Book noted by Lanyi, G. A. . . . . 749
- A Comparative Study of the Indian Constitution, Vol. 1: General Principles of Organization*. Sen, Sirdar D. K. Book noted by Retzlaff, R. H. . . . . 202
- The Conflict Society: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America*. Silvert, Kalman H. Book noted by Taylor, P. B., Jr. . . . . 482
- CONGO, REPUBLIC OF (LEOPOLDVILLE). See B438.
- Congo Disaster*. Legum, Colin. Book noted by Hanna, W. . . . . 198
- CONGRESS. See G.
- CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES. See G25.
- CONGRESS, U. S., INVESTIGATIONS. See C41.
- Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative*. Robinson, James A. Book noted by Patterson, S. C. . . . . 719
- Ibid.* Reviewed by Stokes, D. E. . . . . 984
- Congressional Innovation and Intervention in Defense Policy: Legislative Authorization*

- of Weapons Systems. Raymond H. Dawson..... 42
- Connery, R. H. Reviews Megalopolis: The Urbanized Northeastern Seaboard of the United States. Gottmann, Jean..... 696
- Conquest, R. Power & Policy in the U.S.S.R., Book notes by L. Gerald Bursey 193
- Conscience in Politics: Adlai E. Stevenson in the 1950's*. Brown, Stuart Gerry. Book noted by Mallan, J. P..... 469
- CONSENSUS. See B21.
- CONSERVATIVE PARTY, ENGLAND. See Political Ideas of English Party Activists; also see F51 and B411.
- Conservatism in America: The Thankless Persuasion*. Rossiter, Clinton. Book noted by McGiffert, Michael..... 724
- CONSTITUENCY RESOLUTIONS, see Political Ideas of English Party Activists
- CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY AND LAW. See C.
- Constitutionalism: A Preliminary Discussion*. Sarfori, Giovanni..... 853
- Contemporary Arab Politics: A Concise History*. Kirk, George. Book noted by Lenczowski, G..... 199
- Contours of American History*. Williams, William Appleman. Book noted by Braeman, J..... 1005
- The Control of the Arms Race*. Bull, Hedley. Book reviewed by Gange, J..... 425
- Cooke, Jacob E. (associate ed.) (with Syrett, Harold C., ed.). The Papers of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. I, 1768-1778. Vol. II, 1779-1781. Book reviewed by Barrett, P..... 432
- Coppock, J. O., with Dewhurst, J. F.; Yates, P. L.; and associates. Europe's Needs and Resources. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A..... 208
- Cottrell, F. Notes on Sociology: The Progress of a Decade. Lipset, Seymour Martin. 446
- Courts and Rights: The American Judiciary in Action*. Roche, John P. Book noted by Ulmer, S. S..... 460
- Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process*, Murphy, Walter F. and Pritchett, C. Herman. (eds.). Book noted by Vose, C. E..... 717
- Crabb, C. V. Jr. Notes on Professional Diplomacy in the United States: 1779-1939. Ilchman, Warren Frederick..... 177
- Crabb, C. V. Jr. Notes on Foreign Affairs and You! Berding, Andrew..... 1035
- Crombie, Sir James. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. Book noted..... 1024
- Cropsey, Joseph. A Reply to Rothman..... 353, 682 et seq.
- Crowder, Michael. Senegal, A Study in French Assimilation Policy. Book noted. 1025
- CUBA. See B441.
- The Cuban Story*. Matthews, Herbert L. Book reviewed by Busey, J. L..... 146
- CZECHOSLOVAKIA. See B4141.
- Dahl, Robert A. Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City. Book reviewed by Eulau, H..... 144
- Danmarks Folketing: om dets hus og historie*. Thorsen, Svend. Book noted by Anderson, S. V..... 203
- Darling, F. C. Notes on Around the Edge of War. Amory, John Forth..... 497
- DAVID, PAUL. See AA2.
- David, Paul T. (ed.). The Presidential Election and Transition 1960-1961. Book noted by Ulmer, S. S..... 459
- Davies, J. C. Notes on African Affairs: Number One. St. Anthony's Papers: Number 10. Kirkwood, Kenneth..... 486
- Davis, Harold Eugene. Latin American Social Thought. Book noted by Barber, W. F..... 705
- Davis, H. R. Notes on The Religious Factor. Lenski, Gerhard..... 159
- Dawson, Raymond H. Congressional Innovation and Intervention in Defense Policy: Legislative Authorization of Weapons Systems..... 42
- Dealey, James Q. Book notes on London's Newcomers: The West Indian Migrants. Glass, Ruth..... 195
- de Blij. See Blij.
- DECISION MAKING. See N119; see also AA1, H211 and Z4.
- Decisions in Syracuse*. Martin, Roscoe C., Munger, Frank G. and others. Book noted by Monat, W. R..... 466
- DEFENSE POLICY. See N100.
- DEFENSE PLANNING, BRITAIN. See Market for Strategic Ideas...; see also N100.
- DeGrove, John M., with Kammerer, Farris, & Clubok. City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination. Book noted by Prewitt, Kenneth 1007
- DeMadariaga. See Madariaga.
- DEMOCRACY. See B53.
- Democracy and the Cost of Politics in Britain*. Gwyn, William B. Book noted by Shannon, Jasper B..... 1018
- DENMARK. See B413.
- The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research*. Melville, Sir Harry. Book noted..... 1024
- Design of Regional Accounts: Papers presented at the Conference on Regional Accounts, 1960*, Hochwald, Werner (ed.). Book noted by Wengert, N..... 730
- Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Gov-*

- ernmental Planning*. Maass, Arthur, Hufschmidt, Maynard M., Dorfman, Robert, Thomas, Harold A., Jr., Marglin, Stephen A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others. Book noted by Munger, F. . . . . 1003
- The Development of the Social Security Act*. Witte, Edwin E. Book noted by Leiser-son, A. . . . . 723
- Deviation Control: A Study in the Dynamics of Doctrinal Conflict*. Zbigniew Brzezinski 5
- Dewhurst, J. F., with Coppock, J. O.; Yates, P. L.; and associates. Europe's Needs and Resources. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A. . . . . 208
- Dialectics of Supranational Unification, The*. Amitai Etzioni. . . . . 927
- DIPLOMACY. See D1.
- DISARMAMENT. See D711.
- Disarmament: The Challenge of the Nineteen Sixties*. Warburg, James P. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . . . 425
- Dishman, R. B. Notes on The Government of Kansas. Drury, James W. (with associates) . . . . . 465
- DIXON-YATES. See I28.
- Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics*. Wildavsky, Aaron. Book noted by Strat-ton, O. . . . . 721
- Dizard, Wilson P. The Strategy of Truth: The Story of the U. S. Information Service. Book noted by McLellan, D. S. . . . . 181
- Dorfman, Robert (with Maas, Arthur, Hufschmidt, Robert, Thomas, Harold A., Jr., Marglin, Stephen A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others). Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Book noted by Munger, F. . . . . 1003
- Dragnich, A. N. Notes on Yugoslavia and the New Communism. Hoffman & Neal . . 1034
- Drury, James W. (with associates). The Government of Kansas. Book noted by Dishman, R. B. . . . . 465
- DUE PROCESS. See C41.
- Dugan, A. B. Notes on Parliament and Public Ownership. Hanson, A. H. . . . . 752
- Duncan, J. P. Notes Political Justice: The Use of Legal Procedure for Political Ends. Kirchheimer, Otto. . . . . 438
- Dvorin, E. P. Book notes on The Political Kingdom in Uganda. Apter, David. . . . 199
- Dyke, Vernon Van. Values and Interests. . . 567
- Communication from Oppenheim, Felix E. . . . . 975
- EAST GERMANY. See B4143.
- Eayrs, James. The Art of the Possible: Government and Foreign Policy in Canada. Book noted by Williams, J. R. . . . . 750
- ECONOMIC SOCIOLOGY. See B123.
- Economics of the Political Parties, The*. Harris, S. L. Book noted by S. Wise. . . . 1002
- The Edge of Freedom*. Oakes, John B. Book noted by Wallerstein, I. . . . . 487
- Edinger, L. J. Reviews Changing Patterns of Military Politics. Huntington, Samuel P. (ed.) . . . . . 692
- Reviews Total War and Cold War: Problems in Civilian Control of the Military. Coles, Harry L. (ed.) . . . . . 692
- EGYPT. See B4372.
- Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt 1804-1952*. Safran, Nadav. Book noted by Gerteiny, A. G. . . 748
- Elder, R. E. Notes on The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Farnsworth, David N. . . . . 461
- ELECTIONS. See F8.
- ELECTION ANALYSES. See F806 and AA2.
- EMERGING NATIONS. See D211.
- The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa*. Thompson, Virginia and Adloff, Earl. Book noted by Le Vine, V. T. . . . . 486
- Engel, S. Notes on The Position of the Individual in International Law According to Grotius and Vattel. Remec, Peter M. . . . 767
- Engelmann, Frederick C. Haggling for the Equilibrium: The Renegotiation of the Austrian Coalition, 1959. . . . . 651
- ENGLAND & WALES. See B411.
- Engler, Robert. The Politics of Oil. Book review by Turner, H. A. . . . . 695
- ENGLISH POLITICS. See Political Ideas of English Party Activists: see also B4 and F51.
- Equilibrium, Structure of Interests, and Leadership: Adenauer's Survival as a Chancellor*. Merkl, Peter H. . . . . 634
- Erades, L. and Gould, W. L. The Relation Between International Law and Municipal Law in the Netherlands and in the United States. Book notes by Booth, D. A. . . . . 218
- The Eternal Triangle? Communist China, the United States and the United Nations*. Appleton, Sheldon. Book noted by Walker, R. L. . . . . 1030
- ETHNIC FACTORS IN VOTING. See F806.
- Etzioni, Amitai. The Dialectics of Supranational Unification. . . . . 927
- Eulau, H. Reviews Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City. Dahl, Robert A. . . . . 144
- EUROPE. See B41 and T191.
- European elections by direct suffrage, a comparative study of the electoral systems used in Western Europe and their utility for the direct election of a European parliament*. Birke, Wolfgang. Book noted. . . . 1025

- EUROPEAN UNION. See D74.
Europe's Needs and Resources. Dewhurst, J. F.; Coppock, J. O.; Yates, P. L.; and associates. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A. . . . . 208
- EXECUTIVE—LEGISLATIVE RELATIONS. See I213.
- EXPENSES, ELECTION. See F804.
Exploring the Metropolitan Community, Bollens, John C. (ed.). Book reviewed by Greene, L. S. . . . . 152
- The Failure of Union: Central America, 1824-1960*. Karnes, Thomas L. Book noted by Moses, C. C. . . . . 480
- Fair, Gordon Maskew (with Maass, Arthur, Hufschmidt, Maynard M., Dorfman, Robert, Thomas, Harold A., Jr., Maglin, Stephen A.). Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Book noted by Munger, F. . . . . 1003
- Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism. Payne, Stanley G. Book noted by Wilson, L. C. . . . . 483
- Fall, B. B. Book notes on Storm Over Laos—A Contemporary History. Champassak, Prince Sisouk Na. . . . . 201
- FAR EAST. See B42.
- FARM SUBSIDIES. See Z4.
The Farmer's Dilemma. Andrews, Stanley. Book noted by Talbot, R. B. . . . . 722
- Farnsworth, David N. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Book noted by Elder, R. E. . . . . 461
- Farrelly, D. G. Notes on The Structure of American Federalism. Vile, M. J. C. . . . . 465
- Farris, Charles D., with Kammerer, DeGrove, & Clubok. City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination. Book noted by Prewitt, Kenneth. . . . . 1007
- FASCISM. See B58.
Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. Paul, James C. N. and Schwartz, Murray L. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . . 173
- FEDERALISM. See B263.
- Feierabend, Ivo K., note on Edward Taborsky's Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948-1960. . . . . 193
- Feldman, Julian, compiler of Bibliography on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences. . . . . 165, 450, 709, 995
- Fenno, Richard F., Jr. The House Appropriations Committee as a Political System: The Problem of Integration. . . . . 310
- Fernbach, A. Notes on What Price Coexistence? A Policy for the western Alliance. Slessor, Sir John. . . . . 1029
- Financing International Organization: The United Nations Budget Process*. Singer, J. David. Book noted by Kimball, C. . . . 209
- Fiser, Webb S. Mastery of the Metropolis. Book review by Coke, J. G. . . . . 979
- Fisher, Franklin M. & Ando, Albert. Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus in the Analysis of Dynamic Systems. . . . . 108
- Fitzgerald, J. A. Book notes on History of the Islamic Peoples. Brockelmann, Carl. . 200
- Fitzgibbon, R. H. Notes on Pan America in Crisis. Manger, William. . . . . 760
- Fleming, D. F. The Cold War and Its Origins: The Eloquent and Indelible Record of The Great Conflict of Our Time. Book reviewed by Wright, T. P. . . . . 435
- FLORIDA POLITICS. See Quasi-Partisan Conflict . . . ; also see B65.
- Food, Land, and Manpower in Western Europe*. Yates, P. Lamartine. Book noted by Rothman, S. . . . . 506
- Ford, John Anson. Thirty Explosive Years in Los Angeles County. Book noted by Rice, R. R. . . . . 726
- Foreign Affairs and You!* Berding, Andrew. Book noted by Crabb, C. V. Jr. . . . . 1036
- FOREIGN AID. See D79.
- FOREIGN POLICY. See Scientists, Foreign Policy, and Politics; also see F1, N100, N119, and D3.
- Formal Organizations: A Comparative Approach*. Blau, Peter M. and Scott, Richard W. Book reviewed by Guetzkow, H. . 428
- A Forward Strategy for America*. Strausz-Hupe, R.; Kintner, W. R.; and Possony, S. T. Book noted by Ludden, H. R. . . . . 210
- FRANCE. See B417.
France, Europe, and the Two World Wars. Albrecht-Carrié, René. Book notes by Neumann, R. . . . . 215
- Francis, Wayne L. Influence and Interaction in a State Legislative Body. . . . . 953
- Free Minds: A Venture in the Philosophy of Democracy*. Nelson, Ralph W. Book noted by Zucker, F. D. . . . . 447
- Free Speech: At What Price?* Charles S. Hyneman. . . . . 847
- FREEDOM. See B2.
Freedom and Protection: The Bill of Rights. Weinberger, Andrew D. Book noted by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
- FRENCH COMMUNITY. See each Continent under B4.
- Fried, J. H. E. Book noted on Prospectives on Peace, 1910-1960. Published under the Auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. . . . . 763
- Friedberg, Maurice. Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets. Book noted by Swayze, H. 989
- Friedberg, M. Notes on Political Control of -

- Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959.* Swayze, Harold. . . . . 988
- Friedman, J. R. Notes on Tradition, Values, and Socio-Economic Development. Braibanti, Ralph and Spengler, Joseph J. (ed.) . . . . . 157
- Friedland, Louis L. Notes on Morale in the Civil Service: A Study of the Desk Worker. Walker, Nigel. . . . . 1006
- Frost, Raymond. The Backward Society. Book noted by Rothchild, D. S. . . . . 504
- Frost, Richard T. (ed.). Cases in State and Local Government. Book noted by Altschuler, A. . . . . 178
- Fuchs, Lawrence H. Hawaii Pono: A Social History. Book noted by Horwitz, R. . . . . 727
- GALLICAN CONTROVERSY. See Deviation Control.
- Galloway, George B. History of the House of Representatives. Book noted by Moreland, L. B. . . . . 720
- Game Theory and Cumulative Voting in Illinois: 1902-1954*. Sawyer, Jack; McRae, Duncan Jr. . . . . 936
- GAMES THEORY. See AA3.
- Gange, J. Reviews Disarmament: The Challenge of the Nineteen Sixties; also see The Control of the Arms Race; also see Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control. . . . . 425
- Ganji, Manouchehr. International Protection of Human Rights. Book noted by J. A. Laponce. . . . . 1035
- Garrett, Charles. The LaGuardia Years: Machine and Reform Politics in New York City. Book noted by Rice, R. R. . . . . 726
- Genesis and Structure of Society*. Gentile, Giovanni. Book review by LaPalombara, J. . . . . 698
- GENOCIDE. See D48.
- **Genocide in Satellite Croatia, 1941-1945*. Paris, Edmond. Book noted by Adams, John Clinton. . . . . 1021
- Gentile, Giovanni. Genesis and Structure of Society. Book review by LaPalombara, J. . . . . 698
- GERMANY. See B415.
- The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election*. Barnes, Samuel H.; Grace, Frank; Pollock, James K.; and Sperlich, Peter W. . . . . 899
- Gerteiny, A. G. Notes on Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt 1804-1952. Safran, Nadav. . . . . 748
- Geschichte der Internationale*. Braunthal, Julius. Book noted by Sturmthal, A. . . . . 766
- GHANA. See B432.
- Gibb, Sir Hamilton A. R. Studies on the Civilization of Islam. Book noted. . . . . 992
- Gibbs, H. S. Notes on Ambassadors Ordinary and Extraordinary. Spaulding, E. Wilder. . . . . 762
- Gilmour, C. E. Notes on The Man in the Middle—The Inside Story of the Hot and Cold Wars Between Labor and Management. Shefferman, Nathan W., with Kramer Dale. . . . . 467
- Glass, Ruth. London's Newcomers: The West Indian Migrants. Book noted by Dealey, J. Q. . . . . 195
- Gleber, Lionel. America in Britain's Place: The Leadership of the West and Anglo-American Unity. Book noted by Joynt, C. B. . . . . 496
- Golembiewski, Robert T. Civil Service and Managing Work: Some Unintended Consequences. . . . . 961
- Goodwin, George Jr. Subcommittees: The Miniature Legislatures of Congress. . . . . 596
- Gottfried, Alex. Boss Cermak of Chicago: A Study of Political Leadership. Book noted by McGoldrick, J. D. . . . . 1001
- Gottmann, Jean. Megalopolis: The Urbanized Northeastern Seaboard of the United States. Book review by Connery, R. H. . . . . 696
- Gould, W. L. and Erades, L. The Relation Between International Law and Municipal Law in the Netherlands and in the United States. Book notes by Booth, D. A. . . . . 218
- The Government of Kansas*. Drury, James W. and associates. Book noted by Dishman, R. B. . . . . 465
- Government of Missouri, The*, 7th. Edition, Karsch, Robert F., Book noted by Schmandt, Henry J. . . . . 1008
- Government and Politics of Uruguay*. Taylor, Philip B., Jr. Book noted by Padgett, L. V. . . . . 747
- Governmental Structure and Political Environment: A Statistical Note about American Cities*. Kessel, John H. . . . . 615
- Grace, Frank (with Barnes, Samuel H.; Pollock, James K.; and Sperlich, Peter W.) The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. . . . . 899
- Graduate Education in the United States*. Berelson, Bernard. Book reviewed by Caldwell, L. K. . . . . 153
- Graebner, Norman A. (ed.). An Uncertain Tradition: American Secretaries of State in the Twentieth Century. Book noted by Cohen, B. D. . . . . 176
- The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War*. Bolloten, Burnett. Book noted by Nagle, T. W. . . . . 503
- Grants, Loans, and Local Currencies: Their*

- Role in Foreign Aid.* Asher, Robert E. Book notes by Buehrig, E. H. . . . . 213
- GREAT BRITAIN. See B411.
- Green Belts and Urban Growth: English Town and Country Planning in Action.* Mandelker, D. R. Book noted by Stephens, G. R. . . . . 751
- Green, T. H. POSITIVE LIBERTY, 1880-1914. David Nicholls. . . . . 114
- Greene, L. S. Reviews Exploring the Metropolitan Community. Bollens, John C. (ed.) 152
- Grosser, Alfred. La IVème République et sa Politique Extérieure. Book noted by Kirchheimer, O. H. . . . . 1017
- GROUPS. See F.
- Groups in Theory and Practice.* Peter Loveday and Ian Campbell. Book noted by C. B. Hagan. . . . . 990
- Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom,* by Peacock & Wiseman assisted by Veverka, noted by Philip W. Buck. . . . . 194
- Grundstein, Nathan D. Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime. Book noted by Rackow, F. . . . . 462
- Guetzkow, H. Reviews Formal Organizations: A Comparative Approach. Blau, P. and Scott, R. . . . . 428
- Gulick, Luther Halsey. Metropolitan Problem and American Ideas. Book noted by McCamy, J. L. . . . . 1000
- Gwyn, William B. Democracy and the Cost of Politics in Britain. Book noted by Shannon, Jasper B. . . . . 1018
- Gyorgy, A. Reviews Russia and the West Under Lenin and Stalin. Kennan, George F. . . . . 148
- Gyorgy, A. Notes on Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism versus Communism. Váli, Ferenc C. . . . . 489
- Hagan, C. B. Note on Groups in Theory and Practice by Loveday & Campbell. . . . . 990
- Haggling for the Equilibrium: The Renegotiation of the Austrian Coalition, 1959.* Engelmann, Frederick C. . . . . 651
- Halperin, Samuel. The Political World of American Zionism. Book noted by Rubin, B. . . . . 722
- HAMILTON, ALEXANDER. See B263.
- Hammer, D. P. Notes Alexander Herzen and the Birth of Russian Socialism, 1812-1855 Malia, M. . . . . 443
- Hanna, W. Reviews Africa: The Politics of Independence. . . . . 429
- Hanna, W. Book notes on Congo Disaster. Legum, C. . . . . 198
- The Hansard Society. Parliamentary Reform 1933-1960. Book noted by Marquis, L. C. 479
- Hanson, A. H. Parliament and Public Ownership. Book noted by Dugan, A. B. . . . . 752
- Harbold, William H. (with Hitchner, Dell C.). Modern Government. Book noted by Steinbicker, P. B. . . . . 704
- Harris, J. S. Notes on The Administration of British Foreign Relations. Bishop, Donald G. . . . . 755
- Harris, Seymour L. The Economics of the Political Parties. Book noted by Wise, S. 1002
- Hart, Wilson R. Collective Bargaining in the Federal Civil Service: A Study of Labor-Management Relations in United States Government. Book noted by McNeill, R. J. . . . . 180
- Harvey, Donald G. Note on Donald R. Whitnah's A History of the U. S. Weather Bureau. . . . . 182
- Hauser, Philip M. Urbanization in Latin America. Book noted by K. H. Silvert. . 1033
- Haviland, H. Field, Jr. (ed.) (and Wilcox, Francis O.). The United States and the United Nations. Book noted by Stoessinger, J. G. . . . . 500
- Hazard, John N. Note on Harry Schwartz's The Red Phoenix: Russia Since World War II. . . . . 191
- HAWAII. See B65.
- Hawaii Pono: A Social History.* Fuchs, Lawrence H. Book noted by Horwitz, R. 727
- Heater, D. B. Political Ideas in the Modern World. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A. . . . 706
- Hegel, George W. F. Positive Liberty, 1880-1914. David Nicholls. . . . . 114
- Heidenheimer, Arnold J. Book note on The States in West German Federalism: A Study in Federal-State Relations by Wells, Roger Hewes. . . . . 1018
- Henry, Laurin L. Presidential Transitions. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . . 173
- Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.* Crombie, Sir James. Book noted. . . . . 1024
- Herr, Richard. Tocqueville and the Old Regime. Book noted by Lively, J. . . . . 988
- The Herzl Paradox: Political, Social and Economic Theories of a Realist.* Adler, Joseph. Book noted by Lucatz, N. . . . . 701
- Hindley, Donald. President Sukarno and the Communists: The Politics of Domestication 915
- HISTORICISM. See Revival of Classical Philosophy and Reply to Rothman.
- History of the House of Representatives.* Galoway, George B. Book noted by Moreland, L. B. . . . . 720
- History of the Islamic Peoples.* Brockelmann, Carl. Book noted by Fitzgerald, J. A. . . . 200
- History of the United States Weather Bureau,* by Donald R. Whitnah, noted by Lashley G. Harvey. . . . . 182

- Hitchner, Dell G. (with Harbold, William H.). Modern Government. Book noted by Steinbicker, P. B. . . . . 704
- Hobhouse, Thomas. POSITIVE LIBERTY, 1880-1914. David Nicholls. . . . . 114
- Hochwald, Werner (ed.). Design of Regional Accounts: Papers presented at the Conference on Regional Accounts, 1960. Book noted by Wengert, N. . . . . 730
- Hodgetts, J. E. Book notes on The St. Lawrence Waterway. Willoughby, Wm. R. . . . 215
- Hodgkin, Thomas. African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide. Book review by Untermyer, F. . . . . 980
- Hoffman, George W. (with Neal, Fred Warner). Yugoslavia and The New Communism. Book noted by Dragnich, A. N. 1034
- Holley, H. A., with Benham, F. A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America. Book noted by Lewis, F. M. . . . . 196
- Holman, A. E. United States Fiscal Policy 1945-1959. Book noted by Poland, Orville F. . . . . 463
- Horowitz, Irving Louis. Radicalism and the Revolt against Reason: The Social Theories of Georges Sorel: with a translation of his essay on The Decomposition of Marxism. Book noted by Witte, W. D. S. . . . . 439
- Horwitz, R. Notes on Hawaii Pono: A Social History. Fuchs, Lawrence H. . . . . 727
- Hourani, Albert (ed.). Middle Eastern Affairs: Number Two (St. Antony's Papers No. 11). Book noted by Salem, E. 761
- HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE. See G22.
- House Appropriations Committee as a Political System: The Problem of Integration. Fenno, Richard F., Jr. . . . . 310
- HOUSE ARMED SERVICE COMMITTEE. See G3.
- HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. See G22.
- How Can We Justify Democracy? Mayo, H. B. . . . . 555
- Hsieh, Alice Langley. Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era. Book review by Steiner, H. A. . . . . 688
- Hufschmidt, Maynard M. (with Maass, Arthur, Dorfman, Robert, Thomas, Harold A. Jr., Marglin, Stephen A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others). Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Book noted by Munger, F. . . . 1003
- HUMAN RIGHTS. See D227.
- Huizinga, J. H. Mr. Europe, A Political Biography of Henri Spaak. Book notes by Mayer, A. J. . . . . 216
- Humes, Samuel (with Martin, Eileen M.). The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World. Book reviewed by Burke, F. G. . . . . 434
- HUNGARY. See B4142; see also D213 and D3.
- Huntington, Samuel P. (ed.). Changing Patterns of Military Politics. Book review by Edinger, L. J. . . . . 692
- Huntington, Samuel P. The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in National Politics. Book review by Radway, Lawrence I. . . . . 982
- Hyneman, Charles S. Free Speech: At What Price? . . . . . 847
- I Speak of Freedom. Nkrumah, Kwame. Book noted by Bates, M. L. . . . . 485
- ILLINOIS. See B65; also see AA3.
- Ilchman, Warren Frederick. Professional Diplomacy in the United States: 1779-1939. Book noted by Crabb, C. V., Jr. . . . 177
- Influence and Interaction in a State Legislative Body*. Francis, Wayne . . . . . 953
- Institut für Marxismus Leninismus beim ZK der SED. Wir sind die stärkste der Partei'N! Eine Bibliographie zum 15. Jahrestag der Gründung der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Deutschlands. Book noted. 1025
- IMAGE, NATIONAL. See B124.
- IMMIGRATION. See D8.
- The Imperialism Reader*. Snyder, Louis L. (ed.). Book noted. . . . . 1036
- INDIA. See B421.
- INDIANA. See B65; also see G1.
- INDO-CHINA. See under each State.
- INDONESIA. See B4251.
- INTEGRATION. See Supreme Court Behavior in Racial Exclusion Cases: 1935-1960; see also C41.
- International Immunities*. Jenks, Wilfred. Book noted by Remec, P. P. . . . . 502
- International Protection of Human Rights*. Ganji, Manouchehr. Book noted by Laponce, J. A. . . . . 1035
- ISRAEL. See B424.
- International Politics and Foreign Policy: A Reader in Research and Theory* (ed.) Rosenau, James N. Book reviewed by Platig, E. R. . . . . 431
- INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. See D.
- The International Status of the United Nations*. Weissberg, Guenter. Book noted by Claude, I. L. . . . . 209
- Italian Socialist Party, The: A Case Study in Factional Conflict*. Raphael Zariski. . . . 372
- ITALY. See B410.
- ITALY, POLITICAL PARTIES. See F51.
- Jacobs, Clyde E. Justice Frankfurter and

- Civil Liberties*. Book noted by Kallenbach, J. E. . . . . 172
- JAPAN. See B423.
- JAPAN, POLITICAL PARTIES. See F51.
- The Japanese People and Foreign Policy: A Study of Public Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan*. Mendel, Douglas H., Jr. Book noted by McNelly, Theodore. . . . . 743
- Jenks, Wilfred. International Immunities. Book noted by Remece, P. P. . . . . 502
- Jennings, Sir Ivor. Party Politics (Volume III): The Stuff of Politics. Book noted by Rose, R. . . . . 753
- Johnson, Donald Bruce, compiler (with Porter, Kirk). National Party Platforms: 1840-1960. Book noted by Chambers, W. N. . . . . 729
- Johnson, John J. (ed.). The Role of the Military in Underdeveloped Countries. Book noted by Singer, J. David. . . . . 1019
- Jones, Victor (with Schattschneider, E. E.). Local Political Surveys. Book noted by Wright, D. S. . . . . 991
- Joynt, C. B. Notes on America in Britain's Place: The Leadership of the West and Anglo-American Unity. Gleber, Lionel. . . 496
- JUDICIARY. See H.
- JURISPRUDENCE. See G91.
- JURY SELECTION. See H573.
- Justice and Social Policy*, ed. Olafson, Frederick A. Book noted by Paul, J. . . . . 438
- Justice Frankfurter and Civil Liberties*. Jacobs, Clyde E. Book noted by Kallenbach, J. E. . . . . 172
- Kagan, S. Book notes on Population Control—The Imminent World Crisis. Schimm, Melvin G. (ed.). . . . . 217
- Kallenbach, J. E. Notes on Justice Frankfurter and Civil Liberties. Jacobs, Clyde E. . . . . 172
- Kammerer, Gladys M., with Farris, DeGrove, & Clubok. City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination. Book noted by Prewitt, Kenneth. . . . . 1007
- KANSAS GOVERNMENT. See B65.
- Kant, Liberalism, and War*. Waltz, Kenneth N. . . . . 331
- Karnes, Thomas L. The Failure of Union: Central America, 1824-1960. Book noted by Moses, C. C. . . . . 480
- Karsch, Robert F. The Government of Missouri, 7th Edition. Book noted by Schmandt, Henry J. . . . . 1008
- KATANGA. See B436.
- Kauper, Paul G. Civil Liberties and the Constitution. Book review by Steamer, R. J. . 694
- KAUTSKY, J. H. Notes on The Russian Revolution and Leninism or Marxism? Luxemburg, Rosa. . . . . 162
- Notes on Terrorism and Communism. Trotsky, Leon. . . . . 162
- Notes on The Russian Revolution. Berdy-aeu, Nicholas. . . . . 162
- Kawai, K. Notes on Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan. Scalapino, Robert A. and Masumi, Junnosuke. . . . . 724
- Kelley, Stanley Jr. Notes on Six Crises. Nixon, Richard M. . . . . 725
- Kennan, George F. Russia and The West Under Lenin and Stalin. Book reviewed by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 148
- Kennedy, J. J. Notes on The Making of the Good Neighbor Policy. Wood, Bryce. . . . 759
- Kennedy, J. J. Notes on The United States and Inter-American Security, 1889-1960. Mecham, J. Lloyd. . . . . 1032
- KENYA. See B4311.
- The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960-1961*. Bennett, George and Rosberg, Carl. Book noted by McConnell, G. . . . . 484
- Kenyon, Cecilia. Bibliography on Political Theory. . . . . 448
- Kessel, John H. Governmental Structure and Political Environment: A Statistical Note about American Cities. . . . . 615
- Khadduri, M. Book notes on Political Change in Morocco. Ashford, Douglas E. . 198
- Kimball, C. Book notes on Financing International Organization: The United Nations Budget Process. Singer, J. David. . . . . 209
- Kintner, W. R., with Strausz-Hupe, R. and Possony, S. T. A Forward Strategy for America. Book notes by Ludden, H. R. . . . 210
- Kirchheimer, Otto. Political Justice: The Use of Legal Procedure for Political Ends. Book noted by Duncan, J. P. . . . . 438
- Kirchheimer, O. Notes Politics of Cultural Despair. Stern, Fritz. . . . . 444
- Kirchheimer, O. H. Book note on La IVème République et sa Politique Extérieure, by Grosser, Alfred. . . . . 1017
- Kirk, George. Contemporary Arab Politics: A Concise History. Book noted by Lenczowski, G. . . . . 199
- Kirkwood, Kenneth (ed.). African Affairs: Number One. St. Anthony's Papers: Number 10. Book noted by Davies, J. C. . . . . 486
- Konvitz, Milton R. A Century of Civil Rights. With a study of State Law Against Discrimination. Leskes, Theodore. Book noted by Wiltsey, G. G. . . . . 718
- Kurland, Philip B. (ed.). The Supreme Court Review. Book reviewed by Chase, H. W. . . 427
- Kramer, Dale (with Shefferman, Nathan W.). The Man in the Middle—The Ins de Story of the Hot and Cold Wars Between

- Labor and Management*. Book noted by Gilmour, C. E. . . . . 467
- Krislov, Samuel. Reviews A Theory of Public Opinion. Wilson, Francis Graham. . . . 985
- Labour party, England*. See POLITICAL IDEAS OF ENGLISH PARTY ACTIVISTS; see also B411 and F51.
- LA GUARDIA, FIORELLLO. See B73.
- The LaGuardia Years: Machine and Reform Politics in New York City*. Garrett, Charles. Book noted by Rice, R. R. . . . 726
- Lamarchand, René. The Limits of Self-Determination: The Case of the Katanga Secession. . . . . 404
- LANCASTER, LANE W. See P7093.
- LaNoüe, G. R. Notes on Religion, Government, and Education. Lehrer, Stanley and Brickman, William, W. (ed.). . . . . 468
- Lanyi, G. A. Notes on Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings. Macridis, Roy C. and Brown, Bernard E. . . . . 749
- LAOS. See B426; see also D3.
- LaPalombara, J. Reviews Genesis and Structure of Society. Gentile, Giovanni. . . . . 698
- Laponce, J. A. Notes on International Protection of Human Rights. Ganji, M. . . . . 1035
- Larrabee, Eric (ed.) (with Spiller, Robert E.), American Perspectives. Book noted by Backstrom, Charles H. . . . . 179
- Larson, Arthur. When Nations Disagree: A Handbook on Peace through Law. Book noted by Yalem, R. J. . . . . 498
- Latham, E. Reviews Pricing Power and the Public Interest, A Study Based on Steel. Means, G. C. . . . . 690
- LATIN AMERICA. See B44.
- Latin America between the Eagle and the Bear*. de Madariaga, Salvadore. Book noted by Barber, H. W. . . . . 1032
- Latin American Social Thought*. Davis, Harold Eugene. Book noted by Barber, W. F. 705
- LAW. See G9.
- LAW OF THE SEA. See D225.
- LEADERSHIP, PARTY. See Political Ideas of English Party Activists; also see F51.
- Legal Problems of the European Economic Community and the European Free Trade Association*. . . . . 499
- LEGAL THEORY & INSTITUTIONS. See G9 and H.
- Legge, J. D. Central Authority and Regional Autonomy in Indonesia: A Study in Local Administration, 1950-1960. Book noted by Mill, E. W. . . . . 745
- LEGISLATURES. See G.
- Legum, Colin. Congo Disaster. Book noted by Hanna W. . . . . 198
- Lehrer, Stanley (ed.) (with Brickman, William W.). Religion, Government, and Education. Book noted by LaNoüe, G. R. . . . 468
- Leiserson, Avery. Notes on The Development of the Social Security Act. Witte, Edwin E. 723
- Leiserson, Avery. Notes on Parliaments and Electoral Systems: A World Handbook. . . . 491
- Leiserson, Avery. Notes on Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics. Rowe, Leonard. . . . . 179
- Leiserson, Avery. Toward a Definition of Book Review Policy. . . . . 139
- Lenczowski, G. Book notes on Contemporary Arab Politics: A Concise History. Kirk, George E. . . . . 199
- Lenski, Gerhard. The Religious Factor. Book noted by Davis, H. R. . . . . 159
- Lev, D. S. Notes on Southeast Asia Today—and Tomorrow. A Political Analysis. Butwell, Richard. . . . . 1031
- Le Vine, V. T. Notes on The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa. Thompson, Virginia and Adloff, Earl. . . . . 486
- Lewis, F. M. Book notes on A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America. Benham, F. with Holley, H. A. . . . . 196
- LIBERAL PARTY, ENGLAND. See The Political Ideas of English Party Activists; see also B411 and F51.
- Liberalism*. See B23.
- Lieuwen, Edwin. Venezuela. Book noted by Baker, R. D. . . . . 746
- Limits of Self-Determination, The: The Case of the Katanga Secession*. René Lamarchand. . . . . 404
- Lindblom, C. E. Notes on The Measurement of Social Welfare. Rothenberg, Jerome. . . 702
- Lipset, Seymour Martin. Sociology: The Progress of a Decade. Book noted by Cottrell, F. . . . . 446
- LITERATURE, SOVIET. See B55.
- Lively, J. Notes on Tocqueville and the Old Regime. Herr, Richard. . . . . 988
- Local Political Surveys*. Schattschneider, E. E. and Jones, Victor. Book noted by Wright, D. S. . . . . 991
- Lockwood, W. W. Reviews Politics, Personality, and Nation Building: Burma's Search for Identity. Pye, Lucian. . . . . 978
- London's Newcomers: The West Indian Migrants*. Glass, Ruth. Book noted by Dealey, J. Q. . . . . 195
- Longaker, R. P. Notes on Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. Schwartz, Murray L. and Paul, James C. N. . . . . 173
- Presidential Transitions*. Henry, Laurin L. . . . . 173

- LOS ANGELES. See B71.
- Loveday, Peter, with Campbell, Ian. Groups in Theory and Practice. Noted by Hagan, C. B. . . . . 990
- Lucatz, N. Notes on The Changing Patterns of the Middle East. Rondot, Pierre. . . . . 488
- Lucatz, N. Notes on The Herzl Paradox: Political Social and Economic Theories of a Realist. Adler, Joseph. . . . . 701
- Ludden, H. R. Book notes on A Forward Strategy for America. Strausz-Hupe, R.; Kintner, W. R.; and Possony, S. T. . . . . 210
- LUKAS, JOHN. See D3.
- LUTHER, MARTIN. See Deviation Control.
- Luxemburg, Rosa. The Russia Revolution and Leninism or Marxism? Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- Lyons, Gene M. Military Policy and Economic Aid: The Korean Case, 1950-1953. Book notes by Paige, G. D. . . . . 212
- Maass, Arthur (with Hufschmidt, Maynard M., Dorfman, Robert, Thomas, Harold A. Jr., Marglin, Stephen A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others). Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Book noted by Munger, Frank. . . . . 1003
- MacKenzie, Kenneth M. The Robe and the Sword: The Methodist Church and the Rise of American Imperialism. Book noted by Morrow, R. E. . . . . 470
- Mackintosh, John P. The British Cabinet. Book review by Young, R. . . . . 986
- Ibid.* Book note on The British Parliament by Young, Roland. . . . . 1022
- Macridis, Roy C. (with Brown, Bernard E.). Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings. Book noted by Lanyi, G. A. . . . . 749
- Madariaga, Salvadore de. Latin America Between the Eagle and the Bear. Book noted by H. W. Barber. . . . . 1032
- MAHOMMEDANS. See B425, and B437.
- Main, Jackson Turner. The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781-1788. Book noted by Bowman, E. . . . . 729
- The Making of the Good Neighbor Policy*. Wood, Bryce. Book noted by Kennedy, J. J. . . . . 759
- Malia, Martin. Alexander Herzen and the Birth of Russian Socialism, 1812-1855. Book noted by Hammer, D. P. . . . . 443
- Mallan, J. P. Notes on Conscience in Politics: Adlai E. Stevenson in the 1950's. Brown, Stuart Gerry. . . . . 469
- The Man in the Middle—The Inside Story of the Hot and Cold Wars Between Labor and Management*. Shefferman, Nathan W. with Kramer, Dale. Book noted by Gilmour, C. E. . . . . 467
- Mandelker, D. R. Green Belts and Urban Growth: English Town and Country Planning in Action. Book noted by Stephens, G. R. . . . . 751
- Mander, L. A. Notes on The United States and the Treaty Law of the Sea. Reiff, Henry. . . . . 505
- Manger, William. Pan America in Crisis. Book noted by Fitzgibbon, R. H. . . . . 760
- The Manipulation of Human Behavior*, (eds.). Biederman, Albert D. and Zimmer, Herbert. Book reviewed by Rogow, A. . . . 424
- Manning, C. A. W. The Nature of International Society. Book review by McClelland, Charles A. . . . . 983
- Mansergh, Nicholas. South Africa, 1906-1961: The Price of Magnanimity. Book noted by de Blij, Harm Jan. . . . . 1023
- Mansfield, Harvey C., Managing Editor. Toward a Definition of Editorial Policy for the REVIEW . . . . . 129
- Manwaring, David R. Render Unto Caesar. The Flag-Salute Controversy. Book noted by Rigby, G. . . . . 1004
- Mao, J. Y. Book notes on Sun Yat-sen and Communism. Shao Chuan Leng and Palmer, Norman D. . . . . 197
- MARGALITH, AARON M. See P7093.
- Marglin, Stephen A. (with Maass, Arthur, Hufschmidt, Maynard M., Dorfman, Robert, Thomas, Harold A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others). Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Book noted by Munger, F. . . . . 1003
- Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain, The: The "Sandys Era."* Martin, Laurence W. . . . . 23
- Marquis, L. C. Notes on Parliamentary Reform 1933-1960. The Hansard Society. . . . 479
- Martin, Eileen M. (with Humes, Samuel). The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World. Book reviewed by Burke, F. G. . . . . 434
- Martin, Laurence W. The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain: The "Sandys Era." . . . . . 23
- Martin, Roscoe C. (with Munger, Frank J. and others). Decisions in Syracuse. Book noted by Monat, W. R. . . . . 466
- Marvick, Dwaine (ed.). Political Decision-makers: Recruitment and Performance. Book noted by Verba, S. . . . . 440
- MARX, KARL. See Communism.
- Mastery of the Metropolis*. Fiser, Webb S. Book review by Coke, J. G. . . . . 970

- Masumi, Junnosuke (and Scalapino, Robert A.). Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan. Book noted by Kawai, K. . . . . 742
- Matthews, Herbert L. The Cuban Story. Book reviewed by Busey, J. L. . . . . 146
- Mayer, A. J. Book notes on Mr. Europe, A Political Biography of Henri Spaak. Huizinga, J. H. . . . . 216
- Mayo, H. B. How Can We Justify Democracy? . . . . . 555
- MAYOR-COUNCIL PLAN. See B731.
- McCallum, D. Notes on Philosophy and Myth in Karl Marx. Tucker, R. C. . . . . 442
- McCamy, J. L. Notes on Metropolitan Problem and American Ideas. Gulick, Luther Halsey. . . . . 1000
- McClelland, C. A. Reviews The Nature of International Society. Manning, C. A. W. . . . . 983
- McCloskey, Robert G. Deeds Without Doctrine: Civil Rights in the 1960 Term of the Supreme Court. . . . . 71
- McConnell, G. Notes on The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960-1961. Rosberg, Carl and Bennett, George. . . . . 484
- McDougal, Myres S. (with Associates). Studies in World Public Order. Book noted by Piper, D. C. . . . . 764
- McGiffert, M. Notes on Conservatism in America: The Thankless Persuasion. Rossiter, Clinton. . . . . 724
- McGoldrick, J. D. Notes on Boss Cermak of Chicago: A Study of Political Leadership. Gottfried, Alex. . . . . 1001
- McGovern, William M. Strategic Intelligence and the Shape of Tomorrow. Book notes by Shull, Gordon. . . . . 211
- McKee, D. K. Notes on The Predicament of Democratic Man. Cahn, Edmond. . . . . 156
- McLellan, D. S. Notes on The Strategy of Truth: The Story of the U. S. Information Service. Dizard, Wilson P. . . . . 181
- McNeill, R. J. Notes on Collective Bargaining in the Federal Civil Service: A Study of Labor Management Relations in United States Government. Hart, Wilson R. . . . . 180
- McNelly, T. Notes on The Japanese People and Foreign Policy: A Study of Public Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan. Mendel, Douglas H. Jr. . . . . 743
- McRae, Duncan Jr. (with Sawyer, Jack). Game Theory and Cumulative Voting in Illinois, 1902-1954. . . . . 936
- McWhinney, E. Notes on Our Fundamental Rights: Their Nature and Extent (as Judicially Determined). Banerjee, D. N. . . . . 490
- McWilliams, Wilson Carey. New Orthodoxy for Old Liberalism. . . . . 874
- Means, Gardiner C. Pricing Power and the Public Interest, A Study Based on Steel. Book review by Latham, E. . . . . 690
- The Measurement of Social Welfare*. Rothenberg, Jerome. Book noted by Lindblom, C. E. . . . . 702
- Mecham, J. Lloyd. The United States and Inter-American Security, 1889-1960. Book noted by Kennedy, J. J. . . . . 1032
- Megalopolis: The Urbanized Northeastern Seaboard of the United States*. Gottmann, Jean. Book review by Connery, R. H. . . . . 696
- Melville, Sir Harry. The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research. Book noted. . . . . 1024
- Mendel, Douglas H. Jr. The Japanese People and Foreign Policy: A Study of Public Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan. Book noted by McNelly, Theodore. . . . . 743
- Merkel, Peter H. Equilibrium, Structure of Interests and Leadership: Adenauer's Survival as Chancellor. . . . . 634
- METHODIST CHURCH. See B12439.
- METHODOLOGY. See AA.
- METROPOLITAN AFFAIRS. See B131, B15 and B73.
- Metropolitan Problem and American Ideas*. Gulick, Luther Halsey. Book noted by McCamy, J. L. . . . . 1000
- Meyer, Karl E. The New America: Politics and Society in the Age of the Smooth Deal. Book noted by Chambers, W. N. . . . . 180
- MIDDLE AGES. See Principles of Government and Politics.
- Middle Eastern Affairs: Number Two (St. Antony's Papers No. 11)* Hourani, Albert. (ed.). Book noted by Salem, E. . . . . 761
- MILITARY AFFAIRS. See D3 and N1.
- Military Policy and Economic Aid: The Korean Case, 1950-1953*. Lyons, Gene M. Book notes by Paige, G. D. . . . . 212
- Mill, E. W. Notes on Central Authority and Regional Autonomy in Indonesia: A Study in Local Administration, 1950-1960. Legge, J. D. . . . . 745
- Millett, J. H. Notes on Questions in Parliament. Chester, D. N. and Bowring, Nona . . . . . 753
- Mr. Europe, A Political Biography of Henri Spaak*. Huizinga, J. H. Book notes by Mayer, A. J. . . . . 216
- MODELS. See AA3.
- Modelski, George. A Theory of Foreign Policy. Book noted by Almond, G. A. . . . . 700
- Modern Government*. Hitchner, Dell G. and Harbold, William H. Book noted by Steinbicker, P. G. . . . . 704
- Modern Swedish Government*. Andrén, Nils. Book noted by Anderson, S. V. . . . . 203
- Ibid*. Noted. . . . . 1025
- Monat, W. R. Notes on Decisions in Syracuse. Munger, Frank J. with Martin,

- Roscoe C. and others. . . . . 466
- Montesquieu: A Critical Biography*. Shackleton, Robert. Book noted by Pennock, J. R. . . . . 445
- Morale in the Civil Service: A Study of the Desk Worker*. Walker, Nigel. Book noted by Louis L. Friedland. . . . . 1006
- Moreire, Adriano. Portugal's Stand in Africa. Book noted by Okuma, Thomas. 1023
- Moreland, L. B. Notes on History of the House of Representatives. Galloway, George B. . . . . 720
- Morgenthau, Hans. A Political Theory of Foreign Aid. . . . . 287
- Morris, Bruce R. Problems of American Economic Growth. Book noted by Reagan, M. D. . . . . 174
- Morrison of Lambeth, Lord. British Parliamentary Democracy. Book review by Young, R. . . . . 986
- Morocco. See B4371.
- Morrow, R. E. Notes on The Robe and the Sword: The Methodist Church and the Rise of American Imperialism. MacKenzie, Kenneth M. . . . . 470
- Moses, C. C. Notes on The Failure of Union: Central America, 1824-1960. Karnes, Thomas L. . . . . 480
- Munger, Frank J. (with Martin, Roscoe C. and others). Decisions in Syracuse. Book noted by Monat, W. R. . . . . 466
- Munger, F. Notes on Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating, Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Maass, Arthur, Hufschmidt, Maynard M., Dorfman, Robert, Thomas, Harold A. Jr., Marglin, Stephen A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others. . . . . 1003
- Murphy, Walter F. (ed.) (with Pritchett, C. Herman). Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process. Book noted by Vose, C. E. . . . . 717
- National Character in Action*. Platt, Washington. Book noted by Rosecrance, R. N. 508
- National Party Platforms: 1840-1960*. Porter, Kirk and Johnson, Donald Bruce, compilers. Book noted by Chambers, W. N. . . . . 729
- NATIONALISM. See B262.
- The Nationalist Movement: Indian Political Thought from Ranade to Bhave*. Brown, D. Mackenzie. Book noted by Tinker, I. 990
- The Nature of International Society*. Manning, C. A. W. Book review by McClelland, Charles A. . . . . 983
- NAZISM. See B58.
- Neal, Fred Warner (with Hoffman, George W.). Yugoslavia and The New Communism. Book noted by Dragnich, A. N. . . 1034
- Nelson, Ralph W. Free Minds: A Venture in the Philosophy of Democracy. Book noted by Zucker, F. D. . . . . 448
- NENNI, PIETRO. See The Italian Socialist Party.
- Neo-Freudian Social Philosophy*. Birnbach, Martin. Book noted by Pinner, F. A. . . . 703
- Neumann, R. Book notes on France, Europe and the Two World Wars. Albrecht-Carrié, René. . . . . 215
- The New America: Politics and Society in the Age of the Smooth Deal*. Meyer, Karl E. Book noted by Chambers, W. N. . . . . 180
- NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT. See Two Faces of Power; See also B73.
- NEW YORK POLITICS. See B73.
- Newman, Robert P. Recognition of Communist China? Book reviewed by Stauffer, R. B. . . . . 145
- Nicholls, David. Positive Liberty, 1880-1914. . . . . 114
- Nieburg, H. L. The Threat of Violence and Social Change. . . . . 865
- Niemi, Donald, & Riker, William H. The Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives. . . . . 58
- Niebuhr, Reinhold: New Orthodoxy for Old Liberalism*. Wilson Carey McWilliams. . 874
- 1960 Term of the Supreme Court, The: A Psychological Analysis*. Glendon Schubert. . . . . 90
- Nixon, Richard M. Six Crises. Book noted by Kelley, Stanley Jr. . . . . 725
- Nkruma, Kwame. I Speak of Freedom. Book noted by Bates, M. L. . . . . 485
- Nogee, Joseph L. Soviet Policy towards International Control of Atomic Energy. Book noted by Reshetar, Jr. J. S. . . . . 506
- NOMINATION. See F7.
- NORTH AFRICA. See B437.
- NORWAY. See B413.
- NUCLEAR WEAPONS CONTROL. See D711.
- Oakes, John B. The Edge of Freedom. Book noted by Wallerstein, I. . . . . 487
- O'Donnell, M. E. Notes on Urban Social Structure. Beshers, James M. . . . . 1000
- OIL INDUSTRY. See U2.
- Øisang, Per. Stortinget på naert hold. Book noted by Anderson, S. V. . . . . 203
- Okuma, Thomas. Notes Portugal's Stand in Africa. Moreire, A. . . . . 1023
- Olafson, Frederick A. (ed.). Justice and Social Policy. Book noted by Paul, J. . . 438
- ONE-PARTY STATES. See Quasi-Partisan Conflict . . .; see also B65.

- Oppenheim, Felix E. Communication on Values and Interests. . . . . 975
- ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES. See D612.
- Our Fundamental Rights: Their Nature and Extent (As Judicially Determined)*. Banerjee, D. N. Book noted by McWhinney, E. 490
- OXFORD MOVEMENT. See B23.
- Padgett, L. V. Notes on Government and Politics of Uruguay. Taylor, Philip B., Jr. . . . 747
- Paige, G. D. Book notes on Military Policy and Economic Aid: The Korean Case, 1950-1953. Lyons, Gene M. . . . . 212
- Palmer, Norman D. and Shao, Chuan Leng. Sun Yat-sen and Communism. Book noted by Mao, J. Y. . . . . 197
- Pan America in Crisis*. Manger, William. Book noted by Fitzgibbon, R. H. . . . . 760
- PAN-EUROPEANISM. See D74.
- The Papers of Alexander Hamilton*. Vol. I., 1768-1778. Vol. II., 1779-1781, ed. Syrett, Harold C., associate ed. Cooke, Jacob E. Book reviewed by Barrett, P. . . . 432
- Paris, Edmond. Genocide in Satellite Croatia, 1941-1945. Book noted by Adams, John Clinton. . . . . 1021
- Parliament and Public Ownership*. Hanson, A. H. Book noted by Dugan, A. B. . . . . 752
- PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT. See G.
- Parliamentary Reform 1933-1960*. The Hansard Society. Book noted by Marquis, L. C. . . . . 479
- PARLIAMENTS. See G.
- Parliaments and Electoral Systems: A World Handbook*. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . 491
- Parsons, Malcolm B. Quasi-Partisan Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System: The Florida Senate, 1947-1961. . . . . 605
- Communication from H. D. Price. . . . . 974
- Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan*. Scalapino, Robert A. and Masumi, Junnosuke. Book noted by Kawai, K. . . . 724
- PARTY COHESION. See F51.
- PARTY PLATFORMS. See F805.
- Party Politics (Volume III): The Stuff of Politics*. Jennings, Sir Ivor. Book noted by Rose, R. . . . . 753
- PARTY RESOLUTIONS. See Political Ideas Of English Party Activists; see also F51.
- Passin, Herbert. The Sources of Protest in Japan. . . . . 391
- Patterson, S. C. Notes on Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative. Robinson, James A. . . . . 719
- Paul, J. Notes Justice and Social Policy, Olafson, Frederick A. (ed.) . . . . . 438
- Paul, James C. N. (with Schwartz, Murray L.). Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . 173
- Paulu, Burton. British Broadcasting in Transition. Book noted by Alperin, R. J. . . . 755
- Payne, Stanley G. Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism. Book noted by Wilson, L. C. . . . . 483
- PEACE. See D7.
- Peacock, Alan T., with Jack Wiseman, assisted by Jindrich Veverka, Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom. Noted by Philip W. Buck. . . . . 194
- Pedagogy of Democracy, The: Coercive Public Protest in India*. David H. Bayley. . . . . 663
- Penniman, H. Notes on Secrecy and Publicity Dilemmas of Democracy. Rourke, Francis E. . . . . 175
- Pennock, J. Roland. "Responsible Government," Separated Powers, and Special Interests: Agricultural Subsidies in Britain and America. . . . . 621
- Pennock, J. R. Notes Montesquieu: A Critical Biography. Shackleton, R. . . . . 445
- PEOPLES' DEMOCRACIES. See under B414.
- PHILOSOPHY, CLASSICAL POLITICAL. See Revival of Classical Political Philosophy . . . ; also see Reply to Rothman.
- Philosophy and Myth in Karl Marx*. Tucker, Robert C. Book noted by McCallum, D. . . . 442
- Pinner, F. A. Notes on Neo-Freudian Social Philosophy. Birnbach, Martin. . . . . 703
- Piper, D. C. Notes on Studies in World Public Order. McDougal, Myres S. and Associates. . . . . 764
- Plank, J. N. Notes on Social and Economic Frontiers in Latin America. Stark, Harry . . . . 482
- PLATFORMS, PARTY. See F805.
- Platig, E. R. Reviews International Politics and Foreign Policy: A Reader in Research and Theory. Rosenau, J. (ed.) . . . . . 431
- Platt, Washington. National Character in Action. Book noted by Rosecrance, R. N. . . . 508
- Poland, O. F. Notes United States Fiscal Policy. Holsman, A. E. . . . . 473
- Political Change in Morocco*. Ashford, Douglas E. Book noted by Khadduri, M. . . . 198
- Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959*. Swayze, Harold. Book noted by Friedberg, M. . . . . 988
- The Political Context of Sociology*. Bramson, Leon. Book noted by Scher, S. . . . . 161
- Political Decision-makers: Recruitment and Performance*, ed. Marvick, Dwaine. Book noted by Verba, S. . . . . 440
- Political Ideas of English Party Activists, The*. Richard Rose. . . . . 360
- Political Ideas in the Modern World*. Heater, D. B. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A. . . . . 706
- Political Influence*. Banfield, Edward C.

- Book reviewed by Scoble, H. M. . . . . 151
- Political Justice: The Use of Legal Procedure for Political Ends.* Kirchheimer, Otto. Book noted by Duncan, J. P. . . . . 438
- The Political Kingdom in Uganda.* Apter, David. Book noted by Dvorin, E. P. . . . 199
- POLITICAL PARTIES. See F51.
- Political Theory of Foreign Aid.* A. Morgenthau, Hans. . . . . 301
- The Political World of American Zionism.* Halperin, Samuel. Book noted by Rubin, B. . . . . 722
- Politics in Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara.* Spiro, Herbert J. Book noted by Adam, T. R. . . . . 747
- Politics of Cultural Despair.* Stern, Fritz. Book noted by Kirchheimer, O. . . . . 444
- The Politics of Oil.* Engler, Robert. Book review by Turner, H. A. . . . . 695
- Politics, Personality, and Nation Building: Burma's Search for Identity.* Pye, Lucian W. Book review by Lockwood, W. W. . . 978
- Pollock, James K. (with Barnes, Samuel H.; Grace, Frank; Sperlich, Peter W.) The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. . . . . . 899
- Population Control—The Imminent World Crisis.* Schimm, Melvin G. (ed.). Book notes by Kagan, S. . . . . 217
- Porter, Kirk, compiler (with Johnson, Donald Bruce) National Party Platforms: 1840-1960. Book noted by Chambers, W. N. . . . . 729
- PORTUGAL. See B419.
- Portugal's Stand in Africa.* Moreire, Adriano. Book noted by Okuma, T. . . . . 1023
- Possony, S. T., with Strausz-Hupe, R. and Kintner, W. R. A Forward Strategy for America. Book notes by Ludden, H. R. . . 210
- The Position of the Individual in International Law according to Grotius and Vattel.* Remec, Peter M. Book noted by Engel, S. . . . . 747
- POSITIONISM. See Revival of Classical Political Philosophy.
- Positive Liberty, 1880-1914.* David Nicholls 114
- POSITIVISM. See Reply to Rothman.
- Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control.* Bechhoefer, B. G. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . . . 425
- Power & Policy in the U.S.S.R.: The Study of Soviet Dynasties,* by R. Conquest, noted by L. Gerald Bursey . . . . . 193
- Pozen, Walter (ed.) (with Cerf, Jay H.). Strategy for the 60's. Book noted by Alger, C. F. . . . . 507
- The Predicament of Democratic Man.* Cahn, Edmond. Book noted by McKee, D. K. . 156
- Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics.* Rowe, Leonard. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 179
- President Sukarno and the Communists: The Politics of Domestication.* Donald Hindley 915
- Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime.* Grundstein, Nathan D. Book noted by Rackow, F. . . . . 462
- The Presidential Election and Transition 1960-1961,* ed. David, Paul T. Book noted by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 459
- Presidential Transitions.* Henry, Laurin L. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. . . . . 173
- PRESSURE GROUPS. See F53.
- Prewitt, Kenneth. Book note on City Managers in Politics: An Analysis of Manager Tenure and Termination, by Kammerer, Farris, DeGrove & Clubok. . . . . 1007
- Price, Hugh Douglas. Communication on Quasi-Partisan Conflict. . . . . . 974
- Pricing Power and the Public Interest, A Study Based on Steel.* Means, Gardiner C. Book review by Latham, E. . . . . 690
- PRIMARIES. See F8.
- Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages.* Ullmann, Walter. Book noted by Riesenber, P. . . . . 447
- Pritchett, C. Herman (ed.) (with Murphy, Walter F.) Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process. Book noted by Vose, C. E. . . . . 717
- Problems of American Economic Growth.* Morris, Bruce R. Book noted by Reagan, M. D. . . . . 174
- Professional Diplomacy in the United States: 1779-1939.* Ilchman, Warren Frederick. Book noted by Crabb Jr. C. V. . . . . 177
- PROPAGANDA. See F15.
- Prophets of the Revolution: Profiles of Latin American Leaders.* Alexander, Robert J. Book noted by Burnett, B. G. . . . . 481
- Prospectives on Peace, 1910-1960.* Published under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Book noted by Fried, J. H. E. . . . . 763
- PROTEST. See B21.
- PSI. See The Italian Socialist Party.
- PSYCHOLOGY. See AA2 and F1.
- PUBLIC OPINION. See F1.
- Public Opinion and Foreign Policy.* Rosenau, James N. Book noted by Smith, B. L. . . . . 441
- Pye, Lucian W. Politics, Personality, and Nation Building: Burma's Search for Identity. Book review by Lockwood, W. W. . . . . 978
- Quasi-Partisan Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System: The Florida Senate, 1947-1961.* Malcolm B. Parsons. . . . . 695

- Communication from H. D. Price . . . . . 974
- Quatrième République et sa Politique Extérieure*, La. Grosser, Alfred. Book noted by Kirchheimer, O. H. . . . . 1017
- Questions in Parliament*; Chester, D. N. and Bowring, Nona. Book noted by Millett, J. H. . . . . 753
- RACE RELATIONS & PROBLEMS. See B151, C41 and H211.
- RACE DISCRIMINATION. See London's New-comers; see also C41, B151 and H211.
- Rackow, F. Notes Presidential Delegation of Authority in Wartime . . . . . 462
- Radicalism and the Revolt against Reason: The Social Theories of Georges Sorel; with a translation of his essay on The Decomposition of Marxism*. Horowitz, Irving Louis, Book noted by Witte, W. D. S. . . . 439
- Radway, Lawrence I. Reviews The Common Defense: Strategic Programs in National Politics. Huntington, Samuel P. . . . . 982
- Ransone, Jr., C. B. Notes on Texas: Its Government and Politics. Benton, Wilbourn E. . . . . 466
- Reagan, M. D. Notes on Problems of American Economic Growth. Morris, Bruce R. . 174
- Recognition of Communist China?* Newman, Robert P. Book review by Stauffer, R. B. . 145
- Red Phoenix, The: Russia Since World War II*, by Harry Schwartz, noted by John N. Hazard. . . . . 191
- Reiff, Henry. The United States and the Treaty Law of the Sea. Book noted by Mander, L. A. . . . . 505
- Reinhold Niebuhr: New Orthodoxy for Old Liberalism*. McWilliams, Wilson Carey . . 874
- The Relation Between International Law and Municipal Law in the Netherlands and in the United States*. Erades, L. and Gould, W. L. Book notes by Booth, D. A. . . . . 218
- Religion, Government, and Education* (ed.). Brickman, William W. and Lehrer, Stanley. Book noted by LaNoue, G. R. . . . . 468
- The Religious Factor*. Lenski, Gerhard. Book noted by Davis, H. R. . . . . 159
- Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960*. Andrew R. Baggaley . . . . . 66
- Remec, P. P. Notes on International Immunities. Jenks, Wilfred . . . . . 502
- Remec, Peter M. The Position of the Individual in International Law according to Grotius and Vattel. Book noted by Engel, S. . . . . 767
- Render Unto Caesar. The Flag-Salute Controversy*. Manwaring, David R. Book noted by Rigby, G. . . . . 1004
- Reply to Rothman*, A. Joseph Cropsey . . . 353
- A Report on Social Security Programs in the Soviet Union*. U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Book reviewed by Somers, H. M. . . . . 149
- Reshetar, J. S. Jr. Notes on Soviet Policy Towards International Control of Atomic Energy. Nogee, Joseph L. . . . . 506
- RESOLUTIONS, CONSTITUENCY. See The Political Ideas of English Party Activists. "Responsible Government," Separated Powers, and Special Interests: Agricultural Subsidies in Britain and America. J. Roland Pennock . . . . . 621
- Retzlaff, R. H. Book notes on A Comparative Study of the Indian Constitution, Vol. 1: General Principles of Organization. Sen, Sirdar D. K. . . . . 202
- Revival of Classical Political Philosophy, The: A Critique*. Stanley Rothman . . . . 341; 682 et seq.
- REVOLUTION. See B59.
- Rice, R. R. Notes on The La Guardia Years: Machine and Reform Politics in New York City. Garrett, Charles . . . . . 726
- Notes on Thirty Explosive Years in Los Angeles County. Ford, John Anson . . . 726
- Richardson, C. B. Notes on South African Predicament: The Economics of Apartheid. Spooner, F. P. . . . . 487
- Riesenberg, P. Notes Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages. Ullman, W. . . . . 447
- Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism Versus Communism*. Váli, Ferenc C. Book noted by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 489
- Rigby, G. Notes on Render unto Caesar. The Flag-Salute Controversy. Manwaring, David R. . . . . 1004
- RIKER, WILLIAM H. See AA2.
- Riker, William H., & Niemi, Donald. The Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives . . . . . 58
- RIO PACT. See D612.
- Ritchie, D. G. See Positive Liberty.
- Ritchie, W. A. Book notes on Europe's Needs and Resources. Dewhurst, J. F.; Coppock, J. O.; Yates, P. L.; and associates . . . . . 208
- Ritchie, W. A. Notes on Political Ideas in the Modern World. Heater, D. B. . . . . 706
- Rivlin, Alice M. The Role of the Federal Government in Financing Higher Education. Book noted by Abbott, F. C. . . . . 731
- The Robe and the Sword: The Methodist Church and the Rise of American Imperialism*. MacKenzie, Kenneth M. Book noted by Morrow, R. E. . . . . 470
- Roberts, William H. Bibliography on International Law and Relations . . . . . 219, 510
- Robinson, James A. Congress and Foreign

- Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative.* Book noted by Patterson, S. C. . . . . 719
- Ibid.* Reviewed by Stokes, D. E. . . . . 984
- Roche, John P. Courts and Rights: The American Judiciary in Action. Book noted by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
- Rogow, A. Reviews The Manipulation of Human Behavior. Biderman, A. D. and Zimmer, H. (eds.) . . . . . 424
- The Role of the Federal Government in Financing Higher Education.* Rivlin, Alice M. Book noted by Abbott, F. C. . . . . 731
- Role of the Military in Underdeveloped Countries, The.* Johnson, John J. (ed.). Book noted by Singer, J. David. . . . . 1019
- ROLL CALLS. See The Stability of Coalitions.
- ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Deviation Control: A Study in the Dynamics of Doctrinal Conflict. Zbigniew Brzezinski. . . . . 5
- See also B12439.
- Rondot, Pierre. The Changing Patterns of the Middle East. Book noted by Lucatz, N. . . . . 488
- Rosberg, Carl (and Bennett, George). The Kenyatta Election: Kenya 1960-1961. Book noted by McConnell, G. . . . . 484
- Rose, R. Notes on Party Politics (Volume III): The Stuff of Politics. Jennings, Sir Ivor. . . . . 753
- Rose, Richard. The Political Ideas of English Party Activists. . . . . 360
- Rosecrance, R. N. Notes on National Character in Action. Platt, Washington. . . . . 508
- Rosenau, James N. (ed.) International Politics and Foreign Policy: A Reader in Research and Theory. Book reviewed by Platig, E. R. . . . . 431
- Rosenau, James N. Public Opinion and Foreign Policy. Book noted by Smith, B. L. . . . . 441
- Rossiter, Clinton. Conservatism in America: The Thankless Persuasion. Book noted by McGiffert, Michael. . . . . 724
- Rothchild, D. S. Notes on The Backward Society. Frost, Raymond. . . . . 504
- Rothenberg, Jerone. The Measurement of Social Welfare. Book noted by Lindblom, C. E. . . . . 702
- Rothman, S. Notes on Food, Land, and Manpower in Western Europe. Yates, P. Lamartine. . . . . 506
- Rothman, A. Reply to. See A Reply to Rothman; also see Rejoinder to Cropsey.
- Rothman, Stanley. The Revival of Classical Political Philosophy: A Critique. 341; 682 et seq. Rubin, B. Notes on The Political World of American Zionism. Halperin, Samuel. . . . . 722
- Rourke, Francis E. Secrecy and Publicity Dilemmas of Democracy. Book noted by Penniman, H. . . . . 175
- Rowe, Leonard. Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics. Book noted by Leiserson, A. . . . . 179
- RUSSIA. See B414.
- Russia and the West Under Lenin and Stalin.* Kennan, George F. Book reviewed by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 148
- Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets.* Friedberg, Maurice. Book noted by Swayze, H. . . . . 989
- The Russian Revolution.* Berdyaev, Nicholas. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- The Russian Revolution and Lenninism or Marxism?* Luxemburg, Rosa. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162
- Safran, Nadav. Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt 1804-1952. Book noted by Gerteiny, A. G. . . . . 748
- Sawyer, Jack (with McRae, Duncan Jr.) Game Theory and Cumulative Voting in Illinois: 1902-1954. . . . . 936
- The St. Lawrence Waterway: A Study in Politics and Diplomacy.* Willoughby, Wm. R. Book notes by Hodgetts, J. E. . . . . 215
- Salem, E. Notes on Middle Eastern Affairs: Number Two (St. Antony's Papers No. 11). Hourani, Albert (ed.) . . . . . 761
- Sandifer, D. V. Notes on The United Nations: Constitutional Developments, Growth and Possibilities. Cohen, Benjamin B. . . . . 501
- SANDYS, DUNCAN. See Market for Strategic Ideas.
- Sartori, Giovanni. Constitutionalism: A Preliminary Discussion. . . . . 853
- Scalapino, Robert A. (and Masumi, Junnosuke). Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan. Book noted by Kawai, K. . . . . 742
- SCANDINAVIA. See B413.
- Schaar, J. H. Note on H. G. Wells and the World State by W. W. Wagar. . . . . 160
- Schattschneider, E. E. (with Jones, Victor). Local Political Surveys. Book noted by Wright, D. S. . . . . 991
- Scher, S. Notes on The Political Context of Sociology. Bramson, Leon. . . . . 161
- Schimm, Melvin G. (ed.). Population Control—The Imminent World Crisis. Book notes by Kagan, S. . . . . 217
- Schilling, Warner R. Scientists, Foreign Policy, and Politics. . . . . 287
- Schmandt, Henry J. Book note on The Government of Missouri, 7th Edition, by Karsch, Robert F. . . . . 1008

- Schwartz, Harry. The Red Phoenix: Russia Since World War II. Book noted by John N. Hazard. . . . . 191
- Schwartz, Murray L. (with Paul, James C. N.). Federal Censorship: Obscenity in the Mail. Book noted by Longaker, R. P. 173
- Scientists, Foreign Policy, and Politics. Schilling, Warner R. . . . . 287
- Scoble, H. M. Reviews Political Influence. Banfield, Edward C. . . . . 151
- SCOTLAND. See B411.
- Scott, Richard W. (with Peter M. Blau). Formal Organizations: A Comparative Approach. Book reviewed by Guetzkow, H. . . . . 428
- Secrecy and Publicity Dilemmas of Democracy*. Rourke, Francis E. Book noted by Penniman, H. . . . . 175
- SEGREGATION. See Supreme Court. Behavior in Racial Exclusion Cases: 1935-1960; also see C41.
- Select list of publications issued by Senate and House Committees. Committee prints, staff studies, reports, and documents, 80th-86th Congress (1947-60, inclusive)*. Book noted by Childs, J. B. . . . . 471
- Sen, Sirdar D. K. A Comparative Study of the Indian Constitution: Vol. 1: General Principles of Organization. Book noted by Retzlaff, R. H. . . . . 202
- SENATE. See G21.
- Senegal, A Study in French Assimilation Policy. Crowder, Michael. Book noted. . . 1025
- The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations*. Farnsworth, David N. Book noted by Elder, R. E. . . . . 461
- Shackleton, Robert. Montesquieu: a Critical Biography. Book noted by Pennock, J. R. 445
- Shannon, Jasper B. Book note on Democracy and the Cost of Politics in Britain by Gwyn, William B. . . . . 1018
- Shefferman, Nathan W. (with Kramer, Dale). The Man in the Middle—The Inside Story of the Hot and Cold Wars Between Labor and Management. Book noted by Gilmour, C. E. . . . . 467
- A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America*. Benham, F. and Holley, H. A. Book noted by Lewis, F. M. . . . . 196
- Shoup, Paul. Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II. . . . . 886
- Shull, Gordon. Book notes on Strategic Intelligence and the Shape of Tomorrow. McGovern, William M. . . . . 211
- Silverman, Corinne. Index to Volume LVI of the REVIEW. . . . . 1056
- Silvert, Kalman H. The Conflict Society: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America. Book noted by Taylor, P. B., Jr. . . . . 482
- Notes, Urbanization in Latin America. Hauser, P. M. . . . . 1033
- Singer, J. David. Financing International Organization: The United Nations Budget Process. Book noted by Kimball, C. . . . . 209
- Book note on The Role of the Military in Underdeveloped Countries edited by Johnson, John J. . . . . 1019
- SINO-SOVIET CONFLICT. See B414; see also B422.
- The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961*. Zagoria, Donald S. Book review by Steiner, H. A. 688
- Six Crises*. Nixon, Richard M. Book noted by Kelley, Stanley Jr. . . . . 725
- Slessor, Sir John. What Price Coexistence? A Policy for Western Alliance. Book noted by Fernbach, A. . . . . 1029
- Smith, B. L. Notes Public Opinion and Foreign Policy. . . . . 441
- Snyder, Louis L. (ed.). The Imperialism Reader. Book noted. . . . . 1036
- Social and Economic Frontiers in Latin America*. Stark, Harry. Book noted by Plank, J. N. . . . . 482
- SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. See F1.
- SOCIALISM. See B54.
- SOCIALIST PARTY, ITALY. See F51 and B410.
- SOCIOLOGY. See B1.
- Sociology: The Progress of a Decade*. Lipset, Seymour Martin. Book noted by Cottrell, F. . . . . 446
- SOCIOMETRICS. See G1.
- Somers, H. M. Reviews A Report on Social Security Programs in the Soviet Union. U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. . . . . 149
- Sorel, Georges. See B54.
- SOUTH AMERICA. See B44.
- South Africa 1906-1961: The Price of Magnanimity*. Mansergh, Nicholas. Book noted by de Blij, Harm Jan. . . . . 1023
- South African Predicament: The Economics of Apartheid*. Spooner, F. P. Book noted by Richardson, C. B. . . . . 487
- Southeast Asia Today—And Tomorrow. A Political Analysis*. Butwell, Richard. Book noted by Lev, D. S. . . . . 1031
- Soviet Policy towards International Control of Atomic Energy*. Nogee, Joseph L. Book noted by Reshetar, J. S. Jr. . . . . 506
- SOVIET UNION. See B414.
- SPAIN. See B412.
- SPANISH CIVIL WAR. See D49.
- Spaulding, E. Wilder. Ambassadors Ordinary and Extraordinary. Book noted by Gibbs, H. S. . . . . 762
- Spencer, Herbert. See Positive Liberty.
- Spengler, Joseph J. (ed.). (and Braibanti,

- Ralph) Tradition, Values, and Socio-Economic Development. Book noted by Friedman, J. R. . . . . 157
- Sperlich, Peter W. (with Barnes, Samuel H.; Grace, Frank; and Pollock, James K.) The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. . . . . 899
- Spiller, Rober E. (ed.). (with Larrabee, Eric) American Perspectives. Book noted by Backstrom, Charles H. . . . . 179
- Spinoza, See Positive Liberty.
- Spiro, Herbert J. Comparative Politics: A Comprehensive Approach. . . . . 577
- Politics in Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara*. Book noted by Adam, T. R. . . 747
- Spooner, F. P. South African Predicament: The Economics of Apartheid. Book noted by Richardson, C. B. . . . . 487
- Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives*, The. Riker, William H. & Neimi, Donald. . . . . 58
- Stark, Harry. Social and Economic Frontiers in Latin America. Book noted by Plank, J. N. . . . . 482
- STATE DEPARTMENT. See I17.
- STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT. See B6 and B7.
- States in West German Federalism, The: A Study in Federal-State Relations*. Wells, Roger Hewes. Book noted by Heidenheimer, A. J. . . . . 1018
- STEVENSON, ADLAI E. See F5.
- STATISTICAL METHODS. See AA2.
- Stauffer, R. B. Reviews Recognition of Communist China? Newman, Robert P. . . . 145
- Steamer, R. J. Reviews Civil Liberties and the Constitution. Kauper, Paul G. . . . . 694
- STEEL INDUSTRY. See U2.
- Steinbicker, P. B. Notes on Modern Government. Hitchner, Dell G. and Harbold, William H. . . . . 704
- Steiner, H. A. Reviews Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era. Hsieh, Alice Langley . . . . . 688
- Reviews The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961. Zagoria, Donald S. . . . . 688
- Reviews The Sino-Soviet Dispute. . . . 688
- Stephens, G. R. Notes on Green Belts and Urban Growth: English Town and Country Planning in Action. Mandelker, D. R. . . . . 751
- Stern Fritz. Politics of Cultural Despair. Book noted by Kirchheimer, O. . . . . 444
- STEVENSON, ADLAI E. See F5.
- Stoessinger, J. G. Notes on The United States and The United Nations. Wilcox Francis O. (ed.). and Haviland, H. Field, Jr. . . . . 500
- Stokes, D. D. Reviews Congress and Foreign Policy-Making: A Study in Legislative Influence and Initiative. Robinson, James A. . . . . 984
- Storm Over Laos—A Contemporary History*. Champassak, Prince Sisouk Na. Book noted by Fall, B. B. . . . . 201
- Stortinget på naert hold*. Øisang, Per. Book noted by Anderson S. V. . . . . 203
- Stout, Hiram M., compiler of Bibliography on Foreign and Comparative Government. . . . . 203, 491, 756, 1025
- STRATEGIC IDEAS, BRITAIN. See Market for Strategic Ideas
- Strategic Intelligence and the Shape of Tomorrow*. McGovern, William M. Book notes by Shull, Gordon. . . . . 211
- Strategy for the 60's*, Cerf, Jay H., (ed.). and Pozen, Walter. Book noted by Alger, C. F. . . . . 507
- The Strategy of Truth: The Story of the U. S. Information Service*. Dizard, Wilson P. Book noted by McLellan, D. S. . . . . 181
- Stratton, O. Notes on Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics. Wildavsky, Aaron. . . . 721
- Strauss, Leo. See The Revival of Classical Political Philosophy
- Strausz-Hupe, R., with Kintner, W. R. and Possony, S. T. A Forward Strategy for America. Book notes by Ludden H. R. . . 210
- The Structure of American Federalism*. Vile, M. J. C. Book noted by Farrelly, D. G. . 465
- The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World*. Humes, Samuel and Martin, Eileen M. Book reviewed by Burke, F. G. . . . . 434
- Studies on the Civilization of Islam*. Gibb, Sir H. A. R. Book noted. . . . . 992
- Studies in World Public Order*. McDougal, Myres S. and associates. Book noted by Piper, D. C. . . . . 764
- Sturmthal, A. Notes on Geschichte der Internationale. Braunthal, Julius. . . . . 766
- Subcommittees: The Miniature Legislatures of Congress*. George Goodwin, Jr. . . . . 596
- SUBSIDIES, FARM. See Z4.
- SUBVERSION. See C41.
- Sun Yat-sen and Communism*. Shao, Chuan Leng and Palmer, Norman D. Book noted by Mao, J. Y. . . . . 197
- Supreme Court Behavior in Racial Exclusion Cases: 1935-1960*, Ulmer, Sidney S. . . . . 325
- SUPREME COURT OF U. S. See H211.
- The Supreme Court Review*. (ed.). Kurland, Philip B. Book reviewed by Chase, H. W. 427
- Swayze, H. Notes on Russian Classics in Soviet Jackets. Friedberg, Maurice. . . . 989
- Swayze, Harold. Political Control of Literature in the USSR, 1946-1959. Book noted by Friedberg, M. . . . . 988

SWEDEN. See B413.

SYRACUSE POLITICS. See B73.

Syrett, Harold C. (ed.). (with Cooke, Jacob E., associate ed.). The Papers of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. I., 1768-1778. Vol. II., 1779-1781. Book reviewed by Barrett, P. . . . . 432
Systems, political. See B.

Taborsky, Edward, Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948-1960. noted by Ivo K. Feierabend. . . . . 193

Tagle, T. W. Notes on The Grand Camouflage: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War. Bolloten, Burnett. . . . . 503

Talbot, R. B. Notes on The Farmer's Dilemma. Andrews, Stanley. . . . . 722

Tamko, M. Notes on World Policy II. A Yearbook of Studies in International Law and Organization. . . . . 765

Taylor, Philip B. Jr. Government and Politics of Uruguay. Book noted by Padgett, L. V. 747

Taylor, P. B. Jr. Notes on The Conflict Society: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America. Silvert, Kalman H. . . . . 482

Taylor, Richard W. Book note on Africa South by de Blij, Harm Jan. . . . . 1024

Terrorism and Communism. Trotsky, Leon. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162

TEXAS GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS. See B65.

Texas: Its Government and Politics. Benton, Wilbourn E. Book noted by Ransone, J. C. B. . . . . 466 THEORY. See B21 and B23.

A Theory of Foreign Policy. Modelski, George. Book noted by Almond, G. A. . . . 700

A Theory of Public Opinion. Wilson, Francis Graham. Book review by Krislov, Samuel. 985

Thirty Explosive Years in Los Angeles County. Ford, John Anson. Book noted by Rice, R. R. . . . . 726

Thomas, Harold A., Jr. (with Maass, Arthur, Hufschmidt, Maynard M., Dorfman, Robert, Marglin, Stephen A., Fair, Gordon Maskew and others). Design of Water-Resource Systems: New Techniques for Relating Economic Objectives, Engineering Analysis, and Governmental Planning. Book noted by Munger, F. . . . . 1003

Thompson, Virginia (and Adloff, Earl). The Emerging States of French Equatorial Africa. Book noted by Le Vine, V. T. . . . . 486

Thorsen, Svend. Danmarks Folketing: on dets hus og historie. Book noted by Anderson, S. V. . . . . 203

Threat of Violence and Social Change, The. Nieburg, H. L. . . . . 865

Tinker, I. Notes on The Nationalist Move- ment: Indian Political Thought from Ronade to Bhawe. Brown, D. Mackenzie. . . 990

TITO, J. B. See Deviation Control See also B418.

Tocqueville and the Old Regime. Herr, Richard. Book noted by Lively, J. . . . . 998

Total War and Cold War: Problems in Civilian Control of the Military, ed. Coles, Harry L. Book review by Edinger, L. J. . . 692

TOTALITARIANISM See. B585 also B55.

Toward a Definition of Book Review Policy. Avery Leiserson. . . . . 139

Toward a Definition of Editorial Policy for the Review. Harvey C. Mansfield, Managing Editor. . . . . 129

Tradition, Values, and Socio-Economic Development, eds. Braibanti, Ralph and Spengler, Joseph J. Book noted by Friedman, J. R. . . . . 157

Trotsky, Leon. Terrorism and Communism. Book noted by Kautsky, J. H. . . . . 162

Turner, H. A. Reviews The Politics of Oil. Engler, Robert. . . . . 695

Two Faces of Power. Peter Bachrach & Morton S. Baratz. . . . . 947

Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus in the Analysis of Dynamic Systems. Franklin M. Fisher and Albert Ando. . . . . 108

Tucker, Robert C. Philosophy and Myth in Karl Marx. Book noted by McCallum, D. 442

UGANDA. See B4312.

Ullmann, Walter. Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages. Book noted by Riesenbergs, P. . . . . 447

Ulmer, S. S. Book notes on A. D. Weinberger's Freedom and Protection: The Bill of Rights and J. P. Roche's Courts and Rights: The American Judiciary in Action. . . . . 460

An Uncertain Tradition: American Secretaries of State in the Twentieth Century, ed. Graebner, Norman A. Book noted by Cohen, B. D. . . . . 176

UNDERDEVELOPED NATIONS. See D211.

Undergraduate Education in Foreign Affairs. Bidwell, Percy W. Book noted by Burkhart, J. A. . . . . 991

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS. B414.

UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC. See B4372.

UNITED KINGDOM. See B411.

UNITED NATIONS. See D613.

The United Nations: Constitutional Developments, Growth and Possibilities. Cohen, Benjamin V. Book noted by Sandifer, D. V. . . . . 501

U. S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare. A Report on Social Security Programs

- in the Soviet Union.* Book reviewed by Somers, H. M. . . . . 149
- United States Fiscal Policy 1945-1959.* Holsman, A. E. Book noted by Poland O. F. . . . . 463
- U. S. INFORMATION SERVICE. See I549.
- The United States and Inter-American Security, 1889-1960.* Mecham, J. Lloyd. Book noted by Kennedy, J. J. . . . . 1032
- The United States and the Treaty Law of the Sea.* Reiff, Henry. Book noted by Mander, L. A. . . . . 505
- The United States and the United Nations,* (ed.) Wilcox, Francis O. and Haviland, Jr. H. Field. Book noted by Stoessinger, J. G. 500
- Untermeyer, F. Reviews African Political Parties: An Introductory Guide. Hodgkin, Thomas. . . . . 980
- URBAN PROBLEMS See B131, B15 and B73.
- Urban Social Structure.* Beshers, James M. Book noted by O'Donnell, M. E. . . . . 1000
- Urbanization in Latin America.* Hauser, Philip M. Book noted by Silvert, K. H. . . 1033
- URUGUAY. See B443.
- Váli, Ferenc C. Rift and Revolt in Hungary: Nationalism Versus Communism. Book noted by Gyorgy, A. . . . . 489
- Values and Interests.* Vernon Van Dyke. . 567
- Communication from Oppenheim, Felix E. . . . . 975
- VENEZUELA. See B442.
- Venezuela.* Lieuwen, Edwin. Book noted by Baker, R. D. . . . . 746
- Verba, S. Notes on Political Decision-Makers: Recruitment and Performance. Marvick, Duane, (ed.) . . . . . 440
- Vile, M. J. C. The Structure of American Federalism. Book noted by Farrelly, D. G. 465
- Vose, C. E. Notes on Courts, Judges, and Politics: An Introduction to the Judicial Process. Murphy, Walter F. and Pritchett, C. Herman, (eds). . . . . 717
- VOTING BEHAVIOR. Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960. Andrew R. Baggaley See also F806. . . . . 66
- Wagar, W. Warren. H. G. Wells and the World State. Book noted by Schaar, J. H. 160
- Wallerstein, I. Notes on The Edge of Freedom. Oakes, John B. . . . . 487
- Wallerstein, Immanuel. Africa: The Politics of Independence. Book reviewed by Hanna, W. . . . . 429
- Walker, Nigel. Morale in the Civil Service: A Study of the Desk Worker. Book noted by Friedland, Louis L. . . . . 1006
- Walker, R. L. Notes on The Eternal Triangle? Communist China. The United States and The United Nations. Appleton, Sheldon. . . . . 1030
- Waltz, Kenneth M. Kant, Liberalism, and War. . . . . . 331
- WAR. See D4.
- Warburg, James P. Disarmament: The Challenge of the Nineteen Sixties. Book reviewed by Gange, J. . . . . 425
- Weinberger, Andrew D. Freedom and Protection: The Bill of Rights. Book noted by Ulmer, S. S. . . . . 460
- Weissberg, Guenter. The International Status of the United Nations. Book noted by Claude, I. L. . . . . 209
- H. G. Wells and the World State.* Wagar, W. Warren, Book noted by Schaar, J. H. . . 160
- Wells, Roger Hewes. States in West German Federalism: A Study in Federal-State Relations. Book noted by Heidenheimer, Arnold J. . . . . 1018
- Wengert, N. Notes on Design of Regional Accounts: Papers Presented at the Conference on Regional Accounts, 1960. Hochwald, Werner, (ed.) . . . . . 730
- WEST INDIES. See B44; see also D8.
- What Price Coexistence? A Policy for the Western Alliance.* Slessor, Sir John. Book noted by Fernbach, A. . . . . 1029
- When Nations Disagree: A Handbook on Peace through Law.* Larson, Arthur. Book noted by Yalem, R. J. . . . . 498
- Whitnah, Donald R. A History of the United States Weather Bureau, noted by Lashley G. Harvey. . . . . 182
- Wilcox, Francis O. (ed.) (and Haviland, Jr. H. Field). The United States and the United Nations. Book noted by Stoessinger, J. G. 500
- Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City.* Dahl, Robert A. Book reviewed by Eulau, H. . . . . 144
- Wildavsky, Aaron. Dixon-Yates: A Study in Power Politics. Book noted by Stratton, O. . . . . 721
- Williams, William Appleman. Contours of American History. Book noted by Braeman, J. . . . . 1005
- Willoughby, Wm. R. The St. Lawrence Waterway. Book notes by Hodgetts, J. E. 215
- Wilson, Francis Graham. Theory of Public Opinion. Book reviewed by Krislov, S. . . 985
- Wilson, L. C. Notes on Falange: A History of Spanish Fascism. Payne, Stanley C. . . 483
- Wiltsey, G. G. Notes on A Century of Civil Rights. With a Study of State Law Against Discrimination. Leskes, Theodore. 718
- Wir sind die stärkste der Parteien! Eine Bibliographie zum 15. Jahrestag der Gründung der Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Deutschlands.* Institut für Marxismus-

- Leninismus beim ZK der SED. Book noted..... 1025
 Wise, Sidney. Notes The Economics of the Political Parties..... 1002
 Wiseman, Jack, with Alan T. Peacock, assisted by Jindrich Veverka, Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom. Noted by Philip W. Buck..... 194
 Witte, Edwin E. The Development of the Social Security Act. Book noted by Leiserson, A..... 723
 Witte, W. D. S. Notes Radicalism and the Revolt Against Reason: The Social Theories of Georges Sorel; With a Translation of His Essay on the Decomposition of Marxism. Horowitz, I. L..... 439
 Wood Bryce. The Making of the Good Neighbor Policy. Book noted by Kennedy, J. J.. 759
World Policy II. A Yearbook of Studies in International Law and Organization. Book noted by Tamko, M..... 765
 Wright, Deil S. Notes on Local Political Surveys. Schattschneider, E. E. and Jones, Victor..... 991
 Wright, T. P. The Cold War and Its Origins: The Eloquent and Indelible Record of the Great Conflict of Our Time. Fleming, D. F..... 435
 Yalem, R. J. Notes on When Nations Disagree: A Handbook on Peace Through Law. Larson, Arthur..... 498
 Yates, P. L., with Dewhurst, J. F.; Coppock, J. O., and associates. Europe's Needs and Resources. Book noted by Ritchie, W. A..... 208
 Yates, P. Lamartine. Food, Land and Manpower in Western Europe. Book noted by Rothman, S..... 506
 Young, Roland. The British Parliament. Book noted by Mackintosh, John P..... 1022
 Reviews The British Cabinet. Mackintosh, John P..... 986
 Reviews British Parliamentary Democracy. Morrison of Lambeth, Lord..... 986
 YUGOSLAVIA. See B418.
Yugoslavia and The New Communism. Hoffman, George W. and Neal, Fred Warner. Book noted by Dragnich, A. N..... 1034
 Zagoria, Donald S. The Sino-Soviet Conflict 1956-1961. Book review by Steiner, H. A. 688
 Zimmer, H. (ed.) (with Biderman, A. D.). The Manipulation of Human Behavior. Book reviewed by Rogow, A..... 424
 ZIONISM. See F53.

The American Political Science Review

BOARD OF EDITORS

Harvey C. Mansfield, Managing Editor, Ohio State University	Dwight Waldo, University of California, Berkeley .
Samuel H. Beer, Associate Editor, Harvard University	Harold Stein, Princeton University
Otto Kirchheimer, Columbia University	John D. Lewis, Oberlin University
Andrew Hacker, Cornell University	Hiram M. Stout, George Washington University

VOLUME LVI
1962

391.605

Copyright, 1963, by
THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

GEORGE BANTA COMPANY, INC.
MENASHA, WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

NUMBER 1—MARCH, 1962

Deviation Control. Zbigniew Brzezinski .....	5
Politics and Strategy
The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain. Laurence W. Martin .....	23
Congressional Innovation and Intervention. Raymond H. Dawson .....	42
Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives. William H. Riker and Donald Niemi .....	58
Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960. Andrew R. Baggaley .....	66
Two Views of the Supreme Court
Deeds Without Doctrines: Civil Rights in the 1960 Term of the Supreme Court. Robert G. McCloskey .....	71
The 1960 Term: A Psychological Analysis. Glendon Schubert .....	90
Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus . Franklin M. Fisher and Albert Ando .....	108
Positive Liberty, 1880-1914. David Nicholls .....	114
Editorial Notes
Toward a Definition of Editorial Policy for the Review. Harvey C. Mansfield .....	129
Toward a Definition of Book Review Policy. Avery Leiserson .....	139
Communications to the Editor.....	141
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Thomas H. Eliot (ed.) .....	143
News and Notes. Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) .....	233

NUMBER 2—JUNE, 1962

Scientists, Foreign Policy, and Politics. Warner R. Schilling .....	287
A Political Theory of Foreign Aid. Hans Morgenthau .....	301
The House Appropriations Committee. Richard F. Fenno, Jr. .....	310
Supreme Court Behavior in Racial Exclusion Cases: 1935-1960. S. Sidney Ulmer .....	325
Kant, Liberalism, and War. Kenneth N. Waltz .....	331
The Revival of Classical Political Philosophy. Stanley Rothman .....	341
Reply to Rothman. Joseph Cropsey .....	353
The Political Ideas of English Party Activists. Richard Rose .....	360
Socialist Parties in Readjustment
The Italian Socialist Party. Raphael Zariski .....	372
The Sources of Protest in Japan. Herbert Passin .....	391
The Limits of Self-determination: Katanga. René Lemarchand .....	404
Political Science as a Discipline. APSA Committee on Standards of Instruction .....	417
Communications to the Editor.....	422
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Thomas H. Eliot (ed.) .....	423
News and Notes. Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) .....	520

NUMBER 3—SEPTEMBER, 1962

How Can We Justify Democracy? Henry B. Mayo .....	555
Values and Interests. Vernon Van Dyke .....	567
Comparative Politics: A Comprehensive Approach. Herbert J. Spiro .....	577
Subcommittees: The Miniature Legislatures of Congress. George Goodwin, Jr. .....	596
Tension and Conflict in a One-Party Legislative System. Malcolm B. Parsons .....	605
Governmental Structure and Political Environment. John H. Kessel .....	615
Agricultural Subsidies in England and the United States. J. Roland Pennock .....	621
Equilibrium, Structure of Interests and Leadership: Adenauer's Survival as Chancellor. Peter H. Merkl .....	634
Haggling for the Equilibrium: The Renegotiation of the Austrian Coalition, 1959. Frederick C. Engelmann .....	651
The Pedagogy of Democracy: Coercive Public Protest in India. David H. Bayley .....	663
Communications to the Editor.....	673
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Victor T. Le Vine (ed.) .....	687
Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science. William C. Seyler (comp.) .....	774
News and Notes. Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) .....	792

NUMBER 4—DECEMBER, 1962

Free Speech: At What Price. Charles S. Hyneman .....	847
Constitutionalism: A Preliminary Discussion. Giovanni Sartori .....	853
The Threat of Violence and Social Change. H. L. Nieburg .....	865
Reinhold Niebuhr: New Orthodoxy for Old Liberalism. Wilson Carey McWilliams .....	874
Communism, Nationalism and the Growth of the Communist Community of Nations After World War II. Paul Shoup .....	886
The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election. Samuel H. Barnes, Frank Grace, James K. Pollock, and Peter W. Sperlich .....	899
President Sukarno and the Communists: the Politics of Domestication. Donald Hindley .....	915
The Dialectics of Supranational Unification. Amitai Etzioni .....	927
Game Theory and Cumulative Voting in Illinois: 1902-1954. Jack Sawyer and Duncan Mac- Rae, Jr. .....	936
Two Faces of Power. Peter Bachrach and Morton S. Baratz .....	947
Influence and Interaction in a State Legislative Body. Wayne L. Francis .....	953
Civil Service and Managing Work. Robert T. Golembiewski .....	961
Communications to the Editor.....	974
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Victor T. Le Vine (ed.) .....	977
News and Notes. Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) .....	1042
Index to Volume LVI. Corinne Silverman .....	1056

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

CARL J. FRIEDRICH
Harvard University

President-Elect

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago

Vice Presidents

ALEXANDER HEARD
University of North Carolina

JOHN D. LEWIS
Oberlin College

WALLACE S. SAYRE
Columbia University

Secretary

RUTH LAWSON
Mt. Holyoke College

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Assistant Director

DON TACHERON

Managing Editor, APSR

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

ALFRED DEGRAZIA
New York University

JOHN HALLOWELL
Duke University

SIGMUND NEUMANN
Wesleyan University

LEO C. RIETHMAYER
University of Colorado

LESTER G. SELIGMAN
University of Oregon

VERNON VAN DYKE
State University of Iowa

ROBERT E. WARD
University of Michigan

BRYCE WOOD
Social Science Research Council

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

CHARLES B. HAGAN
University of Illinois

H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR.
The Brookings Institution

ROBERT E. LANE
Yale University

JOSEPH LAPALOMBARA
Michigan State University

ITHIEL DE SOLA POOL
Massachusetts Institute of Technology

HAROLD H. SPROUT
Princeton University

SHELDON S. WOLIN
University of California

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW
ALBERT SHAW
FREDERIC N. JUDSON
JAMES BRYCE
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL
WOODROW WILSON
SIMON E. BALDWIN
ALBERT BUSHNELL HART
W. W. WILLOUGHBY
JOHN BASSETT MOORE
ERNST FREUND
JESSE MACY
MUNROE SMITH
HENRY JONES FORD
PAUL S. REINSCH
LEO S. ROWE
WILLIAM A. DUNNING
HARRY A. GARFIELD
JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM
CHARLES A. BEARD
WILLIAM B. MUNRO
JESSE S. REEVES
JOHN A. FAIRLIE
BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH
EDWARD S. CORWIN
WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY
ISIDOR LOEB
WALTER J. SHEPARD
FRANCIS W. COKER
ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE
THOMAS REED POWELL
CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA
CHARLES GROVE HAINES
ROBERT C. BROOKS
FREDERIC A. OGG
WILLIAM ANDERSON
ROBERT E. CUSHMAN

LEONARD D. WHITE
JOHN M. GAUS
WALTER F. DODD
ARTHUR W. MACMAHON
HENRY R. SPENCER
QUINCY WRIGHT
JAMES POLLOCK
PETER H. ODEGARD
LUTHER H. GULICK
PENDLETON HERRING
RALPH J. BUNCHE
CHARLES MCKINLEY
HAROLD D. LASSWELL
E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER
V. O. KEY, JR.
R. TAYLOR COLE
CARL B. SWISHER
EMMETTE S. REDFORD
CHARLES S. HYNEMAN

THE 1963 ATHERTON PRESS POLITICAL SCIENCE PRIZE

Atherton Press, a Division of Prentice-Hall, Inc., in collaboration with the American Political Science Association, is pleased to announce the terms of the competition for the 1963 Atherton Press Political Science Prize.

TERMS OF THE PRIZE

The Atherton Prize of $1,000 will be awarded at the 1963 Annual A.P.S.A. Meeting to the author of the unpublished, book-length manuscript that in the opinion of the Prize Committee makes the most distinguished contribution to research and theory on a contemporary political science topic. A doctoral dissertation of superior quality will be eligible only if properly revised and prepared for book publication. If the Prize Committee considers no manuscript worthy of the prize in 1963, none will be awarded.

SELECTION BY PRIZE COMMITTEE

Each manuscript submitted in the 1963 competition will be carefully reviewed by the Prize Committee appointed by President Carl J. Friedrich and the other officers of A.P.S.A. The members of the 1963 Committee are: Professor Frederick M. Watkins, Chairman, Professor William H. Riker, and Professor Richard Newton Rosecrance.

PUBLICATION PLANS

Atherton Press will guarantee publication, with royalties, of the prize-winning manuscript in The American Political Science Association Monograph Series. The author's acceptance of the prize will convey to Atherton Press all publication rights to the manuscript. The prize-winning manuscript will be published simultaneously in Great Britain by Prentice-Hall International, London. Atherton and A.P.S.A. may accept for publication in the Monograph Series other outstanding manuscripts submitted in the competition, but only one award of $1,000 will be made in 1963.

MANUSCRIPT SUBMISSION

Manuscripts to be reviewed for the 1963 prize must be submitted by April 1, 1963, to the American Political Science Association. The manuscript must be accompanied by the application form on the reverse, an abstract of the manuscript, and a complete table of contents. Manuscripts should be adequately insured against loss. Please notify A.P.S.A. of any change of address.

MANUSCRIPT PREPARATION

Manuscripts should not ordinarily contain fewer than 75,000 nor more than 150,000 words. All charts, tables, and illustrations must be complete and prepared in the best possible form. Only a clearly legible copy will be acceptable for review. A second copy will be required for manuscripts accepted for publication. The author should retain a complete copy at all times.

ALLEN JOSSEY-BASS
Executive Director and Editor
Atherton Press
70 Fifth Avenue
New York 11

---

---

Complete, sign, date, and mail this application form with the manuscript to:

Evron M. Kirkpatrick, Executive Director
American Political Science Association
Attn: 1963 Atherton Prize Committee
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

DEGREES (years and institutions) _____

PRESENT POSITION AND TITLE _____

TITLE OF MANUSCRIPT _____

NUMBER OF PAGES _____ ESTIMATED NUMBER OF WORDS _____

NUMBER AND TYPE OF ILLUSTRATIONS _____

IF DISSERTATION, IDENTIFY SPONSOR OR CHAIRMAN _____

ARE ABSTRACT AND TABLE OF CONTENTS INCLUDED? _____

I herewith submit the manuscript described above for consideration for the 1963 Atherton Press Political Science Prize. I understand that acceptance of the $1,000 prize will convey to Atherton Press exclusive publication rights to the manuscript and that it will be published, with royalties payable to me, in The American Political Science Association Monograph Series, with simultaneous publication in Great Britain by Prentice-Hall International, London.

SIGNED: _____ DATE: _____

AVAILABILITY of 1962 ANNUAL MEETING PANEL PAPERS

The following panel papers which were delivered at the Association's 1962 annual meeting in Washington, D.C., September 5-8, may be purchased through the national office in Washington. All 1962 panel papers are not available. If a paper you want is not listed below, the Association suggests that you contact the author or authors to determine how copies may be obtained. Please see below for the price list.

ALFORD, Robert	"Stratification and Politics in the Anglo-American Countries"
BRUCE, William	"The Administration and Operational Role of the Secretariat"
DONOGHUE, John D. & USEEMS, John and Ruth	"Men in The Middle of The Third Culture"
DOWNING, Rondal	"The Courts, Congress and Labor Relations"
ELAZAR, Daniel	"Federal-State Collaboration in the 19th Century United States"
EMERSON, Rupert	"Nation-Building in Africa"
FENTON, John	"Two-Party Competition and Governmental Expenditure"
FICK, Winston	"The Regulatory Community and Its Judicial Function"
FINER, Herman	"The Study of Communism in the High Schools"
GATLIN, Douglas	"Socio-Economic Basis of Party Competition in North Carolina"
GOVE, Samuel	"Local Politics: The Illinois Experience"
GRAY, Kenneth	"Congressional Interference in Administration"
HAMILTON, Charles	"County Complexions: Constant or Changing"
HIRSCHFIELD, Robert	"Citizens in Politics"
HOLDEN, Matthew	"The Governance of the Metropolis as a Problem in Diplomacy"
JEWELL, Malcolm	"Competition and Factionalism in Southern Legislative Primaries and Elections"
JOHNSON, Byron L.	"Congress and the Executive—Perspectives Gained from an Interchange of Roles"
JOHNSTON, Whittle	"A Short Critique of the Theories of World Politics of Woodrow Wilson and Frank Tannenbaum"
KELLEY, Stanley, Jr.	"Presidential Legislative Leadership: The Use of Patronage"
KESSEL, John	"A Game Theory Analysis of Campaign Decisions"
MacRAE, Duncan, Jr.	"Immobilisme and the National Assembly in the Fourth French Republic"
MANSFIELD, Harvey	"The Coordination of National Economic Policy"
MARQUIS, Lucian	"Fiction and the Teaching of Comparative Politics"
MARVICK, Dwaine	"The Middlemen of Politics"
MASOTTI, Louis	"Illinois 1961 Special Legislative Session: Some Tentative Conclusions Concerning the Effect of Process on Policy"
McKEAN, Dayton	"Lawyers and the Integrated Bar: Lathrop v. Donohue"
McLEERY, Richard	"Correctional Administration and Political Change"
MERKL, Peter	"Formational Cohesion of Supranational Parties"
MOREY, Roy D.	"Developing a Legislative Program in Arizona"
MOSHER, Frederick	"Factors and Considerations in the Reorganization Process"
MULLER, Steven	"The Philosophers of 'Cultural Decadence' and Their Contemporary Significance"
NAGEL, Stuart	"Judicial Attitudes and Those of Legislators and Administrators"
PALUMBO, Dennis	"The States and the Conduct of American Foreign Relations"
PATTERSON, Samuel	"The Role of the Labor Lobbyist"
PIERCE, Roy	"Opinion and Constitutionalism in Western Europe"
PLANK, John	"The Inter-American Economic and Social Council"
RIGGS, Fred	"Cabinet Politicians in Thailand: A Bureaucratic Elite"
ROSE, Richard	"Faction and Party: The British Example"
ROSECRANCE, R. N.	"Interrelations of Comparative and International Politics: The Concept of the Fragment"
SALOMON, Leon	"The Government's Law Business: The Solicitor General and His Client"
SANDOZ, Ellis	"Political Anthropology and Some Aspects of the Problem of Good and Evil in Dostoevsky's 'Legend of the Grand Inquisitor'"
SCHMIDHAUSER, John	"Legal Professionalism: Its Political Implications"
SELIGMAN, Lester	"Elite Recruitment, Groups and Political Development in Israel"
SHEPHERD, George	"Ghana and Casablanca: A Perspective on the Emerging Regional Systems of Africa"
SIGEL, Roberta	"Presidential Leadership Images: With Some Reflections on the Political Outlook of Negro Voters"
STOKES, Donald	"Spatial Model of Party Competition"
STONER, John	"Local Governmental Relations"
SULLIVAN, Denis	"Towards Theory of Political Attitudes in the Prediction of Voting Behavior"
TEUNE, Henry	"Occupational Affiliation and Attitudes Toward Interest Groups"
WARREN, Robert	"A Municipal Services Market Model of Metropolitan Organization"
WILLIAMS, Oliver	"Urban Differentiation and Political Integration"
YATES, W. Ross	"Residence Requirements for Voting: Ten Years of Change"

PRICE LIST OF 1962 PANEL PAPERS

1 paper —$ .75	5 Papers—$3.00	8 papers—$4.75
2 papers— 1.50	6 papers— 3.75	9 papers— 5.00
3 papers— 2.00	7 papers— 4.00	10 papers— 5.50
4 papers— 2.75

(Checks or money orders should be made payable to The American Political Science Association.)

FOUNDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

by Harold Sprout and Margaret Sprout

This book offers a fresh approach designed to help one to think more realistically about the rapidly changing international scene of today, and to anticipate more creatively the possibilities of tomorrow. The emphasis throughout is on the features of our changing world. Against this background, the book views the historic international system, its successive transformations, and its current transition through bipolarism towards new patterns. The authors' own original writing (well over half of the total) is integrated with carefully chosen selections from a wide variety of sources. 734 pages, text ed. $8.75.

SEARCHLIGHTS original paperbacks

George W. Hoffman and G. Etzel Percy, General Editors

NEW

TITLES IN THE SERIES

- |    |  |        |
|----|--|--------|
| #1 | Divided Germany and Berlin by Norman J. G. Pounds   | $1.45 |
| #2 | The Russo-Chinese Borderlands: Zone of Peaceful Contact or Potential Conflict? by W. A. Douglas | $1.45 |
| #3 | Spain in the World by Sax Bradford  | $1.45 |
| #4 | Pacific Island Bastions of the United States by Herold J. Wiens                                 | $1.45 |

THE COMMON MARKET: THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY IN ACTION concerns the movement toward European unity as a major force for change in the world today. By J. Warren Nystrom and Peter Malof.

CENTRAL AMERICA—LAND OF LORDS AND LIZARDS gives a clear picture of Central America as a single region and as individual nations. By Thorsten V. Kalijarvi.

PUERTO RICO—ALLY FOR PROGRESS shows through the Puerto Rican experience "that 'determination' has a very definite place in the thinking of all who strive to understand man's life within its geographic setting." By Earl Parker Hanson.

SPACE: FRONTIER UNLIMITED summarizes the geography of space, its practical applications, political and military effects, the impact of space on society and the future possibilities of space exploration. By Harold Leland Goodwin.

COMING IN THE SPRING—IDEOLOGY IN CONFLICT: COMMUNIST POLITICAL THEORY focuses on the nature of recent tensions within the Communist camp as they are reflected in key speeches, reports, declarations, and editorials. By Dieter Dux. Paperbound.

READY THIS MONTH—THE AMERICAN POLITICAL PROCESS explains the major aspects of the process, analyzing in detail the nomination and election processes. By Howard R. Penniman. Paperbound.

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC.

120 Alexander Street
Princeton, New Jersey

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

This man is building a car. Not alone, of course. He's an employe in a General Motors plant . . . just one important producer in a team of more than six hundred thousand employes. He's energetic, progressive, reliable . . . knows his job and does it right.

PRODUCER

It's people like this producer, far more than anything else, who are the key to General Motors. It's production people, supervisors, draftsmen, stylists, salesmen, engineers . . . people who design, decide, direct, DO!

More than a million shareholders, men and women, young and old, have invested in the efforts and productiveness of General Motors people. Every one of them has a stake in General Motors . . . and GM's biggest stake is in its people.

GENERAL MOTORS
IS PEOPLE
Making Better
Things For You

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Action Française

Royalism and Reaction in Twentieth-Century France

EUGEN WEBER

Here is the complete story of this complex movement and its leaders from the end of the nineteenth century to the fall of the Vichy government. Much of the material in the book is derived from a study of private papers never before opened to anyone. $10.00

Moscow and Chinese Communists

Second Edition

ROBERT C. NORTH

First published in 1953, this work has been acclaimed as "the best short history of Chinese Communism yet published." The new edition now covers the first decade of Communist power in China from the point of view of Sino-Soviet relations. $7.50

The Political Development of Tanganyika

J. CLAGETT TAYLOR

This first political history of Tanganyika traces its development from the beginning of German colonization in the 1880's to the attainment of independence. The major emphasis is on the British administration of Tanganyika as a mandated territory of the League of Nations and again as a trust territory of the United Nations. February. About $6.00

A History of Argentine Political Thought

JOSÉ LUIS ROMERO

Introduction and Translation by Thomas F. McGann. Now in its third Spanish edition, this widely acclaimed book by one of Argentina's leading scholars gives the full sweep of the political development of Argentina. The author emphasizes equally the ideological shape and significance of social and economic events. $7.50

Order from your bookstore, please

STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Coming in February!

THE ELEMENTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW:
A Casebook

By Gerard J. Mangone, Syracuse University

This is a collection of introductory essays, cases, and documents on international law, mainly seen from the viewpoint of the United States. The work is divided into twelve sections or topics of international law, each of which contains an introduction to the subject by the author. These are followed by illustrative cases or documents highlighting issues involved and offering the student an opportunity to analyze the source materials of cases and documents. The problems chosen focus on matters of contemporary interest in international affairs.

The book contains a sufficient number of leading cases to give the student a thorough experience with the logic of law and the international judicial process and its supporting documents.

While there are no cases available, there is an adequate discussion presented in the text involving the bonding problem of the United Nations from an international point of view.

Available Now

COMPARATIVE POLITICS: Notes and Readings

Edited by Roy C. Macridis, Washington University, and Bernard E. Brown, Vanderbilt University

THE DE GAULLE REPUBLIC: Quest for Unity

By Roy C. Macridis and Bernard E. Brown

CONGRESS AND FOREIGN POLICY-MAKING

By James A. Robinson, Northwestern University

INTERNATIONAL LAW: A Text

By H. B. Jacobini, Southern Illinois University

MAJOR EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS

By Alex N. Dragnich, Vanderbilt University

WRITE FOR 90-DAY EXAMINATION COPIES

THE DORSEY PRESS, INC. HOMewood, ILLINOIS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

PAPERBACKS

---

INTERNATIONAL REGIONAL ORGANIZATIONS Constitutional Foundations

Edited by Ruth C. Lawson

An illuminating survey of the development of regional groupings with a critical summary and constitutional text for each organization. $2.50

NEUTRALISM AND NONALIGNMENT The New States in World Affairs

Edited by Laurence W. Martin

Analyses of the phenomenon of nonalignment and its effect on American interests and goals, examining the behavior of the neutralist nations as well as the policies pursued by both the United States and the Soviet Union. $2.25

THE POLITICS OF DISARMAMENT A Study in Soviet-American Gamesmanship

By John W. Spanier and Joseph L. Noguee

A provocative analysis of the objectives sought by the United States and the Soviet Union and the means used to realize them. $1.95

THE FIFTH FRENCH REPUBLIC Institutions and Politics (Revised Edition)

By Dorothy Pickles

A basic text on French government, now extensively revised with four additional chapters assessing the evolution of "De Gaulle's Republic" and the political climate it has produced. $1.95

NEITHER WAR NOR PEACE The Struggle for Power in the Postwar World (Revised Edition)

By Hugh Seton-Watson

A classic study of the Cold War with a new Epilogue covering the events of the last two years. $2.95

THE IDEOLOGIES OF THE DEVELOPING NATIONS

Edited by Paul E. Sigmund, Jr.

An anthology of the views of the political leaders in Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America, with an Introduction and critical notes. $2.25

THE COMMON MARKET TODAY—AND TOMORROW

By Michael Shanks and John Lambert

An introduction to the structure, operations, and future prospects of the Common Market. $2.25

---

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER PUBLISHER

64 University Place, New York 3, N.Y.

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

PERCEPTIVE, THOUGHTFUL, PROVOCATIVE . . .

THE GENESIS OF THE COMMON MARKET by W. O. Henderson

"Henderson's book, written in a fluent and captivating style, traces back the longing for a larger economic community in Europe to the 18th century. It discusses the forces which opposed economic integration and describes the ingenious stratagem used by those who believed in greater European economic unity, in combating this opposition until ultimately the goal of a united Europe came into the purview in the next decade."—BERT F. HOSELITZ, University of Chicago $5.50

. . . And remember Prof. Henderson's other recent and important books:

THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION IN EUROPE ($6.00)
STUDIES IN GERMAN COLONIAL HISTORY ($5.50)

THE LIBERAL PAPERS edited by James Roosevelt

The book that has been debated on the floor of Congress and across the nation. Wide-ranging essays by representatives of the 46 intellectuals, scientists and scholars who participated in the illuminating discussions of "The Liberal Project." The contributors: David Riesman, Michael Maccoby, James Warburg, Walter Millis, Arthur Waskow, Charles E. Osgood, Emile Benoit, Vera Micheles Dean, Frank Tannenbaum, Allen S. Whiting, Stuart Hughes, Quincy Wright and Kingsley Davis. $5.00

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE EUROPEAN JEWS by Raul Hilberg

"I hardly thought, on taking it up, that I should be unable to put it down . . . For this is not merely a compilation or a recapitulation of the now documented facts. It is not yet another chronicle of horrors. It is a careful, analytic, three-dimensional study of a social and political experience unique in history . . ."—H. R. TREVOR-ROPER

"A staggering and invaluable book . . . Frankly, I do not see how anyone can read this book without recognizing how vulnerable everyone is today to this kind of assault."—ALFRED KAZIN $9.95

QUADRANGLE BOOKS, Inc.

119 West Lake Street / Chicago 1

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

recently published titles—

MAJOR FOREIGN POWERS: Fourth Edition.

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, Smith College; JOHN M. HERZ, The City College, New York. ■ A full revision of the classic text in comparative government which presents a thorough, highly readable survey of Great Britain, the Soviet Union, Germany, and France. Following the parallel organization used in previous editions, the authors assess these governments not as isolated units but as institutions reflecting the historical, economic, and social influences of the past. With new maps and charts and an extensive bibliography. 692 pages, $8.95

WESTERN POLITICAL THEORY: The Modern Age.

LEE C. McDONALD, Pomona College. This new text combines a thorough command of the materials with a vivid prose style, offering a study in depth of modern political thought from the 17th century to the present. 557 pages, $6.95. ■ "I can imagine an undergraduate reading it in preference to other texts in this field; as an introduction it would sustain his interest and give him a reliable general picture, lighted neither capriciously nor by any single over-all interpretation."—Michael Oakshott, London School of Economics

THE USES OF POWER: 7 Cases in American Politics.

ALAN F. WESTIN, General Editor, Columbia University. Eight distinguished political scientists examine the major areas of governmental power in this paperbound book of original case studies. Each case presents a sharp conflict of the past decade and sheds new light on complex political issues and on the roles played by leading political figures. 376 pages, $2.95. ■ "An excellent supplement to any major text for use in the introductory course. Through these essays, the student can get a feeling for politics in a way which few readers provide. I favor the use of a few extended selections, rather than a large number of fragmentary excerpts. This format permits one to give adequate class consideration to each, rather than frantically trying to cover and unify a large number of diverse readings."—Charles W. Anderson, University of Wisconsin

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

for Courses in Political Science and Government

---

new paperbacks—

THE THIRD BRANCH OF GOVERNMENT: 8 Cases in Constitutional Politics. Volume Eds.: C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, University of Chicago; ALAN F. WESTIN, Columbia University. ■ For February publication. In this new paperback for the American government course, eight lively, informative cases concerning the U.S. Supreme Court give the student a firm grasp of this country's constitutional processes. The cases span the twenty-five year period following the Court Packing dispute, and deal not only with the Federal government (as in The Loyalty-Security Case), but with State-Federal relations (The Flag Salute Case, and the Offshore Oil Cases), and State-State relations (The Sunday Closing Cases). With introductions, headnotes, and analytical summaries. A Harbrace Casebook in Political Science. Prob. 352 pages, $2.95

POLITICAL PARTIES IN TODAY'S WORLD. D. W. BROGAN, Cambridge University, England; DOUGLAS V. VERNEY, York University, Toronto. ■ For February publication. A new text-supplement for introductory courses and courses in comparative government which offers a fresh, thoroughly practical appraisal of the political processes of democracy and totalitarianism as they operate in selected countries: the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Sweden, and the USSR. Prob. 288 pages, $2.95

THE SYMBOLS OF GOVERNMENT. THURMAN ARNOLD. Available now. A newly published reissue of the noted survey of the ceremonies and theories of social institutions, and especially of law and economics, "not as collections of truths, but as symbolic thinking and conduct which condition the behavior of men in groups." With a new Introduction and Epilogue. A Harbinger Book. 278 pages, $1.95. ■ "... a keen and lucid analysis of the fictions, myths, and rationalizations that dominate our political and legal thinking."—Harry Elmer Barnes

HARCOURT, BRACE & WORLD, INC.
750 Third Avenue, New York 17, New York
1855 Rollins Road, Burlingame, California

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

New and recent OXFORD texts

THE SUPREME COURT ON RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

edited by Joseph Tussman, Wesleyan University
Spring 1963 416 pages paperbound prob. $1.95

THE CONCEPT OF LAW

by H. L. A. Hart, Oxford University
1962 263 pages $4.25

MATERIALS ON AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

Second Edition, Revised and Reset
edited by John M. Swarthout, Portland State College, and Ernest R. Bartley, University of Florida
1962 608 pages paperbound $4.50

THE JUDICIAL PROCESS: An Introductory Analysis of the Courts of the United States, England, and France

by Henry J. Abraham, University of Pennsylvania
1962 384 pages paperbound $2.25

THE SUPREME COURT ON CHURCH AND STATE

edited by Joseph Tussman, Wesleyan University
1962 329 pages paperbound $1.95

READINGS IN ECONOMICS AND POLITICS

edited by H. C. Harlan
1961 704 pages paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN WORLD POLITICS

edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Ralph Lerner and Gerald Stourzh
1959 590 pages paperbound $2.25

READINGS IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Ralph Lerner and Gerald Stourzh
1959 712 pages paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

edited by Gerald Stourzh and Ralph Lerner
1959 496 pages paperbound $2.25

READINGS IN RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY

edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Gerald Stourzh and Marvin Zetterbaum
1959 792 pages paperbound $2.75

OBLIGATION AND THE BODY POLITIC

by Joseph Tussman, Wesleyan University
1961 152 pages paperbound $2.25

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
417 Fifth Avenue, New York 16

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Announcing the first volume in a significant new series

NELSON'S STUDIES IN MODERN HISTORY

General Editors

C. S. R. KITSON CLARK, Reader in Constitutional History in the University of Cambridge, and Fellow of Trinity College

F. H. HINSLEY, Lecturer in History in the University of Cambridge, and Fellow of St. John's College

Recent research on topics in nineteenth and twentieth century history has produced a wealth of material highly relevant to contemporary developments and events. It is the aim of this series to make this background material available to that larger audience, the intelligent but non-specialist public.

THE STATE AND SOCIETY IN OUR TIMES

by Theodor Schieder

First published in Germany in 1958, this volume is a permanent assembly of a number of articles by one of the most eminent modern historians.

Its central theme is the two-fold process by which such terms as the state, society, party and revolution have changed their meanings in modern times—first in response to the change of men's ideas, and second because the concepts behind the terms change character.

The result is a highly original probe into the central realities of modern historical developments. 168 pages, index $4.50

Titles in preparation:

THE END OF ISOLATION: British Foreign Policy 1900-1907
by G. Monger

THE AMERICAN REVIVALIST IN ENGLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY
by J. Kent

THE POLITICS OF DEFERENCE
by D. C. Moore

THE ORIGINS OF COLONIAL NATIONALISM
by J. Gallagher

THOMAS NELSON & SONS

18 East 41st Street

New York 17, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

IMPORTANT NEW TEXTBOOKS FROM MACMILLAN

IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT:

THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED

By John C. Livingston and Robert G. Thompson, both of Sacramento State College

This American government text provides students with some basic understanding of the theoretical questions and alternatives which make descriptive materials meaningful. The framework is an analysis of the three leading models of American democracy: the traditional liberal and conservative theories and the newer theory of "broker" or "minorities" rule. History, structure, and process are then discussed in terms of the central issues raised by these divergent theories.

Coming in the Spring

IN INTERNATIONAL POLITICS:

THE DYNAMICS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

By Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and George A. Lincoln, United States Military Academy

The authors provide an analytic framework for examining the problems that beset today's world. Emphasis is placed on the central fact that today's vital decisions must be made in an international context that is constantly being modified by dynamic and swiftly moving forces. The problems of economic assistance, foreign trade, mutual aid, defense policy, collective security, and world organization are given full treatment.

634 pages, $7.50

DOCUMENTS ON EUROPEAN GOVERNMENT

By Steven Muller, Cornell University

This collection of documents provides detailed reference support to standard textbooks in comparative government. The book has three major divisions. The first presents the national constitutions of France, the U.S.S.R., and Germany. The second part contains detailed information on political parties in these three countries and Britain. The final section contains significant extracts from the electoral laws of the four countries.

288 pages, paper, $2.25

IN AMERICAN HISTORY:

RECENT AMERICA: Conflicting Interpretations of the Great Issues

By Sidney Fine, University of Michigan

This collection of readings examines fourteen basic issues of twentieth century American history. From the Spanish American War to the Korean War, conflicting interpretations of each issue by prominent American historians are juxtaposed. Each pair of self-contained selections is preceded by a brief introduction that places the interpretations in their historical setting and illustrates the nature of the conflict between them.

470 pages, paper, $3.25

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY    60 Fifth Avenue    New York 11, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Political Science Publications . . .

PEOPLE AND POLITICS: AN ANALYSIS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SYSTEM

Lewis A. Froman, Jr., University of Wisconsin. Attempts to set forth a general theory of politics based on the notion that political decisions involve the distribution of advantages and disadvantages among people with different resources. Features the integration of numerous political, social, and psychological hypotheses into a consistent theory.
1962 128 pp. paperback Text price: $1.75

CULTURAL AFFAIRS AND FOREIGN RELATIONS

Edited by Robert Blum, Council on Foreign Relations. For the first time in book form, an up-to-date description and analysis of the international cultural activities of the United States. An American Assembly Book. S-AA-8 (Orig.)
February 1963 192 pp. Spectrum  Paperback: $1.95

CIVIL JUSTICE AND THE JURY

Charles W. Joiner, The University of Michigan. Provides a critical analysis of the civil jury, including its importance to just decisions and to democracy. Compares the deliberation of a judge and a jury in making decisions. Offers a collection of the opinions of thought leaders of the last century about the civil jury.
1962 238 pp. Text price: $6.95

SIMULATION IN SOCIAL SCIENCE— READINGS

Harold Guetzkow, Northwestern University. Discusses a new research technique, the use of simulation, as a tool for research and education in social science.
1962 approx. 176 pp. Text price: $3.95

DISCRIMINATION

Wallace Mendelson, University of Texas. Based on the Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights. Examines, in local and national contexts, the total impact of discrimination.
1962 S-45 (orig.) 179 pp. Spectrum  Paperback: $1.95
Cloth: $4.25

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE MIDDLE EAST

Maurice Harari, Dartmouth College. Links the current political institutions of this tumultuous region to their historical origins and examines their effect on the cold war.
1962 S-41 (orig.) 179 pp. Spectrum  Paperback: $1.95
Cloth: $3.95

For copies, write: Box 903
Or for a complete Spectrum catalogue, write: Dept. CAC

PRENTICE-HALL INC., Englewood Cliffs, N.J.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Coming and Recent Texts

READY IN FEBRUARY

7th EDITION

DOCUMENTS OF AMERICAN HISTORY

By Henry Steele Commager, Amherst College

Dr. Commager's distinguished collection of basic source material of American history now contains 664 documents covering the period from Privileges and Prerogatives Granted to Columbus in 1492 to the Statements on the Resumption of Nuclear Tests by the U.S. in 1962. The new book will be available in a one-volume clothbound and a two-volume paperbound edition.

One-volume clothbound edition                      about 1312 pages, $6.50 (tent.)

Two-volume paperbound edition                      $3.25 each (tent.)

READY IN MARCH

MASTERS OF RUSSIAN MARXISM

By Thornton Anderson, University of Maryland

The only paperbound edition on Russian Marxism, this new book presents an historic account of the intellectual development of Soviet communism. Professor Anderson traces with lucid exposition the growth of political trends among the Russian Marxists from about 1800 to the present. Each chapter contains a detailed essay on the thought of the individual theorist plus selections from his writings that best express his major ideas. Men not currently regarded as orthodox, such as Martov, Trotsky, Bukharin and Kolontai, who were influential in the formation of Russian Marxism, are included. Plekhanov, Lenin, Stalin and Khrushchev are covered in great detail.

About 320 pages, paperbound, $1.95 (tent.)

APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from Appleton-Century-Crofts

FRENCH POLITICS AND ALGERIA

By William G. Andrews, Tufts University

This book provides a comparative case study in the functioning of French governmental systems. From a wealth of documentary material and statistical data, the writer has woven a lucid account of policy in the making. His study demonstrates how the governmental and political institutions of the Fourth and Fifth French republics have functioned in dealing with the rebellion in Algeria from 1954 to 1962. '

224 pages, paperbound, $2.35

THE REVIVAL OF DEMOCRATIC THEORY

By Neal Riemer, The Pennsylvania State University

In this original work of scholarship, the author analyzes the decline of democratic theory and presents a strong case for its revival. After giving the reasons for the decline, he outlines a scheme for American democracy and provides a framework within which it may operate. Throughout, the underlying definition of political theory is that of the critical study concerned with harmoniously relating the normative, empirical, and prudential components of political science.

190 pages, paperbound, $1.95

4th EDITION

BASIC ISSUES OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

By Hillman M. Bishop and Samuel Hendel, both of The City College of New York

Extensively revised, the fourth edition of this collection of readings on American democracy has been expanded to include such current topics as the lawfulness of the desegregation decisions, the fundamental premises and applications of the Loyalty-Security Program, the demand for a more responsible two-party system, the political implications of the development of atomic weapons and the question of co-existence.

528 pages, paperbound, $2.95

34 West 33rd Street, New York 1, New York
Division of Meredith Publishing Company

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

~~~~~

The Galleon Series in Economics, History, Philosophy and Political Science

~~~~~

Just Out

CANADA VOTES: Howard A. Scarrow

A handbook of Federal and Provincial Election data.

$12.00
LC 62-14822

THE CONFLICT SOCIETY: Reaction and Revolution in Latin America

By KALMAN H. SILVERT, Tulane University

The Conflict Society attempts to breathe order into the complex events of social change in today's Latin America.

$7.50
LC 61-12686

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS, A British View:

The Journal of Major C. R. FORREST

Hugh F. Rankin, Editor

$2.00
LC 61-13685

Recent Publications

EXTRADITION TO AND FROM CANADA, By G. V. LA FOREST

A comprehensive treatment of Canadian law and practice in international and inter-Commonwealth extradition.

$6.50
LC 61-7029

THE CATHOLIC VOTE, By JOHN H. FENTON

"This competent study is written without bias, and constitutes a reliable exposition of a problem of great topicality at the present time."
The Book Exchange (London)

$4.75
LC 60-12512

U. S. COMMERCIAL TREATIES AND

INTERNATIONAL LAW, By ROBERT R. WILSON

". . . an authoritative contribution to the literature on treaty law . . ."
American Political Science Review

$6.50
LC 60-11021

CONTEMPT OF CONGRESS, By CARL BECK

"A masterful organization of material . . . essential for any law library with pretention to adequacy." Law Library Journal

$4.50
LC 59-15941

Wartime Origins of the East-West

DILEMMA OVER GERMANY, By JOHN L. SNELL

"His account of the development of United States policy is the fullest and most painstaking currently available." Journal of Politics

$7.00
LC 59-12404

POLITICS IN THE BORDER STATES, By JOHN H. FENTON

". . . excellent example of the combination of historical, statistical, and interviewing techniques in the study of state politics." Public Administration Review

$5.50
LC 58-16327

Once Again Available

A Distinguished Text

AN INTRODUCTION TO

PEIRCE'S PHILOSOPHY, By JAMES K. FEIBLEMAN

$7.00

THE HAUSER PRESS

720 POYDRAS ST.
NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

NEW PERSPECTIVES FROM THE FIRST NAME IN QUALITY PAPERBACK PUBLISHING DOUBLEDAY ANCHOR BOOKS

AMERICAN RACE RELATIONS TODAY:

Studies of the Problems Beyond Segregation

Edited by Earl Raab. Ten timely essays and case studies probing the "new frontiers" of race relations—dealing with factors other than discrimination. Contributors include S. M. Lipset, Morton Grodzins, Nathan Glazer, Joseph Himes, James B. Conant. A318. 95¢

DOCTORS, PATIENTS AND HEALTH INSURANCE

By Herman M. Somers & Anne R. Somers. An objective study of current developments in private medical care in the U.S.—the changing character of medical practice, new patterns of illness, the problem of insurance plans, and the doctor-patient relationship. A309

$1.95 Index, charts, tables

A HISTORY OF THE COLD WAR (Revised Edition)

By John Lukacs. Professor Lukacs traces the development of the social, political, and national conflicts between Russia and the U.S., and in this light, examines the major events of the Cold War—now updated to 1962. "This book is brilliant."—C. L. Sulzberger. A322 $1.45

THE LEGAL MIND IN AMERICA:

From Independence to the Civil War

Edited by Perry Miller. The distinguished editor of The American Puritans (A80) and The American Transcendentalists (A119) has anthologized the documents and speeches that reveal the shaping of American legal thought from post-Revolutionary chaos to democratic order. An Anchor Original. A313 $1.45

THE QUEST FOR UTOPIA

Edited by Glenn Negley and J. Max Patrick. The major portions of more than 25 Utopias, many now inaccessible, but all important and influential. This history emphasizes the importance of Utopian thought as a mirror of social development from 900 B.C. to the present. A326 $1.95

TODAY'S LATIN AMERICA

By Robert J. Alexander. A broad and sober view of Latin America's current problems and future potentialities in terms of government, politics, society, education, culture, the military, the Church, and world relations. An Anchor Original. A327 95¢

FELIX FRANKFURTER REMINISCES

As recorded in talks with Dr. Harlan B. Phillips. The eminent jurist presents the raw material of history itself. From his youth as an immigrant in New York City to his appointment to the Supreme Court, Justice Frankfurter registers vivid impressions of pivotal events and personalities from TR to FDR. A310 $1.45

SOCIETY IN AMERICA

By Harriet Martineau; edited, abridged, with an introductory essay by Seymour Martin Lipset. One of the most famous—and perceptive—of the 19th century foreign-traveler accounts of America, which has been out of print for many years. In abridging the 800-page original, Lipset has concentrated on the sections most pertinent today, notably Martineau's shrewd analysis of the factors that make up the "American character." A302 $1.25

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

DOUBLEDAY ANCHOR BOOKS

Garden City, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE STATE UNIVERSITIES AND DEMOCRACY

By ALLAN NEVINS

The distinguished historian traces the history of the state universities and land-grant colleges and analyzes their current status and problems in terms of the needs, demands, and aspirations of democracy in this timely and important book. ". . . will fascinate and cheer those to whom today's challenges seem insurmountable."—Washington Post. 171 pages. $2.95.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

By DAVID N. FARNSWORTH

The committee's powerful role in Congress is clearly illustrated in this analysis of its membership, procedures, and staff. Examples disclose how the committee handles nominations, treaties, foreign aid, investigations, and policy debates. Particularly revealing is the role of hearings in these matters. 189 pages. $4.00.

OUTLAWING THE SPOILS

A History of the Civil Service Reform Movement, 1865-1883

By ARI HOOGENBOOM

Here is a new evaluation and interpretation of the civil service reform movement and its leaders. ". . . provides us with the basis for a better understanding of the antecedents of the bureaucracy in our governmental system today."—The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. "This book will easily be the standard work on the subject."—Mississippi Valley Historical Review. 306 pages. $6.50.

THE EARLY DRAFT OF JOHN STUART MILL'S "AUTOBIOGRAPHY"

Edited by JACK STILLINGER

Published here in full for the first time is the early or original draft of Mill's Autobiography, revealing new facts about Mill's life and providing additional insight into his complex personality. It contains a complete and publishable account, as Mill then would have given it, of his life up to his marriage in 1851. 218 pages. $5.50.

THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS PRESS, URBANA, ILLINOIS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

SMUTS

THE SANGUINE YEARS

1870-1919

BY W. K. HANCOCK

Smuts stands with his friends Churchill and Gandhi in the front rank of world statesmen. Until the late 1940's the Union of South Africa bore his stamp; the British Commonwealth still bears it. International relations, first in the League and later in the United Nations, are saturated with his ideas. His view of the universe and man's place in it is shared by many. To understand Smuts, then, is to understand much about the hopes, fears, and facts of the modern world.

This first book of a two-part biography deals with the first fifty years of Smuts's life. It shows him as a student, a young attorney, a general, a rising statesman, and finally as Prime Minister of South Africa. Smuts's position and problems at Vereeniging; his determined quest for answers to the Briton-Boer feud; the private and public turmoils of his struggle with Gandhi; his growing despair as he saw the Treaty of Versailles take shape, 'not as a peace treaty but a war treaty': all these are acutely portrayed.

Sir Keith Hancock knows his subject. Since Smuts's death in 1950 he has directed the assembly of the Smuts Archive, a vast store of letters, diaries, papers and manuscripts. Here he uses this material to draw a remarkable portrait of a remarkable man.

At all booksellers $10.00

Cambridge University Press, 32 East 57th St., New York 22, N. Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

Chandler Studies in International and Intercultural Relations

THREE NEW STUDIES of Communist foreign policy and a revision of Propaganda and International Relations have just been published in this series.

SOVIET BEHAVIOR IN WORLD AFFAIRS, compiled and edited by DeVere E. Pentony, San Francisco State College, presents 10 documents and 20 articles chosen to illuminate trends in Communist theory relevant to international conduct, different methods of analyzing Soviet behavior in world affairs, and reports and analyses of recent strategies in diplomacy, economic affairs, military activities, and psychological offensives. 320 pages, paper, $2.75

CHINA, THE EMERGING RED GIANT, compiled and edited by DeVere E. Pentony, contains 11 documents and 15 articles organized under three main headings. Part I provides a brief survey of the ideological, geographical, and historical bases of Chinese foreign policy. Part II offers several different styles of analysis of Chinese behavior by leading Western experts. The concluding section presents ranges of strategy in diplomacy, conventional and unconventional warfare, foreign aid and trade, and psychological tactics. 272 pages, paper, $2.75

RED WORLD IN TUMULT, compiled and edited by DeVere E. Pentony, provides the reader with 9 documents and 18 articles dealing with problems of internal relationships within the Communist Bloc. The main section of the book consists of examinations of Sino-Soviet relations and their significance for the West. Another substantial section presents analyses of the program of international communism in the uncommitted and underdeveloped areas. The conclusion contains speculative articles about the kind of world the Communists hope to shape. 311 pages, paper, $2.75

PROPAGANDA AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS: Revised and Enlarged, compiled and edited by Urban G. Whitaker, Jr., San Francisco State College, has almost doubled in size, primarily because of the use of two case studies. Major sections are: Nature and Role of Propaganda in International Relations; Propaganda Agencies of the Superpowers; Propaganda Activities of the Superpowers; Proposals for Government Action on the Psychological Front; Cessation of Nuclear Testing—A Case Study in Propaganda of the Word; The Peace Corps—A Case Study in Propaganda of the Deed. 256 pages, paper, $2.25

Other titles in this series:

NATIONALISM AND INTERNATIONAL PROGRESS: Revised—Whitaker	$1.95
NUCLEAR WEAPONS, MISSILES, AND FUTURE WARS—McClelland	$1.75
THE UNDERDEVELOPED LANDS—Pentony	$1.50
UNITED STATES FOREIGN AID—Pentony	$1.25
THE UNITED NATIONS—McClelland	$1.50
DEMOCRACIES AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS—Whitaker	$1.75

---

FORMAL ORGANIZATIONS: A Comparative Approach, By Peter M. Blau and W. Richard Scott. Please see Professor Guetzkow's review elsewhere in this issue. 324 pages, cloth, $6.00

Orders totaling less than $10.00 must be accompanied by payment. Teachers are invited to write for examination copies. Please include 15¢ per book to help defray costs of shipping and handling.

CHANDLER PUBLISHING COMPANY

604 Mission Street, San Francisco 5

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

Leading Decisions of the United States Supreme Court

Editorial Consultant: CHARLES AIKIN

Editor for Political Science: VICTOR JONES

TEACHERS IN MORE than 200 institutions are using this new series in their courses this year. Pertinent decisions, individually bound, enrich a wide variety of courses in the social sciences. The following decisions are available at a cost of 25¢ each.

Baker v. Carr*	Marbury v. Madison
Barenblatt v. U.S.	Mo. v. Holland
Brown v. Bd. of Educ.	Myers v. U.S.*
Chambers v. Fla.	Near v. Minn.
Dennis v. U.S.*	NLRB v. Jones &amp; Laughlin
Everson v. Bd. of Ed.	Pa. v. Nelson
Gallagher v. Crown Kosh Market*	Plessy v. Ferguson
Gibbons v. Ogden	Schenck v. U.S.
Gitlow v. N.Y.	Smith v. Allwright
Henry v. U.S.	Times Film Corp. v. Chicago
Humphrey's Exec. v. U.S.	U.S. v. Curtiss-Wright
Jencks v. U.S.	U.S. v. Darby Lumber
Lochner v. N.Y.	Watkins v. U.S.
McCullum v. Bd. of Ed.	W. Va. Bd. of Ed. v. Barnette
McCulloch v. Md.	Yates v. U.S.
Mapp v. Ohio	Youngstown Sheet &amp; Tube v. Sawyer*

* Abridged.

Examination copies are not available. Orders totaling less than $10.00 must be accompanied by payment. Chandler will collate sets ordered for your courses through your bookstore.

THE NEGRO VOTES, edited by Charles Aikin, University of California, Berkeley. The right to vote is the most precious of all rights. This book presents 11 major determinations by the Supreme Court concerning the Negro's constitutional right to vote with full texts of the following decisions: Guinn v. U.S., Lane v. Wilson, Nixon v. Herndon, Nixon v. Condon, Grovey v. Townsend, Smith v. Allwright, U.S. v. Classic, Colegrove v. Green, South v. Peters, Gomillion v. Lightfoot, Baker v. Carr.

384 pages, paper, $2.50

CHANDLER PUBLISHING COMPANY

604 Mission Street, San Francisco 5

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Politics Among Nations

The Struggle for Power and Peace

Third Edition, Revised

by HANS J. MORGENTHAU, The University of Chicago

... the one indispensable work for the student of virtually any area of international relations and organization and on any level of scholarship. As always, Morgenthau's style is a pleasure to read.

—Gordon J. Schochet, University of Minnesota

660 pages; 5 maps; $7.50 text

Peace Theory

Preconditions of Disarmament

by JOHN W. BURTON, Australian National University

In this exciting new book the former Secretary of the Australian Department of External Affairs makes an important contribution to the study of international relations. Accepting the principle of conflict as an inevitable component in world politics, he proceeds in behaviorist terms to analyze the S/R relationship and to delineate those policies by which peace can be maintained. Illustrating his argument from the rich background of his own career as practical diplomat and statesman, he has given us an excellent text for advanced courses in international politics.

1962; 225 pages; $4.00 text

Introduction to Government

Third Edition, Revised

by ROBERT RIENOW, State University of New York, Albany

A clear, up-to-date introduction to American government approached through a comparative analysis of the major world powers.

Spring 1963

ALFRED A. KNOFF, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Public Opinion and American Democracy

by V. O. KEY, JR., Harvard University

An excellent analysis of the implications for political theory of public opinion poll findings. A most penetrating study. —Harwood L. Childs, Princeton University

599 pages; graphs & charts; $7.50 text

Public Administration

by HERBERT A. SIMON, Carnegie Institute of Technology and DONALD W. SMITHBURG and VICTOR A. THOMPSON
both of the Illinois Institute of Technology

Specifically designed to present the realities of administration, this text stresses the interplay between the formal organizational structure and the informal human relationships so important in the functioning of an administrative organization.

616 pages; $6.00 text

VINTAGE CARAVELLE EDITIONS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Paperbacks

DESEGREGATION AND THE LAW by Albert P. Blaustein and Clarence C. Ferguson, Jr., $1.95

THE PRESIDENT'S CABINET, An Analysis in the Period from Wilson to Eisenhower by Richard F. Fenno, Jr., $1.95

THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY, A Study of a Crisis in American Power Politics by Robert H. Jackson, $1.95

SOUTHERN POLITICS In State and Nation by V. O. Key, Jr., $2.95

U. S. SENATORS AND THEIR WORLD by Donald R. Matthews, $1.95

ESSAYS IN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW Edited by Robert G. McClosky, $1.95

ALFRED A. KNOPE, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE SICKLE UNDER THE HAMMER: The Russian Socialist Revolutionaries in the Early Months of Soviet Rule

By Oliver Henry Radkey

Bringing to a conclusion a definitive study of the Russian Socialist Revolutionary Party, this work goes far to explain the paradox of the seizure and retention of power in a primarily peasant, rural land by the Bolsheviks, a proletarian, urban party. Written in a vigorous style, this authoritatively documented volume rounds out a major contribution to modern Russian history.

January 21

544 pages

$9.75

UKRAINIAN NATIONALISM, Second Edition

By John A. Armstrong

First published in 1955, this revised edition of Professor Armstrong's greatly respected work analytically examines the Ukrainian nationalist movement from World War II through the postwar years to the present. The author has brought up-to-date a story dramatic in its own right and one which affords the reader a unique view into the Soviet Union.

January 21

336 pages

$7.50

THE FIRST PARTITION OF POLAND

By Herbert H. Kaplan

The first book-length study of the first partition of Poland to appear in a century, this work is a fascinating assessment of the complex and subtle diplomacy of eighteenth-century Europe. An extensive bibliography draws heavily upon archival and primary material, much of which has been unavailable in English until now.

240 pages

$5.00

POPULAR EDUCATION AND DEMOCRATIC THOUGHT IN AMERICA

By Rush Welter

In this challenging reappraisal of our traditional belief in universal education Professor Welter traces the political aspects of American educational theory. He argues that the campaign for education at public expense eventuated in a social theory that equated democracy with minimal government and maximal education, and that writers of every political persuasion have relied upon forms of education to serve their political and social purposes.

488 pages

$8.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS / 2960 Broadway, New York 27, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Politics in the 20th Century

Volume I: The Decline of Democratic Politics

Volume II: The Impasse of American Foreign Policy

Volume III: The Restoration of American Politics

By Hans J. Morgenthau. In this collection of outstanding essays, the author, one of the leading creative political thinkers of our day, discusses the major problems which have beset us in modern times. Set $25.00

Ignatius Donnelly

THE PORTRAIT OF A POLITICIAN

By Martin Ridge. The functions and maladies of the American body politic in the latter half of the nineteenth century are woven into this biography of one of the Midwest's most important political and intellectual leaders. In presenting the definitive portrait of the "Sage of Nininger," Mr. Ridge rescues Donnelly from bizarre legend. Illus. $7.95

The Politics of Scarcity

PUBLIC PRESSURE AND POLITICAL RESPONSE IN INDIA

By Myron Weiner. "... a significant and central contribution to political science studies concerning India, balanced, lucid, and addressed to issues of relevance in the study of all transitional societies."—Selig S. Harrison. "... one of the most systematic and careful examinations of the evolving structure of interest groups and their methods of applying political pressure that has yet been produced for an developing country."—Howard Wriggins. $5.00

Capital Punishment and British Politics

By James B. Christoph. The inflammatory issue of capital punishment and the events leading up to the Homicide Act of 1957 are here used to examine the workings of British political decision-making. Mr. Christoph evaluates the nature of leadership in government, parliamentary tactics, party responsibility, the role of the backbencher, and the place of pressure groups. $4.00

through your bookseller, or

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Chicago 37, Illinois

In Canada: The University of Toronto Press

American Foreign Policy and the Blessings of Liberty and Other Essays

by Samuel Flagg Bemis

Gathered together in this volume are seventeen essays on American foreign policy and diplomacy selected from the many written by Samuel Flagg Bemis over the last fifty years. In all of the essays, which range over the whole span of American history, Mr. Bemis displays the careful research, imaginative reconstruction of events, and shrewd interpretation of individual and national motives that have made him one of America's foremost historians:

$10.00

The Sovereign Prerogative

•The Supreme Court and the Quest for Law

by Eugene V. Rostow

This group of essays by the Dean of the Yale Law School states a theory of law and a policy for judicial action, and applies them to the work of the Supreme Court, criticizing some of its decisions, upholding others. Dean Rostow's point of view is that of American legal realism, oriented toward a jurisprudence of ethical values—an approach to law vigorously developed at the Yale Law School in recent years. "With grace and power, and from high ground, Dean Rostow illuminates the role of the judiciary in maintaining a constitutional democracy. The book brings a much-needed philosophic perspective to the current and recurring controversies over the performance of our Supreme Court."—Paul A. Freund, Harvard Law School.

$6.00

The Theory of Political Coalitions

by William H. Riker

"I am convinced," this author writes, "that political science, lacking any sort of positive theory, is in a dead end of describing institutions, collecting isolated facts, and occasionally verifying a descriptive hypothesis. My hope is that this book and others like it will gradually provide political science with a body of theory comparable to that of economics, and thus impart a more disciplined tone to the whole field." In what will no doubt be a controversial book, Mr. Riker uses a mathematical formulation—the theory of n-person games—to develop a theory of coalitions that can be applied to politics. He works out a dynamic model of coalition-formation and—in a bold and fascinating, though sobering final chapter—applies it to world politics to predict the future course of Soviet-American relations.

$6.00

Yale University Press
New Haven and London

An important new casebook in the area of Church-State relations with features that make it perfect as a text or reference

CHURCH AND STATE IN AMERICAN LAW

Cases and Materials

Edited by John J. McGrath, LL.B., J.C.D.

Member of the Bar of the United States Supreme Court and Associate Professor of Civil and Comparative Law at The Catholic University of America

- Contains all the precedent-setting cases on Church-State relations of the various courts from the early days of our nation through the most recent decisions of the last term of court.
  - Cited cases cover the entire field of Church-State relations including: acts of churches as such; the public purpose activities of churches; use of public school facilities for religious purposes; religious education in a pluralistic society.
  - Notes are given following each reported case which cite other cases and pertinent law review articles—over two hundred cases and two hundred articles are cited.
  - Includes a section of historical documents: the earliest constitutions of the thirteen founding states, the "Remonstrance" of Madison, Jefferson's "Bill for Religious Freedom"—27 such documents in all.
  - Final case is the recent Supreme Court decision declaring unconstitutional the prayer approved by the New York State Board of Regents.
- Not just a one-time project, this unique volume comes with a special pocket suitable for inserting additional pertinent cases as they are made available: $7.00

At your bookstore

THE BRUCE PUBLISHING COMPANY

1512 Bruce Bldg., Milwaukee 1, Wisconsin

THE WINDS OF FREEDOM

Selections from the Speeches and Statements of Secretary of State

DEAN RUSK

Edited and with an introduction by Ernest K. Lindley, Special Assistant to the Secretary and distinguished writer on foreign affairs. Secretary Rusk's speeches and statements (January 1961-August 1962) are here expertly organized to present the attitudes, goals and strategy of the State Department in specific areas of foreign policy; foreign aid, Cuba, Berlin, world trade, NATO, SEATO, and many issues of crucial importance are discussed. This book is indispensable for understanding the position of the Kennedy administration on intricate world problems and for its perceptive, carefully articulated analysis of the nature of the world struggle.

Hardbound, $4.95; Paper, $2.45; at all bookstores

BEACON PRESS

25 Beacon Street Boston 8, Mass.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Princeton

UNIVERSITY PRESS

Research on Family Planning

Edited by Clyde V. Kiser

This volume describes and evaluates the current state of research and examines the likelihood of future progress in family planning. It discusses programs investigating attitudes toward family planning, effectiveness of specific birth control devices and techniques, and efficiency of areawide education and action. Particular attention is given to the problems of the developing areas and the difficulties of motivating the peoples of these countries to learn about, accept, and practice family planning. 700 pages. Charts, tables. $12.50

The Production and Distribution of Knowledge in the United States

By Fritz Machlup

Investigating education, research and development, communications media, information machines, and information services, the author describes the allocation of human, fiscal, and natural resources in knowledge-production. The output of each field is evaluated in terms of its productivity and growth, and its contribution to the over-all body of knowledge.

400 pages. $7.50

The National Wealth of the United States in the Postwar Period

By Raymond W. Goldsmith

This report contains the only comprehensive, detailed estimates of U.S. national wealth and its components since World War II, showing that our national wealth nearly tripled between 1945 and 1958. The figures expand the author's 1900-1945 estimates, published in his A Study of Saving in the United States, Vol. III. This present book also investigates the structure of our national wealth, how it has changed during the postwar period, and how it compares with that of other countries for which similar estimates exist. Published for the National Bureau of Economic Research. 448 pages. Tables, charts, $12.50

Order from your bookstore, or
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
Princeton, New Jersey

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The new POLICY BOOK series issued by the
COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

POLICY BOOKS are planned as essential, compact and authoritative policy analyses of major foreign policy problems, written by leading statesmen and specialists.

LATIN AMERICA: Diplomacy and Reality

By Adolf A. Berle. The former Assistant Secretary of State, Ambassador to Brazil and Special Assistant to the President brings his own vigorous views to this frank discussion of the problems facing the American Hemisphere: a Communist offensive that already imperils security, and the need for a long term program for the future.

THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES AND THE HEMISPHERE CRISIS

By John C. Dreier. A trenchant clarification of the Inter-American System and its active agent, the O.A.S.—what it is, what it is not, and what its future may be. Mr. Dreier, for ten years U.S. Ambassador to the O.A.S., makes specific proposals for strengthening the organization to meet its new responsibilities under the Punta del Este agreements.

THE UNITED NATIONS: Structure for Peace

By Ernest A. Gross. "An important book . . . The conclusions of a jurist and the vision of a statesman . . . The advantage that Mr. Gross has enjoyed as United States Representative to the United Nations . . . is reflected in the clarity with which he describes the varied activities of its organs . . . weaving a new pattern of history."—JAMES T. SHOTWELL, Saturday Review

POLICY BOOKS are available in hardcover at $2.95 — in paperback at $1.25

Also —

THE LONG POLAR WATCH: Canada and the Defense of North America

By Melvin Conant. The interweaving of Canadian and U.S. defense facilities against the Soviet threat—an evaluation of Canada's contribution, her new burdens, and possible steps that could make a more effective defense partnership.

$5.00

SPEARHEADS OF DEMOCRACY Labor in the Developing Countries

By George C. Lodge, former Assistant Secretary of Labor for International Affairs. Labor unions are at once a prime target for Communist penetration and a bulwark against it. A frank criticism of the past performance of the U.S. government, American labor, and American business abroad in this important area, with concrete proposals for improvement.

$4.50

Published by Harper & Row for the

COUNCIL ON
58 EAST 68TH

FOREIGN RELATIONS
STREET NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

POLITICAL SCIENCE BOOKS

BASED ON THE LATEST RESEARCH

THE AMERICAN POLITY: A Social and Cultural Interpretation

By William C. Mitchell, University of Oregon

In this revolutionary approach to introductory American government, the author combines structural-functional analysis with up-to-date empirical data to paint an accurate portrait of our political system in all its dimensions.

His examination of the organic relationship of politics to American life covers the nature of national life and political culture, the major phases of the political process, and the historical evolution of political structure and power patterns.

$10.00

PUBLIC OPINION AND CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS

Edited by William N. McPhee and William A. Glaser, both of the Bureau of Applied Social Research, Columbia University

The data on which this collection of pages is based are the results of five regional studies of the midterm Congressional elections of 1950. Twelve papers are organized according to three central problems in the study of public opinion and attitude formation: analytic reduction, synthetic aggregation, and substantive prediction.

Among the articles: "A Reformulation of the 'Coattails' Problem," "The Independent Voter," "A Model for Analyzing Voting Systems," and "The Prediction of Turnout."

$6.00

TO CHANGE A NATION: Propaganda and Indoctrination in Communist China

By Franklin W. Houn, University of Nebraska

"Relying almost entirely on Chinese news reports and other official sources, Dr. Houn has produced a most comprehensive survey and estimate of Chinese Communist operations in the field of mass propaganda and indoctrination. . . . The result is a well-organized, well-documented volume . . . useful conclusions concerning the role of the intellectual class in Communist China and the effects of Chinese Communist policies on the present capabilities of that class."—The Western Political Quarterly

$6.50

INDIVIDUALISM AND SOCIAL WELFARE: An Analysis of the System of Social Security and Social Welfare in France

By Walter A. Friedlander, University of California (Berkeley)

The problem of balancing the democratic principle of individual freedom and the economic needs of industrial society is illuminated in this book. In particular, the author scrutinizes the interrelationships among social welfare programs, political structure, and ideological development. This work is a valuable addition to the study of comparative government and international relations.

$6.75

THE FREE PRESS OF GLENCOE

A Division of The Macmillan Company
60 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

MASTERS OF POLITICAL THOUGHT

Volume I:

PLATO TO MACHIAVELLI Edited by Michael B. Foster
302 pages 1941 $4.50

Volume II:

MACHIAVELLI TO BENTHAM Edited by William T. Jones
388 pages 1946 $5.25

Volume III:

HEGEL TO DEWEY Edited by Lane W. Lancaster
372 pages 1959 $4.75

The three volumes of Masters of Political Thought will be available in paper covers during 1963.

POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

Readings in Political Science

Edited by Howard D. Hamilton

Contains 117 journal articles, documents, and essays spanning the time from Aristotle to the nuclear tests and selected for their intrinsic merit as well as for their illumination of the basic institutions, processes, and functions of government. A chart correlates the readings with major basic texts.

359 pages paperbound 1962 $3.75

THE BALANCE OF POWER AND NUCLEAR DETERRENCE

A Book of Readings

Edited by Frederick H. Gareau

Fourteen excerpts on the balance of power and eight selections on the newer doctrine range from Jean-Jacques Rousseau to J. B. Priestley. Includes a 20-page Introduction, bibliography, and short index.

216 pages paperbound 1962 $1.95

Houghton Mifflin Company

BOSTON · NEW YORK · ATLANTA · GENEVA, ILL. · DALLAS · PALO ALTO

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

current

A monthly magazine for the concerned citizen bringing together in one place the significant new material from all sources on the frontier problems of today

Leo Cherne, Executive Director

John W. Gardner, President

Chester Bowles

Paul G. Hoffman, Managing Director
United Nations Special Fund

"Current is indispensable to a busy man who is interested in the very newest writing about society and its problems."

current 905 Madison Avenue, New York 21, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to Current at the special rate for students and faculty of $5. (Regular subscription $8.) I shall receive a full year of Current (12 issues). My payment ($5.) is enclosed.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

School Affiliation _____

I am not eligible for the Educational Rate; please enter my subscription at the Introductory Rate of $7. for one year. (Regular Rate $8.) My payment is enclosed.

P-2

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

OXFORD BOOKS

OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

---

PAPUA AND NEW GUINEA

A Contemporary Survey

By BRIAN ESSAI. This descriptive and interpretive account of the Australian-administered half of New Guinea is of timely significance in view of recent newspaper headlines on the ending of Dutch rule in the other half of the island. Written to fill a gap caused by the absence of a modern, unified, and complete book on the subject, this is the first one-volume survey of the territory, its people, and its present and future development. 16 half-tone plates. $4.90

CASE STUDIES IN EUROPEAN ECONOMIC UNION

By J. E. MEADE, H. H. LIESNER, and S. J. WELLS. Based on a study of the three long-established European economic unions—Belgian-Luxembourg Economic Union, Benelux, and the European Coal and Steel Community—this book tries to answer such questions as: can commercial unions be built without a unification of national tax policies and wage rates? can a partial union covering only some commodities work effectively if it does not cover other closely related activities? (Royal Institute of International Affairs) $6.10

THE POLITICAL THEORY OF POSSESSIVE INDIVIDUALISM, HOBBS TO LOCKE

By C. B. MACPHERSON. This volume examines the social assumptions contained in the seventeenth-century political theories of Hobbes, the Levellers, Harrington, Locke, and others. The author shows that seventeenth-century social assumptions (which he calls "possessive individualism") are indispensable for a liberal market society but unsuited to a liberal democratic state. $6.75

THE TANGANYIKA WAY

By SOPHIA MUSTAFA. Foreword by JULIUS NYERERE. Mrs. Sophia Mustafa is an Indian married to an African. She is a member of the Tanganyikan Legislative Assembly. This is her personal account of how Tanganyika achieved independence. $1.70

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York 16

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from RANDOM

PATTERNS of GOVERNMENT

The Major Political Systems of Europe

REVISED EDITION

by SAMUEL BEER, ADAM B. ULAM, and NICHOLAS WAHL
all of Harvard University

HARRY ECKSTEIN
Princeton University

HERBERT J. SPIRO
Amherst College

This distinguished text, used in comparative government courses throughout the country since first published in 1958, examines the governments and politics of four major world powers—Britain, France, Germany, and the Soviet Union—against the general background of their respective political cultures. The authors, each a well-known authority in his field, have incorporated the latest significant developments in this second, revised and expanded, edition.

1962; 832 pages; 18 tables and figures; $7.95 text

PEOPLE, POWER, and POLITICS

An Introductory Reader

by LYMAN G. GOULD and E. WILLIAM STEELE
both of the University of Vermont

Excellentlly conceived; well executed . . .

—J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College

725 pages; paperbound; $3.95 text

POWER, FREEDOM, and DIPLOMACY

The Foreign Policy of the United States of America

by PAUL SEABURY
University of California

This important new textbook explores thoroughly the nature and meaning of contemporary foreign policy, its purposes, processes, and prospects, and considers the implications for foreign policy of an influential free society such as our own, set against the background of a dangerous, hostile international environment.

Spring 1963; about 450 pages; about $6.00 text

RANDOM HOUSE • The College Department •

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

HOUSE

STATE and LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

REVISED EDITION

by ROBERT S. BABCOCK

University of Vermont

... highly recommended as a textbook for students in State and Local Government.

—JOSEPH PLANINSIC, Duquesne University

1962; 500 pages; $5.75 text

POWER and INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

by INIS L. CLAUDE, JR.

University of Michigan

In this decisive, systematic examination, an eminent political scientist presents a comparative analysis and evaluation of the three foremost theoretical approaches—balance of power, collective security, and world government—to the creation and control of a stable world order.

Winter 1962; 320 pages; $4.50 text

ELEMENTS of GOVERNMENT

An Introduction to Political Science

by THOMAS R. ADAM

New York University

... A judicious synthesis of the descriptive, historical, philosophical, and comparative approaches, it meets a variety of needs and meets them better than competing texts. A splendid piece of scholarship.

—FRANCIS WILHOIT, University of Miami

478 pages; $6.75 text

COURTS, JUDGES, and POLITICS

An Introduction to the Judicial Process

by WALTER F. MURPHY and C. HERMAN PRITCHETT

Princeton University

University of Chicago

... an excellent introduction to the complex but absorbing role of courts and especially of the Supreme Court in our system of government.

—LEO WEINSTEIN, Smith College

740 pages; $6.75 text

501 Madison Avenue • New York 22 • New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Eyck, Caves, Sylos-Labini, Schmidt

A History of the Weimar Republic

VOLUME I: FROM THE COLLAPSE OF THE EMPIRE TO HINDENBURG'S ELECTION

By Erich Eyck. This is the first English translation of Eyck's famous history of the Weimar Republic. Men who supported the Republic—Ebert, Rathenau, Stresemann—and their opponents, advocates of nationalistic totalitarianism—Papen, Hugenberg, Schleicher, Hindenburg, Hitler—are discussed and evaluated. German history in domestic and international contexts is analyzed—to the death of President Ebert, with which the first volume ends.

$10.00

Air Transporters and Its Regulators

AN INDUSTRY STUDY

By Richard E. Caves. Mr. Caves analyzes the market structure, conduct and performance of the United States domestic passenger lines and shows that the airline industry has structural characteristics that would ensure market results of reasonable quality with less extensive economic regulations.

$10.00

The Law of Labour Relations in Sweden

By Folke Schmidt. Sweden's "middle way" in labor relations has meant a balance between employer and union in a context of free enterprise. Mr. Schmidt examines the history of the Swedish development and analyzes its basic implementation—as in the role of the Labour Court.

$4.25

Oligopoly and Technical Progress

By Paolo Sylos-Labini. The author believes that mainly as a consequence of industrial concentration the modern structure of production in advanced countries differs significantly from that of the past century. In industrial markets concentrated and differentiated oligopoly has taken the place of quasi-competitive conditions. Harvard Economic Studies.

$4.75

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

William C. Havard
Loren P. Beth

THE POLITICS OF MIS-REPRESENTATION

Rural-Urban Conflict in the Florida Legislature. The most comprehensive book yet published on the power structure of a state legislature. A scholarly analysis of formal institutions is brilliantly combined with a practical analysis of actual political relationships, based on numerous interviews and on-the-scene observation. $5.00

Burl Noggle

TEAPOT DOME

Oil and Politics in the 1920's. The first comprehensive scholarly account of the greatest political scandal in American history. "A judicious and objective study—a splendid piece of work in every way."—FRANK FREIDEL $6.00

Hans A. Schmitt

THE PATH TO EUROPEAN UNION

From the Marshall Plan to the Common Market. The complete story of the fast-moving economic and political developments in Western Europe since World War II, based on first-hand research and extended interviews with the major protagonists. $6.00

Frederick Schuman

THE COLD WAR
RETROSPECT AND PROSPECT

"Dr. Schuman has shown his habitual courage by analyzing a desperately difficult problem instead of offering to eat a Russian alive . . . it will, I hope and pray, be widely read."—STRINGFELLOW BARR, Saturday Review $3.50

Richard F. Staar

POLAND, 1944-1962

The Sovietization of a Captive People. This profile of contemporary Poland presents a grim contrast to the image of a rebellious, pro-Western nation which generally prevails in the United States. $7.50

From your bookseller, or

LOUISIANA STATE UNIVERSITY PRESS      Baton Rouge

BIOGRAPHICAL DIRECTORY
of
THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

FOURTH EDITION, 1961

Edited by FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

- The latest biographical material on all individual members of the Association, including degrees, academic and non-academic careers, publications and fields of interest.
- Two listings of members—one alphabetically, one geographically.
- Members classified into fields of primary interest.
- Concise format for easy reference.
- Descriptive and background material about the Association.

*Clothbound: $12.50

Paperbound: $10.00

Orders should be sent to:

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

THE ANNALS of The American Academy of Political and Social Science

---

A BI-MONTHLY journal devoted to the discussion of political, social, and economic problems. Presents a symposium on the development of conservatism and liberalism in relation to American contemporary political issues as the November 1962 issue.

Conservatism, Liberalism, and National Issues

Edited by DR. LEE S. GREENE, Professor of Political Science, University of Tennessee

- Nature and Origin of Development
- Relationship to National Issues
- International Affairs

For full information write to:
3937 Chestnut St.
Philadelphia 4, Pa.

Single Copies
Nonmembers $2.00
Members $1.50

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Stephen T. Early, Jr.
AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

Written by Professor Stephen T. Early, Jr., of DePauw University, this basic text will be suitable for a full semester's course in American government or political science. In addition to presenting a full treatment of the events which led to the adoption of the Constitution, American National Government considers modern applications of constitutional powers.

A concise, factual style; abundant use of primary sources; and excellent, annotated bibliographical material are outstanding features of the forthcoming text. The scheduled publication date is January, 1964.

Carl J. Friedrich
CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT
AND DEMOCRACY
THIRD EDITION

Planned for publication in January, 1964, the Third Edition of this well-known and widely used text will bring completely up to date its comparative study of American and European experiences in democratic government.

Both new texts will be available from

GINN AND COMPANY

College Department
Back Bay P.O. Box 191
Boston 17, Massachusetts

New York 11   Chicago 6   Atlanta 5   Dallas 1   Palo Alto   Toronto 16

MAJOR ASPECTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

By NORMAN J. POWELL and DANIEL P. PARKER, City College of New York. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 442 pages, $3.95 (paper), $5.95 (cloth).

A collection of readings covering all major topics in American government, arranged according to the logical and psychological utility of the subject matter. The readings have been taken from many sources, such as periodicals, classic writings, speeches, hearings, reports, polls, Congressional debates, presidential press conferences, television scripts, and speeches and articles published in Britain, the Soviet Union, and Communist China. Editorial comments preface each chapter as well as each selection within the chapter. These comments are designed to explain main ideas, to stimulate the reader's interest, and to supplement the readings. Selections have not been chosen to cover both sides of an issue since most issues have many aspects, and citing only two sides would be simplistic. Intended for use in American government and introductory political science courses.

GOVERNMENTAL MANPOWER FOR TOMORROW'S CITIES

By the Municipal Manpower Commission. 201 pages, $6.95.

This significant study of metropolitan areas in the United States was conducted by the Municipal Manpower Commission, an independent study group sponsored by the Ford Foundation. Its purpose was to study both the specialized personnel needs created by rapid urban growth, and the training of personnel systems necessary to attract and hold adequate numbers of competent people in managerial, technical, scientific and other specialized positions. It is a factual, up-to-date presentation of information vital to city officials, civic leaders, and students of municipal administration.

TOWARD WORLD ORDER

By AMRY VANDENBOSCH, University of Kentucky, and WILLARD N. HOGAN, State University College, New Paltz, New York. Available January, 1963.

This complete revision of THE UNITED NATIONS provides an explanation of international organization in the context of the modern world political system. A synthesis of descriptive and analytical approaches, book presents both factual information and a critical analysis of problems and issues. It was written for introductory college courses, but is highly recommended for anyone interested in a serious study of the United Nations and other contemporary international organizations.

CASES ON PARTY ORGANIZATION

By THE EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey. Edited by PAUL TILLET. Available in January, 1963.

This is the first series of Eagleton Cases to be published in collected form. Its seven cases provide a sound beginning for the study of party organization . . . a particularly important, but often neglected, aspect of our political system. Other cases will follow, drawing in part from cases published since the program began in 1958. They provide excellent supplementary material for courses ranging from undergraduate to graduate level.

POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY

By NORMAN J. G. POUNDS, Indiana University. McGraw-Hill Series in Geography. Available March, 1963.

An analysis and explanation of how and why the earth's surface is divided politically. Using a functional approach, this advanced text examines the state and its function and discusses the bases of political power, internal and external. The last chapter discusses the alleged geographical control on political events. Contains a unique discussion on international rivers, transit rights, straits and sea canals of international significance.

McGRAW-HILL BOOK COMPANY

330 West 42nd Street • New York 36, N.Y.

5
books of special interest to you send for your on-approval copies now

Official Approval

This Group Plan of Accidental Death and Specific Loss Insurance is recommended to members of The American Political Science Association after careful study. It was selected as the best of the many plans submitted for this desirable coverage—drawn up and tailored by Mutual of Omaha Insurance Company to our special requirements to meet the indicated needs of our present and future members.

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK

Executive Director

Turn Page for Details of Plan

GROUP ACCIDENT INSURANCE FOR MEMBERS OF
THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION AND THEIR FAMILIES

YOU CHOOSE THE PLAN THAT FITS YOUR NEEDS

Available in the following amounts

	Maximum	Minimum
Member .....	$200,000	$10,000
Wife .....	50% of husband's benefit but no more than $50,000	$10,000
Each Child .....	$10,000	(sold in this amount only)

This plan provides cash lump sum benefits for accidental loss of life, limb or sight.

Loss of Life .....	Full Face Amount
Loss of Both Eyes, Both Hands, or Both Feet .....	Full Face Amount
Loss of One Hand and One Foot, One Eye and One Foot or One Eye and One Hand .....	Full Face Amount
Loss of One Hand or One Foot or One Eye .....	One-half Face Amount

LOW COST— ONLY 84c ANNUALLY PER THOUSAND FOR EACH INSURED PERSON

YOU ARE ELIGIBLE

If you are a member of the American Political Science Association and less than 69 years of age.

DEPENDENT ELIGIBILITY

Eligible dependents shall include the spouse of the member unless legally separated, and any unmarried children over the age of 13 days and under the age of 19 years.

FULL TIME
STUDENTS

If an unmarried dependent child has passed his 19th birthday and is a FULL TIME student at an accredited college or university, such a child will continue to be an eligible dependent up to his 23rd birthday or the date he ceases to be such a student, whichever date occurs first.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

POLICY SURETIES

24 hour coverage against accidental bodily injuries sustained anywhere in the world while your insurance is in force, except the few listed in the exclusions.

PERMANENT TOTAL DISABILITY

Includes a Permanent Total Disability Benefit, but only for the principal insured to age 65 and provided he is engaged in a gainful occupation on a full-time basis. When injuries do not result in loss of life, limb or sight, but do result in total disability within 100 days of the accident, preventing any gainful work or service for which you are fitted by education, training, or experience for 12 consecutive months, the Full Face Amount will be paid at that time if such disability is determined to be permanent.

NONSELECTIVE

Policy will be issued regardless of Past or Present health.

SAVINGS

Substantial savings over individual policy purchases because of group buying power of your Association.

CONVENIENT

Policy issued on an annual basis—however, you may apply any time during the policy term.

AGE FEATURE

Unlike many other plans, the accidental death and dismemberment coverage under this plan does not terminate at age 65 but can be continued until age 70 provided the insured is still a member of the American Political Science Association and the Master Policy has not been terminated.

STATE TAX

Third party ownership of policy may be executed for tax purposes.

AIR TRAVEL

Covers injuries received while traveling as a passenger in (a) any civil aircraft having an airworthiness certificate of other than a limited, restricted, or experimental classification; provided such aircraft is at the time making a flight which is for the sole purpose of transporting passengers or passengers and cargo, or (b) any U. S. Department of Defense aircraft, other than a single engine jet, which is at the time making a flight that is for the principal purpose of transporting passengers or passengers and cargo and not for or in connection with any other operational purpose or any tactical or test purpose.

EXCLUSIONS IMPORTANT

Suicide, war, or while in the armed services.

THE POLICY DOES NOT PROVIDE A GRACE PERIOD FOR PAYMENT OF PREMIUM.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

(Please Print)

6. If you desire insurance for your dependents, please furnish the information requested below:

Date _____ Signature of Member _____

1144

TRENDS OF THOUGHT AND TENDS OF CHANGE IN INTERNATIONAL AND NATIONAL POLITICS

DOCUMENTS ON EUROPEAN GOVERNMENT

edited by Steven Muller, Cornell University

A one-volume collection of significant documents dealing with the governments of France (5th Republic), Germany, U.S.S.R., and Great Britain. The subject matter is arranged so that the constitutions, political party programs, crucial laws, and election procedures can be readily compared. Much of this important, hard-to-get material has never before been available in English. These readings can be used in beginning or advanced courses. 1962 280 pages $2.25 paperbound

THE DYNAMICS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

Successor to International Politics)

by Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology
George A. Lincoln, United States Military Academy

The dislocation of traditional power relationships and swift revolutionary changes in the world today multiply and intensify such problems as economic assistance, foreign trade, defense, and collective security. The authors emphasize the central fact that today's vital decisions must be made in an international context that is constantly changing. They offer no set formula for the solutions of these problems, but they do suggest some pragmatic guidelines. 1962 634 pages $7.50

THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED

by John C. Livingston and Robert G. Thompson, both of Sacramento State College

The authors analyze American democracy—its traditional liberal and conservative theories, and the newer theory of “broker” or “minorities” rule. The book presents opposing points of view fully and fairly—theories and alternatives; controversies, challenges, crises; politics and pressures at home; policies abroad. This basic text provides a critical approach to the study of American government. In preparation.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA: Conflicting Interpretations of the Great Issues

by Sidney Fine, University of Michigan

Fourteen basic 20th-century issues are discussed by such eminent historians as Bernard DeVoto, John Morton Blum, Arthur S. Link, and many others. Students are shown both sides of significant questions, such as—who was responsible for the defeat of the League of Nations, Wilson or Lodge? The Yalta Agreements—surrender to Russia or wartime realism? An introduction to each topic supplies necessary background. 1962 470 pages $3.25 paperbound

MACMILLAN COMPANY

60 Fifth Avenue

New York 11, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

American Academy of Political and Social Science .....	1138	Harvard University Press .....	1122
Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. ....	1114, 1115	The Hauser Press .....	1122
Atherton Press .....	846	Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc. ....	1122
The 1963 Atherton Press Political Science Prize .....	1099, 1100	Houghton-Mifflin Company .....	1122
Beacon Press .....	1127	University of Illinois Press .....	1122
Bruce Publishing Company .....	1127	Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. ....	1122
Cambridge University Press .....	1119	Louisiana State University Press .....	1122
Chandler Publishing Company .....	1120, 1121	The Macmillan Company ...	1112, 1113
University of Chicago Press .....	1125	McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. ...	1112
Columbia University Press .....	1124	Thomas Nelson & Sons .....	1112
Cornell University Press .....	Cover III	Oxford University Press .....	1110, 1133
Council on Foreign Relations .....	1129	Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. ....	1106
CURRENT .....	1132	Prentice-Hall, Inc. ....	1112
Dorsey Press, Inc. ....	1105	Princeton University Press .....	1112
Doubleday & Company, Inc. ....	1117	Quadrangle Books, Inc. ....	1112
The Free Press of Glencoe, Inc. ...	1130	Rand McNally & Company ....	Cover
General Motors Corporation .....	1103	Random House .....	1134, 1135
Ginn & Company .....	1139	Stanford University Press .....	1204
Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc. ....	1108, 1109	D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc. ...	1106
Harper & Row, Publishers .....	Cover II	Yale University Press .....	1112

ERRATUM

In the September, 1962 Review, the advertisement by Harper & Row, Publishers, on the page facing the inside front cover was printed with an error.

The advertisement erroneously stated that the fifth edition of Public Personnel Administration, by O. Glenn Stahl, would be "Coming in January" when it was actually due for publication in November, 1962. We now want to stress that the book has been published and is currently available.

The Review regrets this error.